could believe that such a relationship existed, the defendant must be allowed to probe this topic.
The judge may not make a preliminary factual finding barring the testimony if there is evidence that would support the jury’s determination. See Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988).
EVIDENCE
(Rules 413 and 414 – Evidence of Similar Crimes in Sexual Assault and Child Molestation Cases)

United States v. Courtright, 632 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2011)

Rule 413 liberalizes the admission of other sexual misbehavior of the defendant in a case in which he is “accused” of a sexual assault offense. What does “accused” mean? The Seventh Circuit holds that Rule 413 only applies when the defendant is charged with a sexual assault offense, not simply where the government intends to introduce evidence of an accused’s sexual assault behavior. The trial court in this case admitted evidence of a defendant’s prior sexual assault of a minor girl. This case involved an allegation of production of child pornography. Admitting the prior offense conduct was not proper pursuant to Rule 413. Harmless error.

United States v. Blue Bird, 372 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2004)

Various prior acts of the defendant did not qualify as prior sexual acts under Rule 413. Standing in the young girl’s doorway and making sexually suggestive remarks, for example, do not qualify; nor does kissing fall under the definition of a sexual act. Admitting this evidence was not harmless error.

United States v. Guadia, 135 F.3d 1326 (10th Cir. 1998)

Rule 413 is subject to Rule 403’s balancing test.

United States v. Castillo, 140 F.3d 874 (10th Cir. 1998)

Rule 403’s balancing test applies to Rule 414.

United States v. Enjadi, 134 F.3d 1427 (10th Cir. 1998)

Rule 413 is constitutional. The court also concludes that Rule 403 applies to evidence introduced pursuant to Rule 413. Thus, evidence of a defendant’s prior sexual misconduct is subject to the Rule 403 balancing test: is the evidence more probative than unfairly prejudicial?
SEE ALSO: JUDICIAL MISCONDUCT

United States v. Blanchard, 542 F.3d 1133 (7th Cir. 2008)

During a suppression hearing, the judge made certain comments and questioned a witness in a manner which revealed the judge’s credibility determination about the witness – that is, that he was lying to protect the defendant (his father). At trial, the witness recanted his defense-favorable testimony and provided testimony that directly implicated the defendant. The defense attorney sought to show that the witness changed his testimony because of threats from the prosecutor. The prosecutor responded by showing that it was the judge who initially challenged the credibility of the witness. The dialogue between the judge and the witness at the suppression hearing was introduced to rebut the defense attorney’s theory. This was error. Admitting the judge’s statements was not permissible.

United States v. Nickl, 427 F.3d 1286 (10th Cir. 2005)

During the defendant’s cross-examination of the supposed principal in the crime with which the defendant was charged, the defendant suggested that the witness pled guilty without a factual basis. The judge interrupted and instructed the jury that they could assume that the principal actually committed the crime, based on the plea agreement and the factual basis that he, the judge, had accepted. This violated Rule 605’s prohibition on judicial testimony.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 606(b))

SEE ALSO: JUROR MISCONDUCT / EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE / ISSUES DURING DELIBERATIONS

The Supreme Court held that where a juror during deliberations makes a clear statement that indicates he or she relied on racial stereotypes to convict a defendant, the right to a jury trial under the Sixth Amendment requires that the trial court inquire into the circumstances of the statements, the effect it had on other jurors and whether the statements had an impact on the verdict. FRE 606, which generally bars any evidence about the contents of the deliberations must yield to the constitutional right to a fair trial in this situation.

During deliberations in this civil case, one juror told the others about an experience his daughter had in a car wreck and this information was inconsistent with the juror’s claims of lack of bias during voir dire. After trial, another juror revealed this disclosure, which occurred during deliberations, in an affidavit. The Supreme Court held that the affidavit was inadmissible pursuant to Rule 606(b) as inadmissible jury deliberation evidence.

United States v. Lawson, 677 F.3d 629 (4th Cir. 2012)

During deliberations, a juror consulted Wikipedia and looked up the term “sponsorship” that was at the heart of the criminal prosecution in this case. She shared with the other jurors the definition. The Fourth Circuit held that the conviction had to be reversed, because the government could not overcome the presumption of prejudice. The court’s opinion includes a lengthy discussion of the scope of permissible testimony of jurors under Rule 606(b) and the burden on the government to establish a lack of prejudice, as well as the presumption of prejudice.

United States v. Blitch, 622 F.3d 658 (7th Cir. 2010)

During the course of jury selection, jurors became concerned for their safety. The judge declined the defense request to question the jurors individually, but simply advised the jurors as a group not to be concerned for their safety. This was insufficient and the conviction was reversed. The trial court must do more than the judge did in this case to ensure a fair jury which does not start a trial with fear of the defendants. Rule 606 did not bar inquiry into this juror misconduct and the government was not permitted to question individual jurors to probe the significance of the extraneous information on the deliberations.

United States v. Villar, 586 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 2009)

A judge who learns of possible juror prejudice in the jury room (racial prejudice, for example), is not powerless to conduct an inquiry. Though Rule 606(b) does not allow questioning of the jury to impeach the verdict, the judge may inquire – assuming there is a sufficient foundation for doing so – whether ethnically biased statements were made during deliberations and, if so, whether these comments affected the outcome of the trial. The authority to conduct such an inquiry is based on the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause and the Sixth Amendment right to a trial by an impartial jury.

United States v. Awadallah, 436 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with committing perjury in the grand jury. He defended on the basis that he was exhausted, confused and intimidated. The government wanted to call grand jurors as witnesses and have them testify about the circumstances of the defendant’s testimony, as well as their opinion of the witness’s state of mind (i.e., exhaustion, confused, etc). The trial court entered an order providing that a grand juror witness would be permitted to describe the objectively observable circumstances of the grand jury testimony, but would not be permitted to express any opinion about the defendant’s state of mind or express any opinion about the defendant’s demeanor. The Second Circuit held that this was a proper Rule 403 limitation on the grand jurors’ testimony. The trial court also relied on Rule 606(b), but the Second Circuit did not discuss this alternative basis for limiting the testimony of the grand jurors.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 608(a) – Opinion testimony relating to witness’s truthfulness)

United States v. De Leon, 728 F.3d 500 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant did not testify at trial. The defense called a character witness who was asked if the defendant was a law-abiding person. The prosecutor objected, citing Rule 608(a). The trial court improperly sustained the objection. Rule 404(a) allows the defense to introduce evidence of the defendant’s law-abiding trait. This rule applies regardless of whether the defendant testifies. Rule 608(a), on the other hand, only applies to the credibility of a witness (either the defendant, or any other witness), and focuses on the issues of truthfulness, not law-abidingness. Harmless error.

United States v. Turning Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in excluding a defense witness who was prepared to testify that in her opinion, the child-victim, was untruthful and “didn’t always tell the truth.” The witness in this case had a basis for forming the opinion (thus qualifying under Rule 701 to offer opinion testimony). Excluding this testimony violated the defendant’s constitutional right to offer evidence in his behalf.

United States v. Shay, 57 F.3d 126 (1st Cir. 1995)

The defendant was accused of attempting to bomb his father’s car. He provided a statement to the police admitting his guilt. At trial, the defense sought to introduce evidence from a psychiatrist that the defendant suffered from a mental disorder that causes its victims to make false and grandiose statements without regard to the consequences – pseudologia fantastica. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. The evidence was admissible under Rule 608(a) because the evidence was admissible opinion evidence relating to the character of a witness; it was admissible under Rule 405 to prove a relevant character trait; and it was admissible under Rule 702 because such expert testimony was necessary to contradict the common sense notion that people do not generally make untrue inculpatory statements.

United States v. Dotson, 799 F.2d 189 (5th Cir. 1986)

Government agents were permitted to testify that in their opinion, the defendant’s witnesses were untruthful and should not be believed by the jury. The agents had only minimal contact with any of these witnesses prior to trial. Though it is not per se improper for an agent to testify about the veracity of a witness, there must be some foundation and proof that the agent has a basis upon which to form this opinion. No such foundation was established and it was reversible error to permit the testimony.
EVIDENCE

(Rule 608(b) – Impeachment through prior bad acts)

United States v. Demarco, 784 F.3d 388 (7th Cir. 2015)

If a witness testifies to a certain fact, the defense may offer evidence that the witness made an inconsistent statement previously (Rule 613). To prove the inconsistent statement, the proponent of the evidence may ask the person who heard the inconsistent statement what the witness had previously said. This is precisely what Rule 613 envisions. In this case, the trial court held that offering the inconsistent statement through the other witness was barred by Rule 608(b)’s limitation on extrinsic evidence. This was error. While Rule 608(b) prohibits the use of extrinsic evidence to prove the witness’s prior bad act (where the bad act itself is the impeaching evidence), it does not prohibit the introduction of prior inconsistent statements that are expressly authorized by Rule 613.

United States v. Abair, 746 F.3d 260 (7th Cir. 2014)

The prosecutor improperly cross-examined the defendant in a manner that assumed her culpability for false statements on a tax return and on a student financial aid application. This was improper Rule 608(b) impeachment. When the defendant denied making the false statement, which should have concluded the Rule 608(b) inquiry, the prosecutor pressed on, assuming the defendant’s guilt of the false statement without sufficient foundation. The government failed to offer sufficient reason to believe that the tax return and financial aid application had any bearing on the defendant’s truthfulness.

United States v. Delgado-Marrero, 744 F.3d 167 (1st Cir. 2014)

The defense sought to introduce evidence to impeach the testimony of a police officer who had participated in undercover activities that involved luring the defendant (a police officer) into corrupt efforts to provide security for a drug deal. The evidence that the defense proffered involved other efforts of the undercover officer to lure police to engage in corrupt activities. This testimony was offered to support the entrapment defense. The trial court excluded the evidence pursuant to Rule 608(b), on the theory that extrinsic acts of misconduct on the part of a witness are not admissible if the evidence is offered to impeach the credibility of the witness. The First Circuit reversed: Rule 608(b) only limits extrinsic evidence that is offered for the sole purpose of attacking the character of the witness. Rule 608(b) does not limit the defendant’s right to offer evidence that impeaches the witness for bias, or prior inconsistent statements, or to impeach his trial testimony. Quoting from United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984), the First Circuit wrote, “It would be a strange rule of law which held that relevant, competent evidence which tended to show bias on the part of a witness was nonetheless inadmissible because it also tended to show that the witness was a liar.”

United States v. Woodard, 699 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2012)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from cross-examining a law enforcement officer about a prior judge’s determination that the officer was not credible. This method of impeachment is permitted under Rule 608(b). The factors the court should consider in exercising its discretion are as follows: (1) whether the prior finding involved a determination of the officer’s credibility generally, or just in that case; (2) whether the prior testimony involved a subject matter similar to the subject matter in the instant case; (3) whether the prior “lie” was in a judicial proceeding or some other forum; (4) whether the prior lie was about a significant matter; (5) how much time had elapsed between the two proceedings; (6) whether the witness had a motive to lie in the prior proceeding and whether the same motive existed in this proceeding; (7) whether any explanation offered by the witness in the prior proceeding was plausible. The holding in this case is not limited to prior testimony of law enforcement officers, but applies to any witness.

United States v. White, 692 F.3d 235 (2d Cir. 2012)

Based on Cedeno, which was decided after the trial was held in this case, the Second Circuit held that it was reversible error to exclude evidence of a prior judicial finding that a government witness was not credible. The prior judicial finding involved the law enforcement officer’s testimony at a suppression hearing which the judge, in that case, refused to credit. The appellate court also held that excluding evidence of the government’s initial charging decision was also reversible error. The defendant was an occupant of a vehicle with four women. Three guns were found in the car. One of the guns was allegedly found in the defendant’s pocket. The women, however, were initially charged with possessing all the guns, including the gun allegedly found in the defendant’s pocket. Subsequently, the government changed its charging decision. The appellate court held that the defendant should have been permitted to introduce evidence about the initial arrest of the women for that gun.

Jackson v. Nevada, 688 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with raping his ex-girlfriend. He sought to introduce evidence of numerous false allegations of rape (including the testimony of police officers who had responded to earlier claims of rape). The state court excluded this evidence. In part, the exclusion was based on the defendant’s failure to comply with a state law requiring pretrial notice of the intent to introduce prior false allegation evidence. See also Holley v. Yarborough, 568 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2009). THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED in Nevada v. Jackson, 133 S. Ct. 1990 (2013). The Court held that the Nevada rule of evidence (comparable to Rule 608(b) FRE) that barred extrinsic evidence of a witness’s prior acts of dishonesty was not unconstitutional. The Court also noted that the state rule also permitted such evidence of prior false allegations if the defendant provided pretrial notice, a rule that the Court held was properly enforced in the state courts.

United States v. Cedeno, 644 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2011)

The trial court erred – though it was harmless error – in barring the defense from questioning a prosecution witness about a prior judicial finding that the witness was not credible. The witness’s prior testimony can be viewed as prior conduct that comes within the scope of Rule 608(b). See also, United States v. Terry, 702 F.2d 299, 316 (2d Cir. 1983).

United States v. Ramirez, 609 F.3d 495 (2d Cir. 2010)

Generally, Rule 608(b) provides that impeachment by questioning a witness about a prior bad act can only be accomplished by means of cross-examination and extrinsic evidence is not permitted. In this case, the Second Circuit notes an exception to this rule: if the witness, on direct testifies to some fact (“I never previously dealt in drugs”), the opposing party may introduce evidence to contradict the testimony of the witness. This is known as “impeachment by contradiction.” This doctrine is not so clearly applicable in a situation where a defendant, on cross-examination, asserts a fact that the government then seeks to disprove through extrinsic evidence. Noting that the rule is not clear in this situation, the Second Circuit holds that the defendant in this case, during cross-examination, did not make an assertion that deserved rebuttal through extrinsic evidence.

_United States v. McGee_, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005)

The defendant testified at trial and on cross examination, he stated that he did not routinely lie to people to get out of trouble. The prosecution then played a taped phone call (made at the jail where he was held) between the defendant and his employer during which the defendant made up an elaborate lie about his absence from work. This violated the provision in Rule 608(b) which bars the use of extrinsic evidence. The tape was not admissible as a Rule 613 prior inconsistent statement, because the tape was not inconsistent with specific trial testimony; rather, it was offered to prove the defendant’s lack of credibility, that is, Rule 608(b) other bad act impeachment evidence. Harmless error.

_United States v. Dawson_, 434 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2006)

The defense sought to cross-examine a witness by making reference to another judge’s credibility finding regarding the witness’s denial of having committed a prior bad act. The government sought to bar this cross-examination on the theory that it amounted to introducing extrinsic evidence of the witness’s prior bad act. The Seventh Circuit disagreed and held that this form of cross-examination was not barred by Rule 608(b)’s no extrinsic evidence rule.

_United States v. DeSantis_, 134 F.3d 760 (6th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with fraud offenses. He was asked during his testimony about why a liquor license was revoked. He answered in a way that prompted the prosecutor to request that he read the state court of appeals decision revoking his license. This was error. While Rule 608(b) permits a party to question a witness about prior bad acts, the Rule does not allow extrinsic evidence of the prior misconduct. In this case, the state court of appeals decision amounted to extrinsic evidence of the bad act. The fact that the court of appeals decision was not actually admitted in evidence is not relevant. Requiring the defendant to read the decision while on the witness stand was error.

_United States v. Sullivan_, 803 F.2d 87 (3rd Cir. 1986)

The prosecutor was permitted to cross-examine a defendant about other bad acts not amounting to criminal convictions for the purpose of impeachment. Specifically, the witness was asked about inaccuracies in his federal income tax returns and financial disclosure statements. The Sixth Circuit holds that credibility of the witness/defendant was crucial to the case and the government was permitted to test his credibility with this other evidence of misconduct relating to truthfulness. Presumably, what’s good for the goose is good for the gander.

_United States v. Bernal-Obeso_, 989 F.2d 331 (9th Cir. 1993)

Just prior to trial, the government alerted the defense that an informant had killed two people several years earlier, but had never been charged with a crime. The defense learned that... the informant had in fact pled guilty to two counts of manslaughter and asked the court to permit the defense additional time to determine the background, and also asked to be permitted to ask the informant why he lied to the DEA about his background. Both requests were denied by the trial court. The Ninth Circuit reversed. “We expect prosecutors and investigators to take all reasonable measures to safeguard the system against treachery (by informants) including turning over, as Giglio requires, all material information casting a shadow on an informant’s credibility.” The defendant should be permitted to question the informant, pursuant to Rule 608(b), about his lying to the DEA regarding his criminal record.

United States v. Morales-Quinones, 812 F.2d 604 (10th Cir. 1987)

The defendant may impeach a government witness by cross-examining him about specific instances of conduct not resulting in conviction if the conduct is probative of the witness’ character, truthfulness or untruthfulness.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 609 – Impeachment through prior conviction)

United States v. Chapman, 765 F.3d 720 (7th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute heroin and gun charges. The gun and drugs were found in a bag in a house. The defendant denied having any connection to the bag. The government introduced evidence of the defendant’s prior heroin convictions and the circumstances of those offenses. The Seventh Circuit reversed: Proving defendant’s knowledge about distribution quantities of drugs was not relevant, because he denied possession of the bag at all. To the extent that the evidence was admissible to prove an element of the offense that was not in dispute (intent to distribute), it was inadmissible pursuant to Rule 403. The Seventh Circuit also held that the defendant should have been permitted to testify that with regard to his prior drug offenses (one of which was offered pursuant to Rule 404(b) and the others pursuant to Rule 609), the defendant should have been permitted to testify that he entered a guilty plea in those prior cases. This testimony was offered as “rehabilitation”: when he was guilty, he pled guilty. This was his effort to blunt the force the impeachment evidence

United States v. Caldwell, 760 F.3d 267 (3rd Cir. 2014)

In this trial for possession of a weapon by a convicted felon, the trial court erroneously permitted the government to introduce evidence of the defendant’s prior conviction for possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. The defendant denied possessing the weapon. The police testified that they saw the defendant with the gun in his hand. The government argued (and the trial court agreed) that the prior conviction was admissible to prove knowledge and intent. The Third Circuit reversed: the prior conviction did not prove anything about the defendant’s intent or knowledge in this case. The defense was that he did not possess the gun at all, so his knowledge or intent was not relevant. In addition, the government argued that the prior conviction was admissible pursuant to Rule 609, because the defendant testified and the prior conviction was introduced to impeach his credibility. The Third Circuit held that the Rule 403 balancing test weighed in favor of excluding this form of impeachment. This is a significant decision that devotes nearly 20 pages in the published opinion to the inadmissibility of the prior conviction under either the Rule 404(b) or Rule 609 bases.

United States v. Commanche, 577 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with assault with a dangerous weapon (a box-cutter) on Indian Territory. He claimed that he acted in self-defense. The government offered evidence of two prior aggravated battery convictions involving sharp instruments. This was error. The prior offenses served no purpose other than to show the defendant’s violent propensity. There was no showing that he claimed self-defense in the other cases. The government also introduced the evidence pursuant to Rule 609. However, this, too, was error, because the Rule 609 only authorizes the introduction of evidence of the fact of conviction, not the details of the prior convictions.

United States v. Osazuwa, 564 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2009)

When a witness (including the defendant) is being cross-examined about a prior conviction, the fact of the conviction is the scope of the proper cross-examination. The cross-examination of the witness is controlled by Rule 609, not 608, if there is a conviction. Under Rule 609, the attorney may not ask the witness questions about the circumstances relating to the prior offense.

United States v. Rogers, 542 F.3d 197 (7th Cir. 2008)

Rule 609 permits impeachment by means of a prior conviction if the prior conviction is no more than ten years old, measured by the date from the witness’s release from confinement. The Seventh Circuit concludes that “release from confinement” refers to prison, not release from probation or parole. Allowing the defendant to be impeached with his prior conviction (for which he was released from prison more than ten years prior to trial) was harmless error.

United States v. Estrada, 430 F.3d 606 (2d Cir. 2005)

The trial court permitted the defense to cross-examine a government witness and elicit testimony that he had a prior felony conviction. The defense was not permitted to elicit testimony about the nature of the prior conviction, however – not even the name of the offense. This was error. Rule 609 permits the cross-examiner to elicit testimony about the specific felony that the witness has on his record.

United States v. Johnson, 388 F.3d 96 (3rd Cir. 2004)

Evidence of the defendant’s prior purse snatching conviction was inadmissible to impeach him in this trial for carjacking and using a firearm in connection with a crime of violence. The trial court failed to conduct the necessarily balancing test required by Rule 609(a)(1). A remand was appropriate for the trial court to conduct the balancing test, without having to conduct a new trial, if the court decides that the evidence was admissible under the proper standard.

United States v. Tse, 375 F.3d 148 (1st Cir. 2004)

The balancing test implicit in Rules 609 and 403 regarding the admissibility of prior convictions is different when the defendant testifies and when prosecution witnesses testify. Greater protection is provided to the defendant under the balancing test required under Rule 609. In this case, both a government witness and the defendant had a prior conviction for assault and battery on a police officer. With regard to the defendant qua witness, the test is embodied in Rule 609 and states that the probative value of admitting this evidence must outweigh its prejudicial effect to the accused. With regard to a witness, the question is whether the probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion or misleading the jury (i.e., the Rule 403 standard).

United States v. Fisher, 106 F.3d 622 (5th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was held in contempt by a state court prior to this federal criminal prosecution. During the federal trial, the government obtained a ruling that the defendant could be impeached with this contempt conviction. The defendant testified and the defense lawyer, on direct, elicited testimony about this prior conviction. The defendant was convicted. Thereafter, the state appellate court reversed the contempt conviction, on the basis that he had been provided inadequate notice of the charges. The Fifth Circuit concludes that this taints the federal conviction. The fact that the defendant brought the topic up did not amount to a waiver of the issue, since the government had already obtained a ruling that it could raise the issue on cross-examination of the defendant. This decision was subsequently OVERRULED in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000).

United States v. Livingston, 816 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1987)

A prior conviction for writing a check without sufficient funds which is more than ten years old is inadmissible for purposes of impeachment. In this case, the defendant was attempting to impeach a government witness with this prior conviction.

United States v. Scisney, 885 F.2d 325 (6th Cir. 1989)

Though the error was harmless, it was improper to admit evidence of a prior shoplifting conviction in the defendant’s bank robbery prosecution. A shoplifting conviction is not the type of offense involving dishonesty or false statements anticipated by Rule 609(a)(2).

United States v. Robinson, 8 F.3d 398 (7th Cir. 1993)

When a defendant is impeached with a prior conviction under Rule 609, it is not proper for the government to inquire into the specifics of the offense – all that is relevant is the fact of the conviction (the date, the nature of the offense, and the fact of conviction). Harmless error in this case. The prosecutor also improperly asked the defendant about other frauds he committed, knowing that he had no factual predicate for the question. Again, though, harmless error.

United States v. Cameron, 814 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1987)

A witness may not be cross-examined about a prior conviction for possession of a switchblade. Possession of a weapon is not a crime of dishonesty. In this case, the defendant was attempting to cross-examine a prosecution witness.

United States v. Palmer, 3 F.3d 300 (9th Cir. 1993)

After his arraignment on charges of growing marijuana, the defendant stated that he did not want to make a deal, because he had “been through this before.” In fact, the defendant had a prior marijuana conviction. This statement was not admissible under Rule 609, however, because that Rule requires evidence of a conviction, not simply evidence that the defendant had “been through this before.”

United States v. Brackeen, 969 F.2d 827 (9th Cir. 1992)

Bank robbery is not a crime involving dishonesty and therefore cannot be used to impeach a witness under Rule 609. In this case, the witness was the defendant. It was improper for the government to impeach the defendant’s testimony with this prior robbery conviction. The court noted that the Eleventh Circuit reached a consistent result in United States v. Farmer, 923 F.2d 1557 (11th Cir. 1991)(“It is established in this Circuit that crimes such as theft, robbery, or shoplifting do not involve dishonesty or false statement within the meaning of Rule 609(a)(2)”).

United States v. Albers, 93 F.3d 1469 (10th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred when it permitted the government to ask the defendant specifics of his prior convictions. Only the fact of the conviction, the nature of the offense, and the sentence, but not the specifics of the crime, may be probed.

United States v. Burston, 159 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 1998)

The district court erred – though harmlessly – in restricting the defense from cross-examining the government’s witness about his numerous prior felony convictions. The witness had four prior felony convictions for theft, aggravated assault and armed robbery. The trial court limited the defense to asking simply if the witness had a prior felony conviction, without even... specifying the number or nature of the offenses. This was an improper limitation on the defendant’s right to present evidence pursuant to Rule 609 to impeach the witness.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 613 – Prior Inconsistent Statement)

United States v. Pridgen, 518 F.3d 87 (1st Cir. 2008)
A government witness described the person who she saw shooting a gun. On cross-examination, she testified that she could not remember giving an inconsistent statement to the defense attorney’s investigator. Having laid the proper foundation (giving the witness an opportunity to explain the inconsistent statement), the defense then sought to introduce extrinsic evidence of the prior inconsistent statement. The trial court erroneously excluded this evidence. Harmless error.

United States v. Ramos-Caraballo, 375 F.3d 797 (8th Cir. 2004)
During the police officer’s testimony, the defense attorney cross-examined him about inconsistencies between his trial testimony and his police report, his testimony at the grand jury and his testimony at a suppression hearing. In re-direct, the prosecutor offered the entire police report, as well as a transcript of the witness’s entire grand jury testimony and his suppression hearing testimony. This was improper “rule of completeness” evidence. Only when the evidence offered by the opposing party is taken out of context, is distorted, or otherwise in need of balance, should the balance of the written document be admitted. Harmless error.

United States v. Buffalo, 358 F.3d 519 (8th Cir. 2004)
The defendant contended that another man was the perpetrator of the assault with which he was charged. He called the other man to the stand and he denied being the perpetrator. The defendant then sought to call two other witnesses who were prepared to testify that the other man had confessed to them. The district court excluded the evidence because the “prior inconsistent statements” would have been inadmissible hearsay. Rule 613(b) allows a party to use a prior inconsistent statement to impeach a witness, but if the witness is called to the stand for sole purpose of impeaching him, the “impeachment” is really a subterfuge for admitting the hearsay. Nevertheless, the Eighth Circuit holds that because there are no Confrontation Clause concerns when the defendant (as opposed to the government) seeks to engage in this type of subterfuge, the proper course for the trial court is to employ the Rule 403 balancing test. In this case, because of the unique facts, the Eighth Circuit held that the defendant should have been permitted to introduce the prior inconsistent statement of the witness.

United States v. Vaughn, 370 F.3d 1049 (10th Cir. 2004)
In some circumstances, an omission may rise to the level of an inconsistency. Flat contradictions are not the only test for inconsistency. Omissions of fact may be relevant to the process of testing credibility of a witness’ trial testimony. Under certain circumstances, a witness’s prior silence regarding critical facts may constitute a prior inconsistent statement where failure to mention those matters conflicts with that which is later recalled. Harmless error.

United States v. Trzaska, 111 F.3d 1019 (2d Cir. 1997)
During the defendant’s case-in-chief, the defense elicited from the defendant’s son a statement that the defendant had made. The statement was introduced without objection. On rebuttal, the government offered what it considered to be a prior inconsistent statement that was inculpatory. The Second Circuit reversed: the statement offered by the government was certainly inculpatory, but it was not inconsistent with the statement offered by the defense. (The government could not offer the statement in its case in chief, because it was illegally obtained, and thus could only be offered if it impeached a statement by the defendant). Because the statement offered by the government was not inconsistent, it was not admissible.

United States v. Strother, 49 F.3d 869 (2d Cir. 1995)

Under certain circumstances, a witness’s prior silence regarding critical facts may constitute a prior inconsistent statement where the failure to mention those matters conflicts with that which is later recalled. Also, statements need not be diametrically opposed to be inconsistent. In this case, the defendant was charged with a §1344 bank fraud violation in that he requested a bank employee to pay a check which he could not cover. He claimed that he asked the employee to “hold” the check, not pay it. Three bank memoranda prepared either by the employee, or by someone else reporting what the employee said, did not indicate that the defendant told the defendant to pay the check. With regard to one of the memoranda – the one prepared by the other employee reporting what the first employee said – this represented a prior inconsistent statement, because the primary witness “subscribed” to the memorandum, signing it and agreeing that it was accurate. Finally, the fact that the witness was cross-examined about the document did not cure the error. Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement is more persuasive to a jury than a witness’s acknowledgment of inconsistencies in a prior statement.

United States v. Ince, 21 F.3d 576 (4th Cir. 1994)

At trial, a witness who had earlier stated that the defendant had confessed to her, stated that she had no memory of that earlier confession. The government then introduced evidence – purportedly under Rule 613, simply for impeachment purposes – that the witness had told an officer that the defendant had confessed to her. Even though the trial court cautioned the jury that this was impeachment evidence, not substantive evidence of guilt, this was reversible error. The government may not call a witness to the stand for the sole purpose of impeaching her with otherwise inadmissible hearsay evidence. “The naive assumption that prejudicial effects can be overcome by instructions to the jury, all practicing lawyers know to be unmitigated fiction.” Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440 (1949)(Jackson, J., concurring).

United States v. Young, 86 F.3d 944 (9th Cir. 1996)

In order for the defense to offer a prior inconsistent statement of a government witness, it is not necessary that the witness be directly confronted with the statement before the inconsistent statement is offered. All that is required is that the government have the opportunity to re-call the witness if it wants to refute, or explain, the prior inconsistent statement. Here, the defense asked the witness whether he was ever at the location where his prior statement was heard by another witness (the witness said that he was going to frame the defendant). On the basis of denying that he was at the location where he was overheard making this remark, the defendant was entitled to offer the testimony of the person who heard the witness make the remark.

United States v. Gomez-Gallardo, 915 F.2d 553 (9th Cir. 1990)

The government called a witness for the sole purpose of impeaching him with testimony which otherwise would have been inadmissible. “The maximum legitimate effect of the impeaching testimony can never be more than the cancellation of the adverse answer by which the party is surprised. Impeachment is not permitted where it is employed as a guise for submitting to the jury substantive evidence that is otherwise unavailable.”
United States v. Tafollo-Cardenas, 897 F.2d 976 (9th Cir. 1990)

The government offered the testimony of a witness who recanted her prior statement which implicated the defendant. The government convinced the trial court to admit the prior statement as substantive evidence. The evidence was not admissible as substantive evidence; because the trial court did not instruct the jury that the prior statement was only admissible for impeachment purposes, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Mitchell, 113 F.3d 1528 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant questioned a witness about her forgetfulness. She denied being forgetful. The defense then showed her a report of her psychologist which related her statement that she had a problem with forgetfulness. She could not remember making this statement to the psychologist. The trial court prohibited the defense from introducing extrinsic evidence of the inconsistent statement. This was error, though harmless.

United States v. Sheffield, 992 F.2d 1164 (11th Cir. 1993)

A witness may be cross-examined about a prior failure to make a statement consistent with the statement made at trial. That is, a prior failure to implicate the defendant is the proper subject of cross-examination.

United States v. Foster, 982 F.2d 551 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

A police officer was a witness to several drug sales by the defendant. At the preliminary hearing, the officer made no mention of seeing the defendant give the proceeds to anybody. When the defendant was arrested, he had no cash on him. At trial, however, the police officer testified that he observed the defendant give the sales proceeds to another individual after each sale. The defense sought to cross-examine the officer about why he did not testify about this at the preliminary hearing. The trial court’s ruling curtailing this topic of cross-examination was reversible error. Moreover, even though the officer’s written report was introduced – and it, too, was silent about where the proceeds went – the defense should have been permitted to question the officer about his prior sworn testimony.

United States v. Stock, 948 F.2d 1299 (D.C.Cir. 1991)

The defendant sought to impeach a police officer with a prior statement of his which did not contain the same allegations as his courtroom testimony. Prior statements that omit details covered at trial are inconsistent if it would have been “natural” for the witness to include them in the earlier statement. The judge’s error in denying this cross-examination prevented defense counsel from arguing that the officer had a poor memory or was fabricating parts of his story in order to ensure a conviction. Harmless error.

United States v. Johnson, 802 F.2d 1459 (D.C.Cir. 1986)

The defendant was on trial for a narcotics violation. A witness arrested during the transaction stated that the defendant was the kingpin in the operation. At a subsequent preliminary hearing, the witness denied that the defendant had any participation in the conspiracy. At trial, the government called that witness knowing that he would not testify, for the sole purpose of introducing his prior inconsistent statements. The Court of Appeals holds that it is error, but not reversible because of the overwhelming evidence in this case. The court ruled: “Neither Rule 613(b) nor Rule 607 is authority for allowing the government to use impeachment by a prior inconsistent statement as a ‘mere subterfuge’ to get otherwise inadmissible hearsay statements before the jury.”
EVIDENCE
(Rule 701 – Opinion Testimony)

United States v. Glover, 872 F.3d 625 (D.C. Cir. 2017)
Trial counsel’s performance was deficient based on his failure to object to improper opinion testimony offered by the government agent about the meaning of certain code words in the clandestinely recorded conversations of the conspirators. The deficient performance, however, was not prejudicial.

United States v. Natal, 849 F.3d 530 (2d Cir. 2017)
Testimony about historical cell site location analysis requires expertise and presenting the cell site evidence through a non-expert is error. The evidence may not be introduced simply through the business records exception: it requires an expert to explain how cell towers relate to the hand set and how the handset changes connections from one tower to the next and the various factors that affect the analysis of where a handset is located at the time it is communicating with a particular tower.

United States v. Jackson, 849 F.3d 540 (3rd Cir. 2017)
The government should not have introduced testimony from a case agent about the meaning of certain recorded conversations pursuant to Rule 701 (opinion testimony). Many of the conversations did not require opinion testimony to explain or elucidate. Opinion testimony is admissible if the testimony would be “helpful” to the jury to understand the events that the witness is describing.

United States v. Fulton, 837 F.3d 281 (3rd Cir. 2016)
It was error (though not plain error) to permit an FBI agent to testify that another person could not have been the armed robber, because his cell phone records revealed that he was on his phone when the robbery occurred. The agent’s opinion was not needed to clarify or explain a concept that the jurors could not have understood from the cell phone records.

United States v. Williams, 827 F.3d 1134 (D.C. Cir. 2016)
The trial court erred in permitting a police officer to testify about his opinion of the meaning of certain intercepted phone calls. The prosecutor asked in general terms, “Based on your investigation in this case, do you have an opinion of what a particular call involved?” to which the agent responded, “The defendant had a customer ready to purchase cocaine that he wanted to buy from the other person on the phone.” This was improper lay opinion testimony. There was an insufficient factual foundation for the question, and thus no way for the jury to determine whether the agent’s opinion was based on specific evidence that provided him a basis to form an opinion. In fact, the agent’s personal opinion may have been based on facts that were not presented to the jury. The agent’s testimony was not offered as expert testimony. The reversal of one defendant’s conviction was warranted based on this inadmissible evidence. The court relied principally on the earlier decision in Hampton, discussed below.

United States v. Groysman, 766 F.3d 147 (2d Cir. 2014)
The Second Circuit reversed this health care fraud conviction on the basis of several “egregious” evidentiary errors committed at trial. The defendant was charged with conspiring with a company that supplied durable medical equipment to prepare false invoices. The wholesaler was cooperating and taped many of the conversations, though many were inaudible. The government offered testimony from its case agent for several days at the start of trial. The agent (1) offered inadmissible bolstering testimony by testifying that certain transactions occurred, based only on his interviews of the cooperators – he had no personal knowledge to verify that these transactions occurred; (2) offered a summary chart which was not a summary of voluminous evidence, but simply a recitation of what he was supposedly told by the cooperators, thus violating both the hearsay rules and the bolstering rules and the rule governing the admissibility of summary charts; (3) the use of the agent to summarize the case at the outset was improper because it amounted to opinion testimony. The Second Circuit, as noted above, characterized these evidentiary errors as egregious and supported a plain error standard of review reversal.

United States v. Miller, 738 F.3d 361 (D.C. Cir. 2013)

The FBI agent should not have been permitted to offer opinion testimony about the meaning of telephone calls and about the overall course of the investigation.

United States v. Freeman, 730 F.3d 590 (6th Cir. 2013)

The government was improperly permitted to offer lay opinion testimony from an FBI agent who testified about his interpretation of phone calls from two conspirators who were involved in a murder for hire. Throughout his testimony, the agent testified that his basis for his opinion testimony was what he and his colleagues learned during the course of the investigation. His testimony also implied that he knew additional information that the jury did not know that allowed him to reach these conclusions. Finally, some of the conversations being “interpreted” by the agent needed not interpretation or explanation, such as explaining the term “situation” and other easily understood statements of the people talking on the phone.

United States v. Haynes, 729 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2013)

A police officer was permitted to offer testimony about how a gas tank works (i.e., how the fuel gauge reflects the amount of fuel in the tank), which was relevant to whether the defendant was aware that drugs were hidden in the fuel tank. The testimony should not have been admitted as opinion testimony. The testimony should only have been offered as expert testimony after the discovery rules and the witness’s expertise was proven. Another witness – the government’s expert witness – was improperly permitted to offer expert testimony that the defendant was aware that there were drugs in the gas tank. This testimony was inadmissible pursuant to Rule 704(b), which prohibits expert testimony on a defendant’s mental state at the time of a crime.

United States v. Hampton, 718 F.3d 978 (D.C. Cir. 2013)

The testimony of an FBI agent, interpreting and explaining recorded phone conversations of the defendants was inadmissible and admitting this testimony was reversible error. The government offered the testimony as lay opinion testimony, with the agent explaining that he formed his opinion about the meaning of the conversations based on having listened to countless hours of the conspirators’ conversations.
United States v. Fenzl, 670 F.3d 778 (7th Cir. 2012)

In this fraud case (which essentially involved an unusual bid-rigging scheme), the government called a City Investigator to testify whether the Procurement Department would have awarded the contract to the defendant if it had known of the misrepresentation that was made in a certification document. The Seventh Circuit held that allowing this testimony was reversible error. It was not proper “opinion” testimony as claimed by the government, because the investigator was not offering an opinion based on something that he observed.

United States v. Vazquez-Rivera, 665 F.3d 351 (1st Cir. 2011)

This was a child pornography in which the question at trial was whether the defendant was the person who was on the computer engaging in a chat with undercover agents and who knowingly possessed the illegal images. The defendant contended that other people in the house may have been the guilty party. At trial, the government called the lead agent to testify and she testified that “we” concluded that the defendant was the perpetrator. This type of question was asked repeatedly during the agent’s testimony. This was plain error. First, it offered the opinion testimony of other unidentified agents (i.e., “we” concluded); second, it was the agent’s opinion, based on the same disputed testimony that the jury heard and was not helpful to the jury’s decision-making process and was therefore not admissible pursuant to Rule 701.

United States v. Meises, 645 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2011)

The government improperly began its presentation of the evidence with a “summary witness” who described the roles of the various defendants on trial. This was improper summary testimony, based on improper opinion testimony.

United States v. Goodman, 633 F.3d 963 (10th Cir. 2011)

The defendant relied on the insanity defense in this armed robbery case. The trial court barred the defense from introducing evidence of his combat experiences and his mental health around the time of his army experience. He had received extensive treatment for mental illness after returning from Iraq and clearly suffered from mental illness as a result of his combat experience. Limiting the “lay” witness testimony to his behavior at the time immediately surrounding the time of the robberies was reversible error. The defendant’s mental health a few years prior to the armed robberies was not irrelevant to his insanity defense. In addition, the trial court erred in barring the defense to offer lay “opinion” testimony about the defendant’s mental condition. Rule 704(a) specifically allows testimony in the form of an opinion that embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact. Rule 704(b), however, provides an exception for experts, who are not permitted to offer opinions as to the state of mind of a criminal defendant if that mental state is an element of the crime of which the defendant is accused.

United States v. Jadlowe, 628 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2010)

A police officer was improperly permitted to testify that in her opinion, the video of the perpetrator of the crime was the defendant (she compared the video with a recent driver’s license photo). There was no reason to introduce this opinion testimony, because the jury could have performed the same comparison. Harmless error.
United States v. Johnson, 617 F.3d 286 (4th Cir. 2010)

The government offered the testimony of a DEA agent to “interpret” and explain the meaning of wiretapped phone calls. The agent was never tendered as an expert. The testimony was not properly admitted as opinion testimony under Rule 701, because the agent did not observe the events about which he was testifying. Even if he had been tendered as an expert, the government did not offer any evidence explaining the agent’s “methodology or guiding principles that would enable him to decode the wiretapped phone calls in this case.”

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008)

The government offered the testimony of an expert in this gang case. The expert testimony about the structure of the gang, its history and various other matters that was inadmissible because (1) the testimony was not based on any data or information that was the proper subject of expert testimony; (2) the testimony included the expert’s lay opinion, rather than expert opinion; (3) the expert simply repeated some things he was told by co-conspirators and was therefore testimonial hearsay in violation of Crawford. Reversible error.

United States v. Garcia-Ortiz, 528 F.3d 74 (1st Cir. 2008)

The victim of an armed robbery was shown a picture of the defendant and another person. The victim identified the other person as the perpetrator. At trial, an FBI agent was permitted to offer his opinion that the person who was incorrectly identified actually resembled the defendant. This was improper opinion testimony, because the subject matter of the testimony was not beyond the jury’s purview. Harmless error.

United States v. Johnson, 529 F.3d 493 (2d Cir. 2008)

The DEA agent’s testimony was replete with improper hearsay, opinion, vouching, and argumentative testimony. The agent testified about the course of the investigation, declaring, “We found out that . . .” and “We determined that . . .” The agent related what co-conspirators told him when they were first arrested, to explain what he did next in the investigation. He then explained what “corroboration” meant and explained what he did and learned to corroborate what he was told by informants and co-conspirators. He further explained that he was skeptical of what informants told him until he corroborated what they said and he was then able to ensure that the informants told him the truth. While it may be more interesting to a jury to learn how the police conduct investigations, a substantial amount of this testimony was inadmissible. Because defense counsel did not object, the plain error standard applied and the Second Circuit held that the inadmissible evidence did not meet this standard.

United States v. Wantuch, 525 F.3d 505 (7th Cir. 2008)

It was improper to permit one witness to offer his opinion about the defendant’s knowledge that what they were doing was illegal. While the testimony may have been based on the witness’s perception, the testimony was unhelpful to the jury under Rule 701(b). The jury was equally capable of inferring that the defendant was conscious of the wrongfulness of his conduct. Harmless error.

United States v. Oriedo, 498 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2007)
Having failed to provide expert notice pursuant to Rule 16, the government sought to introduce an agent’s opinion about why baggies would be found in a drug dealer’s house as lay opinion testimony. The Seventh Circuit held that allowing the agent to testify about his opinion was erroneous, harmless.

United States v. Kaplan, 490 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2007)

The trial court erred in permitting a co-conspirator to testify that in his opinion, the defendant was a knowing participant in the fraud conspiracy. In a lengthy decision reviewing Rule 701’s requirements, the Second Circuit concluded that the witness, who based his “opinion” on the defendant’s intelligence and experience, as opposed to his own observations, could not offer opinion testimony under Rule 701.

United States v. Perkins, 470 F.3d 150 (4th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with using excessive force against an arrestee. At trial, several officers were asked a hypothetical question about whether certain force would be appropriate in circumstances such as those that the testimony in this case described. This was improper lay “opinion” testimony and would only be permissible as expert opinion.

United States v. Van Eyl, 468 F.3d 428 (7th Cir. 2006)

The prosecutor’s closing argument advanced a theory of guilt that had previously been rejected by the trial court. The trial court acted within its discretion in granting a new trial. The prosecutor repeatedly referred to various witnesses’ lay opinion that the defendant’s conduct in this complex fraud trial was fraudulent. The prosecutor repeatedly referred to witnesses’ testimony that it did not take a CPA to tell the difference between right and wrong. The trial court had initially granted a motion in limine barring such opinion testimony from being offered by the government.

United States v. Garcia, 413 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2005)

A DEA agent may not testify, either as an expert, or as a matter of his lay opinion, about the defendant’s role in the conspiracy based on the totality of his experience. When an agent testifies as a matter of lay opinion, the opinion must be based on his personal observations, not his evaluation of all the evidence, or the totality of the investigation. This opinion explains in some detail the requirements for lay opinion testimony, and concludes that the government satisfied none of the requirements for offering lay opinion testimony.

United States v. Dixon, 413 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2005)

A man attempted to extort money from a bank and surveillance photos recorded his actions. The government offered the testimony of three witnesses who identified the defendant as the person in the surveillance photos, his son and two ex-wives. The evidence was not admissible pursuant to Rule 701, because the witnesses’ testimony was not likely to aid the jury. The witness’s acknowledged that they had not seen the defendant at the time of the crime and the video was of sufficiently good quality that the jury could make its own determination without the aid of the witnesses’ opinions. One ex-wife, moreover, had a tumultuous abusive relationship with the defendant and allowing her to testify would require exploring all these otherwise inadmissible matters (i.e., the defense would be required to cross-examine her about these allegations) thereby diminishing the value of her identification testimony.

United States v. Grinage, 390 F.3d 746 (2d Cir. 2004)

The Second Circuit reverses this conviction on the basis that an agent was permitted to testify about the meaning of wiretapped phone calls. The government argued that the agent was not qualified as an expert and did not purport to translate coded calls, but was simply offering opinion testimony based on a review of all the calls. The Second Circuit rejects these arguments. An agent may not offer his opinion of “all the calls” and ask the jury to accept that interpretation. Moreover, the agent was basing his testimony on more than simply his having listened to the calls; he testified that he based his opinion also on his knowledge of “the entire investigation.” Reversible error.

United States v. Hitt, 164 F.3d 1370 (11th Cir. 1999)

The defendant was charged with filing false claims with the Veterans Administration. The prosecutor asked witnesses questions such as, “If the defendant claimed that he had quit his job in March of 1979, is that correct or incorrect?” and “If he claimed that he lost total use of his right hand to his disabilities, is that true or false?” These questions were improper, because they sought the opinion testimony of the witnesses that focused on the very question being asked of the jury. These questions amounted to nothing more than lawyer argument – the prosecutor’s summation to the jury in advance. Harmless error.

United States v. Garcia, 291 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2002)

An informant recorded a call with the defendant in which the informant used code to discuss a multi-kilogram drug deal. At trial, the informant was permitted to offer his opinion that the defendant understood the code. This was error. There was no foundation offered to show that he had a basis for testifying about another person’s state of mind. There was no showing that they spoke in code before, that the code was common, or that the witness and the defendant had previously discussed using a code.

United States v. Casas, 356 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 2004)

The government was improperly permitted to start the trial with a “summary” witness who provided an “overview” of the case. The agent offered testimony that was not based on his first-hand knowledge of the facts and amounted to conclusions regarding the conspiracy and its members. In addition, some of these conclusions were based on information he learned from cooperating witnesses who did not testify at trial. See also United States v. Flores-De-Jesus, 569 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2009).

United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995)

A witness claimed that she told the agent about the defendant’s participation in the drug conspiracy and also identified a photograph of the defendant for the agent. The agent then testified that he did not remember the witness saying this, or identifying the defendant. Nevertheless, when asked by the prosecutor, the agent gave his opinion that nothing the witness said in court was inconsistent with her statement at the time of the initial interview. The prosecutor claimed that this opinion testimony was admissible “to aid the jury” under Rule 701.
This was erroneous. Far from being “helpful,” the agent’s testimony invaded the traditional province of the jury.

United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997)

Under Rule 701, lay opinion testimony must be based on personal perception and must be one that a normal person would form from those perceptions. In this case, a bank examiner exceeded these bounds by testifying about his opinion of prudent bank practices, as well as the legal requirements governing certain bank practices. He also asserted that in this case, the violation of these rules resulted in a bank failure.

United States v. Dotson, 799 F.2d 189 (5th Cir. 1986)

Three government agents who had only minimal contact with the defendants’ witnesses were permitted to testify that in their opinion, the defendant and his witnesses were untruthful and should not be believed by the jury. While the Court holds that this is not impermissible per se, in this case the agents had no basis on which to offer this opinion testimony.

Cooper v. Sowders, 837 F.2d 284 (6th Cir. 1988)

It was improper for a police officer to offer his opinion that the evidence in the case against other suspects was insufficient to justify their arrest.
SEE ALSO: EXPERT TESTIMONY

In a forty page opinion, the Third Circuit evaluates the admissibility of fingerprint evidence under the Daubert and Kumho Tire standards and ultimately concludes that such evidence passes Daubert muster and was properly admitted in this case.

United States v. Abreu, 406 F.3d 1304 (11th Cir. 2005)
The Eleventh Circuit concludes that fingerprint evidence meets the Daubert standard.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 801(d)(1)(A) -- Inconsistent Statement in Sworn Testimony)

United States v. Gajo, 290 F.3d 922 (7th Cir. 2002)

A witness’s prior sworn testimony may be admitted if the witness claims a lack of memory about a subject. In this case, the witness’s prior grand jury testimony was admitted when he claimed not to remember whether the defendant spoke in English during a particular conversation.

United States v. Bomski, 125 F.3d 1115 (7th Cir. 1997)

Where testimony is offered pursuant to Rule 801(d)(1)(A), it is accepted for the truth of the matter asserted, not simply for impeachment. Thus, where a party introduces the prior sworn testimony of a witness for the purpose of showing a prior inconsistent sworn statement, the prior statement may be considered for the truth of the matter asserted.
Evidence
(Rule 801(d)(1)(B) – Prior Consistent Statements)

In order to introduce a prior consistent statement under Rule 801(d)(1)(B), the statement must have been made prior to the time that the alleged incentive to fabricate occurred. A consistent statement that predates the motive is a square rebuttal of the charge that the testimony was contrived as a consequence of that motive. Statements which were made after the motive to fabricate arose do not rebut the charge of recent fabrication. Thus, such statements are not admissible because they amount to hearsay. On remand, the Tenth Circuit concluded that the error in admitting the testimony was not harmless and required a new trial. 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995).

United States v. Moreno, 809 F.3d 766 (3rd Cir. 2016)

The defense cross-examined the government’s cooperating witness about his expectation of receiving a benefit based on his cooperation, which the witness acknowledged. On re-direct, the prosecutor had the witness read portions of his interviews with the law enforcement agent, purportedly as prior consistent statements. Introducing these out of court statements violated the Confrontation Clause. Harmless error.

Jones v. Cain, 600 F.3d 527 (5th Cir. 2010)

A witness to a murder provided recorded statements to the police prior to his death from unrelated causes. He also testified at a suppression hearing prior to this death. His testimony at the suppression hearing was admissible, because it was prior sworn testimony. His statements to the police, however, were not admissible. The state argued that the statements to the police were not offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but this was clearly belied by the record. The statements were not merely used to “shore up the witness’s credibility” or to “explain the investigators’ conduct.” The state also argued that the statements qualified as prior consistent statements (i.e., consistent with the suppression hearing testimony) and thus were admissible under a firmly-rooted hearsay exception. However, these statements were not made prior to the time that the supposed motive to fabricate arose (i.e., a motive to shift responsibility for the murder from himself to the defendant).

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008)

The government improperly admitted an informant’s hand-written notes that he authored after meeting with a government agent. The notes were not written prior to the time the motive to fabricate arose and, consequently, did not meet the prerequisite for admissibility.

United States v. Gonzalez, 533 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2008)

Certain hearsay was admitted under the theory that it represented a prior consistent statement. The proper predicate for such evidence was not offered. Harmless error.

United States v. Bercier, 506 F.3d 625 (8th Cir. 2007)

The sexual abuse victim’s prior statements implicating the defendant were not admissible as prior consistent statements, because the statements were not made prior to the alleged time of the fabrication. The statements were not admissible under the medical diagnosis exception, Rule 802(4), because statements that identify a perpetrator of a sexual assault are not made for purposes of medical diagnosis. See also United States v. Kenyon, 397 F.3d 1071 (8th Cir. 2005).

United States v. Kenyon, 397 F.3d 1071 (8th Cir. 2005)
Admitting prior consistent statements of the child abuse victim was reversible error, because the statements were not made prior to the time that the defendant claimed she fabricated the charges as required by Tome v. United States, 513 U.S. 150 (1995).

United States v. Awon, 135 F.3d 96 (1st Cir. 1998)
The witness's prior statement implicating the defendant was made after he had the motive to seek leniency for his participation in the crime. Therefore, the out-of-court statement was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B).

United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995)
A witness's hand-written statement which was prepared after her arrest (and after her motive to lie arose) was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B).

United States v. Acker, 52 F.3d 509 (4th Cir. 1995)
The trial court clearly erred in allowing an FBI agent to recite what a key government witness had said to him previously under the prior consistent statement rule, Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(B). The prior statement was made by the witness five months after he had been arrested for participation in a bank robbery for which the defendant was now being tried. The trial court simply held that the prior statement was “corroborative” of the testimony and was therefore admissible. Not only is this not a valid basis for introducing the out-of-court declaration, in this case, the other requirement of 801(d)(1)(B) was not satisfied – that is, the prior statement did not rebut a charge of recent fabrication, because the statement was not made prior to the time that a motive to lie arose.

United States v. Bolick, 917 F.2d 135 (4th Cir. 1990)
The use of prior consistent statements to rehabilitate a witness is only permissible if the witness has been impeached. In this case the government introduced a prior consistent statement without the defendant’s having first impeached the witness. This was reversible error. The fact that the trial court gave a limiting instruction to the jury was not sufficient. The limiting instruction failed to advise the jury that they could consider the prior statements only if the declarant was subsequently impeached by the defense counsel.

United States v. Dotson, 821 F.2d 1034 (5th Cir. 1987)
The police report contained an officer’s statement relating what he was told by a government witness to the effect that the witness had carried marijuana for the defendant. This was inadmissible to strengthen the witness’ credibility even though the witness’ statement would have qualified as a prior consistent statement. The officer’s statement about what the witness stated was not admissible.

United States v. Collicott, 92 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1996)
The government’s introduction of a witness’s prior statements to a law enforcement officer was error. The government’s justification – that the statement to the officer was admissible because the defense asked the officer about other statements made by the witness to the officer – was unavailing, because the defendant was properly seeking to impeach the witness on an unrelated matter.

United States v. Moreno, 94 F.3d 1453 (10th Cir. 1996)

After a co-defendant pled guilty, he testified against the defendant. To rehabilitate the witness’s credibility, the government called that witness’s lawyer who was asked whether the witness (his client) had implicated the defendant prior to the witness’s decision to plead guilty. This was error. The witness’s statements to his lawyer did not pre-date his motive to fabricate evidence against the defendant, and thus was not admissible as a prior consistent statement. The witness’s motive to fabricate arose as soon as he was arrested. Harmless error.

United States v. Albers, 93 F.3d 1469 (10th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred in permitting the introduction of out-of-court statements of witnesses on the theory that they were prior consistent statements. In both instances, the statements were made after the motivation to falsify testimony arose. Thus, the statements did not satisfy the “pre-motive” prong of Rule 801(d)(1)(B) and United States v. Tome, 115 S.Ct. 696 (1995).

United States v. Pendas-Martinez, 845 F.2d 938 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant’s conviction was reversed because the government introduced evidence of a Coast Guard officer’s report under the erroneous theory that it was admissible to rehabilitate a witness as a prior consistent statement. However, the Eleventh Circuit held that the officer’s credibility was not challenged and the report was not admissible under 801(d)(1)(B). The court holds that “It is an abuse of discretion to admit into evidence and send to the jury room government agent case summaries which constitute a written summary of the government’s theory of the case.”
EVIDENCE
(Rule 801(d)(2)(B) – Adopted Admissions)

United States v. Lafferty, 503 F.3d 293 (3rd Cir. 2007)
If a defendant invokes his Miranda right to remain silent, her subsequent failure to deny an accusation, either by the police, or a co-defendant who is in the interrogation room, may not be introduced against the defendant as an adopted admission.

United States v. Williams, 445 F.3d 724 (4th Cir. 2006)
The defendant’s friend thought he was acting oddly and asked, “Did you kill somebody or what?” The defendant did not respond, “He was blank.” The government argued that the defendant’s non-response was an adopted admission of the friend’s statement. The Fourth Circuit disagreed. If someone questions the defendant, “Why did you rob the bank?” the failure to respond by denying that he robbed the bank could be treated as an adopted admission. But the question in this case was no so accusatory, so there was no admission by failing to respond.

United States v. Hove, 52 F.3d 233 (9th Cir. 1995)
A suspect’s refusal to testify before a grand jury cannot amount to an admission by silence under Rule 801(d)(2)(B). Also, an agent’s accusation which is not denied by a suspect (who responded that he wanted to investigate the matter) was not an admission by silence. Instructing the jury that they could infer an admission by the defendant’s silence was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court.

United States v. Joshi, 896 F.2d 1303 (11th Cir. 1990)
Undercover officers were introduced to the defendant by a co-conspirator; the co-conspirator stated that the defendant was a long time friend and partner in the smuggling operations. The defendant simply nodded. The government introduced this nod under Rule 801(d)(2)(B). When a statement is offered as an adoptive admission, two criteria must be met: First, the statement must be such that an innocent defendant would normally be induced to respond; Second, there must be sufficient foundational facts from which the jury could infer that the defendant “heard, understood, and acquiesced in the statement.” Though this is a close case, the court finds that the evidence was admissible here. The court notes, however, that the prosecution should first provide some evidence of the two foundational prerequisites before introducing the adoptive admissions, and not rely on “linking it up” in the future.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 801(d)(2)(D) – Statement of party’s agent)

United States v. Bonds, 608 F.3d 495 (9th Cir. 2010)

Barry Bonds’ trainer brought a vial of blood to BALCO and identified the sample as coming from Bonds. The trainer has refused to testify at Bonds’ trial, despite having been held in contempt. The government wants to introduce his statement to the BALCO employee as a statement of the defendant’s agent, and thus introduce the hearsay identification testimony through Rule 801(d)(2)(D). The Ninth Circuit, in this pretrial ruling, held that the trainer did not qualify as an “agent” under the rule.

United States v. Jung, 473 F.3d 837 (7th Cir. 2007)

The statements of a defendant’s attorney may, in certain circumstances, be admissible against the defendant. However, in this case, the attorney was talking to victims and trying to placate them and be cooperative. The statements were not part of the attorney’s “investigative” efforts. The Seventh Circuit held that in this situation, the statements should not have been admitted pursuant to Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

United States v. Amato, 356 F.3d 216 (2d Cir. 2004)

During the pretrial detention hearing, defense counsel made a proffer that he had advised the defendant to locate a witness as part of the defense preparation. At trial, however, the defendant denied participating in any effort to contact the witness (he no longer had the attorney who represented him at the detention hearing). The attorney’s statement was then offered by the government. This was permissible pursuant to Rule 801(d)(2)(D).

United States v. Ford, 435 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2006)

The appellate court discussed the rule governing the admission of a prosecutor’s out-of-court statement as Rule 801(d)(2)(D) evidence. The evidence was not admissible in this case. To be admissible, the court must be satisfied that the prior argument involved an assertion of fact inconsistent with similar assertions in a subsequent trial. Second, the court must determine that the statements of counsel were such as to be the equivalent of testimonial statements made by the client. Last, the district court must determine by a preponderance of the evidence that the inference that the proponent of the statements wishes to draw is a fair one and that an innocent explanation for the inconsistency does not exist.

United States v. Valencia, 826 F.2d 169 (2d Cir. 1987)

The defense attorney engaged in conversations with the prosecutor prior to a bail hearing. The attorney made these statements on the basis of what he had been told by his client. The Second Circuit ruled that the evidence is inadmissible: The defendant’s interest in keeping his chosen attorney and in assuring uninhibited discussion between his attorney and the prosecutor and in avoiding risks to his privilege against self-incrimination outweigh the government’s claim to the evidence on an agency theory.
United States v. Harris, 914 F.2d 927 (7th Cir. 1990)

An attorney may be an agent of his client under Rule 801(d)(2)(D). Nevertheless, the trial court should exercise caution in admitting such statements. The attorney in this case was interviewing a witness to an armed robbery. The attorney showed two pictures of the defendant’s brother to the witness, hoping that the witness would identify the brother as the perpetrator. When the witness testified, she related these events to the jury. The conduct of the initial counsel (this attorney did not represent the defendant at trial) was admissible under 801(d)(2)(D).

United States v. Garbett, 867 F.2d 1132 (8th Cir. 1989)

The police were searching the defendant’s house during which time his attorney stated, “Al wouldn’t mind” if the officers used the stereo. The evidence was offered to prove that the residence was, in fact, Al’s. This was error, since the attorney was not acting within the scope of his agency. However, the error was harmless.

A taxpayer granted a power of attorney to his attorney to deal with the IRS. The power of attorney was executed on a form provided by the IRS. The trial court holds that this form does not create a relationship sufficient to admit all statements by the attorney, as an agent, against the taxpayer in subsequent tax prosecutions.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 801(d)(2)(E) – Co-conspirator statements)

United States v. Jackson, 636 F.3d 687 (5th Cir. 2010)

A DEA agent explained how and why drug traffickers keep drug ledgers. A co-conspirator’s drug ledgers that implicated the defendant were then introduced into evidence under the Business Records exception to the hearsay rule (the co-conspirator did not testify) and as a co-conspirator statement. The Fifth Circuit held that this was error. The agent’s testimony did not satisfactorily authenticate the records, or establish the necessary foundation that these records were kept in the regular course of business or that they were prepared during the course of the conspiracy. Though a person other than a record custodian may authenticate a business record, the witness must be able to authenticate this business record and not, as here, business records (or drug ledgers) in general. Admitting the ledgers constituted a violation of Confrontation Clause and required that the conviction be reversed. The Fifth Circuit further explained that the notebooks were inadmissible on Confrontation Clause grounds, because the government failed to prove that they were not testimonial. Because no effort was made to authenticate the notebooks (i.e., how or when they were written), the introduction of the notebooks became, in essence, the functional equivalent of the author testifying live in court. It is the government’s burden to prove that an out-of-court statement is non-testimonial.

United States v. Turner, 548 F.3d 1094 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

Determining when a conspiracy ends is important in numerous contexts, including a defense that the statute of limitations has expired; a claim that a co-conspirator statement was not made during the course of a conspiracy and, as in this case, in deciding which version of the Sentencing Guidelines to apply (i.e., a possible Ex Post Facto claim). In this case, the conspirator forged certain documents that enabled them to receive money as the beneficiary of another person who died. The forgery and receipt of the money occurred in 2001. When questioned by the police about these events in 2006, the conspirators lied. The D.C. Circuit held that the conspiracy ended in 2001 when the objects of the conspiracy were achieved. See generally Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391 (1957); Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440 (1949); Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604 (1953).

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008)

The defendant was charged with providing material support to a terrorist organization. The government introduced an application form for another person to enroll in a terrorist training camp and the form indicated that the defendant had sponsored the applicant. The government offered the form under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). However, there was insufficient information that the defendant was in a conspiracy with the applicant (or even knew him) or that the defendant was in a conspiracy that involved enrolling the applicant in the terrorist training camp.

United States v. Conrad, 507 F.3d 424 (6th Cir. 2007)

The record was not clear when the co-conspirator hearsay declaration was made. If it was made after the conspiracy ended, it was not made “in furtherance” of the conspiracy and thus was inadmissible. The trial court’s failure to make pertinent findings necessitated a remand to enable the trial court to make the necessary findings. In addition, the trial judge held that the government had made a prima facie case of the existence of a conspiracy; the proper standard requires the government to prove the existence of a conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence.

United States v. Magluta, 418 F.3d 1166 (11th Cir. 2005)

The defendant bribed a juror in a prior drug prosecution. In this case, the defendant was charged with obstruction of justice based on the bribe to the juror. The government introduced evidence that the juror told an informant (two years after the prior trial) about the bribe. The trial court held that the conspiracy was ongoing and that the statement to the informant was in furtherance of the conspiracy. The Eleventh Circuit disagreed. Following the teaching of Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391 (1957), the court held that the object of the conspiracy was essentially completed when the juror convinced his colleagues to return a not guilty verdict. Though there was a continuing need to keep the existence of the conspiracy a secret, this did not prolong the existence of the conspiracy for purposes of Rule 801(d)(2)(E).

United States v. West, 142 F.3d 1408 (11th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in admitting a drug ledger as a co-conspirator statement. Though drug ledgers may, in certain circumstances be admissible, in this case, the author was unknown and the trial court failed to find that the author was a member of the conspiracy or that the entries in the ledger were made in furtherance of the conspiracy. The trial court also plainly erred in instructing the jury that they should determine whether the ledger was composed by a co-conspirator. Harmless error.

United States v. Maliszewski, 161 F.3d 992 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

Certain statements that were offered under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) were not shown to have been made in furtherance of the conspiracy, but amounted to nothing more than idle chatter between a husband and wife. Harmless error. The statements were still admissible under Rule 804(b)(3), because the declarant was dead and the statements were against his interest.

United States v. Serrano, 870 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1989)

At a deposition, a co-defendant made statements that the defendant had knowledge of, and complicity in, the fraudulent scheme that was the subject of this criminal prosecution. The statement at the deposition was not in furtherance of, or during the course of, the conspiracy and was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). Even if the statement constituted an act of concealment, the statement was not admissible.

United States v. Tellier, 83 F.3d 578 (2d Cir. 1996)

In Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987), the Supreme Court held that the trial court may consider the out-of-court co-conspirator declaration which the government seeks to admit in deciding whether there was a conspiracy – a predicate for the admissibility of the statement before the jury. However, the Court also cautioned that such hearsay statements are presumptively unreliable and, therefore, while they may be considered in deciding whether there was a conspiracy involving the declarant and the defendant, there must be some independent corroborating evidence of the defendant’s participation in the conspiracy. No such corroborating evidence existed in this case. Consequently, the hearsay statement implicating the defendant should not have been admitted and the conviction was reversed. The reversal of the conspiracy conviction also necessitated reversing the separate Hobbs Act conviction because of the prejudicial spillover effect.

United States v. Urbanik, 801 F.2d 692 (4th Cir. 1986)

One co-conspirator told another that his supplier had enormous physical prowess. The government sought to introduce these statements to establish that the supplier was a member of the conspiracy at the time of the conversation. The Fourth Circuit holds that these statements were not “in furtherance of” the conspiracy and, thus, were inadmissible hearsay.

United States v. El-Zoubi, 993 F.2d 442 (5th Cir. 1993)

Adel and El-Zoubi were co-conspirators in an arson offense. Prior to setting the fire, Adel told a neighbor in the shopping center that he was sick of it all and was going to burn the shop down. At El-Zoubi’s trial, this was inadmissible hearsay. The neighbor was not part of the conspiracy, and the statement made to him was not in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. McConnell, 988 F.2d 530 (5th Cir. 1993)

The government failed to prove that the conspirator’s statement was made in furtherance of the conspiracy. Admitting the hearsay statement was reversible error. There was no explanation of the context in which the statement was made and no other explanation of how the statement implicating the defendant furthered the conspiracy.

United States v. Greer, 939 F.2d 1076 (5th Cir. 1991)

Though the error was harmless, the trial court should not have allowed the government to introduce the statement of “a skinhead” that all blacks and Jews should be eliminated. There was no proof that the police officer to whom this statement was made knew which person made the statement. Therefore, there was no way to determine if a co-conspirator made the statement.

United States v. Arroyo, 805 F.2d 589 (5th Cir. 1986)

After the government failed to prove up its conspiracy, the trial judge granted a new trial after concluding that no instruction could cure the error of admitting the co-conspirator’s statements.

United States v. Scartz, 838 F.2d 876 (6th Cir. 1988)

Though prior Sixth Circuit cases held that “only slight evidence” was needed to place the defendant in a conspiracy prior to admitting co-conspirator statements, the proper standard is a preponderance of the evidence. The “slight evidence” rule refers only to the nature and extent of the defendant’s involvement in the conspiracy, not to the initial question of membership.

United States v. Santos, 20 F.3d 280 (7th Cir. 1994)

Statements by a co-conspirator to an IRS agent were not made in furtherance of the conspiracy and were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). Mere idle chatter, narrative statements of past events, and superfluous casual conversations are not statements in furtherance of a conspiracy. Harmless error.

United States v. Mahkimetas, 991 F.2d 379 (7th Cir. 1993)

An undercover police officer testified about what she was told by the person who helped set up a drug deal. These statements identified the defendant as the person who would be the supplier. At the time of this conversation, there were only two people involved in the transaction:
the person who was the declarant and the undercover agent. The defendant/supplier had not yet been contacted. Because the out-of-court statements of the person who was going to arrange the deal were made to an undercover agent and there were no other conspirators at that time, there could not have been a conspiracy. “Rule 801(d)(2)(E) is not brought into play by the sound of just one lawbreaker’s hand clapping.” If the supplier were already in the conspiracy, the result would be different. The admission of the hearsay in this case was not reversible error.

United States v. Johnson, 927 F.2d 999 (7th Cir. 1991)

The statements of one co-conspirator to another were not “in furtherance” of the conspiracy and were inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). The statement was an offhand admission of culpability, but was not designed to encourage the other conspirator to pursue the conspiratorial objectives. Harmless error.

United States v. Shoffner, 826 F.2d 619 (7th Cir. 1987)

The Seventh Circuit rules that the preferable procedure is to require the government to preview its evidence of a conspiracy prior to admitting statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E).

United States v. Alonzo, 991 F.2d 1422 (8th Cir. 1993)

After a co-conspirator’s arrest, he revealed to the police the source of the cocaine he was in possession of at the time of his arrest. The source was the defendant. This hearsay evidence was not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because the declarant was not making the statements during his participation in the conspiracy nor in furtherance of the conspiracy. The evidence was prejudicial and required a new trial. The declarant did not testify at trial.

United States v. Whalen, 844 F.2d 529 (8th Cir. 1988)

Defendant’s mother advised the defendant not to speak to the police and had told someone she had wiped the murder weapon clean. The government sought to introduce the mother’s statement that she had wiped the murder weapon clean as a co-conspirator statement. The Court held that there was insufficient evidence to establish the existence of a conspiracy between the mother and the defendant; the statements were, therefore, inadmissible hearsay.

United States v. Wood, 834 F.2d 1382 (8th Cir. 1987)

A cooperating witness’ statement to his wife that he was putting radios in boats used by the defendant for drug smuggling was not admissible under 801(d)(2)(E). The statement was made merely to inform the wife about the co-conspirator’s activities and was not in furtherance of the conspiracy.

United States v. Chan Lai, 944 F.2d 1434 (9th Cir. 1991)

Records and ledgers of drug transactions were admitted for the truth of the matter contained in the records. In order to be admitted, the government would have to show that the requirements of Rule 801(d)(2)(E) were satisfied. A remand for this inquiry was appropriate.

United States v. Vowiell, 869 F.2d 1264 (9th Cir. 1989)

Four days after escape, the defendant told a third party to tell a witness to get other prisoners out of town. This statement was not made during the course of the conspiracy and was not admissible as a co-conspirator statement.

United States v. Silverman, 861 F.2d 571 (9th Cir. 1988)

Interpreting the United States Supreme Court’s decision in Bourjaily, the Ninth Circuit holds that evidence of the defendant’s participation in a conspiracy must be established by independent corroborating evidence which is “fairly incriminating” in itself. Although the coconspirator statement may be considered in making this evaluation, because of the inherently unreliable nature of such statements, more than “wholly innocuous” conduct by the defendant must be shown to render the co-conspirator statements admissible. In this case, the government failed to introduce sufficient evidence of the defendant’s participation in the conspiracy.

United States v. Perez, 989 F.2d 1574 (10th Cir. 1993)

At a time prior to the commencement of the conspiracy, and in a manner which in no way facilitated or furthered the conspiracy, one person, who later became a co-conspirator, told another that the defendant distributed a lot of cocaine to him. This was inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) and was reversible error. The Court of Appeals rejected the government’s contention that Bourjaily somehow changed the standard for admissibility of such evidence. While Bourjaily did hold that the statement itself could be considered in ascertaining whether there was a conspiracy, the Court did not change the ultimate question, which is whether the statement was made during the scope of, and in furtherance of, the conspiracy.

United States v. Wolf, 839 F.2d 1387 (10th Cir. 1988)

A witness testified that the defendant’s wife stated that the defendant hit a child in the stomach. This was merely narrative and was not admissible against the defendant under the co-conspirator exception to the hearsay rule. The statement did not further the alleged conspiratorial objectives of abusing a child or of covering up abuse. The evidence was harmless in this case.

United States v. Garcia, 13 F.3d 1464 (11th Cir. 1994)

Statements made by one co-conspirator prior to the time that the defendant becomes a member of the conspiracy are not admissible against that defendant. Where there are multiple conspiracies, it is error to admit a statement that merely advances some other conspiracy not involving the defendant against whom it is admitted.

United States v. Blakey, 960 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1992)

The hearsay statement of a co-conspirator was not made in furtherance of the conspiracy and admitting it at trial was reversible error. The statement was made by a co-conspirator to an investigator who was investigating the offense. The co-conspirator pointed the finger of blame at the defendant. This did not advance the goal of the conspiracy, even though the declarant’s identification of the defendant was not entirely accurate and the government argued that the declarant was trying to mislead the investigator.

United States v. Christopher, 923 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1991)

Co-conspirator hearsay statements were inadmissible for two reasons. First, it was never clearly established who made the statement that the witness testified “was made by one of the sons.” Secondly, the trial court never made a specific finding that one of the sons was a co-conspirator at the time the statement was made (assuming the statement was made by that son).
United States v. Ibisevic, 675 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant carried over $10,000 into an international flight from Dulles Airport heading to Bosnia. An ICE agent who had a Puerto Rican accent questioned the defendant and his mother (the mother spoke no English) about whether they were carrying cash. The defendant responded that they had $5,000.00. During this “questioning” the defendant turned to his mother and translated, “They are asking how much the luggage is worth if it is lost.” The defendant and his mother actually had about $40,000 in the luggage, on their persons and in the mother’s purse. At trial, the defendant claimed that he did not understand the question and that the mother’s testimony (about what the defendant said to the mother) was admissible as a “present sense impression” to show a lack of understanding. The trial court held that this was hearsay and inadmissible. The Fourth Circuit reversed: The defendant’s statement was not hearsay (it was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted); it nevertheless would qualify as a present sense impression; and it was important to his defense regarding his lack of understanding that he was making a false statement or knowingly failing to file a currency form in violation of the law.

United States v. Green, 556 F.3d 151 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with selling drugs to an informant. There was a sketchy video of the transaction, but the identity of the seller was not certain. The informant testified at trial that it was not the defendant. The government later introduced a signed statement made by the informant fifty minutes after the videotaped transaction that identified the defendant as the seller. The government argued that it qualified as a “present sense impression” and thus was not hearsay. (The government did not try to impeach the informant during cross-examination with the prior statement as a prior inconsistent statement). The Third Circuit held that Rule 803(1) did not apply in this situation, because the informant’s statement was not made contemporaneous with his observations. Fifty minutes does not qualify as “immediately after” or contemporaneous. Moreover, the informant was responding to questions from the DEA when he made the statement, not simply reciting what he was then observing.

Brown v. Keane, 355 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2004)

The state offered evidence that a 911 caller reported that two men were in front of a bar shooting. The state offered the tape under the “present sense impression” exception to the hearsay rule. The federal district court, on habeas review, concluded that it was not certain that the caller was actually witnessing the shooting; it was possible the caller had earlier seen the two men, and then heard shooting and assumed that the men were involved in the shooting. The lower court concluded, however, that the present sense impression exception to the hearsay rule was “firmly rooted” and therefore the evidence should be admitted, despite the fact that there was an absence of a particularized guarantee of trustworthiness. The Second Circuit reversed: First, the court concluded that the tape did not qualify as a present sense impression for the same reason that the lower court found a lack of trustworthiness – there was no proof that the caller was actually describing events that he was contemporaneously witnessing. The court also rejected the theory that the caller’s statement qualified as an “excited utterance.” Again, however, excitement without contemporaneous observation does not qualify under that hearsay exception.

United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3rd Cir. 1998)

Two men robbed a cash-checking store and fled in a getaway car driven by a third man. Later, the police received a tip as to where the getaway car could be found. When they went to that location, there was an anonymous note for the police that stated, “Light green ZPJ-254. They changed cars; this is the other car.” Based on this information the police found the defendant, who was associated with the license plate ZPJ-254. At trial this note was introduced by the government on three theories: present sense impression, excited utterance, and residual hearsay exception. The Third Circuit rejected each theory and reversed the conviction. There was no proof that the author of the note actually witnessed what he described (for example, he may have been simply reciting what he had been told). Also, there was no proof that the author wrote the note at the time he was observing the event (if he did observe the event). The appellate court also held that there were no circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness – particularly because the author of the note was never learned.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 803(2) -- Excited Utterance)

United States v. Taveras, 380 F.3d 532 (1st Cir. 2004)

The evidence offered by the government did not qualify as a spontaneous declaration or an excited utterance. The declarant’s statement was made hours after the incident about which she was making the statement that was offered by the government.

Brown v. Keane, 355 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2004)

The state offered evidence that a 911 caller reported that two men were in front of a bar shooting. The state offered the tape under the “present sense impression” exception to the hearsay rule. The federal district court, on habeas review, concluded that it was not certain that the caller was actually witnessing the shooting; it was possible the caller had earlier seen the two men, and then heard shooting and assumed that the men were involved in the shooting. The lower court concluded, however, that the present sense impression exception to the hearsay rule was “firmly rooted” and therefore the evidence should be admitted, despite the fact that there was an absence of a particularized guarantee of trustworthiness. The Second Circuit reversed: First, the court concluded that the tape did not qualify as a present sense impression for the same reason that the lower court found a lack of trustworthiness – there was no proof that the caller was actually describing events that he was contemporaneously witnessing. The court also rejected the theory that the caller’s statement qualified as an “excited utterance.” Again, however, excitement without contemporaneous observation does not qualify under that hearsay exception.

United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3rd Cir. 1998)

Two men robbed a cash-checking store and fled in a getaway car driven by a third man. Later, the police received a tip as to where the getaway car could be found. When they went to that location, there was an anonymous note for the police that stated, “Light green ZPJ-254. They changed cars; this is the other car.” Based on this information the police found the defendant, who was associated with the license plate ZPJ-254. At trial this note was introduced by the government on three theories: present sense impression, excited utterance, and residual hearsay exception. The Third Circuit rejected each theory and reversed the conviction. There was no proof that the author of the note actually witnessed what he described (for example, he may have been simply reciting what he had been told). Also, there was no proof that the author wrote the note at the time he was observing the event (if he did observe the event). The appellate court also held that there were no circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness – particularly because the author of the note was never learned.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 803(3) – State of Mind)

United States v. Samaniego, 345 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 2003)
An apology can be admitted under the “state of mind” exception to the hearsay rule. However, while the statement, “I’m sorry” may reflect the declarant’s state of mind, the reason assigned to the apology is not generally covered. Thus, “I’m sorry for stealing your property” is not admissible under Rule 803(3).

United States v. Delvecchio, 816 F.2d 859 (2d Cir. 1987)
The government introduced the testimony of a DEA agent who was told by an informant that he was going to set up a meeting with Delvecchio and Amen. The DEA agent subsequently witnessed the transaction but could not identify Delvecchio. The government introduced testimony of the DEA agent concerning what he had been told by the informant to establish that Delvecchio was the other person there. The Second Circuit reverses: Rule 803(3) cannot be used to establish a fact which is in the mind of a declarant that is being used to establish the actions of a non-declarant unless there is “independent evidence which connects the declarant’s statement with the non-declarant’s activities.”

United States v. Peak, 856 F.2d 825 (7th Cir. 1988)
A defendant made statements during a telephone conversation with a co-defendant which illustrated his state of mind with regard to his involvement in a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine: the defendant, during the course of this conversation, indicated a willingness to join the co-defendant in an attempt to “capture” the perpetrators of the crime, as opposed to wanting to participate in the planned drug deal. The defendant offered this evidence to show his state of mind – that is, that he was not conspiring to participate in the drug deal. The evidence should have been admitted under the state of mind exception to the hearsay rule.

United States v. Tome, 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995)
Statements of a child abuse victim to a babysitter identifying her assailant were not admissible under Rule 803(3). That rule, which encompasses statements of a declarant’s then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition does not allow for statements identifying an alleged abuser, because that reflects the declarant’s memory of an event and the rule specifically does not include a statement of memory.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 803(4) – Statement Made for Medical Diagnosis)

United States v. Bercier, 506 F.3d 625 (8th Cir. 2007)

The sexual abuse victim’s prior statements implicating the defendant were not admissible as prior consistent statements, because the statements were not made prior to the alleged time of the fabrication. The statements were not admissible under the medical diagnosis exception, Rule 802(4), because statements that identify a perpetrator of a sexual assault are not made for purposes of medical diagnosis. See also United States v. Kenyon, 397 F.3d 1071 (8th Cir. 2005).

Olesen v. Class, 164 F.3d 1096 (8th Cir. 1999)

The defendant was convicted of sexual assault of three children. One child did not testify; a doctor testified, however, that the child told the doctor that the defendant was the perpetrator. This evidence was admitted under the state law analog to Rule 803(4). The Eighth Circuit held that the identity of the perpetrator was not shown to be necessary for medical diagnosis or treatment and the admission of the hearsay violated the defendant’s right of confrontation.

Ring v. Erickson, 983 F.2d 818 (8th Cir. 1992)

A child sex abuse victim made an out-of-court statement to a doctor. This was not admissible under the state analogy to Rule 803(4), because the child was not seeking medical help and, in fact, did not even know she was talking to a doctor. Both of these criteria underlie the rationale for the exception, which is that the patient is motivated to tell the truth to a treating physician. Admitting the evidence in this case violated the confrontation clause.

Webb v. Lewis, 44 F.3d 1387 (9th Cir. 1994)

The state offered the hearsay statements of a child abuse victim which had been made to a social worker on videotape under the state version of Rule 803(4). This was clearly erroneous, however. The social worker was not a doctor and nothing about her relationship to the child reflected a medical relationship. The social worker’s sole function was to investigate the charges of sexual abuse which had been made against the defendant. The child in no way was seeking medical attention. The videotaped statement was also inadmissible under the residual exception to the hearsay rule. There were inconsistencies in her statements and a lack of spontaneity which indicated that she had been coached by other people prior to the videotaped statement. See Idaho v. Wright, 110 S.Ct. 3139 (1990).

People of Territory of Guam v. Ignacio, 10 F.3d 608 (9th Cir. 1993)

A child’s statement to a social worker identifying the person who molested her was not admissible under Rule 803(4), because the inquiry was for the purpose of ensuring the child’s safety, not for the purpose of treatment or diagnosis. Harmless error.

United States v. Tome, 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995)

Statements of a child abuse victim to a social worker were not admissible under Rule 803(4), because the statements were not made for the purpose of diagnosis or treatment. The caseworker stated that she was an investigator, and provided no treatment to the victim.
United States v. Esparza, 791 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was arrested at the border, driving a car that had marijuana hidden in various compartments. He claimed that he had borrowed the car from a friend. At trial, the government introduced a Department of Motor Vehicles Form that was signed by the previous owner of the vehicle that declared that she had sold the car to the defendant six days prior to the arrest. The DMV form had been sent to the previous owner with an accompanying letter that explained that the car had been seized with drugs. The previous owner sent in the form, aware that there was a criminal investigation. The form, therefore, was testimonial. It was not a routine business record, though it was in the DMV files, because it was not created by an agency employee in the routine course of business and because of the criminal investigation, the previous owner had a motive to disassociate herself from the vehicle.

United States v. Blechman, 657 F.3d 1052 (10th Cir. 2011)

Records from AOL and PACER were admitted at trial and these records included certain “user-identifying” information that was inputted by the user, not by the companies and there was no effort by the companies to verify the information. This evidence was not admissible under the business records exception. Only when the business which accepts the outsider’s information makes an effort to assure reliability, or to verify the accuracy of the information, is the business records exception available in this situation. Harmless error.

United States v. Jackson, 636 F.3d 687 (5th Cir. 2010)

A DEA agent explained how and why drug traffickers keep drug ledgers. A co-conspirator’s drug ledgers that implicated the defendant were then introduced into evidence under the Business Records exception to the hearsay rule (the co-conspirator did not testify) and as a co-conspirator statement. The Fifth Circuit held that this was error. The agent’s testimony did not satisfactorily authenticate the records, or establish the necessary foundation that these records were kept in the regular course of business or that they were prepared during the course of the conspiracy. Though a person other than a record custodian may authenticate a business record, the witness must be able to authenticate this business record and not, as here, business records (or drug ledgers) in general. Admitting the ledgers constituted a violation of Confrontation Clause and required that the conviction be reversed. The Fifth Circuit further explained that the notebooks were inadmissible on Confrontation Clause grounds, because the government failed to prove that they were not testimonial. Because no effort was made to authenticate the notebooks (i.e., how or when they were written), the introduction of the notebooks became, in essence, the functional equivalent of the author testifying live in court. It is the government’s burden to prove that an out-of-court statement is non-testimonial.

United States v. Marguet-Pillado, 560 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2009)

The contents of the INS “A” file did not all qualify as a business record, because the file contained statements made by non-government people about the defendant. It was reversible error to admit this document under either Rule 803(6) or 803(8).
United States v. Baker, 538 F.3d 324 (5th Cir. 2008)

In this child pornography case, the government introduced a NCMEC report (National Center for Missing and Exploited Children) that identified certain victims in the pornographic files. The government failed to authenticate the report, however, under either Rule 803(6) (Business Record) or Rule 803(8) (Public Report). Though the government may have been able to overcome the hearsay exception, it was still required to authenticate the record as a business, or public record. Various means of authenticating such records are set forth in Rules 901 and 902. But the government did not offer any such proof.

United States v. Gwathney, 465 F.3d 1133 (10th Cir. 2006)

Western Union sent documents in compliance with a subpoena from the DEA. The records themselves could qualify as a business record, assuming that they were authenticated and the foundation was laid by a Western Union representative. However, the DEA agent could not lay that foundation and the records could not qualify as a business record of the DEA. Allowing the records into evidence was harmless error.

United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3rd Cir. 1992)

The government introduced bank wire transfer records for the truth of the matter asserted—that is, to show the movement of money from the bank to the corporation and then diverted to the defendant. The records were not admissible as a business record, because no custodian or other qualified witness identified the documents or established the foundation for the admissibility on this theory. No other exception could be used to authorize the admission of the documents. This was reversible error.

United States v. Casoni, 950 F.2d 893 (3rd Cir. 1991)

At trial, the government introduced the testimony of a former co-conspirator of the defendant. Then, to corroborate his testimony, the government introduced the testimony of the witness’s attorney, who also recited what the witness told him. Then the government offered the attorney’s memorandum proffer of what the witness would say; this memorandum had been given to the government in the attorney’s pitch to get the witness immunity. The memorandum was offered as a business record of the attorney. Though the attorney’s testimony was properly admitted as a prior consistent statement of the witness, the attorney’s memorandum was not a proper business record because it lacked trustworthiness usually ascribed to business records. The declarant—the witness—had an interest in minimizing his role in the offense and maximizing the role of the person against whom he was prepared to testify. Also, the attorney, in preparing the memorandum, had the same interest—in his professional capacity—to minimize his client’s culpability and maximize the culpability of the defendant. Thus, the witness’s statements to the attorney were admissible, but not the attorney’s memorandum of the proffer. Harmless error.

United States v. Versaint, 849 F.2d 827 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The defendant sought to introduce a police report as substantive evidence of a misidentification. The government resisted the offer on the grounds that the report was written one month after the undercover activities in the drug investigation had been conducted. The exclusion of the evidence was reversible error; the report qualified under the records exception to the hearsay rule.

United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1996)

A business record is admissible only if the information on the document is furnished by a person who is providing the information pursuant to the regular course of the business activities. Thus, a business record is not admissible even if it is prepared in the usual course of business, but the information is provided by someone outside the business, such as a customer. Here, the government introduced bank records that contained customers’ complaints that their credit cards included unauthorized charges. While the bank’s records were prepared in the ordinary course of business, the information provided by the customers did not qualify under Rule 803(6). Nevertheless, the court approved the admission of the evidence under Rule 803(24), the residual exception.

United States v. Chu Kong Yin, 935 F.2d 990 (9th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with INS fraud because of his false statement on an INS application about his prior criminal record. At trial, the government offered an official Hong Kong record of defendant’s conviction. The record was prepared, however, in 1988 and indicated that defendant had a 1981 conviction. This record was properly authenticated under Rule 901, but was nevertheless inadmissible hearsay. It was not a business record, because the author did not report something which he or she witnessed; rather the author’s basis of knowledge was unknown. The document was also inadmissible under the public records exception, because, again, the author did not report events to which he or she was a witness. This exception, Rule 803(8), only excuses the appearance of the author, but the testimony of the author would have to be otherwise admissible.

United States v. McIntyre, 997 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1993)

The government offered motel registration cards for the purpose of showing that the conspirators had been at the hotel on a particular date. The registration cards, however, were hearsay. Though the cards were shown to have been maintained in the regular course of business, the information was obtained from the guest and the guest is not under the “business duty” or compulsion to provide accurate information. If the business employee verified the information, the business record exception might apply; but the government failed to establish that the employee actually verified the information (the guest’s identity). Also, the government introduced Western Union wire transfers for the purpose of establishing the identity of both the sender and the recipient. Though Western Union verified recipients, it never verified the identity of the sender. The admission of the transfer records was erroneous with regard to identifying the sender, but not with regard to the identity of the recipient. Finally, this same analysis applied to records of a cellular phone. Again, the identity of the customer as reflected in the records was hearsay, absent evidence that the company verified the customer’s identity. These errors were harmless.

United States v. Bohrer, 807 F.2d 159 (10th Cir. 1986)

The government sought to introduce an IRS contact card which contained the agent’s version of an alleged telephone conversation between the agent and the defendant. This was inadmissible under the “business records” exception. The card was maintained as part of the defendant’s IRS file for the specific purpose of prosecuting the defendant. As such, it was not kept in the regular course of business.
EVIDENCE
(RULE 803(8) – Public Records and Reports)

United States v. Esparza, 791 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was arrested at the border, driving a car that had marijuana hidden in various compartments. He claimed that he had borrowed the car from a friend. At trial, the government introduced a Department of Motor Vehicles Form that was signed by the previous owner of the vehicle that declared that she had sold the car to the defendant six days prior to the arrest. The DMV form had been sent to the previous owner with an accompanying letter that explained that the car had been seized with drugs. The previous owner sent in the form, aware that there was a criminal investigation. The form, therefore, was testimonial. It was not a routine business record, though it was in the DMV files, because it was not created by an agency employee in the routine course of business and because of the criminal investigation, the previous owner had a motive to disassociate herself from the vehicle.

United States v. Marguet-Pillado, 560 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2009)

The contents of the INS “A” file did not all qualify as a business record, because the file contained statements made by non-government people about the defendant. It was reversible error to admit this document under either Rule 803(6) or 803(8).

United States v. Baker, 538 F.3d 324 (5th Cir. 2008)

In this child pornography case, the government introduced a NCMEC report (National Center for Missing and Exploited Children), that identified certain victims in the pornographic files. The government failed to authenticate the report, however, under either Rule 803(6) (Business Record) or Rule 803(8) (Public Report). Though the government may have been able to overcome the hearsay exception, it was still required to authenticate the record as a business, or public record. Various means of authenticating such records are set forth in Rules 901 and 902. But the government did not offer any such proof.
EVIDENCE
(RULE 803(15) -- statement in a document affecting an interest in property)

United States v. Boulware, 384 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with tax evasion and related charges. He claimed that the money that he allegedly skimmed from the company (and gave to his girlfriend) was actually legally still owned by the company (and simply being held by the girlfriend) and was therefore not taxable (i.e., there was no transfer of the money for tax purposes from the company to the defendant or the girlfriend). In a state court lawsuit, the state court agreed that the funds were still owned by the company. The trial court in the federal prosecution erred in excluding evidence of the state court judgment. The court also concluded that the state court judgment was not hearsay because under Rule 803(15) it was a statement in a document affecting an interest in property.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 803(18) – Learned Treatise)

United States v. Martinez, 588 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2009)

During the direct or cross-examination of an expert witness, the witness may refer to statements in a learned treatise. Portions of the treatise may be read into evidence, though the treatise itself is not admissible. The portion of the treatise is admissible for the truth of the matter asserted and Rule 803(18) exempts the statements from the hearsay rule. In this case, during the testimony of the expert, the government introduced a videotape of an expert describing a medical procedure. The Sixth Circuit held that a videotaped interview of the expert did not qualify under Rule 803(18).
EVIDENCE
(Rule 803(24) – Residual Exception – NOW Rule 807)

Rivers v. United States, 777 F.3d 1306 (11th Cir. 2015)

Rule 807, the residual exception to the hearsay rule, focuses on the reliability of the declarant, not the witness who is in court reciting what the declarant said out of court. In this case, the defendant claimed that his trial attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel. The trial attorney had died prior to the § 2255 hearing. Another attorney was called to the stand by the prosecutor and he recited what the trial attorney had told him. The trial court in the § 2255 hearing held that the testifying attorney was reliable. This misses the point, however. What matters is the reliability of the declarant – the attorney who represented the defendant at trial. And his reliability, in regards to his preparation of the case for trial, was not inherently reliable.

United States v. Mitchell, 145 F.3d 572 (3rd Cir. 1998)

Two men robbed a cash-checking store and fled in a getaway car driven by a third man. Later, the police received a tip as to where the getaway car could be found. When they went to that location, there was an anonymous note for the police that stated, “Light green ZPJ-254. They changed cars; this is the other car.” Based on this information the police found the defendant, who was associated with the license plate ZPJ-254. At trial this note was introduced by the government on three theories: present sense impression, excited utterance, and residual hearsay exception. The Third Circuit rejected each theory and reversed the conviction. There was no proof that the author of the note actually witnessed what he described (for example, he may have been simply reciting what he had been told). Also, there was no proof that the author wrote the note at the time he was observing the event (if he did observe the event). The appellate court also held that there were no circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness – particularly because the author of the note was never learned.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 804(a) – Definition of Unavailability)

United States v. Tirado-Tirado, 563 F.3d 117 (5th Cir. 2009)

The government’s deportation of the witness foreclosed its ability to claim that it made a good faith effort to obtain the witness’s presence in court. Thus, the use of a prior video-taped deposition of the witness could not be used at trial.

United States v. Yida, 498 F.3d 945 (9th Cir. 2007)

If the government deports a witness, it cannot then claim that the witness is “unavailable” and attempt to use the witness’s testimony from a prior trial pursuant to Rule 804(b)(1): “Implicit in the duty to use reasonable means to procure the presence of an absent witness (Rule 804(a)(5)) is the duty to use reasonable means to prevent a present witness from becoming absent.”

United States v. Foster, 128 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1997)

An alleged co-conspirator testified at the grand jury, under a grant of immunity, that the defendant was not in any way involved with any drug dealing. The witness could not be found at trial, however – possibly because of threats made by the prosecutor to the witness’s attorney about the dangers of testifying perjuriously. The trial judge erred in denying the defendant’s request to introduce the witness’s grand jury testimony. With regard to the unavailability requirement, the defense attorney’s late effort to secure the witness’s presence was explained in part by the government’s tardy disclosure of the grand jury transcripts to the defense.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 804(b)(1) – Prior Testimony)

United States v. Sklena, 692 F.3d 725 (7th Cir. 2012)

The defendant sought to introduce the prior testimony of his deceased partner that was given during a CFTC deposition. The government argued the DOJ was not the “same party” as the CFTC and therefore Rule 804(b)(1) did not authorize the prior testimony. The Seventh Circuit disagreed. The CFTC had the same motive to cross-examine the witness in the CFTC proceeding as the prosecutors in the criminal case and the CFTC, a governmental agency, can be considered to be the “same party” for purposes of Rule 804(b)(1) as the Department of Justice. Therefore the prior testimony was admissible.

United States v. Duenas, 691 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy. A law enforcement officer testified at a hearing that was focused on the admissibility of the defendant’s post-arrest statement. The officer was killed by a drunk driver prior to trial. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant did not have a “similar motive and opportunity” to question the officer at the earlier hearing and his testimony from that hearing should not have been admitted at the trial. At the suppression hearing, the question was whether the defendant’s statements were voluntarily given and whether his statement was obtained in violation of Miranda, while at the trial, the defendant would have questioned the officer about the contents of the statement.

Cross v. Hardy, 632 F.3d 356 (7th Cir. 2011)

In the first state trial, the victim testified that the defendant raped her. The jury failed to reach a verdict. The “victim” could not be found prior to the second trial, so her testimony was simply read to the jury at the second trial. The Seventh Circuit held that the state failed to exercise sufficient due diligence to locate the victim and using her prior testimony violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights. “Given the importance of A.S.’s testimony, the state was obligated to exert great effort to locate her . . . If there is a possibility, albeit remote, that affirmative measures might produce the declarant, the obligation of good faith may demand their effectuation.” THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED ON AEDPA-DEFERENCE GROUNDS.

United States v. McFall, 558 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2009)

The defendant sought to introduce the grand jury testimony of a witness on the theory that his prior testimony was subjected to the cross-examination of the government and was thus admissible under Rule 804(b)(1). Though the government may not have had the exact same motive in cross-examining the witness at the grand jury, the trial court erred in excluding the testimony. The Ninth Circuit rejected the stricter rule followed by the Second Circuit in United States v. DiNapoli, 8 F.3d 909 (2d Cir. 1993), which requires a virtually identical interest, as opposed to “similar” motive in cross-examining the witness during the prior proceeding.

United States v. Yida, 498 F.3d 945 (9th Cir. 2007)

If the government deports a witness, it cannot then claim that the witness is “unavailable” and attempt to use the witness’s testimony from a prior trial pursuant to Rule 804(b)(1): “Implicit in the duty to use reasonable means to procure the presence of an absent witness (Rule 804(a)(5)) is the duty to use reasonable means to prevent a present witness from becoming absent.”

United States v. Omar, 104 F.3d 519 (1st Cir. 1997)

Under certain circumstances, the defense may offer the grand jury testimony of a witness who is unavailable for trial. This requires a showing that the government had the same motive during the grand jury to cross-examine the witness as it would have at trial. The government in this case did not have the same motive, so the evidence was properly excluded.

United States v. Salerno, 937 F.2d 797 (2d Cir. 1991)

Rule 804(b)(1) provides that if a witness is unavailable, his prior sworn testimony is admissible, assuming that the party against whom the testimony is introduced had an opportunity and a similar motive to cross-examine the witness. Here, the defense sought to introduce the exculpatory grand jury testimony of two witnesses. The witnesses relied on their Fifth Amendment rights at trial and refused to testify, thus, they were unavailable; also, the government refused to grant the witnesses immunity. The issue on appeal was whether the government had a “similar motive” when the witnesses were “cross-examined” at the grand jury? While the court agrees that the government had no motive to cross-examine the witnesses at the grand jury (the government contended that the witnesses were known to be committing perjury), because the government “procured” the witnesses’ unavailability by refusing to grant them immunity at trial, this requirement would be relaxed. Where, as here, the unavailability of a witness can be remedied by the party against whom the testimony is being offered (as opposed, for example, to cases in which the witness is dead), that party cannot complain that it did not have a similar motive in the prior proceeding to cross-examine the witness. The United States Supreme Court reversed: the Rule specifically requires that the party against whom the testimony is offered must have had a similar motive to cross-examine the witness at the earlier proceeding. The Second Circuit then again considered the case, 974 F.2d 231, and again reversed the conviction, concluding that the prosecutor did have the same motive to cross-examine the witnesses at the grand jury as he had at trial. The government had a meaningful opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses at the grand jury and, in fact, did cross-examine the witnesses in that forum. The Second Circuit then reconsidered the case again, en banc, United States v. DiNapoli, 8 F.3d 909 (2d Cir. 1997), and held that the government did not have a similar motive during the grand jury to develop the cross-examination and therefore, the hearsay testimony was not admissible. The en banc court held as follows: “We do not accept the position that the test of similar motive is simply whether at the two proceedings the questioner takes the same side of the same issue. If a fact is critical to a cause of action at a second proceeding but the same fact was only peripherally related to a different cause of action at a first proceeding, no one would claim that the questioner had a similar motive at both proceedings to show that the fact had been established or disproved.” This applies to the grand jury testimony.

United States v. Foster, 128 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1997)

An alleged co-conspirator testified at the grand jury, under a grant of immunity, that the defendant was not in any way involved with any drug dealing. The witness could not be found at trial, however – possibly because of threats made by the prosecutor to the witness’s attorney about the dangers of testifying perjuriously. The trial judge erred in denying the defendant’s request to introduce the witness’s grand jury testimony. With regard to the unavailability requirement, the defense attorney’s late effort to secure the witness’s presence was explained in part by the government’s tardy disclosure of the grand jury transcripts to the defense.

United States v. Flenoid, 949 F.2d 970 (8th Cir. 1991)

The trial court erred in refusing to allow defendant to introduce the testimony of a witness from one of the prior mistrials. The witness had been cross-examined by the government and the defendant made an adequate showing that the witness could not be located.

United States v. Curbello, 940 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1991)

The trial court failed to demonstrate that the declarant was “unavailable” thus justifying the use of his out-of-court statement against penal interest. The only proof of unavailability was the statement of the prosecutor that the declarant was in prison in the Bahamas. This is not sufficient to prove unavailability: The government must show that it could not procure the declarant’s attendance by process or other reasonable means. The government had to show that efforts were made to contact the Bahamian government about extradition or other means of procuring the witness’s attendance. The government failed to show that a deposition or letters rogatory were not practical.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 804(b)(3) -- Statement Against Interest)

The Supreme Court reversed this state court murder conviction on the grounds that the state was permitted to introduce the statement of a co-defendant that implicated the defendant. The co-defendant was not tried with the defendant (thus, this was not a _Bruton_ situation) and he invoked his Fifth Amendment right not to testify. In his out-of-court statement, he admitted some participation in the crime spree, but implicated the defendant (his brother) in the murder. The state argued that this was admissible under the state exception to the hearsay rule for statements against the declarant's penal interest. The Supreme Court held that the statement implicating the defendant in the murder was not sufficiently against the declarant's penal interest to be admitted. The admission of this testimony violated the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment.

Only the actual inculpatory portions of an out-of-court statement “against penal interest” may be admitted in evidence, not the other portions of a narrative statement.

_United States v. Ocasio-Ruiz_, 779 F.3d 43 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with carjacking. He sought to introduce at trial the statement of another man, since deceased, that he made to his mother, that he was the sole perpetrator of the offense. The defendant argued that this statement of the deceased to his mother was a statement against interest that was corroborated by the fact that the statement was made to the declarant’s mother. The First Circuit held that excluding this evidence was reversible error.

_United States v. Hatfield_, 591 F.3d 945 (7th Cir. 2010)

The trial court erred in excluding testimony that a third party admitted (in an out-of-court statement recorded in a police report) that he committed the crime that the defendant in this case was facing. There was no evidence that the confessor knew the defendant and there were circumstances corroborating the confessor’s admission. The out-of-court statement was obviously against the declarant’s penal interest and there were sufficient indications of the trustworthiness of the statement.

_United States v. Rodriguez-Martinez_, 480 F.3d 303 (5th Cir. 2007)

A drug purchaser’s statement to the police that the defendant was his supplier may have been against his interest, but it also violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights and admitting the statement was reversible error.

_Stallings v. Bobby_, 464 F.3d 576 (6th Cir. 2006)

Allowing the state to introduce a co-conspirator’s statement that implicated the defendant violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights.

_United States v. Jones_, 371 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2004)
The defendant’s co-codefendant confessed to the crime with which he was charged, but then became a fugitive prior to trial. The government offered the co-conspirator’s confession at trial, though all references to the defendant were redacted. The Seventh Circuit held that the statement should not have been admitted. First, because the declarant was not at trial, the statement was obviously only used against the defendant, thus, redacting the defendant’s name did not satisfy the Bruton concerns. Second, according to Crawford v. Washington, this statement could not be admitted without violating the defendant’s right of confrontation.

United States v. Chapman, 345 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 2003)

A missing witness previously assisted the police in catching one of his drug customers. His statements did not qualify under Rule 804(b)(3). The witness, “by casting himself as a mere mule and serving up the repeat buyer, could reasonably assume that he would be minimizing his criminal liability.” Therefore, the statement was not sufficiently against his penal interest to satisfy the Confrontation Clause. The court also rejected the government’s theory that the statements were admissible to explain the officers’ conduct in pursuing the buyer (defendant).

Forn v. Hornung, 343 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2003)

The out of court statements of the accomplice / declarant did not qualify as statements against interest under the Lilly standard.

Hill v. Hofbauer, 337 F.3d 706 (6th Cir. 2003)

Following the decision in Lilly, the Sixth Circuit held that a statement by a co-conspirator, even if it incriminates the declarant, is inherently unreliable and inadmissible pursuant to the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Price, 134 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in excluding evidence offered by the defense regarding a co-conspirator’s statements against penal interest. The declarant was unavailable (he was a fugitive at the time of trial). With regard to the condition that there are corroborating circumstances, the issue is whether there are circumstances that indicate the trustworthiness of the statement itself, not whether there are circumstances that corroborate the content of the declaration. Among circumstances that may corroborate a statement against penal interest are: (1) the statement is made after receiving Miranda warnings; (2) the declarant and the party offering the statement do not have a close relationship; (3) the absence of any indication that the statement was made in an effort to curry favor with law enforcement. The error in excluding this evidence was harmless.

Crespin v. New Mexico, 144 F.3d 641 (10th Cir. 1998)

Admitting the co-conspirator’s statement that implicated the defendant was erroneous. The state’s theory that the statement was “against the declarant’s penal interest” did not survive appellate habeas scrutiny. The Tenth Circuit held that the state courts failed to properly apply the “indicia of reliability” test. The court reiterated the “time-honored” principle that “a codefendant’s confession inculpating the accused is inherently unreliable.”

United States v. Castelan, 219 F.3d 690 (7th Cir. 2000)
Pursuant to Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594 (1994), the trial court must evaluate a witness’s out-of-court statement line-by-line in determining whether it is admissible under Rule 804(b)(3). The fact that the statement, taken as a whole is incriminating is not sufficient to overcome the Confrontation Clause concerns. Here, the court failed to undertake this analysis and the fact that the police told the co-defendant that he could help himself by cooperating further reduced the reliability of the statement. Harmless error.

United States v. Barone, 114 F.3d 1284 (1st Cir. 1997)

At great length, the First Circuit reviews the law regarding the admissibility of statements against penal interest pursuant to Rule 804(b)(3), concluding, in the end, that the vast majority of evidence offered by the government was admissible.

United States v. Boyce, 849 F.2d 833 (3rd Cir. 1988)

A co-defendant was arrested and his subsequent statement was offered in evidence at trial under the statement against interest exception to the hearsay rule. The record, however, failed to reveal the circumstances surrounding the arrest and interrogation. It was equally plausible that the co-defendant was motivated by a desire to curry favor with the FBI agent. The statement was inadmissible under 804(b)(3).

United States v. Flores, 985 F.2d 770 (5th Cir. 1993)

Defendant’s co-defendant testified at the grand jury, implicating both himself and the defendant in the drug conspiracy. The government offered this hearsay against the defendant, relying on the “against penal interest” exception to the hearsay rule – 804(b)(3). Pursuant to Idaho v. Wright, corroborating evidence may not be considered in determining whether a statement may be admitted under the Confrontation Clause where, as here, the statement is presumed to be unreliable. The circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness must exist in the circumstances of the statement itself. Mere corroboration is not itself sufficient to overcome the Confrontation Clause hurdle. Also, the “against penal interest exception,” though a “firmly rooted exception,” does not qualify all hearsay statements as inherently reliable. This is particularly true where, as here, the statement is not only against the penal interest of the speaker, but also against the penal interest of the party objecting to the admissibility of the statement.

United States v. Hazelett, 32 F.3d 1313 (8th Cir. 1994)

A woman was arrested on a bus and found to be in possession of cocaine. She agreed to cooperate and implicated herself (as the courier) and the defendant as the supplier. She disappeared before trial. The government sought to introduce her earlier statements under Rule 804(b)(3) – statements against her penal interest. An unavailable declarant’s lengthy narrative is not admissible under 804(b)(3) merely because some portion of the narrative subjects the declarant to criminal liability. Williamson v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 2431 (1994). The declarant’s statements which implicated the defendant were not sufficiently against the declarant’s penal interest to be admissible. This statement, which was made after the declarant was arrested in possession of a substantial quantity of cocaine, is a good example of a declarant possibly motivated by the very natural desire to curry favor from the arresting officers and the desire to alleviate culpability by implicating others. In short, pointing the finger at the defendant may well have been an effort to minimize culpability, the opposite motivation which is the basis for the 804(b)(3) exception to the hearsay rule.
United States v. Beydler, 120 F.3d 985 (9th Cir. 1997)
When the declarant’s out-of-court statement (made against his penal interest) is made during the course of the declarant’s effort to secure a deal, the statement will generally not be admissible under Rule 804(b)(3).

United States v. Paguio, 114 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1997)
The defendant was charged with bank fraud. His father made a statement to defendant’s attorney and paralegal that he was responsible for the crime. The father was a fugitive at the time of trial. The defendant sought to introduce the statement pursuant to Rule 804(b)(3). The trial court permitted the defense to offer part of the father’s statement (the part in which he inculpated himself), but not the part that exculpated his son, the defendant. This was reversible error. Unlike in Williamson, the portion of the statement being excluded was not self-exculpatory of the declarant. The excluded portion – exonerating the son – was simply another way of inculpating the declarant, and was thus admissible under Rule 804(b)(3).

United States v. Costa, 31 F.3d 1073 (11th Cir. 1994)
The government offered the confession of a co-defendant (who was not on trial with the defendant) which implicated both the defendant on trial, and the co-defendant, himself. The government relied on Rule 804(b)(3). The court reversed: even though the statement might appear to be against the declarant’s penal interest, the part of the statement implicating the defendant was not sufficiently against the declarant’s penal interest to be admissible under this theory. Under Bruton, such statements must be excluded. The declarant’s statement was made while he was in custody, and after he was told by the AUSA that if he did not provide substantial assistance, he would face life in prison.

United States v. Curbello, 940 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1991)
The trial court failed to demonstrate that the declarant was “unavailable” thus justifying the use of his out-of-court statement against penal interest. The only proof of unavailability was the statement of the prosecutor that the declarant was in prison in the Bahamas. This is not sufficient to prove unavailability: The government must show that it could not procure the declarant’s attendance by process or other reasonable means. The government had to show that efforts were made to contact the Bahamian government about extradition or other means of procuring the witness’s attendance. The government failed to show that a deposition or letters rogatory were not practical.

United States v. Gabay, 923 F.2d 1536 (11th Cir. 1991)
Rule 804(b)(3) permits the introduction of an unavailable witness’s out-of-court statements if the statements were contrary to the penal interest of the declarant. Here, the statements were made by a person who was deceased at the time of trial. The statements amounted to a confession of complicity in the counterfeiting venture for which the defendant was being tried. The fact that the declarant had been immunized prior to making the prior statements did not change the result – the statements were still against the penal interest of the declarant.
EVIDENCE
(Former Rule 804(b)(5)) --- SEE: Rule 807)

The forfeiture-by-wrongdoing exception to the hearsay rule can be invoked only if there is proof that the defendant caused the declarant’s unavailability with the intent of silencing the witness.

Jensen v. Clements, 800 F.3d 892 (7th Cir. 2015)

The victim wrote a letter saying that she thought her husband was going to kill her. Two weeks later she was murdered. The letter was not admissible under the forfeiture-by-wrongdoing exception to the hearsay rule, because the defendant did not kill the victim to prevent her from being a witness in a case.

United States v. Leal-Del Carmen, 697 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 2012)

Deporting a potentially exculpatory witness prior to providing the defense an opportunity to interview the witness violates the defendant’s right to compulsory process and to due process. The defendant, however, is required to show that the government acted in bad faith, a showing that was, in fact, made in this case, because the government had interviewed the witness prior to deporting him. The Ninth Circuit held that once the government is aware that a witness has exculpatory evidence, the government must alert the defense. If defense counsel has not yet been appointed or retained, the government may not deport the witness until after counsel is appointed or retained and given an opportunity to preserve the testimony. The Ninth Circuit also held that the trial court should have permitted the defendant to introduce the witness’s statement to the border agent prior to being deported. The out-of-court declaration was admissible pursuant to Rule 804(b)(6) – the forfeiture by wrongdoing hearsay exception – because the government rendered the witness unavailable. Finally, the appellate court held that the defendant was entitled to a “missing witness” instruction that would have advised the jury that the failure of a party to produce a material witness who could elucidate matters under investigation gives rise to a presumption that the testimony of that witness would be unfavorable to that party if the witness is peculiarly within the party’s control. The deported witness could have been paroled back into the country, but only the government could produce the witness under that procedure. “For the government to say that it isn’t responsible for her absence because it no longer knows where to find her comes close to the classic definition of chutzpah.”

Perkins v. Herbert, 596 F.3d 161 (2d Cir. 2010)

The state trial court concluded that the defendant procured a witness’s unavailability and therefore, the hearsay statement of the witness was admissible. The factual finding of the trial court, however, was not supported by sufficient evidence and the admission of the witness’s grand jury testimony violated the Confrontation Clause. Harmless error.

United States v. Rodriguez-Marrero, 390 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004)

The government offered the testimony of a witness who recited what a cooperating witness had told him. The government argued that the cooperating witness’s death (he was murdered) rendered the evidence admissible, because the statements were reliable and because the defendant “acquiesced” in his murder, though he was not directly responsible for the murder. The First Circuit held that Crawford v. Washington barred this evidence on Confrontation Clause grounds, and that Rule 804(b)(5) did not apply, because the lower court made no findings that would support the conclusion that the defendant was responsible (in the conspiratorial sense) for the murder of the witness, as opposed to simply being aware of the order from others that the witness was to be killed.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 806 – Impeaching Declarant)

Blackston v. Rapelje, 780 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2014)
If the state introduces a prosecution witness’s prior sworn testimony at defendant’s trial, the defense is entitled to introduce evidence that the witness recanted that testimony. This is implicit in the right to confront one’s accusers. The prior sworn testimony in this case occurred at the defendant’s first trial. After that trial, two of the principal witnesses recanted. At the retrial, the two witnesses refused to testify and the state was permitted to read their testimony from the first trial. The defense was prohibited from impeaching their testimony with the recantations. This error required granting a writ of habeas corpus.

Vasquez v. Jones, 496 F.3d 564 (6th Cir. 2007)
The state trial court’s decision to bar the defense from introducing impeachment evidence relating to a hearsay declarant’s criminal record violated the Confrontation Clause. The right to offer evidence of a witness’s criminal record to demonstrate his lack of credibility is a core principle of the Confrontation Clause and applies with equal force to a “witness” who does not appear at trial but whose out-of-court statements are offered through a hearsay exception.

United States v. Jackson, 345 F.3d 59 (2d Cir. 2003)
Brady applies to information about declarants who do not testify, but whose out-of-court statements are introduced in evidence.

United States v. Grant, 256 F.3d 1146 (11th Cir. 2001)
The government offered considerable co-conspirator hearsay evidence, but very few statements actually implicated the defendant, though the statements did indicate that the declarant had a partner. The defendant had acquired an affidavit from the co-conspirator declarant that completely exonerated the defendant and stated that the defendant was not the declarant’s partner. The Eleventh Circuit held that excluding the affidavit was reversible error. The fact that the affidavit statements were not specifically inconsistent with a particular statement attributed to him at trial is not the test. Rather, Rule 806 states that any evidence is admissible “which would be admissible … if [the] declarant had testified as a witness” from the stand. The statements contained in the affidavit would be admissible to impeach the declarant, had he been a witness for the government at trial. The court noted that the affidavit statements would not be admissible for the truth of the matter asserted, but only as impeachment.

United States v. Gonzalez-Maldonado, 115 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1997)
The court retained a psychiatrist to determine if a co-defendant was competent to stand trial. The co-defendant was declared incompetent, but his recorded statements to undercover officers, statements that incriminated the defendant, were critical evidence for the prosecution. The defense wanted to call the psychiatrist as their witness to establish the mental illness of the co-defendant – a mental illness that led the witness to exaggerate, according to the psychiatrist. Excluding this testimony was reversible error. The psychiatrist was obviously qualified as an expert and his testimony related directly to the veracity of the declarant (i.e., the recorded statements of the incompetent co-defendant).
United States v. Wali, 860 F.2d 588 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The government offered evidence of a co-conspirator’s statement which incriminated the defendant. In response, the defense offered prior inconsistent statements of the co-conspirator under Rule 806. The trial court erred in excluding this testimony. Once the prosecution introduces statements in which the co-conspirator inculpated the defendant, inconsistent statements in which the same co-conspirator exculpated the defendant can be admitted under Rule 806 without any need for cross-examination and regardless of whether the declarant could have been deposed. Furthermore, the declarant need not be given an opportunity to examine or explain or deny the inconsistent statement.

United States v. Moody, 903 F.2d 321 (5th Cir. 1990)

It was reversible error to preclude the defense attorney from impeaching the veracity of hearsay declarants whose statements formed the basis of the government’s prosecution of the defendant for mail and wire fraud.

Brown v. Dugger, 831 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987)

A police officer testified about the statements of a third party. Defense counsel sought to cross-examine that officer in a way to demonstrate bias on the part of that third party declarant. The trial court prohibited this mode of cross-examination of the officer. This was error of constitutional dimensions and required reversal.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 807 – Residual Exception)

United States v. Slatten, 865 F.3d 767 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

This is the Blackwater prosecution relating to the murders committed by military contractors while serving in Iraq. Reversal was required because the trial court refused to sever one defendant’s case which was requested in order to introduce the statement of a co-defendant that was inadmissible in a joint trial. Severance is required under Rule 14 if it is necessary in order to assure that a defendant can introduce evidence that would be inadmissible at a joint trial, and which is essential to the defendant’s right to a fair trial. The statement of the co-defendant exonerated the defendant. Even though the co-defendant would not have testified at defendant’s severed trial, the statement of the co-defendant would have been admissible pursuant to Rule 807, the residual exception to the hearsay rule. The co-defendant’s statements to the authorities investigating the shooting contained equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness: the co-defendant was speaking pursuant to a grant of immunity; he was implicating himself; his statements were consistent over time. Because the statement of the co-defendant would have been admissible at a separate trial, the trial court erred in denying the severance motion.

Rivers v. United States, 777 F.3d 1306 (11th Cir. 2015)

The residual exception to the hearsay rule, Rule 807, was designed to be used rarely, in exceptional circumstances, when exceptional guarantees of trustworthiness exist and when high degrees of probativeness and necessity are present. At the heart of a Rule 807 determination is the trustworthiness of the declarant’s out of court statement, not the credibility or reliability of the witness who, in court, is reciting what the declarant said. The witness who is reciting what was said can be cross-examined in court and his memory of the declarant’s statement can be challenged and the jury (or judge) can evaluate the credibility and memory of the witness. Rule 807, however, focuses on the out-of-court declarant’s credibility and the trustworthiness of what the declarant said. The declarant is not available to be cross-examined, so there must be circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness that instill in that out-of-court statement reliability. One factor that the court may consider is whether there is corroborating evidence that supports the out-of-court statement. But the corroborating evidence must be “extraordinarily strong before it will render the hearsay evidence sufficiently trustworthy to justify its admission.”

Christie v. Hollins, 409 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2005)

The prior testimony of a defense witness should have been admitted in this case in light of the showing by the defense that diligent efforts had been made to locate the witness and she had not been located.

United States v. Brothers Const. Co. of Ohio, 219 F.3d 300 (4th Cir. 2000)

Grand jury testimony of an unavailable witness should not have been admitted under the residual exception to the hearsay rules, Rule 804(b)(5). Harmless error.
United States v. Canan, 48 F.3d 954 (6th Cir. 1995)

In Williamson v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 2431 (1994), the Supreme Court held that in order to introduce a hearsay statement under Rule 804(b)(3), the district court must go through the statement line-by-line to determine if the statements are against the declarant’s penal interest. In this case, the Sixth Circuit holds that the same inquiry must be undertaken when out-of-court statements are introduced pursuant to Rule 804(b)(5). Thus, the “circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness” must be found in each assertion of the hearsay statement. The district court should review the statement “sentence by sentence” in order to comply with the confrontation clause and Rule 804(b)(5).

United States v. Gomez-Lemos, 939 F.2d 326 (6th Cir. 1991)

The grand jury testimony of a co-conspirator was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(5). Even though the testimony was corroborated by other witnesses, the presence of corroboration does not satisfy the requirement for other “indicia of reliability.” Idaho v. Wright, 110 S.Ct. 3139 (1990) (indicia of reliability must come from surrounding circumstances of the statement).

United States v. York, 852 F.2d 221 (7th Cir. 1988)

The government introduced statements by a fourteen-year-old to a probation officer. The fourteen-year-old was describing events that occurred five years earlier. The probation officer to whom the fourteen-year-old had made these statements made no transcript of the interview; thus preventing the Court from determining whether there were leading questions or other suggestive means of eliciting the statements of the child. The evidence was inadmissible under the residual exception to the hearsay rule.

United States v. Harbin, 112 F.3d 974 (8th Cir. 1997)

The government offered the grand jury testimony of a witness who was supposedly unavailable to testify, because she could not be located. However, the government failed to offer sufficient proof that it had made efforts to locate the witness. The government may not rely on general statements that “we can’t find her” or “she is avoiding service of a subpoena.”

United States v. Lang, 904 F.2d 618 (11th Cir. 1990)

An unavailable witness’ grand jury testimony which lacks circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness is not admissible under Rule 804(b)(5). Although the Eleventh Circuit has not adopted a per se rule excluding grand jury testimony, in three reported decisions, this testimony has not been admitted under Rule 804(b)(5), United States v. Gonzalez, 559 F.2d 1271 (5th Cir. 1977); United States v. Thevis, 665 F.2d 616 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Fernandez, 892 F.2d 976 (11th Cir. 1989).

United States v. Fernandez, 892 F.2d 976 (11th Cir. 1989)

The government introduced the grand jury testimony of a witness who died prior to trial. The witness’ death was of natural causes unrelated to the defendants. In a lengthy review of Rule 804(b)(5), the Eleventh Circuit concludes that such testimony is not admissible absent an extraordinary showing of trustworthiness.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 901 – Authentication)

United States v. Alvirez, 831 F.3d 1115 (9th Cir. 2016)

Everything you wanted to know about authenticating a Certificate of Indian Blood in a prosecution of an Indian (allegedly) for assault. The Ninth Circuit discusses the provision in FRE 902(1) and FRE 902(2) dealing with authentication of domestic public documents in the context of an Indian Tribe document.

United States v. Vayner, 769 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with sending a fake birth certificate through email. He defended on the basis that that was not his email address. The government offered a printout of a Russian social media website page (akin to Facebook) without submitting sufficient evidence to authenticate that this was what the government claimed it was (i.e., the defendant’s profile page). That page identified the defendant as using the email address that was the focus of the prosecution. Because the government failed to sufficiently authenticate the profile page on the social media website and this was the principal evidence used to link the defendant to the email address, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Jones, 600 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 2010)

Rule 901(b)(5) allows voice identification of a voice on an audiotape by opinion based upon hearing the voice at any time under circumstances connecting it with the alleged speaker. In this case, the law enforcement officer identified the defendant’s voice on a wiretap by comparing it to the defendant’s voice which he heard on a couple occasions and by overhearing a conversation between the defendant and his attorney for fifteen minutes during a break in the trial. The Seventh Circuit held that the former basis (hearing the defendant speak briefly in court during a pretrial proceeding) was minimally sufficient. But the latter basis (eavesdropping on a conversation between the defendant and his attorney should not have been admitted, because the attorney could not rebut this claim because he was trial counsel and could not refute the agent’s conversation about the length of time that he and his client were talking and whether the defendant was whispering.

United States v. Chin, 371 F.3d 31 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant offered credit card receipts into evidence to establish his alibi – that he was in New York, not China at the time the crimes allegedly occurred. The companies that prepared the receipts had destroyed the originals. But the defendant offered his copies, with a handwriting expert that identified his signature, to establish their authenticity. The Second Circuit held that the proponent of evidence is not required to rule out all possibility that the evidence is not authentic; the proponent is only obligated to cross an initial threshold that the evidence is what it purports to be. While it was possible that the defendant’s wife purchased the items and brought the receipts home unsigned; and while government witnesses to place the defendant in China at the time the receipts were purportedly produced, these were matters that went to the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence. Excluding the evidence was reversible error.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 1002 – Best Evidence Rule)

United States v. Bennett, 363 F.3d 947 (9th Cir. 2004)

The best evidence rule provides that the original of a writing, recording, or photograph is required to prove the contents thereof. Rule 1002, Fed.R.Evid. Whether the rule applies depends on whether the proponent is attempting to prove the content of the writing, recording or photograph. A tape recording of a conversation is not the best evidence of the conversation if one of the participants testifies. Similarly, a witness may identify a photograph as an accurate depiction of a certain scene, or event that he saw. In this case, however, the government established that the defendant had navigated his boat through international waters (and thus was guilty of importation of drugs) by relying on a GPS system that provided “back-tracking.” But the GPS was not introduced in evidence. An agent simply testified about what the GPS “revealed.” This violated the best evidence rule. The agent did not have independent knowledge of the fact and was relying entirely on the GPS “recording.”
EX POST FACTO

The Alaska sex offender registration statute does not offend the Ex Post Facto Clause, even though the registration requirement is imposed on offenders whose offenses were committed prior to the enactment of the registration law. The registration law is civil in nature, not punitive, so the Clause does not apply.

California changed the procedure for conducting parole hearings for certain individuals, allowing the Board to conduct hearings once every three years. When the defendant committed his crime, hearings were required to be held annually. The Supreme Court holds that this change in Parole Board practice did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. Note that this effectively overrules certain cases annotated below: Akins v. Snow and Roller v. Cavanaugh.

The definition of an ex post facto law is one that: (1) Punishes as a crime an act previously committed, which was innocent when done; (2) Makes more burdensome the punishment for a crime, after its commission; or (3) Deprives one charged with a crime of any defense available according to law at the time when the act was committed. Previous decisions which also held that legislation was ex post facto if it deprived an accused of a “substantial protection” under law existing at the time of the crime are no longer valid.

Hughey v. United States, 495 U.S. 411 (1990)

Amendments to the Victim Witness Protection Act expanding the scope of restitution could not be applied to defendants whose conduct occurred prior to the enactments.

The State of Florida changed the sentencing guidelines after the conduct which led to the defendant’s conviction. The Supreme Court holds that the change in sentencing guidelines represented an illegal ex post facto law. See also Peugh v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 2072 (2013) (applying Miller to the federal Sentencing Guidelines, post-Booker).

Lancaster v. Metrish, 683 F.3d 740 (6th Cir. 2012)

The Michigan Supreme Court’s decision holding that diminished capacity was not a defense under Michigan law, though based on the enactment of a prior statute, could not be applied to defendant. This interpretation of the law was novel and not consistent with a long line of prior decisions and therefore, it would violate Due Process to apply this new rule to the defendant’s conduct, which occurred prior to the Michigan Court’s decision. THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED: Metrish v. Lancaster, 133 S. Ct. 1781 (2013).

Magwood v. Warden, Alabama Dept. of Corrections, 664 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2011)

The novel interpretation of Alabama’s aggravating circumstance law (which renders certain murders to be death-eligible), amounted to a “fair-warning” violation, which essentially provides that a defendant must have fair warning of the elements of a criminal offense and a novel interpretation of the law by an appellate court after the defendant’s conduct occurs

Niederstadt v. Nixon, 465 F.3d 843 (8th Cir. 2006)

The Missouri Supreme Court’s modification of the law of sodomy (eliminating the element of “physical force that overcomes reasonable resistance” by holding that the incapacitation of the victim is sufficient, as in cases where the sexual conduct occurs while the defendant is asleep), violated the ex post facto clause, according to the panel opinion. The panel opinion held that this construction of the law was not the prevailing law when the defendant committed the offense. See Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347 (1964); Rogers v. Tennessee, 532 U.S. 451 (2001). The en banc court reversed, holding that the Missouri Supreme Court’s decision did not amount to a due process violation because the law was not “changed” by the decision in petitioner’s case. 505 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 2007) en banc.

Dyer v. Bowlen, 465 F.3d 280 (6th Cir. 2006)

The Sixth Circuit reviews the Supreme Court precedent regarding the ex post facto implications of changes in the rules governing parole, and concludes that a remand for an evidentiary hearing is necessary to ascertain the practical effects of the change in Tennessee’s parole statute. See Cal. Dep’t of Corrections v. Morales, 514 U.S. 499 (1995); Lynce v. Mathis, 519 U.S. 433, 117 S.Ct. 891 (1997); Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24 (1981); Garner v. Jones, 529 U.S. 244 (2000).

Clark v. Brown, 450 F.3d 898 (9th Cir. 2006)

The state appellate court’s reinterpretation of the felony murder statute in California, and the retroactive application of that interpretation (thus making the defendant death-eligible) violated the defendant’s due process rights.

Fletcher v. Reilly, 433 F.3d 867 (D. C. Cir. 2006)

The habeas petitioner stated a colorable ex post facto claim, based on his allegation that the change in parole guidelines amounted to an ex post facto violation. Some of the factors that applied under the former regime were no longer applicable, thus leading to the likelihood that the defendant would serve a longer sentence.

Williams v. Roe, 421 F.3d 883 (9th Cir. 2005)

When the defendant committed his crime, state law provided that if the defendant was convicted of two offenses based on the same conduct, the judge could impose sentence under either offense. When sentenced, the law provided that the judge was required to sentence the defendant pursuant to the section carrying the greater punishment. Applying the new law violated the Ex Post Facto clause.

Richey v. Mitchell, 395 F.3d 660 (6th Cir. 2005)

Although a statute may be made clear by judicial gloss, due process bars courts from applying a novel construction of a criminal statute to conduct that neither the statute nor any prior judicial decision has fairly disclosed to be within its scope. See also United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259 (1997).

Hunter v. Ayers, 336 F.3d 1007 (9th Cir. 2003)

Application of amended prison regulations that denied the defendant restoration of good time credits violated his rights under the ex post facto clause. Previously, he could have good time credits restored even if the credits were previously withheld based on misconduct. Under the new system, once good time credits were lost, they could not be restored.

Himes v. Thompson, 336 F.3d 848 (9th Cir. 2003)

Changes in the state parole regulations resulted in a considerable increase in the amount of time that the defendant would have to serve following revocation of his parole. This violated his rights under the ex post facto clause.

United States v. Edwards, 162 F.3d 87 (3rd Cir. 1998)

Applying the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act (MVRA) in setting restitution in this case violated the Ex Post Facto Clause, because the conduct occurred prior to the enactment of the MVRA in 1996.

Pyler v. Moore, 129 F.3d 728 (4th Cir. 1997)

South Carolina amended its mandatory furlough procedure which, prior to amendment, required that all non-life sentence inmates receive a furlough six months prior to the expiration of their sentence. The amendment limited the inmates who could qualify for the furlough. The amendment violated the ex post facto clause. The fact that the furlough program was initially conceived as a remedy for prison overcrowding does not alter the ex post facto analysis. See Lynce v. Mathis, 519 U.S. 433, 117 S.Ct. 891 (1997).

United States v. Siegel, 153 F.3d 1256 (11th Cir. 1998)

The Mandatory Victims Restitution Act of 1996 substantially revised the rules governing the imposition of restitution that had been embodied in the Victim and Witness Protection Act of 1982. The MVRA, to the extent that it increase the mandatory amount of restitution, could not be applied to offenses occurring before its enactment.

United States v. Torres, 901 F.2d 205 (2d Cir. 1990)

The defendants were sentenced under the “Super Kingpin” statute which requires a life sentence for the principal administrator or organizers of a CCE enterprise. This was improper because the statute was not in effect during the time that the defendants acted in this super supervisory capacity.

Roller v. Cavanaugh, 984 F.2d 120 (4th Cir. 1993)

Relying in large part on Akins v. Snow, the Fourth Circuit holds that an amendment increasing the length of time between parole reconsiderations from every year to every two years is an unconstitutional ex post facto law when applied to prisoners whose crimes were committed before the amendment. But see Morales, 514 U.S. 499, discussed above, which implicitly overruled this holding.
United States v. Parriett, 974 F.2d 523 (4th Cir. 1992)

18 U.S.C. §3583(g) provided that a person on supervised release who is found in possession of drugs will automatically have one-third of his term of supervised release revoked. The defendant committed the offense in this case in August 1988. §3583(g) was enacted effective December 1988. The defendant entered his guilty plea in May 1989; began his period of supervised release in 1990; and was found in possession of drugs in 1991. The Ex Post Facto Clause barred the application of §3583(g). Though the conduct giving rise to revocation occurred after the enactment of the section, the conduct for which the defendant was serving the term of supervised release occurred prior to the enactment of the section. Moreover, the fact that the court could have revoked the same amount of time under the old law is irrelevant for ex post facto concerns.

Kellogg v. Shoemaker, 46 F.3d 503 (6th Cir. 1995)

The state adopted a new rule which mandated parole revocation, without regard to mitigating circumstances, for all parolees who committed a felony while paroled. Under the old law, mitigating circumstances could be considered to preclude revocation. With regard to defendants who committed their initial crime prior to the promulgation of this new rule, this violated the Ex Post Facto Clause.

Williams v. Lee, 33 F.3d 1010 (8th Cir. 1994)

While the defendant was in prison, the legislature amended the law and permitted the parole board to reduce good time credits if a parolee violated the terms of his parole. The defendant was then paroled and violated the terms. The new good time forfeiture legislation could not be applied to him. Even though he was aware of the change in the law when he was paroled, and thus was aware of the consequences of violating the terms of his parole, this did not alter the ex post facto nature of the legislation.

Parton v. Armontrout, 895 F.2d 1214 (8th Cir. 1990)

A new parole eligibility statute which requires all sex offenders to complete treatment and rehabilitation programs suffered from a violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause. The program was applied to inmates whose crime was committed before implementation of the new requirement.

United States v. $814,254.76 in U.S. Currency (Banamex), 51 F.3d 207 (9th Cir. 1995)

18 U.S.C. §981 provides that the government may seize funds in a bank account which represent the proceeds of some form of money laundering activity. That law was in effect when the government seized money in a bank account which was not the proceeds of money laundering activity, even though the account itself had been involved in laundering funds. After the seizure, Congress enacted 18 U.S.C. §984 which permits the seizure of untainted funds (such as the funds in this case) which are in an account which was involved in money laundering activity. The question is whether the new law applies to money which was seized before the law was enacted. The Ninth Circuit holds that the new law does not apply and the funds must be returned. Because §984 attaches new legal consequences to actions which occurred prior to its enactment, it would have to be shown that Congress specifically intended this result before the court would apply the new statute to conduct occurring before its enactment.

United States v. DeSalvo, 41 F.3d 505 (9th Cir. 1994)

According to Hughey v. United States, 495 U.S. 411 (1990), interpreting the pre-1990 version of the VWPA, restitution could only be ordered for the loss caused by the specific conduct that is the basis of the offense of conviction. In 1990 however, Congress amended the statute, 18 U.S.C. §3663(a)(2), to broaden the availability of restitution: “For the purpose of restitution, a victim of an offense that involves as an element a scheme, a conspiracy, or a pattern of criminal activity means any person directly harmed by the defendant’s criminal conduct in the course of the scheme, conspiracy, or pattern.” This new provision, however, cannot be applied to offenses which occurred prior to the 1990 amendment. To do so would violate the Ex Post Facto Clause.

_Nulph v. Faatz_, 27 F.3d 451 (9th Cir. 1994)

The state of Oregon violated the Ex Post Facto Clause by applying a new parole eligibility formula to prisoners whose crimes were committed prior to the enactment of the new rule.

_Flemming v. Oregon Board of Pardons and Paroles_, 998 F.2d 721 (9th Cir. 1993)

A regulation which reduced the amount of time that could be subtracted from a sentence violated the Ex Post Facto Clause. The fact that the sentence reduction was only discretionary under the old regime is not consequential. There was no possibility for reduction under the new regulation, therefore, the new regulation impacted negatively on the prisoner. The loss of the opportunity for relief was a substantial hardship covered by the Ex Post Facto Clause.

_United States v. Reed_, 924 F.2d 1014 (11th Cir. 1991)

The RICO Act was amended to provide for the forfeiture of substitute assets in the event that forfeitable assets were transferred prior to the time the government had the ability to seize the property from the defendant. This section was applicable to transfers which occurred prior to the enactment of the substitute asset forfeiture section.
EXAMINATION OF PHYSICAL EVIDENCE

The defendant was arrested on drug charges and the state crime lab confirmed that the substance was cocaine. The defendant filed a discovery demand, but then became a fugitive. Ten years later he was re-captured and demanded the right to test the substance. In the meantime, it had been destroyed. This did not violate the defendant’s due process rights, because there was no showing of bad faith on the part of the state, even though there was a specific discovery request by the defendant.
EXPERT TESTIMONY

(Expert Evidence Offered by the Defendant)

Frye is dead in the federal courts. The Federal Rules of Evidence superseded the common law rule of Frye and established a new test for the admissibility of scientific evidence in federal courts pursuant to Rule 702: the evidence must amount to “scientific knowledge” and must assist the trier of fact to understand or determine a fact in issue. The questions are whether the theory has been tested; whether the theory has been subject to peer review and publication; the known or potential rate of error; and finally, the court may consider the acceptance in the community of the theory – the old Frye standard.

United States v. Odeh, 815 F.3d 968 (6th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was prosecuted for making a false statement on her naturalization documents when she denied having been arrested, prosecuted and convicted of a felony. In fact, she had been convicted of a bombing in Israel and spent time in prison. She offered the testimony of an expert on PTSD who was prepared to testify that the effects of her imprisonment and the PTSD could have affected her ability to know what was false or truthful. Excluding this testimony was error.

United States v. West, 813 F.3d 619 (7th Cir. 2016)

The defense sought to introduce expert testimony that would have explained that the defendant was a mentally ill person with a low IQ and was suggestible (all for the purpose of explaining that his confession was not reliable). The trial court excluded the expert testimony on the basis that it was just a back door way of trying to get an insanity defense before the jury. The Seventh Circuit reversed: evidence which shows that a confession is not reliable is admissible and expert testimony is no exception.

United States v. Litvak, 808 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2015)

Litvak was a securities broker who worked for Jefferies & Company and was involved in selling residential mortgage backed securities (“RMBS”). He was charged with fraud in connection with his sales of RMBS’s. There were three categories of misrepresentations: (1) He lied about the cost at which Jefferies acquired certain RMBS in his effort to convince a purchaser to pay more for the same RMBS’s; (2) He lied when he said that he was negotiating for the purchase of certain RMBS’s at a certain price in his efforts to re-sell the RMBS’s, when, in fact, Jefferies already owned the RMBS’s at a lower price than the price he was about to pay to purchase the RMBS’s; (3) In the process of purchasing RMBS’s, he lied about the price at which he had negotiated to re-sell the RMBS’s (falsely saying that the price was less than it actually was) and thereby induced the seller to sell the RMBS’s to him at a cheaper price to enable Jefferies to make a profit. On the basis of these representations, Litvak was convicted of securities fraud and also making a false statement to the U.S. Treasury which was overseeing certain RMBS sales in connection with TARP. The Second Circuit reversed the false statement count, based on the failure to prove that Litvak’s false statements were material. Though the U.S. Treasury was aware and monitored these types of sales, the Treasury made no “decision” that was affected by the price of the sales. The Second Circuit held, however, that the materiality of the false statements to counter-parties was a jury question that could not be decided as a matter of law for purposes of the securities fraud convictions under Rule 10b-5. Litvak argued that the “price” of the RBMS’s to Jefferies was not what was important to the counter-parties; what mattered was the value. The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that the jury was the proper fact-finder on the question of materiality. However, the securities fraud convictions were reversed, because the district court improperly excluded expert testimony offered by Litvak on the topic of materiality. The expert was prepared to testify that a reasonable counter-party would not rely on representations made by Litvak and that they would normally make their own determination of value, rather than relying on Litvak’s representation about Jefferies’ price in purchasing (or the intended sales price of) the RMBS’s. This was the proper subject of expert testimony. Finally, the Second Circuit held that the trial court erred in excluding evidence offered by Litvak that his supervisors permitted these types of sales practices by other brokers, which, according to Litvak, demonstrated his good faith and his lack of intent to defraud. The evidence was relevant to show that Litvak held an honest belief that he was not engaged in improper or illegal conduct.

United States v. Hite, 769 F.3d 1154 (D. C. Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with enticing a minor for unlawful sex. He provided pretrial notice of the intent to introduce expert testimony that the defendant is not a pedophile and about the phenomenon of role-play on the Internet. The trial court held that the notice was deficient because it did not explain the legal basis for introducing this testimony. There is no requirement in the Expert Notice provision of Rule 16 that the party offer the legal basis for introducing the expert testimony; the trial court erred, therefore, in excluding the testimony based on any deficiency in the notice. In addition, the testimony was inadmissible, because it was relevant to the defendant’s intent in communicating about having sex with the child. While the expert may not testify directly about the defendant’s intent, he can offer the type of expert testimony that was offered in this case.

United States v. Christian, 749 F.3d 806 (9th Cir. 2014)

Prior to a related state court trial, the defendant was examined by a doctor who was asked to assess the defendant’s competence to stand trial and the doctor concluded that the defendant was not competent. In the defendant’s federal criminal trial, he sought to call the same doctor to testify about the defendant’s defense of diminished capacity. The doctor testified that his competence examination was sufficient to support his conclusion about the defendant’s diminished capacity, but the trial judge held that the two standards are different and therefore, having only evaluated the defendant for purposes of determining his competence, the expert could not offer any opinion about diminished capacity. The Ninth Circuit reversed. The doctor should have been permitted to testify and explain why his examination was sufficient to enable him to formulate an opinion on the subject of the defendant’s diminished capacity.

United States v. Joseph, 542 F.3d 13 (2d Cir. 2008)

The Second Circuit remanded this case for trial for reasons other than an expert witness issue. However, the appellate court urged the district court to reconsider its decision excluding a defense expert. The defendant was charged with enticing a child over the Internet to engage in prohibited sexual conduct. The defendant offered an expert who would testify about sexual fantasies and role-playing on the Internet. The court suggested that testimony about human behavior that is not familiar to the jury is an acceptable subject of expert testimony.

United States v. Gladish, 536 F.3d 646 (7th Cir. 2008)

In this child enticement prosecution, the defense sought to introduce the testimony of an expert who would have testified that the defendant would engage in conversations with young girls on the Internet and suggest meeting to have sex, but would never follow through. The defendant suffered from a character pathology that led him to be afraid of rejection. The Seventh Circuit held that the trial court should have admitted this testimony. (In fact, the appellate court ultimately ruled that the evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of enticement, because his chat on the Internet suggesting that in the future they should meet, without ever planning any actual meeting, did not constituted enticement).

United States v. Safavian, 528 F.3d 957 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

The defendant was the chief of staff of the GSA. He went on a golf trip with a lobbyist. Later he was asked about this venture and failed to reveal that the lobbyist was trying to engage in certain business transactions with the GSA (i.e., buying government property). He was prosecuted for obstruction of justice and making a false statement because of his failure to reveal that he was “doing business” with the lobbyist. He sought to introduce expert testimony about what it meant, in the “industry” to be “doing business” with a lobbyist. The trial court held that expert testimony on this issue was not admissible. The D.C. Circuit reversed. The term “doing business” is, in fact, a term of art that had a definition that would not necessarily be known to a lay jury. Experts were prepared to testify that “doing business” with the GSA required the existence of a contract, not simply discussions about the possibility of buying or selling property.

United States v. Nacchio, 555 F.3d 1234 (10th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with insider trading. He filed notice pursuant to Rule 16 of his intent to introduce expert testimony from an economist who would offer testimony about trading patterns of the defendant and the economic consequences of the defendant’s trades. The trial court held that the notice was deficient (because the notice did not specifically detail the expert’s “methodology”) and even if the notice was sufficient, the subject matter was not the proper subject of expert testimony. The Tenth Circuit reversed on both grounds. With regard to the notice issue, the Tenth Circuit held that the defendant is required to provide notice of the subject matter of the expert’s testimony, as well as the bases and reasons of that opinion; but the notice is not required to include the “methodology.” Nor is the report required, on its face, to set forth a prima facie basis for complying with Daubert. A Daubert inquiry may or may not be necessary, but the defendant is not required to spell out his Daubert presentation in the Rule 16 notice. Thus, the failure to provide a detailed explanation of the expert’s methodology was not a basis for excluding the testimony. When the case was reviewed en banc, the Tenth Circuit did not question this aspect of the panel opinion. The en banc Court, however, held that the district court did not, ultimately, reject the defendant’s expert on the basis of a notice deficiency, but rather, excluded the expert after concluding that the defendant failed to satisfy the Daubert standard of admissibility. The trial court did not err in this respect. Thus, the conviction was affirmed.
United States v. Cohen, 510 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2007)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from introducing evidence from a psychiatrist about his narcissistic personality disorder that made him more susceptible to believe that he was not required to obey the tax laws. Though Rule 704 bars the defense from introducing evidence from an expert that states an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did not have the mental state or conditions constituting an element of the crime charged, in this case, the diagnosis would still require the jury to determine whether the defendant had the requisite state of mind to violate the tax laws. See also United States v. Finley, 301 F.3d 1000 (9th Cir. 2002) (evidence of defendant’s delusional personality disorder was admissible to prove that defendant did not appreciate that certain documents were fraudulent).

United States v. Sandoval-Mendoza, 472 F.3d 645 (9th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from introducing expert medical testimony that the defendant’s medical condition (brain damage caused by pituitary tumor) rendered him unusually susceptible to “inducement” in this entrapment-defense case. The fact that doctors disagreed about the defendant’s medical condition did not mean that the defendant’s expert testimony was inadmissible. Medical testimony that a medical condition renders a person unusually vulnerable to inducement is highly relevant to an entrapment defense and should not have been excluded.

United States v. Brownlee, 454 F.3d 131 (3rd Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in preventing the defendant from introducing expert testimony on the fallibility of eyewitness testimony. Though the defendant was permitted to introduce the expert testimony on certain subjects relating to this subject, the trial court prohibited the expert from testifying about the lack of “confidence-accuracy correlation.” In other words, a witness’s assertion that she is confident of her identification of the defendant does not correlate to the accuracy of the identification.

United States v. Henderson, 409 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2005)

A district court may reject the admissibility of polygraph evidence under the Daubert standard, despite the earlier ruling by the same court that such evidence may be admitted. United States v. Piccinonna, 885 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1989).

Howard v. Walker, 406 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2005)

A co-conspirator’s statement to the police was excluded on Bruton grounds. However, an expert witness for the state relied on that statement in reaching her conclusion that the victim’s death was caused by conduct of the conspirators. Though an expert may generally rely on inadmissible evidence in reaching a conclusion, including hearsay, that rule assumes that an expert will carefully analyze the basis of his opinion and that the trial court will conduct a sufficient Daubert hearing to ensure the reliability of the expert’s underlying data from which she draws her conclusion. In this case, the unreliable statements of the co-conspirator were not reliable and the expert’s opinion was therefore improperly admitted. The error was compounded by the state trial court’s ruling that if the defense cross-examined the witness about her conclusions, the inadmissible Bruton statement would be admitted. A defendant cannot be compelled to sacrifice one right – the Sixth Amendment right to cross-examine witnesses – to protect another right – i.e., the right of Confrontation embodied in theBruton doctrine. Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968). The final error in the state trial was the ruling by the trial court that if the defendant called his own expert, the state would be permitted to cross-examine the defense expert with the inadmissible Bruton statement.

United States v. Frazier, 387 F.3d 1244 (11th Cir. 2004)

In this en banc decision, the Eleventh Circuit thoroughly reviews the law regarding the admissibility of expert testimony and the application of Daubert to testimony offered by an expert on a matter of his expertise. In this case – which is ultimately resolved in favor of the government – the trial court excluded testimony from the defendant’s expert (a forensic investigator) about what “would have been expected” had the defendant and the victim had sexual intercourse in a car. The victim claimed to have been raped in the car; the defendant claimed that they did not have sex. There was no physical evidence found in the car (such as pubic hair, or seminal fluid). The en banc decision decided that this was not an abuse of discretion. On the other hand, the government was permitted at trial to introduce testimony from its expert that scientific research established that there was frequently no “transference” of pubic hair in cases of sexual assault. Though the decision focuses on the specific testimony being offered by the different experts (the defendant’s expert based his conclusion on vague “what he expected” standard, while the government’s expert had scientific studies that revealed actual statistics), the decision thoroughly reviews the type of Daubert analysis required by the trial court before offering what might be described as “junk” expert testimony.

United States v. Vesey, 338 F.3d 913 (8th Cir. 2003)

The defense offered the testimony of an expert (a drug dealer and confidential informant) about the normal ways that drug dealers operate. Excluding this evidence was improper, though harmless. The expert was prepared to testify that drug dealers do not deal from their homes.

United States v. Finley, 301 F.3d 1000 (9th Cir. 2002)

The trial court erred in excluding defense expert testimony relating to a delusional personality that explained how the defendant could believe that certain financial documents were valid. The court held that there are times when expert testimony is important when an issue appears to be within the parameters of a layperson’s common sense, but in actuality, is beyond their knowledge.

United States v. Frost, 125 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 1997)

Rule 704(b) would bar the defense from introducing evidence from an expert that the defendant lacked the intent to commit fraud in a mail fraud prosecution. In this case, however, the defense sought to offer evidence that the defendant did not engage in billing practices in a deceptive manner. This evidence would not be barred by Rule 704(b).

United States v. Gonzalez-Maldonado, 115 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1997)

The court retained a psychiatrist to determine if a co-defendant was competent to stand trial. The co-defendant was declared incompetent, but his recorded statements to undercover officers, statements that incriminated the defendant, were critical evidence for the prosecution.
The defense wanted to call the psychiatrist as their witness to establish the mental illness of the co-defendant – a mental illness that led the witness to exaggerate, according to the psychiatrist. Excluding this testimony was reversible error. The psychiatrist was obviously qualified as an expert and his testimony related directly to the veracity of the declarant (i.e., the recorded statements of the incompetent co-defendant).

United States v. Shay, 57 F.3d 126 (1st Cir. 1995)

The defendant was accused of attempting to bomb his father’s car. He provided a statement to the police admitting his guilt. At trial, the defense sought to introduce evidence from a psychiatrist that the defendant suffered from a mental disorder that causes its victims to make false and grandiose statements without regard to the consequences – pseudologia fantastica. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. The evidence was admissible under Rule 608(a) because the evidence was admissible opinion evidence relating to the character of a witness; it was admissible under Rule 405 to prove a relevant character trait; and it was admissible under Rule 702 because such expert testimony was necessary to contradict the common sense notion that people do not generally make untrue inculpatory statements.

United States v. Onumonu, 967 F.2d 782 (2d Cir. 1992)

The defendant was caught at the airport with heroin that he ingested in condoms. The defendant claimed that he thought he was smuggling diamonds into the country. He sought to introduce evidence from an expert that Nigerians frequently smuggle diamonds out of the country. The trial court erred in excluding this expert testimony. It was relevant and beyond the ken of the average juror.

United States v. Velasquez, 64 F.3d 844 (3rd Cir. 1995)

The trial court allowed the government to introduce testimony from a handwriting expert, but then denied the defendant’s offer of proof from an expert which challenged this “science.” This was reversible error.

United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997)

The trial court erred in excluding the expert legal testimony offered by the defense regarding the law governing bank practices and regulations. The evidence was offered to counter the lay opinion testimony offered by the government that asserted that the defendant’s practices were unlawful and caused the bank’s failure.

United States v. Newman, 849 F.2d 156 (5th Cir. 1988)

A defendant may introduce expert testimony on his psychological susceptibility to inducement in connection with his defense of entrapment.

United States v. Lueben, 816 F.2d 1032 (5th Cir. 1987)

In this mail fraud prosecution, the defendant offered expert testimony on the materiality of the statements, that is, whether the false statements would have had any bearing on the lender’s decision to make the requested bank loans. The trial court prohibited the introduction of the expert opinion. The court holds that expert testimony on this issue is admissible and does not constitute impermissible expert testimony about a legal conclusion.

United States v. Hall, 93 F.3d 1337 (7th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred in excluding testimony from experts about the defendant’s mental condition that led him to be susceptible to confessing to crimes he did not commit in an effort to please his interrogators. The proffered expert testimony satisfied the Daubert standards.
Arcoren v. United States, 929 F.2d 1235 (8th Cir. 1991)

The battered women syndrome is an appropriate subject of expert testimony in federal court.

United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with making false entries in a union ledger. The falsity of the information was not contested at trial. Whether the errors were mistakes or were intentional, however, was disputed. The defendant offered expert accounting testimony that the defendant lacked basic bookkeeping understanding. The trial court committed reversible error in excluding this evidence. Rule 704 prohibits the introduction of expert testimony (psychiatric, or otherwise) on the issue of whether the defendant had the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Nevertheless, the testimony offered in this case was not that the defendant did or did not intend to make false entries. Rather, the testimony related to a “predicate” matter: the defendant’s understanding of bookkeeping principles.

United States v. Amador-Galvan, 9 F.3d 1414 (9th Cir. 1993)

Whether an expert should be permitted to testify on the issue of the reliability of eye witness testimony should be evaluated under the standard set forth in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals 113 S.Ct. 2786 (1993). A remand was required in this case to apply the proper standard.

United States v. Rahm, 993 F.2d 1405 (9th Cir. 1993)

At defendant’s trial for possession of counterfeit currency, she sought to introduce the testimony of an expert who would testify that the defendant “showed a consistent tendency to overlook important details” based on tests the psychiatrist administered. The testimony was improperly excluded by the trial court. Under Rule 12.2, notice of the intended use of expert testimony is required where the expert will testify about a mental condition which bears on the issue of guilt. It is not necessary (as the lower court held) that the expert testify about a “mental disorder.” Other mental “conditions” may be the subject of expert testimony. Also, the fact that the expert was somewhat tentative in his testimony (the defendant “could have” failed to notice that the currency was counterfeit), was not a basis for excluding the testimony: it was the test results and the perceptual difficulties they demonstrate which were admissible, not the expert’s opinion. This testimony would have been helpful to the jury and was otherwise admissible as expert testimony and its exclusion was reversible error.

United States v. Langford, 802 F.2d 1176 (9th Cir. 1986)

The court holds that expert testimony on the reliability of eyewitness identification is not admissible. In a lengthy dissent, Judge Ferguson reviews the case law throughout the country on the admissibility of this evidence. The trend in other courts, concludes Judge Ferguson, is to admit this testimony where the circumstances suggest that the jury may not be aware of the causes of honest misidentification.

United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992)

In defense of tax evasion charges, the defendant sought to introduce expert evidence that the money he received could be characterized as a gift rather than a loan. The trial court committed reversible error by excluding this evidence. Such expert testimony is highly relevant to the assessment of whether the defendant willfully violated the tax laws.
EXPERT TESTIMONY
(Expert Evidence Offered by the Government)

United States v. Oti, 872 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2017)
A government expert should not have been permitted to testify as an expert that “security guards” hired by a pill mill were using or carrying firearms in furtherance of a drug trafficking offense, because this was an improper expert opinion on the law. Harmless error.

United States v. Haines, 803 F.3d 713 (5th Cir. 2015)
Another case that explores the issues that arise when a law enforcement officer testifies as both an expert witness on topics relating to drug trafficking organizations and drug code, and then also offers opinion testimony about what was meant by recorded phone calls between conspirators. The Fifth Circuit holds that the witness crossed the line and the trial court, in some instances, failed to properly instruct the jury, but the error was harmless.

United States v. Richter, 796 F.3d 1173 (10th Cir. 2015)
The government permitted, over objection to call a witness who was an employee of a state agency that regulated the activity involved in this case (environmental waste) who offered his opinion that the defendant’s activity was covered by the regulations. The witness was not identified as an expert, but he summarily provided his expert opinion. The government’s use of the witness’s testimony was simultaneously compelling and incorrect. This was reversible error.

United States v. Garcia, 793 F.3d 1194 (10th Cir. 2015)
If an expert merely parrots testimonial hearsay from a gang member when the expert offers opinion about the activities of the gang, this violates the Confrontation Clause. Though an expert may rely on hearsay, the expert must exercise independent judgment in assessing and using the hearsay and not simply repeat what he is told by other gang members. Harmless error in this case.

United States v. Vera, 770 F.3d 1232 (9th Cir. 2014)
This is a lengthy decision that explains what the government may and may not accomplish with expert testimony in gang and drug cases. The government was permitted to introduce expert testimony on issues of gang culture and structure, but improperly admitted expert testimony on drug jargon that purported to translate wiretapped calls. Regarding the coded language expert testimony, there is a difference between an expert who explains and translates commonly used terms and one who explains what terms mean in this case which were encountered for the first time by the expert. If the expert is explaining certain jargon that he has encountered for the first time in this case he must explain the methodology by which he has reached his conclusions. The jury, moreover, must be instructed about the differences between an expert testifying based on his experience with certain terms and his lay opinion testimony based on his familiarity with the people and conversations involved in this case. For example, the agent was asked to explain the statement, “get one and cook it” referred to one ounce of crack cocaine. That is lay opinion testimony, not an expert’s opinion about common drug jargon. The jury should have been instructed that such testimony does not come with the imprimatur of the agent’s expertise.

United States v. Groysman, 766 F.3d 147 (2d Cir. 2014)

The Second Circuit reversed this health care fraud conviction on the basis of several “egregious” evidentiary errors committed at trial. The defendant was charged with conspiring with a company that supplied durable medical equipment to prepare false invoices. The wholesaler was cooperating and taped many of the conversations, though many were inaudible. The government offered testimony from its case agent for several days at the start of trial. The agent (1) offered inadmissible bolstering testimony by testifying that certain transactions occurred, based only on his interviews of the cooperators – he had no personal knowledge to verify that these transactions occurred; (2) offered a summary chart which was not a summary of voluminous evidence, but simply a recitation of what he was supposedly told by the cooperators, thus violating both the hearsay rules and the bolstering rules and the rule governing the admissibility of summary charts; (3) the use of the agent to summarize the case at the outset was improper because it amounted to opinion testimony. The Second Circuit, as noted above, characterized these evidentiary errors as egregious and supported a plain error standard of review reversal.

United States v. Medina-Copete, 757 F.3d 1092 (10th Cir. 2014)

The defendant, an alleged drug courier, was extremely nervous when she was stopped by the state police. She started reciting a prayer. The government introduced expert testimony from a law enforcement officer who also professed to have expertise in various Mexican shrines of drug traffickers. He testified that the prayer recited by the defendant was an indication that she was a drug courier based on the content of the prayer. The Tenth Circuit reversed the conviction based on this improper testimony linking a religious icon to drug traffickers.

United States v. Garcia, 752 F.3d 382 (4th Cir. 2014)

Allowing an FBI agent to testify as a fact witness and also as an expert on slang interpretation was reversible error in this case. The problem is that having cloaked the witness with “expert” status, the witness’s fact testimony is given special credence. In addition, the “expertise” in this case was derived from talking to other people in this investigation, which creates hearsay and Confrontation Clause problems. The agent testified that she “confirmed” her understanding of certain codes by talking to arrested co-conspirators. Additionally, the expert would simply recite what actually occurred during the course of the investigation (for example, the seizure of a certain quantity of drugs) and then explain that this seizure was the basis for her expert opinion that a previous conversation related to the transaction that was the subject of the seizure. This is not expert testimony, but simply argument. Finally, the expert provided no basis for many of her expert “de-coding” opinions. She did not explain that the same code was used in another conspiracy she investigated, or from her experience in other cases, or from some other training. For example, she stated that “590” meant “590 grams of heroin” or “2” meant $200.00.

United States v. Hill, 749 F.3d 1250 (10th Cir. 2014)

After the defendant’s statement was played in court, the government called an “expert” FBI agent who had training in determining if a person was being truthful or not and he offered his expert opinion that the defendant was not being truthful. Among other reasons, the agent found the defendant lacked credibility because he said, “I swear to God” and other statements that showed that he invoked his belief system, rather than relying on facts to support his protestations of innocence. The Tenth Circuit held that this was reversible error even in the absence of an objection by the defense attorney. Juries are tasked with making credibility decisions, not government experts.

United States v. Ramirez-Fuentes, 12-1494 (7th Cir. 2013)

The government elicited testimony that the methamphetamine involved in this case was “Mexican methamphetamine.” The Seventh Circuit held that this was reversible error.

United States v. Haynes, 729 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2013)

A police officer was permitted to offer testimony about how a gas tank works (i.e., how the fuel gauge reflects the amount of fuel in the tank), which was relevant to whether the defendant was aware that drugs were hidden in the fuel tank. The testimony should not have been admitted as opinion testimony. The testimony should only have been offered as expert testimony after the discovery rules and the witness’s expertise was proven. Another witness – the government’s expert witness – was improperly permitted to offer expert testimony that the defendant was aware that there were drugs in the gas tank. This testimony was inadmissible pursuant to Rule 704(b), which prohibits expert testimony on a defendant’s mental state at the time of a crime.

United States v. Hampton, 718 F.3d 978 (D.C. Cir. 2013)

The testimony of an FBI agent, interpreting and explaining recorded phone conversations of the defendants was inadmissible and admitting this testimony was reversible error. The government offered the testimony as lay opinion testimony, with the agent explaining that he formed his opinion about the meaning of the conversations based on having listened to countless hours of the conspirators’ conversations.

United States v. Santini, 656 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was caught at the border bringing marijuana into the country. He claimed that because of a brain injury, he was subject to being tricked and presented a psychiatrist to support the defense. The prosecutor also presented an expert witness who testified that based on his review of the defendant’s “rap sheet” this defense was invalid, because he had run-ins with the law prior to the injury. The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction: the rap sheet was unreliable and did not distinguish arrests from convictions and was otherwise not probative of the defendant’s state of mind in connection with the present case. The government’s argument that the evidence was admissible to explain the expert’s opinion was also unavailing, because pursuant to Rule 702, the expert must base his opinions on reliable information.

United States v. Morin, 627 F.3d 985 (5th Cir. 2010)

The government’s expert offered improper expert testimony about drug courier profile evidence in certain respects. The expert “interpreted” a surveillance video and testified that her interpretation of the events was typical of how drug conspirators operate.
United States v. Gonzalez-Rodriguez, 621 F.3d 354 (5th Cir. 2010)

A DEA agent should not have been allowed to testify as an expert about the methods drugs are brought into the United States from Mexico. To some extent, the testimony violated Rule 704(b)’s prohibition on testimony about the mental state of the defendant. The court noted that testimony about a drug courier’s profile was improper, because profile evidence is inadmissible. (e.g., “drug couriers generally have no criminal record”). The implication – “the defendant must be a culpable drug courier because he has no criminal record” – was illogical. Harmless error.

United States v. Johnson, 617 F.3d 286 (4th Cir. 2010)

The government offered the testimony of a DEA agent to “interpret” and explain the meaning of wiretapped phone calls. The agent was never tendered as an expert. The testimony was not properly admitted as opinion testimony under Rule 701, because the agent did not observe the events about which he was testifying. Even if he had been tendered as an expert, the government did not offer any evidence explaining the agent’s “methodology or guiding principles that would enable him to decode the wiretapped phone calls in this case.”

United States v. Cooks, 589 F.3d 173 (5th Cir. 2009)

The government used an FDIC investigator as an expert in the area of mortgage fraud. Though the agent had some training in fraud investigation, he had no specialized training in the area of mortgage fraud and had never previously testified as an expert in this field. Qualifying the agent as an expert was erroneous, but harmless error.

United States v. Martinez, 588 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2009)

During the direct or cross-examination of an expert witness, the witness may refer to statements in a learned treatise. Portions of the treatise may be read into evidence, though the treatise itself is not admissible. The portion of the treatise is admissible for the truth of the matter asserted and Rule 803(18) exempts the statements from the hearsay rule. In this case, during the testimony of the expert, the government introduced a videotape of an expert describing a medical procedure. The Sixth Circuit held that a videotaped interview of the expert did not qualify under Rule 803(18).

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008)

The government offered the testimony of an expert in this gang case. The expert offered testimony about the structure of the gang, its history and various other matters that was not admissible because (1) the testimony was not based on any data or information that was the proper subject of expert testimony; (2) the testimony included the expert’s lay opinion, rather than expert opinion; (3) the expert simply repeated some things he was told by co-conspirators and was therefore testimonial hearsay in violation of Crawford. Reversible error.

Ege v. Yukins, 485 F.3d 364 (6th Cir. 2007)

Bite mark evidence offered by the state in this trial had no foundation and should not have been admitted. The expert for the state testified that nobody else in the Detroit Metropolitan area had similar “dentition.” Without any foundation for this expert testimony the evidence was inadmissible and was a violation of the defendant’s right to due process. Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973).

United States v. White, 492 F.3d 380 (6th Cir. 2007)

Testimony offered by employees of Medicare fiscal intermediaries about the mechanics of Medicare reimbursement, as well as defining “related-party transactions” and “reasonable costs” qualified as “expert testimony.” The government did not qualify these witnesses as experts and failed to provide the required Rule 16 discovery regarding their testimony. Harmless error.

United States v. Ibarra, 493 F.3d 526 (5th Cir. 2007)

The government asked its agent about the notion that a driver of a truck would not know that his truck contained a large quantity of cocaine. The agent testified that in his experience, he had never seen a courier entrusted with an amount of cocaine that size ($4 million) without the courier knowing that he was carrying something illegal. The Fifth Circuit held that this was improper expert testimony (not beyond the knowledge of a typical juror, and thus not in need of expert analysis) and was reversible error in this case.

United States v. Ganier, 468 F.3d 920 (6th Cir. 2006)

A government computer expert who utilized a forensic program to mine information from the defendant’s computer qualified as an expert whose testimony was subject to Rule 16(a)(1)(G). Though the expert relied on a forensic tool that was available to the public, the testimony was nevertheless of an expert nature and was therefore covered by the Rule.

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 461 F.3d 724 (6th Cir. 2006)

It was reversible error for the trial court to fail to instruct the jury about the dual role of the government’s case agents as both expert witnesses and fact witnesses. As experts, the agents testified that the defendant’s conduct was consistent with the actions of someone conducting counter-surveillance and that certain scraps of paper were drug ledgers and that other evidence was “drug wrapping” material.

United States v. Garcia, 413 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2005)

A DEA agent may not testify, either as an expert, or as a matter of his lay opinion, about the defendant’s role in the conspiracy based on the totality of his experience. When an agent testifies as a matter of lay opinion, the opinion must be based on his personal observations, not his evaluation of all the evidence, or the totality of the investigation. This opinion explains in some detail the requirements for lay opinion testimony, and concludes that the government satisfied none of the requirements for offering lay opinion testimony.

Howard v. Walker, 406 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2005)

A co-conspirator’s statement to the police was excluded on Bruton grounds. However, an expert witness for the state relied on that statement in reaching her conclusion that the victim’s death was caused by conduct of the conspirators. Though an expert may generally rely on inadmissible evidence in reaching a conclusion, including hearsay, that rule assumes that an expert will carefully analyze the basis of his opinion and that the trial court will conduct a sufficient Daubert hearing to ensure the reliability of the expert’s underlying data from which she draws her conclusion. In this case, the unreliable statements of the co-conspirator were not reliable and the expert’s opinion was therefore improperly admitted. The error was compounded by the state trial court’s ruling that if the defense cross-examined the witness about her conclusions, the inadmissible Bruton statement would be admitted. A defendant cannot be compelled to sacrifice one right – the Sixth Amendment right to cross-examine witnesses – to protect another right – i.e., the right of Confrontation embodied in the Bruton doctrine. Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968).

United States v. Miller, 395 F.3d 452 (D.C. Cir. 2005)

Though finding no error, the D.C. Circuit in this case cautioned that when questioning an expert on the practices of drug organizations, the questions should not be phrased in such a way as to amount to a carbon copy of the evidence at trial. Additionally, the expert should carefully explain that he is testifying about his knowledge of drug organizations in general, not the particular drug organization on trial, in order to eliminate the possibility that the jury will conclude that the “expert” has reached a decision about the case on trial.

United States v. Abreu, 406 F.3d 1304 (11th Cir. 2005)

The Eleventh Circuit concludes that fingerprint evidence meets the Daubert standard.

United States v. Grinage, 390 F.3d 746 (2d Cir. 2004)

The Second Circuit reverses this conviction on the basis that an agent was permitted to testify about the meaning of wiretapped phone calls. The government argued that the agent was not qualified as an expert and did not purport to translate coded calls, but was simply offering opinion testimony based on a review of all the calls. The Second Circuit rejects these arguments. An agent may not offer his opinion of “all the calls” and ask the jury to accept that interpretation. Moreover, the agent was basing his testimony on more than simply his having listened to the calls; he testified that he based his opinion also on his knowledge of “the entire investigation.” Reversible error.

United States v. Frazier, 387 F.3d 1244 (11th Cir. 2004)

In this en banc decision, the Eleventh Circuit thoroughly reviews the law regarding the admissibility of expert testimony and the application of Daubert to testimony offered by an expert on a matter of his expertise. In this case – which is ultimately resolved in favor of the government – the trial court excluded testimony from the defendant’s expert (a forensic investigator) about what “would have been expected” had the defendant and the victim had sexual intercourse in a car. The victim claimed to have been raped in the car; the defendant claimed that they did not have sex. There was no physical evidence found in the car (such as pubic hair, or seminal fluid). The en banc decision decided that this was not an abuse of discretion. On the other hand, the government was permitted at trial to introduce testimony from its expert that scientific research established that there was frequently no “transference” of pubic hair in cases of sexual assault. Though the decision focuses on the specific testimony being offered by the different experts (the defendant’s expert based his conclusion on vague “what he expected” standard, while the government’s expert had scientific studies that revealed actual statistics), the decision thoroughly reviews the type of Daubert analysis required by the trial court before offering what might be described as “junk” expert testimony.

_Earls v. McCaughtry_, 379 F.3d 489 (7th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with molesting a six-year-old child. There were no witnesses to the events and no physical evidence corroborating the child’s statements. A social worker who interviewed the child and testified as an expert said that she believed the child. This was inadmissible evidence and the attorney’s failure to object amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. In addition, during the videotape of the child prepared by the social worker, the social worker told the child that she believed her and the defendant should not have done that to her. The attorney’s failure to redact the tape was ineffective assistance of counsel.

_United States v. Dukagjini_, 326 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2003)

The government should not be permitted to use a fact witness, such as a case agent, to also offer expert testimony. In this case, the case agent, who testified as a fact witness, also offered expert testimony about drug jargon. A considerable amount of his “expert” testimony was based on his consideration of the evidence in this case, as opposed to his former experience and knowledge. One problem with this procedure is that juries will add undue weight to the witness’s fact testimony. Harmless error.

_United States v. Mitchell_, 365 F.3d 215 (3rd Cir. 2004)

In a forty page opinion, the Third Circuit evaluates the admissibility of fingerprint evidence under the Daubert and Kumho Tire standards and ultimately concludes that such evidence passes Daubert muster and was properly admitted in this case.

_United States v. Casas_, 356 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 2004)

The government’s case agent, the first witness to testify, was permitted, over objection, to “name the members of the organization” that was involved in drug dealing (which, of course, included numerous of the defendants on trial). Some of the agent’s testimony was based on what other conspirators told him during their debriefings. This testimony was not admissible as summary evidence, because the underlying facts were not in evidence. In fact, he was offered as an “overview witness” not a summary witness. See also United States v. Griffin, 324 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2003). The testimony violated the confrontation clause. The testimony was not proper expert testimony because there was nothing about his testimony that was the proper scope of expert testimony. With regard to certain defendants, the error was reversible error. See also United States v. Flores-De-Jesus, 569 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2009).

_United States v. Cruz_, 363 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant was asked by a drug dealer to “watch his back” while he finished a deal. A DEA agent testified as an expert (and also as a fact witness) that “watch his back” was drug code for act as surveillance during a drug deal. The Second Circuit held that trial court erred in admitting this expert testimony. The agent was not able to explain why the slang term referred to a drug deal, as opposed to some other criminal (or for that matter, innocent) conduct. The court stressed the dangers inherent in allowing an agent to testify as both an expert and a fact witness. See also United States v. Dukagjini, 326 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2003). The court reversed the conviction, holding that the evidence was insufficient, even considering the agent’s expert testimony.

United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003)

Though it was harmless error, the trial court should not have permitted the government to use a DEA agent to testify as an expert witness about matters regarding the methods by which drug couriers do their work. Testimony such as “they bring their families along to disguise their mission” and “drug dealers don’t trust unwitting couriers” and similar words of wisdom were not the proper subject of expert testimony. See also United States v. Gutierrez-Farias, 294 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 2002); United States v. Ramirez-Velasquez, 322 F.3d 868 (5th Cir. 2003).

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003)

In this civil rights prosecution (a law enforcement officer shooting a suspect), the government called other officers to testify that the shooting was not reasonable. This was error, because the question of reasonableness was a legal question and an expert may not offer an opinion about the law. Harmless error.

United States v. Pablo Varela-Rivera, 279 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2002)

The trial court committed reversible error in allowing the government to introduce DEA expert testimony regarding the structure of drug trafficking operations, as well as their modus operandi and the fees paid to couriers. Such evidence is not admissible in a case, such as this case, where the defendant is not charged with being a member of a conspiracy. See also United States v. Vallejo, 237 F.3d 1008, 246 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2001); United States v. McGowan, 274 F.3d 1251 (9th Cir. 2001).

United States v. Hermanek, 289 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2002)

If an expert testifies about the use of code words, even though he has not heard the words used that way before, the government must satisfy the requirements of Daubert. It appeared that in this case, the agent concluded that the various references to “watches” and “cookies” in the taped conversations were actually references to drugs, based simply on the agent’s belief that the participants in the calls were drug dealers. Such circular logic does not satisfy Rule 702. Harmless error.

Snowden v. Singletary, 135 F.3d 732 (11th Cir. 1998)

Permitting an expert witness to testify that 99.5% of children tell the truth in child abuse cases was a denial of fundamental fairness and in the circumstances of this case, where the child’s credibility was the central issue, required setting aside the conviction.

United States v. Cruz, 981 F.2d 659 (2d Cir. 1992)

Expert testimony in this case was improper for two reasons: (1) the expert testified that the area of the drug transaction was heavily Hispanic and “drug-inundated.” Because all the defendants were Hispanic, this was improper and prejudicial; (2) the defendant claimed he was not on the scene; the expert testified that the conduct of the defendant as described by witnesses was characteristic of a drug broker. This amounted to improper bolstering of the witness’s testimony and was not the proper subject of expert testimony. Any juror who watches TV, movies, or the news, knows that drug dealers attempt to hide their identity.

United States v. Boissoneault, 926 F.2d 230 (2d Cir. 1991)

The trial court should not have allowed an agent to conclude that all the physical evidence in the case suggested that the defendant was involved in the street level distribution of cocaine. Such a conclusion was not beyond the ken of the jury. Furthermore, even assuming the admissibility of this testimony, the evidence was insufficient to support a conviction of possession with intent to distribute. The defendant was arrested after a traffic stop. He had none of the typical paraphernalia of a distributor. He had a ledger (which the agent described as a drug accounts receivable ledger), $1,460 in cash and 5 grams of cocaine. Only a possession offense could be upheld.

United States v. Castillo, 924 F.2d 1227 (2d Cir. 1991)

A narcotics officer's expert testimony about the practices of drug dealers led to a reversal of this conviction. The officer testified that drug dealers often force customers to ingest cocaine, at gunpoint, in order to ensure that the customer is not an undercover agent. Such matters are not beyond the ken of the jury and are thus not the appropriate subject of expert testimony under Rule 702.

United States v. Scop, 856 F.2d 5 (2d Cir. 1988)

A defendant's perjury prosecution was based on answers he gave to questions which contained the term “manipulation.” At trial, the government was permitted to offer expert testimony on the definition of the word “manipulation.” It was error to admit this testimony and the perjury conviction could not stand. The Court dealt with other issues relating to the improper expert testimony at 846 F.2d 135.

United States v. Scop, 846 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1988)

The Second Circuit reversed a conviction because a witness gave expert testimony couched in terms of legal conclusions. The expert testified, in language of the criminal code, that the defendants were “direct” and “material” participants in a “fraudulent” and “manipulative” scheme to artificially inflate stock prices. The court holds that this is improper expert testimony. An expert may, for example, give an opinion that a defendant participated in a drug transaction, but an expert may not testify that the defendant possessed heroin with intent to sell. The trial court also erred in admitting a prosecution expert witness to give his opinion as to the credibility of other prosecution witnesses.

United States v. Armendariz-Mata, 949 F.2d 151 (5th Cir. 1991)

The DEA agent’s “expert” testimony that the defendant was a “knowledgeable drug trafficker” was not proper under Rule 702: this testimony was totally unnecessary to the jury and did not help them understand the issues.

Cooper v. Sowders, 837 F.2d 284 (6th Cir. 1988)

The Sixth Circuit condemns a police officer’s testimony that, in his opinion, the other suspects in the case were not linked to the crime. There was nothing scientific, technical, or specialized about the officer’s testimony.

United States v. Quigley, 890 F.2d 1019 (8th Cir. 1989)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce expert testimony about the characteristics of a typical drug courier. The government used such evidence to argue that the defendant, who possessed a kilogram of cocaine in his car, intended to distribute it. The evidence in this case was not used to explain or justify an investigative stop, but as substantive evidence that because he fit the profile he therefore intended to distribute what was in his possession.

United States v. Roy, 843 F.2d 305 (8th Cir. 1988)

It was error, although harmless, to permit a law enforcement officer to give his opinion as to the truthfulness of the defendant’s accomplices’ testimony. Human lie detectors are not permissible in court.

United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, 125 F.3d 1241 (9th Cir. 1997)

Testimony of law enforcement officers that the defendant’s actions were consistent with those of experienced drug traffickers was improperly admitted in this drug prosecution as lay opinion testimony. The witness was not qualified as an expert.

United States v. Blackstone, 56 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. The gun was found in his truck. Also found in the truck was a methamphetamine recipe. The government was permitted to offer expert testimony from a DEA agent to the effect that guns and meth labs go together. This was error. Not only should the expert testimony not have been admitted, the recipe itself was not admissible because its probative value was outweighed by its prejudicial impact.

United States v. Gillespie, 852 F.2d 475 (9th Cir. 1988)

The government failed to qualify its expert testimony under the Frye test in this trial involving allegations of child sex abuse. The expert testified that the child’s behavior with anatomically correct dolls demonstrated that she had been abused by a man and not a woman. The trial court erred in holding that testimony relating to a child’s behavior with anatomically correct dolls does not constitute expert opinion. Also, the court held that it is error to permit an expert to testify that the defendant exhibited characteristics typical of child molesters.

United States v. Messner, 107 F.3d 1448 (10th Cir. 1997)

In this bankruptcy fraud trial, the trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce expert legal testimony about a bankrupt’s duty to disclose assets. Harmless error.

United States v. Zimmerman, 943 F.2d 1204 (10th Cir. 1991)

The defendant, an attorney, was charged with conspiracy to commit bankruptcy fraud. The government offered the statements of two bankruptcy judges, made in the course of the bankruptcy proceedings, to the effect that the attorney was either negligent, or was part of a conspiracy. This was inadmissible and necessitated reversal of the conviction.

Pursuant to Rule 704(b), an expert witness may not testify whether a defendant has the requisite state of mind to satisfy an element of the offense. In this case, the defendant, who was conversing with another individual, was seen holding a bag which contained 5 grams of crack cocaine. When the police approached him, he ran and threw the bag under a truck. A law enforcement officer was posed these facts in the form of a hypothetical and he opined that the defendant possessed the cocaine “with intent to distribute it.” This violated Rule 704(b). expert testimony about the defendant’s mental state relating to an element of the offense. Because defense counsel did not object on these grounds, however, this was not reversible error.

United States v. Doe, 903 F.2d 16 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

The conviction of two Jamaican drug dealers was reversed because of the improper testimony of police detectives that persons of Jamaican descent were “taking over the distribution of drugs in D.C.” This testimony was unfairly prejudicial and outweighed any probative value under Rule 403. Furthermore, the prosecutor repeatedly referred to the defendants as “the Jamaicans” which created a potential for prejudice on the part of the jurors.
EXPUNGEMENT OF CRIMINAL RECORD

United States v. Coloian, 480 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2007)

Everything you wanted to know about the court’s jurisdiction to entertain a motion to expunge a criminal record following acquittal. In the First Circuit, at least, the court does not have ancillary jurisdiction to expunge a record. The court notes that other Circuits find that it is within the power of the court to grant such relief. See, e.g., United States v. Flowers, 389 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 2004); United States v. Schnitzer, 567 F.2d 536 (2d Cir. 1977); Livingston v. Dept. of Justice, 759 F.2d 74 (D.C. Cir. 1985); United States v. Linn, 513 F.2d 925 (10th Cir. 1975).
EXTORTION

SEE: HOBBS ACT; MAILING THREATENING LETTERS

United States v. Carlson, 787 F.3d 939 (8th Cir. 2015)

In order to be guilty of sending an extortionate letter in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 876, the defendant must intend to extort money from a natural person, not a corporate entity.

United States v. Coss, 677 F.3d 278 (6th Cir. 2012)

A thorough discussion of the law of extortion. This case considers whether the threat must be inherently illegal, or is it sufficient that the threat is inherently wrongful? The court decides that the latter is sufficient. The Sixth Circuit reviews various decisions around the country, as well as scholarly writings, about what amounts to extortion, given the fact that in various circumstances, what the “exorter” is threatening to do is, in and of itself, not unlawful. As the court noted, “The law of extortion has always recognized the paradox that extortion often criminalizes the contemporaneous performance of otherwise independently lawful acts.”

United States v. Havelock, 664 F.3d 1284 (9th Cir. 2012)

The statute that makes it a federal crime to mail a threatening communication to another person – 18 U.S.C. § 876(c) – requires that the mailing be to a person, not to an institution, or a company.
EXTORTIONATE EXTENSIONS OF CREDIT

United States v. Didonna, 866 F.3d 40 (1st Cir. 2017)

The defendant’s demand to the victim to “come up with an offer of what he thought would be appropriate payment for defendant’s silence” was not an attempt to collect an extension of credit and could not be prosecuted pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 894.

United States v. Dzhanikyan, 808 F.3d 97 (1st Cir. 2015)

Under 18 U.S.C. § 894(a)(1), it is a crime to knowingly participate in any way, or conspire to do so, in the use of any extortionate means … to collect or attempt to collect any extension of credit.” The statute then defines “to extend credit” as “to make or renew any loan, or to enter into any agreement, tacit or express, whereby the repayment or satisfaction of any debt or claim, whether acknowledged or disputed, valid or invalid, and however arising, may or will be deferred.” § 891(1). In cases that involve something other than a traditional loan, there must be more than simply evidence of a demand for immediate payment of a debt. There must be sufficient indicia of an agreement to conclude that an agreement to defer payment of the debt existed. In this case, one person gave money to a second person with which the second person was supposed to buy oxycodone pills. The second person did not return the money or the pills to the first person. There was no evidence to prove that the first person tacitly agreed to give the second person more time to pay the money back. Thus, the subsequent extortionate means to collect the money was not an offense covered by § 894.

United States v. Allen, 127 F.3d 260 (2nd Cir. 1997)

18 U.S.C. § 892 outlaws, in part, an extortionate extension of credit, which is defined as any extension of credit with respect to which it is the understanding of the creditor and the debtor at the time it is made that delay in making repayment or failure to make repayment could result in the use of violence or other criminal means to cause harm to the person, reputation, or property of any person. In this case, the defendant made a loan to an undercover agent. The defendant accepted collateral and the agent repaid the loan. The agent then borrowed money again, and discussed with the defendant the difficulties the defendant must have in collecting sometimes. The two laughed about this and the defendant explained that that was why he required collateral and further explained that sometimes he took a loss, but his gains exceeded his losses. Then, when prompted by the agent, and not in connection with the pending transaction, the defendant stated that he once beat up someone. This evidence was not sufficient to support a conviction. The agent could not reasonably have had an understanding that if he did not repay the loan, he was subject to being beaten up based on this contrived conversation that he instigated. Regardless of the usurious interest rate and the unenforceability of the loan in court (factors that triggered a permissive presumption of extortion), this evidence was not sufficient.
EXTRADITION

Martinez v. United States, 793 F.3d 533 (6th Cir. 2015)

The U.S. treaty with Mexico provides that “Extradition shall not be granted when the prosecution or the enforcement of the penalty for the offense for which extradition has been sought has become barred by lapse of time according to the laws of the requesting or requested Party.” This provision in the treaty required the district court to decide whether the defendant’s prosecution for second degree murder in Mexico would be barred under either the U.S. statute of limitations, or the Speedy Trial Clause of the Sixth Amendment.

United States v. Anderson, 472 F.3d 662 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was extradited from Costa Rica to face charges of mail fraud, wire fraud and tax offenses. He was also indicted for money laundering. He claimed in the appellate court that his conviction on these counts violated the principles of dual criminality and specialty. In essence, he claimed that money laundering is not a crime in Costa Rica – unless it is connected to drug dealing (the dual criminality claim); and that the extradition process did not permit the U.S. to try the defendant for money laundering based on fraud offenses. The Ninth Circuit remanded the case to the District Court to review these claims.
EXTRATERRITORIAL APPLICATION OF LAWS

United States v. Bellaizac-Hurtado, 700 F.3d 1245 (11th Cir. 2012)

Article I, § 8, cl. 10 contains three separate provisions that empower Congress to write criminal laws extraterritorially: (1) the power to define and punish piracies; (2) the power to define and punish felonies committed on the high seas, and (3) the power to define and punish offenses against the law of nations. In this case, the court held that the offense of drug trafficking (an offense which in this case occurred in Panamanian waters) was not an offense that qualified as an offense “against the law of nations” and therefore was outside the scope of Congressional authority to enact. The court held that 46 U.S.C. § 70503, therefore, was unconstitutional.

United States v. Weingarten, 632 F.3d 60 (2d Cir. 2011)

18 U.S.C. § 2423(b) makes it a crime to travel in foreign commerce to engage in illicit sexual conduct with a minor. The Second Circuit held that travel that has no connection to the United States, however, does not qualify. Thus, travel by an American citizen between two foreign countries would not be subject to § 2423.

United States v. Lopez-Vanegas, 493 F.3d 1305 (11th Cir. 2007)

Though the courts have applied the drug laws extraterritorially, there are limits. In this case, the defendants, while in Florida, discussed transporting cocaine from Colombia to France for distribution throughout Europe. There was no intention that the drugs ever come to (or through) the United States. The Eleventh Circuit held that the defendants could not be convicted in the United States of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. See also United States v. Benbow, 539 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2008) (in a case somewhat similar to Lopez-Vanegas, it was reversible error to fail to instruct the jury that the government was required to prove that the defendant conspired to either possess, or distribute the drugs in the United States).
EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATION

United States v. Jernigan, 492 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2007)

In this en banc decision, the Ninth Circuit held that it was a Brady violation for the government to fail to reveal that after the defendant’s arrest, nearby banks had been robbed by a woman whose description bore a physical resemblance to the defendant. This case contains a useful discussion of the fallibility of eyewitness identification.
FAIR TRIAL / FREE PRESS

SEE ALSO: PUBLIC TRIAL

United States v. Kravetz, 706 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2013)
Sentencing memoranda and good character letters that are submitted in support of a lenient sentence should not normally be filed under seal and should be accessible to the press. The district court, however, does have the authority to seal certain portions of these submissions, such as medical records.

United States v. Wecht, 484 F.3d 194 (3rd Cir. 2007)
The district court intended to enforce a local rule that barred attorneys from communicating with the press on various subjects. Relying on Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991), the Third Circuit exercised its supervisory power to modify the Local Rule and provide that it only prohibits speech that is substantially likely to materially prejudice ongoing criminal proceedings. In a separate holding, the court held that certain material that was filed in camera in connection with Brady / Giglio requests would be made available to the press. The court engaged in a lengthy analysis of when the press may gain access to information that is furnished to the court or counsel as part of discovery, and determined that the adverse information relating to a government witness was part of the public record.

Guzman v. Scully, 80 F.3d 772 (2d Cir. 1996)
The prosecutor advised the court that four spectators were known to the government’s witness to be related, or friendly with a defense witness and the government witness felt intimidated by their presence in the courtroom. Based on this representation and over the objection of the defense and without making any further inquiry, the trial court excluded the spectators during the balance of the witness’s testimony. This violated the defendant’s right to a public trial. The Second Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus based on this constitutional violation.

United States v. Doe, 63 F.3d 121 (2d Cir. 1995)
The defendant asked that the court be closed for his testimony, as well as other portions of the trial so he could relate to the jury the extent of his cooperation with the government, which he claimed supported his “public authority” defense. The trial court denied his request for closure which resulted in the defendant’s refusing to reveal this information (for fear that he would be the victim of retaliation). Even though the defendant could not point to a direct threat that he had received, the court of appeals holds that the district court should have more carefully evaluated the defendant’s request. A remand was required for more findings.

Vidal v. Williams, 31 F.3d 67 (2d Cir. 1994)
The state trial court erred in permitting an undercover police officer to testify with the courtroom cleared to protect his identity. Even the defendant’s parents were ordered to leave the courtroom. There was no evidence that the defendant’s parents were at all inclined to harm the officer, or that they ever would have encountered the officer in their outside lives. The trial court made no effort to consider alternatives to clearing the courtroom entirely.

United States v. Cojab, 996 F.2d 1404 (2d Cir. 1993)

Though the court did not reveal why closure was required in this case, after a review of the historical precedents involving the conflicting interests of the press in keeping proceedings open and the defendant’s guarantee of a fair trial, the court concludes that closure was appropriate in this pretrial proceeding.

Application of New York Times Co., 878 F.2d 67 (2d Cir. 1989)

The trial court offered insufficient justification for barring defense counsel from speaking to members of the press during the course of the trial. The trial judge relied on his experience in other trials rather than in any conduct which had tainted the pending proceedings.

United States v. Antar, 38 F.3d 1348 (3rd Cir. 1994)

After trial, the judge sealed the entire voir dire and other information in the record which could identify the jurors. No findings were made about the need to restrict the press access to the jurors’ identities. This was error.

United States v. A.D., 28 F.3d 1353 (3rd Cir. 1994)

The Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act, 18 U.S.C. 5031, et seq., permits, but does not require, that juvenile hearings be closed. In each case, the trial judge should weigh the benefits to an open trial, against the benefits of confidentiality and determine whether the proceedings should be open to the public.

In re Baltimore Sun Co., 886 F.2d 60 (4th Cir. 1989)

A newspaper has a limited right to examine a search warrant affidavit after the warrant has been executed and before indictment. This right is not grounded in the First Amendment, but in the common law which confirmed a qualified right of access to inspect and copy affidavits in such circumstances.

In re The Charlotte Observer, 882 F.2d 850 (4th Cir. 1989)

The magistrate violated the First Amendment in precluding the press and public from attending a hearing on a motion for change of venue.

United States v. Soussoudis, 807 F.2d 383 (4th Cir. 1986)

The Fourth Circuit holds that plea and sentencing proceedings, just as any other court proceeding, are presumptively open to the public and the press.

Absent any finding of fact to support the conclusion that a defendant’s right to a fair trial might be undermined, it is improper to close the voir dire proceedings of a trial. The court employed a “white noise” device which precluded each juror from hearing the responses of another juror. The effect was also to preclude the press from hearing the voir dire. This violated the First Amendment.

United States v. Ford, 830 F.2d 596 (6th Cir. 1987)

The Sixth Circuit reverses the trial court’s order which imposed a gag order on Congressman Harold Ford in his prosecution in Knoxville. The Sixth Circuit holds that such a gag order is proper only where there is a clear and present danger that an exercise of free speech rights will interfere with the rights of the parties to a fair trial. No such showing had been made.
in this case. “While permitting the defendant to defend himself publicly may somewhat disadvantage the government, that is simply an artifact of our system that the government must tolerate.”

_In re Search Warrant (McDonald Douglas Corp.),_ 855 F.2d 569 (8th Cir. 1988)

Though the public had a right of access to the search warrants and supporting affidavits, a balancing test must be utilized in any given case in which closure or the sealing of documents is necessary. For example, the existence of an on-going investigation may necessitate at least a temporary sealing of the documents.

_Oregonian Publishing Co. v. U.S. District Court (Wolsky),_ 920 F.2d 1462 (9th Cir. 1990)

The press has the right to examine plea agreements unless an overriding right or interest can be shown to overcome this presumptive First Amendment right.

_Seattle Times Company v. United States District Court, _845 F.2d 1513 (9th Cir. 1988)_

The Ninth Circuit holds that the public has a qualified right of access to detention hearing proceedings and to documents filed in connection with those proceedings. The court holds that it was improper to seal documents in a case involving the woman charged with lacing pain relief capsules with cyanide.

_Davis v. Reynolds, _890 F.2d 1105 (10th Cir. 1989)_

It is not necessary that a defendant show any prejudice by the closure of the courtroom during a witnesses’ testimony in order to be entitled to a new trial. In this case, the trial court failed to articulate specific reviewable findings adequate to support the court’s decision to eliminate spectators during the testimony of a minor rape victim. This violation of the defendant’s right to a public trial necessitated a retrial.

_United States v. Noriega, _917 F.2d 1543 (11th Cir. 1990)_

The Eleventh Circuit upholds Judge Hoeveler’s decision prohibiting the broadcast of recorded conversations between Noriega’s attorney and Noriega. The trial court directed CNN not to broadcast the tapes in response to Noriega’s Petition For Injunctive Relief. It is the trial judge’s primary responsibility to govern judicial proceedings so as to insure that the accused receives a fair, orderly trial comporting with fundamental due process. This includes the right to restrain press access to information and to enjoin publication of information which the media has obtained.

_Washington Post v. Robinson, _935 F.2d 282 (D.C. Cir. 1991)_

The newspaper has the right to have access to plea agreements. Though there may be circumstances in which such pleadings may have to be filed under seal, there must be a public record made of the sealing of the plea agreement.
FALSE STATEMENTS / FALSE CLAIMS

SEE ALSO: MATERIALITY

United States v. Stacks, 821 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. 2016)

The defendant applied for an SBA loan and later renewed the application. On the renewal form, a question was asked whether there was a substantial adverse change from the initial application and gave, as examples, liens, bankruptcies, arrests. The defendant did not disclose that he had additional loans, and a larger balance due to suppliers. The district court granted a post-trial judgment of acquittal, because the information that was not disclosed was not similar to the types of adverse changes described in the loan application and the changes in his circumstance that were not disclosed were not necessarily “substantial adverse changes.”

United States v. Bankston, 820 F.3d 215 (6th Cir. 2016)

The defendant wrote a letter to the judge in her case complaining that the government had planted evidence in her house. Among other offenses, she was charged with a § 1001 violation based on this letter. However, § 1001 does not apply to conduct committed by a party to litigation during the course of the litigation.

United States v. Litvak, 808 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2015)

Litvak was a securities broker who worked for Jefferies & Company and was involved in selling residential mortgage backed securities (“RMBS”). He was charged with fraud in connection with his sales of RMBS’s. There were three categories of misrepresentations: (1) He lied about the cost at which Jefferies acquired certain RMBS in his effort to convince a purchaser to pay more for the same RMBS’s; (2) He lied when he said that he was negotiating for the purchase of certain RMBS’s at a certain price in his efforts to re-sell the RMBS’s, when, in fact, Jefferies already owned the RMBS’s at a lower price than the price he was about to pay to purchase the RMBS’s; (3) In the process of purchasing RMBS’s, he lied about the price at which he had negotiated to re-sell the RMBS’s (falsely saying that the price was less than it actually was) and thereby induced the seller to sell the RMBS’s to him at a cheaper price to enable Jefferies to make a profit. On the basis of these representations, Litvak was convicted of securities fraud and also making a false statement to the U.S. Treasury which was overseeing certain RMBS sales in connection with TARP. The Second Circuit reversed the false statement count, based on the failure to prove that Litvak’s false statements were material. Though the U.S. Treasury was aware and monitored these types of sales, the Treasury made no “decision” that was affected by the price of the sales. The Second Circuit held, however, that the materiality of the false statements to counter-parties was a jury question that could not be decided as a matter of law for purposes of the securities fraud convictions under Rule 10b-5. Litvak argued that the “price” of the RBMS’s to Jefferies was not what was important to the counter-parties; what mattered was the value. The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that the jury was the proper fact-finder on the question of materiality. However, the securities fraud convictions were reversed, because the district court improperly excluded expert testimony offered by Litvak on the topic of materiality. The expert was prepared to testify that a reasonable counter-party would not rely on representations made by Litvak and that they would normally make their own determination of value, rather than relying on Litvak’s representation about Jefferies’ price in purchasing (or the intended sales price of) the RMBS’s. This was the proper subject of expert testimony. Finally, the Second Circuit held that the trial court erred in excluding evidence offered by Litvak that his supervisors permitted these types of sales practices by other brokers, which, according to Litvak, demonstrated his good faith and his lack of intent to defraud. The evidence was relevant to show that Litvak held an honest belief that he was not engaged in improper or illegal conduct.

United States v. Rahman, 805 F.3d 822 (7th Cir. 2015)

The same principles that apply in a perjury prosecution also apply in a false statement prosecution. If the defendant’s statement is literally true, then it is not “false” and the fact that it might have been nonresponsive to a question posed to him by a government agent, or was misleading does not make it “false.” The conviction in this case was reversed based on this principle.

United States v. Bowling, 770 F.3d 1168 (7th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with making a false statement on a firearms form that he filled out in order to purchase a gun. He denied that he was a convicted felon. In fact he was a convicted felon (a fact that he acknowledged at trial), but he claimed that he was laboring under a mistake of fact when he filled out the form, because when he pled guilty to the predicate offense, he thought it was a misdemeanor offense. He sought to introduce evidence at the false statement trial that the prosecutor in the prior case had communicated an offer to the defense attorney in that case offering a misdemeanor disposition which the lawyer then communicated to the defendant. This, he claimed, was the source of his confusion. Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

United States v. Hale, 762 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2014)

At the meeting of creditors in a bankruptcy case, the defendant was asked, “To your best knowledge and belief, is the information contained in your petition, statements, schedules and related bankruptcy documents true, complete and accurate?” There is an ambiguity in this question, because it is not clear if the truthfulness of the answer is measured at the time the statement was made (i.e., the bankruptcy schedules were filed) or at the time of the creditors’ meeting. In this case, the ambiguity was important, because the defendant learned after filing the schedules that one of the assets was worth substantially more than what he had listed on the schedule. Because of this ambiguity, the defendant could not be convicted of making a false statement in a bankruptcy proceeding.

United States v. Ashurov, 726 F.3d 395 (3rd Cir. 2013)

It is a crime under 18 U.S.C. §1546, to knowingly making a false statement under oath a document required by the immigration laws. It is also a crime “to knowingly present any such document which contains any such false statement.” This latter section is ambiguous regarding whether the document must be under oath. The word “such” suggests that the document must be under oath, but that second law only refers to a “false statement” being contained in the document. The Third Circuit, applying the Rule of Lenity, holds that the latter provision also requires proof that the document was made under oath.
United States v. White Eagle, 721 F.3d 1108 (9th Cir. 2013)

Merely failing to reveal another person’s crime is not sufficient to support a false statement offense under § 1001. The fact that the defendant made a statement about another person’s conduct (a partial disclosure) and omitted to reveal that the other person had committed an offense is not a “silent statement” that supports a conviction. See also United States v. Safavian, 528 F.3d 957 (D.C. Cir. 2008).

United States v. Phillips, 731 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2013)

In this en banc decision, the Seventh Circuit held that the defendants should have been permitted to introduce evidence that the defendants (who were charged with making a false statement to a bank in violation of § 1014) were told by their broker that lying in response to certain questions on a loan application form was permissible. The evidence was relevant to whether the defendants actually knew that their answers were false and whether they believed that answering the questions in that way would “influence” the bank’s decision.

United States v. Castro, 704 F.3d 125 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The defendant was convicted of making a false statement when he said that he had not received money from the bribe payor. He later entered a guilty plea to related charges and signed an appeal waiver. With regard to the false statement conviction, what he said was actually true (unbeknownst to him), because the money was paid by a government agent posing as a confederate of the bribe payor. The Third Circuit held that the conviction for making a false statement could not be sustained, because what the defendant said was true and, moreover, it would be a manifest injustice to enforce the appeal waiver on this count of the conviction.

United States v. Kurlemann, 736 F.3d 439 (6th Cir. 2013)

A material omission on a bank loan application is not a “false statement” under 18 U.S.C. § 1014. A material omission may amount to fraud, but § 1014 only prohibits false statements, not fraud.

United States v. Alexander, 679 F.3d 721 (8th Cir. 2012)

In order to succeed in a § 1014 false statement prosecution, the government must establish that the victim financial institution was FDIC insured. In this case, the government proved that Bank of America was FDIC insured, but not that Bank of America, N.A. or Bank of America Mortgage was FDIC insured or that the latter two institutions were subsidiaries of Bank of America so that they qualified under § 1014.

United States v. Fontenot, 665 F.3d 640 (5th Cir. 2011)

The defendant, a state politician, “borrowed” money from two businessman. The loan was in cash and was illegal under state campaign finance laws. Later, the defendant filled out a loan application at a bank and failed to reveal this “debt” and was prosecuted for making a false statement under both § 1001 and § 1014. The Fifth Circuit held that omitting to mention an illegal debt was not a false statement. If the debt is unenforceable, it does not qualify as “debt” as that term is generally understood.
United States v. Spurlin, 664 F.3d 954 (5th Cir. 2011)
Because of some ambiguity in the question on the form that the defendant allegedly answered inaccurately, a false statement conviction could not be sustained.

United States v. Smith, 641 F.3d 1200 (10th Cir. 2011)
Venue for a false statement prosecution is where the statement was made. In this case, the government sought to prosecute the defendant in the jurisdiction that was the subject matter of the false statement. The government argued that there was a “substantial contacts” test for venue. The Tenth Circuit rejected this theory.

United States v. Ford, 639 F.3d 718 (6th Cir. 2011)
The defendant did not disclose his financial relationship with certain entities on his state disclosure forms (he was a state senator). The Sixth Circuit holds that these “false statements” were not within the jurisdiction of a federal agency and therefore could not form the basis for a § 1001 violation. The fact that the subject matter of the non-disclosure was an entity that received federal funding, did not make the false statement within the jurisdiction of a federal agency.

United States v. Goyal, 629 F.3d 912 (9th Cir. 2010)
The defendant was charged with securities fraud in connection with the method by which he accounted for certain sales. According to the government, the method violated GAAP. The proof at trial, however, failed to prove that materiality of the misrepresentations that were made on the financial statements. The court also reversed the counts of the indictment dealing with lying to auditors. The basis of the reversal on these counts, in part, was the failure to prove that the defendant had a culpable state of mind (i.e., willful and knowing deception).

United States v. Saybolt, 577 F.3d 195 (3rd Cir. 2009)
A prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 286 for conspiring to defraud the government by submitting a false, fraudulent or fictitious claim to the government requires proof that the defendants conspire to submit a material false statement. On the other hand, § 287 which simply outlaws submitting a false claim, does not require proof of materiality.

United States v. Hayes, 574 F.3d 460 (8th Cir. 2009)
Though the government proved that the form sent to the government agency in connection with the defendant’s home health care agency contained a false statement, there was insufficient evidence that the defendant knew the false statement was submitted to the agency. The form was filled out by a co-conspirator.

United States v. Ali, 557 F.3d 715 (6th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was charged with making a false statement on a naturalization document. He had been married to a Canadian woman and then, prior to the divorce being finalized, he married a woman in Georgia. He answered a question on a naturalization form that he had never been married to two women at the same time. The defendant claimed that he could not be guilty of making a false statement because a bigamous marriage, under Georgia law, was void ab initio, therefore he was never actually married to the woman in Georgia. The government moved to bar this defense on the theory that it represented a “mistake of law” defense. The Sixth Circuit disagreed, holding that if the defendant in fact believed that he was not married, based on the void ab initio principle, then he was not guilty of knowingly making a false statement.

United States v. Safavian, 528 F.3d 957 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

The defendant was formerly the chief of staff of the Government Services Administration. He was considering taking a golfing trip with a lobbyist, Jack Abramoff, and solicited an ethics opinion about whether it was permissible for him to go on the trip. He omitted to tell the ethics officer that Abramoff was arguably doing business, or seeking to do business, with the GSA. This failure to include the pertinent facts in his ethics inquiry could not form the basis for a false statement prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 1001(a)(1). When it comes to a “concealment” false statement, the government must prove that the defendant had a duty to disclose the facts that were concealed. No such duty existed in this case, where the defendant was voluntarily seeking an ethics opinion.

United States v. Manning, 526 F.3d 611 (10th Cir. 2008)

When a defendant provides false information to a probation officer in connection with the preparation of a presentence report, he may be prosecuted for a § 1001 violation. Though the report is furnished by the probation officer to the court, this kind of statement does not qualify as a “statement, representation, writing or document submitted to a judge,” and thus does not qualify for the § 1001(b) exception to the coverage of the statute. The probation officer is not the equivalent of a courier, who merely transmits the statement to the judge.

United States v. Robison, 505 F.3d 1208 (11th Cir. 2007)

The defendant’s false statement conviction was reversed. The allegation was that he submitted an environmental report to the EPA certifying that it was true, when, in fact, the report contained false information. However, the certification only stated that he knew that the reports was prepared by a competent person and that he was told by that person that it was accurate. The government introduced no evidence that the reports were not prepared by a qualified person, or that the qualified person did not tell the defendant that the reports were accurate.

United States v. Horvath, 492 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant made a false statement to a probation officer in connection with a presentence interview. The Ninth Circuit holds that conduct is encompassed within the exception for statements made by a party to a judge or magistrate. 18 U.S.C. § 1001(b). See also the various opinions filed in connection with the denial of the government’s request for rehearing, en banc, 522 F.3d 904 (2008).

United States v. Jiang, 476 F.3d 1026 (9th Cir. 2007)

The evidence was insufficient to support the defendant’s conviction. Because of the uncertainty regarding the nature of the questions asked by the law enforcement officer and the answers given by the defendant about his export of amplifiers, a conviction could not be sustained. At best, the exchange was ambiguous.

United States v. Hoover, 467 F.3d 496 (5th Cir. 2006)
The trial court’s jury charge improperly expanded the indictment by offering a theory by which the jury could find that the statement made by the defendant was false, in a manner different than the manner set forth in the indictment. The indictment alleged that he made a false statement about how many people complained to him about a financing arrangement of his car dealership. Specifically the indictment said that “he knew the statement was false because “more than one person told him about the ‘double floorplanning.’” The jury was instructed, however, that he could be found guilty if he knew the statement he made to the police was false, but did not limit the basis upon which he knew it was false. The Sixth Circuit held that, pursuant to Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212 (1960), if the government chooses to specifically charge the manner in which the defendant’s statement is false, the government should be required to prove that it is untruthful for that reason.

United States v. Cacioppo, 460 F.3d 1012 (8th Cir. 2006)

The defendants were prosecuted for making a false statement in connection with ERISA reports, 18 U.S.C. §1027. The trial court erroneously instructed the jury that a conviction could be predicated on a finding that the defendant recklessly disregarded whether his statement was false, or not. The statute requires proof of “knowing” false statements and reckless disregard for the truthfulness of a statement is not the same as knowing that a statement is false.

United States v. Stewart, 420 F.3d 1012 (9th Cir. 2005)

Repeating the same false statement to a law enforcement officer on two separate occasions does not constitute two separate crimes of violating § 1001, if the second false statement did not independently impair a government investigation.

United States v. Gibson, 409 F.3d 325 (6th Cir. 2005)

The defendants were charged with making false statements (and failing to make mandatory disclosures) in connection with mine safety reporting requirements. One count of the indictment was deficient, because it failed to properly identify the specific failure to report that is required by the regulations. A judgment of acquittal was also appropriate on that count.

United States v. Bruno, 383 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2004)

The conspirators could not have envisioned that six years after they participated in a murder, one of their confederates would lie to investigators about the crime. Under a Pinkerton theory, a conviction for making a false statement could not be sustained.

United States v. Blankenship, 382 F.3d 1100 (11th Cir. 2004)

The defendants submitted contracts and equipment leases to the government to demonstrate the bona fides of the parties’ relationship (in order to qualify for a government contract). Actually, the parties did not intend to have that relationship, but submitted the documents in order to win the contract. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that this conduct does not amount to a false statement under § 1001. A contract is not a “false statement” unless it is fraudulent, or actually contains false statements of fact. A contract like the one at issue in this case is not like a guarantee that a party never intended to honor (which could constitute a false statement). A contract can be breached without any criminal culpability. The existence of the contract was not actually disputed, even if the parties never intended to comply with its terms, or sue the other party for breaching the contract. In a separate holding, the court held that other false statements made by one of the defendants did not fall within the jurisdiction of a federal agency and therefore could not be the basis for a § 1001 prosecution.

United States v. Karaouni, 379 F.3d 1139 (9th Cir. 2004)

18 U.S.C. § 911 makes it a crime to falsely claim to be a U.S. citizen. On an I-9 employment form, the defendant checked a box indicating that he was a U.S. “national.” Checking the box did not violate § 911. Though all citizens are nationals, not all nationals are citizens.

United States v. Finn, 375 F.3d 1033 (10th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was a law enforcement agent with HUD. His car was towed and despite his efforts to bully the towing company to release his car, the company refused to release the car without being paid. He eventually enlisted the aid of a colleague to drive the car off the lot, running through a fence. When he realized that there would be trouble, he had the friend take some petty cash from the HUD office and reimburse the towing company. On the government expenditure form and receipt, the defendant crossed out the phrase “damage to fence” and added the word “storage.” The Tenth Circuit concludes that changing the term “damage to fence” to “storage” was not a material false statement.

United States v. McBride, 362 F.3d 360 (6th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with violating the false claim statute (18 U.S.C. § 287) by writing a bad check to cover his girlfriend’s tax liability. A bad check written to the government to pay for a liability is not a false claim.

United States v. McNeil, 362 F.3d 570 (9th Cir. 2004)

A false statement in a CJA-23 (financial affidavit used to support appointment of counsel in criminal case) is not covered by § 1001. The false statement statute expressly exempts statements made during the course of judicial proceedings and an application to have appointed counsel and the accompanying financial affidavit is covered by the judicial proceeding exemption.

United States v. Dunne, 324 F.3d 1158 (10th Cir. 2003)

Making a false statement is not a continuing offense for statute of limitations purposes.

In order to qualify as a criminal false statement under 18 U.S.C. § 1001(c), a false statement to the legislative branch must be in connection with an investigation or review of a committee, subcommittee, commission or office of Congress. Alleging this element of the offense is essential in an indictment. In this case, the defendant (a Capitol security guard) made a “bad joke” – he left some “sugar substitute” on a desk near the entrance to the Capitol and suggested that it was anthrax. Based on the note he left next to the substance, the U.S. Attorney charged him with making a false statement in a matter involving the legislative branch. The D.C. Circuit held that the fake note was not the proper subject of a § 1001 prosecution.
United States v. Baird, 134 F.3d 1276 (6th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with making a false statement to the government in an effort to obtain a progress payment on a government construction project. The defendant submitted a claim for payment based on “incurred costs,” though the defendant had not yet paid for the product for which he was requesting a progress payment. Because of the confusion over the definition of the term “incurred costs,” the trial court should have instructed the jury on this aspect of the charge.

United States v. Brown, 151 F.3d 476 (6th Cir. 1998)

The Sixth Circuit holds that a statement that is impliedly false may be prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 1001. In this case, the principal defendant’s conviction was sustained on this theory. The second defendant, however, was not shown to have shared in the lead defendant’s criminal intent and her conviction was reversed. The defendants, who were employed by the Detroit housing authority filled out various HUD forms indicating that certain people were “eligible” to participate in a low-income housing program. While those people were technically “eligible” (i.e., they had low income), they were not taken off the waiting list in the proper order and, in certain instances, had actually bribed the lead defendant to gain acceptance in the program. The second defendant was not shown to have had any knowledge of the waiting list, or the significance of the list in determining actual eligibility.

United States v. Whiteside, 285 F.3d 1345 (11th Cir. 2002)

The defendants’ convictions were reversed on sufficiency grounds. The defendants were charged with making false statements in connection with Medicare reimbursement cost reports and conspiracy to defraud the government. In the reimbursement cost reports, the defendants reported that part of their hospital’s annual costs included certain interest payments on a note that represented a capital expenditure. According to the government, these interest payments should not have been reported as a capital expenditure. The jury convicted the defendants. The Eleventh Circuit held that it was far from clear what the appropriate definition of a “capital expenditure” is in the context of interest payments for the note. Consequently, as a matter of law, the defendants could not be found guilty of making a false statement. The court held that, “In a case where the truth or falsity of a statement centers on an interpretive question of law, the government bears the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant’s statement is not true under a reasonable interpretation of the law.” Id. 285 F.3d at 1351.
FEDERAL OFFICER REMOVAL STATUTE

State of Texas v. Kleinert, 855 F.3d 305 (5th Cir. 2017)

A person acting in his capacity as a federal officer may not be prosecuted in state court for such conduct. A defendant charged in state court may ask to “remove” the prosecution to federal court. 28 U.S.C. § 1442(a)(1). The defendant must show that he has a colorable federal defense to the conduct in order win the removal motion. The elements for removal were established in this case.
FIFTH AMENDMENT

SEE ALSO: Confessions
           Closing Argument (Comment on Defendant’s Failure to Testify)
           Post Arrest Silence

The subpoena served on the defendant required him to produce various documents that fit into several categories, such as “documents that reflect all income.” The defendant sought, and was given use immunity. Nevertheless, the government used these documents to obtain an indictment. The United States Supreme Court held that the indictment had to be dismissed. The act of producing the documents and corresponding authentication that these documents were responsive to the subpoena was “used” against the defendant. The Court observed that providing documentation in response to the broad categories requested was tantamount to answering a series of interrogatories about the sources and amount of income received by the defendant.

A defendant has a Fifth Amendment right to remain silent at sentencing and this may not be used against her. In this case, the defendant entered a guilty plea and the amount of drugs which would be attributed to her at sentencing was left open. At sentencing, the government introduced evidence relating to the drug quantity and the defendant did not respond. The trial court expressly considered the defendant's silence against her. The Supreme Court reversed: a defendant has a right to remain silent and this may not be used to her detriment.

Salinas v. Texas, 133 S. Ct. 2174 (2013)

The defendant was interviewed by the police and agreed to answer questions. During the questioning, the police asked him whether shotgun shells found at the scene would match his shotgun. The defendant did not respond. The state introduced this “failure to respond” at trial and argued that the defendant’s silence was evidence of his guilt. In a 5-4 decision, the United States Supreme Court held that a defendant’s non-custodial silence was admissible at trial and could be used to draw an inference of guilt, assuming the defendant does not affirmatively assert his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

United States v. Apple MacPro Computer, 851 F.3d 238 (3rd Cir. 2017)

Pursuant to a search warrant, the police seized the defendant’s computers and external hard drives. The hard drives were encrypted and the defendant did not voluntarily provide the password. The police had sufficient information to establish that the hard drives contained child pornography, including an interview with family members who had viewed child pornography on the computer, as well as certain forensic information. The Magistrate then ordered the defendant to produce the password. He refused, claiming a Fifth Amendment right to decline to provide the information. The Third Circuit upheld the contempt order. Because of the “foregone conclusion” doctrine, the defendant could not assert the “act of production” component of the Fifth Amendment. The court distinguished In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum Dated Mar. 25, 2011, 670 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2012), because in that case, the government was not shown to have known what the contents of the computers were – the foregone conclusion doctrine did not apply.

United States v. Von Behren, 822 F.3d 1139 (10th Cir. 2016)
A condition of supervised release required the defendant to submit to a polygraph test regarding his sexual activities (he had been convicted of possession and distributing child pornography). He asserted a Fifth Amendment right to refuse to answer the polygraph questions. The Tenth Circuit held that he had a Fifth Amendment right to refuse to answer the questions. The answers could incriminate him and the condition of supervised release amounted to “compulsion.”

United States v. Cabrera, 811 F.3d 801 (6th Cir. 2016)
At sentencing, the trial court decried the “fantastical” defense that the defense offered at trial and the fact that the defendant did not testify in his own defense. (The defense was that the undercover tapes were manipulated by the government). Relying on the fact that the defendant did not testify at trial (or in support of his defense at any time) and on the fact that the defense was “fantastical” violated both the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. The defendant may not be punished for not testifying and his right to challenge the government’s case (and the reliability or authenticity of its evidence) may not be the basis for an increased sentence.

United States v. Okatan, 728 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2013)
When confronted by the police – but not while in custody – the defendant answered a few questions, but then invoked his right to counsel. Repeatedly during trial, the government highlighted the fact that when questioned by the police, the defendant invoked his right to counsel. This occurred during the examination of the interrogating officer and during closing argument. This was reversible error. Unlike the situation in Salinas v. Texas, the defendant in this case did not simply remain silent in response to questions, here, the defendant affirmatively asserted his right to counsel. Using that express assertion of the privilege to remain silent (which, in this context was the same as the invocation of the right to counsel), as evidence of guilt, violates the Fifth Amendment rights of the defendant, even post-Salinas.

A Kansas prison regulation requires a sex offender to fully admit all of his sexual history in order to retain certain privileges and to stay in a less secure facility. The Supreme Court held that this provision does not violate the Self-Incrimination Clause in light of the consequences of the failure to “confess.”

The Supreme Court holds that the government may require a suspect to sign forms requiring an off-shore bank to release information to the grand jury. Because the act of signing such forms is not “testimonial” it does not violate the defendant’s Fifth Amendment rights.

A defendant may not rely on the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination if the only threat of prosecution exists in a foreign country.
United States v. Bahr, 730 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 2013)

While on probation from a prior state sex offense, the defendant was required to take a polygraph (during which he confessed to certain sex offenses) and to fill out a “workbook” (in which he confessed to several sex offenses). Following his federal prosecution for a new offense, the probation officer provided this information to the sentencing judge. The Ninth Circuit held that the statements made by the defendant during the period of probation were “compelled self-incrimination” and should have been suppressed from the federal case on Fifth Amendment grounds. Even though he did not refuse to answer questions during his period of probation, the Fifth Amendment protection is “self-executing” and having been compelled to answer the questions (even without any objection on his part), the government was precluded from using this information in a subsequent proceeding. See Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984).

United States v. Bright, 596 F.3d 683 (9th Cir. 2010)

In the context of an IRS summons enforcement proceeding, the Ninth Circuit reviews the law concerning the Fifth Amendment in the context of a subpoena to produce documents. With respect to certain credit card records, the court concludes that the “foregone conclusion” exception to Hubbell applied, but with respect to other credit card records, the government did not establish that it was aware of the records, or the defendants’ possession of the records, prior to the issuance of the summons and therefore the taxpayers were entitled to assert the Fifth Amendment to resist production of these records.

United States v. Ponds, 454 F.3d 313 (D.C. Cir. 2006)

The grand jury was investigating an attorney in connection with his receipt of attorney’s fees from a particular client – specifically, his receipt of a car as a fee. A grand jury subpoena was issued, seeking any and all documents relating to the receipt of the car, documents relating to the fees paid by that client, documents relating to the attorney’s sister, documents relating to any other cars provided to the attorney by the client, and any documents relating to the client’s mother. The attorney sought and received “act of production” immunity. Nevertheless, he was indicted. The D.C. Circuit concluded that the trial court did not conduct a sufficiently rigorous Kastigar hearing. The trial court concluded that Fisher controlled, rather than Hubbell, because the government obtained only pre-existing documents in defined categories. The D.C. Circuit disagreed, holding that the document requests were sufficiently broad that they came within the Hubbell decision that bars the use of documents that are authenticated and categorized by the immunized target.

United States v. Saechao, 418 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2005)

A condition of probation that required the probationer to answer all reasonable questions of the probation officer truthfully violated his Fifth Amendment rights. In contrast to Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984), in this situation, the defendant would be penalized if he failed to answer the probation officer’s questions, while in Murphy, the defendant was simply required to be honest whenever he did answer questions.

De LiSi v. Crosby, 402 F.3d 1294 (11th Cir. 2005)
A witness who waives his Fifth Amendment privilege with regard to a topic in a judicial proceeding, may not later invoke the privilege, even in a separate legal proceeding, on the same topic. In this case, a prosecution witness previously waived his Fifth Amendment rights regarding possible charges of tax evasion. When cross-examined by the defendant at the defendant’s trial, the trial court erred in permitting the witness to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights. Harmless error.

United States v. Antelope, 395 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2005)

The incarceration of a probationer who refused to disclose information about sex crimes for which he had not been prosecuted violated his Fifth Amendment rights. The consequences of refusing to reveal this information distinguished this case from McKune v. Lile, supra.

Doe v. United States, 383 F.3d 905 (9th Cir. 2004)

The subpoena to the defendant was so broad that it violated his Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination. Relying on Fisher and Hubbell, the Court held that the defendant was being required to authenticate (by his act of production) the existence of various documents. Therefore, holding the defendant in contempt for failing to comply with the grand jury subpoena was improper. The court specifically rejected the “foregone conclusion” exception to “act of production” immunity.

The AUSA improperly advised the defendant that when he appeared at the grand jury, he had no right to plead the Fifth, because he had already been convicted of drug charges about which he was being questioned (his case was still on appeal). The defendant’s answers led to a perjury prosecution. While condemning the misconduct of the AUSA, the Fourth Circuit holds that the erroneous advice did not provide a defense to the perjury charges.

Ketchings v. Jackson, 365 F.3d 509 (6th Cir. 2004)

The trial court improperly took into account the defendant’s failure to admit his guilty at sentencing. In short, the trial judge stated that the defendant’s failure to admit his guilt suggested to the court that he could not be easily rehabilitated and increased his sentence accordingly. This violated the principle set forth in Mitchell v. United States and required that a writ be granted unless a new sentencing hearing was conducted by a different judge.

United States v. Burgos, 276 F.3d 1284 (11th Cir. 2001)

Though this decision is in the Sentencing Guidelines context, the court holds that a defendant may not be penalized for refusing to cooperate with the government in a criminal investigation unrelated to the offense for which the defendant is to be sentenced. In this case, the trial court sentenced the defendant to the high end of the guideline range because of her refusal to cooperate in an investigation of her husband. This violated her Fifth Amendment rights.

United States v. Vavages, 151 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998)

A defense witness (the defendant’s wife) refused to testify in support of her husband’s alibi defense because she had been threatened by the prosecutor with a perjury prosecution if she did. She could not invoke a blanket Fifth Amendment refusal to testify on this basis. Fear of a perjury prosecution for the expected testimony is not a basis for refusing to testify, because truthful testimony may not be prosecuted as perjury. The principal reason for reversing the defendant’s conviction in this case, however, was the misconduct of the prosecutor for threatening the witness in the first place.

United States v. McLaughlin, 126 F.3d 130 (3rd Cir. 1997)

When a grand jury subpoena is served on a corporation for corporate records, neither the corporation, nor the custodian may assert the Fifth Amendment privilege. Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1988). The flip side of this, however, is that if the custodian produces certain records (or fails to produce certain records), this fact may not be used against the custodian personally in a trial against that individual. Here, the custodian (the defendant) failed to produce certain records and the government argued to the jury that the failure to produce these records was evidence of his guilty state of mind. This was reversible error.

United States v. Gravatt, 868 F.2d 585 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The defendant, charged with tax evasion, refused to fill out a financial affidavit in his efforts to obtain court-appointed counsel. The Third Circuit held that it was error to require the defendant to complete the form. Rather, the Court should have provided the defendant a right to fill out the form for an in-camera review, or the defendant should have been granted immunity for purposes of obtaining an attorney.

United States v. Sharp, 920 F.2d 1167 (4th Cir. 1990)

The IRS was investigating the defendant because of his failure to file tax returns for a number of years. The defendant refused to answer questions when he received an IRS summons. The trial court erred in directing the defendant to respond to the civil inquiries. The fact that it was the civil division does not alter the incriminating nature of the information sought. The trial court indicated that the questions should be answered and if he was prosecuted, the court could then protect his rights by dismissing the indictment, or suppressing the evidence. This was not a proper method of preserving Fifth Amendment rights.

In re Hitchings, 850 F.2d 180 (4th Cir. 1988)

A witness testified under a grant of immunity at a grand jury proceeding. At trial, she asserted her Fifth Amendment privilege, but answered that she had testified truthfully at the grand jury. This one answer did not constitute a waiver of her Fifth Amendment rights.

United States v. Grable, 98 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 1996)

A taxpayer has the right to assert the “act of production” Fifth Amendment privilege in response to an IRS summons enforcement proceeding. The defendant’s failure to file tax returns for two years presented enough of a risk of possible incrimination to support the invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination.

United States v. Troescher, 99 F.3d 933 (9th Cir. 1996)

A defendant may refuse to answer questions, or produce documents, in reliance on the Fifth Amendment, even if the only threat of prosecution is for a tax offense.

United States v. Safirstein, 827 F.2d 1380 (9th Cir. 1987)

During sentencing, the trial court noted that the defendant failed to cooperate and this indicated a lack of remorse. The judge indicated that he would rely on this factor in sentencing.
the defendant. The Ninth Circuit reverses holding that this constitutes a violation of the defendant’s Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

United States v. Paris, 827 F.2d 395 (9th Cir. 1987)

A co-defendant of the defendant on trial was promised leniency and promised that a conspiracy charge would be dropped if he would cooperate at the defendant’s trial. He was called as a witness at the defendant’s trial but pled the Fifth Amendment because he had not yet been sentenced. The Ninth Circuit held that the witness could rely on the Fifth Amendment until such time as the conspiracy charge was, in fact, dropped and his sentence imposed on the substantive count.

United States v. Hardwell, 80 F.3d 1471 (10th Cir. 1996)

A defendant’s financial affidavit that is completed in an effort to secure appointed counsel after being indicted may not be used by the government at trial to prove that the defendant has no legitimate income. Using this affidavit penalizes the defendant’s right to secure appointed counsel and, pursuant to Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968), the defendant’s right to counsel cannot be conditioned on providing incriminating information to the government.

United States v. Kuku, 129 F.3d 1435 (11th Cir. 1997)

A witness may assert the Fifth Amendment privilege after he has pled guilty to a criminal offense but before being sentenced.

United States v. Gecas, 120 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997)

A person may not refuse to incriminate himself on the basis of a perceived threat of prosecution in a foreign country.

United States v. Argomaniz, 925 F.2d 1349 (11th Cir. 1991)

The Fifth Amendment privilege can be asserted in any proceeding, civil or criminal, administrative or judicial, investigatory or adjudicatory. A taxpayer may invoke this privilege in response to requests for information in an IRS investigation. There can exist a legitimate fear of criminal prosecution while an IRS investigation remains in the civil stage, before formal transfer to the criminal division.

In re Grand Jury Investigation (Heller), 921 F.2d 1184 (11th Cir. 1991)

The grand jury subpoenaed an attorney’s trust account records during an investigation of the attorney for tax offenses. The attorney attempted to thwart the appearance of his secretary on Fifth Amendment grounds. However, because the Fifth Amendment is personal, it could not be asserted vicariously through the secretary. In a footnote, the Court also considered the argument that “personal papers” can never be covered by the Fifth Amendment. This argument, advanced by the government, was premised on the holding in Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976), and represents a repudiation of the privacy-based rationale of the Fifth Amendment represented by Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886). The theory of Andresen is that once one’s thoughts are reduced to writing, their compelled production is not self-incrimination. The court, while reviewing this argument, does not render a final verdict on this point.

Matire v. Wainwright, 811 F.2d 1430 (11th Cir. 1987)

During closing argument, the prosecutor referred to the defendant’s silence after having been warned of his Miranda rights. The government argued that evidence of post-arrest silence was probative on the defendant’s insanity defense. The Eleventh Circuit reverses on the basis of this Fifth Amendment violation.

United States v. Dean, 989 F.2d 1205 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

Defendant was the assistant to HUD Secretary Pierce who was under investigation by an Independent Counsel. She was subpoenaed to produce all documents in her possession relating to her work at HUD. She resisted, but was ultimately ordered to do so by the district court. At trial, the government sought to introduce the records and the fact that she produced them pursuant to a subpoena. The “act of production” doctrine, however, applied in this situation. Though the defendant was the custodian of “government records,” just as the custodian of business records may insist on being immunized before being compelled to produce documents – with regard to evidence of the act of production (as opposed to the contents of the documents) – a government custodian has that same right. This case contains a good discussion of the act of production doctrine, as well as the “required records” exception which provides that records which must be maintained are not subject to the “act of production” doctrine. The required records exception does not apply in this case because the records being subpoenaed were not required to be maintained by the government.

A witness retains the Fifth Amendment right not to testify, even after the witness enters a guilty plea, and even though the witness entered into a plea agreement which required truthful testimony. The witnesses had not yet been sentenced and other charges which were to be dropped in accordance with the plea agreement, had not yet been dismissed.
FIFTH AMENDMENT
(Immunity and Proffers)

United States v. Allen, 864 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 2017)

The Fifth Amendment prohibition on the use of compelled testimony in criminal proceedings applies even when a foreign government compels a foreigner to answer questions, which are then used in a prosecution of the foreigner in an American court. In this case, the foreigner (British citizen) was given use immunity, but not derivative use immunity and compelled to answer questions by British authorities. He was later prosecuted in New York. One of the witnesses against him had reviewed the defendant’s answers to the British interrogation and his testimony was affected by his review of those statements. The Second Circuit held that the Fifth Amendment applied, that the government was required to satisfy the Kastigar requirement to prove that the witness’s testimony was not affected by his review of the defendant’s compelled testimony, and that the witness’s simple assurance that his testimony was not affected, was insufficient to satisfy the Kastigar burden. The Second reversed the conviction and also held that the witness’s testimony at the grand jury also violated the defendants’ Fifth Amendment rights and necessitated dismissing the indictment.

United States v. Rosemond, 841 F.3d 95 (2d Cir. 2016)

The defendant was a member of a gang which killed a rival gang member. The defendant was arrested and signed a proffer agreement that provided the government would not use any of statements made during the proffer sessions against him, except that they could be used “as substantive evidence to rebut, directly or indirectly, any evidence offered or elicited, or factual assertions made, by or on behalf of him at any stage of a criminal prosecution.” During one proffer session, the defendant said he understood that as a result of the actions he took with others the victim would be killed. The defendant did not plead guilty and proceeded to trial. A co-conspirator testified and the defendant’s attorney cross-examined him about his belief that the victim would be shot, but not killed. The attorney also asked if the defendant had ever instructed the witness to kill the victim. The district court held that this questioning triggered the proffer waiver provision. That trial ended in a hung jury. Prior to the retrial, the court re-affirmed its ruling and instructed defense counsel that if he argued that this was a “mere shooting” and not a murder, the waiver would apply. The Second Circuit reversed. The defendant is entitled to draw the jury’s attention to the lack of evidence presented by the prosecution without waiving the provisions of a proffer agreement. The appellate court provided a list of matters that do not trigger a waiver, including arguing the absence of proof beyond a reasonable doubt; pleading not guilty; cross-examining a police officer about inconsistencies in his reports; the absence of corroborating evidence supporting the prosecution’s theory of the case; cross-examining a witness to expose problems with his credibility.

United States v. Mark, 795 F.3d 1102 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was interviewed by the FBI and after demonstrating his cooperation was granted informal immunity by the AUSA. He participated in a phone conference with the prosecutors in preparation for another trial. Later, the government claimed that he refused to cooperate in a subsequent phone conference which prompted the government to issue a target letter. The defendant’s motion to dismiss was denied. The defendant was tried and convicted, after which the defendant requested reconsideration of his Motion to Dismiss based on his cell phone records that showed that no phone call ever occurred in which he failed to cooperate. The government had no notes or memo of the uncooperative phone call and the FBI agent testified that he did not remember the call that the prosecutors asserted was the basis for the breach of the immunity agreement. The Ninth Circuit held that the Motion to Reconsider should have been granted and the indictment must be dismissed based on the government’s failure to prove that any breach occurred.

United States v. Melvin, 730 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2013)

The defendant gave a statement during a proffer session. It was agreed that his statement could not be used against him at trial under the typical proffer conditions. At trial, an agent was permitted to identify the defendant’s voice on recorded wiretaps and said he knew the voice from the proffer session. The First Circuit held that this violated the terms of the proffer agreement.

United States v. Jimenez-Bencevi, 788 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant gave an immunized proffer admitting that he shot the victim. He then went to trial. The defendant sought to call an expert to the stand who would have testified that based on surveillance videos, he could determine that the shooter was taller than the defendant. The trial judge, invoking Daubert held that he would not allow the expert to testify unless he was first provided a copy of the immunized proffer. The judge further held that the expert would not be allowed to testify to a “fact” that the court knew was untrue. The First Circuit held that this was reversible error. The immunity agreement barred the “trial court’s use” of the statement, just as it barred the prosecutor’s use of the statement.

In re: Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum Dated March 25, 2011, 670 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2012)

Based on Hubbell, the Eleventh Circuit held that a defendant who has received “act of production” immunity to compel him to decrypt a computer may not have the decrypted computer then “used” against him, because the contents of the computer – the decrypted files – represent the indirect use of the immunized statement. In short, the court held that once “act of production” immunity is given to the defendant, the contents of the documents or computer files that are produced may not be used against him, because the contents represent the fruits of his immunized testimony. This case was examined in United States v. Apple MacPro Computer, 851 F.3d 238 (3rd Cir. 2017) where the Third Circuit held that the Fifth Amendment did not apply when the government demands a password, if it is a foregone conclusion that the computer contains contraband. The Third Circuit held that the government in the Eleventh Circuit case did not make a showing that the contents of the computer were known to the police.

United States v. Hill, 643 F.3d 807 (11th Cir. 2011)

The defendant signed a proffer agreement that provided “Anything related to the proffer cannot and will not be used against [the defendant] in any Government case-in-chief. . .[T]he government is completely free to pursue any and all investigative leads derived in any way from the proffer.” These two sentences are inconsistent, because the “related to” language in the first sentence suggests a Kastigar-like derivative use immunity, while the second sentence reflects a standard “use immunity” proffer agreement that would allow the government to introduce evidence derived from the debriefing. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that the proffer agreement in this case must be interpreted as a Kastigar use and derivative use immunity agreement and the matter was remanded to the district court for a full evidentiary hearing on whether the government’s case was built entirely independent of any information obtained, or derived from, the immunized cooperation of the defendant.

United States v. Harper, 643 F.3d 135 (5th Cir. 2011)

The defendant entered into a plea agreement that included a U.S.S.G. § 1B1.8 use immunity provision that barred the government from using his debriefing statements at sentencing. The PSR calculated the drug quantity at 18 kilograms of crack cocaine. The defendant objected, claiming that the information was unreliable. The government responded, stating the information was accurate and was consistent with the defendant’s debriefing. The defendant objected to the government’s argument, claiming a violation of the plea agreement. At sentencing, the court heard testimony from different witnesses that the quantity involved was 18 kilograms of crack and there was no evidence of the defendant’s debriefing that was introduced. The defendant maintained that the government’s written response to the defendant’s objections constituted a violation of the immunity agreement, notwithstanding the fact that no evidence of the debriefing was introduced at the sentencing hearing. The Fifth Circuit agreed, reversed the judgment of the trial court, and remanded for sentencing before a new judge. The Fifth Circuit held that the defendant’s insistence that the information in the PSR was unreliable was not a “false statement” that justified breaching the immunity agreement.

United States v. Slough, 641 F.3d 544 (D. C. Cir. 2011)

This is the Blackwater case involving the statements of various members of the Blackwater team who were involved in numerous civilian deaths in Iraq. The defendants made statements that were covered by Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967), and claimed that their indictments were, in fact, tainted by those statements. A Kastigar hearing was held and the district court agreed. See United States v. North, 920 F.2d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1990). The D. C. Circuit reverses: for the most part, the court criticized the lower court’s methodology and remanded for additional fact-finding. But the appellate court also held that it is not a Kastigar violation if all that is shown is that the prosecutor was “motivated” to proceed based on the immunized statement. “Use” of an immunized statement requires more than simply motivation to continue.

United States v. Oluwanisola, 605 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 2010)

The defendant signed a proffer agreement that provided that the government could introduce the defendant’s statements as substantive evidence to rebut, directly or indirectly, any evidence offered or elicited, or factual assertions made, by or on behalf the defendant at any stage of the criminal prosecution. The defense counsel, in opening statement, suggested that the government would fail to prove certain elements of the offense. During cross-examination of a witness, the defense attorney questioned the witness about certain dates he made observations. The district court held that both of these events triggered the waiver provision. The Second Circuit disagreed. Simply challenging the sufficiency of the evidence in general, or questioning a witness about certain dates, did not allow the government to introduce the defendant’s statements that were subject to the proffer agreement. See also United States v. Barrow, 400 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2005).

United States v. Al-Esawi, 560 F.3d 888 (8th Cir. 2009)

The defendant signed a proffer agreement and provided a statement to the government. Settlement discussions were not successful and he proceeded to trial. The agreement stated that the defendant’s statements could be used at trial if he provided testimony that contradicted his statements, or if the defense presented evidence that contradicted his statements. The prosecutor, however, introduced the statements in its case-in-chief. This was error. The statements were not admissible until after the defendant offered inconsistent evidence.

United States v. Ponds, 454 F.3d 313 (D.C. Cir. 2006)

The grand jury was investigating an attorney in connection with his receipt of attorney’s fees from a particular client – specifically, his receipt of a car as a fee. A grand jury subpoena was issued, seeking any and all documents relating to the receipt of the car, documents relating to the fees paid by that client, documents relating to the client’s sister, documents relating to any other cars provided to the attorney by the client, and any documents relating to the client’s sister and mother. The attorney sought and received “act of production” immunity. Nevertheless, he was indicted. The D.C. Circuit concluded that the trial court did not conduct a sufficiently vigorous Kastigar hearing. The trial court concluded that Fisher controlled, rather than Hubbell, because the government obtained only pre-existing documents in defined categories. The D.C. Circuit disagreed, holding that the documents were sufficiently broad that they came within the Hubbell decision that bars the use of documents that are authenticated and categorized by the immunized target.

United States v. Farmer, 543 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2008)

The defendant’s U.S.S.G. § 1B1.8 proffer agreement provided that any information he provided during his proffer agreement debriefing would not be used to enhance his guideline level. Though there were inconsistent paragraphs in the proffer agreement (e.g., anything he said could be furnished to the probation department), the § 1B1.8 provision barred the government from using the information to set the drug quantity base offense level.

United States v. Copeland, 381 F.3d 1101 (11th Cir. 2004)

The defendant signed a plea agreement that obligated the government not to bring any additional charges based on information that he provided to the government. Thereafter, the defendant was charged with firearms offenses that significantly increased his sentence. He challenged the firearms charges on the basis that the parties intended that conduct to be covered by the plea agreement. The government disputed this contention. The Eleventh Circuit held that plea agreements must be viewed against the background of the negotiations and should not be interpreted to directly contradict an oral understanding. The court must also consider whether the government’s actions are inconsistent with what the defendant reasonably understood when he entered his guilty plea. In this case, there was ambiguity in the plea agreement, because it was not clear whether the defendant had to have already provided the information (that was considered immunized) or whether he could provide the information after the plea agreement was signed. The opinion also discusses the concept that a plea agreement that envisions being debriefed creates an obligation on the part of the government to actually conduct a debriefing. See United States v. Ringling, 988 F.2d 504 (4th Cir. 1993) and United States v. Laday, 56 F.3d 24 (5th Cir. 1995). Ultimately, the court remanded the case to the lower court for further inquiry into the defendant’s reasonable belief at the time he signed the plea agreement.

Taylor v. Singletary, 148 F.3d 1276 (11th Cir. 1998)
Though an informal grant of immunity is fully enforceable, if the federal government simply agrees not to use a defendant’s incriminating statement against him, this will not bar a state from using this information if the testimony was not, in fact, compelled. In other words, to ensure that a witness’s statements are not used against him, the witness’s statements must either be compelled and immunized, or the agreement must explicitly bind all sovereigns.

United States v. Castaneda, 162 F.3d 832 (5th Cir. 1998)
The defendant entered into an oral transactional immunity agreement that obligated him to “tell everything he knew” about corrupt practices connected with DUI prosecutions in Brownsville, Texas. The government later indicted the defendant, contending that he did not fulfill his obligation. The Fifth Circuit reversed the conviction: the government failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant materially breached. A breach is not material unless the non-breaching party is deprived of the benefit of the bargain. In this case, the defendant provided considerable information about the corruption scheme. Though the defendant omitted to tell the government certain things, the government received the benefit of its bargain and the relatively insignificant omissions were not sufficient to constitute a breach of the agreement.

United States v. Lopez, 219 F.3d 343 (4th Cir. 2000)
The defendant entered into a proffer agreement with the government but never consummated the deal and eventually went to trial. At sentencing, the government used the amounts of drugs he admitted having sold in calculating his sentence. However, none of the conditions precedent to using the information he provided occurred. Therefore, using the information he provided subject to the proffer agreement was improper.

United States v. Conway, 81 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 1996)
Pursuant to U.S.S.G. §1B1.8, the defendant agreed to provide information to the government in exchange for which the government agreed not to use this information to increase the sentence. The court, however, considered this information in deciding not to grant a downward departure pursuant to §5K1.1. This violated the terms of the immunity agreement as explained to the defendant during the initial plea colloquy.

United States v. Pelletier, 898 F.2d 297 (2d Cir. 1990)
The government violated its agreement not to use the defendant’s immunized grand jury testimony. The immunized testimony was used at a subsequent grand jury proceeding which indicted the defendant and later was used at the defendant’s trial.

United States v. Harris, 973 F.2d 333 (4th Cir. 1992)
The immunity conferred by §6002 prevents the government from even altering its investigatory strategy as a result of the immunized statement. Even focusing on a new witness is barred. The government’s mere representations that there was an independent, non-tainted source for the information, is alone not sufficient. The government failed to make the necessary Kastigar showing in this case.

United States v. Palumbo, 897 F.2d 245 (7th Cir. 1990)

Informal use and derivative use immunity grants are fully enforceable. In this case, the government failed to satisfy its Kastigar burden of proving that the indictment of the defendant was based on independent evidence from his immunized debriefing. Though the government had ample evidence, apart from the proffer, demonstrating that the defendant was involved in operations relating to the marijuana distribution scheme, the evidence was not so clear that the defendant was knowingly in the marijuana operation. That is, the prior information known to the police was that the defendant leased certain docks which were used to off-load marijuana. There was no knowledge, apart from the defendant’s proffer, that he knew the dock was to be used to off-load marijuana.

United States v. Abanatha, 999 F.2d 1246 (8th Cir. 1993)

A pre-sentence report may not include information which was obtained from the defendant as part of an immunized statement. The Fifth Amendment applies to sentencing and therefore, an immunized statement may not be used against the defendant.

United States v. Garrett, 797 F.2d 656 (8th Cir. 1986)

The defendant testified before a grand jury under a grant of immunity. That same grand jury ultimately indicted the defendant. Though the defendant claims that the same grand jury may never indict a defendant who has appeared under a grant of immunity, the Eighth Circuit disagrees, holding that the trial court must conduct an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the indictment rests on evidence totally apart from the immunized testimony.

United States v. Young, 86 F.3d 944 (9th Cir. 1996)

Generally, a criminal defendant is not entitled to compel the government to grant immunity to a witness. In order to fall under an exception to this rule, defendant must show that: (1) the testimony was relevant; (2) the government distorted the judicial fact-finding process by denying immunity. In this case, a witness was prepared to testify for the defense (if immunized) that he overheard a government witness state that he was going to offer false testimony to inculpate the defendant.

United States v. Westerdahl, 945 F.2d 1083 (9th Cir. 1991)

Though the government cannot be forced to confer immunity on a defense witness, the failure to do so can, in certain circumstances, amount to prosecutorial misconduct. This would be the case where the failure to do so intentionally distorts the fact-finding process.

United States v. Plummer, 941 F.2d 799 (9th Cir. 1991)

In an informal letter, the government offered the defendant an opportunity to be interviewed by government agents. There was no explicit statement regarding immunity in the letter. The letter simply said that any statements by the defendant “would not be used in any subsequent prosecution” of the defendant. The trial court held that direct use immunity was implicitly granted by the letter. The appellate court decided that direct and indirect (derivative) use immunity was implicitly granted by the letter.
United States v. Holloway, 74 F.3d 249 (11th Cir. 1996)

The two defendants in this case were previously claimants in a civil forfeiture case. When they appeared to be deposed, they were confronted not only by the AUSA, but also a criminal investigator from Customs. The claimants’ attorney refused to proceed, commenting that he would not let his clients say something that could be used against them. The civil forfeiture AUSA responded, “We’re not going anywhere criminally with this thing . . . this is a civil case and I want to take their deposition and [the agent] is only here to help me.” The court held that this amounted to a grant of immunity and anything the defendants said, and any records they produced could not be used against them. Because the records and their civil deposition testimony were introduced at the grand jury, the indictment was dismissed.

United States v. Schmidgall, 25 F.3d 1523 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant gave an immunized statement to several investigators. One of the investigators’ notes were reviewed briefly by another agent. The latter agent eventually became the lead case agent in the defendant’s prosecution. The government failed to show that the investigator who briefly reviewed the notes of the immunized debriefing did not use that information in framing questions to other witnesses in his investigation of the defendant. The investigator could show that all the information which he presented to the grand jury was derived from the interview of other witnesses. But the interviews of these other witnesses may have been influenced by the immunized statements of the defendant. Also, the government failed to prove that the investigator’s conversations with other agents – including agents who participated in the initial immunized debriefing – did not involve tainted information.

United States v. Hampton, 775 F.2d 1479 (11th Cir. 1985)

The government had the burden of establishing that all of the evidence presented to the grand jury and ultimately all of the evidence to be utilized at trial was derived from legitimate, independent sources, as opposed to the state immunized testimony of the defendant. Mere denials by the prosecutor and other government agents are generally insufficient to meet the government’s burden, even if made in good faith. Neither speculation nor conclusory denials of use or derivative use by government officials will substitute for the affirmative showing of an independent source required for each and every item of evidence presented to the indicting grand jury. “A previously immunized defendant is not dependent for the preservation of his rights upon the integrity and good faith of prosecuting authorities.” Moreover, the government’s burden is not limited to such “negation of taint;” rather, the government must go further and affirmatively prove legitimate independent sources for its evidence and affirmatively establish that none of the evidence presented to the grand jury was derived directly or indirectly from the immunized testimony. Also, where the testimony of an immunized witness, or the fruits of that testimony, enable the government to build a case against his co-conspirator, who consequently strikes a plea bargain with prosecutors and agrees to testify against the immunized witness, the testimony of the co-conspirator must be deemed to have been indirectly derived from the testimony of the immunized witness in violation of Kastigar. See United States v. Kurzer, 422 F.Supp. 487 (S.D.N.Y. 1976).

United States v. Poindexter, 951 F.2d 369 (D.C.Cir. 1991)

Poindexter’s immunized testimony was “used” by Oliver North to refresh his recollection when he testified at Poindexter’s trial. North testified that he did not know what he remembered from the event itself, as opposed to what he remembered simply by having his recollection.
refreshed by Poindexter’s Congressional testimony. Such “use” of the immunized testimony was improper.

United States v. North, 920 F.2d 940 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

Oliver North’s conviction was potentially tainted by the use of his immunized testimony before the Iran-Contra Committee of Congress. The trial court must convene a “line-by-line” and “item-by-item” inquiry into whether the testimony of grand jury witnesses or trial witnesses was affected by North’s testimony. The appellate court holds that witnesses may not “refresh their memories” with immunized testimony. Rehearing the case, 920 F.2d 940, the court reached the same result. The court emphasized that insulating the prosecutor from exposure does not automatically prove that immunized testimony was not used against the defendant. “Kastigar is violated whenever the prosecution puts on a witness whose testimony is shaped, directly or indirectly, by compelled testimony, regardless of how or by whom he was exposed to that compelled testimony.” The court also holds that the inquiry into the improper use of immunized testimony includes an inquiry into whether the grand jury improperly had before it immunized testimony. There is a distinction between presenting to the grand jury statements which were improperly obtained (such as a forced or un-Mirandized confession) and presenting Kastigar-tainted testimony to the grand jury. In the latter case, the grand jury is considering evidence which was derived on the “promise” of the prosecutor that such use would never be made of the testimony.

United States v. Rinaldi, 808 F.2d 1579 (D.C.Cir. 1987)

The Court of Appeals holds that in order to determine whether evidence has been obtained in violation of a grant of use immunity or whether it is derived from an independent source requires the Court to make specific findings on the independent nature of the proposed evidence.
FIFTH AMENDMENT
(Defense Witness Immunity)

United States v. Straub, 538 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 2008)

The refusal of the government to offer immunity to the only witness who could provide testimony that would impeach the testimony of the government’s immunized witness violated due process. A prosecutor’s refusal to grant use immunity to a defense witness violates the defendant’s right to a fair trial when the witness’s testimony would have been relevant and the prosecution refused to grant the witness use immunity with the deliberate intention of distorting the fact-finding process. The defendant can satisfy the second showing if he can show that the government caused the witness to invoke his Fifth Amendment right or by proving that the selective denial of immunity had the effect of distorting the fact-finding process. The Ninth Circuit emphasized that the effect, and not necessarily the intent of the prosecution in refusing to grant immunity to the witness, is the proper focus. The defendant made a sufficient showing in this case. See also United States v. Wilkes, 662 F.3d 524 (9th Cir. 2011) (remanding case to trial court to apply the Straub analysis).

United States v. Quinn, 728 F.3d 243 (3rd Cir. 2013)

Over thirty years ago, the Third Circuit had held that in limited circumstances, the trial court could grant immunity to a defense witness if the testimony of the witness was “clearly exculpatory and essential to the defense case and ... the government has no strong interest in withholding use immunity. Government of the Virgin Islands v. Smith, 615 F.2d 964 (3rd Cir 1980). In this en banc decision, the Third Circuit overruled Smith, but held that if the government refuses to immunize a defense witness in a situation where the testimony of that witness is clearly exculpatory and essential testimony and there is no countervailing reason to refuse to immunize that witness, the trial court may decide to dismiss the prosecution on the basis of prosecutorial misconduct, a due process violation.
FIFTH AMENDMENT
(Foregone Conclusion Doctrine)

United States v. Greenfield, 831 F.3d 106 (2d Cir. 2016)

The IRS issued a summons to the defendant seeking all financial accounts pertaining to his ownership and management of offshore entities that he controlled. The defendant claimed privilege based on the act of production doctrine. The IRS claimed that the foregone conclusion doctrine applied, because the existence and authenticity of the documents it sought were not unknown and therefore, the act of production privilege did not apply. Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976). The Second Circuit agreed with the defense and upheld his assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege. Excellent discussion of Fisher, Hubbell, and the foregone conclusion doctrine.
FIFTH AMENDMENT
(Required Records Doctrine)

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 696 F.3d 428 (5th Cir. 2012)
A subpoena that required the production of any records of a foreign bank account – records were required to be kept by Treasury Department regulations – fell within the Required Records Exception to the Fifth Amendment.

In re M.H., 648 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2011)
A thorough review of the Required Records Doctrine which provides that the government may subpoena records from a person and demand compliance with the subpoena – despite a claim of self-incrimination privilege – on the basis that the person was required by law to maintain the records, such as records relating to the existence of foreign bank accounts.
FINGERPRINT EVIDENCE

United States v. Strayhorn, 743 F.3d 917 (4th Cir. 2014)

Evidence that a defendant’s fingerprint was on a movable item located at the crime scene (in this case, duct tape), is not sufficient to conviction the defendant of perpetrating a crime at that location, unless some other evidence links the defendant to the crime, or there is proof that the fingerprints were imprinted at the time the offense was committed.

United States v. Vargas, 471 F.3d 255 (1st Cir. 2006)

The First Circuit approves the use of fingerprint evidence following a Daubert hearing.

United States v. Abreu, 406 F.3d 1304 (11th Cir. 2005)

The Eleventh Circuit concludes that fingerprint evidence meets the Daubert standard.

In a forty page opinion, the Third Circuit evaluates the admissibility of fingerprint evidence under the Daubert standard and ultimately concludes that such evidence passes Daubert muster and was properly admitted in this case.
FIREARMS
(armed career criminal act)

NOTE: Because this issue is principally a sentencing issue, I have not included the hundreds (or thousands) of cases that deal with the eligibility of various state crimes as predicate offenses.

The residual clause of the Armed Career Criminal Act is unconstitutionally vague. The residual clause triggers ACCA sentencing if the defendant, convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm has three or more previous convictions for a “violent felony,” a term defined to include any felony that “involves conduct that presents a serious potential risk of physical injury to another.” 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(B). The Court, having struggled with this definition for over a decade, finally decided that it was simply too vague.

Welch v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1257 (2016)

Johnson, noted above, will be given full retroactive effect to cases on § 2255 review.

In order to determine whether a defendant’s prior conviction – which was obtained as a result of a guilty plea – qualifies as a predicate under the Armed Career Criminal Act, the sentencing court is limited to reviewing the sentencing documents and the plea colloquy. The court may not also consider police reports to determine whether a prior state conviction for burglary. This holding is essentially the same as Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575 (1990), but applies that holding to cases involving prior guilty plea convictions.

Descamps v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 2276 (2013)

If a statute contains alternative ways of committing an offense, then the “modified categorical approach” allows the court to examine a certain limited number of sources to determine which alternative means of committing the offense was involved in the prior offense. But if the statute of conviction simply omits an element that would otherwise qualify the offense as a violent felony, then the modified categorical approach does not apply, even if the government could prove that the actual conduct of the defendant in the prior offense would qualify as a violent felony.

Mathis v. United States, --- S. Ct. ---- (2016)

If a state statute provides alternative means for committing one element of a crime, and one of the alternative means would not qualify as a violent felony, then that offense may not be used as a predicate offense and the government may not rely on Shepard documents to prove that the offense did not involve the non-violent felony alternative. In other words, the state offense is categorically not eligible as a predicate. In this case, the state statute provided that the offense of burglary involved breaking and entering into a structure and then defined a structure to include a watercraft or a motor vehicle. That statute was not subject to the modified categorical approach, because the “watercraft” and “motor vehicle” were not separate elements, but were different factual means by which the “structure” element could be satisfied.

Battery by touching is not a violent felony for purposes of the Armed Career Criminal Act.

United States v. King, 853 F.3d 267 (6th Cir. 2017)

Battery by touching is not a violent felony for purposes of the Armed Career Criminal Act.

United States v. Jenkins, 849 F.3d 390 (7th Cir. 2017)

Kidnapping (18 USC § 1201(a)) is not a crime of violence for purposes of § 924(c). Kidnapping does not have “force” as an essential element of the offense.

United States v. Esprit, 841 F.3d 1235 (11th Cir. 2016)

The Florida burglary statute is indivisible, because a jury is not required to reveal what “structure” (if any), the defendant entered. The statute also defines the crime of burglary as entering the curtilage of a house. Thus, this indivisible statute is not generic burglary and is not divisible, so a conviction for Florida burglary may never serve as a predicate for an ACCA enhanced sentence.

United States v. McCloud, 818 F.3d 591 (11th Cir. 2016)

The information that was available to the sentencing judge – Shepard approved documents – did not establish that the defendant’s three prior armed robberies were committed on separate occasions and therefore the defendant could not be sentenced as an Armed Career Criminal.

United States v. Braun, 801 F.3d 1301 (11th Cir. 2015)

In this post-Johnson decision, the Eleventh Circuit holds that the Florida crimes of battery against a pregnant woman and battery against a police officer are not categorically crimes of violence under the elements clause. Though the crimes are divisible (Descamps), the Shepard approved documents in the defendant’s cases did not establish that his offense was committed under the violent crime prong of the state offenses.

Brown v. Rios, 696 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 2012)

The Illinois crimes of compelling a person to become a prostitute and committing a felony while armed, are not crimes of violence under the ACCA.

Jones v. United States, 689 F.3d 621 (6th Cir. 2012)

Reckless homicide under Kentucky law is not a crime of violence.
United States v. Farrell, 672 F.3d 27 (1st Cir. 2012)

In 1980, the defendant was convicted of “breaking and entering” in Massachusetts. Though it was not entirely clear what state statute was the basis for the conviction, the First Circuit held that the government failed to prove that it was a qualifying ACCA predicate offense.

United States v. Owens, 672 F.3d 966 (11th Cir. 2012)

Second degree rape and second degree sodomy under Alabama law are not violent felonies. Neither crime requires the use of force (both crimes are the equivalent of statutory rape which can be entirely consensual – as a practical, even if not legal, matter – and neither offense has an element of force in the statutory elements.

United States v. Harris, 608 F.3d 1222 (11th Cir. 2010)

A Florida conviction for sexual battery of child under the age of sixteen does not constitute a violent felony.

United States v. Alston, 611 F.3d 219 (4th Cir. 2010)

Defendant’s prior conviction under Maryland law for second degree assault did not qualify as a violent felony. Though the facts proffered by the prosecutor at the plea colloquy satisfied the Johnson standard, the defendant did not agree to those facts as part of his Alford plea and there was no other basis to conclude that the prior offense was a violent felony.

United States v. Furqueron, 605 F.3d 612 (8th Cir. 2010)

The Minnesota crime of fleeing a peace officer in a motor vehicle is not a crime of violence.

United States v. McGill, 618 F.3d 1273 (11th Cir. 2010)

Possession of a sawed-off shotgun is not an offense that triggers the Armed Career Criminal Act.

United States v. Johnson, 601 F.3d 869 (8th Cir. 2010)

A Minnesota conviction for fleeing a police officer in a motor vehicle is not a “violent felony” under the Armed Career Criminal Act.

United States v. Tucker, 603 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2010)

The record did not suffice to prove that defendant’s prior offenses were committed on separate occasions.

United States v. Bethea, 603 F.3d 254 (4th Cir. 2010)

A South Carolina conviction or escape does not qualify as a violent felony.

United States v. Sneed, 600 F.3d 1326 (11th Cir. 2010)

In order to determine if the defendant has three prior felony convictions, the sentencing court may not rely on police reports to determine if the three prior felonies were “separate.” Under Shepard v. United States, 544 U.S. 13 (2005), the court may not rely on police reports to determine either the nature of the prior offenses, or the “separateness” of prior offenses.
United States v. Whitson, 597 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2010)

A prior conviction for a conspiracy offense that does not require the commission of an overt act does not qualify as a violent felony that will trigger career offender sentencing. Under the definition of “violent felony” set forth in Begay v. United States, 553 U.S. 137 (2008) (construing the identical provision in the Armed Career Criminal Act) – an offense must require, as an element of the offense, purposeful, violent, and aggressive conduct – a conspiracy, without the commission of an overt act does not qualify.

United States v. Goodpasture, 595 F.3d 670 (7th Cir. 2010)

A California conviction for lewd or lascivious act involving a person under the age of 14 does not qualify as a violent felony, because the state law does not require that the child was harmed in any way, or that force or fraud was used in the commission of the crime.

United States v. Rivers, 595 F.3d 558 (4th Cir. 2010)

A South Carolina conviction for failure to stop for a blue light (i.e., a law enforcement officer attempting to stop the defendant on the highway) does not qualify as a violent felony.

United States v. Christensen, 559 F.3d 1092 (9th Cir. 2009)

A prior conviction in the state of Washington for the offense of statutory rape is not a categorically a violent felony.

United States v. Gordon, 557 F.3d 623 (8th Cir. 2009)

A prior conviction for first degree child endangerment did not qualify as a violent felony.

United States v. Esparza-Herrera, 557 F.3d 1019 (9th Cir. 2009)

A conviction under Arizona law for aggravated assault did not qualify as a crime of violence.

United States v. Walker, 555 F.3d 716 (8th Cir. 2009)

A prior conviction under Minnesota law for auto theft did not qualify as a violent felony under the Armed Career Criminal Act.

United States v. Thornton, 554 F.3d 443 (4th Cir. 2009)

A conviction for statutory rape under Virginia law does not qualify as a violent felony. The state law expressly provides that the offense involves no force. The fact that sexually transmitted diseases and other injuries may result from the commission of this offense, this is not the type of inquiry that Begay permits in deciding what qualifies as a violent felony.

United States v. Smith, 544 F.3d 781 (7th Cir. 2008)

A prior conviction in Indiana for criminal recklessness were not violent felonies for purposes of the Armed Career Criminal Act.

United States v. Rosa, 507 F.3d 142 (2nd Cir. 2007)
The information properly considered by the district court did not support the conclusion that the defendant’s prior juvenile “conviction” for robbery in the first degree qualified as a violent felony.

United States v. Amos, 501 F.3d 524 (6th Cir. 2007)

Possession of a sawed-off shotgun is not a crime of violence that may serve as a predicate for an Armed Career Criminal Act sentence. Six other Circuits have reached a contrary conclusion on this question.

United States v. Flores, 477 F.3d 431 (6th Cir. 2007)

Carrying a concealed weapon is not a predicate crime of violence of purposes of the Armed Career Criminal Act.

United States v. Fuller, 453 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2006)

The government failed to prove that two burglaries were separate offenses. The defendant testified that he and a friend simultaneously entered two different dwellings, that resulted in two felony burglary convictions. The record did not disestablish this contention and an Armed Career Criminal Act enhancement should not have been applied.

United States v. Pressley, 359 F.3d 347 (4th Cir. 2004)

In order to qualify as a “prior conviction” under the Armed Career Criminal Act, the previous conviction must have occurred prior to the commission of the instant gun offense. The Fourth Circuit held that the plain text of 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(1) dictated this result. See also United States v. Richardson, 166 F.3d 1360 (11th Cir. 1999).

United States v. Melton, 344 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defendant’s conviction for burglary in Virginia did not qualify as a categorical ACCA predicate offense. No additional documentation of the nature of the offense was offered to the district court to determine whether the offense qualified under the standard set forth in Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575 (1990).
FIREARMS
(Explosives)

United States v. Graham, 691 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2012)

18 U.S.C. § 844(h)(i) makes it a crime to use an explosive to commit a felony. The Second Circuit held that a .9 millimeter cartridge discharged from a semiautomatic pistol does not constitute an explosive.

United States v. Hull, 456 F.3d 133 (3rd Cir. 2006)

18 U.S.C. § 842(p)(2)(A) makes it a crime to distribute information about explosives with the intent that the explosives would be used in a crime of violence. The Third Circuit holds that the mere fact of making or possessing a pipe bomb is not a “crime of violence.” The term “crime of violence” is defined at 18 U.S.C. § 16 and was construed in Leocal v. Ashcroft, 543 U.S. 1 (2004). The mere possession of a pipe bomb does not involve the use of force.
FIREARMS
(Possession by Prohibited Person)

Note: 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) outlaws the possession of a firearm by numerous categories of “prohibited persons,” including convicted felons, illegal aliens, drug users, and people convicted of domestic violence misdemeanors. This section deals with convicted felons (and domestic violence offenders) and general principles of possession, multiplicity and other frequently litigated topics under § 922(g). Issues relating to illegal aliens and drug users are addressed in the next sections.

Assuming that duress is a defense to possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, or by a person under indictment, it is not unconstitutional to place the burden of proving duress on the defendant.

18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9), applies to misdemeanor offenses of domestic violence that require an element of force. However, the force need include nothing more than an offensive touching and does not require injury, or violent conduct.

A felony conviction from a foreign country may not serve as the predicate for a conviction for possession by a convicted felon.

In a prosecution for being a felon in possession of a firearm, though the nature of the defendant’s prior offense is relevant pursuant to the definition of relevance under Rule 401, the defendant’s willingness to stipulate that he was a convicted felon obviates the need for this evidence and the trial court, pursuant to Rule 403, should accept the stipulation and bar evidence relating to the nature of the prior offense.

_Beecham v. United States_, 511 U.S. 368 (1994)

If a person has been convicted of a federal offense, in order to have his civil rights restored for purposes of Section 921(a)(20), it is not sufficient that the state in which the crime was committed restore the defendant’s rights. Rather, the civil rights must have been restored by the federal government.

In order to be found guilty of being a felon in possession of a firearm – 18 U.S.C. §922(g)(1) – the defendant must have been previously convicted of an offense carrying a sentence of more than one year imprisonment. However, if the predicate conviction was from a state court, then the defendant may defend on the basis that, under that state’s law, he has had his civil rights restored, unless such restoration of civil rights expressly provides that the person may not possess firearms. 18 U.S.C. §921(a)(20). In this case, the defendant’s right to possess firearms had been partially restored: he was allowed to possess rifles, but not handguns. The trial court held that this still was a restoration of rights and that the defendant could not be convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm. The Supreme Court disagreed. The restriction on the defendant’s use of handguns “triggered” the “unless” clause in §921(a)(20) – “unless such restoration of civil rights expressly provides that the person may not possess firearms.” Thus, he could be convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm, even though the firearm he possessed was a rifle.

It is not necessary that the domestic relationship between the defendant and the victim be an essential element of an offense under state law in order to qualify under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9). That relationship must be proven at trial, but is not required to be an essential element of the offense.

United States v. Giannukos, 908 F.3d 649 (10th Cir. 2018)
The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The gun was found in a bedroom that he shared with his girlfriend. The trial court instructed the jury that constructive possession can be proven as follows: “A person who, although not in actual possession, knowingly has the power at a given time to exercise dominion or control over an object, either directly or through another person or persons, is then in constructive possession of it.: This instruction omitted the critical element that the defendant must actually “intend” to exercise control over the weapon. This was reversible error in this case. See also United States
v. Benford, 875 F.3d 1007 (10th Cir. 2017).

United States v. Ramos, 852 F.3d 747 (8th Cir. 2017)
The government executed a search warrant at an apartment where the defendant lived.
There were two bedrooms in the apartment. In both bedrooms, there were men’s clothes in the closet. In one of the bedrooms there was also women’s clothes in the closet. In the bedroom that had the closet with both men’s and women’s clothes, under the mattress there was a pink vibrator and a gun. This evidence was not sufficient to convict the man of possession of the gun. While a conviction for possession may be based on joint possession, there must be proof that the defendant knows the gun is present. Here, the proof did not establish that the defendant slept in that room, or that he was aware the gun was present.

United States v. Pauler, 857 F.3d 1073 (10th Cir. 2017)
A person convicted of a municipal domestic abuse case is not subject to § 922(g)(9)’s gun possession prohibition. Only state cases trigger the prohibition.

United States v. Simpson, 845 F.3d 1039 (10th Cir. 2017)
In the Tenth Circuit, constructive possession requires not only proof that the defendant knew about the guns (or drugs), but also that the defendant intended to exercise control over the items. The failure to include the requirement of intent amounted to plain error for some of the firearm counts of conviction in this case.

United States v. Ways, 832 F.3d 887 (8th Cir. 2016) Ammunition found in the basement of a home where the defendant’s daughter and girlfriend lived was not sufficiently shown to have been possessed by the defendant and his conviction for possession of the ammunition by a convicted felon was reversed. Though the defendant was obviously connected to the house and was present at different times, this evidence was insufficient to support the conviction.

United States v. Ford, 821 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 2016)

If a defendant is charged with aiding and abetting another person’s illegal possession of a firearm based on the other person’s felony record, the government must prove that the defendant knew the other person had a felony record, not just that she had “reason to know.” In this case, the defendant was the wife of the felon, but the trial court failed to properly instruct the jury that the government was required to prove that she knew that his prior record involved a felony conviction.

United States v. Burleson, 815 F.3d 170 (4th Cir. 2016)

Between 1964 and 1985, the defendant had several state felony convictions. When he was paroled in 1988, his civil rights were restored to vote and and serve on a jury. Pursuant to state law, in 1993, his rights under state law to possess a gun were restored. In 1995, the state passed a law that retroactively deprived the defendant of the right to possess a firearm based on his prior state convictions. The Fourth Circuit held that the defendant could not be prosecuted for possessing a firearm as a convicted felon under federal law. The federal statute, 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20), allows a previously convicted felon to possess a firearm, if, under state law, his civil rights were restored, including the right to possess a firearm. That occurred in 1993. The fact that the state later “reneged” did not alter this result.

United States v. Carter, 752 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2014)

This case considers whether a prior conviction of simple assault under Maine law qualifies as a prior misdemeanor offense of domestic violence according to 18 U.S.C. §922(g)(9). In particular, because the state assault offense can be accomplished through reckless conduct, the court considered whether a “reckless” assault can qualify as a prior crime that involves the “use of force.” The First Circuit then considered what documents associated with the prior offense may be considered in deciding whether the prior crime was committed through the use of force, or recklessly. A remand was necessary to further develop the record.

United States v. Bloch, 718 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 2013)

The simultaneous possession of more than one firearm only supports one count of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, even if more than one firearm is possessed and even if there is more than one prior conviction, or reason that the defendant is prohibited from possessing the firearm. Charging the defendant with two counts under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) was multiplicitous.

United States v. Benjamin, 711 F.3d 371 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The defendant was twice found in possession of a firearm. He was a convicted felon. He was charged (and convicted) of two counts of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The Third Circuit, joining the decisions of various other Circuits, held that possession of a firearm is a continuing offense and cannot be prosecuted in several counts, unless there is proof that the possession was not continuous, including constructively.
United States v. Griffin, 684 F.3d 691 (7th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was released from prison and went to live with his parents. His father, an avid hunter, had numerous firearms, including revolvers and shotguns in the house. While executing a search warrant that was designed to locate the defendant’s brother, the police found the guns. The defendant was convicted of possession by a convicted felon. The Seventh Circuit reversed the conviction: there was insufficient evidence that the defendant actually or constructively possessed any of the firearms in the house. The court cited decisions from numerous Circuits that require proof of a substantial connection between a defendant and the contraband when the proof is limited to the defendant’s occupancy of a house that contains the contraband and others live in the same house.

United States v. Mahin, 668 F.3d 119 (4th Cir. 2012)

A defendant may not be convicted and sentenced for the simultaneous possession of ammunition and a firearm under § 922(g)(8).

United States v. Rehlander, 666 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 2012)

The law that makes it a crime for a person who has been committed to a mental institution to possess a firearm (18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(4)) does not apply to a person who was subject to a temporary involuntary emergency hospitalization attended only by an ex parte hearing.

United States v. Sanchez, 639 F.3d 1201 (9th Cir. 2011)

A prior restraining order must explicitly must do more than simply state “no contact” in order to trigger the prohibition on possession of firearm pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(8). The court order must restrain the defendant from the threatened use of physical force against the intimate partner or child.

United States v. Sistrunk, 622 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 2010)

The defense of entrapment is available in a case of being a felon in possession of a firearm. The fact that the offense is essentially strict liability does not contradict the notion that the government may have entrapped the defendant to commit the offense. The evidence in this case, however, was not sufficient to establish an entrapment defense.

Gov’t of Virgin Islands v. Lewis, 620 F.3d 359 (3rd Cir. 2010)

A defendant is entitled to an instruction on the defense of justification in a case involving possession of a firearm by a conviction felon if he can show an imminent threat to the life of the defendant; the defendant did not place himself in the position where his life would be endangered; the absence of reasonable legal alternative to the threat; and that the possession of the firearm did not last longer than necessary. In this case, the defendant satisfied the first three tests, but he kept the gun longer than necessary, so the trial court properly refused to instruct the jury on the law of justification.

United States v. Coleman, 609 F.3d 699 (5th Cir. 2010)
Certain offenses do not qualify as predicate offenses under the felon in possession of a firearm statute, specifically, offenses involving antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, and “other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices.” 18 U.S.C. § 921 (a)(20)(A). In evaluating the defendant’s prior offense in this case, the trial judge viewed a § 371 conspiracy conviction as categorically not included within the definition of “similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices.” This was incorrect, when the prior offense involves a § 371 conspiracy, the focus must be on the underlying object of the conspiracy.

United States v. Katz, 582 F.3d 749 (7th Cir. 2009)

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was in possession (either actually, or constructively) of the firearm that he was alleged to have possessed after having been convicted of a felony.

United States v. Dooley, 580 F.3d 682 (8th Cir. 2009)

The police found a gun in the vehicle that the defendant was driving. The defendant denied knowing the gun was in the car. The court, at the request of the government, instructed the jury that “A person who, although not in actual possession, has both the power and the intention at a given time to exercise dominion or control over a firearm, or over a vehicle in which the firearm is located, is then in constructive possession of the firearm.” This was reversible error. Being in possession of the vehicle (actually, or constructively) does not automatically equate to possession of all the contents of the vehicle.

United States v. Ricks, 573 F.3d 198 (4th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was entitled to rely on a justification defense in this § 922(g) prosecution. The defendant’s roommate came home, armed with a gun, and was acting erratically. The defendant removed the gun from the roommate’s possession and placed the gun out of his reach. The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the justification defense was reversible error.

United States v. Coleman, 552 F.3d 853 (D.C.Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. He offered to stipulate that he was a felon. During voir dire, the judge read the indictment to the jury, including the portion that alleged that defendant had a prior conviction for a crime of violence, that is, robbery with a deadly weapon. Though the defendant did not object, this amounted to plain error and required setting aside the verdict.

United States v. Tann, 577 F.3d 533 (3rd Cir. 2009)

Convictions for both possession of a firearm and possession of ammunition for that firearm violate the double jeopardy clause. See Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81 (1955) (transporting two women across state lines in violation of Mann Act is only one offense).

United States v. White, 552 F.3d 240 (2d Cir. 2009)

The Second Circuit – like other Circuits – has not yet decided whether “necessity” or “fleeting possession” or “innocent possession” are defenses to a charge under § 922(g). (The court does indicate that “fleeting possession” is a recognized defense, though it can only “imagine” scenarios in which it would be a successful defense). The court reviews the body of law that has developed in other Circuits and concludes that even if there were such defenses, the defendant did not qualify in this case for an instruction on any of these defenses.

United States v. Bailey, 553 F.3d 940 (6th Cir. 2009)

There was insufficient evidence to prove that the defendant had constructive possession of a firearm found beneath his seat in the car he was driving. Even when the prosecution relies on a theory of constructive possession, there must be proof that the defendant knew of the presence of the gun. Though he attempted to elude the police when they tried to apprehend him, this could be explained by the fact that he had drugs in his pocket and did not prove that he knew the gun was in the car.

United States v. Hope, 545 F.3d 293 (5th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was arrested in possession of a firearm. It was determined that the same firearm had been used by the defendant the previous day to commit a robbery. There was no evidence that he ever relinquished control of the firearm. This evidence could not support two counts of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon.

United States v. Howell, 531 F.3d 621 (8th Cir. 2008)

The defendant’s prior state “third degree assault” conviction did not qualify as a “misdemeanor crime of domestic violence” because the state law did not require as an element either the use or attempted use of physical force, or the threatened use of a deadly weapon.

United States v. Baker, 523 F.3d 1141 (10th Cir. 2008) (McConnell, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc)

Judge McConnell makes a compelling case why “transitory possession” should be viewed as a defense to a charge of unlawfully possessing a firearm or ammunition. For example, if a convicted felon sees some ammunition on a playground full of children and he picks up the ammunition and brings it immediately to the nearest police station, his conduct should be beyond the scope of the criminal law, perhaps through the invocation of a justification defense. However, Judge McConnell’s view is limited to his dissent from the denial of the defendant’s petition for rehearing en banc. Apparently, only the D.C. Circuit has adopted this view. United States v. Mason, 233 F.3d 619 (D.C. Cir. 2000).

United States v. Hays, 526 F.3d 674 (10th Cir. 2008)

A prior conviction for a domestic battery does not invoke § 922(g)(n) unless the offense requires more than a de minimus touching. There must be more than a simple rude touching in order to qualify. (Note that the Eleventh Circuit, among others, disagrees with this position. United States v. Griffith, 455 F.3d 1339 (11th Cir. 2006)).

United States v. Parker, 508 F.3d 434 (7th Cir. 2007)

A defendant who possesses one firearm may not be convicted of both being a felon in possession of a firearm and being a drug user in possession of a firearm. Two convictions for this one offense are multiplicitous.

United States v. Hollis, 506 F.3d 415 (5th Cir. 2007)
A defendant may not be convicted of both being a felon in possession of a firearm and for being a fugitive in possession of a firearm. This would be multiplicitious.

United States v. Grubbs, 506 F.3d 434 (6th Cir. 2007)

A gun was found in a house where the defendant was a transient occupant. The evidence was insufficient to find him guilty of possessing the weapon. Though another witness testified that the defendant was seen in possession of a weapon that “looked like the gun” that was found in the house, this testimony was not sufficient to sustain the conviction.

Parker v. Renico, 506 F.3d 444 (6th Cir. 2007)

The evidence was insufficient to sustain a state court conviction of the defendant of the offense of possessing a firearm by a convicted felon. The defendant was a passenger in a car occupied by three others. Guns were found in the car after a high-speed chase, but no gun was found in the immediate proximity of the defendant.

United States v. Baker, 508 F.3d 1321 (10th Cir. 2007)

The Tenth Circuit ultimately rejects the notion that a defendant’s explanation of why he possessed a weapon is a defense to a charge of possession by a convicted felon. Absent a viable necessity defense (no legal option), a defendant’s decision to possess a weapon, even if only briefly, cannot be defended on the basis that the defendant had a good explanation for possessing the weapon briefly. A dissenting opinion suggested that the law should provide for a justification defense.

United States v. Mooney, 497 F.3d 397 (4th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel was ineffective in advising the defendant that he should plead guilty in this felon-in-possession case, because there was no justification defense available. The defendant seized the gun from his wife, who was threatening him, and promptly went to the police who were at his place of employment and gave them the weapon.

United States v. Ankeny, 502 F.3d 829 (9th Cir. 2007)

The possession of several weapons by a convicted felon only amounts to one offense of possession of a weapon by a convicted felon unless the government proves that the weapons were acquired or stored at different times and places. The failure to prove this during the entry of the guilty plea required that the counts merged and all but one count should have been dismissed.

United States v. Nobriga, 474 F.3d 561 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) – possession of a weapon by a person with a conviction for domestic violence. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant’s conviction for domestic violence may have involved the reckless use of force which cannot qualify as the use of force under federal law and therefore cannot serve as the predicate offense for a domestic violence misdemeanor in possession prosecution.

United States v. Gardner, 488 F.3d 700 (6th Cir. 2007)
Though intuition might lead one to conclude that to be prosecuted as an aider and abettor, the defendant is not required to have as much of a culpable state of mind as the principal, in certain situations, just the opposite is true. Consider the offense of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. If one is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm, the defendant may not defend on the basis that he did not know that he was a felon. An aider and abettor, however, must be proven to have actually known that the person who he aided in the possession was a felon. See also United States v. Xavier, 2 F.3d 1281 (3d Cir. 1993).

United States v. Groves, 470 F.3d 311 (7th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm (a shotgun). The police never recovered the shotgun, but a neighbor testified that he saw the defendant with the weapon. At trial, in order to prove that the gun had traveled in interstate commerce, the prosecutor asked the expert whether any major shotgun manufacturers were located in Indiana. There are not, and, consequently, the expert opined that if the defendant possessed a shotgun in Indiana, it had to have traveled in interstate commerce. The Seventh Circuit reversed. There was no definition of what a “major manufacturer” of shotguns was, and consequently, there was insufficient proof that the defendant’s shotgun did, in fact, travel in interstate commerce.

United States v. Johnson, 459 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2006)

The Ninth Circuit considers – and rejects – the concept of “innocent” and “transitory possession” defense to a charge of being a felon in possession of a firearm. The court canvasses the law around the country, noting that in at least one Circuit, the defense is available: United States v. Mason, 233 F.3d 619 (D.C.Cir. 2004).

United States v. Chenowith, 459 F.3d 635 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant’s restoration of civil rights under Ohio law was sufficient to restore to him the right to possess a firearm. The determination of whether a restoration of civil rights is sufficient, the court first determines whether § 921(a)(20) is satisfied (essentially all civil rights were restored); and whether the restoration order specifically exempted guns from its restoration.

United States v. Allen, 449 F.3d 1121 (10th Cir. 2006)

Insanity is a viable defense to a charge of being a felon in possession of a firearm, even though the offense is a general intent crime.

United States v. Simpson, 442 F.3d 737 (9th Cir. 2006)

Because the defendant had his civil rights restored and was not classified as a convicted felon under Arizona state law, he could not be convicted under § 922(g)(1).

United States v. Richardson, 439 F.3d 421 (8th Cir. 2006)(en banc)

A defendant who satisfies more than one criterion that disqualifies him from possessing a weapon, but who only possesses one weapon, is only guilty of one offense. In this case, the defendant was a convicted felon and a drug user. Though it is a crime for a felon to possess a weapon and a crime for a drug user to possess a firearm, because he only possessed one weapon, he was only guilty of one offense.
United States v. Weiland, 420 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2005)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce four prior felony convictions in this prosecution for felon in possession of a firearm. Though there was no stipulation of the defendant’s status, it was prejudicial to introduce four priors, including the nature of the specific offenses.

United States v. Jones, 403 F.3d 604 (8th Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the indictment as multiplicitious. The defendant was charged in one count of the indictment with being a felon in possession of a firearm in August and another count of being a felon in possession of the same firearm in October. The crime, however, outlaws the continued possession of the weapon and this cannot multiplied by however many days, or hours, the gun is possessed as a separate crime.

United States v. Chambers, 408 F.3d 237 (5th Cir. 2005)

The indictment alleged that the defendant possessed “rounds” (i.e., bullets) that had traveled in interstate commerce. The rounds were actually manufactured in the same state where they were found in possession of the defendant. The government argued that components of the rounds had traveled in interstate commerce prior to the manufacture of the completed rounds. This amounted to an amendment of the indictment. The evidence was insufficient to support a conviction on these counts of the indictment and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Gunn, 369 F.3d 1229 (11th Cir. 2004)

Though the convictions of other defendants for using a gun during a violent crime and possessing a gun by a convicted felon were supported by the evidence, with respect to one defendant, though he was aware of other participants’ possession of firearms, he was not in constructive possession of any gun and his conviction of possession by a convicted felon, therefore, could not be sustained. The § 924(c) counts could be sustained on the basis that a co-conspirator possessed a gun during the violent crime. A felon-in-possession prosecution, however, requires proof of actual or constructive possession.

United States v. Allen, 383 F.3d 644 (7th Cir. 2004)

Proof that is limited to offering an abstract of judgment (i.e., a prior conviction) that names a person with the same name as the defendant does not establish that the defendant has a prior felony conviction. There must be some other identifying proof that establishes that the defendant is the person with the felony conviction.

United States v. Walters, 359 F.3d 340 (4th Cir. 2004)

A juvenile conviction is not a conviction under Virginia state law and cannot be the predicate for a felon in possession of a firearm offense.

United States v. Gayle, 342 F.3d 89 (2d Cir. 2003)

A felony record in a foreign country does not qualify under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1) as a qualifying felony conviction. Other Circuits, including the Third, Fourth and Sixth have held that foreign felony convictions do qualify.
United States v. Jackson, 368 F.3d 59 (2d Cir. 2004)

A certified copy of a conviction of a person with the same name as the defendant is not sufficient proof, alone, to establish that the defendant is a convicted felon. The defendant did not dispute that he was the person named in the record during the evidentiary portion of the trial, but he did raise the question during the closing argument and again on appeal. The Second Circuit held that the evidence was insufficient to support his conviction.

United States v. Rawlings, 341 F.3d 657 (7th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was the driver for a couple armed bank robbers. He was aware that they possessed guns when the other two exited the car to rob the bank, though there was no evidence that he was aware of their possession of the guns before that time. The trial court instructed the jury that possession had to be “knowing” but did not instruct the jury on the concept of constructive possession, or Pinkerton. In a decision by Judge Posner, the court held that the evidence was insufficient to prove the defendant’s conviction of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The problem, according to Judge Posner was not the instructional error, there was simply insufficient proof that the defendant was, in fact, in either actual or constructive possession of the firearms that his co-defendants possessed. There was no evidence that he purchased the guns, gave them to the conspirators, or encouraged them to be armed. No other evidence suggested that he exercised dominion or control over the guns. With regard to Pinkerton, that concept enables a person to be convicted of an offense committed by someone else in the conspiracy, but it does not authorize the finding of specific elements of some other offense (such as the possession of a weapon) based on a conspirator’s conduct. Thus, the defendant, on a Pinkerton theory, could be found guilty of other offenses of the conspirators, but not, on that theory, of their possession of a firearm.

United States v. Belless, 338 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 2003)

18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9) makes it a crime to possess a firearm if one has a misdemeanor conviction involving domestic violence. The term is defined at 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii). The prior conviction in this case did not qualify. The state statute only required the unlawful touching in a rude, insolent or angry manner, whereas the federal statute requires that the statute involve the use or attempted use of physical force. The court noted that President Nixon’s behavior when confronting Krushchev would qualify as “rude and insolent” and this did not amount to the type of behavior Congress sought to make a predicate offense (even if committed by spouses upon one another). This decision was later overruled in United States v. Castleman, 134 S. Ct. 1405 (2014).

United States v. Daniel, 134 F.3d 1259 (6th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred, but it was harmless error, in permitting the government to introduce evidence relating to the nature of the defendant's prior conviction, despite the defendant's willingness to stipulate that he was a convicted felon. The court also erred in failing to strike the allegations of the prior specific crimes from the indictment.

United States v. Cunningham, 133 F.3d 1070 (8th Cir. 1998)
The trial court erred when it permitted the government to offer evidence of the nature of three prior felonies after he had offered to stipulate to his status as a felon for purposes of the felon-in-possession-of-a-firearm count. The error, however, was harmless.

United States v. Gonzalez, 122 F.3d 1383 (11th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was indicted in Puerto Rico on drug charges, and was later found in possession of a firearm when arrested in Florida. There was no evidence presented by the government that the defendant committed the indicted offense while physically in Puerto Rico, or that he fled Puerto Rico. The evidence established nothing more than that the defendant had a pending charge in Puerto Rico, and he was located in Florida. This does not establish that he was a fugitive. His conviction under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(2) was reversed.

United States v. Dunford, 148 F.3d 385 (4th Cir. 1998)

A person who is disqualified from possessing a firearm by more than one subsection of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) (e.g., felon, drug user, fugitive, illegal alien), may only be convicted of one offense for each possession of a weapon. Moreover, a person who simultaneously possessed more than one gun, as well as ammunition, may only be prosecuted for one count of possessing a firearm by a convicted felon (and drug user). This rule applies unless the government proves that he weapons were stored in different places or acquired at different times.
FIREARMS

(Possession By Illegal Alien)

United States v. Elrawy, 448 F.3d 309 (5th Cir. 2006)

The evidence did not support the defendant’s conviction of being an alien admitted under a nonimmigrant visa who possessed a firearm. 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(5)(B). The defendant, at the time he possessed the firearm, was not admitted under a nonimmigrant visa, because the visa had expired. (He could be prosecuted, however, for being an illegal alien in possession of a firearm).

United States v. Lucio, 428 F.3d 519 (5th Cir. 2005)

The defendant entered the county unlawfully, but had applied for adjustment of his status, during which time he was prepared to remain in the country and work. Given this status, he was not “unlawfully” in the country and could not be found guilty of violating § 922(g)(5).

United States v. Orellana, 405 F.3d 360 (5th Cir. 2005)

18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(5) makes it a crime for a person who is illegally or unlawfully in the United States to possess a firearm. A person who entered the country unlawfully, but who then obtained “temporary protected status” does not qualify as a person unlawfully or illegally in the country.

United States v. Lopez-Perera, 438 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2006)

An illegal alien was stopped at the border and arrested for trying to enter the country illegally. He possessed a firearm. He could not be prosecuted under § 922(g)(5)(A), because he never “entered” the country.
FIREARMS
(Possession By Drug User)

United States v. Augustin, 376 F.3d 135 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of being a drug user in possession of a firearm, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(3). The evidence only established that he had smoked marijuana prior to possessing the weapon. No other evidence was introduced in connection with his drug use. At a minimum, the government must present evidence that the defendant is a regular user of drugs to obtain a conviction under this statute.

United States v. Herrera, 289 F.3d 311 (5th Cir. 2002)

18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(3) makes it a crime to possess a firearm if the defendant is an unlawful user of or addicted to any controlled substance. The Fifth Circuit defined “is an unlawful user” to mean a person who uses narcotics so frequently and in such quantities as to lose the power of self-control. In other words an “unlawful user” is a person who is just short of addiction. The court reached this result by invoking the Rule of Lenity. This decision was reheard en banc and the conviction was affirmed, because the defendant did not properly articulate his objection to the sufficiency of evidence in his Rule 29 motion. 313 F.3d 882 (5th Cir. 2002).
FIREARMS
(Miscellaneous)

McDonald v. Chicago, 130 S. Ct. 3020 (2010)

The Second Amendment, which provides the right to bear arms, applies to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment (according to four Justices) and applies to the states through the Privileges and Immunities Clause (according to Justice Thomas).

Prosecuting a “straw purchaser” – someone who buys a gun for someone else, while stating on the form that the gun is being purchased for himself – is permissible. 18 U.S.C. § 922(a)(6). A prosecution is appropriate, even if the person for whom the gun is actually being purchased could have legally purchased the gun.

United States v. Fernandez-Jorge, 894 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2018)

A required element of the offense of possessing a firearm in a school zone, is that the defendant knew he was in a school zone. Though the convictions of several defendants in this case were affirmed, with respect to one defendant, who did not live in the community, there insufficient evidence that he was aware of the proximity to the school. The First Circuit reversed all defendants’ convictions who were prosecuted on an aiding and abetting theory, because the jury instruction did not comply with Rosemond: The instruction did not require that the aider and abettor knew the crime was to occur within a school zone.

United States v. White, 863 F.3d 784 (8th Cir. 2017)

The Eighth Circuit holds that, pursuant to Staples, the government is required to prove that the defendant knows the characteristic of the firearm that makes it subject to the National Firearms Act.

United States v. Montoya-Gaxiola, 796 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with possession of a sawed-off shotgun. Pursuant to Staples v. United States, the government was required to prove that the defendant knew the characteristics of the firearm that brought it it within the scope of the registration act. The jury instruction did not explain the proper mens rea element.

United States v. Fries, 725 F.3d 1286 (11th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §922(a)(5), which makes it a crime to sell a firearm to a person in another state unless either the seller or purchaser is a licensed firearms dealer. The purchaser in this case was an undercover ATF agent. There was no evidence at trial that the agent was not a licensed firearms dealer. Because this is an essential element of the offense, the conviction was set aside, even though the defendant did not move for a directed verdict.

United States v. Baird, 712 F.3d 623 (1st Cir. 2013)
The defendant purchased a firearm from another person. Several days later, he determined that the gun was stolen and returned it to the seller shortly thereafter. He requested an instruction on the defense of “innocent possession.” Because the evidence was sufficient to support this requested instruction and the content of the instruction was integral to his defense (and not covered by other instructions), the trial court’s refusal to give the instruction was reversible error.

United States v. Haile, 685 F.3d 1211 (11th Cir. 2012)

Two firearms statutes were involved in this case: possessing a firearm with an obliterated serial number and possession of a machine gun in connection with a drug offense. The Eleventh Circuit held that the machine gun offense did not require proof that the defendant knew that the weapon was a machine gun (thus, he could receive a mandatory 30 year sentence, even if he only knew it was a weapon, but did not know it had automatic capability). With regard to the obliterated serial number offense, however, the court held that knowledge that the serial number is obliterated or altered is an essential element of the offense.

United States v. Crooker, 608 F.3d 94 (1st Cir. 2010)

A silencer that was made for an air gun is not a “firearm.”

United States v. Ayala-Garcia, 574 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with possession of a stolen firearm. 18 U.S.C. § 922(j). There was no evidence relating to the method by which the defendant acquired the gun. He was seen giving it to another conspirator, and the circumstances of that transaction were suspicious, but this did not satisfy the government’s burden of proving that he knowingly possessed a stolen weapon.

United States v. Zalapa, 509 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2007)

The possession of a short-barreled machine gun violates two separate provisions of the registration act, 26 U.S.C. §5861. However, only one conviction and one sentence can be imposed for the possession of one weapon, regardless of the number of ways in which its possession if a violation of the registration law.

United States v. Introcaso, 506 F.3d 260 (3rd Cir. 2007)

Firearms, such as short-barreled shotguns, that were manufactured prior to 1900, are not covered by the registration act, if the ammunition designed for that weapon is not being manufactured, nor is readily available. The government argued in this case that the ammunition designed for that weapon is not being manufactured, but regular (and easily available) twelve-gauge shells worked with this particular gun. The Third Circuit held that the statute was ambiguous – it was not clear if the exemption only applied if the ammunition originally designed for the weapon was not available, or if any ammunition that could be used with the weapon was not available. Applying the Rule of Lenity, the court held that the conviction could not be sustained.

United States v. Nieves-Castanos, 480 F.3d 597 (1st Cir. 2007)
Though the defendant was obviously in possession of a machine gun that was in a golf bag in her apartment, and that she knew a weapon was in the golf bag, the government failed to prove that she knew the gun was a machine gun, that is, that the weapon had the characteristics that brought the gun within the statutory definition of a machine gun. The defendant exhibited a guilty knowledge that regarding her possession of the weapon, but this guilty knowledge, itself, was not sufficient to establish that she knew it was a machine gun.

United States v. Michel, 446 F.3d 1122 (10th Cir. 2006)

The defendant had a shotgun in his car that was 17 ½ inches long. A sawed-off shotgun is one with a barrel that is less than 18 inches long. Though the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant knowingly possessed the firearm, it was not sufficient to prove that he knowingly possessed a sawed-off shotgun. The defendant was a passenger in a car and the shotgun was in the backseat. There was no evidence that he ever personally touched the gun.

United States v. Johnson, 381 F.3d 506 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm with an obliterated serial number. The Fifth Circuit held that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was aware that the gun had this characteristic.

United States v. Hammond, 371 F.3d 776 (11th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with manufacturing a firearm without obtaining a license. A firearm is defined as a destructive device, including any explosive device. However, only explosive devices that are designed for use as a weapon, qualify. 26 U.S.C. § 5845(f). Thus a device that explodes is not necessarily a destructive device. The device in this case was made of cardboard and there were no projectiles that would have been expelled had the device been detonated. Nor was there any other evidence that the device could be used as a weapon. Rather, the device was more akin to a firecracker. The district court properly granted a judgment of acquittal.

United States v. Haywood, 363 F.3d 200 (3rd Cir. 2004)

A charge that the defendant possessed a firearm with an obliterated serial number (18 U.S.C. § 922(k)), requires proof that the firearm had an obliterated serial number and proof that the defendant knew the firearm had an obliterated serial number. The trial court erred in this case by instructing the jury that the defendant need only have been shown to know that he was in possession of the firearm. The defendant was also charged with possessing a firearm in or near a school zone (18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(A)). This charge, too, requires proof that the defendant knew that he was in a school zone.

United States v. Batterjee, 361 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was not a citizen and, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(5)(B) was not permitted to possess a firearm. When he went to a store to buy a gun, the dealer asked certain questions, each of which the defendant answered accurately – including the fact that he was not a citizen – and filled out the required forms accurately, as well. The dealer followed up with certain questions relating to his citizenship answer and then sold him the gun. The dealer did not specifically ask, however, whether the defendant was in the United States on a work visa (which was what disqualified him for possessing a firearm). The Ninth Circuit held that the prosecution was barred under the theory of entrapment by estoppel.

DONALD F. SAMUEL · GARLAND, SAMUEL & LOEB, P.C., ATLANTA, GEORGIA · 404-262-2225 · dfs@gsllaw.com

United States v. Collins, 350 F.3d 773 (8th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was charged under 18 U.S.C. § 922(d)(3) with disposing a firearm to a person that was known to be an unlawful user of controlled substances. The trial court instructed the jury that the offense could be proven if the defendant knew or had reasonable cause to believe there was a risk that the recipient would unlawfully use a controlled substance while in possession of the firearms. This amounted to an improper amendment of the indictment. The government is required to prove that the defendant knew or had reasonable cause to believe that the recipient was an unlawful user of a controlled substance.

United States v. McCullough, 348 F.3d 620 (7th Cir. 2003)

Defendant was charged with willfully selling firearms without recording the name, age, and residence of the buyer. 18 U.S.C. § 922(b)(5). At trial, he requested a jury instruction on the lesser record keeping offense. 18 U.S.C. § 922(m). Because it is impossible to violate § 922(b)(5) without also violating § 922(m), the trial court should have given the lesser included instruction. The fact that it is possible to commit record keeping violation without committing the greater offense (for example, by making some other false entry that does not relate to the buyer’s name, age or residence) does not mean that the record keeping offense is not a lesser included offense. Moreover, the lesser offense requires proof that the defendant acted knowingly, while the greater offense requires proof that the defendant acted willfully. This does not preclude the record keeping offense from being characterized as a lesser offense of the false recording offense. The failure to instruct the jury on the lesser offense was reversible error.

United States v. Jackson, 124 F.3d 607 (4th Cir. 1997)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the defendant, charged with possessing an unregistered firearm, had to be shown to have known the characteristics of his sawed-off shotgun that made it a firearm subject to the requirements of the Firearm Act. See Staples v. United States, 511 U.S. 600 (1994). The failure to instruct the jury consistent with Staples, however, was not plain error.

United States v. Polk, 118 F.3d 286 (5th Cir. 1997)

18 U.S.C. § 922(a)(6) makes it a federal crime to provide false information to a licensed firearm dealer in connection with the purchase of a weapon, in an attempt to deceive the dealer with respect to any fact material to the lawfulness of the sale. The Fifth Circuit has previously held that a straw purchaser who buys a weapon on behalf of someone who may not legally purchase the weapon violates this law. United States v. Ortiz-Loya, 777 F.2d 973 (5th Cir. 1985). Here, however, the "straw" purchaser was not purchasing the gun for someone who was not legally allowed to purchase the gun. Rather, he was buying it for the other person simply because the other person did not want it known that he was the actual purchaser. Thus, the "false statement" was not material to the lawfulness of the sale, because the actual purchaser could lawfully purchase the weapon. The § 922(a)(6) conviction was reversed. NOTE: This decision was overruled in Abramski v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2259 (2014).
United States v. Spinner, 152 F.3d 950 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

The evidence did not support a conviction for possessing a semi-automatic assault weapon. 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(30)(B), because the expert who described the weapon that was seized from the defendant did not describe it in the terms of the statute. The fact that the jury could look at the weapon and determine that it had the necessary characteristics did not convince the court to uphold the verdict, because there was no “testimonial guidance” about what feature of the gun the jury should consider and the definition of an assault weapon in the jury instructions would not have provided sufficient information to the jury to determine whether the weapon qualified. Finally, the D.C. Circuit also concluded that there was insufficient evidence to prove that the defendant knew the characteristic of the gun that brought it within the definition of an assault weapon. Staples v. United States, 511 U.S. 600 (1994).
FIREARM OFFENSES
(Use of Firearm... § 924(c))

Abbott v. United States, 131 S. Ct. 18 (2010)
In a unanimous opinion, the Court rejects the Second Circuit decision in Whitley and holds that the § 924(c) consecutive sentence provision applies even if there is another mandatory minimum provision in a related offense, such as the underlying drug offense.

A person who sells drugs in exchange for a gun does not “use” the firearm during and in relation to a drug offense.

If a defendant "uses" a gun as barter for the purchase of cocaine, this qualifies as "use" "in relation to" a drug trafficking crime.

A §924(c) offense can be tried in any district where the underlying crime of violence occurred, even if the gun is not possessed, or used in that district. In this case, the defendant kidnapped the victim and carried him through various states. In one state, Maryland, the defendant possessed a gun in connection with the kidnapping. The defendant was tried in New Jersey, however, one of the states in which the kidnapping occurred, but not in which the defendant ever possessed the gun. The Court holds that venue was proper in New Jersey.

Dean v. United States, 129 S.Ct. 1849 (2009)
If a defendant uses a gun during and in relation to a crime of violence, he will receive a 5-year mandatory minimum sentence. If the gun is brandished, the sentence increases to 7 years. And if the firearm is discharged, the sentence is 10 years. What if the gun discharges by accident? In this case, the Supreme Court holds that the 10-year sentence applies, even if the gun is accidentally discharged. There is no requirement that the defendant intend to discharge the firearm.

Different mandatory minimum sentences apply in §924(c) offenses, depending on what kind of firearm is used. Thus, for example, if the § 924(c) offense is committed with a machine gun, then a thirty-year mandatory minimum sentence applies. In this case, the Supreme Court held that the type of firearm used is an essential element of the offense, not simply a sentencing factor. Therefore, the type of weapon used must be proved to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt in order for the higher mandatory minimum sentence to apply.

United States v. Salas, 889 F.3d 681 (10th Cir. 2018)
In order to be convicted of a § 924(c) offense, the underlying crime must be a drug offense or a “crime of violence.” As with the Armed Career Criminal Act and several other laws, the courts have struggled to make sense of the term “crime of violence” despite the definitions that are in the statutes. In § 924(c)(3)(B), the offense is defined as either a felony that “has as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another” or a felony “that by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense.” The second clause was the focus of this case. The second clause (“a substantial risk that physical force against the person of another may be used”), is also found in 18 U.S.C. § 16(b). The United States Supreme Court, in an immigration case, held that §16(b) is unconstitutionally vague for the same reason that the Armed Career Criminal Act’s “residual clause” was declared vague in Johnson v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2551 (2015). Sessions v Dimaya, 138 S. Ct. 1204 (2018). Based on Dimaya, the Tenth Circuit in this case held that § 924(c)(3)(B) is unconstitutionally vague and the defendant’s conviction of the § 924(c) offense was reversed.

United States v. Gonzales, 841 F.3d 339 (5th Cir. 2016)
18 U.S.C. §924(c) makes it a crime to use and carry a firearm during a drug trafficking offense. 18 U.S.C. § 924(j) makes it a crime to commit murder with a firearm in relation to a drug trafficking offense. A defendant cannot be convicted and sentenced for both offenses. The § 924(c) offense is a lesser included offense of the murder offense.

United States v. Jenkins, 849 F.3d 390 (7th Cir. 2017)
Kidnapping (18 USC § 1201(a)) is not a crime of violence for purposes of § 924(c). Kidnapping does not have “force” as an essential element of the offense.

United States v. Prado, 815 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2016)
The trial court’s instruction on the law of aiding and abetting in this prosecution for a 924(c) violation was plainly erroneous in light of Rosemond v. United States. The instruction focused on the defendant’s aiding and abetting the underlying crime, without addressing the necessary intent to aid and abet the use of a firearm.

United States v. Vichitvongsa, 819 F.3d 260 (6th Cir. 2016)
The defendant used a firearm in the commission of a home invasion which was alleged to have furthered two conspiracies: Hobbs Act and drugs. This only supports one § 924(c) conviction.

United States v. Fuertes, 805 F.3d 485 (4th Cir. 2015)
The defendant was charged with a § 924(c) violation in connection with the offense of sex trafficking by force, fraud, or coercition. 18 U.S.C. § 1591(a). In order to be convicted of a § 924(c) offense, the underlying crime must be a crime of violence, which is defined in § 924(c)(3) as an offense which requires the use of force as an element, or which, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense. The Fourth Circuit held that the crime is “indivisible” under the Descamps v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 2276 (2013) standard, and because the offense can be committed by “fraud” (which is not “force”), the offense does not categorically qualify as a crime of violence. Nor is the offense of sex trafficking by its nature, an offense that involves a substantial risk of physical force. Therefore, a § 924(c) conviction may not be based on the use of a weapon in connection with a sex trafficking offense.

_United States v. Henry_, 797 F.3d 371 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was convicted of a 924(c) violation in connection with an armed robbery based on his aiding and abetting the principal perpetrator. The jury instruction, however, did not comply with _Rosemond_. The instruction failed to require that the government prove that the defendant intended to aid and abet the armed robbery with knowledge that the principal would use a firearm in connection with the armed robbery.

_United States v. Rodriguez-Martinez_, 778 F.3d 367 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant was a passenger in a car. When the car was pulled over, the defendant got out, walked to the corner and made a phone call. Drugs were found in the possession of the driver. The defendant was visibly nervous. A gun was found in the possession of the defendant. The First Circuit held that this evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the drugs. His nervousness did not prove that he knew the driver was in possession of drugs and may just as well have reflected his concern about his own possession of the firearm. In addition, the court reversed the driver’s conviction of possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug offense (the gun was possessed by the passenger). Because there was insufficient evidence that the driver, who possessed the drugs, knew that the passenger possessed a gun, he could not be convicted of the § 924(c) offense.

_United States v. Rentz_, 777 F.3d 1105 (10th Cir. 2015)

In order to be prosecuted for more than one § 924(c) offense, there must be proof that the defendant “used” a gun on separate occasions, not just that he committed two crimes while using a gun.

_United States v. Campbell_, 775 F.3d 664 (5th Cir. 2014)

In order to be found guilty of more than one § 924(c) count, the defendant must have possessed a different gun, even if more than one predicate offense was proven.

_United States v. Carr_, 761 F.3d 1068 (9th Cir. 2014)

The defendant participated in a meeting with other conspirators during which they discussed robbing a credit union. There was no discussion of using guns and no guns were displayed or visible at the meeting. This defendant did not go into the credit union and was not the getaway driver, though he was parked nearby. The district court found that there was sufficient evidence that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy to rob the credit union, but the evidence was insufficient to prove that he knew that guns would be used, even under the _Pinkerton_ doctrine. The Ninth Circuit affirmed.

_United States v. Thomas_, 627 F.3d 534 (4th Cir. 2010)

The decision in _Watson v. United States_ regarding selling drugs in exchange for guns (i.e., that this does not constitute the “use” of a firearm in a drug offense) amounts to a new substantive rule that applies retroactively, including on § 2255 review.
United States v. Diaz, 592 F.3d 467 (3rd Cir. 2010)

There can only be one § 924(c) conviction for each count of conviction of a drug offense. Thus, if there is only one drug offense set forth in the indictment, there can only be one § 924(c) conviction, even if more than one gun is possessed, and even if a gun is possessed on more than one occasion during the course of a drug conspiracy.

United States v. Maye, 582 F.3d 622 (6th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug offense. The plea colloquy (the factual basis), established only that he possessed a firearm and that he also committed a drug offense. There was no suggestion that the gun was possessed to advance or promote the commission of the underlying drug offense. The factual basis was inadequate and the defendant’s questioning of the plea at the time of his sentencing demonstrated that he did not voluntarily enter the plea (and that neither the defense attorney, nor the judge knew the elements of the offense).

United States v. Rush-Richardson, 574 F.3d 906 (8th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking offense, but the jury instruction defined the crime in the language that applies to possession of a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking offense. The “in furtherance” offense requires a greater relationship between the possession of the weapon and the drug crime than the “during and in relation” offense. See also United States v. Brown, 560 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 2009).

United States v. Serafin, 562 F.3d 1105 (10th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with possessing a firearm in furtherance of a crime of violence. The crime of violence that was alleged was the possession of another weapon, an unregistered assault rifle. The Tenth Circuit held that the possession of the unregistered assault rifle is not a crime of violence and therefore the possession of the other weapon could not constitute a § 924(c) offense.

United States v. Hunter, 558 F.3d 495 (6th Cir. 2009)

The indictment charged the defendant with possession of a weapon during and in relation and in furtherance of a drug offense. The phrase “during a drug offense” is a meaningless allegation in the context of §924(c) and the indictment was therefore defective, as were the jury instructions defining the offense.

United States v. Bailey, 553 F.3d 940 (6th Cir. 2009)

There was insufficient evidence to prove that the defendant had constructive possession of a firearm found beneath his seat in the car he was driving. Even when the prosecution relies on a theory of constructive possession, there must be proof that the defendant knew of the presence of the gun. Though he attempted to elude the police when they tried to apprehend him, this could be explained by the fact that he had drugs in his pocket and did not prove that he knew the gun was in the car.

United States v. Castano, 543 F.3d 826 (6th Cir. 2008)
There are two separate § 924(c) offenses. One offense makes it a crime to use or carry a firearm during and in relation to a crime of violence or a drug trafficking crime. The other offense makes it a crime to possess a firearm in furtherance of a crime of violence or a drug trafficking crime. In this case, the defendant was charged with carrying a firearm during an in relation to a drug trafficking crime, but the jury instructions repeatedly referred to “possessing” a firearm. The error in defining the elements of the offense was plain error. See also United States v. Combs, 369 F.3d 925 (6th Cir. 2004); and United States v. Savoires, 430 F.3d 376 (6th Cir. 2005).

United States v. O’Brien, 542 F.3d 921 (1st Cir. 2008)

The type of weapon that is “used” in a § 924(c) offense is an element of the offense, not just a sentencing factor. The type of weapon that is used directly affects the range of sentences that must be imposed. Thus, for example, if the weapon is a machine gun, or an assault weapon, the sentence is considerably longer than if the weapon is a simple revolver. This decision is inconsistent with the decisions from most other Circuits.

United States v. Huntley, 523 F.3d 874 (8th Cir. 2008)

Because the jury was improperly instructed regarding the possibility of convicting the defendant for using a firearm, by virtue of having received a firearm in exchange of drugs, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Kirk, 528 F.3d 1102 (8th Cir. 2008)

Based on Watson, the defendant’s § 924(c) conviction was vacated. Trading drugs to acquire a gun does not amount to using a gun.

United States v. Pruett, 523 F.3d 863 (8th Cir. 2008)

In light of the Supreme Court decision in Watson, the defendant’s § 924(c) conviction, based on his having received a gun in exchange for methamphetamine could not be sustained.

United States v. Cunningham, 517 F.3d 175 (3rd Cir. 2008)

The evidence proved the defendant’s constructive possession of drugs being carried in a bag by his co-conspirator, but did not establish his constructive possession of a weapon that was also in the bag. No evidence was introduced that the defendant knew what was in the bag (other than the drugs).

United States v. Korey, 472 F.3d 89 (3rd Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with using a firearm during and in relation to a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. A correct instruction on the law of conspiracy to distribute cocaine was required. The evidence established that the defendant was asked by a cocaine dealer to kill someone, in exchange for which the dealer would pay the defendant with cocaine. The district court judge instructed the jury that if they found that the defendant agreed to accept cocaine in payment for killing the victim, that is a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. This was erroneous. This instruction failed to explain correctly that a conspiracy to distribute cocaine requires proof of a “unity of purpose” between the conspirators to distribute cocaine and this instruction did not include that concept. Merely accepting payment in the form of cocaine is not the same as sharing a purpose with the dealer to distribute cocaine. Reversible error.

United States v. James, 468 F.3d 245 (5th Cir. 2006)

When the government files a motion pursuant to USSG 5K1.1 and 18 USC § 3553(e), the mandatory minimum sentence of 18 USC § 924(c) is eliminated.

United States v. Ruiz, 462 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir. 2006)

The evidence was insufficient to link the defendant to any of the firearms found throughout the house where methamphetamine was being manufactured. A § 924(c) conviction could not be sustained. While Pinkerton liability is permissible for a § 924(c) prosecution, there was no evidence linking any conspirator to the guns found at the premises.

United States v. Palmer, 456 F.3d 484 (5th Cir. 2006)

An appeal waiver that provides that there will be no appeal of the sentence does not preclude an appeal that targets the legitimacy of the guilty plea. In this case, the factual basis for the offense of possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime was insufficient. At the plea colloquy, the defendant acknowledged possessing the weapon and stated that he possessed it to “protect myself” but denied that he dealt drugs out of his apartment, which was where the gun was found.

United States v. Thompson, 454 F.3d 459 (5th Cir. 2006)

The evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant aided and abetted a bank robbery and that he was the getaway driver. The evidence did not sufficiently prove, however, that he was aware that his colleague would use a gun during the course of the robbery and, consequently, his conviction under § 924(c) was reversed.

The law provides for three statutory sentencing ranges in a § 924(c) case, depending on whether the gun is “used,” brandished, or discharged. The D.C. Circuit holds that if the gun is accidentally fired, this does not trigger the “discharge” higher range. See also United States v. Dare, 425 F.3d 634 (9th Cir. 2006). In short, the statute contains an implicit intent requirement. This case was OVERRULED by Dean v. United States, 556 U.S. 568 (2009).

United States v. Rios, 449 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir. 2006)

Evidence that the defendant possessed a sawed-off shotgun at his house in close proximity to various drug related documents, including a price list and other documents was not sufficient to support a § 924(c) conviction in the absence of evidence that he possessed drugs at the residence, or sold drugs at the residence.

United States v. Wallace, 447 F.3d 184 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant used a firearm to commit a drive-by shooting that was prompted by a dispute involving his drug empire. The government charged the defendant with two § 924(c) violations: using the gun in connection with the drive-by shooting and using the gun in connection with the drug conspiracy. The Second Circuit held that only one § 924(c) conviction could be sustained based on one use of the gun.

United States v. Savoires, 430 F.3d 376 (6th Cir. 2005)

18 U.S.C. § 924(c) sets forth two different crimes: (1) using or carrying a firearm during an in relation to a drug trafficking crime; and (2) possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. These two separate offenses may not be set forth in one count of the indictment.

United States v. Zhou, 428 F.3d 361 (2d Cir. 2005)

In a §924(c) firearm prosecution, the evidence of the underlying felony must establish its commission beyond a reasonable doubt, because the commission of the underlying felon is an essential element of the firearm offense. Nevertheless, it is not necessary that the defendant actually be convicted of the predicate offense.

United States v. Groce, 398 F.3d 679 (4th Cir. 2005)

If a gun is brandished, a mandatory seven year sentence is required by 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1)(A)(ii). In this case, the defendant told the bank teller that he had a gun and later a gun was found in the defendant’s purse. This evidence was insufficient to invoke the “brandishing” mandatory minimum. A remand for further fact-finding was necessary in order to determine whether this sentencing enhancement applied.

United States v. Harris, 397 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2005)

Apprendi requires that in order to invoke higher mandatory minimum sentences based on the type of gun possessed by the defendant, the government must allege the type of gun in the indictment. The Court distinguished Harris v. United States, 536 U.S. 545 (2002), which held that whether the defendant “brandished” or “discharged” a weapon is a sentencing factor that is not subject to Apprendi. Harris was later overruled by Alleyne v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 2151 (2013).

United States v. Mann, 389 F.3d 869 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendants were arrested at a campsite where they were manufacturing methamphetamine. Inside a locked safe in the truck were guns. The government failed to prove that the guns were possessed in furtherance of a drug trafficking offense. The fact that the gun was illegal (a pen gun) and that the defendant was felon who could not possess a gun did not prove that the gun was used in furtherance of a drug offense.

United States v. Montano, 398 F.3d 1276 (11th Cir. 2004)

Limiting Smith, the Eleventh Circuit holds that if the defendant provides the drugs in exchange for a gun, this does not constitute using the gun in connection with a drug offense. Smith involved a defendant who provided the gun in exchange for drugs. This case involves providing the drugs in exchange for the gun. The former defendant “used” the gun in a drug offense, the latter defendant did not. In this case, the gun was actually to be provided by an undercover agent and the gun was never, in fact, produced by the agent or possessed by the defendant.
United States v. Bradley, 381 F.3d 641 (7th Cir. 2004)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to carrying a firearm in connection with a drug offense. The factual basis offered by the government recited that the defendant carried the gun in a car that was transporting marijuana. The indictment, however, alleged that he carried the gun in connection with a cocaine offense. The defendant then moved to withdraw the plea on the basis of this variance. The trial court erred in denying the defendant the right to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Combs, 369 F.3d 925 (6th Cir. 2004)

In the 1998 amendment to § 924(c), Congress intended to create two separate violations: (1) using or carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime; and (2) possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. “Use” requires active employment of the firearm by the person committing the drug offense. “In furtherance” requires proof that the firearm was possessed to advance or promote the commission of the underlying drug trafficking crime. An example of “use” without “in furtherance” would be if a buyer of drugs stole a gun from his dealer’s house during a drug deal. Thus, the two crimes are, in fact, conceptually different. The indictment in this case mismatched the elements of these two offenses. The indictment charged the defendant with “possessing a weapon during and in relation to a drug offense.” The indictment was fatally defective because it failed to allege the elements of an offense. In addition, with regard to a separate count, though the indictment properly alleged the elements of the possession offense, the jury instructions improperly “amended” the indictment by setting forth elements from the “use” prong of the statute (during and in relation to a drug offense) rather than the “possession” prong (in furtherance). The conviction on this count, therefore, had to be reversed.

United States v. Reynolds, 367 F.3d 294 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with robbing three banks. The victims never witnessed his possession of a firearm, however. When he was arrested he made the statement that he “always had that gun with him” and that he “never intended on using the gun either on a victim teller or on the police but on himself in the event that he got caught.” These uncorroborated confessions by the defendant were not sufficient to sustain a §924(c) conviction.

United States v. Cartwright, 359 F.3d 281 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was a knowing “lookout” for a drug transaction (as opposed to some other offense) and therefore his convictions for being a member of a drug conspiracy and for aiding and abetting the drug offense were reversed on sufficiency grounds. The government failed to prove that the defendant knew specifically that the illegal activity in which he was participating involved drugs rather than some other form of contraband. The court notes several other Third Circuit cases that have overturned drug conspiracy and aiding and abetting convictions because of the absence of evidence that the defendant agreed to participate in the specific crime alleged in the indictment. Because the defendant’s § 924(c) conviction required proof that he knew that he was engaged in a drug offense, that conviction was reversed, as well. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Walters, 351 F.3d 159 (5th Cir. 2003)

The defendant delivered a home-made bomb to a military base. Two counts of the indictment charged that he (1) used the bomb to assault a federal officer and (2) used a bomb to damage a federal building. At sentencing, the court relied on the second conviction to impose a mandatory life sentence. This was error. There was only one bomb, which detonated only once. Relying on Phipps, the Fifth Circuit held that only conviction could be sustained for this offense.

United States v. Phipps, 319 F.3d 177 (5th Cir. 2003)

The defendants used a gun to commit a carjacking and kidnapping. Only one § 924(c) conviction is supported by this evidence. In this case, the gun was only used once, during the commission of the multiple crimes.

United States v. Garcia-Torres, 280 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002)

Though the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant participated in a kidnapping and murder, there was insufficient proof that he was aware that the crimes were designed to further (or were in any way related to) his colleagues’ drug enterprise. He could not be convicted of conspiracy of possession with intent to distribute cocaine. For the same reason, he could not be convicted of a § 924(c) count where there is insufficient proof of his participation in the underlying drug offense.

United States v. Canady, 126 F.3d 352 (2d Cir. 1997)

At the time the defendant was arrested, he was sitting on a chair that had two pistols hidden under the cushions. This evidence did not suffice to establish either that the defendant "used" or "carried" the weapons in connection with the drug offense. However, there was additional evidence that the defendant had carried the weapon earlier, so the conviction could be supported on that basis.

United States v. Tolliver, 116 F.3d 120 (5th Cir. 1997)

Bailey held that § 924(c)(1) requires evidence sufficient to show an active employment of the firearm by the defendant, a use that makes the firearm an operative factor in relation to the predicate offense. The mere possession of firearms for the protection of, or to embolden, an offender is not enough to constitute "use" under §924(c)(1).

United States v. Mount, 161 F.3d 675 (11th Cir. 1998)

The government failed to prove that the defendant “used” the firearm as defined in Bailey. Moreover, though the gun was found in the defendant’s house, this did not establish that he “carried” the firearm in connection with a drug offense. There was no showing that the gun was transported at any time during and in relation to the underlying drug offense.

United States v. Kubosh, 120 F.3d 47 (5th Cir. 1997)

The trial court’s pre-Bailey instruction was plain error.
United States v. Polk, 118 F.3d 286 (5th Cir. 1997)

The defendant carried a shotgun with him while he negotiated with undercover agents for the purchase of explosives that he planned to use to blow up federal buildings. The underlying crimes were "attempt" crimes that did not mature into an "attempt" until after the discussion occurred during which the defendant possessed the weapon. Thus, the possession of the weapon was not "in relation to" a crime of violence.

United States v. Westmoreland, 122 F.3d 431 (7th Cir. 1997)

An undercover agent gave a gun to the defendant in exchange for cocaine that was provided by the defendant. This does not amount to "use" of the gun by the defendant. Under Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223 (1993), if the defendant trades a gun for drugs, he has "used" the gun, but when he receives a gun from an undercover agent, he has not "used" the gun, according to the Seventh Circuit. (The court notes that if the defendant received the gun in exchange for drugs from a co-defendant, not an undercover agent, he could be found to have aided and abetted the co-defendant's use of the gun. But the court chose not to decide this question).

United States v. Perez, 129 F.3d 1340 (9th Cir. 1997)

When the police went to one defendant's apartment to arrest him, he was sitting on the couch. When he stood up, a gun was discovered where he had been sitting. This does not satisfy Bailey's standard for use of a gun. With regard to another defendant, the indictment charged him with using three guns. The sentence would be dramatically different if the defendant used an assault weapon, versus a pistol. In this situation, the trial court must submit a special verdict form to the jury to determine which gun(s) they unanimously agreed the defendant used.

United States v. Sheppard, 149 F.3d 458 (6th Cir. 1998)

Defendant’s § 924(c) “carrying a firearm” conviction was predicated on proof that cocaine and a gun was found in a bedroom when the defendant was arrested, coming out of the bathroom. The government argued that he must have carried the gun into the bedroom at some point in time. The court rejected this argument and found that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to support a “carrying” conviction under §924(c).

United States v. Schmalzried, 152 F.3d 354 (5th Cir. 1998)

The government conceded that the defendant’s possession of a firearm did not qualify as “use” under Bailey. The government argued, however, that the gun was carried in connection with a drug offense. However, in order to qualify under the “carry” prong of § 924(c), the gun must have been carried in connection with the commission of the drug offense. Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223 (1993). It is not enough that the firearm be connected with the offense – the “carrying” of the firearm must also be related to the offense.

United States v. Sanders, 157 F.3d 302 (5th Cir. 1998)

Evidence that a firearm was found under a porch three feet from where cocaine was hidden does not establish a § 924(c) “carry” offense. (This case involves a remand of a §2255 petition for further proceedings where the defendant claimed actual innocence after having entered a guilty plea).
FIRST AMENDMENT

The Stolen Valor Act, 18 U.S.C. § 704(b) violates the First Amendment. The law makes it a crime to falsely claim to have been awarded military awards. The law focuses on the content of speech and therefore must fit within one of the limited categories of speech that may be prohibited.

The Supreme Court upheld the “material support for terrorist organizations” law, 18 U.S.C. § 2339B. The statute makes it a crime to provide material support – including money, services, or personnel – to a designated terrorist organization. Even if the support is designated for humanitarian aid, or consists of medical supplies, the law outlaws providing this type of material support. The government successfully persuaded the court that providing “humanitarian assistance” allows the terrorist organization to spend its resources on other projects, rather than having to pay for medical supplies; thus, providing any kind of support does, in fact, aid the terrorists’ dangerous activities. The Court held that the law does not violate the First Amendment’s association, or free speech guarantees and is not unconstitutionally vague.

The Supreme Court upheld the child pornography pandering provision that had earlier been held unconstitutional by the Eleventh Circuit. The statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2252A(a)(3)(B) makes it a crime to solicit, or to offer to sell or distribute material that is purported to be child pornography. The Court rejected the defendant’s claim that it violates the First Amendment to make it a crime to offer to sell or distribute material as child pornography, if, in fact, the material being offered for sale is not, in fact, child pornography. The Court also rejected a Fifth Amendment vagueness challenge.

The Supreme Court holds that the “virtual” pornography provision contained in the 1996 Child Pornography Prevention Act is unconstitutional. This provision is not intrinsically related to the protection of children or to the sexual abuse of children, because, by definition, no children are involved in the production of the images. In addition, the statute is defective because it does not incorporate the community standards test of obscenity requiring that the artistic merit of a work be judged considering the work as a whole.

The Child Online Protection Act is not unconstitutionally overbroad just because it uses a community standards test to regulate speech on the World Wide Web.

A state may outlaw cross-burning, as long as an essential element of the offense is the intent to intimidate any person or group of persons. Cross-burning, per se, however, is protected First Amendment expression.

A local ordinance which banned the cruel or ritualistic killing of animals – but which exempted killing for purposes of food consumption – violated the First Amendment in light of the discriminatory use of the ban against religious activity. The ordinance virtually banned activity which was prompted by a religious motivation, but permitted the same conduct if it was not prompted by a religious motivation.

A statute which enhanced penalties if the crime was motivated by the race, religion or other protected status of the victim did not violate the First Amendment.

A city ordinance of St. Paul prohibited the display of a symbol which one knows or has reason to know “arouses anger, alarm, or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender.” This statute was unconstitutionally content-based.

At the defendant’s death penalty trial, evidence of his membership in a white racist organization was introduced. His affiliation with this group had nothing to do with the crime. The introduction of this evidence violated the defendant’s First Amendment rights.

New York’s “Son of Sam” law which requires that publishers turn over proceeds of a convict’s book to an escrow account for the benefit of any victim is a violation of the First Amendment.

A state bar rule which prohibits an attorney from making certain extrajudicial statements to the press was void for vagueness.

The First Amendment does not prohibit cities from banning non-obscene nude dancing.

The defendants were convicted of solicitation on posted premises. The Supreme Court upholds the conviction. Although solicitation is a recognized form of speech, the government may regulate such activity on its property to an extent determined by the nature of the relevant forum.

The Free Exercise Clause permits the State to prohibit sacramental peyote use and may deny unemployment benefits to persons discharged for using peyote. See Francis v. Mineta, 505 U.S. 266 for future developments in this area. Also, see 42 USC § 2000bb, enacted three years after Smith.

It is a violation of the First Amendment to create a licensing scheme for sexually oriented businesses that neither requires a prompt judicial review of the municipality’s licensing decision nor provides for the municipality to make a decision within a specified and reasonable time.

Sable Communications of California v. F.C.C., 492 U.S. 115 (1989)

The Supreme Court holds that the statute which prohibits “Dial-a-Porn” is constitutional insofar as it applies to “obscene” messages, but not insofar as it applies to “indecent” messages.

The Supreme Court holds that the Texas flag desecration crime did not pass First Amendment muster.

United States v. Stevens, 130 S. Ct. 1577 (2010)

The statute (18 U.S.C. § 48) that criminalized the making, sale or possession of certain “depictions of animal cruelty” was so overbroad that it violated the First Amendment on its face.

United States v. Alvarez-Nunez, 828 F.3d 52 (1st Cir. 2016)

Though this is a sentencing decision, and only peripherally a First Amendment case, the court addressed the issue of whether a defendant’s music could be a relevant factor at sentencing, and thus may be a case worth noting when the government introduces such things as rap lyrics to prove a defendant’s predisposition, etc. The First Circuit held that a defendant’s music should not be any more relevant to a sentencing decision than an actor’s portrayal of a sadistic character.

United States v. Swisher, 811 F.3d 299 (9th Cir. 2016)

The reasoning in United States v. Alvarez, noted above, which invalidated a statute prohibiting lying about being awarded military medals, also applies to a statute that criminalizes the unauthorized wearing of such medals.

United States v. Caronia, 703 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2012)

The Second Circuit holds that prosecutions based on “off-label” promotion violates the First Amendment. The defendant’s were charged with promoting the off-label use of certain drugs (i.e., promoting the use of a drug that was approved by the FDA for one purpose, but advocating its use for another purpose). While it is perfectly legal for a doctor to prescribe a drug approved for a purpose other than the use for which the FDA approved the drug, it is not legal for the drug manufacturer to promote the drug’s use for any purpose other than the approved purpose. The Second Circuit held that this violates the First Amendment.

United States v. Marcavage, 609 F.3d 264 (3rd Cir. 2010)

The defendant’s citation for violating a “verbal permit” to conduct his abortion protest at a certain location (other than the public forum he had chosen) violated the First Amendment.

United States v. Alvarez, 617 F.3d 1198 (9th Cir. 2010)

The Stolen Valor Act, 18 U.S.C. § 704(b), (c) makes it a crime to falsely represent oneself either verbally, or in writing, to have been awarded any decoration or medal authorized by Congress for the Armed Forces. The Ninth Circuit held that this statute violates the First Amendment, because it does not require any fraudulent intent or anything more than a simple false statement. Merely telling a lie cannot, without more, be a criminal offense. Affirmed by the Supreme Court, as noted above.

_United States v. Stevens_, 533 F.3d 218 (3rd Cir. 2008)

The defendant was charged with selling visual depictions of animal cruelty (dog fighting). The Third Circuit concluded that the defendant’s conduct was protected by the First Amendment and the statute which the defendant allegedly violated, 18 U.S.C. § 48, is unconstitutional.

_Chaker v. Crogan_, 428 F.3d 1215 (9th Cir. 2005)

A California state law makes it a crime to file a false allegation of misconduct against a police officer. It is not a crime, however, to file a false report in support of a police officer. The Ninth Circuit holds that this “view point” discrimination violates the First Amendment thus invalidating the criminal provision.

_Cooper v. Dillon_, 403 F.3d 1208 (11th Cir. 2005)

A Florida state law that makes it a crime to disclose information obtained in an internal investigation of a law enforcement officer violates the First Amendment.

_United States v. Cassel_, 408 F.3d 622 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was charged with interfering with a sale of federal land by intimidation (18 U.S.C. § 1860). He defended on First Amendment grounds. The Ninth Circuit held that the government must prove that the defendant subjectively intended to intimidate the victim. Absent this requirement, the First Amendment would bar a prosecution. The trial court’s failure to properly instruct the jury on this element – subjective intent to intimidate – was harmful error.

_American Civil Liberties Union v. Ashcroft_, 322 F.3d 240 (3rd Cir. 2003)

On remand from the Supreme Court (535 U.S. 564) which upheld certain portions of the “Child Online Protection Act” 47 U.S.C. § 231, the Third Circuit found other provisions unconstitutional. First, because the Internet has no geographical limits, the Act is too broad in invoking “community standards” for determining what constitutes pornography. Second, the Act’s definition of “material harmful to minors” fails to allow for an evaluation of the material in context, thus the “taken as a whole” definition fails to meet First Amendment strictures. _See also_ _American Civil Liberties Union v. Mukasey_, 534 F.3d 181 (3rd Cir. 2008).
FLIGHT EVIDENCE

United States v. Al-Sadawi, 432 F.3d 419 (2d Cir. 2005)

The trial court improperly permitted the government to introduce evidence that the defendant’s wife purchased plane tickets out of the country for herself and the defendant. There was no evidence linking the defendant to his wife’s activity and mere speculation of flight is not a sufficient predicate for introducing the evidence.
FOOD AND DRUG ACT VIOLATIONS

United States v. Farinella, 558 F.3d 695 (7th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with wire fraud and introducing misbranded food in interstate commerce in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 331(a). The defendant purchased a million bottles of salad dressing that had a label that stated, “best when purchased by” a certain date and then pasted another label over that label that extended the date by approximately one year. The government contended at trial that the salad dressing “expired” on the original date, but this was not true. The “best when purchased by” date was not an expiration date. The salad dressing did not expire and was not rancid or unhealthy if purchased after the “best when purchased by” date. There was no evidence introduced at trial what was meant by “best when purchased by” or whether this was a decision made by the manufacturer to generate sales quicker (as opposed to having anything to do with the quality of the food).
FORCED LABOR

United States v. Toviave, 761 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2014)

Requiring children to perform household chores, even if it is accompanied by instances of child abuse, does not constitute the crime of forced labor in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1589.
FORFEITURE

(Attorneys Fees)

Attorney’s fees are forfeitable.

Attorney’s fees are forfeitable.

_Luis v. United States_, 136 S. Ct. 1083 (2016)

The government may not seize assets prior to trial that are only subject to forfeiture on the basis of the “substitute asset” provision of the forfeiture laws, if the money is needed to pay for an attorney. Thus, pursuant to _Kaley_, the government may seize proceeds prior to trial and hold them pending the completion of trial, the government may not seize substitute assets that are not traceable to the criminal conduct prior to trial.

In this case, the Supreme Court reviewed an Eleventh Circuit decision that addressed whether a defendant was entitled to challenge a pretrial restraint of his assets if the assets were necessary to retain counsel. The Court concluded that a defendant does have the right to challenge whether the restrained assets represented proceeds of the conduct that is the subject of the indictment, but a defendant does not have the right to challenge whether there is probable cause to believe that the defendant engaged in the illegal conduct or, whether the conduct was illegal. Because the grand jury already has decided the question of probable cause, no further inquiry into the legality of the conduct is required or permitted. Again, however, the defendant is permitted to challenge whether the restrained assets were derived from that conduct.

_United States v. Kahn_, --- F.3d --- (10th Cir. 2018)

Refining its earlier decision in _United States v. Jones_, discussed below, the Tenth Circuit held that a defendant can challenge a pre-hearing seizure of assets that are necessary to retain counsel (even if they are traceable to the alleged illicit conduct) even if there has not been a showing that the defendant has “no” other assets. That language, in _Jones_, was taken too literally. The question is whether the defendant has sufficient other assets to hire retain counsel, not whether he has any other assets.

_United States v. Marshall_, 872 F.3d 213 (4th Cir. 2017)

Seeking to extend the rationale of _Luis_, the defendant in this case sought to use assets that were subject to a substitute asset forfeiture order to retain appellate counsel. The Fourth Circuit held that once the defendant was convicted, the substitute assets that were needed to satisfy the forfeiture judgment were no longer “his” money and could not be used to retain private appellate counsel.

_United States v. Chamberlain_, 867 F.3d 459 (4th Cir. 2017)
Joining various other Circuits, the Fourth Circuit holds that the government may not seize substitute assets prior to trial.

United States v. Chittenden, 848 F.3d 188 (4th Cir. 2017)

In Luis, discussed above, the Supreme Court held that substitute assets may not be seized pretrial if the funds are needed to hire an attorney. (Substitute assets are assets of the defendant that are not traceable to the alleged illicit conduct, but will be needed to pay any judgment in the event of a conviction and forfeiture judgment). The Supreme Court did not answer the question whether substitute assets may be seized pretrial if the money is not needed for an attorney. Most Circuits (as discussed below in the topic Forfeiture (Seizures)) had held that substitute assets may not be seized pretrial based on the statutory interpretation of the substitute asset provision. 21 U.S.C. § 853(p). The Fourth Circuit, however, before Luis was decided held that substitute assets may be seized pretrial. In this post-Luis decision, the court reiterated that substitute assets may be seized pretrial if the money is not needed to retain counsel of choice. But see Chamberlain, discussed above.

United States v. Watts, 786 F.3d 152 (2d Cir. 2015)

The defendant’s attorney took an assignment of the defendant’s interest in certain bank accounts prior to trial. At the time, the district court had conducted a hearing and determined that the government had not established in a pretrial hearing that some of the money in the account was subject to forfeiture. After the hearing, however, the money remained in an account of the court in order to resolve competing claims to the money. At trial, the jury determined that all the money was subject to forfeiture. The Second Circuit held that the attorney was arguably a bona fide purchaser for value who had a valid claim to the money in a post-trial ancillary proceeding pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 853(n). The court reviews at some length various issues relating to the “relation back” principle, as well as New York fraudulent conveyance law.

United States v. Bonventre, 720 F.3d 126 (2d Cir. 2013)

The Second Circuit recognizes a defendant’s right to challenge a pretrial seizure of funds if the defendant needs the funds to hire an attorney. The procedure authorized by United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991), requires that the court determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the defendant committed the crimes that provide the basis for the forfeiture and that the contested funds are properly forfeitable. In this case, the seizure occurred in a civil forfeiture action. The Second Circuit held that the same procedure applies where the assets are tied up in a civil case. However, the court also held that the defendant must make a showing that the money is needed to hire counsel and must do so with some proof, not a simple claim that the money is needed. In addition, the court held that the defendant is not required to make a preliminary showing that the money was illegitimately restrained. That is part of the Monsanto hearing and is not a showing that the defendant must make in order to trigger a hearing.

United States v. E-Gold Ltd., 521 F.3d 411 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

If the government seizes a defendant’s assets prior to trial, the defendant is entitled to a post-seizure adversarial hearing to contest the probable cause that they committed the underlying offense and that the assets are subject to forfeiture, if the money is needed to hire an attorney.
This case includes an extensive discussion of the forfeiture / attorney’s fees issues that arise in a criminal forfeiture case. This decision did not survive Kaley v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1090 (2014).

United States v. Jarvis, 499 F.3d 1196 (10th Cir. 2007)

Placing a lis pendens on property that the government claimed it would seek to forfeit as “substitute assets” was not proper under New Mexico law. Under New Mexico law, a lis pendens is only appropriate if the real estate itself is the focus of the action and the party claims a present interest in the property. Substitute assets, however, are only recoverable as part of a money judgment against the defendant. The forfeiture component of the criminal case does not constitute an action “affecting title” to the property, which is required in order to file a lis pendens under New Mexico law. The Tenth Circuit also notes that the pretrial seizure of substitute assets is not permissible under the criminal forfeiture provisions. Note that this issue was litigated pretrial in connection with the defendant’s efforts to sell the property in order to raise money to pay attorney’s fees.

United States v. Bailey, 419 F.3d 1208 (11th Cir. 2005)

F. Lee Bailey accepted money from his client and disbursed some of it to other lawyers and kept the balance for his fee. The government filed a forfeiture action against the money and the Eleventh Circuit had previously held that the money was subject to forfeiture – but it was gone. In the earlier opinion, the court had suggested that Bailey could be sued for conversion, based on the theory that the “relation back” doctrine meant that the money was forfeitable to the government when it was unlawfully obtained by the criminal. The government took the hint and sued Bailey for conversion. On appeal from that case, the Eleventh Circuit held that the government could not rely on a conversion theory. The central question (under Florida law) is whether the government had a right of immediate possession of the asset that was allegedly converted when the act of conversion occurred. Despite the relation back doctrine, the government did not have the right to immediate possession of the money at the time that Bailey spent the money. The government’s right of possession did not accrue until after the forfeiture judgment was entered.

United States v. Saccoccia, 354 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2003)

The government could not seize attorney’s fees that had been paid and spent by the attorneys as substitute assets in this RICO case. The district court concluded that the attorneys did not know the money represented proceeds of money laundering until after the client was convicted. The government argued that the attorneys’ knowing violation of a pre-trial restraint of the defendant’s assets justified entering a judgment against the lawyers. With regard to substitute assets, the First Circuit wrote that the forfeiture statute does not provide an avenue through which the government may reach a third party’s untainted assets as a substitute for tainted assets which the third party had already transferred prior to the date of forfeiture. Back in the District Court, the lower court held the lawyers in contempt (civilly) until they returned the money. 342 F.Supp.2d 25 (2004). But on appeal, the First Circuit reversed the contempt order, concluding that the freeze order did not unambiguously block the lawyers from accepting the fees. 433 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2005).
The government is only required to establish probable cause in order to obtain a pretrial order enjoining the sale or disposal of assets seized for civil forfeiture under 18 U.S.C. § 983(j)(1)(A). The claimant unsuccessfully argued that the government was required to establish the forfeitability of the assets by a preponderance of the evidence. The probable cause standard applies even when the claimant contends that he needs the assets to retain an attorney. The court also noted that most Circuits (though not the Eleventh) have held that some type of pre-trial post-seizure hearing may be appropriate to determine whether restrained assets are needed to pay attorney’s fees.

A post-seizure hearing should be held when money is seized and frozen (pre-judgment) under the forfeiture laws to determine if money should be released to enable the claimant / defendant to hire criminal counsel.

The defendant was indicted on charges of fraud and money laundering related to his alleged Medicare fraud. The indictment sought the forfeiture of $31 million in various accounts. The trial court ordered the freezing of accounts containing $20 million. The Seventh Circuit reached the following conclusions: (1) Protective orders entered pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 982(b)(1) are immediately appealable; (2) property that is alleged to be involved in (or traceable to) money laundering is subject to pre-trial seizure. The Court of Appeals held that the pre-trial seizure provisions are not limited to drug offenses. When § 982(b)(1) states that pre-trial seizure procedures are governed by 21 U.S.C. §853(e), this refers to the procedure by which seizures should be handled – it is not a limitation on what can be seized. (3) If the restrained money was needed to retain an attorney, a post-indictment hearing may be required (and a pre-indictment hearing is statutorily required) though the defendant made an inadequate showing in this case. (4) The court declined to decide whether there was a Due Process right to a post-seizure hearing. The court noted numerous decisions in other Circuits that ruled both ways on this topic: United States v. Crozier, 777 F.2d 1376 (9th Cir. 1985); United States v. Roth, 77 F.3d 1525 (7th Cir. 1996); United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991); United States v. Bissell, 866 F.2d 1343 (11th Cir. 1989). (5) The restraint on the defendant’s wife’s property was the proper subject of an appeal and was not proper. The wife was not a party in the district court and could not be restrained from transferring her own assets.

The defendant was indicted for health care fraud, 18 U.S.C. § 1347, and the indictment alleged that certain real and personal property was subject to forfeiture, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 982(a)(6). Post-indictment, the government moved to freeze certain assets – $1.5 million – pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 853(e)(1)(A). The district court denied the defendant’s motion for a pre-trial hearing. The defendant argued that the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment required a pre-trial hearing at which the government must establish probable cause to believe that defendants committed health care fraud and the assets named in the indictment are traceable to the offense. The Tenth Circuit holds that in certain situations, the defendant is entitled to a post-restraint, pre-trial hearing. The defendant must first demonstrate to the court’s satisfaction that she has no assets, other than those restrained, with which to retain private counsel and provide for herself and her family. The defendant must also establish a prima facie showing of a bona fide reason to believe the grand jury erred in determining that the restrained assets constituted or were derived, directly or indirectly, from gross proceeds traceable to the commission of the health care offense. A recent decision, United States v. Kahn, --- F.3d --- (10th Cir. 2018), relied on Jones and is discussed above.

United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991)

On remand from the United States Supreme Court, the en banc Second Circuit concludes that if a criminal defendant’s assets are frozen pre-trial, the defendant is entitled to an evidentiary hearing pre-trial to determine if there is a basis to continue the restraint as to assets which the defendant needs to retain counsel. But see Kaley, supra.

United States v. One 1973 Rolls Royce, 43 F.3d 794 (3rd Cir. 1994)

A reputed drug dealer gave his attorney a Rolls Royce in payment of part of the fee (actually, to reimburse the attorney for expenses incurred at a victory party). The attorney was unaware of the car’s use to facilitate drug transactions at the time the car was being used for that purpose, though he was arguably aware of that at the time he received the car. The court first held that in determining whether the claimant had knowledge, a willful blindness standard could be used, which is a subjective test, focusing on the claimant’s actual knowledge, or efforts to remain ignorant. The mere fact that the claimant is aware that the defendant is a drug dealer would not be enough, in and of itself, to establish that the claimant was willfully blind to the forfeitability of the car. The car in this case was seized pursuant to §881(a)(4)(C) – a conveyance used to facilitate drug trafficking. The innocent owner defense for conveyances (§881(a)(4)(C)), like the innocent owner defense for real property (§881(a)(7)), allows a claimant to show that he was either unaware of the criminal activity, or did not consent to it. The Third Circuit concludes that, pursuant to 92 Buena Vista Avenue, even if the lawyer knew when he received the car that it was tainted, this would not support a forfeiture, because he was not aware of, and did not consent to, the illegal acts at the time they occurred. NOTE: The Eleventh Circuit rejected the holding in this case in United States v. One Parcel of Real Estate Located at 6640 S.W. 48th Street, Miami, Fla. (Larraz) 41 F.3d 1448 (11th Cir. 1995), where, like here, the claimant was an attorney who received the tainted property, knowing the property was forfeitable when he received it, but not knowing about the offense which tainted the res when the offense occurred.

United States v. Michelle’s Lounge, 39 F.3d 684 (7th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was facing criminal charges and a civil forfeiture proceeding was also pending. The forfeiture case tied up all of the defendant’s assets. The Seventh Circuit holds that in such cases, the defendant is entitled to a prompt post-seizure hearing to determine whether there is probable cause to seize the assets, thus depriving the defendant of the means to retain counsel. The government cannot rely simply on the indictment to establish probable cause, or rely on an ex parte showing to the court. Moreover, the failure to conduct such a hearing is subject to appellate review under the collateral order doctrine. Kaley overruled this decision.

United States v. De Ortiz, 910 F.2d 376 (7th Cir. 1990)

Prior to the defendant’s conviction, he assigned to his attorney his bail money. After the conviction, the government sought to forfeit this money. The defense attorney was entitled to a hearing to determine whether the money was in fact forfeitable and whether he had a legitimate claim to the money. The fact that the defendant himself declared the money to be forfeitable does not make it so.

United States v. Unimex, Inc., 991 F.2d 546 (9th Cir. 1993)

It is essential that a corporation have counsel at trial, for a corporation cannot appear pro se. Here, there was no counsel for the corporation and the government virtually assured this by forfeiting all of the corporation’s assets prior to trial. The district court did not appoint an attorney for the corporation; indeed there is no Sixth Amendment right to appointed counsel (because there is no risk of jail time); and the Criminal Justice Act does not apply to corporations. In this situation, Caplin & Drysdale and Monsanto do not apply. The seizure of all the corporate assets deprived the corporation of the ability to retain counsel and there was no other means to defend itself at trial.

If assets of the defendant are needed in order to retain counsel of choice, the government must prove the forfeitability of the money at an adversarial hearing. The government violated the defendant’s rights in this case by persuading foreign governments to freeze bank accounts containing millions of dollars without affording the defendant the right to a hearing to contest the forfeitability of these funds.

United States v. All Funds on Deposit in Any Accounts…, 767 F.Supp. 36 (E.D.N.Y. 1991)

As in the context of criminal forfeiture, if a criminal defendant has his assets tied up in an §881 action, he has the right to a probable cause hearing if the assets are needed to retain counsel. The Court relied on the Monsanto decision issued by the Second Circuit after remand from the United States Supreme Court.
FORFEITURE
(Criminal Procedure)

Honeycutt v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 1626 (2017)

The federal forfeiture law requires a defendant to forfeit “any property constituting, or derived from, any proceeds the person obtained, directly or indirectly, as the result of” certain drug offenses. In an 8-0 decision, the Court held that this limits any individual defendant’s exposure to the amount of money he or she received, not the total amount of proceeds enjoyed by other conspirators. There is no joint and several liability under this provision.

United States v. Marshall, 872 F.3d 213 (4th Cir. 2017)

Seeking to extend the rationale of Luis, the defendant in this case sought to use assets that were subject to a substitute asset forfeiture order to retain appellate counsel. The Fourth Circuit held that once the defendant was convicted, the substitute assets that were needed to satisfy the forfeiture judgment were no longer “his” money and could not be used to retain private appellate counsel.

United States v. Burns, 843 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2016)

Under 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(2)(A), the court may order the forfeiture of “proceeds” and under § 981(a)(2)(B), the court may order the forfeiture of profits. In either case, however, the forfeiture is limited to what the defendant received, not what the victim lost.

United States v. Cosme, 796 F.3d 226 (2d Cir. 2015)

The government seized various bank accounts and stock brokerage accounts in the process of initiating a civil forfeiture case. No warrant was obtained from the court; the seizure of the accounts was accomplished simply by sending a letter to the bank and brokerage houses. Subsequently, the government obtained an indictment against the defendant and listed the accounts in the Bill of Particulars as assets subject to criminal forfeiture. The government acknowledged, however, that the specific assets were not identified in the indictment and subject to a vote of the grand jury (thus Kaley did not apply). The Second Circuit holds that the continued seizure of the money without any warrant having been issued (and absent any exigent circumstances) violated the Fourth Amendment.

United States v. Watts, 786 F.3d 152 (2d Cir. 2015)

The defendant’s attorney took an assignment of the defendant’s interest in certain bank accounts prior to trial. At the time, the district court had conducted a hearing and determined that the government had not established in a pretrial hearing that some of the money in the account was subject to forfeiture. After the hearing, however, the money remained in an account of the court in order to resolve competing claims to the money. At trial, the jury determined that all the money was subject to forfeiture. The Second Circuit held that the attorney was arguably a bona fide purchaser for value who had a valid claim to the money in a post-trial ancillary proceeding pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 853(n). The court reviews at some length various issues relating to the “relation back” principle, as well as New York fraudulent conveyance law.
United States v. Beltramea, 785 F.3d 287 (8th Cir. 2015)

The government failed to present sufficient evidence to demonstrate a nexus between the specific property the government sought to forfeit in this criminal forfeiture case and the underlying fraud and money laundering offenses. Even though the defendant signed the preliminary order of forfeiture, the court has the obligation to find a sufficient nexus. The forfeitures in this case (properties) were based on 18 USC § 981(a)(1)(C); § 982(a)(1); and 28 USC § 2461(c).

United States v. Mahaffy, 693 F.3d 113 (2d Cir. 2012)

The definition of “proceeds” differs in a criminal forfeiture proceeding depending on whether the crime involved the sale of a lawful product in an unlawful manner, versus the sale of an unlawful product. 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(2). In this case, the defendants were charged with selling securities with the improper use of confidential information. The Second Circuit concluded that this constituted the sale of a lawful product in an unlawful manner, which means that the forfeiture was limited to the profit, as opposed to gross proceeds.

United States v. Shakur, 691 F.3d 979 (8th Cir. 2012)

Because the trial court failed to enter a preliminary order of forfeiture, as required by Rule 32.2(b), the final forfeiture order could not be entered.

Kaley v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1090 (2014)

In this case, the Supreme Court reviewed an Eleventh Circuit decision that addressed whether a defendant was entitled to challenge a pretrial restraint of his assets if the assets were necessary to retain counsel. The Court concluded that a defendant does have the right to challenge whether the restrained assets represented proceeds of the conduct that is the subject of the indictment, but a defendant does not have the right to challenge whether there is probable cause to believe that the defendant engaged in the illegal conduct or, whether the conduct was illegal. Because the grand jury already has decided the question of probable cause, no further inquiry into the legality of the conduct is required or permitted. Again, however, the defendant is permitted to challenge whether the restrained assets were derived from that conduct.

United States v. E-Gold Ltd., 521 F.3d 411 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

If the government seizes a defendant’s assets prior to trial, the defendant is entitled to a post-seizure adversarial hearing to contest the probable cause that he committed the underlying offense and that the assets are subject to forfeiture, if the money is needed to hire an attorney. This case includes an extensive discussion of the forfeiture / attorney’s fees issues that arise in a criminal forfeiture case. This decision did not survive Kaley v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1090 (2014).

United States v. Silvious, 512 F.3d 364 (7th Cir. 2008)

Though 18 U.S.C. § 982 limits the federal crimes for which criminal forfeiture is an available remedy, a separate statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2461(c) permits criminal forfeiture in any case in which civil forfeiture is an available remedy. Therefore, because the civil forfeiture statutes provide for forfeiture in mail fraud cases, criminal forfeiture is also available, pursuant to 28
U.S.C. § 2461, even though mail fraud is not one of the listed offenses in 18 U.S.C. § 982 (unless the offense involved a financial institution).

United States v. Capoccia, 503 F.3d 103 (2d Cir. 2007)

Where an indictment charges the defendant with substantive offenses, but does not allege a “scheme,” enterprise or conspiracy, the forfeiture is limited to the assets involved in the charges. In this case, the crimes were interstate transportation of stolen property, which does not involve a “scheme” which could otherwise broaden the scope of the forfeiture.

United States v. Jarvis, 499 F.3d 1196 (10th Cir. 2007)

Placing a lis pendens on property that the government claimed it would seek to forfeit as “substitute assets” was not proper under New Mexico law. Under New Mexico law, a lis pendens is only appropriate if the real estate itself is the focus of the action and the party claims a present interest in the property. Substitute assets, however, are only recoverable as part of a money judgment against the defendant. The forfeiture component of the criminal case does not constitute an action “affecting title” to the property, which is required in order to file a lis pendens under New Mexico law. The Tenth Circuit also notes that the pretrial seizure of substitute assets is not permissible under the criminal forfeiture provisions. Note that this issue was litigated pretrial in connection with the defendant’s efforts to sell the property in order to raise money to pay attorney’s fees.

United States v. Arbolaez, 450 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from introducing evidence, or making a closing argument during the forfeiture phase of this case.

United States v. Razmilovic, 419 F.3d 134 (2d Cir. 2005)

28 U.S.C. § 2461(c) allows for criminal forfeitures in certain cases in which the civil forfeiture of property is authorized in connection with a violation of a federal law, but there is no specific statutory provision made for criminal forfeiture upon conviction. When criminal forfeiture is sought pursuant to this unusual procedure, the government may not seek pretrial restraint of the assets pursuant to § 853(e).

United States v. Nava, 404 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2005)

In this criminal forfeiture action, the jury reached a special verdict that required the defendant to forfeit to the government his interest in certain properties. The defendant’s daughter claimed that the properties were hers and she was an innocent owner. The Ninth Circuit held that the daughter did, in fact, have legal title, despite the fact that she did not pay for the property when it was given to her by her grandmother. In answering this question, the focus is on state law. The fact that the defendant occasionally paid the taxes on the property and used it for illegal purposes did not operate to vest title in him. Therefore, the property was not subject to in personam forfeiture.

United States v. Swanson, 394 F.3d 520 (7th Cir. 2005)

The Seventh Circuit limited the scope of criminal forfeiture, holding that “money put at risk” is not subject to forfeiture. Only actual gains are forfeitable. Even if the victim lost money as a result of the defendant’s conduct, this does not necessarily translate into a forfeiture amount. Loss to the victim is essential to a calculation of restitution (or setting a base offense level), but only gain to the defendant can be the measure of forfeiture.

United States v. Iacaboni, 363 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004)

Payments of gambling winnings to the bettors constituted a money laundering financial transaction and the amount of these payments could be forfeited. However, the court erred in forfeiting additional money that may have been a financial transaction that concealed the money, because the money laundering charge only alleged “promotion prong” money laundering and therefore, a financial transaction that concealed the nature, source, or ownership of the money could not be forfeited. This would improperly amend the indictment.

United States v. Vondette, 352 F.3d 772 (2d Cir. 2003)

IRA’s are subject to criminal forfeiture, even as substitute assets.

United States v. McHan, 345 F.3d 262 (4th Cir. 2003)

The defendant transferred assets to his wife and children after he committed the criminal offense, but prior to indictment. The Fourth Circuit held that his property may be seized as a substitute asset. The wife and children argued that substitute assets can be seized only if they are transferred after the forfeiture judgment is entered, or, at the latest, after the defendant is indicted. The Fourth Circuit disagreed, holding that the relation-back doctrine applies to substitute assets as well as tainted assets. The Fourth Circuit also rejected a Due Process challenge that focused on the pre-hearing “preliminary order of forfeiture” which ties up property before a third-party claimant has notice, or a right to be heard. The Court also rejected the claimant’s Seventh Amendment argument that they were entitled to a jury trial. Finally, the court addressed various specific challenges to the forfeiture of particular parcels and rejected each challenge.

United States v. Pantelidis, 335 F.3d 226 (3rd Cir. 2003)

In the unusual posture of this case, the claimant had a right to appeal the trial court’s denial of his Rule 41(g) motion for return of seized property. The money that was seized constituted “substitute assets” under the forfeiture law and, therefore, were not actually part of a pending criminal case. Thus, the decision to deny the return of the money was independent of the criminal case and amounted to a final order for appellate jurisdiction purposes.

United States v. Gotti, 155 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 1998)

A post-indictment pre-trial seizure is not authorized for substitute assets under 18 U.S.C. § 1963(d)(1)(A), because the pre-trial seizure provision only authorizes the seizure of proceeds, or property affording a source of interest over the enterprise. The substitute asset provision, § 1963(m) does not define a species of proceeds, but, rather, property that may be seized, post-trial, in the event that proceeds are not available.

United States v. Kirschenbaum, 156 F.3d 784 (7th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was indicted on charges of fraud and money laundering related to his alleged Medicare fraud. The indictment sought the forfeiture of $31 million in various accounts.
The trial court ordered the freeze of accounts containing $20 million. The Seventh Circuit reached the following conclusions: (1) Protective orders entered pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 982(b)(1) are immediately appealable; (2) property that is alleged to be involved in (or traceable to) money laundering is subject to pre-trial seizure. The Court of Appeals held that the pre-trial seizure provisions are not limited to drug offenses. When § 982(b)(1) states that pre-trial seizure procedures are governed by 21 U.S.C. §853(e), this refers to the procedure by which seizures should be handled – it is not a limitation on what can be seized. (3) If the restrained money was needed to retain an attorney, a post-indictment hearing may be required (and a pre-indictment hearing is statutorily required) though the defendant made an inadequate showing in this case. (4) The court declined to decide whether there was a Due Process right to a post-seizure hearing. The court noted numerous decisions in other Circuits that ruled both ways on this topic: United States v. Crozier, 777 F.2d 1376 (9th Cir. 1985); United States v. Roth, 77 F.3d 1525 (7th Cir. 1996); United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991); United States v. Bissell, 866 F.2d 1343 (11th Cir. 1989). (5) The restraint on the defendant’s wife’s property was the proper subject of an appeal and was not proper. The wife was not a party in the district court and could not be restrained from transferring her own assets.

United States v. Jones, 160 F.3d 641 (10th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was indicted for health care fraud, 18 U.S.C. § 1347 and the indictment alleged that certain real and personal property was subject to forfeiture, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 982(a)(6). Post-indictment, the government moved to freeze certain assets – $1.5 million – pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 853(e)(1)(A). The district court denied the defendant’s motion for a pre-trial hearing. The defendant argued that the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment required a pre-trial hearing at which the government must establish probable cause to believe that defendants committed health care fraud and the assets named in the indictment are traceable to the offense. The Tenth Circuit holds that in certain situations, the defendant is entitled to a post-restraint, pre-trial hearing. The defendant must first demonstrate to the court’s satisfaction that she has no assets, other than those restrained, with which to retain private counsel and provide for herself and her family. The defendant must also establish a prima facie showing of a bona fide reason to believe the grand jury erred in determining that the restrained assets constituted or were derived, directly or indirectly, from gross proceeds traceable to the commission of the health care offense.
FORFEITURE
(Extent of Forfeiture; Proportionality; Excessive Fine)

The Eighth Amendment applies to civil forfeiture proceedings under 21 U.S.C. §881. The Eighth Amendment is not limited to criminal cases – it applies to any form of punishment and civil forfeiture amounts to punishment.

Pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §1963, the RICO in personam forfeiture procedure, the forfeiture of defendant’s entire adult entertainment inventory (including constitutionally protected material) was not violative of the First Amendment. However, the in personam nature of the forfeiture proceeding must pass muster under the excessive fines clause of the Eighth Amendment.

The defendant was arrested as he was about to depart from the L.A. airport on a flight to Italy. He was found to be in possession of $357,144 in currency which he failed to report. Reporting the transfer of currency in excess of $10,000 across the border is required by the currency transaction laws, 31 U.S.C. §5316(a)(1)(A). In addition to prosecuting the defendant for making a false statement and for the currency transaction violation, the government also sought to forfeit the entire amount of money pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §982(a)(1), which provides that all property “involved in the offense” shall be forfeited. The defendant contested the forfeiture on Eighth Amendment grounds and the Supreme Court agreed. First, the Court concluded that the forfeiture in this case amounted to a “fine” for Eighth Amendment purposes. Section 982 forfeitures are punitive and are imposed as part of the sentence following conviction for the underlying offense. Second, the Court decided that in analyzing whether a forfeiture amounts to an Excessive Fine, the appropriate analysis is simply the “proportionality test”: The amount of the forfeiture must bear some relationship to the gravity of the offense that it is designed to punish. A fine is excessive if it is grossly disproportional to the gravity of a defendant’s offense. In this case, the fine was disproportional, because the money was not proceeds of any criminal offense, nor intended to be used for a criminal offense, but was simply not properly reported – an information-gathering offense. A fine in the amount of $357,144, for failing to properly fill out a form is grossly disproportionate to the offense.

Honeycutt v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 1626 (2017)

The federal forfeiture law requires a defendant to forfeit “any property constituting, or derived from, any proceeds the person obtained, directly or indirectly, as the result of” certain drug offenses. In an 8-0 decision, the Court held that this limits any individual defendant’s exposure to the amount of money he or she received, not the total amount of proceeds enjoyed by other conspirators. There is no joint and several liability under this provision.

United States v. Courtney, 816 F.3d 681 (10th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was convicted of wire fraud based on fraudulent mortgage loan applications. The question posed on appeal was whether the mortgage payments that were made should be deducted from the amount of the forfeiture. The government argued that pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 853, the amount of the forfeiture should be the “proceeds” of the crime (the entire amount of the loans); the defendant argued that pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(2)(C), the amount of the forfeiture must be reduced by the amount of money the bank received in mortgage payments. The Tenth Circuit held that the defendant’s argument prevailed.

United States v. Viloski, --- F.3d --- (2d Cir. 2016)
In evaluating whether a forfeiture runs afoul of the Eighth Amendment, the court should consider whether the forfeiture will deprive the claimant of the ability to make a living. In contrast to decisions from other Circuits the Second Circuit held that factors other than the amount of the forfeiture and the claimant’s relationship to the crime may be considered.

United States v. Abair, 746 F.3d 260 (7th Cir. 2014)
Though not issuing a conclusive holding, the Seventh Circuit observed that the forfeiture of the defendant’s house based on a conviction for structuring offenses was disproportionate to the offense. There was no need to decide this question, because the conviction was reversed on other grounds.

United States v. Mahaffy, 693 F.3d 113 (2d Cir. 2012)
The definition of “proceeds” differs in a criminal forfeiture proceeding depending on whether the crime involved the sale of a lawful product in an unlawful manner, versus the sale of an unlawful product. 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(2). In this case, the defendants were charged with selling securities with the improper use of confidential information. The Second Circuit concluded that this constituted the sale of a lawful product in an unlawful manner, which means that the forfeiture was limited to the profit, as opposed to gross proceeds.

United States v. Contorinis, 692 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 2012)
In a criminal forfeiture proceeding, a defendant may not be ordered to forfeit funds never acquired by him or someone working in concert with him. Though an order of forfeiture may apply to funds no longer in the defendant’s control, at some point, the funds must have been in his control, or the control of someone with whom the defendant was working.

United States v. Seher, 562 F.3d 1344 (11th Cir. 2009)
The trial court erred in ordering the forfeiture of a certain bank account based on the defendants’ CTR and money laundering convictions, without a showing that those accounts were involved in the offenses of conviction.

United States v. Levesque, 546 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2008)
The First Circuit holds that the Excessive Fines Clause analysis requires the court to determine whether a forfeiture order will deprive the defendant of her livelihood. The court remands the case to the district court to re-evaluate the Eighth Amendment claim in this case, in which the court imposed a multi-million money judgment on the defendant, a mule who regularly transported marijuana for the conspiracy, but made little profit, herself.
Von Hofe v. United States, 492 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2007)

A civil forfeiture action was brought against the house of the claimant and her husband. Both had been convicted in state court of using the house to cultivate marijuana, but the evidence against the wife/claimant was limited to her knowledge that marijuana was being grown for personal use of the husband. The Second Circuit held that forfeiting the entire interest of the wife violated the Eighth Amendment. She was not aware of any distribution activities and her knowledge of personal use cultivation did not support the forfeiture of her entire interest. See generally United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 118 S.Ct. 2028 (1998); Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602 (1993). This case contains a lengthy analysis of the factors that the court should consider in evaluating an Excessive Fine claim in an in rem forfeiture case.

United States v. $100,348 in U.S. Currency, 354 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was arrested at the airport and charged with failing to report the transportation of the currency that was the subject of this forfeiture action. He claimed that he was a “gratuitous bailee” – he was carrying the money for someone else. The forfeiture proceedings concluded with the trial court deciding that the forfeiture of the entire amount was excessive. The government appealed, arguing that the bailee had not right to contend that it was an excessive fine. The Ninth Circuit upheld the lower court’s decision. The Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act expressly provides that a claimant may mount an excessive fine defense and this is not limited by the nature of the claim.

United States v. 3814 NW Thurman St., Portland, Or., 164 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 1999)

The government sought to forfeit the defendant’s property on the basis that she obtained a mortgage loan in the amount of $322,500 on the property based on numerous false statements that were submitted to the bank. The Ninth Circuit identified several factors that should be considered in determining whether a forfeiture is excessive: (1) Other related illegal activity; (2) Other penalties – in this regard, the court stressed that the possible Guideline sentence, rather than the statutory sentence should be the focus; (3) Harm caused; (4) Gravity of the offense vs. the amount of the forfeiture. Considering all these factors, the court decided that forfeiture of $200,686 (the increase in equity in the property) was excessive.

United States v. $273,969.04 U.S. Currency, 164 F.3d 462 (9th Cir. 1999)

A remand was necessary to determine whether the forfeiture of the currency was grossly disproportionate to the gravity of the defendant’s offense. See United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 118 S. Ct. 2028 (1998). The currency was seized from the claimant (along with jewelry and British currency) at the airport. She was charged with failing to comply with monetary transaction reporting requirements.
FORFEITURE
(Innocent Owner Defense)

United States v. Salti, 579 F.3d 656 (6th Cir. 2009)
   The claimant offered sufficient information to support her claim to the forfeited bank account in Switzerland. In claiming a marital interest in the property, the law of Switzerland governs the decision, since the claimant lived in Switzerland and that is the where the property rights were established.

United States v. Nava, 404 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2005)
   In this criminal forfeiture action, the jury reached a special verdict that required the defendant to forfeit to the government his interest in certain properties. The defendant’s daughter claimed that the properties were hers and she was an innocent owner. The Ninth Circuit held that the daughter did, in fact, have legal title, despite the fact that she did not pay for the property when it was given to her by her grandmother. In answering this question, the focus is on state law. The fact that the defendant occasionally paid the taxes on the property and used it for illegal purposes did not operate to vest title in him. Therefore, the property was not subject to in personam forfeiture.

United States v. Totaro, 345 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2003)
   In this criminal forfeiture case, the claimant was the wife of the criminal defendant, whose assets were ordered forfeited. The wife claimed that she was title owner of the house, though the mortgage payments and improvements were made with the husband’s illegal income.
The Eighth Circuit held that this does not present a case of a straw owner. The wife lived on the property and exercised dominion and control over the property, so she was not a straw owner.
Because criminal forfeiture is in personam, the government may not seize the wife’s interest in the property. In order to determine how much of the property is “hers” the district court should consider the state’s divorce law.

United States v. Leak, 123 F.3d 787 (4th Cir. 1997)
   The claimants made dozens of deposits into their bank account in increments less than $10,000. The money in the bank was later used to pay off the mortgage and to finance an addition for their house. The trial court correctly concluded that there was probable cause to support the forfeiture of the house. However, the claimants denied knowing about the currency transaction reporting requirements and this created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether they were innocent owners of the property. The trial court erred in granting summary judgment to the government.
Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2466, a defendant who is a fugitive may not avail himself of the courts. The standard for applying the fugitive disentitlement doctrine is as follows: (1) a warrant or similar process must have been issued in a criminal case for the claimant's apprehension; (2) the claimant must have had notice or knowledge of the warrant; (3) the criminal case must be related to the forfeiture action; (4) the claimant must not be confined or otherwise held in custody in another jurisdiction; and (5) the claimant must have deliberately avoided prosecution by (A) purposefully leaving the United States, (B) declining to enter or reenter the United States, or (C) otherwise evading the jurisdiction of a court in the United States in which a criminal case is pending against the claimant. Though the government is not required to prove that the defendant’s only intent was to avoid prosecution, in this case, the record was not sufficiently developed in the lower court and a remand for additional evidence was required.

The claimant’s failure to answer special interrogatories did not provide an adequate basis for striking his claim. The special interrogatories were essentially discovery requests and did not relate to issues such as standing, or the claimant’s right to file a claim in the first place.

The seizures in this case were the result of a warrantless (improper) search and un-Mirandized statements of the defendant. The government did not contest these violations, but obstinately and aggressively litigated the forfeiture matter. Awarding attorney’s fees to the claimant was appropriate.

A law firm was engaged in a massive Ponzi scheme. Proceeds from the crime were deposited into the law firm’s account, along with other “legitimate” fees. The question in this case is whether the government could forfeit the money in the account on the theory that the money in the account was proceeds of the crime. The Eleventh Circuit held that the government did not prove that the money in the account represented proceeds. Though the government could proceed on a substitute asset theory, it could not proceed on a strict proceeds theory.

When a claimant alleges that he has an ownership interest in seized assets, this is sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss on standing grounds. When a claimant alleges a possessory interest, the claimant the claimant must explain the circumstances of this possession.

The definition of “proceeds” differs in a criminal forfeiture proceeding depending on whether the crime involved the sale of a lawful product in an unlawful manner, versus the sale of an unlawful product. 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(2). In this case, the defendants were charged with selling securities with the improper use of confidential information. The Second Circuit concluded that this constituted the sale of a lawful product in an unlawful manner, which means that the forfeiture was limited to the profit, as opposed to gross proceeds.

United States v. $186,416.00, 590 F.3d 942 (9th Cir. 2010)

The search that resulted in the seizure of the money in this case was not lawful. The search was conducted pursuant to a state search warrant that alleged a violation of state law. There was, however, no law against medical marijuana in California, so there was no state law violation. The money was then transferred to the federal government for forfeiture. The illegal search, however, was illegal regardless of the venue in which the forfeiture case was tried and the evidence, including the fruits of the illegal search, could not be used in the federal forfeiture case.

United States v. Wright, 361 F.3d 288 (5th Cir. 2004)

The statute of limitations for filing a Rule 41(g) motion for return of seized property (alleging, for example, insufficient notice prior to forfeiture) is six years from the date the defendant was on reasonable notice about the forfeiture.

United States v. Vondette, 352 F.3d 772 (2d Cir. 2003)

The government may forfeit money in an IRA. ERISA does not bar a seizure of tainted money that the defendant places in an IRA.

United States v. $133,735.30 Seized from U.S.Bancorp Acct. No 32130630, 139 F.3d 729 (9th Cir. 1998)

After the government's forfeiture complaint was dismissed, the question was the rate of interest that the government would be required to pay on the funds that it had seized. The Ninth Circuit held that the interest actually earned on the seized funds, which had been deposited into an interest-bearing account, would be disgorged. The trial court had held that interest should be paid at the "prevailing government rate."

United States v. $515,060.42 in U.S. Currency, 152 F.3d 491 (6th Cir. 1998)

The statute of limitations for a forfeiture action is five years. 19 U.S.C. § 1621. The statute begins to run from the date the government discovers the criminal violation. Even if there is a continuing offense, the period of limitations runs after the government learns of the crime. The limitation also does not start when the asset is seized – it begins before that: when the discovery of the crime occurs. The court decides another question as well: When the government wrongfully seizes money, it must return the money with interest. The court analogized to the seizure of a pregnant cow. If the seizure was improper, the government would be required to return the cow and the calf. The government could not keep the calf. Even if the funds are not placed in an interest-bearing account, the court should calculate an appropriate interest rate.

United States v. Cunan, 156 F.3d 110 (1st Cir. 1998)

The doctrine of res judicata applies to bar a criminal forfeiture of property which was the subject of a prior civil forfeiture petition that was dismissed with prejudice. Though generally the disposition in a civil case does not generate a res judicata bar to subsequent criminal charges, in the forfeiture context, the proceedings satisfy the “identity” requirement of the doctrine of res judicata. Rather than dismissing the forfeiture case with prejudice, the government should have requested a stay.
FORFEITURE
(Procedure -- Generally)

United States v. $196,969.00 U.S. Currency, 719 F.3d 644 (7th Cir. 2013)
Cash was seized in the defendant’s house. In his claim, he asserted that it was his house and everything in it belonged to him. This was a sufficient assertion of an ownership interest to establish his standing to contest the forfeiture.

United States v. Funds in the Amount of $574,840, 719 F.3d 648 (7th Cir. 2013)
The claimant filed his claim and accompanied the claim with a motion to stay the proceedings because the pendency of criminal proceedings in the state court. The statute, 18 U.S.C. § 981(g)(2), states that a stay shall be granted. The trial court denied the motion to stay and required the claimants to answer interrogatories, after which he dismissed the claims. The Seventh Circuit reversed. The claimant filed a sufficient claim, after which a stay should have been granted.

United States v. $11,500.00, 710 F.3d 1006 (9th Cir. 2013)
The district court struck the claimant’s claim to the property in this case based on his failure to properly state that his interest was that of a bailee. This was improper. The fact that the money was given to the defendant by his wife (and he was taking it to the jail in order to bail her out after she was arrested on a drug offense), did not negate his claim that he had a possessory interest in the money. Also, the requirement that the claimant state whether his interest is that of a bailee may occur after the filing of the initial claim.

United States v. $92,203, 537 F.3d 504 (5th Cir. 2008)
The government may not rely on hearsay (unless a recognized hearsay exception exists) in presenting its case in support of forfeiture. When Congress enacted CAFRA in 2000, the decision to elevate the government’s burden to a preponderance of the evidence implicitly recognized that the rules against hearsay would also be enforced. This applies to summary judgment proceedings, as well. Note, however, that the statute expressly provides that the Rules of Evidence do not apply to hearings on motions for Temporary Restraining Orders.

United States v. $125,938.62, 370 F.3d 1325 (11th Cir. 2004)
The district court abused its discretion in denying the claimants’ request to amend their verified claims. The district court should be wary to not confer the sins of the attorney unto the claimant in a civil forfeiture case, especially when the prejudice to the government, if any, is slight. Amendments should be liberally permitted to add verifications to claims originally lacking them, provided that the amendment would not undermine the goals underlying the time restriction and verification requirement of Rule C. In this case, the government knew the claimants at the time the initial verified complaint was filed and thus the government was not prejudiced.

United States v. One Piece of Property at 5800 SW 74th Ave, Miami, Fla., 363 F.3d 1099 (11th Cir. 2004)
The government moved for summary judgment in this forfeiture case and the claimant failed to respond. Nevertheless, summary judgment should not have been granted in the absence of a showing in the government’s motion that there were no contested issues. The government’s presentation in this case (which included the deposition of the claimant’s girlfriend) demonstrated that there was a dispute as to the legality of the search of the claimant’s house and therefore, summary judgment should not have been granted.

United States v. $8,221,877.16 in U.S. Currency, 330 F.3d 141 (3rd Cir. 2003)

The statute of limitation for the institution of an action to seize substitute assets under 18 U.S.C. § 984 is one year.

United States v. Estate of Parsons, 367 F.3d 409 (5th Cir. 2004)

During the direct appeal of his conviction, the defendant died. The en banc Fifth Circuit concludes that the criminal forfeiture order, as well as the sentence of restitution abated upon the defendant’s death.

United States v. Certain Real Property Located at Route 1, 126 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 1997)

When a claimant fails to comply with the government's discovery requests, the trial court should do what it does in other civil cases: enter an order to compel, or take other appropriate action. Fed.R.Civ.P. 37(d). Striking the claim and entering judgment for the government should not be the first step.

Ikelionwu v. United States, 150 F.3d 233 (2d Cir. 1998)

The trial court improperly dismissed the plaintiff’s complaint that sought return of seized property. The trial court dismissed the complaint based on laches. The Second Circuit, however, held that the government failed to show that the plaintiff knew of his right to challenge the forfeiture proceedings. At no time did the government serve notice of the proceedings on the plaintiff. While the plaintiff knew about the seizures, he did not know about the forfeiture proceedings.
FORFEITURE
(Procedure – Notice of Seizure)

The government satisfied its burden under the Due Process Clause by sending notice of seizure by certified mail to the prison where the defendant was incarcerated. The proper test is whether the notice was “reasonably calculated, under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections.”

Lucas v. United States, 775 F.3d 544 (2d Cir. 2015)

Pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 982(e)(1), a person may move to reopen a forfeiture proceeding that was closed if the person can show that inadequate notice of the seizure and pending forfeiture was provided to the person.

United States v. Real Properties Located at 7215 Longboat Drive, 750 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 2014)

The government seized property that was titled in the name of an LLC. The government knew the LLC had dissolved and that its registered agent had died. The government did not make sufficient efforts to locate the registered agent’s estate to provide notice of the pending forfeiture. An attorney contacted the AUSA and informed the AUSA that he might be retained to represent the estate in the forfeiture proceeding. The government did not send notice to the attorney. The Eighth Circuit held that the letter from the attorney did not reflect “actual notice” of the forfeiture proceeding, because the lawyer did not acknowledge that he was actually representing the estate. The government failed to comply with Rule G’s notice requirement and thus the untimely filed claim would be given effect.

Nunley v. Department of Justice, 425 F.3d 1132 (8th Cir. 2005)

Notices sent to the defendant (who was in jail) and to his last known address were not sufficient to put him on notice of the government’s forfeiture proceedings.

Clymore v. United States, 164 F.3d 569 (10th Cir. 1999)

The government failed to provide adequate notice to the claimant of the pendency of the forfeiture proceeding. Prior to the claimant filing a Rule 41(e) motion, the statute of limitations for filing a forfeiture action expired. See 19 U.S.C. § 1621. The Tenth Circuit holds that the statute of limitations should be enforced in this situation. Note that this is a pre-CAFRA case.

United States v. Ritchie, 342 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2003)

When a letter providing personal notice of a forfeiture proceeding is returned undelivered, the DEA must make reasonable additional efforts to provide personal notice of the proceeding.

Small v. United States, 136 F.3d 1334 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

The defendant was arrested at Union Station in D.C. and $1,813.10 was seized from him. He was detained in the D.C. jail. A notice of seizure was sent to the defendant's home address; another notice was published in U.S.A. Today; and another notice was sent to the jail, but returned to the DEA undelivered. These attempts at notice were insufficient and the forfeiture proceeding would be reinstated. Sending a notice to the defendant's home, when the government knows the claimant is in jail is insufficient.

Krecioch v. United States, 221 F.3d 976 (7th Cir. 2000)

After the DEA learned that the defendant was in custody, sending notice of proposed forfeitures to his house was insufficient notice and violated his right to due process.

Polanco v. U.S. DEA, 158 F.3d 647 (2d Cir. 1998)

Six years after currency was seized from him, the defendant filed a lawsuit seeking the return of the money. The Second Circuit held that this type of action was governed by the six year statute of limitations found in 28 U.S.C. § 2401 for lawsuits against the United States. The accrual date was the date on which he learned the money was subject to forfeiture without sufficient notice. This was later than the date of seizure.
FORFEITURE
(Procedure -- Seizure)

Under Florida state law the police are authorized to seize an automobile for forfeiture purposes. (The same law exists with regard to federal forfeitures). In this case, the police observed the defendant, in his vehicle, involved in a drug transaction, but waited several months before seizing the car from a parking lot at defendant's place of employment. They then performed an inventory search. The Court upheld the warrantless seizure and inventory search even though there were no exigent circumstances and the probable cause to seize the vehicle arose several months earlier.

Unless there are exigent circumstances, when the government institutes a civil forfeiture action against real property, it may not seize the property absent notice to the property owner and an opportunity to be heard.

_United States v. Chamberlain_, 867 F.3d 459 (4th Cir. 2017)

Joining various other Circuits, the Fourth Circuit holds that the government may not seize substitute assets prior to trial.

_United States v. Cosme_, 796 F.3d 226 (2d Cir. 2015)

The government seized various bank accounts and stock brokerage accounts in the process of initiating a civil forfeiture case. No warrant was obtained from the court; the seizure of the accounts was accomplished simply by sending a letter to the bank and brokerage houses. Subsequently, the government obtained an indictment against the defendant and listed the accounts in the Bill of Particulars as assets subject to criminal forfeiture. The government acknowledged, however, that the specific assets were not identified in the indictment and subject to a vote of the grand jury (thus _Kaley_ did not apply). The Second Circuit holds that the continued seizure of the money without any warrant having been issued (and absent any exigent circumstances) violated the Fourth Amendment.

_United States v. Parrett_, 530 F.3d 422 (6th Cir. 2008)

The government may not seize or restrain substitute assets in a criminal forfeiture case prior to trial pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 853(p). The court suggested that state law, however, may support the filing of a _lis pendens_.

_Smith v. City of Chicago_, 524 F.3d 834 (7th Cir. 2008)

The Seventh Circuit holds that if property is seized in contemplation of a civil forfeiture proceeding, in certain circumstances, a post-seizure hearing should be held. Due process requires some opportunity to the claimant to contest the validity of the seizure. CERT GRANTED 2/23/09 and decided that the case was moot and vacated the Seventh Circuit decision. 130 S. Ct. 576 (2009). Nevertheless, the Seventh Circuit decision is worth reading for its reasoning.
United States v. Rutledge, 437 F.3d 917 (9th Cir. 2006)

Criminal forfeiture is now an available tool of the prosecutor in any case in which the assets would be subject to civil forfeiture. 28 U.S.C. § 2461(c). That code provides that criminal forfeiture is permissible in cases in which civil forfeiture of the property in issue is authorized and there is “no specific statutory provision” allowing criminal forfeiture for the charged offense. In this case, this code section supported the pretrial seizure and criminal forfeiture of mail and wire fraud proceeds. However, the Ninth Circuit held that the non-profit corporation that was controlled by the defendant was not itself subject to forfeiture, because of the assets of the corporation were not the proceeds of fraud. Rather, the defendant had “taken control” of the corporation through fraudulent means and had engaged in various schemes to self-deal with the assets of the corporation. The fact that the defendant took control of the corporate assets (i.e., he effectively stole the assets from the membership of the non-profit corporation), this did not make the corporate assets the “proceeds” of his fraud. The Ninth Circuit also held that, pretrial, the defendant could attempt to set aside the government’s seizure of assets if the government could not establish probable cause to support the seizure. THE DECISION IN THIS CASE WAS WITHDRAWN AS MOOT, 448 F.3d 1080.

The government contended that the claimants had defrauded the Federal Crop Insurance program and instituted a civil forfeiture proceeding which included seizing various bank accounts and filing a lis pendens on various pieces of property. The claimants sought to release the property prior to trial on the theory that the funds were needed for attorney’s fees and because of hardship. See United States v. Farmer, 274 F.3d 800 (4th Cir. 2001) and 18 U.S.C. § 983(f). The Fourth Circuit held that releasing the funds was not proper and reversed the decision of the trial court which approved limited release of seized funds for purposes of paying attorney’s fees. The various requirements of § 983(f)(1) and (f)(8) must be met in order to order the release of the money. In this case, however, there was no showing that if the funds were released, there would be assets available to satisfy the forfeiture judgment in the end. The availability of other assets which were themselves subject to forfeiture (i.e., real estate) does not satisfy the requirement that there will be no dissipation of the assets prior to judgment. The Fourth Circuit also held that there was insufficient proof of hardship.

United States v. Bowman, 341 F.3d 1228 (11th Cir. 2003)

The Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000 essentially codified James Daniel Good, by requiring a showing of probable cause and exigent circumstances before real property may be seized without a hearing. If property is seized and at a post-seizure hearing there is evidence of probable cause, but not exigent circumstances, the proper remedy is to pay the rents received between the date of the seizure and the date of the hearing to the owner.

Krimstock v. Kelly, 306 F.3d 40 (2d Cir. 2002)

In this civil class action lawsuit, claimants challenged New York City’s policy of seizing vehicles under the city forfeiture laws without providing a meaningful hearing to the claimants. The Second Circuit concluded that a hearing should be afforded to people whose cars had been seized in order to determine the likelihood of forfeiture, as well as the availability of other options.
United States v. Melrose East Subdivision, 357 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2004)

The government is only required to establish probable cause in order to obtain a pretrial order enjoining the sale or disposal of assets seized for civil forfeiture under 18 U.S.C. § 983(j)(1)(A). The claimant unsuccessfully argued that the government was required to establish the forfeitability of the assets by a preponderance of the evidence. The probable cause standard applies even when the claimant contends that he needs the assets to retain an attorney.

United States v. Land, Winston County, 163 F.3d 1295 (11th Cir. 1998)

It is not proper for the government to post a “No Trespassing” sign on property prior to the time that a hearing was held to determine the validity of a seizure. Such a sign inhibits the owner’s right to full occupancy, use, and enjoyment of the property. The appropriate manner for the government to protect its interest in property it seeks to forfeit is to file a lis pendens.

United States v. 408 Peyton Rd., S.W., 162 F.3d 644 (11th Cir. 1998)

The government must provide notice and the right to be heard before executing an arrest warrant for property. The failure to provide such notice does not require that the forfeiture proceedings be dismissed, however. Rather, the only remedy is that the government should return any rents received or other proceeds realized from the property during the period of illegal seizure.

United States v. Gotti, 155 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 1998)

A post-indictment pre-trial seizure is not authorized for substitute assets under 18 U.S.C. § 1963(d)(1)(A), because the pre-trial seizure provision only authorizes the seizure of proceeds, or property affording a source of interest over the enterprise. The substitute asset provision, § 1963(m) does not define a species of proceeds, but, rather, property that may be seized, post-trial, in the event that proceeds are not available.

United States v. Kirschenbaum, 156 F.3d 784 (7th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was indicted on charges of fraud and money laundering related to his alleged Medicare fraud. The indictment sought the forfeiture of $31 million in various accounts. The trial court ordered the freeze of accounts containing $20 million. The Seventh Circuit reached the following conclusions: (1) Protective orders entered pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 982(b)(1) are immediately appealable; (2) property that is alleged to be involved in (or traceable to) money laundering is subject to pre-trial seizure. The Court of Appeals held that the pre-trial seizure provisions are not limited to drug offenses. When § 982(b)(1) states that pre-trial seizure procedures are governed by 21 U.S.C. §853(e), this refers to the procedure by which seizures should be handled – it is not a limitation on what can be seized. (3) If the restrained money was needed to retain an attorney, a post-indictment hearing may be required (and a pre-indictment hearing is statutorily required) though the defendant made an inadequate showing in this case. (4) The court declined to decide whether there was a Due Process right to a post-seizure hearing. The court noted numerous decisions in other Circuits that ruled both ways on this topic: United States v. Crozier, 777 F.2d 1376 (9th Cir. 1985); United States v. Roth, 77 F.3d 1525 (7th Cir. 1996); United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991); United States v. Bissell, 866 F.2d 1343 (11th Cir. 1989). (5) The restraint on the defendant’s wife’s property was the proper subject of an appeal and was not proper. The wife was not a party in the district court and could not be restrained from transferring her own assets.

United States v. Jones, 160 F.3d 641 (10th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was indicted for health care fraud, 18 U.S.C. § 1347 and the indictment alleged that certain real and personal property was subject to forfeiture, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 982(a)(6). Post-indictment, the government moved to freeze certain assets – $1.5 million – pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 853(e)(1)(A). The district court denied the defendant’s motion for a pre-trial hearing. The defendant argued that the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment required a pre-trial hearing at which the government must establish probable cause to believe that defendants committed health care fraud and the assets named in the indictment are traceable to the offense. The Tenth Circuit holds that in certain situations, the defendant is entitled to a post-restraint, pre-trial hearing. The defendant must first demonstrate to the court’s satisfaction that she has no assets, other than those restrained, with which to retain private counsel and provide for herself and her family. The defendant must also establish a prima facie showing of a bona fide reason to believe the grand jury erred in determining that the restrained assets constituted or were derived, directly or indirectly, from gross proceeds traceable to the commission of the health care offense.
FORFEITURE
(Standing)

United States v. $31,000.00 in U.S. Currency, 872 F.3d 342 (6th Cir. 2017)

The claimant asserted sufficient Article III and statutory standing by claiming ownership of the seized currency.

United States v. $17,900.00, 859 F.3d 1085 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

Amtrak police located a backpack that had $17,900 in cash and a notebook with the name Peter Rodriguez. The police were able to locate Rodriguez, who said that the backpack was his. Later, his mother and her domestic partner claimed that the money in the backpack was theirs. The story was implausible. Nevertheless, the mother and domestic partner asserted ownership and presented at least some evidence to support their claim. Granting summary judgment to the government on the issue of standing was reversible error.

United States v. JP Morgan Chase Bank Account, 835 F.3d 1159 (2d Cir. 2016)

The two claimants both established sufficient possessory interest in the funds that were in a seized bank account to resist the government’s summary judgment motion. The claimants also established sufficient prudential standing to proceed with their claim.

United States v. Funds in the Amount of $271,080, 816 F.3d 903 (7th Cir. 2016)

Cash was seized from the claimants’ van. They contested the forfeiture and submitted affidavits declaring that the money represented savings from years of hard work. The district court granted summary judgment, finding that the affidavits were shams and did not sufficiently establish standing. The district court noted that the claimants had previously disavowed any connection with the money. The Seventh Circuit reversed: the factual dispute created by the affidavit was sufficient to avoid summary judgment and to establish standing.

United States v. Funds in the Amount of $239,400, 795 F.3d 639 (7th Cir. 2015)

Rule G(8)(c)(ii)(B) states that a claimant bears the “burden of establishing standing by a preponderance of the evidence.” At the pleading stage, the claimant is only required to allege standing, not prove standing. At the summary judgment stage, an assertion of ownership coupled with some proof of ownership – including possession – is sufficient to defeat the government’s motion for summary judgment.

United States v. $304,980.00, 732 F.3d 812 (7th Cir. 2013)

The claimants asserted a claim to the seized currency, though they did not “prove” their ownership of cash (in fact they invoked their Fifth Amendment right in response to the government’s interrogatories about ownership). Nevertheless, their claim established their standing to contest the seizure. Whether they would prevail in their claim is a separate matter.

United States v. $999,830.00, 704 F.3d 1042 (9th Cir. 2012)

When a claimant alleges that he has an ownership interest in seized assets, this is sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss on standing grounds. When a claimant alleges a possessory interest, the claimant must explain the circumstances of this possession.
Even though a defendant asserted his Fifth Amendment rights regarding the source of the money and the reason for unusual packaging, he still had standing to challenge the forfeiture of the money found in his vehicle. The defendant in this case demonstrated (or at least asserted) an ownership interest in the funds, not simply naked possession. This assertion is sufficient to support constitutional standing to maintain a claim in the forfeiture proceeding.

In this criminal forfeiture action, the jury reached a special verdict that required the defendant to forfeit to the government his interest in certain properties. The defendant’s daughter claimed that the properties were hers and she was an innocent owner. The Ninth Circuit held that the daughter did, in fact, have legal title, despite the fact that she did not pay for the property when it was given to her by her grandmother. In answering this question, the focus is on state law. The fact that the defendant occasionally paid the taxes on the property and used it for illegal purposes did not operate to vest title in him. Therefore, the property was not subject to in personam forfeiture.

Claimants were people who were defrauded out of millions of dollars. The fraudster deposited the money in a Lichtenstein bank account. The U.S. government persuaded the Lichtenstein authorities to send the money to a bank account in the U.S., whereupon the claimants filed their forfeiture claims. Inexplicable, the government argued that the claimants lacked standing to challenge the forfeiture. The Ninth Circuit disagreed, holding that the money was held by the fraudster in constructive trust for the victims / claimants, and this constructive trust continued even after the government repatriated the money.

The criminal defendant transferred property to her parents after becoming aware of a criminal investigation and there was no consideration for the transfer, the transferees lacked standing to contest the forfeiture of the property.

The court explains that standing can be established with a showing that the claimant is the owner of the seized property, or the possessor of the property, but simple possession requires an additional showing, explaining the circumstances by which the claimant came into possession of the asset, in order to prevent mere straw purchasers from asserting a successful claim. In order assert a valid claim, however, the defendant is not required to prove standing at that stage of the proceedings. And in evaluating the sufficiency of proof of standing when the issue is raised by the government, the government’s own allegations in the complaint may be considered.
FORFEITURE
(Sufficiency of Evidence to Support Forfeiture)

United States v. $11,500 in U.S. Currency, 869 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2017)

The government seized money that the defendant posted for bond, claiming that based on his longstanding drug addiction, it was logical to assume that the money was derived from, or eventually would be used for a drug deal. The Ninth Circuit rejected this basis for forfeiting money that was not linked to any known (or specifically foreseeable) drug deal.

United States v. Assorted Jewelry Valued of $44,328.00, 833 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2016)

An assortment of jewelry valued at over $44,000 was found in close proximity to a brick of cocaine in the defendant’s apartment where he apparently lived alone. The defendant eventually entered a guilty plea to being a member of a drug conspiracy. This evidence, alone, did not support the government’s motion for summary judgment that the jewelry was purchased with drug proceeds.

United States v. Funds in the Amount of $271,080, 816 F.3d 903 (7th Cir. 2016)

Cash was seized from the claimants’ van. They contested the forfeiture and submitted affidavits declaring that the money represented savings from years of hard work. The district court granted summary judgment, finding that the affidavits were shams and did not sufficiently establish standing. The district court noted that the claimants had previously disavowed any connection with the money. The Seventh Circuit reversed: the factual dispute created by the affidavit was sufficient to avoid summary judgment and to establish standing.

United States v. Funds in the Amount of $100,120.00, 730 F.3d 711 (7th Cir. 2013)

In this forfeiture case, among other factors, the government relied on a drug dog alert to the currency to establish that the funds that were seized by agents was connected to drug dealing. The government relied on studies that it claimed showed that what drug dogs smelled on currency was only recent contact with cocaine, because the dogs were detecting something that quickly evaporates. The defense introduced contrary evidence, and relied on the generally-known contamination theory, that is, that most currency has trace amounts of cocaine. The Seventh Circuit held that this dispute foreclosed granting summary judgment to the government, because the disputed facts regarding what drug dogs alert to required resolution by the trier of fact. The defense also mounted a successful attack on the dog’s certification, including demonstrating that during training sessions, the dog could not differentiate between pure cocaine and cutting agents that might be added to cocaine, and that these cutting agents might be present on money without cocaine. This case includes an excellent primer on methods of challenging drug dog alerts. In addition, the claimant introduced sufficient information to create a disputed fact issue regarding the source of the money (i.e., his legitimate earnings).

United States v. $48,100.00 in U.S. Currency, 756 F.3d 650 (8th Cir. 2014)

The claimant was stopped in his RV driving from Colorado to his home in Wisconsin. He had the currency in his possession, as well as a small quantity of marijuana for personal use. The claimant established the source of the money, but the lower court concluded that the government satisfactorily proved that the money was intended to purchase marijuana while the defendant was in Colorado, prior to returning to his home in Wisconsin. The Eighth Circuit reversed: the evidence was insufficient to prove that the money was intended to purchase marijuana while the defendant was in Colorado.

United States v. Contorinis, 692 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 2012)

In a criminal forfeiture proceeding, a defendant may not be ordered to forfeit funds never acquired by him or someone working in concert with him. Though an order of forfeiture may apply to funds no longer in the defendant’s control, at some point, the funds must have been in his control, or the control of someone with whom the defendant was working.

United States v. Hodge, 558 F.3d 630 (7th Cir. 2009)

The defendant ran a massage parlor. Some (or perhaps many) of the customers received prostitution services. Following a conviction, the trial judge forfeited all the assets of the company. No effort was made to determine, however, the extent to which the business was legitimate and assets were not subject to forfeiture. If the business could survive without the prostitution services, then only the illicit revenue could be forfeited. If the prostitution services were essential to the success of the business, then the entire business could be forfeited.

United States v. $125,938.62, 537 F.3d 1287 (11th Cir. 2008)

The government presented sufficient evidence that certain certificates of deposit were purchased with embezzled money. With regard to other cd’s, however, the government’s only “evidence” was the argument that because the other cd’s were purchased with embezzled funds, these cd’s were also presumably purchased with embezzled funds. The Eleventh Circuit rejected this argument, “Circumstantial evidence is one thing; speculation another.”

United States v. Jones, 502 F.3d 388 (6th Cir. 2007)

The evidence was insufficient to support the forfeiture of the real property in this case. The claimants were convicted of participation in a drug conspiracy, but there was insufficient evidence that they engaged in any specific drug transactions once they moved to the property that was the subject of the criminal forfeiture. The agent speculated that “he had no reason to believe that they did not continue.” This was insufficient evidence to support the forfeiture.

United States v. Real Property Located at 3234 Washington Ave. North, Minneapolis, 480 F.3d 841 (8th Cir. 2007)

In light of conflicting affidavits about the use of the subject property for drug deals, summary judgment should not have been granted to the government in this forfeiture action. Some witnesses averred that they never saw drugs at the location and other affidavits challenged the credibility of the government’s witnesses.

United States v. Swanson, 394 F.3d 520 (7th Cir. 2005)

The Seventh Circuit condemned a forfeiture judgment in this complicated bank fraud case, because there was insufficient evidence linking all the property being forfeited to the ill-gotten gains generated by the fraud. The government seemed to merge the issue of “fraud loss” under the guidelines, with restitution and forfeiture, each of which has separate and distinct bases. The fact that a “victim” may be entitled to restitution in a certain amount does not automatically mean that the defendant’s forfeiture exposure is the same. Similarly, the fact that fraud loss under the guidelines includes certain amounts that qualify as “intended loss” does not mean that that amount of money is forfeitable. The court also questioned the “ink the bottle” theory of forfeiting a bank account – that is, forfeiting an entire account when any forfeitable money is deposited in the account. Except in cases where the entire company is fraudulent, or engaged in criminal activity (or where a bank account is used to camouflage tainted assets), the amount of money being forfeited should represent the amount of ill-gotten assets, not the entire bank account into which tainted assets are deposited.

United States v. $242,484, 389 F.3d 1149 (11th Cir. 2004) en banc.

The Eleventh Circuit held that the evidence was sufficient to support the forfeiture of the currency seized by government agents at the Miami airport. A drug-detecting dog alerted to the money, which was wrapped in plastic and hidden in paper bags in the claimant’s backpack. The claimant’s inability to provide a detailed explanation where she had been staying or from whom she received the money, was also part of the probable cause calculus. In addition, the mere fact that the claimant was traveling from New York to Miami with over 40 pounds of cash, rather than going to a bank and obtaining a cashier’s check (or wiring the money) was another factor that could be considered in evaluating whether there was probable cause.

United States v. Puche, 350 F.3d 1137 (11th Cir. 2003)

If the defendant commingles forfeitable funds in an account with “clean” money for the purpose of disguising the tainted funds, the entire account is subject to forfeiture on a facilitation theory. Here, the defendants commingled $22,375 into an account that had $1.6 million. Forfeiting the entire account was appropriate and did not violate the Excessive Fines Clause.

United States v. Bornfield, 145 F.3d 1123 (10th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was an accountant who agreed to deposit cash ($13,000) from two of his clients and then write a check on their behalf to purchase some land. He was prosecuted for money laundering and structuring (he deposited the cash incrementally). He was convicted of money laundering and the jury then ordered that he forfeit $13,000 from his account. The Tenth Circuit held that the forfeiture was improper. Money remaining in the defendant’s account was not “involved” in the offense and was not “traceable” to the offense. All the tainted funds went into the cash in the form of cash and went out in the form of a check to buy the property. The next question is whether other money in the account somehow “facilitated” the offense. There was no effort to disguise the tainted funds in this case. The mere pooling or commingling of tainted and untainted funds in an account does not, without more, render the entire contents of the account subject to forfeiture, unless the account is used to disguise the tainted funds. The substitute asset provision was also unavailable in this case, because in a money laundering case, the use of the substitute asset provision is unavailable if the defendant is the intermediary of tainted funds. 18 U.S.C. § 982(b)(2). Moreover, the jury’s verdict ordering forfeiture was void, therefore, there was no basis for ordering the forfeiture of substitute assets.

United States v. Garcia-Guizar, 160 F.3d 511 (9th Cir. 1998)

The police executed a search warrant at the defendant home and storage locker after he participated in an undercover drug transaction. The police found $43,000 in currency in the storage locker. There was insufficient proof to support the criminal forfeiture of this money. The money may only be criminally forfeited if it represents proceeds of the offenses (three undercover transactions) for which the defendant was indicted and convicted. Money that is “relevant conduct” (in the Guidelines use of the term) is not subject to 21 U.S.C. § 853(a)(1) forfeiture.
FORGERY

United States v. Powell, 767 F.3d 1026 (10th Cir. 2014)

The defendant stole checks from the mail and deposited them into his bank accounts at several banks. The indictment alleged that the defendant possessed and uttered forged checks “of an organization, the activities of which affected interstate commerce . . .” At trial the government alleged that the banks into which the checks were deposited were the “organizations” alleged in the indictment. But the checks were not “of the banks” into which they were deposited.

United States v. Hunt, 456 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 2006)

The federal statute that makes it a crime to utter a forged security, 18 U.S.C. § 513, does not apply to a defendant who has authority to write checks on behalf of her employer, but misuses this authority to steal money from the employer. The statute only applies in situations in which a document purports to be genuine but is not because it has been falsely altered, completed, signed, or endorsed.

United States v. LeCoe, 936 F.2d 398 (9th Cir. 1991)

The defendant forged endorsements on several U.S. Treasury checks, but each check was in an amount less than $500.00. This amounts to several separate misdemeanor offenses. The checks should not be aggregated so as to result in a felony offense because of the sum of the forged checks.

United States v. Faust, 850 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1988)

The defendant signed “Secretary of Transportation” and then his initials next to that signature to endorse a check. No attempt was made to sign the actual secretary of transportation’s name. This does not constitute forgery; the use of the defendant’s initials next to the payee’s title indicated, although falsely, the defendant’s status as an agent of the secretary.
Funds for Experts

See also: Attorney-Client; Right to Counsel (CJA)

McWilliams v. Dunn, 137 S. Ct. 1790 (2017)

In this case, the Court held that the basic requirement of Ake had not been satisfied, because a mental health expert who was made available to the defense failed to do anything more than conduct a basic examination of the defendant and write a report. The expert did not assist the defense in evaluating, preparing and presenting a defense based on the mental health status of the defendant. A remand to the Eleventh Circuit was required to decide whether compliance with Akes’ requirement would have made a difference in the death penalty decision.

United States v. Pete, 819 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 2016)

The trial court erred in failing to appoint an expert to evaluate the defendant prior to his sentencing. The defendant was being resentenced after having previously (many years ago), been sentenced as a juvenile to a mandatory life sentence without parole. After Miller v. Alabama, necessitated a re-sentencing, the defendant requested funds to secure a psychological assessment prior to the re-sentencing. Denying this request was error and violated 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(e).

Conklin v. Schofield, 366 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 2004)

The state trial court erred in failing to provide funds to the indigent defendant to secure the assistance of an expert pathologist. (The court assumed, without actually deciding, that Ake applies to experts other than psychiatrists). An expert was necessary to develop the defendant’s theory that he acted in self-defense and that the knife wounds inflicted on the victim occurred post-mortem. Nevertheless, the error was harmless.

United States v. Smith, 987 F.2d 888 (2d Cir. 1993)

The trial court should have granted defendant’s request for funds to employ a psychiatrist to help him with his duress or coercion defense. Though the psychiatrist could not testify that defendant was, subjectively, coerced into committing the robbery, expert testimony would have been admissible on certain collateral matters, including sentencing.

Fuller v. Johnson, 114 F.3d 491 (5th Cir. 1997)

A request for expert assistance pursuant to 21 U.S.C. §848(q)(relating to habeas challenges to death sentences) and 18 U.S.C. §3006A(e)(1)(relating to expert assistance in trial preparation) should be considered ex parte. The failure to do so, however, was harmless error.

Starr v. Lockhart, 23 F.3d 1280 (8th Cir. 1994)

The trial court erred in this death penalty trial by denying the defendant’s request for funds to retain an expert to aid the defense in preparing and presenting evidence of the defendant’s mental retardation. This was virtually the only evidence that the defendant had to offer in mitigation of sentence. The state-ordered psychiatric examination was not a substitute for a defense expert.

Little v. Armontrout, 819 F.2d 1425 (8th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was confronted at trial by the testimony of the hypnotically enhanced testimony of the victim. Prior to trial, he sought funds to hire an expert to help him challenge that testimony. The trial court refused the request and the Eighth Circuit reversed on the basis of Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985). The Eighth Circuit re-affirmed this holding on rehearing, 835 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1987).

Smith v. McCormick, 914 F.2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990)

The Ninth Circuit holds that in order to comply with the Ake requirement, with regard to psychiatric assistance, the trial court must appoint a psychiatrist who reports to the defendant, not directly to the court. “The right to psychiatric assistance does not mean the right to place the report of a ‘neutral’ psychiatrist before the court; rather, it means the right to use the services of a psychiatrist in whatever capacity defense counsel deems appropriate – including to decide, with the psychiatrist’s assistance, not to present to the court particular claims of mental impairment.”

The state trial court erred in denying the defendant’s request for expert psychiatric assistance in preparing the mitigation phase of this death penalty case. The Ake requirement that funds be provided to the defense in preparing the mitigation phase is not limited to cases in which the state offers psychiatric testimony. In any case in which the state, during the sentencing phase, offers evidence, psychiatric or otherwise, of the defendant’s future dangerousness or continuing threat to society, and the indigent defendant establishes the likelihood his mental condition is a significant mitigating factor, he is entitled to Ake assistance.

Ford v. Gaither, 953 F.2d 1296 (11th Cir. 1992)

The state trial court erred in failing to appoint a psychiatrist to evaluate defendant’s mental state at the time of the murder. Though two psychiatrists had been appointed, one focused only on the defendant’s competence to stand trial, while the other testified that he did not have sufficient time to evaluate the defendant’s sanity at the time of the offense. Ake’s promise of a fundamentally fair trial was not achieved in this case.

Cowley v. Stricklin, 929 F.2d 640 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant had been committed to mental health facilities nineteen times prior to committing the offense charged in a state prosecution. Though the judge allowed the defense to have one 45-minute psychiatric examination, no further requests for psychiatric assistance were granted. Furthermore, the examination allowed by the judge involved a state psychiatrist who furnished his report to both the defense and the prosecution. Ake holds that psychiatric assistance must be made available for the defense. No such help was furnished to the defense. “The right to psychiatric assistance does not mean the right to place the report of a ‘neutral’ psychiatrist before the court; rather it means the right to use the services of a psychiatrist in whatever capacity defense counsel deems appropriate.” Finally the fact that a psychologist volunteered to help the defense – without having had an opportunity to examine the defendant, was not an adequate substitute for a court-financed expert.

In the state death penalty prosecution, the prosecutor notified the defendant that he intended to call a private psychologist during the penalty phase of the trial to identify the defendant’s sexual sadism and future dangerousness. The trial court erred in not providing the defendant with funds to employ an independent psychiatrist. Affirmed: 908 F.2d 695.
GAMBLING

United States v. Bala, 489 F.3d 334 (8th Cir. 2007)
In order to prove a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1955, the government must prove that the defendant violated a state gambling criminal law. Proving that the defendant violated a state administrative regulation is not sufficient. The evidence was insufficient in this case.

United States v. Iacoboni, 363 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004)
Payments of gambling winnings to the bettors constituted a money laundering financial transaction and the amount of these payments could be forfeited. However, the court erred in forfeiting additional money that may have been a financial transaction that concealed the money, because the money laundering charge only alleged “promotion prong” money laundering and therefore, a financial transaction that concealed the nature, source, or ownership of the money could not be forfeited. This would improperly amend the indictment.

United States v. Truesdale, 152 F.3d 443 (5th Cir. 1998)
The defendant’s gambling conviction was based on the alleged violation of Texas bookmaking laws. However, the evidence established that the bets were all received off-shore and thus there could have been no violation of Texas state law.

United States v. Murray, 928 F.2d 1242 (1st Cir. 1991)
In order to prove that the gambling enterprise involved five or more persons for a period in excess of thirty days, the government does not have to prove that the same five persons were involved for thirty days – there must be proof, however, that five persons were involved at all times during the thirty day period. In this case, persons who took bets on one or two occasions over a fifty-six day period were not “participants.” The evidence was insufficient to sustain the conviction. A conspiracy conviction was also reversed because the government failed to establish that the defendant conspired to have five or more persons involved for more than thirty days.

United States v. Montford, 27 F.3d 137 (5th Cir. 1994)
The defendants sought to avoid the reach of Mississippi gambling statutes by gambling on a boat which traveled outside the three-mile limit. They were prosecuted under the Travel Act for traveling in foreign commerce to accomplish the gambling. They were also prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. §1084. The cruise ship, however, did not travel in foreign commerce because it never traveled to another country, or into another country’s waters.

United States v. King, 834 F.2d 109 (6th Cir. 1987)
Under 18 U.S.C. §1955(b)(ii), the gambling operation must involve at least five persons. The Sixth Circuit holds that one incidental contact with a bookmaker does not include that person within the group of five. Rather, “regular contacts” among the five individuals are required to establish the offense.

United States v. Gilley, 836 F.2d 1206 (9th Cir. 1988)
This gambling indictment required the jury to find that five people engaged in a gambling operation which lasted at least thirty days. The trial judge failed to instruct the jury that they had to agree unanimously on the thirty-day durational element of the crime. This failure constituted reversible error.
GOVERNMENTAL MISCONDUCT

SEE ALSO: Brady; Search and Seizure (Good Faith).

The defendant was arrested on drug charges and the state crime lab confirmed that the substance was cocaine. The defendant filed a discovery demand, but then became a fugitive. Ten years later he was re-captured and demanded the right to test the substance. In the meantime, it had been destroyed. This did not violate the defendant’s due process rights, because there was no showing of bad faith on the part of the state, even though there was a specific discovery request by the defendant.

The fact that the DEA forcibly abducted the defendant in Mexico and kidnapped him back to California did not prevent him from being tried in the United States District Court. The forcible abduction of the defendant did not explicitly violate any terms of the treaty between the United States and Mexico. Because there was no violation of any treaty, Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886), applies and there was no prohibition on trying the defendant.

United States v. Bowen, 799 F.3d 336 (5th Cir. 2015)

In a case described by the Fifth Circuit as extraordinary and sui generis, the Fifth Circuit upheld the lower court’s decision to reverse the conviction of several police officers in connection with the Hurricane Katrina shootings. Three prosecutors, two from the U.S. Attorney’s Office and another from DOJ had anonymously posted numerous posts on a website, posing as citizens of New Orleans, whipping up anger in the community and creating a “carnival atmosphere.” The Court compared this to an angry mob outside the courthouse. The impropriety of this conduct was coupled with the US Attorney’s office denials that his assistants were involved, while at least one assistant who was involved sat in the courtroom and listened to these claims.

Gumm v. Mitchell, 775 F.3d 345 (6th Cir. 2014)

The prosecutor introduced evidence in a murder trial that the defendant admitted having sex with a horse (and that the horse talked to him) and other evidence of deviant sexual acts that were contained in psychiatric reports. The Sixth Circuit, reviewing the case in habeas, held that this amounted to flagrant prosecutorial misconduct that required setting aside the conviction.

United States v. Black, 750 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2014)

This decision contains a noteworthy dissent to the denial of a request for rehearing en banc. Judge Reinhardt posed the question: “Whether the government may target poor, minority neighborhoods and seek to tempt their residents to commit crimes that might well result in their escape from poverty[?]” He then noted, “These cases force us to consider the continued vitality of the outrageous government conduct doctrine itself.” The case involves the use of a CI, who was instructed by the government to go to Phoenix and recruit random people to help rob a non-existent cocaine stash house. The CI went to a bad part of town and looked for people who looked like bad guys. When the defendant said he was interested, the CI introduced him to the undercover agent who told the defendant about the large quantity of cocaine at the fictitious stash house (thus driving up the Guideline calculation). Judge Reinhardt emphasized numerous problems with this operation, including its inception: The CI was sent to look for “bad guys” in a “bad part of town,” i.e., a minority neighborhood. This was an open invitation to racial discrimination. The CI was not told to invite known or suspected criminals to get involved in the stash house robbery. This dissenting opinion contains a wealth of quotable observations, including, “The government verges too close to tyranny when it sends its agents trolling through bars, tempts people to engage in criminal conduct, and locks them up for unconscionable periods of time when they fall for the scheme. . . In this era of mass incarceration, in which we already lock up more of our population than any other nation on Earth, it is especially curious that the government feels compelled to invent fake crimes and imprison people for long periods of time for agreeing to participate in them – people who but for the government’s scheme might have ever entered the world of major felonies. Of course, the government also controls the (often extraordinarily long) amount of time that its targets spend in prison after reverse sting operations, as it can specify the amount of drugs involved in the fake conspiracies.” Chief Judge Kozinski joined this dissent. See also United States v. Washington, 869 F.3d 193 (3rd Cir. 2017), which addresses the defendant’s right to seek discovery in a selective enforcement claim, as well as the sentencing manipulation issues raised in these cases.

United States v. Leal-Del Carmen, 697 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 2012)

Deporting a potentially exculpatory witness prior to providing the defense an opportunity to interview the witness violates the defendant’s right to compulsory process and due process. The defendant, however, is required to show that the government acted in bad faith, a showing that was, in fact, made in this case, because the government had interviewed the witness prior to deporting him. The Ninth Circuit held that once the government is aware that a witness has exculpatory evidence, the government must alert the defense. If defense counsel has not yet been appointed or retained, the government may not deport the witness until after counsel is appointed or retained and given an opportunity to preserve the testimony. The Ninth Circuit also held that the trial court should have permitted the defendant to introduce the witness’s statement to the border agent prior to being deported. The out-of-court declaration was admissible pursuant to Rule 804(b)(6) – the forfeiture by wrongdoing hearsay exception – because the government rendered the witness unavailable. Finally, the appellate court held that the defendant was entitled to a “missing witness” instruction that would have advised the jury that the failure of a party to produce a material witness who could elucidate matters under investigation gives rise to a presumption that the testimony of that witness would be unfavorable to that party if the witness is peculiarly within the party’s control. The deported witness could have been paroled back into the country, but only the government could produce the witness under that procedure. “For the government to say that it isn’t responsible for her absence because it no longer knows where to find her comes close to the classic definition of chutzpah.”

United States v. Hills, 618 F.3d 619 (7th Cir. 2010)

During the prosecutor’s closing argument in this multi-defendant case, the prosecutor said, “And you don’t really need to worry about that Fifth Amendment protection unless you’re worried that you’re doing something illegal. They knew perfectly well precisely what they were doing. . . In this case, they’re using the Fifth Amendment not as a shield to protect themselves from incrimination, but as a sword to prevent the IRS from getting the information that they are entitled to.” This improper argument amounted to prosecutorial misconduct that required setting aside one defendant’s conviction under the plain error standard. See Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965).

United States v. Liburd, 607 F.3d 339 (3rd Cir. 2010)

The defendant was arrested attempting to smuggle cocaine form the Virgin Islands into the United States. When he went through the TSA checkpoint in the Virgin Islands, two blocks were seen in the Xray scanner and when questioned about the items, he said that they were blocks of cheese. Later, another TSA agent found that the blocks were cocaine. At trial, the defendant claimed that someone must have placed the items in his bag. The government never revealed in discovery that the defendant had made the “cheese statement” and prior to trial told the court unequivocally that no statement of the defendant would be introduced at trial. Repeatedly during trial, however (including opening statement), the prosecutor referred to the cheese statement. This was misconduct and that necessitated granting a new trial. Whether the government was required to make no mention of the cheese statement or not, it agreed to do so, and having agreed to do so, it was obligated to honor that agreement. See also United States v. McKinney, 758 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1985) (Agreements between the government and a defendant to forego the presentation of otherwise admissible evidence are enforceable.).

United States v. Nobari, 574 F.3d 1065 (9th Cir. 2009)

Eliciting testimony that Mexicans are involved in the drug trade in one way, and Middle Easterners are involved in another aspect, was improper, especially given the government’s closing argument that pointed out that the Middle Eastern defendants played precisely the role that was described by the agent. To the extent that the evidence was minimally relevant (for example, there was a taped call where one of the conspirators referred to “the Mexicans”), the evidence should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403.

United States v. Reyes, 577 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir. 2009)

In this “combative” trial involving allegations of illegal options back-dating, the defendant, who was a corporate executive who signed corporate financial statements defended on the basis that he thought the Finance Department was aware of the back-dating and properly documented the options transactions in the financial statements. Only one person from the Finance Department testified for the government and she testified that she did not know about the back-dating. However, the government knew – both through FBI interviews and through a pending SEC lawsuit against other people in the Finance Department – that people in the Finance Department were aware of the back-dating. No other people from the Finance Department testified (in part because they asserted the Fifth Amendment right to testify). In closing argument, the defendant argued that other people in the Finance Department knew (though there was no evidence of this at trial). The government then responded that no other people in the Finance Department knew (though the government knew that this was false). The Ninth Circuit held that this amounted to prosecutorial misconduct that necessitated reversing the conviction. “We do not lightly tolerate a prosecutor asserting as a fact to the jury something known to be untrue or, at the very least, that the prosecution had every strong reason to doubt.”
Ferrara v. United States, 456 F.3d 278 (1st Cir. 2006)

Twelve years ago, the defendant entered a guilty plea to a RICO case that charged various predicate offenses, including murder. A key witness for the government provided a statement implicating the defendant in one of the charged murders. Later, however, he recanted and told the AUSA and the case agents that the defendant was not involved in the murder. The AUSA and agents met once again with the witness and he recanted his recantation. The witness’s recantation was never provided to the defense, despite Brady obligations that were ongoing pursuant to the Constitution and Local Rules. The defendant entered a guilty plea, though during the plea colloquy, he never admitted participation in the murder. Years later, the witness’s recantation was revealed. The District Court granted § 2255 relief. The First Circuit affirmed, concluding that the government’s conduct amounted to a violation of Brady and amounted to gross governmental misconduct.

Earp v. Ornoski, 431 F.3d 1158 (9th Cir. 2005)

The petitioner was entitled to an evidentiary hearing on his claim that the state intimidated and threatened a witness he wanted to call at a hearing on his Motion for New Trial. Though the Ninth Circuit made no findings regarding whether this event actually occurred, the defendant proffered an affidavit from the witness and he was at least entitled to an evidentiary hearing in support of this allegation, which, if true, might entitle him to relief. Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); United States v. Vavages, 151 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998); Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972); Williams v. Woodford, 384 F.3d 567 (9th Cir. 2004).

United States v. Wilson, 390 F.3d 1003 (7th Cir. 2004)

The government withdrew a Rule 35 motion for reduction of sentence because the defendant threatened to bring a civil suit against the government unrelated to the criminal case in which he was cooperating (or in which he was presently involved). The Seventh Circuit held that this was “bad faith” and ordered the lower court to consider a reduction in sentence.

United States v. Rutherford, 371 F.3d 634 (9th Cir. 2004)

During the defendant’s tax evasion trial, several IRS agents sat behind the prosecution table. Post-trial interviews with jurors indicated that some of them felt intimidated by the agents. The lower court held that the defendant had to prove that the government acted with the intent to intimidate the jurors. The Ninth Circuit, however, held that the defendant was only required to prove a prejudicial impact on the jury; the defendant was not required to prove that this was the government’s intent. A remand for further development of the record was required. The defendant should be permitted to introduce evidence regarding the jurors’ perceptions of the agents’ conduct and any discussions among the jurors concerning the possibility of IRS retaliation if they voted to acquit.

United States v. Derrick, 163 F.3d 799 (4th Cir. 1998)

The district court dismissed the indictment in this case after deciding that there were discovery abuses and Brady violations. The lower court relied on its supervisory powers. The Fourth Circuit reversed in a lengthy opinion that canvasses the law regarding the propriety of dismissing an indictment based on governmental misconduct in the discovery process. Even with a finding of a “pattern of misconduct” the defendant must still demonstrate prejudice, except, perhaps, in the most extreme circumstances. In this case, the appellate court found insufficient basis for the drastic remedy of dismissal.

United States v. Gonzales, 164 F.3d 1285 (10th Cir. 1999)

Although the defense has no right under Rule 16 to interview a witness, it has a right to be free from prosecution interference with a witness’ freedom of choice about whether to talk to the defense. In this case, the district court directed the government to provide to the defense “face-to-face” access to its confidential witnesses. The government then misled the court about the government’s knowledge of the witness’s whereabouts. The Tenth Circuit concludes that excluding the witness’s testimony was not an appropriate remedy. Less severe sanctions, including allowing the witness to be deposed, or recommending disciplinary proceedings against the government attorneys should have been considered.

United States v. Wilson, 149 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor engaged in various instances of misconduct during cross-examination of the defendant. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that this conduct did not warrant a new trial. However, the court reiterated the principle, “That we find an error not to be reversible does not transmute that error into a virtue. The error is still an error. And urging the error upon the trial court still violates the United States Attorney’s obligation to the court and to the public.” The appellate court invited the trial court to take more aggressive measures, including disciplinary proceedings, contempt citations; fines; and reprimands to curb this type of misconduct.

United States v. Nolan-Cooper, 155 F.3d 221 (3rd Cir. 1998)

This case contains a primer on the law of governmental misconduct caused by an undercover agent getting under the covers with the target. The single inappropriate act in this case (the agent had sexual intercourse with the target one time over the course of a year-long investigation) was not enough to merit dismissing the indictment.

Siddiqi v. United States, 98 F.3d 1427 (2d Cir. 1996)

The government shifted its theory of prosecution in this Medicare fraud trial repeatedly during the course of trial, and in post-trial litigation. Its positions were inconsistent during various portions of the case and constantly changed to accommodate the evidence presented by the defense which rebutted the theory du jour. The Second Circuit vacated the conviction.

United States v. Tarricone, 11 F.3d 24, amended by 21 F.3d 474 (2d Cir. 1993)

The government possessed a handwriting expert’s opinion that the writing on a particular document was not the defendant’s. At trial, however, the government elicited testimony from more than one witness that the writing was that of the defendant and then argued this matter to the jury. This was prosecutorial misconduct. A remand was necessary to determine if the false testimony could have affected the jury’s verdict.

United States v. Cuervelo, 949 F.2d 559 (2d Cir. 1991)

A DEA agent was alleged by the defendant to have seduced her and had sex with her on at least fifteen occasions. He also allegedly bought her clothes and jewelry. The DEA agent denied this. The District Court decided that no hearing was necessary, because even if the facts... were as alleged by the defendant, there was no basis to dismiss the indictment. The Second Circuit remanded for a hearing. The court reviewed several cases in which informants engaged in sex with defendants (\textit{U.S. v. Miller}, 891 F.2d 1265 (7th Cir. 1989); \textit{U.S. v. Shoffner}, 826 F.2d 619 (7th Cir. 1987); \textit{U.S. v. Simpson}, 813 F.2d 1462 (9th Cir. 1987)) but considered this case a matter of first impression in light of the DEA agent’s alleged misconduct. The court concludes that a hearing is necessary. It was not clear if sex was used by the DEA agent to promote the defendant’s participation in the conspiracy, as opposed to his having only acquiesced to having sex with the defendant. It was also unclear who allegedly initiated the sexual conduct. Before deciding whether the indictment should be dismissed for outrageous misconduct, these questions had to be answered.

\textit{United States v. Wallach}, 935 F.2d 445 (2d Cir. 1991)

The government should have known that one of its witnesses was committing perjury and therefore, the defendants’ convictions in this case were reversed. This is not a case in which the government knowingly introduced perjured testimony; rather, the court finds that the government should have known that the witness was lying when, on cross-examination, he denied being a compulsive gambler. This witness was the “centerpiece” of the government’s case and the government should have further investigated his claims about not being a gambler.

\textit{United States v. Nolan-Cooper}, 155 F.3d 221 (3rd Cir. 1998)

The court set forth the analysis that should be undertaken when an undercover agent goes undercover with a target – that is, engages in sexual conduct with the target. In this case, the sexual conduct occurred at the conclusion of a lengthy sting operation and was not planned by the agents to further the target’s criminal conduct. This did not amount to a due process violation.

\textit{United States v. Voigt}, 89 F.3d 1050 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The Third Circuit thoroughly reviewed the principles governing a claim of outrageous governmental misconduct. First, the court noted that these types of claims are not limited to cases in which the government has initiated criminal conduct (i.e., the extreme entrapment-type cases). In this case, the defendant’s claim focused on the government’s use of an attorney who was employed by the defendant, to obtain information, including recorded conversations with the defendant, and assorted documents. The court also held that the trial court, which denied the motion, should have conducted a pretrial evidentiary hearing to further develop the record. However, after trial, the facts were sufficiently developed to support the rejection of the claim. The attorney – who was ultimately indicted, as well – initially approached FBI agents and reported that her employer was engaged in an advance fee loan scheme involving millions of dollars. She reported that she was not employed to provide legal advice, but rather, contacted potential banks and other parties. She became a confidential informant, but continued to work for the defendant, and was at times engaged in the fraudulent conduct without the knowledge of the government and without their consent. Because the government took several precautions during the course of the investigation to prevent the disclosure of any attorney-client privileged information and never affirmatively sought to intrude on the relationship and because the attorney was not acting principally as the defendant’s attorney (and certainly was not involved as the attorney for the defendant in the criminal case itself), the outrageous misconduct claim was properly rejected.
United States v. Weddell, 800 F.2d 1404 (5th Cir. 1986)

FBI agents subpoenaed the defendant’s wife and kept her in a hotel room for a day during the time that she wanted to go to the defendant’s trial. At the end of the day, she was brought to the courthouse and because of her fatigue was unable to testify on behalf of her husband. The court calls the government’s conduct “highly irresponsible” but remanded for further development of the record prior to deciding whether the conviction of the husband should be reversed (The remand order was modified at 804 F.2d 1343). The court also criticizes the government’s failure to advise the wife that she had no duty to talk to them.

United States v. Catton, 89 F.3d 387 (7th Cir. 1996)

The conviction in this case was reversed, because a government agent lied on the stand (he claimed to have talked to a third party about critical evidence the day before, when, in fact, he had one of his agents ask the witness to fax information to the government’s case agent) and the prosecutor, in closing argument, misstated the evidence on a crucial point.

United States v. LaFuente, 991 F.2d 1406 (8th Cir. 1993)

The practice of using trial subpoenas to compel witnesses to attend pretrial conferences is improper under Rule 17 of the Fed.R.Crim.P. The government admittedly did so. To determine if a new trial is required, the case would be remanded to the trial court to determine what prejudicial effect this procedure had on the defendant. The defendant argued that witnesses were improperly brought together to eliminate any discrepancies in their testimony.

United States v. McBride, 862 F.2d 1316 (8th Cir. 1988)

During the final argument, the government referred to counts which had been dismissed, asked irrelevant questions of the defendant’s former girlfriend, and sought to impeach a defendant’s witness without factual basis. These errors require the granting of a new trial.

United States v. Young, 17 F.3d 1201 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was arrested at a house where a methamphetamine lab was located. Other than his presence at the scene, the strongest evidence linking him to the crime was the discovery of notebooks in his truck with directions how to set up a lab. At trial, he explained that a resident of the house had thrown the books into the back of the truck. A law enforcement officer, however, testified that the notebooks were found by another officer taped underneath the dashboard. After the defendant was convicted, the officer who discovered the notebooks heard about this testimony and revealed that the notebooks were actually found in the back of the pickup and claimed that she told the AUSA this during the trial, before the other officer testified. Regardless of whether the AUSA purposefully introduced perjured testimony, or did so in good faith, a new trial was required. If the use of the perjured testimony was knowing, then the conviction must be set aside if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury. If the government unwittingly presents false evidence, a defendant is entitled to a new trial if there is a reasonable probability that without the evidence the result of the proceeding would have been different.

United States v. Kojayan, 8 F.3d 1315 (9th Cir. 1993)

Three people were caught smuggling drugs. Two defendants went to trial, while the third provided information to the government. The cooperating individual did not testify. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the third individual could not be compelled to testify. This was not true; the witness had signed a cooperation agreement and the government withheld this from the defense and the jury. This type of misconduct on the part of the government necessitated reversing the conviction. The government made this argument in response to the defendant’s argument that the government failed to call the cooperating individual, and therefore the witness probably had nothing to say that was favorable to the government. The government’s response was untrue and thus unfairly undercut the defendants’ argument.

United States v. Cooper, 983 F.2d 928 (9th Cir. 1993)

The DEA busted a home laboratory, believing that methamphetamine was being produced. Immediately after the equipment was seized, the defendant contacted the DEA and explained that it was not Meth, but an AIDS cure which the defendants were manufacturing. The DEA said the equipment was being kept for evidence, but the agents actually knew that the equipment was being destroyed. An expert for the defense testified that if the lab was configured as described by the defense, then methamphetamine could not have been the product. Because of the exculpatory nature of the destroyed evidence, as well as the bad faith conduct of the government, the only appropriate remedy was the dismissal of the indictment.

United States v. Westerdahl, 945 F.2d 1083 (9th Cir. 1991)

Though the government cannot be forced to confer immunity on a defense witness, the failure to do so can, in certain circumstances, amount to prosecutorial misconduct. This would be the case where the failure to do so intentionally distorts the fact-finding process.

Cuffle v. Goldsmith, 906 F.2d 385 (9th Cir. 1990)

Following his murder conviction, the defendant was told by agents of the state that he should discharge his attorney and withdraw his appeal because if he succeeded on his appeal, he would be subject to the death penalty. This represents misconduct on the part of the state and his appeal to the state court would be reinstated.

United States v. Wilson, 149 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor repeatedly suggested that the defendant was a “major drug dealer” even though he was only charged with one relatively minor sale of crack. Also, on cross-examination of the defendant, the prosecutor improperly asked about other offenses committed by the defendant. This amounted to prosecutorial misconduct, but reversal of the conviction was not required. The appellate court noted, however, that lower courts should employ other means of correcting prosecutorial abuses, such as: (1) contempt citations; (2) fines; (3) reprimands; (4) suspension from the court’s bar; (5) removal or disqualification from office; and (6) recommendations to bar associations to take disciplinary action. The court concluded that district courts are encouraged to remain vigilant and consider more fully such sanctions in cases of persistent or flagrant misconduct by prosecutors.

United States v. Crutchfield, 26 F.3d 1098 (11th Cir. 1994)

The government engaged in serious prosecutorial misconduct which necessitated reversing the conviction. Among the tactics which were condemned were (1) engaging in totally irrelevant inquiries of government witnesses in the specialized area of reptiles, for the purpose of demonstrating to the jury the prosecutor’s own expertise in the area; (2) introducing improper bad character evidence against the defendants; (3) implying that one of the defendant’s witnesses was involved in marijuana smuggling; (4) frequent disobedience of trial court’s rulings.
United States v. Eyster, 948 F.2d 1196 (11th Cir. 1991)

On cross-examination, a government witness indicated that certain counts of the indictment to which he pled guilty were false – he was not guilty of the charges to which he pled guilty. On re-direct, the prosecutor suggested that there was a typographical error in the plea agreement and thus, the witness only pled guilty to the charges which he was, in fact, guilty of. This re-direct was erroneous: there was no typographical error. The prosecutor’s questions were based on evidence not in the record and amounted to improper bolstering of the witness. This was reversible error. In assessing whether this was grounds for reversal, the court noted that “the government’s reference to a typographical error was ultimately an outright falsehood designed to mitigate [the witness’] willful perjury.”

United States v. Eason, 920 F.2d 731 (11th Cir. 1990)

The government engaged in misconduct by introducing evidence of a co-conspirator’s conviction for the offense for which the defendant was being tried. The Eleventh Circuit recites dozens of cases from the Southern District of Georgia in which the court found that the United States Attorney either engaged in misconduct or erroneously introduced evidence. The court reminded the prosecutors that they have a duty to properly advise the court of the Rules of Evidence, and not, as here, mislead the court as to the admissibility of certain evidence. The court also cites the famous passage from Berger v. United States, relating to the duty of a United States Attorney to seek justice, not a conviction.

United States v. Espinosa-Hernandez, 918 F.2d 911 (11th Cir. 1990)

A critical witness for the government in this drug prosecution was a customs agent. The government had also used an informant who was controlled by that agent, but who was not available at the time of trial. After the defendant was convicted, he filed a motion for new trial and a request for additional discovery relating to the customs agent’s impending charges of lying on his employment application, participation in the escape of an informant from custody, and distribution of drugs. Additionally, the defendant sought discovery concerning the agent’s participation in rendering the informant unavailable at trial. The trial court erred in not affording the defendant an opportunity to take additional post-trial discovery.

United States v. Heller, 830 F.2d 150 (11th Cir. 1987)

The government substantially interfered with the defendant’s due process rights in this tax evasion case by advising his accountant that if he did not cooperate with the government, he might find himself to be a co-defendant. Shortly after this warning was issued, the accountant advised the government that he would provide testimony against the defendant. The accountant then falsely testified that the defendant concealed facts from him, the accountant, and that the accountant had not heard of the defendant’s method of accounting and that he did not approve of this method. This was all a fabrication on the part of the accountant who had earlier made statements indicating that he was aware not only of the defendant’s accounting methods but had approved them. Conviction reversed.

United States v. Ballivian, 819 F.2d 266 (11th Cir. 1987)

Prior to sentencing, an assistant United States attorney who was not involved with this prosecution sent a letter to the judge purporting to describe the activities of the defendant and his family in an extensive money laundering operation. This was an improper ex parte communication. The case was reassigned to another district judge who had not received that letter but who was provided with a sentencing memorandum in a proper manner.
Brown v. Wainwright, 785 F.2d 1457 (11th Cir. 1986)

The State knowingly introduced false testimony relating to a witness’ tentative plea agreement. In granting habeas relief, the Eleventh Circuit holds that the proper legal standard is not whether the defendant can prove that the correction of the false testimony “probably would have resulted in an acquittal.” Rather, where, as here, the State intentionally uses false testimony, a new trial is required if the false testimony “could in any reasonable likelihood have affected the judgment of the jury.”

United States v. Richardson, 161 F.3d 728 (D.C.Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor was black; the jurors were black; the defendant was black and the eyewitness was black. The defense attorney was white. The defense was misidentification. In closing argument, the defense attorney argued vigorously that the eyewitness may have confused the defendant with someone else who may have been the perpetrator. The prosecutor responded that the jury should not fall prey to the “we all look alike” argument. The prosecutor repeated that “we all don’t look alike.” Then, in response to the defendant’s argument that the eyewitness was only 17, and therefore able to make a mistake, the prosecutor responded that in the defense attorney’s world, perhaps 17 year olds have not come of age, but in this world, they are grownups. Both of these arguments played on racial prejudice and amounted to plain error necessitating reversal of the conviction, even without there having been any objection by defense counsel.

United States v. Doe, 903 F.2d 16 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

The repeated references to the defendants as “the Jamaicans” and statements that “the Jamaicans” were an undesirable force in the District of Columbia, and that “what’s happening in Washington, D.C. is that Jamaicans are coming in; they are taking over the retail sale of crack in Washington, D.C. . . . “amounts to an improper reference to the race or ancestry of the defendants and requires reversal of the conviction.

Discovery in this massive bank fraud prosecution was being maintained at an independent document management firm. The defense was allowed to review documents at that location and to make copies. Unbeknownst to the defense, however, whenever the employees made a copy of a document for the defense, an extra copy was made for the government. The defense learned about this and moved to seal the government’s copies. Prior to a hearing on this motion, the government made an extra copy of their set of the defendant’s documents. The lower court held that this amounted to serious governmental misconduct, violating the defendant’s right to due process, to the effective assistance of counsel and also violated the work product doctrine. The appellate court agreed with this assessment, but reversed the lower court’s award of attorney’s fees and costs. 29 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1994).
GOVERNMENTAL MISCONDUCT
(Selective Prosecution)

   A defendant is not entitled to discovery from the government on the issue of selective prosecution, pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(C), because that rule only allows for discovery of information which is relevant to a defense to the government’s case-in-chief, not a selective prosecution claim.

United States v. Sellers, 906 F.3d 848 (9th Cir. 2018)
   The Ninth Circuit concludes that the strict standard for authorizing discovery in a selective prosecution claim (i.e., the Armstrong standard), does not apply in a selective enforcement, reverse-sting case. The Ninth Circuit joined the Seventh and Third Circuits in this holding: United States v. Davis, 793 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2015); United States v. Washington, 869 F.3d 193 (3rd Cir. 2018). The Ninth Circuit did not decide what the standard for allowing discovery is in every case, but said that the trial court should permit discovery if there is some showing of selective enforcement.

United States v. Washington, 869 F.3d 193 (3rd Cir. 2017)
   The defendant was entitled to engage in discovery to support his view that the sting operation that he was induced to join focused on minorities. The Third Circuit noted that there is a difference between a selective prosecution claim (which focuses on the prosecutors) and a selective enforcement claim (which focuses on law enforcement). Discovery is not as limited in a selective enforcement claim, because there are unlikely to be any records of similarly-situated defendant, as in the case of a selective prosecution claim.

United States v. Jones, 159 F.3d 969 (6th Cir. 1998)
   When the police went to the defendant’s house to make the arrest, they wore t-shirts with the picture of the defendant on the front and his wife (another target) on the back with derogatory statements. Just prior to trial, one of the officers sent a post card of an African American woman with bananas on her head to the defendant in jail. Based on this outrageous conduct – and proof that a disproportionate number of African Americans were referred to federal court for crack cocaine prosecution – the Sixth Circuit found that the defendant had established a prima facie case of intentional racial discrimination. The trial court erred in failing to allow the defendant to take discovery in pursuit of this claim.
GOVERNMENTAL MISCONDUCT
(Vindictive Prosecution)

United States v. Dvorin, 817 F.3d 438 (5th Cir. 2016)

While the defendant’s conviction was pending for bank fraud, the government conceded that there was a Brady violation and requested that the conviction be vacated and a new trial ordered. When the case was remanded, a new prosecution team added a forfeiture count to the indictment. After the defendant was convicted a second time, he claimed that this was a vindictive prosecution (or a vindictive addition to the indictment). The Fifth Circuit held that the government failed to rebut the presumption of vindictiveness.

United States v. LaDeau, 734 F.3d 561 (6th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was initially charged with possession of child pornography. The trial court suppressed a confession which prevented the government from proving that the defendant actually possessed the images. The government then opted to prosecute him on a conspiracy charge. This was permissible. However, rather than conspiracy to possess the child pornography, the government charged the defendant with conspiracy to receive pornography, which carried a mandatory minimum sentence (that did not apply to the conspiracy to possess offense). The Sixth Circuit held that this triggered a presumption of vindictiveness and ordered that the indictment be dismissed.

United States v. Jenkins, 504 F.3d 694 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was stopped crossing the border into the United States and acknowledged that she was involved in alien smuggling. During another entry, she was caught with marijuana in the vehicle, but denied knowing anything about the marijuana. She was tried for marijuana smuggling and was acquitted. Thereafter, the government brought charges against her for alien smuggling. She claimed that this was a vindictive prosecution, because the government knew about the alien smuggling facts before it brought the marijuana charges and thus, there was a clear appearance, which was not rebutted, that the alien charges were brought vindictively, because of her acquittal in the marijuana case. The Ninth Circuit held that this was a vindictive prosecution and directed that the charges be dismissed.
GRAND JURY

(Attorney/Client Privilege)

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 909 F.3d 26 (1st Cir. 2018)

At least in some circumstances, the attorney-client privilege applies to government employees and government attorneys. In this case, the apparent target of the grand jury subpoena was not a government employee, so the privilege applied to communications between an employee and the government lawyer.

In re Grand Jury Matter #3, 847 F.3d 157 (3rd Cir. 2017)

In order for work product or attorney client privileged communications to be stripped of the privilege on the basis of the crime-fraud exception, the defendant must engage in some overt act of fraud or criminality and not simply muse about using the information to commit a crime. In this case, the document was submitted to the grand jury which returned an indictment and later a second grand jury returned a superseding indictment. Nevertheless, because the government conceded that the grand jury was still investigating the defendant, the district court had jurisdiction to consider the privilege issue.

United States v. Gorski, 807 F.3d 451 (1st Cir. 2015)

The Perlman doctrine authorized a direct appeal of a company which challenged the issuance of a subpoena to its law firm and which the lower court held would be enforced pursuant to the crime fraud exception. Because the client could not be held in contempt and thereby bring an appeal prior to the disclosure of the documents (the client was not the recipient of the subpoena and therefore could not be held in contempt for failure to comply), the Perlman doctrine permitted the client to appeal the crime-fraud determination.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 745 F.3d 681 (3rd Cir. 2014)

This case contains a thorough primer on the procedures that are appropriate when the government seeks to pierce the attorney-client privilege by invoking the crime-fraud exception. The procedure—proceeding in camera before a trial judge ex parte—is appropriate. An immediate appeal under the Perlman doctrine is appropriate when, as here, the information is in the possession of the attorney, who would otherwise have no reason to risk being held in contempt in order to protect his client’s privilege; thus the client may appeal, rather than having to wait for the attorney to be held in contempt and relying on the attorney’s decision to appeal. On the merits, the Third Circuit held that crime fraud exception applies only if the client was in the process of committing a crime, or contemplating committing a crime when the attorney was consulted. It does not apply if the attorney is consulted and later the client decides to commit a crime or fraud.

In re Grand Jury, 705 F.3d 133 (3rd Cir. 2012)

When a grand jury subpoena is issued to a corporation for certain documents, or to an attorney for the corporation who is in possession of certain of the corporate documents the attorney must suffer the consequences of contempt in order to perfect an appeal of an Order by the district court that the attorney-client privilege does not apply. The Order requiring the attorney to produce the records is not directly appealable. The exception recognized in Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7 (1918), only applies to a third party custodian who has no interest in being held in contempt. In that situation, the client has the right to appeal the Order, because the custodian has no interest in perfecting an appeal and the client is not subject to contempt, so the client must be afforded the opportunity to appeal without the custodian, or the client first being held in contempt. In the situation with an attorney custodian, however, the client can simply insist that the documents be returned to the client and the client can then refuse to produce the documents, be held in contempt and appeal. With respect to Orders directed at former employees (including former in-house counsel), the corporation may appeal, because the corporation may not require former employees to return documents to the corporation. Finally, the Third Circuit held that Mohawk did not eliminate the Perlman rule, at least in the context of grand jury subpoenas. The Third Circuit, having disposed of the jurisdictional issue, then reached the merits of the crime fraud exception issue, as it related to the former employees and concluded that a sufficient showing was made by the government to invoke the crime fraud exception.

United States v. Ponds, 454 F.3d 313 (D.C. Cir. 2006)

The grand jury was investigating an attorney in connection with his receipt of attorney’s fees from a particular client – specifically, his receipt of a car as a fee. A grand jury subpoena was issued, seeking any and all documents relating to the receipt of the car, documents relating to the fees paid by that client, documents relating to the attorney’s sister, documents relating to any other cars provided to the attorney by the client, and any documents relating to the client’s mother. The attorney sought and received “act of production” immunity. Nevertheless, he was indicted. The D.C. Circuit concluded that the trial court did not conduct a sufficiently rigorous Kastigar hearing. The trial court concluded that Fisher controlled, rather than Hubbell, because the government obtained only pre-existing documents in defined categories. The D.C. Circuit disagreed, holding that the subpoenaed documents were sufficiently broad that they came within the Hubbell decision that bars the use of documents that are authenticated and categorized by the immunized target.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas 04-124-03, 454 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2006)

When a grand jury issues a subpoena to a person or entity that holds documents that arguably are privileged, the holder of the privilege (i.e., the target of the grand jury investigation) has the right to review the documents and assert the privilege. The government in this case argued that the government, through the use of a taint team, should do the initial privilege review. The Sixth Circuit held that the privilege takes precedence over the grand jury’s power to investigate and subpoena records.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 445 F.3d 266 (3d Cir. 2006)

The attorney communicated with the corporate client representative, advising her about a subpoena duces tecum. The crime fraud exception applied to this communication, because the government claimed that the client made decisions about shredding documents and deleting... emails (or at least not preventing the deletion of documents) based on this communication. This case contains a lengthy analysis of the crime fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege.

United States v. Bergeson, 425 F.3d 1221 (9th Cir. 2005)

A defendant jumped bail. His attorney, Ms. Bergeson, was subpoenaed to testify at the grand jury about whether she had told her attorney about the trial date. The trial court held that the information was not privileged, but the subpoena would be quashed as unreasonable and oppressive, because compliance with the subpoena would destroy the attorney-client relationship. The government had other evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the trial date (from the defendant’s mother and an earlier pleading filed by counsel indicating that the defendant agreed to a continuance). The Ninth Circuit affirmed, holding that the trial court did not abuse its discretionary authority under Rule 17(c)(2).

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 123 F.3d 695 (1st Cir. 1997)

When the grand jury issues a subpoena to a law firm for records relating to a client, if the trial court denies a motion to quash on attorney/client privilege grounds, the company may immediately appeal and need not wait until the law firm is held in contempt. Turning to the merits of this appeal, the First Circuit concluded that billing records may, in some circumstances, contain attorney/client privileged information where, for example, the bill reveals the nature of the work performed by the attorney. The record was too sparse in this case, however, to make this determination and a remand for further development of the facts was necessary.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, 144 F.3d 653 (10th Cir. 1998)

Generally, any privilege resulting from communications between corporate officers and corporate attorneys concerning matters within the scope of the corporation’s affairs and the officers’ duties belongs to the corporation and not to the officers. There are exceptions, however: First, the officer must show he approached counsel for the purpose of seeking legal advice. Second, he must demonstrate that when he approached counsel, he made it clear that he was seeking legal advice in his individual rather than in his corporate capacity. Third, he must demonstrate that counsel saw fit to communicate with him in his individual capacity, knowing that a possible conflict could arise. Fourth, he must prove that his conversations with counsel were confidential. Fifth, he must show that the substance of his conversations with counsel did not concern matters within the general affairs of the company. See also United States v. International Bhd. Of Teamsters, 119 F.3d 210, 215 (2d Cir. 1997); In re Bevill, Bresler & Schulman Asset Management Corp., 805 F.2d 120, 123 (3rd Cir. 1986); In re Grand Jury Investigation, 575 F.Supp. 777, 780 (N.D. Ga. 1983). The officer met this standard in this case. A related decision appears at In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 156 F.3d 1038 (10th Cir. 1998) (holding that intervenor established that his conversations with counsel focused on his personal exposure to jail time, even though it related to his employment in the corporation).

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 220 F.3d 568 (7th Cir. 2000)

There is no accountant-client privilege. However, where an attorney hires an accountant and the accountant is acting as an agent of an attorney for the purpose of assisting with the provision of legal advice, the attorney-client privilege applies. If what is sought is not legal advice but only accounting service, or if the advice sought is the accountant’s rather than the lawyer’s, no privilege exists. The preparation of tax returns is an accounting service, not the provision of legal advice. Documents used in both preparing tax returns and litigation are not privileged. An assertion of privilege must be evaluated by the court on a document-by-document basis. In this case, the trial court made inadequate findings of fact to enable meaningful appellate review of the document-by-document findings by the judge.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 219 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2000)
A corporation was being investigated for illegal firearms sales. The corporation explicitly sought to enforce the attorney-client privilege. An officer of the corporation, however, testified at the grand jury about certain dealings of the corporation and procedures that the corporation adopted in light of counsel’s advice; and the corporation’s in-house counsel also testified, but refused to disclose certain notes that were taken by his assistant during a meeting about which he testified (claiming that this was work product). The government claimed that the corporation waived both the attorney-client and the work product privileges. The Second Circuit held that waiver may be found where the privilege holder asserts a claim that in fairness requires examination of protected communications. Fairness comes into play when a party attempts to use the privilege both as a sword and as a shield. In other words, a party cannot partially disclose privileged communications or affirmatively rely on privileged communications to support its claim or defense and then shield the underlying communications from scrutiny by the opposing party. A quintessential example of waiver is the advice of counsel defense. Circumstances may also dictate that there has been a partial waiver. The issue is more complicated in the context of corporate entities, because, as here, the corporation may assert the privilege, but an officer – acting in an individual capacity – may inadvertently (or, for that matter, intentionally) waive the privilege. This case contains a thorough review of the jurisprudence of waiver and corporate attorney-client privilege and work product privilege issues.

Whitehouse v. United States District Court for District of Rhode Island, 53 F.3d 1349 (1st Cir. 1995)
The District Court did not exceed its authority in issuing a local rule which adopted the ABA ethics rule requiring judicial approval before a subpoena is issued to an attorney seeking information about a client.

United States v. Klubock, 832 F.2d 664 (1st Cir. 1987)
The First Circuit divides three to three thereby affirming the district court decision which upheld a rule which requires federal prosecutors to seek permission from the court prior to issuing a subpoena to a lawyer. The rule was adopted by the district court for the District of Massachusetts as a local rule.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum, 798 F.2d 32 (2d Cir. 1986)
The government sought to pierce the attorney/client privilege by relying on the crime-fraud exception. The affidavit supplied by the government, however, merely showed that the client corporation was communicating with its attorney at the same time that it was engaged in criminal activity. However, there was no probable cause to establish that the communication with the counsel was intended to facilitate or conceal the criminal activity. The privilege withstood the government’s attempt to elicit the information.
In re Grand Jury Subpoena (DeGeurin), 913 F.2d 1118 (5th Cir. 1990)

Although the Fifth Circuit held that the attorney/client privilege did not preclude issuing a subpoena to the defendant’s attorney, it nevertheless upheld quashing the subpoena under Rule 17(c) on the grounds that it was unreasonably burdensome when issued because the client was facing imminent prosecution and the attorney would have been distracted from his representation.

In re Antitrust Grand Jury (Advance Publications, Inc.), 805 F.2d 155 (6th Cir. 1986)

In order to apply the crime / fraud exception to the attorney/client privilege, a trial court must conduct an in camera ex parte hearing. The trial court must then distill what documents were subject to the crime fraud exception and may not simply authorize the disclosure of all documents and communications between the attorney and the client. The Sixth Circuit also held that the government must make a prima facie showing of the crime or fraud and must also demonstrate the relationship between the fraud and the particular communication which the government seeks to compel disclosed. The court emphasizes that the crime/fraud exception only applies to those particular communications intended to further the crime or fraud, and the trial court must make an in camera review of each and every document.

In the Matter of Grand Jury Proceeding (Cherney), 898 F.2d 565 (7th Cir. 1990)

A member of a drug conspiracy consulted with a lawyer and asked the attorney to represent a co-defendant. This client, who paid the fee for the co-defendant, was never himself indicted. The government asked the attorney who the client was who acted as the beneficiary of the other defendant. The attorney moved to quash the subpoena, the District Court granted the motion and the Seventh Circuit affirmed.

Ralls v. United States, 52 F.3d 223 (9th Cir. 1995)

The attorney was paid by an individual to represent the defendant at a bond hearing and at an initial appearance. The government subpoenaed the attorney to the grand jury to disclose the identity of the fee-payor. The Ninth Circuit holds that the information was privileged in this case: “An examination of [the attorney’s] sealed affidavit leaves no doubt that the fee arrangements and the fee-payer’s identity are inextricably intertwined with confidential communications and fall within the attorney-client privilege.”

In re Grand Jury Subpoena 92-1(SJ), 31 F.3d 826 (9th Cir. 1994)

United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989), requires a district court to conduct a two-step analysis in deciding whether the crime-fraud exception applies to certain documents: First, the court must require a showing of a factual basis adequate to support a good faith belief by a reasonable person that in camera review of the material may reveal evidence to establish the claim that the crime-fraud exception applies. At this stage, only evidence presented by the party seeking in camera review must be considered. Second, the court must make a discretionary decision whether to order in camera review in light of the facts and circumstances of the particular case, including, among other things, the volume of the materials the district court has been asked to review, the relative importance to the case of the alleged privileged information, and the likelihood that the evidence produced through in camera review, together with other available evidence then before the court, will establish that the crime-fraud exception does apply. At this stage, the party resisting disclosure may introduce evidence. In this case the trial court erred in ordering the disclosure of documents from the attorney which were generated after the crime or fraud was completed.
In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Horn), 976 F.2d 1314 (9th Cir. 1992)

Despite the fact the subpoena disclaimed any attempt to require the production of privileged information, because of the breadth of the request, it was unenforceable. The subpoena sought all financial information relating to sixteen of the attorney’s clients, without narrowing the specific financial information requested. “All financial information” would include retainer agreements which would set forth the nature of the work performed, as well as the strategy of the attorney.

In re Grand Jury Investigation (U.S. v. Corporation), 974 F.2d 1068 (9th Cir. 1992)

In response to a grand jury subpoena, the corporation submitted a log to the court, documenting the privileged nature of the documents sought by the government. In addition, the Corporation submitted affidavits which further demonstrated the privileged nature of the communications contained in the documents. Moreover, the government failed to meet the threshold of United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989), to establish that the documents fell within the crime-fraud exception.

United States v. Perry, 857 F.2d 1346 (9th Cir. 1988)

Just five days prior to trial, the government served a grand jury subpoena on the indicted defendant’s attorney seeking unprivileged information about the lawyer’s fee. This does not constitute a per se violation of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel. However, the Court characterized the government’s conduct as “clearly wrongful.” The timing and circumstances of the issuance of the subpoena strongly suggest an improper motive. Nevertheless, because no motion to quash was made, the sole question is whether the issuance of a subpoena rendered the attorney ineffective.

United States v. Anderson, 906 F.2d 1485 (10th Cir. 1990)

The Tenth Circuit upholds the subpoena issued to criminal defendants’ attorneys for fee information. The purpose of the subpoena was to determine whether the defendants had paid the fees for members of the “crew.”

In re Grand Jury Proceedings 90-2 (Garland), 946 F.2d 746 (11th Cir. 1991)

The last link exception survives in the Eleventh Circuit. The attorney was subpoenaed to the grand jury to reveal the identity of the client who asked the attorney to find another lawyer for his “friend” who had just been arrested. The attorney refused to identify the client. The attorney was held in contempt. The Eleventh Circuit reversed. This is a case in which the disclosure of the name would be the last link of incriminating evidence against the client. What he told the attorney was already known to the prosecutor – only his identity remained confidential. And so it should remain, the Eleventh Circuit decided.

United States v. Frazier, 944 F.2d 820 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with lying to the grand jury in an effort to protect her employer. The prosecutor was permitted to point out to the jury that the defendant’s lawyer had been hired and paid for by her employer. The appellate court held that this was admissible evidence. This case shows that the identity of the fee-payor can be admissible evidence which is used to incriminate the defendant. The case is worth noting when attorneys object to being compelled to reveal fee information to the government or the grand jury.
In re Federal Grand Jury Proceedings, 89-10 (MIA), 938 F.2d 1578 (11th Cir. 1991)

An attorney was subpoenaed to produce memoranda to the grand jury which was investigating one of his clients. The memoranda memorialized prior conversations between the attorney and the client which arguably came within the crime-fraud exception to the privilege. However, the memoranda themselves were not prepared during the course of the client’s crime. That is, though the initial communication between the attorney and the client were not privileged, the attorney’s subsequent communication with the client, which referred to those prior conversations, was privileged. “The attorney-client privilege protects communications rather than information . . . Thus, although communications otherwise covered by the attorney-client privilege lose their privileged status when used to further a crime or fraud, post-crime repetition or discussion of such earlier communications, made in confidence to an attorney, may still be privileged even though those earlier communications were not privileged because of the crime-fraud exception.”

In re Grand Jury Proceedings 88-9 (Newton), 899 F.2d 1039 (11th Cir. 1990)

There isn’t much left to the “last link” doctrine in the Eleventh Circuit. In this case, the Court upholds a subpoena to an attorney seeking fee information about an unindicted suspect who allegedly paid the fees of an indicted defendant. The specific information sought was the identity of the person on whose behalf a cashier’s check had been issued to the attorney.

In re Sealed Case, 29 F.3d 715 (D.C.Cir. 1994)

An individual who had been engaged in illegal transactions with Libya sought counsel from an attorney. No grand jury had been empanelled to investigate the individual’s transactions at that time. Nevertheless, the work product doctrine covered these conversations, because the doctrine applies to work performed, “with an eye toward litigation.” In determining whether the materials in the lawyer’s files are protected by the work product privilege, the testing question is whether, in light of the nature of the document and the factual situation in the particular case, the document can fairly be said to have been prepared or obtained because of the prospect of litigation. The privilege may be asserted not only by a lawyer, but also by his client. The lawyer also claimed that the conversations with the client were covered by the “common interest privilege.” In addition to the joint defense privilege, there is also a “common interest privilege.” This privilege protects communications between a lawyer and two or more clients regarding a matter of common interest. See In re Auclair, 961 F.2d 65 (5th Cir. 1992)(privilege applies if persons consult an attorney together as a group with common interests seeking common representation). In such cases, one client cannot unilaterally waive the privilege.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena (DeGuerin), 752 F.Supp. 239 (S.D.Tex. 1991)

After remand from the Fifth Circuit, the District Court again allowed the attorney to claim the privilege and refuse to disclose the identity of the fee-payor because the fee-payor was the attorney’s client and the fee arrangements were part of their confidential communications. Back in the Fifth Circuit, the appellate court affirmed at 926 F.2d 1423 (5th Cir. 1991). Because the fee payor was also a client, his identity did not have to be divulged.
GRAND JURY
(Generally)

A federal grand jury issued a subpoena to petitioner as the president of two corporations requiring him to produce the corporations’ records. There was no requirement that the petitioner testify. The Supreme Court holds that the custodian of corporate records may not resist a subpoena for such records on the ground that the act of production will incriminate him in violation of the Fifth Amendment. Had the defendant conducted his business as a sole proprietorship, under United States v. Doe, he could rely on the “act of production” privilege. However, as the president of a corporation, he may not.

United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36 (1992)
The government is under no obligation to introduce exculpatory evidence to the grand jury – not even if the evidence substantially negates the defendant’s guilt.

On the basis of various irregularities and misconduct at the grand jury, the district court dismissed the indictment against the defendants. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that absent any evidence of prejudice, governmental misconduct does not give rise to dismissal of an indictment. In order to determine if prejudice has been established, the defendant must establish that the “violation substantially influenced the grand jury’s decision to indict.” Because there were no allegations of constitutional errors at the grand jury, just procedural irregularities, the indictment should not have been dismissed in this case.

Irregularities in the grand jury may be rendered harmless by the subsequent conviction of the defendant at trial.

The Supreme Court finds a Florida statute which barred witnesses from disclosing their grand jury testimony to be unconstitutional. The unanimous decision held that at least in situations where the grand jury’s term has ended, the interests advanced by the law are insufficient to overcome the witness’ First Amendment right to make a truthful statement of information he acquired on his own.

The defendant sought to dismiss his indictment on the grounds that the prosecutor had provided information from his grand jury to the court and parties in a separate criminal case. The Supreme Court, in this unanimous decision, holds that this motion is not subject to immediate appeal under §1291. The defendant’s contention that he has a right not to be tried at all, not simply not to be convicted, finds no support in the grand jury clause of the Fifth Amendment or Rule 6(e). If a violation of the secrecy rules is to be remedied, it can be remedied after trial and final judgment has been entered.
Woodfox v. Cain, 772 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2014)

The district court’s conclusion that the petitioner established that the state trial judges acted in a discriminatory manner in choosing grand jury foremen was supported by the evidence and affirmed on appeal.

In re Grand Jury, 566 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2009)

A witness has a right to review his prior grand jury testimony if he shows a particularized need to do so. A prosecutor’s threats and comments about a possible perjury prosecution may provide a sufficient basis to require the disclosure of the witness’s prior testimony prior to having to testify again. The First Circuit noted that this only applies to allowing the witness to review his testimony; the witness is not entitled to a transcript of his prior testimony.

In re: Grand Jury, 490 F.3d 978 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

Witnesses before the grand jury appeared several years ago, and then were “invited back” to give further testimony. They requested an opportunity to review their prior testimony. The D.C. Circuit held that a grand jury witness has a strong interest in reviewing the transcripts of his own grand jury testimony and the government’s interest in grand jury secrecy is not as strong. On a case by case basis, the court should determine whether the witness’s attorney should be entitled to review the transcript. This holding only authorizes the witness to review the transcript and not to obtain a copy.

In re Grand Jury, 566 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2009)

This case arrives at virtually the same holding as the D.C. Circuit in the case above: the witness has the right to review his grand jury transcript, though this does not necessarily allow him to make copies or to allow his attorney to see the transcript.

United States v. Bergeson, 425 F.3d 1221 (9th Cir. 2005)

A defendant jumped bail. His attorney, Ms. Bergeson, was subpoenaed to testify at the grand jury about whether she had told her attorney about the trial date. The trial court held that the information was not privileged, but the subpoena would be quashed as unreasonable and oppressive, because compliance with the subpoena would destroy the attorney-client relationship. The government had other evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the trial date (from the defendant’s mother and an earlier pleading filed by counsel indicating that the defendant agreed to a continuance). The Ninth Circuit affirmed, holding that the trial court did not abuse its discretionary authority under Rule 17(c)(2).

United States v. Downer, 143 F.3d 819 (4th Cir. 1998)

After the defendant was convicted by a jury of aggravated sexual abuse, the court realized that the definition of the offense given to the jury violated the Ex Post Facto Clause, because the offense, as defined, did not exist at the time of the alleged conduct. The trial court then entered judgment on a lesser included offense. The Fourth Circuit reversed: entering judgment on the lesser offense, which was not the subject of the indictment, violated the Grand Jury Clause.
A motion to quash a grand jury subpoena is not moot simply because the documents sought in the subpoena have already been produced. The court still can remedy the error by requiring the return of the documents, or the destruction of the documents.

United States v. McLaughlin, 126 F.3d 130 (3rd Cir. 1997)

When a grand jury subpoena is served on a corporation for corporate records, neither the corporation, nor the custodian may assert the Fifth Amendment privilege. Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1988). The flip side of this, however, is that if the custodian produces certain records (or fails to produce certain records), this fact may not be used against the custodian personally in a trial against that individual. Here, the custodian (the defendant) failed to produce certain records and the government argued to the jury that the failure to produce these records was evidence of his guilty state of mind. This was reversible error.

In re Trial Subpoena Duces Tecum (Ellwest Stereo Theatres), 927 F.2d 244 (6th Cir. 1991)

A record custodian may be compelled to authenticate records which are brought under compulsion of a subpoena (in this case, a trial subpoena). Unlike in Cursio v. United States, 354 U.S. 118 (1957), where the custodian was asked about missing records, the custodian in this case was simply asked to identify the records which were produced.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, Subpoenas for Documents, 41 F.3d 377 (8th Cir. 1994)

Records which belonged to the defendants and which were prepared in their personal capacity, or as sole proprietors, were subpoenaed from their lawyer and accountant. The records in the possession of the accountant were given to him by the attorney. The question of whether the Fifth Amendment applies in this circumstance is decided under the following principle: When material has been transferred from a client to an attorney for the purpose of seeking legal advice and the subpoena is directed to the attorney, the proper inquiry is whether the subpoena, if directed to the client himself, would require compelled testimonial self-incrimination. In this case, moreover, the defendant did have the “act of production” privilege. By producing the documents in compliance with the subpoena, the defendants would be vouching for the genuineness of the documents.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Mora v. U.S.), 71 F.3d 723 (9th Cir. 1995)

The collective entity doctrine (i.e., the Fifth Amendment may not be invoked by a corporation or other collective entity) does not apply to a former employee of a collective entity who is no longer acting on behalf of the entity.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated April 9, 1996, 87 F.3d 1198 (11th Cir. 1996)

A custodian may not be forced to give testimony about the whereabouts of records not in her possession if she asserts the Fifth Amendment.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated November 12, 1991 (Paul), 957 F.2d 807 (11th Cir. 1992)

The defendant, the former Chairman of a failed savings and loan, was subpoenaed to bring various corporate records which were in his possession. He was no longer affiliated with the corporation at the time he received the subpoena. Nevertheless, pursuant to Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1988), he could not resist compliance with the subpoena on Fifth Amendment grounds.
United States v. Dean, 989 F.2d 1205 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

Defendant was the assistant to HUD Secretary Pierce who was under investigation by an Independent Counsel. She was subpoenaed to produce all documents in her possession relating to her work at HUD. She resisted, but was ultimately ordered to do so by the District Court. At trial, the government sought to introduce the records and the fact that she produced them pursuant to a subpoena. The “act of production” doctrine, however, applied in this situation. Though the defendant was the custodian of “government records,” just as the custodian of business records may insist on being immunized before being compelled to produce documents – with regard to evidence of the act of production (as opposed to the contents of the documents) – a government custodian has that same right. This case contains a good discussion of the act of production doctrine, as well as the “required records” exception which provides that records which must be maintained are not subject to the “act of production” doctrine. The required records exception does not apply in this case because the records being subpoenaed were not required to be maintained by the government.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum Dated April 19, 1991 (Continental Holdings), 945 F.2d 1221 (2d Cir. 1991)

In a bankruptcy civil suit, certain depositions were filed under seal. A prosecutor sought access to the depositions by means of a grand jury subpoena. The Second Circuit concluded that the government had to establish either a compelling need or the impropriety of the civil protective order.

In re Grand Jury, 111 F.3d 1066 (3rd Cir. 1997)

Individuals who had been illegally wiretapped (by another private party) had standing to challenge the government’s effort to obtain the wiretaps to present to the grand jury. 18 U.S.C. §2515 expressly provides that no illegally obtained wiretap may be used in any proceeding – and this includes the grand jury.

United States v. Bolton, 893 F.2d 894 (7th Cir. 1990)

An indictment returned by a grand jury which was sitting beyond its properly extended term must be dismissed.

United States v. North, 920 F.2d 940 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

Oliver North’s conviction was potentially tainted by the use of his immunized testimony before the Iran-Contra Committee of Congress. The trial court must convene a “line-by-line” and “item-by-item” inquiry into whether the testimony of grand jury witnesses or trial witnesses was affected by North’s testimony. The appellate court holds that witnesses may not “refresh their memories” with immunized testimony. Rehearing the case, 920 F.2d 940, the court reached the same result. The court emphasized that insulating the prosecutor from exposure does not automatically prove that immunized testimony was not used against the defendant. “Kastigar is violated whenever the prosecution puts on a witness whose testimony is shaped, directly or indirectly, by compelled testimony, regardless of how or by whom he was exposed to that compelled testimony.” The court also holds that the inquiry into the improper use of immunized testimony includes an inquiry into whether the grand jury improperly had before it immunized testimony. There is a distinction between presenting to the grand jury statements which were improperly obtained (such as a forced or un-Mirandized confession) and presenting Kastigar-tainted testimony to the grand jury. In the latter case, the grand jury is considering evidence... which was derived on the “promise” of the prosecutor that such use would never be made of the testimony.

In re Sealed Motion, 880 F.2d 1367 (D.C.Cir. 1989)

A witness before the grand jury who was named in an independent counsel’s report is entitled to a transcript of his testimony. Legislative history of the Ethics in Government Act reveals Congress’ awareness of the necessity of protecting individuals who are named in such reports.

The government issued a subpoena requesting fee information from the defendants’ attorneys. The defendants had already been indicted and were awaiting trial. The government contended that the information was not being sought for evidentiary purposes in the pending case, but for possible new tax charges. Of course, the grand jury may not be used by the government for pretrial criminal discovery. Because the dominant purpose of these subpoenas was to uncover evidence for trial, compliance with the subpoenas would be delayed until after judgment was entered in the pending criminal case.

The district court enjoined a state grand jury probe into the conduct of an attorney who allegedly identified an undercover agent in a public place, thereby spoiling her undercover role. After his first arrest, the case against the attorney was dismissed. The federal court enjoined a new grand jury investigation. Younger v. Harris did not apply, because there was no pending criminal case. The Eleventh Circuit affirmed: 949 F.2d 1163.

The court could not salvage this invalid indictment by a nunc pro tunc order purporting to extend the term.

A protective order was issued in a civil case which barred disclosure of the depositions which were being taken in the case. Despite this protective order, the United States Attorney subpoenaed all depositions to a sitting grand jury. The Court held that this was proper, noting that a grand jury is not limited by a civil protective order. The Court notes that the civil parties could have asserted the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination but simply relying on the protective order was not sufficient. The Fourth Circuit affirmed, holding that in order to invoke the Fifth Amendment rights, a witness must assert them and not rely on a civil protective order. 42 Crim.L.Rep. 2317.

A corporation’s shareholders and directors could intervene in a grand jury proceeding to challenge as abusive the issuance of grand jury subpoenas requiring all the corporation’s employees to appear at the same time on the same day.
GRAND JURY
(Subpoenas)

The subpoena served on the defendant required him to produce various documents that fit into several categories, such as “documents that reflect all income.” The defendant sought, and was given use immunity. Nevertheless, the government used these documents to obtain an indictment. The United States Supreme Court held that the indictment had to be dismissed. The act of producing the documents and corresponding authentication that these documents were responsive to the subpoena was “used” against the defendant. The Court observed that providing documentation in response to the broad categories requested was tantamount to answering a series of interrogatories about the sources and amount of income received by the defendant.

The government can obtain enforcement of a grand jury subpoena without having to demonstrate either relevance or the admissibility of evidence. The only limitation would be if the court determines that there is “no reasonable possibility” that the materials subpoenaed would yield something relevant to the criminal investigation.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, LK-15-029, 828 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2016)

The grand jury subpoena in this case was too broad, even under the R Enterprises standard. The subpoena required the production of all archived emails of the former Governor of Oregon, without any limitation. The government acknowledged that the emails would include personal emails between the Governor and his family, or doctors, or private counsel. The failure of the government to include any list of categories of emails that were sought rendered the subpoena too broad. Emails, in particular, are to be treated as “private papers” which are expressly included in the Fourth Amendment. “[E]mails are to be treated as closed, addressed packages for expectation-of-privacy purposes.”

United States v. Punn, 737 F.3d 1 (2d Cir. 2013)

As the trial court refuses to quash a subpoena on the basis that the subpoena was issued in connection with a pending case and not as a legitimate grand jury investigation, there is no right to interlocutory review. The Second Circuit declined to decide whether the absence of a right to appeal also applied to challenges based on attorney-client privilege, post-Mohawk.

In re Grand Jury, 705 F.3d 133 (3rd Cir. 2012)

When a grand jury subpoena is issued to a corporation for certain documents, or to an attorney for the corporation who is in possession of certain of the corporate documents the attorney must suffer the consequences of contempt in order to perfect an appeal of an Order by the district court that the attorney-client privilege does not apply. The Order requiring the attorney to produce the records is not directly appealable. The exception recognized in Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7 (1918), only applies to a third party custodian who has no interest in being held in contempt. In that situation, the client has the right to appeal the Order, because the custodian has no interest in perfecting an appeal and the client is not subject to contempt, so the client must be afforded the opportunity to appeal without the custodian, or the client first being held in contempt. In the situation with an attorney custodian, however, the client can simply insist that the documents be returned to the client and the client can then refuse to produce the documents, be held in contempt and appeal. With respect to Orders directed at former employees (including former in-house counsel), the corporation may appeal, because the corporation may not require former employees to return documents to the corporation. Finally, the Third Circuit held that Mohawk did not eliminate the Perlman rule, at least in the context of grand jury subpoenas. The Third Circuit, having disposed of the jurisdictional issue, then reached the merits of the crime fraud exception issue, as it related to the former employees and concluded that a sufficient showing was made by the government to invoke the crime fraud exception.

Armstrong v. Guccione, 470 F.3d 89 (2d Cir. 2006)

Although a corporate custodian is not entitled to raise the Fifth Amendment as a shield to the production of corporate records and property, Braswell established a “mitigating evidentiary privilege” to reduce the risk that the custodian's act of production would be attributed to him personally. Thus, “in a criminal prosecution against the custodian, the Government may not introduce into evidence before the jury the fact that the subpoena was served upon and the corporation's documents were delivered by ... the custodian.” Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1988). See also In re Twelve Grand Jury Subpoenas, 908 F.3d 525 (9th Cir. 2018) (document custodian may not assert Fifth Amendment privilege, but jury may not be told who produced (or failed to produce) the records in response to a grand jury subpoena to the corporation; this is the rule, even if corporate entity is closely held and it is obvious to the jury who had control over the records).

United States v. Bergeson, 425 F.3d 1221 (9th Cir. 2005)

A defendant jumped bail. His attorney, Ms. Bergeson, was subpoenaed to testify at the grand jury about whether she had told her attorney about the trial date. The trial court held that the information was not privileged, but the subpoena would be quashed as unreasonable and oppressive, because compliance with the subpoena would destroy the attorney-client relationship. The government had other evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the trial date (from the defendant’s mother and an earlier pleading filed by counsel indicating that the defendant agreed to a continuance). The Ninth Circuit affirmed, holding that the trial court did not abuse its discretionary authority under Rule 17(c)(2).

Doe v. United States, 383 F.3d 905 (9th Cir. 2004)

The subpoena to the defendant was so broad that it violated his Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination. Relying on Fisher and Hubbell, the Court held that the defendant was being required to authenticate (by his act of production) the existence of various documents. Therefore, holding the defendant in contempt for failing to comply with the grand jury subpoena was improper. The court specifically rejected the “foregone conclusion” exception to “act of production” immunity.
GUILTY PLEAS

(Advice of Possible Sentence and Consequence of Plea)

The failure to advise a defendant about the deportation consequences of entering a plea in a felony drug case amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Court held that in certain situations, the failure to provide any advice constitutes ineffective assistance – especially where the consequence of a plea is easy to determine and is “automatic” – while in other cases, it is required at a minimum that counsel advise the defendant that there may be immigration consequences and that the defendant should seek advice from an immigration law attorney. In other words, to be effective, an attorney may be required to actually provide accurate advice if the immigration consequences are clear; and at a minimum, should warn the defendant of possible consequences if the result of entering a plea is not so clear. The Court held that the right to effective assistance of counsel is not violated only when counsel provides erroneous advice.

If a trial court fails to advise the defendant that he will not have the right to withdraw his plea if the court rejects the government’s recommendation (as required by Rule 11), and the defendant does not object to this Rule 11 violation, the plain error standard applies. Moreover, in order to set aside the guilty plea under this standard, the defendant must show that he would not have entered a guilty plea had the trial court properly advised him. In other words, there must be a prejudicial “effect” of the trial court’s error; and absent a finding that the defendant would not have entered a guilty plea had he been properly advised, there can be no such showing.

United States v. Johnson, 850 F.3d 515 (2d Cir. 2017)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to a charge that carried a mandatory minimum sentence of life imprisonment. The judge asked the prosecutor to explain the various guideline calculations, which resulted in a sentence in the twenty year range and the prosecutor then said, “but that is trumped by the statutory mandatory minimum life sentence.” The judge did not ask the defendant if he understood that. The judge then advised the defendant about the period of supervised release. The judge also explained how the guidelines worked and that the judge was not bound by the guidelines (all of which was irrelevant, given the mandatory life sentence). After the plea was entered, trial counsel filed a sentencing memorandum that explained the guideline calculation, and failed to recognize the statutory mandatory minimum. The Second Circuit vacated the plea and concluded that the record demonstrated that the defendant did not, in fact, understand the consequences of his plea. The Second Circuit also noted that there was no reason for the defendant to enter a guilty plea in this case, because he received absolutely no benefit: “The only to ensure that such a seemingly irrational plea is made knowingly is to tell the defendant clearly and unambiguously that the judge will have no discretion at sentencing, and that accepting the plea will result in no less than the mandatory sentence.” The court ordered a remand to a different judge.

United States v. Monie, 858 F.3d 1029 (6th Cir. 2017)
When he entered a guilty plea, the defendant was told the maximum sentence for the Armed Career Act count was ten years, while in fact, it was a mandatory minimum 15 years. The defendant adequately showed that absent this misinformation, he would not have entered a guilty plea.

United States v. Swaby, 855 F.3d 233 (4th Cir. 2017)

Prior to entering a guilty plea to trafficking in counterfeit goods, the defendant was not warned by his trial counsel that this offense would make him categorically deportable because the offense was an aggravated felony. Even though the trial judge advised the defendant during the plea colloquy in general terms about the possibility of immigration consequences, the defense counsel’s failure to advise the defendant amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel and the plea was not voluntary. As for prejudice, the defendant established that he would have gone to trial if he had known the consequences of entering the guilty plea.

United States v. Batamula, 788 F.3d 166 (5th Cir. 2015)

If an attorney fails to advise a defendant of deportation consequences, the defendant may challenge the validity of the plea (and the attorney’s ineffective assistance), even if the trial judge, during the Rule 11 colloquy, provides that advice.

United States v. Avila, 733 F.3d 1258 (10th Cir. 2013)

The defendant litigated a Motion to Suppress and lost. He tried to enter a conditional plea, reserving the right to appeal the Fourth Amendment issue, but the government rejected this offer. The defendant then entered an unconditional plea. During the plea colloquy, the judge said that he had the right to appeal. The advice by the court did not explain that the guilty plea negated his right to appeal various issues, including the fourth amendment issue. This rendered the plea involuntary. The court should have advised the defendant that he had the right to appeal his sentence and perhaps certain other issues, but not the fourth amendment issue.

United States v. Akinsade, 686 F.3d 248 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant’s attorney told the defendant he would not be deported. The judge told the defendant at sentencing that he “could” be deported. Actually the offense mandated deportation. The Fourth Circuit held that the attorney’s bad advice was grounds to grant coram nobis relief 12 years after the plea was entered. See also Doe v. United States, 915 F.3d 905 (2d Cir. 2019).

United States v. Carreon-Ibarra, 673 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2012)

During the plea colloquy, the defendant was advised that he faced a sentence of 5 years to life on a gun charge. The PSR revealed that the gun was a machinegun, mandating a 30-year mandatory minimum sentence. The defendant sought to withdraw his plea. The trial court erred in refusing to allow him to withdraw, given the inaccurate advice about the existence of a mandatory minimum sentence.

United States v. Ortiz-Garcia, 665 F.3d 279 (1st Cir. 2011)

The trial court failed to properly advise the defendant of the possible maximum sentence that he faced. This rendered the plea and the appeal waiver void.
Tovar Mendoza v. Hatch, 620 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2010)

The trial attorney’s grossly inaccurate statement to the defendant about the amount of time he would be required to serve if he pled guilty amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel and rendered the guilty plea involuntary. Defense counsel told the defendant his sentence would be three years. The sentence imposed was 25 years.

United States v. Self, 596 F.3d 245 (5th Cir. 2010)

If the district court does not intend to adhere to the terms of a binding plea agreement that was entered pursuant to Rule 11(c)(1)(C), the court must clearly state that the court rejects the plea agreement in toto. In this case, the trial court advised the defendant that the court would accept the plea except as to the sentence on one of the counts. The court may not accept a binding plea in part. This should have been more accurately explained to the defendant so that he could have made a decision whether to withdraw his plea.

United States v. Gray, 581 F.3d 749 (8th Cir. 2009)

Because the judge failed to correctly advise the defendant of the possible maximum sentence he faced, the guilty plea was defective. The fact that the judge ultimately imposed a sentence below the amount that he advised the defendant was the maximum sentence did not cure the error.

United States v. Rivera-Maldonado, 560 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2009)

Erroneously advising a defendant that the term of supervised release is three years, when it is actually life amounts to plain error and the guilty plea was set aside, even though there was no objection at the time of sentencing.

Jamison v. Klem, 544 F.3d 266 (3rd Cir. 2008)

Failing to advise a defendant of a mandatory minimum five year sentence rendered a state court guilty plea invalid, even though the defendant was aware of the twenty year sentence that he was exposed to by entering a guilty plea.

United States v. Hairston, 522 F.3d 336 (4th Cir. 2008)

When the defendant entered a guilty plea, he acknowledged that he faced 0 – 10 years on the possession of a firearm by a convicted felon count, plus a mandatory minimum 5 consecutive for a § 924(c) count and a mandatory minimum consecutive 25 years for a second § 924(c) count. In short, he envisioned a thirty year sentence. The defense attorney, the court and the prosecutor overlooked that that the first count would be treated as an armed career criminal act count, requiring fifteen years, not 0 – 10. Thus, the defendant was sentenced to 45 years. The inaccurate advice tainted the guilty plea and necessitated remanding the case to give the defendant the opportunity to re-plead on all counts.

United States v. Sura, 511 F.3d 654 (7th Cir. 2007)

The district court’s failure to inquire about, and advise the defendant of the consequences of the appeal waiver as required by Rule 11(b)(1)(N) was plain error that negated the voluntariness of the guilty plea.
United States v. Benz, 472 F.3d 657 (9th Cir. 2006)
In this Assimilative Crimes Act case (driving under a suspended license) the mandatory minimum sentence was ten days in jail. Failing to advise the defendant of this mandatory minimum at the time the guilty plea was entered was error that resulted in setting aside the plea.

Hanson v. Phillips, 442 F.3d 789 (2d Cir. 2006)
The state court’s plea colloquy was insufficient to satisfy the standard of Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969). The advice about his right to go to trial was insufficient; the defendant’s express waiver of his right to go to trial was insufficiently demonstrated.

United States v. Adams, 432 F.3d 1092 (9th Cir. 2006)
The trial court’s failure to advise the defendant that there would be a mandatory fine rendered the guilty plea invalid. Even though the defendant was told about the possible maximum fine, he was not told that U.S.S.G. § 5E1.2(a) required the imposition of a fine. (The dissent predicts that this case would be rendered obsolete by Booker’s holding that the Guidelines are advisory).

United States v. Gonzalez, 420 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2005)
The defendant pled guilty to a drug conspiracy indictment that alleged that he possessed with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of crack. During the plea colloquy, he denied possessing considerably more. At sentencing, the judge found that he possessed an amount that triggered a mandatory minimum twenty year sentence. The factual basis for the plea, and the voluntariness of the plea, was inadequately established.

United States v. Murdock, 398 F.3d 491 (6th Cir. 2005)
If a trial judge fails to expressly discuss an appeal waiver with a guilty-pleading defendant (a violation of Rule 11(b)(1)(N)), the provision is subject to plain error review that is more relaxed than the plain error standard required by Dominguez-Benitez and Vonn. This is because the defendant is only seeking review, not overturning his conviction.

United States v. Rodriguez-Gonzales, 386 F.3d 951 (10th Cir. 2004)
The defendant entered a guilty plea, but on the record, informed the court that he intended to preserve his Motion to Suppress for § 2255 review. This is not a legal possibility, however, since fourth amendment claims may not be reviewed in a § 2255 proceeding and a guilty plea waives non-jurisdictional defects. This was not a valid knowing and voluntary plea, because the defendant did not correctly understand the consequences of his plea.

United States v. White, 366 F.3d 291 (4th Cir. 2004)
The defendant entered into a guilty plea, but claimed in a § 2255 petition that he was orally assured by his attorney and the AUSA that he could appeal the denial of the suppression motion. Both parties in the § 2255 proceeding agreed that defense counsel made this assurance. Both parties also agreed that this rendered the plea involuntary, because the defendant did not understand the consequences of his plea. The Fourth Circuit held that the trial court should have conducted a full evidentiary hearing to determine if the government did, in fact, orally assure the defendant that he could enter a conditional plea.

951
United States v. Harrington, 354 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2004)

The trial court’s inaccurate statement about the mandatory minimum sentence (stating that there was one, despite the fact that there wasn’t because of an Apprendi defect in the indictment) and incorrect statement about the mandatory restitution (failing to mention restitution), rendered the plea defective.

United States v. Martinez, 277 F.3d 517 (4th Cir. 2002)

Though it was not plain error, the trial court erred in failing to comply with the Rule 11 requirements that the trial court advise the defendant correctly about the applicability of the mandatory minimum and the statutory maximum sentence (the advice that was given was erroneous, in light of Apprendi); and in failing to advise the defendant that he would not be permitted to withdraw his plea.

United States v. Couto, 311 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2002)

Trial counsel affirmatively misled the defendant into believing there were things that could be done to avoid deportation (when, in fact, there were none). This affirmative misrepresentation is different than a failure to advise the defendant of collateral consequences of a plea.

United States v. Toothman, 137 F.3d 1393 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was misinformed during the plea colloquy about the sentencing guideline range for his offense. Though the actual guideline range was not a subject of the plea agreement and the defendant was advised that sentencing was a matter that would be determined by the judge and that if the guideline range had been inaccurately predicted by the attorneys, the plea could not be withdrawn, the advice given to the defendant by the court and the prosecutor about the guideline range was completely erroneous. Therefore, the plea was not voluntary.

United States v. Gigot, 147 F.3d 1193 (10th Cir. 1998)

Both the plea agreement and the in-court recitation of the possible sentence was incorrect. At no time was the defendant explicitly informed of the elements of the charges against her. The failure of the trial court to advise the defendant of the elements of the offenses and the correct penalties mandated reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Thorne, 153 F.3d 130 (4th Cir. 1998)

When the defendant entered his guilty plea, the trial court failed to advise him of the supervised release term and the nature of supervised release. The assistant United States Attorney reminded the court that a term of supervised release was mandatory (in fact, this provision was contained in the plea agreement), but the trial judge failed to ask the defendant, after the AUSA said this, whether he still wanted to enter a plea, and the court never advised the defendant what supervised release meant.

Thompson v. United States, 111 F.3d 109 (11th Cir. 1997)

A district court must advise the defendant, after sentencing, of his right to appeal, and the court’s failure to do so will require the court to re-sentence the defendant, even if it is shown through independent evidence that the defendant was aware of his right to appeal. This decision did not survive the Supreme Court’s decision in Peguero v. United States, 119 S. Ct. 961 (1999).

United States v. Siegel, 102 F.3d 477 (11th Cir. 1996)

The trial court failed to explain to the defendant that his guilty plea to certain §924(c) counts involved mandatory sentences that were required to be served consecutively to other sentences being imposed. This was a reversible Rule 11 violation.

Finch v. Vaughn, 67 F.3d 909 (11th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was on parole from a federal sentence when he was arrested by state agents on a drug charge. At the beginning of his state trial, he entered into a plea agreement which provided that he would plead guilty in exchange for receiving a ten-year sentence to run concurrent with his federal parole violation sentence. After the plea was entered, the federal government declined to revoke his parole, returning him to state custody. The government indicated that his federal parole would be revoked after he served his state sentence. Because it was clearly the defendant’s view that the sentences would run concurrent, this amounted to an involuntary plea of guilty. A voluntary plea requires an awareness of the consequences of the plea. Moreover, his counsel rendered ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Hourihan, 936 F.2d 508 (11th Cir. 1991)

The trial court failed to advise the defendant that his mandatory minimum sentence for this marijuana offense was five years incarceration. Advising the defendant that he was facing a maximum of five to forty was erroneous. The court also advised that the Guideline range was 63 to 78 months; this, however, did not correctly note that there was a five-year statutory mandatory minimum sentence. The incorrect guilty plea advice required vacating the plea. This decision pre-dates United States v. Dominguez Benitez, 542 U.S. 74 (2004).
GUilty Plea
(Conditional Plea)

United States v. Lustig, 830 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2016)
If the appellate court reverses the decision of the trial court that was preserved as part of a conditional plea, the defendant/appellant then must show that had the decision been reached in his favor in the lower court, he would not have entered the plea. He is not required to prove that he would have been acquitted at trial.

United States v. Fitzgerald, 820 F.3d 107 (4th Cir. 2016)
Rule 11(a)(2) permits a defendant to enter a conditional guilty plea that permits the defendant to appeal a pretrial ruling such as a ruling on a motion to suppress. The reservation of the right to appeal should be in writing, but this requirement may be satisfied by an unequivocal record made at the time the plea is entered. The rule also requires the consent of the government and the court. These two requirements must be unequivocal and clear on the record (a silent record is not sufficient). In this case, the prosecutor said nothing during the entry of the plea, during which time both the defense counsel and the judge acknowledged the right to appeal the decision on the motion to suppress. The appellate court held that the right to appeal was not preserved. However, because of the obvious impact this had on the voluntariness of the plea, the court permitted the defendant to withdraw his plea.
GUILTY PLEAS
(Factual Basis and Advice of Nature of Charges)

Bradshaw v. Stumpf, 545 U.S. 175 (2005)
If the defense counsel tells the court, on the record, that he has explained the nature of the charges to the defendant and the defendant acknowledges this, there is no requirement – in the Constitution – that the trial judge personally explain the nature of the charges or the elements of the offense to the defendant on the record.

United States v. Carillo, 860 F.3d 1293 (10th Cir. 2017)
The trial court failed to comply with Rule 11(b)(1)(G) (explaining the nature of the charges) or Rule 11(b)(3) (providing a factual basis). This was plain error requiring that the conviction be set aside.

United States v. Nickle, 816 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 2016)
The defendant admitted during the plea colloquy that he conspired to possess with intent to distribute a controlled substance in the district in a quantity at least 50 grams. The judge rejected the plea, stating that he wanted more facts. The trial judge erred. The judge’s discretion to reject a non-binding plea is limited; the court can ensure that the defendant understands his rights and that the plea is knowing and voluntary; and can insist on a factual basis, but only to the extent that the defendant acknowledges the facts that compromise the elements of the offense. Demanding more details is not permissible.

United States v. Figueroa-Ocasio, 805 F.3d 360 (1st Cir. 2015)
There was no plea agreement that preceded the defendant’s entry of the guilty plea and thus, the plea colloquy was all that evidenced the defendant’s understanding of the indictment, the elements of the offenses and the consequences of entering the plea. Yet, the plea colloquy was inadequate to achieve these objectives. The court was not accurate in its description of the mens rea for the offense: at one point, for the charge of possessing a stolen weapon, the court simply said that the defendant had to know that there was a possibility that the gun was stolen. The court also failed to adequately explain aiding and abetting liability. The First Circuit held that the plea had to be vacated and the case remanded to a different judge for consideration of the proposed plea.

United States v. Fard, 775 F.3d 939 (7th Cir. 2015)
The fact that a defendant is an educated businessman does not excuse the trial court’s failure to explain the nature of the charges and ensure that the defendant understands concepts such as “intent to defraud” and “fraudulent scheme.” In this case, the defendant was educated, but English was not his native language. The defense counsel answered most of the judge’s questions during the plea colloquy. He sought to withdraw his plea on the basis that he did not understand the nature of the charges. The Seventh Circuit held that the defendant was entitled to withdraw his plea based on the trial court’s failure to explain the concepts of fraud and the nature of the crime to which he was pleading guilty.

United States v. Hogg, 723 F.3d 730 (6th Cir. 2013)
The defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute fifty grams or more of crack. He entered a guilty plea to the lesser offense of possession with intent to distribute more than five grams of crack. The law at the time the plea was entered set a five year mandatory minimum. The trial judge correctly explained the law as it existed at the time of the plea colloquy. However, the Supreme Court later held that the Fair Sentencing Act applied retroactively and that the mandatory minimum did not apply to a charge of possession of at least five grams of crack. The defendant filed a motion to withdraw his guilty plea based on the incorrect statement of the mandatory minimum. The fact that the judge correctly cited the law at the time of the plea is not what matters. The defendant correctly predicted that the mandatory minimum would be retroactively lowered (based on the Dorsey decision) and the incorrect statement of the mandatory minimum (in hindsight) required that the defendant be permitted to withdraw his plea.

United States v. Culbertson, 670 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2012)

In order to trigger a mandatory minimum sentence based on drug type and quantity, the factual basis that is presented at the guilty plea proceeding must identify the drug type and quantity. Moreover, while the prosecutor’s statement of the type and quantity is the first step in this process, if the defendant contests that quantity, the factual basis for the plea will be insufficient. In this case, the government asserted that the quantity was five kilograms and the defendant stated that it was only three kilograms. This was not a sufficient basis to accept a plea with a ten-year mandatory minimum sentence.

United States v. Heid, 651 F.3d 850 (8th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was the mother of a drug dealer. When her son was in jail, she agreed to help him post bond. She retrieved several thousand dollars that she acknowledged was derived from drug dealing and gave the money to bondsmen to post the bond. She was indicted for conspiracy to launder money, with the object of the conspiracy being a § 1956(a)(1)(B)(i) violation (i.e., concealment money laundering). She entered a guilty plea with the factual basis essentially including no more facts than recited above. She later moved to withdraw her plea on the basis that the factual basis was insufficient to set forth a crime (i.e., there was no evidence of an intent, or an agreement, to conceal the proceeds). The Eighth Circuit held that the trial court erred in failing to grant the motion to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Szymanski, 631 F.3d 794 (6th Cir. 2011)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to receiving child pornography under 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(2). However, during the plea colloquy, it was not made clear to the defendant that the scienter requirement of the statute required that he know when he received the pornography that it included images of children engaged in sexual activity. See United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994). This defect in the plea necessitated setting aside the guilty plea.

United States v. Garcia-Paulin, 627 F.3d 127 (5th Cir. 2010)

A prosecution under 8 U.S.C. § 1324(a)(1)(A)(i) for bringing an illegal alien into the country requires some proof that the defendant participated in bringing the alien into the country. Simply providing a phony stamp for his passport that would have assisted him in getting a job was not sufficient evidence to prosecute the defendant under this statute. In this case, the defendant entered a guilty plea and the Fifth Circuit concluded that that factual basis for the plea was insufficient, because the only facts offered to support the defendant’s guilt related to his providing the fraudulent documents that were needed to assist the alien to enter the county.

United States v. Garcia, 587 F.3d 509 (2d Cir. 2009)

The fact that the defendant, a truck driver, accepted dirty money and then transported it in a hidden manner, and that he knew the recipients of the money would not report the money on their income taxes, was not sufficient, under the Cuellar decision, to establish a factual basis for a guilty plea to a money laundering charge. The key to concealment money laundering under § 1956(a)(1)(B)(i) is proof that the purpose of the transaction was to conceal the funds, not just that the effect of the transaction was concealment. Not reporting the money as income is not the same as “concealing” the source, location, or ownership of the money. Accepting a guilty plea based on the factual basis in this case was plain error.

United States v. Maye, 582 F.3d 622 (6th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug offense. The plea colloquy (the factual basis), established only that he possessed a firearm and that he also committed a drug offense. There was no suggestion that the gun was possessed to advance or promote the commission of the underlying drug offense. The factual basis was inadequate and the defendant’s questioning of the plea at the time of his sentencing demonstrated that he did not voluntarily enter the plea (and that neither the defense attorney, nor the judge knew the elements of the offense).

Hicks v. Franklin, 546 F.3d 1279 (10th Cir. 2008)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to second degree murder under Oklahoma law. During the plea colloquy, he admitted engaging in a dangerous activity (manufacturing methamphetamine) but was reluctant to acknowledge that he intended to kill the victim (his wife) as a result of the manufacturing process. The state trial court failed to explain an essential element of the second degree murder offense: that the defendant must act with a depraved mind in extreme disregard for human life. The failure to explain this element of the offense rendered the guilty plea defective as a matter of federal constitutional law. See Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637 (1976) (failure to properly advise the defendant of the intent element of an offense renders a guilty plea defective).

United States v. Mastrapa, 509 F.3d 652 (4th Cir. 2007)

The defendant transported drugs into an apartment. He claimed that he did not know what was in the packages, but entered a guilty plea. The factual basis recited by the prosecutor and accepted by the court failed to state that the defendant knew what was in the packages and the defendant did not acknowledge, on the record that he knew what was in the packages. The guilty plea therefore lacked a factual basis and was set aside by the Fourth Circuit.

United States v. McCreary-Redd, 475 F.3d 718 (6th Cir. 2007)

The trial court failed to elicit a factual basis, or assure that the defendant understood the nature of the charges. The defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute cocaine (he was arrested with three grams of cocaine). The “with intent” element was debatable.
and neither the factual basis, nor the explanation of the charges to the defendant during the guilty plea provided any assurance that the defendant was aware of this aspect of the charge to which he was entering his guilty plea. Though there was no objection during the entry of the plea, this violation of Rule 11 constituted plain error.

United States v. Adams, 448 F.3d 492 (2d Cir. 2006)

The factual basis of the plea focused entirely on the defendant’s role in a marijuana conspiracy. The plea did not support a sentence that focused on his participation in a cocaine conspiracy. The court also held that the “appeal waiver” did not bar a challenge to the underlying plea.

United States v. Monzon, 429 F.3d 1268 (9th Cir. 2005)

The Rule 11 colloquy failed to establish a factual basis for the defendant’s § 924(c) conviction. During the colloquy, in fact, the defendant denied that the gun he possessed had anything to do with the drugs which were in his house.

United States v. Gonzalez, 420 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant pled guilty to a drug conspiracy that alleged that he possessed with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of crack. During the plea colloquy, he denied possessing considerably more. At sentencing, the judge found that he possessed an amount that triggered a mandatory minimum twenty year sentence. The factual basis for the plea, and the voluntariness of the plea, was inadequately established.

United States v. Reasor, 418 F.3d 466 (5th Cir. 2005)

Forged checks that were written on the bank account of a church were not sufficiently connected to interstate commerce to support a federal prosecution for forgery. There were insufficient facts stated during the guilty plea proceeding that the church’s activities were “in” or that they “affected” interstate commerce. The factual statement at the guilty plea proceeding was therefore insufficient to support the plea.

United States v. Bradley, 381 F.3d 641 (7th Cir. 2004)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to carrying a firearm in connection with a drug offense. The factual basis offered by the government recited that the defendant carried the gun in a car that was transporting marijuana. The indictment, however, alleged that he carried the gun in connection with a cocaine offense. The defendant then moved to withdraw the plea on the basis of this variance. The trial court erred in denying the defendant the right to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Villalobos, 333 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defendant must be advised during the guilty plea colloquy that the government would be required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt any drug quantity triggering a mandatory minimum sentence if the defendant had gone to trial.

United States v. Minore, 292 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir. 2002)
As part of the plea colloquy, the court should explain to the defendant that the government would have to prove drug quantity beyond a reasonable doubt in order to trigger an enhanced sentence, if the case were to go to trial.

United States v. Gobert, 139 F.3d 436 (5th Cir. 1998)

During the plea colloquy, the prosecutor stated only that a gun was found in the co-defendant's car. This statement, alone, was not sufficient to create a factual basis for a § 924(c) gun violation. There was insufficient information provided in the prosecutor's statement to establish that the gun was carried by the defendant, or that it was carried in connection with a drug offense.

United States v. Brown, 117 F.3d 471 (11th Cir. 1997)

The defendant pled guilty to a CTR violation, but explained at sentencing that he did not know that his conduct violated the law. After the plea was entered, the Supreme Court decided Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135 (1994), holding that the defendant must have known that his conduct was unlawful in order to violate the CTR law. The defendant then filed a § 2255 petition to vacate his sentence. The Eleventh Circuit agreed that because the defendant was misinformed about the elements of the offense when he entered the guilty plea, the guilty plea was constitutionally inadequate.

United States v. Gigot, 147 F.3d 1193 (10th Cir. 1998)

Both the plea agreement and the in-court recitation of the possible sentence were incorrect. At no time was the defendant explicitly informed of the elements of the charges against her. The failure of the trial court to advise the defendant of the elements of the offenses and the correct penalties mandated reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Odedo, 154 F.3d 937 (9th Cir. 1998)

The plea colloquy in this case did not satisfy the requirements of Rule 11(c)(1), because the court failed to advise the defendant about the nature of the charges to which he was entering his guilty plea. The decision in this case predates United States v. Vonn, 535 U.S. 55 (2002).

United States v. Suarez, 155 F.3d 521 (5th Cir. 1998)

When the court initially read the charge to the defendant (possession with intent to distribute), the defendant balked and said, “I am only guilty of possession.” This was never adequately cleared up and proceeding with the guilty plea was a violation of Rule 11(c)(1).

United States v. Abernathy, 83 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 1996)

Defendant was charged with possession of a weapon with an obliterated serial number. At the guilty plea, the government and the court advised the defendant that the government was not required to prove that the defendant had actual knowledge that the weapon had this characteristic. This was erroneous and the defendant should have been allowed to withdraw his plea.
In deciding whether to permit a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea, prior to sentencing, Rule 32(d) directs the court to grant the motion if there is a showing of a fair and just reason. One such reason would be a showing that there was a core violation of Rule 11. A core violation would include an improper description of the mens rea element of the offense. Here, the court instructed the defendant that he could be found guilty of the theft offense only if he acted willfully – that is “the government has to prove that at some point in time you had some reasonable understanding that what you were about to do and actually did was wrong, was marginal conduct, was questionable . . . In other words, that you had a – had or should have had a pretty good understanding that this was wrong and against the law.” This was an inaccurate statement of the willfulness requirement of the theft offense. See Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952). Consequently, when the defendant moved to withdraw the plea prior to sentencing, the trial court erred in denying the motion.

The defendant was asked to sign a form which contained the typical information in a plea colloquy. The judge then asked the defendant in open court if he would change any of the answers. This does not comply with Rule 11’s requirement of a direct interrogation of the defendant about his understanding of the proceedings.

At the guilty plea proceeding, the defendant acknowledged conspiring with a government informant and a government agent in a conspiracy to distribute heroin. This does not constitute a sufficient factual basis in light of the requirement that there be at least one other person with whom the defendant legitimately conspired, other than government employees.

The trial court never read the charge aloud and never explained the essential elements. The guilty plea had to be vacated in this circumstance. The mere fact that the defendant had been given a copy of the information and acknowledged going over it with his lawyer is not a substitute for Rule 11’s requirement.

The trial judge failed to engage in any discussion with the defendant about the nature of the charges to which he was pleading guilty. This was not a case of a merely inadequate discussion, but a total failure to ensure that there was a factual basis for the plea. Automatic reversal is required in this situation.

The defendant entered a guilty plea to a charge of credit card fraud, but refused to acknowledge the factual basis. The government failed to set forth a sufficient factual basis for the plea. Specifically, the government did not offer any evidence that the defendant obtained the credit card with intent to defraud. A mere statement by the prosecutor that he could prove an intent to defraud, without offering any evidence in support of this proposition, does not satisfy the factual basis requirement. In short, in cases where the defendant pleads guilty but refuses to admit to conduct that demonstrates a factual basis for the plea (such as in an Alford plea), if the government undertakes to establish the factual basis by reciting what facts it would have proven at trial, the prosecutor must also identify the evidence it has to prove those facts. The appropriate remedy is for the prosecutor to be given another chance to reveal the factual basis. The defendant would not be given an opportunity to re-plead.

United States v. Lowery, 60 F.3d 1199 (6th Cir. 1995)

Rule 11(c)(1) requires that the court determine whether the defendant understands the nature of the charges before accepting a guilty plea. In this case, the defendant entered a guilty plea to a bank robbery charge, including a count that he possessed a weapon in connection with that crime. At the re-arraignment, the court did not read the indictment or the firearm count to the defendant. At the time of sentencing, the defendant expressed confusion about his culpability for the weapon, since he did not possess the weapon. The trial court never explained the concept of aiding and abetting to the defendant, insisting that he either withdraw his guilty plea, or be sentenced. This was erroneous. At no time did the court assure that the defendant understood the nature of the charges. While the government could show that the defendant knew that he was pleading guilty to aiding and abetting the actual robber commit the crime, there was no evidence that the defendant understood the nature of the charge.

United States v. Syal, 963 F.2d 900 (6th Cir. 1992)

The trial court’s failure to explain the elements of a wire fraud count and the failure to disclose the mandatory term of supervised release negated the validity of the guilty plea. The fact that the defendant had an experienced lawyer and that he was well educated, is no substitute for a proper Rule 11 proceeding.

United States v. Goldberg, 862 F.2d 101 (6th Cir. 1988)

In a lengthy opinion setting forth the requirements of a “factual basis” before the entry of a guilty plea under Rule 11(f), the Sixth Circuit holds that the trial court improperly inferred a factual basis which was not present in the record.

United States v. Van Buren, 804 F.2d 888 (6th Cir. 1986)

The factual basis for the conspiracy/guilty plea was not established. Though the indictment was read to the defendant, at no time was an inquiry made of the defendant whether he understood what it meant to be part of a conspiracy and whether he in fact acted in furtherance of that conspiracy. Failure to pose these questions to the defendant required setting aside the plea.

United States v. Longoria, 113 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 1997)

The trial court failed to adequately inform the defendant of the nature of the charges to which he was entering his guilty plea. This was a violation of Rule 11 that necessitated setting aside the judgment.

United States v. Smith, 60 F.3d 595 (9th Cir. 1995)

The trial court failed to inform the defendant of the nature of the charges prior to accepting the guilty plea. Even though the defendant waived reading of the indictment, this was a violation of Rule 11(c) and required that the guilty plea be set aside. The fact that the defendant admitted that he committed the facts underlying the indictment is not the same as being informed of the nature of the charges – to be voluntary, the defendant must understand the law in relation to the facts.

United States v. Bruce, 976 F.2d 552 (9th Cir. 1992)

The guilty plea in this case was void for two reasons: (1) the trial judge participated in the plea bargaining; (2) the trial judge failed to correctly explain the nature of the charges during the plea colloquy. The judge discussed the proposed plea with the defendants at length – on the record – and suggested that in light of the fact that they were parents, he thought it was a good idea to accept the plea. He suggested that this was far better than the life sentence the defendants were facing if convicted. Such discussions and participation in the plea negotiation is barred by Rule 11(e)(1). Though the judge’s advice was sound and compassionate, Rule 11(e)(1) has no exceptions. The plea was also defective because the judge simply advised the defendant that the charge was conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine. This does not adequately set forth the elements of the offense. Moreover, the defendant was actually pleading to aiding and abetting a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine.

United States v. Bigman, 906 F.2d 392 (9th Cir. 1990)

The defendant challenged his guilty plea on the grounds that he was not adequately advised of the intent element of the offense. The defendant was prosecuted for murder and pled guilty. This issue should have been more fully developed at the trial court and a remand was necessary to determine whether the defendant, in fact, knowingly and voluntarily entered a guilty plea.

United States v. Keiswetter, 860 F.2d 992 (10th Cir. 1988)

The failure to adequately set forth the factual basis for the district court’s belief that there was evidence of all the elements of the crime of conversion required remand to enable the defendant to re-plead. In its en banc consideration, the Court further concludes that the only remedy is to vacate the plea. A partial remand to permit the trial court to clarify its factual finding is not an appropriate remedy. Re-affirmed en banc: 866 F.2d 1301 (10th Cir. 1989).

United States v. Quinones, 97 F.3d 473 (11th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred in failing to explain to the defendant the elements of a §924(c) offense. This amounted to plain error.

United States v. Dewalt, 92 F.3d 1209 (D.C. Cir. 1996)

The defendant was charged with possessing a sawed-off shotgun with a barrel length of less than 18 inches. At the plea colloquy, the district court failed to advise the defendant of the nature of the charges – specifically, the requirement that the defendant was aware that the weapon that he possessed was illegal. This proceeding violated Rule 11(c)(1) and required that the conviction be set aside.

United States v. Ford, 993 F.2d 249 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

After entering a guilty plea, but before sentencing, the defendant moved to withdraw his plea. He asserted his innocence, claiming that the drugs and gun found in a room belonged to his brother, not him. The trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant’s motion to withdraw the plea. The government’s proof failed to establish the defendant’s possession of the gun other than his proximity to the gun. At the plea colloquy, the government did not establish the factual basis for the gun count and the court failed to adequately inform the defendant of the elements of the offenses to which he was entering his plea.
GUILTY PLEAS
(Miscellaneous)

SEE ALSO: PLEA AGREEMENTS

United States v. Doyle, 857 F.3d 1115 (11th Cir. 2017)

The failure to afford the defendant an opportunity to allocute at sentencing required that the case be remanded to give the defendant the opportunity to do so. The Rules are mandatory:
the court must address the defendant personally and invite the defendant to make a statement, Rule 32(i)(4)(a)(ii), and even if the defense does not object to the failure to comply with the Rule, the error constitutes plain error.

United States v. Bustamante-Conchas, 850 F.3d 1130 (10th Cir. 2017)

The trial court erred in failing to afford the defendant the right of allocution prior to sentencing. Plain error is established by the failure to address the defendant and to afford the defendant an opportunity to allocate.

United States v. Palacios, 844 F.3d 527 (5th Cir. 2016)

The trial court’s failure to give the defendant an opportunity to allocate prior to sentencing was plain error requiring a remand for a new sentencing hearing. The court reviewed the various factors that govern whether the error requires a remand, such as the defense attorney’s recitation of facts warranting a lesser sentence, the defendant’s opportunity to speak during the sentencing hearing, albeit not during the time that allocution is appropriate, and the defendant’s proffer in the appellate court concerning what he wanted to tell the judge that merited consideration in imposing sentence.

United States v. Green, 842 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2016)

A defendant may enter a plea of nolo contendere pursuant to Rule 11(a)(6), which requires the court to consider the public interest in allowing such a plea: “Before accepting a plea of nolo contendere, the court must consider the parties' views and the public interest in the effective administration of justice.” Id. The conviction that results following a nolo contendere plea is essentially the same for most purposes, including the conviction’s eligibility as the basis for recidivist punishment if the defendant commits another crime, the conviction’s use as impeachment pursuant to Rule 609, and the conviction’s use for deportation purposes. One exception, however, was found in United States v. Green, 842 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2016). In Green, the government sought to prove that a defendant had a prior conviction for the same offense for which he was on trial pursuant to Rule 404(b). The prior conviction was based on a nolo contendere plea. Citing Rule 803(22), the Green court, after thoroughly analyzing the ins and outs of nolo pleas, held that a conviction based on a nolo plea may not be introduced to prove that the defendant committed a prior similar act.

United States v. Nickle, 816 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 2016)

The defendant admitted during the plea colloquy that he conspired to possess with intent to distribute a controlled substance in the district in a quantity at least 50 grams. The judge rejected the plea, stating that he wanted more facts. The trial judge erred. The judge’s discretion to reject a non-binding plea is limited; the court can ensure that the defendant understands his rights and that the plea is knowing and voluntary; and can insist on a factual basis, but only to the extent that the defendant acknowledges the facts that compromise the elements of the offense. Demanding more details is not permissible. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant must be given the option of re-pleading, or having a new trial.

United States v. Moreno, 809 F.3d 766 (3rd Cir. 2016)

The prosecution may not cross-examine a defendant after the defendant offers his testimony in allocution prior to imposition of the sentence.

United States v. Vanderwerff, 788 F.3d 1266 (10th Cir. 2015)

The trial court’s rejection of the plea agreement on the basis that it included an appeal waiver was error.

United States v. Edmond, 780 F.3d 1126 (11th Cir. 2015)

The defendant pled guilty to a crime that was not the crime set forth in the indictment. This violated the Grand Jury Clause of the Constitution and required setting aside the conviction, even though it was not raised until noticed by the appellate court.

United States v. Paladino, 769 F.3d 197 (3rd Cir. 2014)

Even if there is a stipulated sentence in a plea agreement, the defendant must be given the opportunity to allocute. The judge retains the authority to sentence the defendant below the stipulated sentence.

United States v. Adame-Hernandez, 763 F.3d 818 (7th Cir. 2014)

When a judge accepts a guilty plea that is part of a binding, 11(c)(1)(C) plea, but defers accepting the agreement, if the court later decides to reject the agreement, all that the court may do is offer the defendant the opportunity to withdraw the plea. The district court is not authorized to withdraw or otherwise negate the plea. Here, after rejecting he plea agreement, the court withdrew the plea itself.

United States v. Arqueta-Ramos, 730 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir. 2013)

Mass guilty plea proceedings violate the requirement in Rule 11 that the court “address the defendant personally in open court.” While the court may advise more than one defendant at a time about the rights that are being waived by entering a guilty plea, each defendant must individually be questioned about his or her understanding of the rights and the voluntariness of any waiver of the rights that occurs upon the entry of a guilty plea.

United States v. Lewis, 633 F.3d 262 (4th Cir. 2011)

The plea agreement in this case contained language that indicated that it was a “binding” plea agreement (Rule 11(c)(1)(C)), because it said that the sentence “shall run concurrent” with a state sentence currently being served, rather than “the government would recommend that the sentence run concurrent” with the state sentence. Other parts of the plea agreement stated that the government “would recommend” certain Guideline decisions. The court’s colloquy with the defendant at the plea was also ambiguous. The Fourth Circuit holds that the judge should have treated this portion of the plea as binding and given the defendant the right to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Frownfelter, 626 F.3d 549 (10th Cir. 2010)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to a charge that was, as a matter of law, a misdemeanor. The judge, the prosecutor and the defendant, however, believed it was a felony. After the plea was entered and the defendant was sentenced, the government acknowledged that it was actually a misdemeanor and urged the court to simply vacate the plea under the contractual theories of “mutual mistake” or “frustration of purpose.” The Tenth Circuit rejected the government’s theory and ordered the district court to vacate the sentence and re-sentence the defendant to a misdemeanor sentence consistent with the charge to which he pled guilty.

United States v. Mancinas-Flores, 588 F.3d 677 (9th Cir. 2009)

During the plea colloquy, the judge asked the defendant if he was guilty. The defendant’s response was that there were no fingerprints connecting him to the crime. The judge asked again if the defendant was pleading guilty because he was guilty, to which the defendant responded, “Well, I’m really not guilty.” The judge promptly ordered that a jury be brought upstairs and commenced the trial. On appeal, the defendant claimed that rejecting his plea agreement was an abuse of discretion. The Ninth Circuit agreed, holding that the judge failed to set forth the factual reason for rejecting the plea. In addition, the judge never explained the charges to the defendant, so his protestation of innocence may have reflected his lack of understanding of the charges. A remand to permit the defendant to enter a guilty plea pursuant to the plea agreement was ordered.

United States v. Self, 596 F.3d 245 (5th Cir. 2010)

If the district court does not intend to adhere to the terms of a binding plea agreement that was entered pursuant to Rule 11(c)(1)(C), the court must clearly state that the court rejects the plea agreement in toto. In this case, the trial court advised the defendant that the court would accept the plea except as to the sentence on one of the counts. The court may not accept a binding plea in part. This should have been more accurately explained to the defendant so that he could have made a decision whether to withdraw his plea.

United States v. Roblero-Solis, 588 F.3d 692 (9th Cir. 2009)

The practice of advising 40 or 50 defendants at a time of the Rule 11 rights and procedures is not permissible, even if the actual entry of the guilty plea and factual basis is handled on an individual basis. There is no practical way that even the most conscientious judge can be assured that 40 or more defendants (some of whom do not speak English) are fully understanding the rights that are being waived when a plea is entered.

United States v. McIntosh, 580 F.3d 1222 (11th Cir. 2009)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to certain charges and the court unconditionally accepted the plea. Prior to sentencing, the government moved to dismiss the indictment because of an error in a date and presented a second indictment which corrected the error. The defendant objected, claiming that jeopardy had attached. The defendant then conditionally entered a plea to the second indictment. The Eleventh Circuit held that jeopardy had attached and the defendant could not be prosecuted under the second indictment for the same offense.

In re Gallaher, 548 F.3d 713 (9th Cir. 2008)

The defendant, with the consent of the government tendered a conditional plea that would have enabled him to appeal a certain pretrial ruling. Rule 11(a)(2). The district court judge deferred ruling on whether he would agree to accept the conditional plea until after he reviewed the PSR. He reviewed the PSR, but then rejected the conditional plea. Because a PSR may only be reviewed by a judge after a plea has been accepted (unless the defendant consents otherwise), Rule 32(e)(1), the case would have to be re-assigned to a different district court judge.

In re Morgan, 506 F.3d 705 (9th Cir. 2007)

A district court judge may not summarily reject all plea agreements that contain a recommendation by the prosecution as a matter of policy. The district court must make an individualized decision regarding any plea agreement and whether to accept or reject the agreement and cannot establish his own policy of rejecting all government recommendations that are contained in a plea agreement.

United States v. Rea-Beltran, 457 F.3d 695 (7th Cir. 2006)

The trial court repeatedly rejected the defendant’s attempt to enter a guilty plea, based on the defendant’s apparent lack of understanding of the proceedings, his statement that he did not want to forego certain pretrial motions and his statement that he did not know that he entered the country illegally. The defendant did, however, repeatedly attempt to plead guilty. The Seventh Circuit held that the trial court erroneously refused to accept the tendered plea. With regard to the defendant’s statement that he did not know that he was committing a crime, this did not amount to a protestation of innocence, because the defendant’s knowledge of the prohibition was not an element of the offense.

Ferrara v. United States, 456 F.3d 278 (1st Cir. 2006)

Twelve years ago, the defendant entered a guilty plea to a RICO case that charged various predicate offenses, including murder. A key witness for the government provided a statement implicating the defendant in one of the charged murders. Later, however, he recanted and told the AUSA and the case agents that the defendant was not involved in the murder. The AUSA and agents met once again with the witness and he recanted his recantation. The witness’s recantation was never provided to the defense, despite Brady obligations that were ongoing pursuant to the Constitution and Local Rules. The defendant entered a guilty plea, though during the plea colloquy, he never admitted participation in the murder. Years later, the witness’s recantation was revealed. The District Court granted § 2255 relief. The First Circuit affirmed, concluding that the government’s conduct amounted to a violation of Brady and amounted to gross governmental misconduct.

In re: Vasquez-Ramirez, 443 F.3d 692 (9th Cir. 2006)

A trial court does not have the authority to reject the entry of a guilty plea. The court can reject the plea agreement, but not a plea of guilty. An unconditional guilty plea must be accepted. Rule 11(a)(1), Fed.R.Crim.P.
In a case involving a package deal, the parties must reveal this to the district court judge. Thus, where one defendant’s plea is accepted by the government under the condition that other defendants enter pleas, as well, the trial court must take “special care” in determining the voluntariness of the pleas of all defendants. See generally Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1977).

The defendant offered proof in his § 2255 petition that he was under the influence of a powerful narcotic drug (painkiller) at the time he entered his guilty plea and that his attorney was aware of this. The district court erred in not conducting an evidentiary hearing to inquire into the factual support for this claim.

Where a plea agreement is part of a package deal involving other defendants, or third parties, the trial court should be apprised of the existence of this “package” and should ensure that the plea has been entered into voluntarily by the defendant.

Shortly after the trial began, the defendant entered into a binding plea agreement that provided for a 262-month sentence. Unfortunately, the attorneys for the government and the defense agreed that this would be achieved by pleading to one count – a § 371 count – that only carried a five year maximum sentence. The appellate court held that the plea would be vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings.

Defendant was charged with conspiring to possess firearms in connection with a drug offense (18 U.S.C. §924(o)) but entered a guilty plea to possessing a firearm in connection with a drug offense (§ 924(c)). This tainted the guilty plea and as a matter of law it could not have been a knowing and voluntary plea. Not only do these statutes have different elements (one is a conspiracy, the other is a substantive offense), but they also have different sentence provisions. Finally, the court held that an appeal waiver did not apply. Here, the plea agreement itself was invalid; not just the sentence.
GUILTY PLEA
(PLEA AGREEMENTS)

SEE: PLEA AGREEMENTS
GUilty Pleas
(Right to Withdraw)

See also: Ineffective Assistance of Counsel (Guilty Pleas).

If a trial court fails to advise the defendant that he will not have the right to withdraw his plea if the court rejects the government’s recommendation (as required by Rule 11), and the defendant does not object to this Rule 11 violation, the plain error standard applies. Moreover, in order to set aside the guilty plea under this standard, the defendant must show that he would not have entered a guilty plea had the trial court properly advised him. In other words, there must be a prejudicial “effect” of the trial court’s error; and absent a finding that the defendant would not have entered a guilty plea had he been properly advised, there can be no such showing.

When a guilty plea is entered pursuant to Rule 11(e)(1)(A), the government generally agrees to dismiss certain counts as part of the plea agreement. The court then will accept the guilty plea and delay accepting the agreement until after the pre-sentence report is completed. Between the time that the plea is entered and the court decides whether to accept the agreement, the defendant may only withdraw the guilty plea if he can demonstrate a “fair and just reason” pursuant to Rule 32(e). If the court decides to reject the agreement, however, the defendant must be afforded an opportunity to withdraw the plea. Rule 11(e)(2).

United States v. Andrews, 857 F.3d 734 (6th Cir. 2017)

The defendant entered a Rule 11(c)(1)(C) plea. The judge expressly stated at the time the plea was entered that he would await the preparation of the PSI prior to accepting the plea. The defendant thereafter moved to withdraw the plea pursuant to Rule 11(d)(1). The defendant had a right to withdraw the plea and denying his motion to withdraw the plea was error. The court noted that had the district court provisionally or preliminarily accepted the 11(c)(1)(C) plea, the result might be different, thus triggering the Rule 11(d)(2) “fair and just reason” for withdrawing a plea standard.

United States v. Davila-Ruiz, 790 F.3d 249 (1st Cir. 2015)

If a defendant enters a guilty plea before a Magistrate, he has the right to withdraw the plea until the time that it is accepted by the district court judge following the issuance of a Report and Recommendation by the Magistrate.

United States v. Symington, 781 F.3d 1308 (11th Cir. 2015)

The government and the defendant entered into a plea agreement that stated that the maximum sentence was ten years. This agreement reflected the misunderstanding of the defense and the government that the Armed Career Criminal Act did not apply. In fact, the ACCA did apply. When the plea was entered, the trial court explained that the court was not bound by the agreement of the parties, but stated that he could impose a sentence as long as ten years. After the court applied the ACCA and sentenced the defendant to fifteen years, the Eleventh Circuit held that the trial court was not permitted to impose a sentence of ten years, because that would be an illegal sentence; but the trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant’s motion to withdraw his plea.

United States v. Fard, 775 F.3d 939 (7th Cir. 2015)

The fact that a defendant is an educated businessman does not excuse the trial court’s failure to explain the nature of the charges and ensure that the defendant understands concepts such as “intent to defraud” and “fraudulent scheme.” In this case, the defendant was educated, but English was not his native language. The defense counsel answered most of the judge’s questions during the plea colloquy. He sought to withdraw his plea on the basis that he did not understand the nature of the charges. The Seventh Circuit held that the defendant was entitled to withdraw his plea based on the trial court’s failure to explain the concepts of fraud and the nature of the crime to which he was pleading guilty.

United States v. Adame-Hernandez, 763 F.3d 818 (7th Cir. 2014)

When a judge accepts a guilty plea that is part of a binding, 11(c)(1)(C) plea, but defers accepting the agreement, if the court later decides to reject the agreement, all that the court may do is offer the defendant the opportunity to withdraw the plea. The district court is not authorized to withdraw or otherwise negate the plea. Here, after rejecting the plea agreement, the court withdrew the plea itself.

United States v. Urias-Marrufo, 744 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2014)

Soon after entering a guilty plea, the defendant obtained new counsel and promptly filed a motion to withdraw the guilty plea on the grounds that her former counsel had not informed her that deportation was a virtual certain consequence of the guilty plea. The Fifth Circuit held that this was a valid basis for moving to withdraw the guilty plea and the lower court’s holding that Padilla only applied to §2255 proceedings was erroneous.

United States v. Benard, 680 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was stopped on the road on suspicion that he was involved in a drug transaction. Eventually, he was arrested. He was asked, “Will I find anything in the car when I search it?” The defendant responded that there was a gun in the car. The question qualified as “interrogation” and was not subject to the public safety exception. Because this appeal followed a conditional guilty plea, the proper remedy was to remand the case and allow the defendant to withdraw his plea, if he chooses to do so.

United States v. Heid, 651 F.3d 850 (8th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was the mother of a drug dealer. When her son was in jail, she agreed to help him post bond. She retrieved several thousand dollars that she acknowledged was derived from drug dealing and gave the money to bondsmen to post the bond. She was indicted for conspiracy to launder money, with the object of the conspiracy being a § 1956(a)(1)(B)(i) violation (i.e., concealment money laundering). She entered a guilty plea with the factual basis essentially including no more facts than recited above. She later moved to withdraw her plea on the basis that the factual basis was insufficient to set forth a crime (i.e., there was no evidence of an intent, or an agreement, to conceal the proceeds). The Eighth Circuit held that the trial court erred in failing to grant the motion to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Mendez-Santana, 645 F.3d 822 (6th Cir. 2011)

A defendant has a right to withdraw a guilty plea under Rule 11 if the trial court defers accepting the plea. In this case, the trial judge expressly said that he was going to “hold off” on accepting the guilty plea because of the absence of a plea agreement and questions about the underlying facts. The defendant thereafter attempted to withdraw his plea, which he had an unqualified right to do. Denying his motion was error.

United States v. Tyerman, 641 F.3d 936 (8th Cir. 2011)

The defendant and the government entered into a Rule 11(c)(1)(C) “binding” plea agreement and the defendant was expressly told at the time he entered the plea that he could withdraw the plea if the court did not accept the agreement. The trial judge did not accept the plea at the time the plea was entered, repeatedly stating that he was deferring making that decision until after he read the PSR. Prior to sentencing, the defendant announced that he wished to withdraw the plea. When he made this announcement, the court had not yet accepted the plea. The Eighth Circuit held that the defendant had the right to withdraw the plea, even though the trial judge promptly stated that he would accept the plea.

United States v. Bonilla, 637 F.3d 980 (9th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was aware of the possible deportation consequences of entering a plea, but counsel failed to give him advice – that is, that deportation was a certainty. In fact, the attorney was not aware that the defendant was not a citizen. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant should have been allowed to withdraw his plea: “A defendant demonstrates a ‘fair and just reason’ for withdrawing a guilty plea in circumstances in which the proper legal advice could have at least plausibly motivated a reasonable person in the defendant’s position not to have pled guilty.”

United States v. Lewis, 633 F.3d 262 (4th Cir. 2011)

The plea agreement in this case contained language that indicated that it was a “binding” plea agreement (Rule 11(c)(1)(C)), because it said that the sentence “shall run concurrent” with a state sentence currently being served, rather than “the government would recommend that the sentence run concurrent” with the state sentence. Other parts of the plea agreement stated that the government “would recommend” certain Guideline decisions. The court’s colloquy with the defendant at the plea was also ambiguous. The Fourth Circuit holds that the judge should have treated this portion of the plea as binding and given the defendant the right to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Self, 596 F.3d 245 (5th Cir. 2010)

If the district court does not intend to adhere to the terms of a binding plea agreement that was entered pursuant to Rule 11(c)(1)(C), the court must clearly state that the court rejects the plea agreement in toto. In this case, the trial court advised the defendant that the court would accept the plea except as to the sentence on one of the counts. The court may not accept a binding plea in part. This should have been more accurately explained to the defendant so that he could have made a decision whether to withdraw his plea.
United States v. Thompson-Riviere, 561 F.3d 345 (4th Cir. 2009)

The trial court erred in denying the defendant the right to withdraw his guilty plea prior to sentencing. The defendant entered a guilty plea to an illegal re-entry case. Prior to sentencing, a DNA test demonstrated that he may have been the child of an American, which means that he could not be guilty. Based on the possibility of legal innocence, the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

United States v. Arami, 536 F.3d 479 (5th Cir. 2008)

A defendant has an absolute right to withdraw a guilty plea prior to the time that the district court accepts the plea. Rule 11(d)(1). In this case, the plea was entered before a Magistrate and before the district court accepted the plea, the defendant sought to withdraw it. Denying his request was plain error.

United States v. McTiernan, 546 F.3d 1160 (9th Cir. 2008)

If a defendant seeks to withdraw a guilty plea based on a claim that his attorney failed to alert him that incriminating evidence might have been suppressed had a motion been filed, a hearing on this claim should be held. This type of claim can qualify as a “fair and just reason for requesting withdrawal.” Fed.R.Crim.P. 11(d)(2)(B).

United States v. Newbert, 504 F.3d 180 (1st Cir. 2007)

If a defendant withdraws his guilty plea based on newly discovered evidence of his innocence, the government may not invoke the “breach the plea agreement” penalties (such as various rights waivers, including a waiver of Rule 410) that would apply in other situations when the defendant breaches a plea agreement.

United States v. Segarra-Rivera, 473 F.3d 381 (1st Cir. 2007)

Based on the defendant’s pro se statements regarding the inappropriate pressure that counsel placed on him before he relented and signed his guilty plea, there was at least a colorable basis for inquiring into a possible conflict of interest before actually conducting a hearing on the issue of the defendant’s Motion to Withdraw his Guilty Plea.

United States v. Morris, 470 F.3d 596 (6th Cir. 2006)

In this most unusual case, the federal district court acted properly in dismissing the federal indictment because of a breach of the state prosecutor’s agreement to permit the defendant to plead to a state charge. Among other factors the court considered was the fact that the federal prosecutor participated in the state prosecution and plea negotiations.

United States v. Davis, 428 F.3d 802 (9th Cir. 2005)

When a defendant seeks to withdraw a guilty plea based on bad advice from his attorney, Rule 11(d)(2)(B) – formerly Rule 32(e) – does not require that the defendant prove that but for the bad advice, he would not have entered the guilty plea. That would be the standard post-sentencing. After the plea is entered, yet before sentencing, the “fair and just reason” standard in the Rule is less rigorous than the post-sentencing standard. In this case, withdrawal was justified based on the defense attorney’s mischaracterization of the possible sentence.
United States v. Garcia, 401 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s presentation of newly discovered evidence that contradicted evidence of his guilt was a fair and just reason that supported his withdrawal of his guilty plea. When he entered his plea, he entered an Alford-type plea. The Ninth Circuit noted that the newly discovered evidence need not be so persuasive that there is a reasonable probability that the defendant would not be convicted at trial. The court also held that it is not necessary for a defendant to claim actual innocence in order to be entitled to withdraw his guilty plea.

United States v. Patterson, 381 F.3d 859 (9th Cir. 2004)

Fallout from the decision in Ellis, which is annotated below: The defendant in this case entered a guilty plea pursuant to Rule 11(b)(1)(B). The amount of marijuana plants was acknowledged by the government and the defense to be in dispute and would require a hearing at sentencing. After the plea was entered, Apprendi was decided and the government acknowledged that the number of plants became an element of the offense. The district court vacated the plea. The Ninth Circuit held that this was impermissible. Once the plea was entered, only the defendant has the power to withdraw the plea; the court may reject the plea agreement, but it cannot vacate the guilty plea, itself. Vacating the plea in this case violated the Double Jeopardy Clause.

United States v. Bradley, 381 F.3d 641 (7th Cir. 2004)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to carrying a firearm in connection with a drug offense. The factual basis offered by the government recited that the defendant carried the gun in a car that was transporting marijuana. The indictment, however, alleged that he carried the gun in connection with a cocaine offense. The defendant then moved to withdraw the plea on the basis of this variance. The trial court erred in denying the defendant the right to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Lopez (Ramirez), 385 F.3d 245 (2d Cir. 2004)

Pursuant to Rule 11, a defendant who enters a non-binding plea agreement may not withdraw the plea, absent a fair and just reason. This case answers the unusual question, “Can a defendant maintain his guilty plea, but withdraw from the agreement?” The court holds that this is permissible and the trial court should evaluate the defendant’s request under a similar “fair and just reason” approach.

Waucaush v. United States, 380 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 2004)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to a RICO charge and was sentenced to life. Subsequent developments in the U.S. Supreme Court in other cases cast considerable doubt on the sufficiency of the interstate commerce proof in this case. The Sixth Circuit held that the defendant could challenge his guilty plea based on the change in the law, because the “new” law was sufficient to establish that the defendant was “actually innocent” of the charged offense.

United States v. Ortega-Ascanio, 376 F.3d 879 (9th Cir. 2004)

After the defendant entered his guilty plea to a charge of illegal re-entry (but before sentencing), the United States Supreme Court issued its decision in INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289 (2001), which held that certain prior orders of deportation were invalid. The Ninth Circuit held that this intervening Supreme Court decision provided a “fair and just” reason for withdrawing the plea.

Ellis v. U.S. District Court, 356 F.3d 1198 (9th Cir. 2004) (en banc)

When a trial court accepts a guilty plea, but subsequently rejects the plea agreement, the ball is then in the defendant’s court as to whether he wishes to withdraw his plea or go forward with sentencing, without the plea agreement in place. The trial court may not simply vacate the guilty plea and proceed to trial. See Rule 11(c)(5), Fed.R.Crim.P. The court reached this conclusion after reviewing the analysis of the Supreme Court in United States v. Hyde, 520 U.S. 670 (1997), which also explained that a trial judge may accept a guilty plea and defer acceptance of the plea agreement; but if the agreement is rejected, then the defendant must be given an opportunity to withdraw the plea. The Ellis court also held that upon remand, the case would be assigned to a different judge.

United States v. Ventura-Cruel, 356 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2003)

The defendant entered into a plea agreement and entered his plea. However, his debriefings went poorly and the court ultimately set aside the guilty plea, because the court concluded that based on the defendant’s statements, there was no longer a factual basis for the plea. During the ensuing trial, the government introduced a letter written by the defendant during the debriefings (it was essentially the “acceptance of responsibility” letter) that was incriminating. The First Circuit held that admitting this letter was reversible error. Technically, Fed.R.Evid 410 did not apply, because the defendant’s statement was not anticipatory to, or part of, the plea negotiation process. The court concluded that allowing the government to use the statement gave them the benefit of the bargain while depriving the defendant of the benefit of the bargain. See also United States v. Escamilla, 975 F.2d 568 (9th Cir. 1992).

United States v. Head, 340 F.3d 628 (8th Cir. 2003)

Pursuant to Rule 11(d), which replaced Rule 32(e) in December, 2002 in governing withdrawals of pleas, a plea may be withdrawn before the court accepts the plea, for any reason or for no reason.

United States v. Couto, 311 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2002)

The trial court denied the defendant’s motion to withdraw her guilty plea, relying in part on possible evidence to be offered by the government. This was an inappropriate basis for denying relief pursuant to Rule 32(e).

United States v. Reyes, 313 F.3d 1152 (9th Cir. 2002)

The defendants entered binding Rule 11(e)(1)(C) pleas. They failed to live up to their cooperation obligations, however. In this situation, the defendants must be afforded the right to withdraw their pleas prior to sentencing. The trial court may not simply exceed the agreed-upon sentence limit. The trial judge is not empowered to unilaterally modify a Rule 11(e)(1)(C) binding plea agreement.

Two defendants were arrested for smuggling marijuana. Alvarez entered a guilty plea, but the court had not yet accepted the plea. Thereafter, the co-defendant won his motion to suppress – a motion that would have succeeded for Alvarez, as well. The government had already indicated that it would not appeal the co-defendant’s successful motion. Nevertheless, Alvarez’s counsel did not move to withdraw the guilty plea and re-assert a Motion to Suppress. This was ineffective assistance of counsel. Because the court had not accepted the guilty plea yet, the defendant was entitled to withdraw the plea. The case would then have been dismissed.

United States v. Shaker, 279 F.3d 494 (7th Cir. 2002)

The defendant entered a guilty plea and the district court explicitly stated that the court was deferring accepting the guilty plea and plea agreement until after the court reviewed the presentence report. When the PSR was issued, the defendant, disappointed in some of its findings, moved to withdraw the guilty plea. The Seventh Circuit held that he had an absolute right to do so, because the trial court deferred accepting the plea. The requirement that there be a fair and just reason is not applicable when the district court has not accepted the guilty plea.

United States v. Ribas-Dominicci, 50 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 1995)

In deciding whether to permit a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea, prior to sentencing, Rule 32(d) directs the court to grant the motion if there is a showing of a fair and just reason. One such reason would be a showing that there was a core violation of Rule 11. A core violation would include an improper description of the mens rea element of the offense. Here, the court instructed the defendant that he could be found guilty of the theft offense only if he acted willfully – that is “the government has to prove that at some point in time you had some reasonable understanding that what you were about to do and actually did was wrong, was marginal conduct, was questionable . . . In other words, that you had a – had or should have had a pretty good understanding that this was wrong and against the law.” This was an inaccurate statement of the willfulness requirement of the theft offense. See Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952). Consequently, when the defendant moved to withdraw the plea prior to sentencing, the trial court erred in denying the motion.

United States v. DeBusk, 976 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1992)

The failure to advise the defendant that if the court did not accept the recommendation, the defendant would not be permitted to withdraw his plea was harmful error. The court had advised the defendant that he would be permitted to withdraw his plea if the court rejected the plea agreement. The plea called for the prosecutor to recommend probation. The judge imposed a one-year sentence and explained that he accepted the plea agreement, that is, he considered the government’s recommendation, but he felt a one-year sentence was more appropriate. Though the court is not obligated to permit a defendant to withdraw his plea if a sentence is longer than expected or longer than recommended by the prosecutor, the misleading advice given to the defendant by the court at the time of the plea required that the defendant be permitted to withdraw his plea in this case. The court’s contradictory advice that he was not “bound by the recommendation” was not a cure for the incorrect advice.

United States v. Kemper, 908 F.2d 33 (6th Cir. 1990)

The trial court properly rejected a plea agreement where the pre-sentence report showed that the stipulated drug quantity was inaccurate. However, once rejecting a plea agreement, the trial court should have afforded the defendant the right to withdraw his plea, rather than simply imposing sentence.

United States v. Groll, 992 F.2d 755 (7th Cir. 1993)

After tendering a guilty plea, the defendant moved to withdraw the plea, arguing that she was entrapped and that the pistol with which she was charged was not hers. The district court denied the motion to withdraw without reason. The Seventh Circuit reversed: the record in this case established a colorable claim of entrapment based on the repeated calls of the informant to the defendant to engage in a marijuana transaction. In denying a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, the district court must make findings as to why the defense now being asserted would not be available to the defense at trial.

United States v. Chan, 97 F.3d 1582 (9th Cir. 1996)

When a defendant enters a “B”-type agreement, that is, a plea agreement which includes a non-binding recommendation by the government, the district court should caution the defendant that the court is not bound by the recommendation and the defendant will not be allowed to withdraw the plea if the recommendation is rejected. The court failed to caution the defendant about this principle during the acceptance of the plea, but it was harmless error in this case, because the court did accept the recommendation.

United States v. Washman, 66 F.3d 210 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defendant entered into a binding plea agreement pursuant to Rule 11(e)(1)(c). Prior to the time that the district court accepted the plea, (but after the magistrate agreed to recommend that the plea be accepted by the district court) the defendant moved to withdraw the plea. Denying this motion was improper. Prior to the time the plea is accepted by the district court, the defendant has a right to withdraw from the agreement.

United States v. Scott, 884 F.2d 1163 (9th Cir. 1989)

The defendant moved to dismiss an indictment which had been returned against him. He subsequently pled guilty to a substituted information, conditioned on his right to appeal the denial of his motion to dismiss. The defendant should be provided an opportunity to withdraw his guilty plea in order to perfect his appeal of the invalid indictment.

United States v. Kummer, 89 F.3d 1536 (11th Cir. 1996)

Even where a plea is taken pursuant to Rule 11(e)(1)(B) – which involves the government making a non-binding recommendation without the defendant retaining the right to withdraw the plea – if the court, when it takes the plea, advises the defendant that he could withdraw the plea if the recommendation were not followed, the defendant must be given that opportunity.

United States v. Bell, 22 F.3d 274 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §664, which outlaws embezzling money from a fund covered by ERISA. Many of the counts, including portions of the conspiracy count, alleged that the defendant embezzled money from a fund which was not, in fact, covered by ERISA. After the defendant entered a guilty plea, he sought to withdraw the plea based on this defect in the indictment. The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s motion to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Idowu, 105 F.3d 728 (D.C.Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with unlawful presence in the United States within five years of being deported. 8 U.S.C. §1326. Arguably, he was permitted to be present, pursuant to a statute which allows a deported alien to re-enter, 8 U.S.C. §1182(a). Whether this was a viable defense or not, the defendant, after having entered a guilty plea, should have been allowed to withdraw the plea to mount this defense.

United States v. Ford, 993 F.2d 249 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

After entering a guilty plea, but before sentencing, the defendant moved to withdraw his plea. He asserted his innocence, claiming that the drugs and gun found in a room belonged to his brother, not him. The trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant’s motion to withdraw the plea. The government’s proof failed to establish the defendant’s possession of the gun other than his proximity to the gun. At the plea colloquy, the government did not establish the factual basis for the gun count and the court failed to adequately inform the defendant of the elements of the offenses to which he was entering his plea.
GUILTY PLEAS
(Voluntariness; Adequacy of Waiver of Rights)

SEE ALSO: PLEA AGREEMENTS

Despite language in precedents to the contrary, the standard for assessing the competence of a defendant to enter a guilty plea is the same as for assessing the defendant’s competence to stand trial: whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him. Moreover, the defendant’s capacity to waive the assistance of counsel is measured by the same standard – the ability to understand the nature of the proceeding and to waive the right to counsel with an understanding of what is being waived.

_United States v. Yang Chia Tien_, 720 F.3d 464 (2d Cir. 2013)

The defendant’s responses to the court’s questions during the plea colloquy showed that he did not understand the court’s questions, he was taking medications that clearly affected his ability to understand and that his understanding of English was minimal (and the Interpreter provided inadequate translations). The defendant’s motion to withdraw his guilty plea should have been granted.

_United States v. Fisher_, 711 F.3d 460 (4th Cir. 2013)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to drug charges. The principal evidence against him was derived from a search which was based on the affidavit of a DEA Agent. A year later, the DEA agent was convicted of perpetrating various lies in connection with his conduct as an agent, and acknowledged that the affidavit that was used in Fisher’s case was based on false evidence. The Fourth Circuit held that this disclosure vitiated the voluntariness of the guilty plea. The government has a duty not to engage in misconduct that induces a guilty plea. _Brady v. United States_, 397 U.S. 742 (1970). That_ Brady_ decision (not to be confused with _Brady v. Maryland_), requires: (1) governmental misconduct and (2) the misconduct induced the guilty plea. Both showings were made in this case.

_United States v. Smith_, 640 F.3d 580 (4th Cir. 2011)

If a defendant claims that his lawyer was so deficient that it amounted to no counsel at all, this can taint a guilty plea. Though a guilty plea generally waives all non-jurisdictional defects, this doctrine does not bar a challenge to the right to counsel, because this affects the voluntariness of the plea.

_United States v. Gonzalez_, 420 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant pled guilty to a drug conspiracy that alleged that he possessed with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of crack. During the plea colloquy, he denied possessing considerably more. At sentencing, the judge found that he possessed an amount that triggered a mandatory minimum twenty year sentence. The factual basis for the plea, and the voluntariness of the plea, was inadequately established.

_United States v. Arellano-Gallegos_, 387 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2003)
At no time during the plea colloquy did the court advise the defendant about the appeal waiver. The appeal waiver would not be enforced.

United States v. Martinez-Molina, 64 F.3d 719 (1st Cir. 1995)

The defendants entered a guilty plea as part of a package deal. The written plea agreements indicated that the defendants were entering their pleas without any compulsion or threats. At the plea proceeding, however, the court only asked if the defendants were compelled by the government or any agent of the government to enter the plea. This was an inadequate inquiry: Because package-deal plea agreements increase the risk that one defendant will coerce another to plead guilty, the district court is obligated to ascertain carefully whether the defendants were in fact entering their pleas without compulsion.

United States v. Parra-Ibanez, 951 F.2d 21 (1st Cir. 1991)

The trial court committed harmful error in failing to follow-up on information that the defendant, at the time he entered his plea, was under the influence of medication.

United States v. Hansel, 70 F.3d 6 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendant pled guilty to two counts of the indictment which were barred by the statute of limitations. Though the guilty plea amounts to a waiver of the issue on appeal, he received ineffective assistance of counsel and the guilty plea was therefore not knowing and voluntary and the convictions on those counts would be set aside.

United States v. Rossillo, 853 F.2d 1062 (2d Cir. 1988)

The defendant acknowledged taking medication for a heart condition at the time he entered his guilty plea. The trial court erred in failing to fully explore the nature of the medication to determine whether the defendant’s waiver of his rights was voluntary and knowing in light of the influence of the drug.

Heiser v. Ryan, 951 F.2d 559 (3rd Cir. 1991)

A threat by a defendant’s attorney to withdraw from the case if the defendant did not plead guilty may render a guilty plea involuntary. This is true notwithstanding the mitigating effect of an attorney’s assurance that new counsel would be appointed if the defendant insisted on proceeding to trial.

United States v. Cole, 813 F.2d 43 (3rd Cir. 1987)

The defendant admitted at the taking of his plea that he had ingested drugs the previous night. The trial judge made no further inquiry on the matter but accepted the plea. The Third Circuit holds that the plea must be vacated.

United States v. DeBusk, 976 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1992)

The failure to advise the defendant that if the court did not accept the recommendation, the defendant would not be permitted to withdraw his plea was harmful error. The court had advised the defendant that he would be permitted to withdraw his plea if the court rejected the plea agreement. The plea called for the prosecutor to recommend probation. The judge imposed a one-year sentence and explained that he accepted the plea agreement, that is, he considered the government’s recommendation, but he felt a one-year sentence was more appropriate. Though the court is not obligated to permit a defendant to withdraw his plea if a sentence is longer than expected or longer than recommended by the prosecutor, the misleading advice given to the defendant by the court at the time of the plea required that the defendant be permitted to withdraw his plea in this case. The court’s contradictory advice that he was not “bound by the recommendation” was not a cure for the incorrect advice.

_Estock v. Lane_, 842 F.2d 184 (7th Cir. 1988)

The defendant established that he was not competent at the time he entered his plea of guilty on rape charges. Six days prior to the entry of the plea, the defendant had attempted suicide; psychiatric evaluations described the defendant as paranoid personality and borderline psychotic.

_United States v. Kennell_, 15 F.3d 134 (9th Cir. 1994)

At the plea colloquy, the trial court failed to inquire if the defendant realized that the court was not bound by the government’s recommendation and that he would not be allowed to withdraw his guilty plea, as required by Rule 11(e)(2). The trial court did not accept the government’s recommendation, sentencing the defendant to nearly four times the recommended time. Even though the plea agreement stated that the government’s recommendation was nothing more than that, the trial court’s failure to advise the defendant of the irrevocability of his plea was not harmless error and the case was remanded to enable the defendant to re-plead, or to sentence the defendant according to the bargain.

_United States v. Caro_, 997 F.2d 657 (9th Cir. 1993)

Whenever a plea agreement with multiple defendants is offered as a “package deal” – all plead, or the deal is off – the district court must make additional inquiries as part of the Rule 11 colloquy to ensure that there has not been any coercion between the defendants. Though such agreements are permissible, there is inherent risk that a defendant who perceives that he is getting a good deal will influence other defendants to get on board. The district court in this case did not adequately address this potential problem.

_United States v. Anderson_, 993 F.2d 1435 (9th Cir. 1993)

At arraignment, the trial judge cautioned the defendant that no deals would be accepted after that date and expressed a desire to expedite the proceedings. Prior to this arraignment, a plea agreement had been reached by the defendant and the government, but a change of counsel led to canceling this agreement. The trial judge was clearly frustrated by the turn of events. The judge’s comments about trying the case right away, coupled with his comments about accepting no negotiated plea after that date was overly coercive and rendered the subsequent plea involuntary – even though the court did accept a plea to two counts and dismissed the other twenty-eight counts. Note that _Davila_ expressly overruled _Anderson_ on the basis of _Anderson_’s automatic reversal holding.

_United States v. Cortez_, 973 F.2d 764 (9th Cir. 1992)

Just prior to trial, the defendant moved for a continuance, arguing that he wanted to perfect a selective prosecution motion. Both the government and the trial court explained to the defendant that this could be raised post-trial. On the day set for the trial to begin, the defendant entered a guilty plea and later, before sentencing, filed his selective prosecution motion. Though the plea was not conditional under Rule 11(a)(2), because of the assurances of his trial counsel, the government and the trial judge, that the issue could be raised after trial, the plea was not knowing and voluntary, because the defendant did not realize he was waiving this defense. In this case, the affirmative misrepresentations of the government and the trial court made the difference.
United States v. Graibe, 946 F.2d 1428 (9th Cir. 1991)

The defendant pled guilty knowing that the government was going to make a recommendation. The trial judge, however, did not advise the defendant that the plea could not be withdrawn if the recommendation was not followed. The proper way to analyze whether this was grounds to void the plea is to place the burden on the government to prove that the defendant knew that he could not withdraw the plea.

United States v. Whalen, 976 F.2d 1346 (10th Cir. 1992)

Defendant contended that his guilty plea was not voluntary because the government (he claimed) threatened to prosecute his wife if he did not enter a guilty plea. The Supreme Court has cautioned that, “Adverse or lenient treatment for some person other than the accused might pose a greater danger of inducing a false guilty plea by skewing the assessment of the risks a defendant must consider.” Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978). Nevertheless, such plea agreements are permissible, but the trial court, in accepting such a plea, should be made aware, and should make inquiry into the circumstances. A hearing on this habeas petition was needed to enable the trial judge to inquire into the voluntariness of the plea, in light of the defendant’s contention that such a threat was made. See Martin v. Kemp, 760 F.2d 1244 (11th Cir. 1985)(statement at plea that the plea was voluntary does not bar later habeas petition challenging voluntariness in light of threat to third party).

United States v. Estrada, 849 F.2d 1304 (10th Cir. 1988)

The defendant claimed that a prosecutor threatened to file charges against him which had no basis and that the defense counsel threatened to withdraw from the case unless the defendant pled guilty. The defendant further claimed that the prosecutor and defense promised a light sentence if the defendant would cooperate. A hearing was required to inquire into this claim.

United States v. Pierre, 120 F.3d 1153 (11th Cir. 1997)

If a defendant believes that he is entering a conditional guilty plea pursuant to Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(a)(2), but for some reason the appellate issue has not been preserved properly, then the plea has not been entered voluntarily and knowingly.

United States v. Corbitt, 996 F.2d 1132 (11th Cir. 1993)

At the scheduled change of plea hearing, one defendant’s attorney asked for more time. The judge responded that all pleas must be submitted by noon that day. He also advised the attorneys and the defendants that if the defendants were convicted, he generally gave “high sentences.” The plea agreements were tendered that day. The Eleventh Circuit reversed: the judge’s comments violated Rule 11(e)(1) which strictly outlaws any judicial participation in plea negotiations, which would include the judge’s threat when defendants were convicted, he gave high sentences. The case would be remanded to the district court for assignment to a different judge and to permit the defendant to withdraw his plea. The automatic reversal rule was abolished in United States v. Davila, 133 S. Ct. 2139 (2013).

United States v. Zickert, 955 F.2d 665 (11th Cir. 1992)

At the time defendant’s guilty plea was entered, he was not informed that he had no right to withdraw his plea of guilty if the court refused to impose the sentence recommended by the government. This was reversible error, requiring that the defendant be allowed to re-plead. Even though the court advised the defendant that the court was not bound by the recommendation, this did not properly advise the defendant that he would not be permitted to withdraw his plea if the recommendation was not accepted.
HANDWRITING EVIDENCE

United States v. Samet, 466 F.3d 251 (2d Cir. 2006)

A witness may not identify a person’s handwriting if the witness only gains his knowledge in anticipation of litigation. However, a law enforcement officer may rely on the knowledge he gained during the course of the investigation to form his opinion.

United States v. Alvarez-Farfan, 338 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2003)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from introducing evidence of a motel receipt and a debriefing statement that was written by a witness to prove the witness’s handwriting. The jury is entitled to make a handwriting comparison.
HARBORING A FUGITIVE

United States v. Strain, 396 F.3d 689 (5th Cir. 2005)

Venue in this fugitive harboring case was not proper in the Western District of Texas. The defendant was aware that there was a warrant for the fugitive, there was no act of harboring that occurred in the district where the trial was conducted. The mere failure to disclose a witness’s whereabouts does not constitute harboring a fugitive. There must be some affirmative act of concealment, or aiding the fugitive in his fugitivity.
HATE CRIME

United States v. Miller, 767 F.3d 585 (6th Cir. 2014)

In order to be guilty of violating the Matthew Shepard and James Byrd Hate Crimes Prevention Act (18 U.S.C. § 249), the victim’s status must be the “but for” cause for the defendant’s criminal act. The trial court in this case instructed the jury that the victim’s religion must be a “significant motivating factor” for the commission of the crime. This is not the correct standard.
HEALTH CARE FRAUD

United States v. Willner, 795 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2015)
This case involved a health care fraud conspiracy in which recruiters were paid to send ineligible patients to a facility that was supposedly performing sleep studies. The patients were not eligible, they were kept as long as Medicare would pay, then they were discharged and often then re-admitted so that more fraudulent billings could occur. The evidence was sufficient to support the conviction of most of the defendants who were involved in this scheme. However, one doctor, Dr. Abreu, was not shown to have had knowledge of the scheme and her conviction was reversed on sufficiency grounds.

United States v. Lopez-Diaz, 794 F.3d 106 (1st Cir. 2015)
The evidence did not support defendant’s health care fraud conviction. The defendant knowingly supplied certain patient information to his brother, but unbeknownst to him, the brother was using the information to defraud Medicare. The evidence did not support the defendant’s conviction under either a conspiracy or aiding and abetting theory. Even a willful blindness instruction did not support the theory that the defendant knew that his brother was using the information improperly to defraud Medicare.

United States v. Rufai, 732 F.3d 1175 (10th Cir. 2013)
While the defendant’s conduct aided the principal’s health care fraud offense, the evidence was insufficient to show that the defendant was aware of the crime and thus he could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the health care fraud crime. Innocent explanations for his conduct were too reasonable to allow the government to convict based on alternative theories that supported the argument that he “must have known” about the principal’s crime.

United States v. Medina, 485 F.3d 1291 (11th Cir. 2007)
It is a federal crime to solicit or pay kickbacks in connection with certain health care related transactions. For example, a medical equipment supplier may not pay a kickback to a patient or a doctor to use his equipment that is covered by Medicare. 42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b(b)(2)(A). Every violation of this anti-kickback provision, however, does not amount to health care fraud under 18 U.S.C. § 1347. Fraud requires proof of a false statement or some other kind of fraud. In this case, the court reversed the health care fraud convictions of most of the defendants because their kickback violations were not accompanied with any fraudulent conduct. The equipment was, in fact, supplied and Medicare was not over-billed. One defendant, however, submitted a form that falsely stated that she complied with all Medicare rules (including the anti-kickback provision) when she knew that she was violating that provision. Her fraud conviction was sustained.

United States v. Jones, 471 F.3d 478 (3rd Cir. 2006)
The defendant was a clerk at a methadone clinic. She stole cash from the clinic that was paid by patients. This does not constitute a § 1347 offense, because the theft did not amount to “fraud.” The defendant made no “misrepresentations by the employee in connection with the delivery of, or payment for, health care benefits, items, or services.”

United States v. Miles, 360 F.3d 472 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendants paid a public relations firm to deliver literature and business cards to local medical offices. The firm was paid a set amount for each Medicare patient who became a client of the defendant’s company as a result of the firm’s work. This did not violate 42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b(b)(2)(A). Because the public relations firm did not “refer” patients to the defendant’s company, the statute did not apply.

United States v. Starks, 157 F.3d 833 (11th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with violation of the Medicare Antikickback Statute, 42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b(b). The court concluded that the “willful” requirement was properly explained to the jury in these terms: “The word “willfully,” as that term is used from time to time in these instructions, means the act was committed voluntarily and purposely, with the specific intent to do something the law forbids, that is with a bad purpose, either to disobey or disregard the law.” The defendant sought a “Ratzlaf” instruction that would have required the jury to find that the defendant was aware of the actual law he was violating. Based on Bryan v. United States, 118 S. Ct. 1939 (1998), however, the court concluded that the government was only required to prove that the defendant was aware that he was violating the law – not that he was aware of the specific law that he was violating.
HOBBS ACT

Proof that a defendant engaged in a robbery of marijuana and money from the victim is sufficient to establish an interstate nexus for Hobbs Act purposes.

Ocasio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1423 (2016)

In a conspiracy prosecution, it is not necessary that the government prove that all conspirators were capable of committing the offense. What matters is that the conspirators agree that the offense will be committed by someone. In Ocasio, the Court held that a police officer and a shop owner could conspire that the two would conspire to violate the Hobbs Act through the commission of the crime of “color of official right” extortion: the shop owner would pay money to the police officer to refer business to the shop owner. Even though the shop owner could not commit the offense himself, he could conspire to commit the offense.

One of the predicate acts in this civil RICO case was a Hobbs Act violation. The plaintiffs claimed that abortion protesters were engaged in Hobbs Act extortion. The Supreme Court held that the conduct in which the protesters engaged did not amount to extortion, because they were not attempting to obtain “property” from the targets of the protests.

In order to make out a Hobbs Act violation under the “color of official right” prong, there is no need to prove that any force or threat of force was used. Nor need the defendant make a demand for payment. In short, the passive receipt of a bribe is sufficient.

In order for a campaign contribution to amount to a violation of the Hobbs Act, there must be proof of an explicit quid pro quo.

Ocasio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1423 (2016)

The defendant was a police officer who accepted bribes from a car repair shop to which he referred car accident victims. He was prosecuted under the Hobbs Act – extortion – for receiving money, with the consent of the car repair shop owner, under color of official right. The charge alleged that he conspired with the owner to violate the law. The officer claimed that he could not “conspire” with the person who was allegedly the victim of the extortion. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the defendant and the car repair shop owner did, in fact, conspire to commit the Hobbs Act violation, which essentially criminalizes the payment of bribes in this context.

United States v. Burhoe, 871 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2017)

The defendants’ convictions for extortion, based on their conduct pressuring employers to hire Teamsters, rather than non-union workers, were reversed because of the insufficient evidence of unlawful extortion. There is nothing improper about union officials urging or pressuring employers to hire union workers. It would be a crime if the defendants were “featherbedding” which means requiring employers to hire employees who will perform no work. But urging employers to hire union workers even when the employer does not want, or need, workers is not a crime. The evidence in this case did not show that the defendants were urging the employers to hire fictitious workers. This case contains a thorough analysis of the relationship between the Hobbs Act and the Labor laws.

_United States v. Silver_, 864 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2017)

Sheldon Silver’s conviction for honest services fraud and Hobbs Act violations were reversed based on an error in the jury instructions, which failed the _McDonnell_ requirements for an “official act.” The trial court incorrectly explained that an “official act” was _any action taken or to be taken under color of official authority._

_United States v. Blagojevich_, 794 F.3d 729 (7th Cir. 2015)

Though affirming various counts of Governor Blagojevich’s conviction, the Seventh Circuit held that the Hobbs Act was not violated when the defendant engaged in “logrolling” which essentially means that the defendant agreed to appoint a particular person to fill Obama’s vacant Senate seat in exchange for the President appointing him to a Cabinet post. Swapping one public act for another public act does not amount to extortion under the Hobbs Act. To be illegal the swap must involve the agreement to perform a public act in exchange for private gain. The statute requires that the public official receive “property of another” under color of official right. A Cabinet post is not “property of another.”

_United States v. Manzo_, 636 F.3d 56 (3rd Cir. 2011)

A non-incumbent candidate for office who extorts money, but then loses the election, may not be prosecuted under the Hobbs Act. Only a public official can be prosecuted for extortion “under color of official right.” This principle applies, regardless of whether the charge is attempted extortion, or some other inchoate offense.

_United States v. Dean_, 629 F.3d 257 (D.C. Cir. 2011)

The defendant received license fees from people in D.C. She told some of the applicants that they had to pay certain license fees in cash, which she then pocketed. The citizens were not aware of her theft. This does not constitute bribery under § 201, because there was no _quid pro quo_. This did not amount to a Hobbs Act violation for the same reason. Clearly, she had committed a theft, but the citizen who paid the money was never told that the money had to be paid to her personally for some reason other than to have the license issued in exchange for the proper amount of the fee. In fact, the citizens had no idea that she was pocketing the money.

_United States v. Needham_, 604 F.3d 673 (2d Cir. 2010)

A Hobbs Act prosecution requires proof that the offense affected interstate commerce. Even in a robbery involving drugs, the government is required to prove that the offense affected interstate commerce. Because this is an essential element of the offense, the jury must be instructed that they must find that the robbery affected interstate commerce and the failure to do so is reversible error. _See United States v. Parkes, infra._

_United States v. Kincaid-Chauncey_, 556 F.3d 923 (9th Cir. 2009)
The Ninth Circuit affirms the defendant’s Hobbs Act and Honest Services Mail Fraud convictions, concluding that the court properly explained to the jury that the government was required to prove that there was a quid pro quo arrangement between the unlawful payment and an official act, even though the words “quid pro quo” were not used. The court noted that the quid quo pro requirement must be proven in the Hobbs Act context whether the payment is made in the context of a campaign contribution, or not. In the context of an Honest Services Mail Fraud prosecution of a public official, a specific quid pro quo is not required if the theory is an undisclosed conflict of interest, but a quid quo pro, at least an implicit quid pro quo, is required in an honest service “bribe” case. Portions of this case did not survive Skilling and Weyhrauch.

United States v. McFall, 558 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2009)

Two separate Hobbs Act convictions were reversed in this case. In one count, the defendant, a lobbyist for a company that was attempting to win a county contract, threatened a competing company if it did not withdraw its bid. He followed through on his threat, by encouraging a county supervisor to pass a resolution condemning the other company’s performance in another project. This conduct did not deprive the competing company of property under the Sheidler standard. The second Hobbs Act conviction was spoiled, because even though it involved the lobbyist’s effort to obtain money from a contractor in exchange for securing a favorable vote by a public official, the lobbyist himself was not a public official and the jury was not instructed that he must, in fact, have been acting on behalf of a public official in order to violate the Hobbs Act “under color of official right” offense.

United States v. Gray, 521 F.3d 514 (6th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was charged in a RICO indictment with various offenses, including paying bribes to public officials to ensure that the defendant’s clients were offered lucrative municipal contracts. As in Brock, discussed below, the court held that the bribe-payor (i.e., the person paying the public official) may not be convicted of a Hobbs Act offense unless that payor induces someone else to part with money or property. With regard to certain counts, Brock required reversal of the convictions (and predicate RICO offenses). With other counts, however, the government did offer evidence that the defendant induced other people to part with their property to pay the public official.

United States v. Brock, 501 F.3d 762 (6th Cir. 2007)

If a person pays a bribe to a public official for some quid pro quo, the bribe-payor may not be prosecuted under the Hobbs Act on an “official right” extortion theory, because the bribe-payor is the person who was extorted, not a co-conspirator. The crime requires proof that the defendant obtained property “from another” which cannot be the defendant, himself.

United States v. Mann, 493 F.3d 484 (5th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was convicted of various offenses, including mail fraud, wire fraud, and Hobbs Act, based on stealing motorists’ speeding ticket money. Because the government failed to prove that some of the motorists were traveling interstate, those counts had to be dismissed because of the failure to prove a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce.

United States v. Parkes, 497 F.3d 220 (2d Cir. 2007)
Proof that a defendant’s robbery was designed to obtain illegal drugs – marijuana – is not alone sufficient to establish that the crime involved an effect on interstate commerce. The government must introduce evidence that the marijuana was, or was at least likely, to have traveled in interstate commerce. (The government satisfied its burden in this case).

_United States v. Zhou_, 428 F.3d 361 (2d Cir. 2005)

In order to be guilty of the crime of extortion under the Hobbs Act, the defendant must obtain the property of another with his consent, induced by wrongful use of actual or threatened force, violence of fear. 18 U.S.C. § 1951(b)(2). The victim must be shown to have parted with the property as a matter of choice, though the victim may act out of fear. This is what differentiates (albeit by a razor’s edge) extortion from robbery. In a case of robbery, the property is taken against the victim’s will. The evidence in this case demonstrated that the defendants robbed the victim, they did not commit extortion.

_United States v. Santos_, 449 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendants tried to rob an undercover drug agent by flashing fake DEA badges. The use of the fake badge did not amount to “force” in support of a Hobbs Act robbery charge. With regard to one alleged co-conspirator, moreover, the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was a knowing participant in the conspiracy to rob the victim. Mere presence and association with the other conspirators was all that was established.

_United States v. Saadey_, 393 F.3d 669 (6th Cir. 2005)

A private citizen may not be prosecuted for a Hobbs Act “color of official right” extortion offense unless he is conspiring with a public official or aiding and abetting a public official. The defendant in this case was an attorney who “masqueraded” as a person who could “fix” criminal cases. The people paying the money, however, knew that he was not a state official when they paid him money. The Hobbs Act is reserved for cases in which the defendant is, in fact, a public official, or otherwise extorts money under color of official right. The defendant in this case did not qualify.

_United States v. McCormack_, 371 F.3d 22 (1st Cir. 2004)

The court affirmed the defendant’s Hobbs Act conviction. The defendant attempted to extort the victim into paying him $100,000 from his mutual fund. This would have had the effect of depleting the assets of the mutual fund and this provided a sufficient impact on interstate commerce. The First Circuit rejected, however, the government’s invitation to hold that any extortion of a substantial amount of money has an impact on interstate commerce.

_United States v. Pendergraft_, 297 F.3d 1198 (11th Cir. 2002)

The defendants threatened a county with a lawsuit, but premised the lawsuit, in part, on false allegations which were contained in an affidavit prepared by one of the defendants. The Eleventh Circuit held that threatening a lawsuit is not “wrongful” within the meaning of the Hobbs Act. Particularly in this case, where the threat involved a lawsuit against a governmental entity, First Amendment considerations also came into play (the right to petition the government for the redress of grievances). In short, the Hobbs Act does not criminalize the fabrication of evidence, or perjury if the “threat” to use the evidence or testimony relates to a civil lawsuit. The court also concluded that this conduct did not amount to mail fraud, because the false affidavits were known to the “victims” to be false, so the victims were not being deceived.

United States v. Perrotta, 313 F.3d 33 (2d Cir. 2002)

An extortion offense committed against a person who is employed by a company engaged in interstate commerce does not affect interstate commerce, simply because the employee misses time at work.

United States v. Smith, 156 F.3d 1046 (10th Cir. 1998)

The defendant went into a sporting goods store and asked to see some guns. Two unloaded guns were given to him and he promptly ran out of the store. While fleeing, he ran his car in the direction of store employees who chased him. This does not amount to a Hobbs Act robbery. The store employee who gave the guns to the defendant knew that they were empty and there was no threat or use of force. Though one of the employees was hurt in the parking lot, this does not establish that the guns were taken by means of force or violence.

United States v. Garcia, 992 F.2d 409 (2d Cir. 1993)

Defendant’s Hobbs Act conviction was reversed in light of the jury instructions which indicated that a conviction could be based on conduct which did not require that the money given to the Congressman involved a quid pro quo. The holding in McCormick v. United States, 111 S.Ct. 1807 (1991), though on its face limited to cases in which money is given during a campaign, also applies in cases in which the elected official receives money after he is elected: that is, the money must be given with a specific quid pro quo in mind.

United States v. Inigo, 925 F.2d 641 (3rd Cir. 1991)

Though some of the defendants clearly participated in the acts which amounted to extortion, the proof did not establish that they knew an extortionate threat had been made.

United States v. Taylor, 966 F.2d 830 (4th Cir. 1992)

The trial court’s instruction to the jury did not adequately explain the need to find a specific quid pro quo in order to convict a public official under the Hobbs Act.

United States v. Buffey, 899 F.2d 1402 (4th Cir. 1990)

The government failed to demonstrate that the victim’s effort to pay the defendant’s demands were reasonably likely to affect interstate commerce. Therefore, the defendant’s Hobbs Act conviction was reversed. The court does not rely on the fact that there had been no actual effect on interstate commerce. Rather, the court focused on the fact that if the facts had been as the defendant believed, there still would not have been any effect on interstate commerce.

United States v. Box, 50 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 1995)

The defendants, a bail bondsman and local law enforcement agents, would arrest people at a roadside rest area and agree to drop the charges after bond had been posted. With respect to the people arrested who had not traveled in interstate commerce, the facts did not show any impact on interstate commerce and the Hobbs Act convictions on these counts would be set aside.
United States v. Tomblin, 46 F.3d 1369 (5th Cir. 1995)

A private person who extorts money from another private person in exchange for his promise to help the “victim” with the defendant’s influence over a public official does not violate the extortion provision of the Hobbs Act. The defendant did not “threaten” the victim with fear of harm and because he was a private person, he was not acting under color of official right.

United States v. Collins, 78 F.3d 1021 (6th Cir. 1996)

Even where payments are made to a public official in a context other than a campaign contribution, the government must prove that there was a quid pro quo.

United States v. DiCarlantonio, 870 F.2d 1058 (6th Cir. 1989)

The defendant’s Hobbs Act conviction was reversed because of the government’s failure to establish any effect on interstate commerce. The money used to pay the bribe was FBI funds; the sought-after action of the government officials was to permit the use of propane tanks within the city limits. The defendants did nothing which either increased or decreased the flow of propane as the result of the bribe. As a result, there was no effect on interstate commerce by virtue of the money paid or the action undertaken by the officials.

United States v. Carpenter, 961 F.2d 824 (9th Cir. 1992)

The trial court committed reversible error by instructing the jury that no quid pro quo was required for a Hobbs Act conviction. McCormick v. United States. The quid pro quo must be clear and unambiguous, leaving no uncertainty about the terms of the bargain.

United States v. Montoya, 945 F.2d 1068 (9th Cir. 1991)

This conviction was spoiled by an instruction inconsistent with McCormick v. United States. The jury was incorrectly instructed that the government was not required to prove that the defendant demanded or directly solicited the payment in question or that he offered anything specific in return.

United States v. Frost, 61 F.3d 1518, modified, 77 F.3d 1319 (11th Cir. 1996), judgment vacated on other grounds, 117 S.Ct. 1816 (1997)

The defendants were political rivals of a city council member. They sent an extortion letter to their rival (threatening to expose his extramarital activity if he did not resign). The defendants were charged with a Hobbs Act violation. The evidence, however, failed to establish a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce. Although the indictment sufficiently alleged an interstate commerce nexus, the government’s proof fell short of its intended purpose. The affairs of the city council were linked to interstate commerce; but there was no showing that the resignation of one member of the six-member city council would have impacted the continuing business of that governing body in such a manner as to constitute a violation of the federal statute. Therefore, the extortion threat, if it had succeeded, was not shown to be likely to have the natural effect of obstructing commerce.

United States v. Davis, 30 F.3d 108 (11th Cir. 1994)

In order to establish Hobbs Act extortion, it is necessary to establish a specific quid pro quo. Because of the failure to properly charge the jury in this case, the conviction was set aside.
United States v. O'Keefe, 825 F.2d 314 (11th Cir. 1987)

The evidence was insufficient to support the defendants’ Hobbs Act conviction where they accepted the money to perform a service, despite the fact that they were members of local governing authorities.
IDENTIFICATION

The Supreme Court held that an eyewitness identification procedure is not subject to Due Process review (or judicial gatekeeping), if there was no state action involved in the problems with the identification procedure. Where the police are merely present, for example, and the victim or witness points out the alleged perpetrator – without the police being involved in a show-up, or otherwise involved in the identification procedure – the trial court is not obligated to gauge the reliability of the identification procedure, or preview the evidence to determine its admissibility. The lone dissenter, Justice Sotomayor, provided a primer on the unreliability of eyewitness identification and argued that whether the state was involved, or not, the evidence is sufficiently unreliable (yet persuasive to a jury), that the court should undertake a gatekeeping role.

_United States v. Gonzalez_, 863 F.3d 576 (7th Cir. 2017)

Shortly after the commission of a bank robbery, the police based only on a hunch, showed the teller a picture of the defendant. There was no need to do this one-person photo ID (there was plenty of time to compose a photo array) and the process was unnecessarily suggestive. A six-person photo spread that was subsequently showed to the teller was also flawed, because some of the pictures did not have facial hair or a shaved head (which the teller reported to the police was the perpetrator’s appearance). Nevertheless, these suggestive procedures did not taint the in-court identification testimony of the teller.

_United States v. Greene_, 704 F.3d 298 (4th Cir. 2013)

The bank teller was not able to identify the defendant as the person who committed the robbery because of the disguise the robber was wearing. While on the witness stand, however, the witness was asked by the prosecutor to identify characteristics of the defendant that were similar to the characteristics of the robber. Focusing on the defendant made the identification too suggestive. This was error, but not reversible.

_Young v. Conway_, 698 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 2012)

The defendant’s arrest was not proper, because there was no probable cause. Shortly after the arrest, however, the victim saw the defendant in a line-up and picked him as the perpetrator. Pursuant to _United States v. Crews_, 445 U.S. 463 (1980), the line-up identification must be suppressed, because it was fruit of the illegal arrest. But an in-court identification would be permissible if untainted by the prior line-up. In this habeas case, the Second Circuit held that there was an insufficient showing of the lack of taint, so the in-court identification should have been suppressed.

_United States v. Jadlowe_, 628 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2010)

A police officer was improperly permitted to testify that in her opinion, the video of the perpetrator of the crime was the defendant (she compared the video with a recent driver’s license photo). There was no reason to introduce this opinion testimony, because the jury could have performed the same comparison. Harmless error.
United States v. Garcia-Alvarez, 541 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2008)

The line-up in this case involved requiring the participants to repeat a statement made by the robbery participant. Only the defendant had the particular accent that matched the participant. This was unduly suggestive. Nevertheless, under the Neil v. Biggers 409 U.S. 188 (1972) totality of the circumstances test, the court allowed identification testimony to be introduced.

United States v. Garcia-Ortiz, 528 F.3d 74 (1st Cir. 2008)

The victim of an armed robbery was shown a picture of the defendant and another person. The victim identified the other person as the perpetrator. At trial, an FBI agent was permitted to offer his opinion that the person who was incorrectly identified actually resembled the defendant. This was improper opinion testimony, because the subject matter of the testimony was not beyond the jury’s purview. Harmless error.

Bell v. Miller, 500 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2007)

The victim was robbed in the street and shot. When the police asked him who shot him, he said “a black male wearing a lemon-colored shirt.” He lost copious amounts of blood and then slipped into a coma. Eleven days later he began to recover and was asked to identify the assailant again. This time he identified an acquaintance. Trial counsel did not hire an expert to explain the effects of the coma and the drugs the victim had taken and how this could have altered his identification. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Brownlee, 454 F.3d 131 (3rd Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in preventing the defendant from introducing expert testimony on the fallibility of eye witness testimony. Though the defendant was permitted to introduce the expert testimony relating to this subject, the trial court prohibited the expert from testifying about the lack of “confidence-accuracy correlation.” In other words, a witness’s assertion that she is confident of her identification of the defendant does not correlate to the accuracy of the identification. In a separate holding, the court held that a show-up identification was impermissibly suggestive, but did not taint the in-court identification.

Thomas v. Varner, 428 F.3d 491 (3rd Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the admissibility of the out-of-court and the in-court identification of his client by one of the victims. The victim was initially unable to identify the perpetrator. He was shown numerous photos and still could not identify the perpetrator. Finally, the officer took out two photos and showed them to the victim, who agreed that one of the photos showed the perpetrator. This was an impermissibly suggestive identification procedure. Counsel initially objected pretrial to any identification evidence, but the victim failed to identify the defendant in court during that hearing, so the motion was withdrawn. At trial, however, the victim spontaneously identified the defendant. Trial counsel failed to object, or seek any remedial measure. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Dixon, 413 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2005)

A man attempted to extort money from a bank and surveillance photos recorded his actions. The government offered the testimony of three witnesses who identified the defendant as the person in the surveillance photos, his son and two ex-wives. The evidence was not admissible pursuant to Rule 701, because the witnesses’ testimony was not likely to aid the jury. The witnesses acknowledged that they had not seen the defendant at the time of the crime and the video was of sufficiently good quality that the jury could make its own determination without the aid of the witnesses’ opinions.

United States v. Rogers, 387 F.3d 925 (7th Cir. 2004)

A criminal defendant has a due process right not to be identified before trial in a manner that is unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification. In this case, the police placed a witness in the same cell with the defendant (after he was unable to identify the defendant). The court noted that the police did not intentionally place the two in the same cell; but that is not critical. The fact is that they were placed in the same cell and this tainted the subsequent identification testimony. Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188 (1972).

United States v. Montgomery, 150 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 1998)

The government employed suggestive identification techniques, though these pretrial techniques did not taint the subsequent in-court identification. First, the DEA showed three photographs of the three alleged conspirators to the witness, who identified the principal defendant as the person who bought precursor chemicals from him. Later the witness asked the DEA to send him the photograph of the person he identified (and he hung that photograph on the wall in his office). Just before testifying, the DEA brought the witness into the courtroom so he could see where the defendant was sitting. These unnecessarily suggestive techniques, however, did not create substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification of the defendant in the courtroom.

United States v. de Jesus-Rios, 990 F.2d 672 (1st Cir. 1993)

Two women dropped off boxes filled with cocaine at a ship and asked that the boxes be transported to Puerto Rico. After cocaine was discovered when the ship docked in Puerto Rico, the person on the boat who received the packages was asked to identify the women who delivered the boxes. The description did not fit the defendant. Later, through a confidential source, the police came to suspect the defendant. They arranged to have the defendant meet the police on the steps of the Customs Building. The person on the boat was told that a suspect was going to meet the agents on the steps and that if he could identify the woman, he should waive his handkerchief. The person from the boat saw the woman approach and walk up the steps. Not until the woman met the police on the steps, however, did the person from the boat waive his handkerchief. This was an impermissibly suggestive show-up procedure which tainted that, and future, identifications. Though another witness also identified the defendant, the erroneous admission of the tainted identification necessitated reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Bouthot, 878 F.2d 1506 (1st Cir. 1989)

The witness was subpoenaed to appear in the state trial court and watched the defendant being brought into court. Thereafter, she was shown a photographic array. This procedure is impermissibly suggestive and the photographic identification should not have been admitted into evidence. This case needs to be re-examined in light of Perry v. New Hampshire, 132 S. Ct. 716 (2012).
United States v. Eltayib, 88 F.3d 157 (2d Cir. 1996)

Though the error was harmless, the photo array that was shown to the witness was unduly suggestive and there was no independent basis of reliability for the identification.

United States v. Emanuele, 51 F.3d 1123 (3rd Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with two bank robberies. One of the bank tellers had previously either failed to identify the defendant and the other provided a contradictory identification. During the trial, the witnesses were instructed to wait in the hallway of the courthouse. The defendant, in shackles, was marched past the two witnesses, who, among themselves, concluded that he “must be the robber.” They later provided in-court identifications of the defendant. This was error. Their in-court identifications were surely prompted by having seen the defendant in shackles in the hallway, and thus there was a substantial risk of misidentification. Whether the government acted intentionally or not is a factor which may be considered by the court in assessing whether the identification procedure was unduly suggestive, but it is not determinative. Also, other evidence of guilt or innocence is not relevant in gauging whether the identification procedure is unduly suggestive, or not.

Dispensa v. Lynaugh, 847 F.2d 211 (5th Cir. 1988)

The defendant identified an assailant who did not meet the description of the defendant. Nevertheless, the victim was brought to a restaurant where she was told a suspect was located and a detective stood behind the defendant and asked the victim if the assailant could be identified. This was improper identification proof.

Thigpen v. Cory, 804 F.2d 893 (6th Cir. 1986)

A robbery victim was confronted with the defendant at a co-defendant’s line-up, preliminary hearing and trial. The presence of the defendant at the other suspect’s line-up planted suspicion in the victim’s mind that was reinforced by the defendant’s presence at the first suspect’s trial. Admitting the identification testimony violated the defendant’s right to due process and required setting aside the conviction.

United States v. Kord, 836 F.2d 368 (7th Cir. 1988)

It was improper for the prosecutor to coach his witnesses prior to putting them on the stand by having them look through the courtroom windows and see if they could identify the defendants. While improper, this did not require reversal of the conviction.

Williams v. Armontrout, 877 F.2d 1376 (8th Cir. 1989)

A witness’ in-court identification was impermissibly tainted by a suggestive photo array and a hypnotic session which was uncontrolled and which could have led to the eyewitness’ being influenced to identify a particular suspect.

Tomlin v. Myers, 30 F.3d 1235 (9th Cir. 1994)

The petitioner’s trial counsel failed to challenge an out-of-court identification (because it was conducted without the benefit of counsel), as well as the in-court identification which may have been the product of the unlawful out-of-court identification. This was ineffective assistance of counsel, necessitating the granting of habeas relief. The court of appeals concluded, moreover, that the unconstitutional out-of-court identification did taint the in-court identification and the latter should have been excluded.
United States v. Olvera, 30 F.3d 1195 (9th Cir. 1994)

A bank robber entered a bank and ordered the teller to give him money. The defendant, who did not testify at trial, was directed by the prosecutor to stand up and utter the same words uttered by the defendant. The teller, who was on the stand, was not asked if the voice was similar. This violated the defendant’s right to due process. This procedure was not needed to enable the witness to identify the defendant – indeed, she identified the defendant by his appearance, not by the sound of his voice.

United States v. Amador-Galvan, 9 F.3d 1414 (9th Cir. 1993)

Whether an expert should be permitted to testify on the issue of the reliability of eye witness testimony should be evaluated under the standard set forth in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 113 S.Ct. 2786 (1993). A remand was required in this case to apply the proper standard.

United States v. LaPierre, 998 F.2d 1460 (9th Cir. 1993)

Two holdings relating to identifications: (1) Defendant’s attorney expressed an interest in being present at a post-charge line-up. When the line-up began, however, the attorney was left outside waiting in the hall. The police remembered the attorney was there after the first two line-up members had been asked to step forward and the attorney was then invited in the room. This violated the defendant’s right to counsel. United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967). (2) At trial, an officer was permitted to testify that the person portrayed in the bank videotape of the robbery was, in fact, the defendant. This “identification” invaded the province of the jury. There was no evidence that the officer knew the defendant and there was no evidence that the defendant had changed his appearance prior to trial. Only in these two circumstances may someone give an opinion that a surveillance photo is the defendant.
IDENTITY THEFT

Flores-Figueroa v. United States, 129 S.Ct. 1886 (2009)

The Supreme Court resolves a Circuit split and, agreeing with the majority (as set forth in the cases below), held that in order to be guilty of a § 1028A offense, the defendant must be shown to have known that the identifying information that was “used” was of a real person. That is, the language of the statute, the offender “knowingly . . . uses, without lawful authority, a “means of identification of another person” requires that the defendant “know” that he is using a means of identification and that he knows the “means” are “of another person.”

United States v. Berroa, 856 F.3d 141 (1st Cir. 2017)

The defendants fraudulently obtained medical licenses in Puerto Rico, by conspiring with an employee of the medical board to improperly score their test. They were charged with mail fraud and identity theft (using the license improperly to write prescriptions to patients). The mail fraud conviction was reversed (see discussion in Mail Fraud). The Identity Theft conviction was reversed because the statute was not designed to reach this type of fraud in which nobody’s identity was stolen or used improperly.

United States v. Camick, 796 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2015)

The defendant’s real name is Leslie Lyle Camick. But over ten years ago, he took the name of his deceased brother, Wayne Camick and had used that name ever since. He was charged with mail fraud, wire fraud and identity theft when he wrote a letter to a court and claimed an interest in certain property that was the subject of a Quiet Title action by another person. He used the name Wayne Camick in this correspondence. He also claimed that he had been wrongfully detained in jail and that was the reason his response to the court was late. He had been arrested and released recently, but, according to the government, his detention was not “wrongful.” The Tenth Circuit held that claiming that he was “wrongfully detained” was not a material misstatement, nor was using the name Wayne Camick a material misstatement. In an entirely separate holding, the court held that using the name Wayne Camick on a provisional patent application was also not a materially false statement. Because his mail and wire fraud convictions were reversed on sufficiency grounds, the court also reversed the aggravated identity theft convictions which were predicated on those fraud convictions.

United States v. Medlock, 792 F.3d 700 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendants, who ran an ambulance service, falsely claimed Medicare reimbursements for some of the patients by stating that a particular service was provided that was not, in fact, provided to those patients. There were, however, real patients to whom services were provided – just not the service for which reimbursement was sought. This does not qualify as identity theft. Though the defendants “used” the name and identifying information of the patient to receive Medicare reimbursement, this is not the type of “use” which is made unlawful by the identity theft statute.

United States v. Miller, 734 F.3d 530 (6th Cir. 2013)
The defendant, a partner in a real estate investment partnership applied for a loan and falsely stated that the other partners had authorized the loan. This was false. Nevertheless, this did not constitute the crime of identity theft. The identity theft statute requires that the defendant “use” the identifying information to commit a crime (including making a false statement to a bank). The Sixth Circuit, however, relying on the Rule of Lenity, concluded that “use” requires that the defendant falsely claim to be the other person, not simply to lie about the other person’s agreement.

United States v. Spears, 729 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 2013)

The defendant prepared a counterfeit identification card and sold it to a woman who wanted it in order to buy a gun illegally. The woman’s name and birthdate was on the card, but it was otherwise counterfeit. This does not constitute the crime of identity theft, because nobody’s identity was stolen. While the card was fraudulent, transferring the card to the woman did not amount to transferring the identity of “another.”

United States v. Hilton, 701 F.3d 959 (4th Cir. 2012)

The identity theft statutes are vague as to whether they apply to the unauthorized use of a corporation’s means of identification. Pursuant to the rule of lenity, the Fourth Circuit held that a conviction for stealing the identity of a corporation would be reversed. The defendants opened a bank account in the corporate name and cashed checks stolen from the corporation.

United States v. Onyesoh, 674 F.3d 1157 (9th Cir. 2012)

The government must establish that an expired credit card can be used in order to enhance a sentence pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 1029. Absent proof of “usability,” the card is not capable of obtaining something of value, which is an element of the offense.

United States v. Ochoa-Gonzalez, 598 F.3d 1033 (8th Cir. 2010)

During the plea colloquy in this identity fraud case, the AUSA told the judge that the government was not required to show that the defendant knew that the identity number she was using belonged to a real person. Because this was erroneous, the plea was defective and required that the plea be set aside.

United States v. Gomez, 580 F.3d 1229 (11th Cir. 2009)

The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury in accordance with Flores-Figueroa was not harmless error in this case and required reversal of the conviction. The element of the offense that was omitted in the jury instruction (the fact that the stolen identity applied to a real person), was a contested issue at trial and the error, therefore, was not harmless.

United States v. Bonilla, 579 F.3d 1233 (11th Cir. 2009)

Convictions for identity theft (§ 1028(a)(7)) and aggravated identity theft (§ 1028A(a)(1)) may not be sustained. Punishment for both offenses would violate the Double Jeopardy Clause. Neither of the statutes requires proof of an additional fact that the other does not.

United States v. Miranda-Lopez, 532 F.3d 1034 (9th Cir. 2008)
In order to be guilty of a § 1028A offense, the defendant must be shown to know that fake identifying information belonged to an actual individual.

United States v. Godin, 534 F.3d 51 (1st Cir. 2008)

In order to be guilty of a § 1028A offense, the defendant must be shown to know that fake identifying information belonged to an actual individual.

If a defendant commits identity theft by simply picking a name out of a phone book, this does not qualify as statutory aggravated identity theft (18 U.S.C. § 1028A), unless there is some effort to use sufficiently particular information, such as a social security number or some other uniquely identifying information relating to that person so that he is, in fact, victimized. The use of a name, alone, is not sufficiently unique to the individual to qualify. The government unsuccessfully argued that there was, in fact, a person named Marcus Jackson, and therefore the defendant did use the identity of “another person.”

United States v. Villanueva-Sotelo, 515 F.3d 1234 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

The Federal Identity Theft Statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1028A, defines aggravated identity theft as the unauthorized use of “a means of identification of another person.” The D.C. Circuit holds that this statute only applies if the “other person” is, in fact, a real person whose identity has been used. The offense does not include using forged or fraudulent documents that do not actually belong to another real person. Moreover, the government must prove that the defendant knew that the identification documents belonged to a real person.
IMMIGRATION OFFENSES

United States v. Tydingco, 909 F.3d 297 (9th Cir. 2018)

The crime of harboring a fugitive requires proof that the defendant intended to violate the law.

United States v. Castillo-Mendez, 868 F.3d 830 (9th Cir. 2017)

If a defendant illegally crosses the border, intending to be taken into border patrol custody in order to avoid smugglers who threatened the defendant, this is not illegal reentry “free from official restraint.” The failure to properly instruct the jury in this regard required reversing the conviction in this case.

United States v. Ochoa, 861 F.3d 1010 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with illegal reentry, following his removal for the commission of an aggravated felony, to wit: conspiracy to export defense articles without a license. The Ninth Circuit held that the predicate offense was not an aggravated felony and therefore, the removal was not appropriate as charged and the illegal reentry conviction was reversed.

United States v. Khalil, 857 F.3d 137 (2d Cir. 2017)

The defendant helped a Pakistani man illegally enter the country and prepared a false American passport for him. Count 4 of the indictment alleged that the defendant then picked up the Pakistani man and drove him to the train station for the purpose of helping him move to Canada. 8 U.S.C. § 1324(a)(1)(A)(ii). He was charged with transporting an alien to further his illegal presence in the United States. The jury convicted and the Second Circuit reversed. The transportation activity was intended to remove the alien from the United States, not to further his presence in the United States.

United States v. Vazquez-Hernandez, 849 F.3d 1219 (9th Cir. 2017)

At the border in Nogales, Arizona, people coming into the United States actually enter the border for a short distance prior to entering the inspection station. The defendant was in this area, offering to wash car’s windows. The defendant was charged with attempted reentry. The court failed to instruct the jury that attempted illegal reentry requires as an element the intent to reenter free from official restraint. The Ninth Circuit held that the area approaching the inspection station comes within the definition of “official restraint” and the failure to instruct the jury on this element was reversible error.

United States v. Orona-Ibarra, 831 F.3d 867 (7th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was “found” in Texas by immigration officials. That is where the crime of illegal reentry occurred. Venue was not proper, therefore, in Illinois, where the case was tried. The case had been transferred to Illinois, because that was where he had originally been placed on probation.

United States v. Cisneros-Rodriguez, 813 F.3d 748 (9th Cir. 2015)
A customs officer told the defendant, prior to her removal hearing, that a lawyer would be no use to her. She then waived her right to counsel at the hearing. She was now being prosecuted for re-entry. The customs agent’s improper comment about the right to counsel at the removal hearing tainted that proceeding and thus, the defendant could not be prosecuted for illegal re-entry based on that removal.

United States v. Guzman-Ibarez, 792 F.3d 1094 (9th Cir. 2015)

Based on his claim that the 1999 deportation hearing was conducted in violation of his due process rights, the defendant claimed that the indictment for illegal re-entry was required to be dismissed. The Ninth Circuit remanded to determine whether the defendant was prejudiced by the IJ’s failure to advise him of a then-existing avenue of relief.

United States v. Guerrero-Jasso, 752 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2014)

In order to invoke the twenty-year maximum sentence for being found in the United States after having been removed following a conviction for an aggravated felony, the indictment must allege, or the defendant must admit, that he had a prior aggravated felony that preceded his removal. Triggering the twenty-year maximum absent an allegation in the indictment or an admission by the defendant to these additional facts violates Apprendi.

United States v. Borrero, 771 F.3d 973 (7th Cir. 2014)

The evidence in this harboring case failed to establish that the defendants knew that their clients were illegal aliens or that the defendants were recklessly indifferent to this fact.

United States v. Raya-Vaca, 771 F.3d 1195 (9th Cir. 2014)

A defect in the procedure that led to the defendant’s removal (the failure of the immigration officer to advise the alien of the charge against him and to permit his to read the sworn statement against him), invalidated his illegal re-entry conviction.

United States v. Aguilera-Rios, 769 F.3d 626 (9th Cir. 2014)

Defendant was charged with illegal re-entry. He was originally removed based on having possessed a firearm after being convicted of a felony. The removal, however, was improper because it was based on a charge that did not qualify as a removable offense. (The offense was for possession of a firearm after being convicted of a felony, but the state offense did not have an exception for antique weapons, which meant it was not categorically a removable offense, according to Moncrieffe v. Holder, 133 S. Ct. 1678 (2013)).

United States v. Vargas-Cordon, 733 F.3d 366 (2d Cir. 2013)

The offense of harboring requires some evidence more than simply providing shelter. In addition, there must be some indication of an intent to hide or conceal.

United States v. Wei Lin, 738 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir. 2013)

18 U.S.C. § 1546 makes it a crime to possess of forged or false documents used to gain entrance into the United States. The defendant possessed a forged driver’s license from the Northern Mariana Islands. The Ninth Circuit held that this type of document is not covered by the statute.
United States v. Macias, 740 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 2014)

After the defendant unsuccessfully tried to cross into Canada at Niagara Falls, the Canadian authorities returned the defendant to CBP agents. When it was determined that the defendant had previously been deported, he was charged with being found in the United States in violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1326. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction. Macias was not “in” the United States when the Canadian officials returned him to the CBP agents.

United States v. Thum, 749 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2014)

The defendant’s supervised release was revoked based on evidence that he escorted an illegal alien from a restaurant to a waiting van, knowing that the person was illegally in the country and needed transportation away from the post of entry. While this evidence may have supported a charge that he aided in the transportation of an illegal alien, it did not amount to encouraging or inducing the alien to reside in the country illegally. Because the revocation petition alleged that he encouraged or induced the alien to remain in the country, the trial court erred in granting the petition.

United States v. Melendez-Castro, 671 F.3d 950 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defect in the defendant’s 1997 immigration proceedings – that he was not meaningfully informed of his eligibility for voluntary departure – violated his due process rights. A remand to determine whether he was prejudiced was necessary to determine the impact on this criminal illegal reentry case.

United States v. Barajas-Alvarado, 655 F.3d 1077 (9th Cir. 2011)

If a defendant’s immigration illegal re-entry case is based on a prior removal that was expedited, he may challenge – in the criminal case – the procedure used in that prior proceeding.

United States v. Costello, 666 F.3d 1040 (7th Cir. 2012)

The girlfriend of an illegal alien was not guilty of harboring under § 1324(a)(1)(A)(iii) simply by virtue of the fact the alien/boyfriend lived in her apartment. There was no evidence that she concealed the boyfriend, or shielded him from detection. The court spends considerable time discussing the definition of the word “harboring” and concludes that it means more than simply providing a place to live. Various dictionaries were consulted, as well as Google in this endeavor to figure out the meaning of the word.

United States v. Dominguez, 661 F.3d 1051 (11th Cir. 2011)

An essential element of a § 1324(a)(1)(A)(ii) offense of transporting an alien “in furtherance of such violation of law” requires proof that the transportation was designed to further the illegal presence of the alien. In this case, the defendant was a sports agent. He smuggled Cubans into the United States and after they arrived, he participated in transporting them to Los Angeles. This transportation, however, was not designed or intended to further their illegal status, but rather to get them in contact with a lawyer who endeavored to have them processed through Immigration so that they could remain. The Eleventh Circuit reversed the convictions on the § 1324(a)(1)(A)(ii) counts as well as harboring counts of the indictment.
United States v. Garcia-Paulin, 627 F.3d 127 (5th Cir. 2010)
A prosecution under 8 U.S.C. § 1324(a)(1)(A)(i) for bringing an illegal alien into the country requires some proof that the defendant participated in bringing the alien into the country. Simply providing a phony stamp for his passport that would have assisted him in getting a job was not sufficient evidence to prosecute the defendant under this statute. In this case, the defendant entered a guilty plea and the Fifth Circuit concluded that that factual basis for the plea was insufficient, because the only facts offered to support the defendant’s guilt related to his providing the fraudulent documents that were needed to assist the alien to enter the country.

United States v. Cerna, 603 F.3d 32 (2d Cir. 2010)
Because of counsel’s deficient performance during the administrative proceedings that led to defendant’s initial deportation, the criminal conviction for illegal re-entry could not be upheld in this case.

United States v. Arias-Ordonez, 597 F.3d 972 (9th Cir. 2010)
Because of defects in the removal proceedings, the defendant’s prosecution for reentry after removal was properly dismissed by the district court. The defendant was advised during the removal proceedings that there was “no administrative relief which may be extended” which was not true.

United States v. Pereyra-Gabino, 563 F.3d 322 (8th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was charged with harboring illegal aliens. The instruction explained that the jury must find (1) that a person was in the country illegally; (2) that the defendant knew that a person was in the country illegally; and (3) that the defendant harbored or attempted to harbor one of the people identified in #1. The problem with this instruction is that there were several aliens identified in the case and the instruction permitted a jury to find that the defendant harbored one of the illegal aliens, but not that he knew that particular alien was in the country illegally. That is, the court failed to explain that all three elements must apply to at least one of the aliens.

United States v. Barraza-Ramos, 550 F.3d 1246 (10th Cir. 2008)
The defendant’s prior conviction for aggravated battery under Florida law was not categorically a crime of violence and enhancing the sentence on the basis of this prior conviction was error.

United States v. Silveus, 542 F.3d 993 (3rd Cir. 2008)
The evidence was sufficient on counts alleging transportation of illegal aliens, but the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was guilty of harboring the aliens. One illegal alien lived in the same apartment with the defendant. But cohabitation is not alone sufficient to prove harboring. When an agent went to the apartment looking for the alien, the defendant said that the alien was not in the apartment and she did not know if someone had just left out the back door. This evidence, too, was insufficient to prove harboring.

United States v. Ozcelik, 527 F.3d 88 (3rd Cir. 2008)
The defendant, a Customs Officer, accepted bribes from an alien and was convicted of those offenses. The defendant was also charged with harboring the alien, in violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1324. The basis for this charge was that the defendant told the alien, “stay low key for 5 - 6 months.” He also advised him keep a low profile and that it was good that he lived at a different address than the one at file at INS. The Third Circuit held that this conduct – this advice – did not establish that he attempted to conceal or harbor the alien. The conviction on this count was reversed.

United States v. Lopez, 484 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2007)

The crime of bringing an alien into the United States is completed when the alien disembarks inside the United States. A person who transports the alien inside the country after the alien has arrived may only be prosecuted for transporting an alien in the country. He may not be prosecuted for aiding and abetting bringing the alien into the country.

United States v. Gunera, 479 F.3d 373 (5th Cir. 2007)

The agents were aware of the defendant’s presence in the country more than five years prior to the filing of the charges and the illegal reentry charge, therefore, was barred by the statute of limitations. The defendant reentered illegally and then applied for temporary protected status. More than five years later, the charges were filed.

United States v. Charleswell, 456 F.3d 347 (3rd Cir. 2006)

Because the defendant was denied the opportunity for direct review of a reinstatement order, the district court should have further inquired into whether this caused prejudice thus barring a re-entry prosecution.

United States v. Camacho-Lopez, 450 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 2006)

Defects in defendant’s deportation proceeding rendered his illegal re-entry prosecution impermissible. The Immigration Judge erroneously told the defendant that he was not eligible for discretionary relief.

United States v. Lopez, 445 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 2006)

Because of an apparent defect in the deportation hearing (the absence of meaningful judicial review), the defendant’s charge of illegal re-entry could not be sustained without further inquiry into the administrative process that resulted in his deportation.

United States v. Lombera-Valdovinos, 429 F.3d 927 (9th Cir. 2005)

An illegal alien who presents himself at the border for the express purpose of turning himself in to serve a previously-imposed sentence, has not “unlawfully attempted to re-enter.” This case gets my vote for least likely ever to happen again.

United States v. El Shami, 434 F.3d 659 (4th Cir. 2006)

The failure to give proper notice of deportation proceedings to the defendant deprived him of the right to administratively challenge the deportation. Consequently, his prosecution for unlawful entry could not be sustained.
United States v. Smith-Balthier, 424 F.3d 913 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant sought to introduce evidence in this illegal re-entry case that he was actually a United States citizen. Barring this testimony was error. In addition, the trial court erred in barring the defendant from introducing evidence that he thought he was a United States citizen, thus negating the mens rea element of the offense.

United States v. Munoz, 412 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was found guilty of bringing illegal aliens into the United States for financial gain. The government argued that the defendant did not personally have to receive financial gain; it was only necessary that the defendant knew that somebody would receive financial gain as a result of the defendant’s actions of bringing the illegal aliens into the country. The Ninth Circuit disagreed: the defendant must be shown to have intended to reap financial gain as a result of the smuggling conduct.

United States v. Bello-Bahena, 411 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2005)

In order to be found guilty of an offense under § 1326, it is not enough simply to be “found in” the United States after having been deported. The government must also prove that the defendant entered the United States free from official restraint at the time officials discovered or apprehended him. Official restraint includes constant governmental observation or surveillance from the moment of entry. In other words, a person under constant surveillance from the time that he enters the county is not “found in” the United States, for purposes of § 1326. This is true, even if the defendant is not aware that he is under surveillance and even if the actual arrest occurs at a point well past the point of entry. The trial court’s failure to properly instruct the jury on this concept was reversible error.

United States v. Zavala-Mendez, 411 F.3d 1116 (9th Cir. 2005)

A defendant is not “found in” the United States for purposes of 8 U.S.C. § 1326(a), if he has simply presented himself for entry at the border and been directed to the border station.

United States v. Orellana, 405 F.3d 360 (5th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was charged with possessing a firearm while being an alien “illegally or unlawfully in the United States.” The defendant had a lawful temporary protected status pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1254a. The Fifth Circuit, applying the Rule of Lenity, concluded that the defendant was not “unlawfully in the United States” and reversed the conviction.

United States v. Scott, 394 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant successfully demonstrated a fundamental procedural error in his underlying deportation order – ineffective assistance of counsel – thus negating the validity of his deportation, which negated an essential element of his illegal reentry case.

United States v. Calderon, 391 F.3d 370 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant successfully collaterally attacked his deportation in the district court and the Second Circuit affirmed. Despite the fact that the defendant failed to exhaust his administrative remedies with INS, his failure to do so was not knowing and intelligent. He was expressly misinformed by the Immigration Judge that no administrative relief was available.
In this illegal re-entry case, the lower court erred in barring the defendant from collaterally attacking his administrative deportation. Though the defendant had not exhausted his administrative remedies, the waiver of the appeal was invalid, because the waiver was not knowingly and intelligently made.

The defendant demonstrated that he was prejudiced by the due process defects in his deportation proceeding.

18 U.S.C. § 911 makes it a crime to falsely claim to be a U.S. citizen. On an I-9 employment form, the defendant checked a box indicating that he was a U.S. “national.” Checking the box did not violate § 911. Though all citizens are nationals, not all nationals are citizens.

A deportation order may be collaterally challenged in an illegal reentry criminal case if the alien (1) exhausted administrative remedies; (2) was deprived of the opportunity for judicial review; and (3) showed that the proceeding was fundamentally unfair. 8 U.S.C. § 1326(d). In this case, the district court concluded that all three requirements were met and dismissed the indictment. The Second Circuit approved each of the findings, but remanded to determine if the fundamental unfairness of the proceeding prejudiced the defendant.

An underlying removal hearing is “fundamentally flawed” if the alien’s due process rights were violated and he suffered prejudice as a result. If the removal hearing is fundamentally flawed, a criminal prosecution under 8 U.S.C. § 1326 is defensible on this basis. In this case, the removal hearing was flawed because the immigration judge did not inform the defendant that he had the right to appeal the decision.

The defendant was charged with knowingly transporting undocumented aliens in furtherance of the aliens’ illegal presence within the United States. The trial court granted a post-trial judgment of acquittal and the court of appeals affirmed. The evidence did show that the defendant was aware of the illegal alien status of the passengers in his vehicle. But there was insufficient evidence that the reason he was driving them from Arizona to New Mexico was to further their illegal presence in the United States. Even if the transportation was for the purpose of helping the passengers seek employment, this does not satisfy the "in furtherance" element of the offense.

The defendant was charged with a violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1326(a) – being a deported alien found in the United States without permission and 8 U.S.C. § 1326(b)(1) – being such an alien after having been deported following a felony conviction. This latter provision is a sentencing enhancement provision, not a separate crime. Almendarez-Torres v. United States, 523 U.S. 224, 118 S.Ct. 1219 (1998). Therefore, there was no necessity (or relevance) in introducing the defendant’s prior felony convictions at trial. Harmless error.

United States v. Chukwura, 101 F.3d 230 (2d Cir. 1996)

The defendant was prosecuted in the Northern District of Georgia, and as part of his sentence, the judge ordered that he be escorted out of the country as part of his term of supervised release. After being escorted out of the country, he attempted to re-enter and was prosecuted under 8 U.S.C. §1326 for attempting to re-enter after being deported. Because he was never “deported” as that term is defined in §1326, he could not be prosecuted under this provision.

United States v. 1982 Ford Pick-up (Mendoza), 873 F.2d 947 (6th Cir. 1989)

A prerequisite to a prosecution under 8 U.S.C. §1324(a)(1)(B), is that defendant have the specific intent to transport the illegal alien to support the alien’s illegal presence in the country. Merely transporting the alien within the country, without that specific intent is not sufficient to sustain a conviction. In this case the evidence was insufficient to support the defendants’ conviction in light of the fact that they took no money from their passengers and did not attempt to conceal their immigration status.

United States v. Jimenez-Marmolejo, 104 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 1996)

The defendant challenged his §1326 conviction on the basis that his original deportation was procedurally flawed. This Ninth Circuit agreed. Because the immigration judge failed to obtain a knowing and intelligent waiver of defendant’s right to appeal the deportation decision, the procedure violated his right to due process and could not serve as the predicate for a prosecution for illegal reentry.

United States v. Gomez-Rodriguez, 77 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 1996)

8 U.S.C. §1326(b)(2) makes it a crime to re-enter the United States after having been deported and convicted of an aggravated felony. The definition of “aggravated felony” was amended in 1990 to include various crimes of violence. The defendant committed a crime of violence prior to the enactment of the 1990 amendment, at a time when that crime was not included within §1326’s definition of an aggravated felony. Upon re-entering in 1995, the defendant could not be convicted of this offense. This decision was affirmed on rehearing en banc at 96 F.3d 1262 (9th Cir. 1996).

United States v. Nguyen, 73 F.3d 887 (9th Cir. 1995)

8 U.S.C. §1324(a) makes it an offense to bring any alien into the United States other than through a port of entry. The statute contains no explicit mens rea requirement. Nevertheless, the court concluded that Congress intended such a requirement. See Staples v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 1793 (1994); United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422 (1978); Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952). The government must prove that the defendant knew that the individuals he was transporting were aliens and that he off-loaded them at other than a port of entry, intending to violate the law.
United States v. Bahena-Cardenas, 70 F.3d 1071 (9th Cir. 1995)

8 U.S.C. §1326 makes it a crime to attempt to re-enter the country after being previously arrested and deported. The defendant had been the subject of deportation proceedings previously, but was never served with the warrant of arrest and simply left the country voluntarily. When he attempted to re-enter the country, he could not be charged with a §1326 offense. Because he was never served with the arrest warrant the first time, he was not under arrest and this is an essential element of the offense.

United States v. Canals-Jimenez, 943 F.2d 1284 (11th Cir. 1991)

While the evidence would have supported a conviction for entering or attempting to enter the country, the evidence did not support a conviction for “being found in” the country, where the defendant was stopped at the recognized immigration port of entry.
IMMUNITY

SEE: FIFTH AMENDMENT (Immunity and Proffers) IMPOSSIBILITY

United States v. Fernandez, 722 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2013)
The First Circuit discusses the defense of impossibility – distinguishing factual impossibility from pure legal impossibility. In this case, the “goal” of the conspiracy was not illegal, and therefore, impossibility was a defense to the conspiracy charge.

United States v. Karaouni, 379 F.3d 1139 (9th Cir. 2004)
18 U.S.C. § 911 makes it a crime to falsely claim to be a U.S. citizen. On an I-9 employment form, the defendant checked a box indicating that he was a U.S. “national.” Checking the box did not violate § 911. Though all citizens are nationals, not all nationals are citizens. The fact that the defendant told an agent that he intended to misrepresent himself as a citizen does not render his conduct criminal under § 911, because confessing to a crime that was not, in fact, committed, does not make it so.
INDICTMENTS

The Court initially agreed to answer the question whether the omission of an essential element of the offense in an indictment can ever be considered harmless error. However, after oral argument, the Court determined that the indictment under consideration did not, in fact, fail to allege a required element. The defendant was charged with attempted re-entry pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1326(a). The indictment did not specifically allege what the “substantial step” was that was a required element of the offense. The Court decided that it was sufficient that the indictment alleged that the defendant attempted to re-enter at a particular time and place. It was not also necessary to identify specifically what he did (such as presenting a misleading identification card, or walking into the inspection area, or lying to the inspector). If the defendant is charged under § 1326(a) with attempting to illegally re-enter, the indictment is not required to allege a particular overt act or any other “component part” of the offense.

Jones v. United States, 119 S.Ct. 1215 (1999)

The federal carjacking statute provides for three different punishments, depending on whether death results, serious bodily injury results, or if there is no serious injury. The Court, distinguishing Almendarez-Torres v. United States, 523 U.S. 224, 118 S.Ct. 1219 (1998), held that these amounted to three separate crimes and the indictment had to spell out which crime was alleged, and the jury was required to unanimously agree on which crime was proved.

An indictment must set forth each element of the crime that it charges, but it need not set forth factors relevant only to sentencing. 8 U.S.C. §1326(b)(2), which makes it a crime to re-enter the United States after having been deported and convicted of an aggravated felony, is a penalty enhancement provision, not a separate offense. Therefore, the indictment is not required to allege the commission of a prior aggravated felony.

United States v. Lang, 732 F.3d 1246 (11th Cir. 2013)

The crime of structuring a financial transaction (31 U.S.C. § 5324), is not committed simply by the depositing of an amount of money in increments less than $10,000.00. Rather the offense is committed by the act of “structuring” not the act of “depositing” and the critical element is that there is a larger sum of money that is being broken into incremental deposits. Therefore, an indictment that simply alleges that the defendant made deposits of less than $10,000 (even if there are dozens of such deposits and some occurred on the same day), it is not a crime, unless the indictment expressly alleges that there was an amount of money in excess of $10,000 that was divided into separate deposits for the purpose of evading the reporting requirement. The indictment in this case was defective and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Gonzalez, 686 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2012)

The indictment did not state the quantity of drugs involved in the conspiracy, but merely recited the statutory penalty that would be applicable if there were an allegation that 500 or more

1013
grams of cocaine were involved. Failure to allege an amount of drugs involved was a violation of the defendant’s right to be charged by the grand jury with the offense. “Stating that an act is in violation of a cited statutory section adds no factual information as to the act itself. It declares the legal basis for claiming that the act is deserving of punishment, but does nothing to describe the act.”

_United States v. McGarity_, 669 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2012)

An indictment charging a defendant with a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1512(c), obstruction of justice, must identify the official proceeding that was the object of the obstruction. Even if the indictment mirrors the elements of the offense in the statute, the indictment must specifically identify the particular proceeding that the government will prove was the object of the obstruction.

_United States v. Schmitz_, 634 F.3d 1247 (11th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with mail fraud and violating 18 U.S.C. § 666 (federal funds fraud). The latter counts failed to allege sufficient facts to support the charges and those counts of the indictment should have been dismissed. Though the factual background for the allegations appeared in other counts of the indictment, the court is not required to automatically incorporate facts from one count into another count.

_United States v. Kingrea_, 573 F.3d 186 (4th Cir. 2009)

The indictment in this “cock-fighting” case failed to include all the essential elements of the offense. The indictment should have been dismissed. The fact that this was a conspiracy offense; and the fact that the judge properly instructed the jury on the elements of the offense, did not alter the result.

_United States v. Abu-Shawish_, 507 F.3d 550 (7th Cir. 2007)

In order to violate § 666, the defendant’s fraud must affect the program that employs the defendant. Thus, it is not enough that the defendant commit a fraud while employed by a covered organization (i.e., recipient of federal funds). The fraud must impact the organization. The indictment in this case failed to allege that the defendant defrauded the organization for which he worked. Though he was alleged to have defrauded the City of Milwaukee, he was not employed by Milwaukee. Thus, the indictment failed to allege that he defrauded the entity for which he worked and was fatally defective.

_Gautt v. Lewis_, 489 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2007)

The indictment in this cited a criminal provision involving the “use of a firearm” rather than the provision outlawing “discharging” a firearm. The conviction and sentence for discharging a firearm, therefore, could not be sustained.

_Valentine v. Konteh_, 395 F.3d 626 (6th Cir. 2005)

The state court indictment charged the defendant with twenty identically-worded counts of sexual penetration and twenty identically-worded counts of child rape. There was no distinction between these charges in the indictment, the bill of particulars, or even at trial. A conviction on all forty counts could not be sustained because the failure to provide adequate notice of the specific charges denied the defendant his right to due process. The conviction on these counts also violated the defendant’s guarantee against double jeopardy. One of each counts was allowed to stand.

United States v. Omer, 395 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s bank fraud indictment failed to allege that the falsehood was material. He moved to dismiss the indictment prior to trial, but this motion was denied. The conviction could not be sustained in light of his timely challenge to the sufficiency of the indictment.

In order to qualify as a criminal false statement under 18 U.S.C. § 1001(c), a false statement to the legislative branch must be in connection with an investigation or review of a committee, subcommittee, commission or office of Congress. Alleging this element of the offense is essential in an indictment.

United States v. Combs, 369 F.3d 925 (6th Cir. 2004)

In the 1998 amendment to § 924(c), Congress intended to create two separate violations: (1) using or carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime; and (2) possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. “Use” requires active employment of the firearm by the person committing the drug offense. “In furtherance” requires proof that the firearm was possessed to advance or promote the commission of the underlying drug trafficking crime. An example of “use” without “in furtherance” would be if a buyer of drugs stole a gun from his dealer’s house during a drug deal. Thus, the two crimes are, in fact, conceptually different. The indictment in this case mismatched the elements of these two offenses. The indictment charged the defendant with “possessing a weapon during and in relation to a drug offense.” The indictment was fatally defective because it failed to allege the elements of an offense. In addition, with regard to a separate count, though the indictment properly alleged the elements of the possession offense, the jury instructions improperly “amended” the indictment by setting forth elements from the “use” prong of the statute (during and in relation to a drug offense) rather than the “possession” prong (in furtherance). The conviction on this count, therefore, had to be reversed.

United States v. Bobo, 344 F.3d 1076 (11th Cir. 2003)

The indictment in this case failed to adequately allege either a conspiracy to commit health care fraud, or a substantive scheme to defraud.

United States v. Adkinson, 135 F.3d 1363 (11th Cir. 1998)

The indictment in this case alleged that the defendants had a scheme to defraud a bank. The indictment did not allege, however, an execution of the scheme. Both elements are essential to a bank fraud prosecution. The indictment was defective and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Yefsky, 994 F.2d 885 (1st Cir. 1993)

Though the error was harmless, the indictment in this case inadequately charged a mail fraud conspiracy. The indictment simply alleged that the defendant made false pretenses, without identifying them. In a mail fraud case – even if it is a conspiracy to commit mail fraud – the fraud must be specified in the applicable count of the indictment.

United States v. Scanzello, 832 F.2d 18 (3rd Cir. 1987)

Because the indictment for conspiracy to steal goods from an interstate shipment failed to specify the value of the stolen goods, only a misdemeanor conviction could be upheld.

United States v. Pupo, 841 F.2d 1235 (4th Cir. 1988)

The indictment in this case failed to allege that the defendant acted “knowingly and intentionally.” The fact that the indictment specifically charged the defendant with a violation of 21 U.S.C. §841 is not a sufficient substitute for alleging, in the indictment, the knowing and intentional elements of the offense.

United States v. Hooker, 841 F.2d 1225 (4th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was indicted for conspiracy to violate RICO which requires that the business enterprise have an effect on interstate commerce. The indictment failed to allege the interstate commerce element of the offense. The Fourth Circuit holds that this is a fatal defect in the indictment requiring dismissal.

United States v. Fitzgerald, 89 F.3d 218 (5th Cir. 1996)

The quantity of cocaine base – more than five grams – must be alleged in the indictment (it was sufficient in this case to make the allegation in the caption) in order to invoke the felony possession statute, 21 U.S.C. §844(a). Possession of less than five grams is a misdemeanor.

United States v. Morales-Rosales, 838 F.2d 1359 (5th Cir. 1988)

An indictment’s failure to allege an element of this immigration offense rendered it defective. The crime, 8 U.S.C. §1324, outlaws transporting an illegal alien to willfully further the alien’s violation of the law. The indictment failed to allege that the defendant acted willfully or in furtherance of the alien’s violation of the law. The indictment should have been dismissed.

United States v. Holcomb, 797 F.2d 1320 (5th Cir. 1986)

In this Mann Act prosecution, the government failed to specify in the indictment that the prostitute was carried over a route used by a common carrier. Failure to specify this element of the offense renders the indictment insufficient.

United States v. McGhee, 854 F.2d 905 (6th Cir. 1988)

An indictment which charged the defendant with an “attempt to facilitate” the possession and distribution of cocaine failed to state a legally cognizable crime under §§843(b) or 846 of Title 21.

United States v. Locklear, 97 F.3d 196 (7th Cir. 1996)

Defendant was prosecuted for uttering counterfeit cashier’s checks in violation of 18 U.S.C. §493. That statute requires proof that the instrument was purported to have been issued by a bank authorized or acting under the laws of the United States. The indictment did not charge this element of the offense, the government offered no evidence on this element of the offense and the jury was not instructed on this element of the offense. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. ORS, Inc., 997 F.2d 628 (9th Cir. 1993)

The defendant corporation was charged with a Sherman Act violation, which requires a showing of an impact on interstate commerce. The indictment alleged in conclusory terms that there was an impact, but failed to allege any facts in support of this charge. The indictment was defective and was properly dismissed by the district court.

United States v. Bell, 22 F.3d 274 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §664, which outlaws embezzling money from a fund covered by ERISA. Many of the counts, including portions of the conspiracy count, alleged that the defendant embezzled money from a fund which was not, in fact, covered by ERISA. After the defendant entered a guilty plea, he sought to withdraw the plea based on this defect in the indictment. The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s motion to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Scott, 993 F.2d 1520 (11th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was a postmaster. The government believed that he improperly brought some packages home with him. He was indicted and charged with “detaining” the mail in violation of 18 U.S.C. §1703. This indictment was inadequate. The indictment did not allege that he “unlawfully” detained the mail. Because the mail can be detained lawfully by a postmaster, this count did not allege the essential elements of the offense. The government argued that the specific reference to the statute cured the deficiency in the charging language. The appellate court disagreed: §1703 has two subsections, “a” and “b” and the indictment did not specify which one was the focus of the charge, so the indictment did not make “specific reference” to the code.

United States v. Fitapelli, 786 F.2d 1461 (11th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was charged with an antitrust violation, but the indictment failed to adequately allege the effect on interstate commerce which is an essential and jurisdictional element of the offense.
INDICTMENTS
(Dismissal – Rules 12(h)(2) and 48(a))

United States v. Romero, 360 F.3d 1248 (10th Cir. 2004)
Generally, dismissal upon a government’s motion pursuant to Rule 48(a) is required unless dismissal is clearly contrary to manifest public interest. The principal object of the “leave of court” requirement in Rule 48 is to protect a defendant against prosecutorial harassment, e.g., charging, dismissing, and recharging when the government moves to dismiss an indictment over the defendant’s objection.

In re United States, 345 F.3d 450 (7th Cir. 2003)
The district court may not decline to dismiss an indictment pursuant to Rule 48(a) simply on the ground that the court disagrees with the Justice Department’s exercise of prosecutorial discretion. The government agreed to dismiss certain counts of the indictment in a plea agreement with the defendant. The district court refused to dismiss one of the counts because the government was attempting to circumvent the district court’s sentencing authority. The Seventh Circuit granted a writ of mandamus for the purpose of dismissing the count. The purpose of Rule 48(a) is to protect the defendant from abuses of the government indicting and dismissing counts repeatedly, not to invest the court with discretion to decide that additional charges should be pursued. “The plenary prosecutorial power of the executive branch safeguards liberty, for, in conjunction with the plenary legislative power of Congress, it assures that no one can be convicted of a crime without the concurrence of all three branches. When a judge assumes the power to prosecute, the number shrinks to two.”

United States v. Flores, 404 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2005)
Disagreeing with the Eleventh Circuit (see United States v. Salman, 378 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 2004), the Fifth Circuit holds that if there is no dispute as to the facts, a court, pursuant to Rule 12(h)(2) may dismiss an indictment on legal grounds.

United States v. Smith, 55 F.3d 157 (4th Cir. 1995)
Pursuant to Rule 48(a), the government, “with leave of court,” may dismiss an indictment. In this case, one defendant entered a guilty plea, following which all four co-defendants (against whom the defendant testified) were acquitted. The government moved to dismiss the indictment, but the district court refused to grant “leave of court.” The Fourth Circuit reverses: Only if the government acts in bad faith may the court deny the government’s motion to dismiss.

United States v. Gonzalez, 58 F.3d 459 (9th Cir. 1995)
After the defendant entered a guilty plea to two counts, he provided substantial assistance to the government. The parties later realized that after sentencing, the defendant would be deported because of the nature of the charges in the second count. The government moved to dismiss the second count, pursuant to Rule 48(a). The trial court’s denial of this motion was erroneous. The “leave of court” requirement of the rule is designed to protect the defendant from a prosecutor who dismisses, recharges and harasses the defendant. When the government moves to dismiss and it is for the benefit of the defendant, the trial court may not deny the government’s request to dismiss except in exceptional circumstances where the prosecutor has clearly “betrayed the public interest.”
INDICTMENTS
(DISMISSAL BASED ON UNDISPUTED FACTS)

United States v. Stock, 728 F.3d 287 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §875. The Third Circuit held that “the word ‘threat’ in § 875(c) encompasses only communications expressing an intent to inflict injury in the present or future.” Thus, a general threat that a person deserves to be killed is not sufficient to prove a threat under §875. In this case, the defendant wrote a post on Craigslist stating that he had been searching for some particular police officer so that he could beat him up, but couldn’t find him. He did not say that the search would continue, or that he had any intent to harm him in the future. However, he did state that he wished that the officer would die. The Third Circuit held that this “wish” was sufficient to satisfy the “future intent” element of the offense. The Third Circuit held that the district court had the authority to determine whether the indictment was sufficient to allege an offense, because the precise “threat” made by the defendant was set forth in the indictment.

United States v. Ali, 557 F.3d 715 (6th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with making a false statement on a naturalization document. Specifically, he stated that he had never been married to two different people at the same time. The government alleged that while he was still married to a Canadian woman, he married a woman in Georgia. He claimed, in a motion to dismiss, that under Georgia law, he could not marry the second woman, because of the pre-existing marriage. The government claimed that this defense had to be raised at trial. The Sixth Circuit disagreed and held that a motion that can be decided as a matter of law without any contested facts can be raised pretrial pursuant to Rule 12. On the merits, the court held that the indictment should not be dismissed.
INDICTMENTS
(Duplicity)

In re Gomez, 830 F.3d 1225 (11th Cir. 2016)
The defendant was earlier convicted of a § 924(c) offense which alleged that he possessed a firearm in connection with certain drug offenses and a Hobbs Act conspiracy. A Hobbs Act conspiracy is not a crime of violence. Because the jury’s verdict did not reveal what the underlying offense was, it was not possible to determine if the offense constituted a crime of violence which was an essential element of the § 924(c) charge. The indictment was duplicitous and the defendant was entitled to raise a second § 2255 to challenge his conviction.

United States v. Mancuso, 718 F.3d 780 (9th Cir. 2013)
Charging the defendant with multiple sales of cocaine over a several year period in one count of an indictment violates the rule against duplicitous charges. Some of the substantive sales alleged in the count occurred outside the statute of limitations. Separate acts of distribution are separate crimes and must be charged in separate counts.

United States v. Newell, 658 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2011)
This case contains a thorough discussion of the requirement that a jury be instructed that a verdict must be unanimous when an indictment contains duplicitous allegations, such as numerous fraudulent acts in one count of the indictment, or numerous false statements. The jury must unanimously agree that at least one of the false statements or fraudulent acts occurred and they must agree which one. The failure to object, however, resulted in affirmance of the conviction, because it did not amount to plain error.

United States v. Pietrantonio, 637 F.3d 865 (8th Cir. 2011)
In this SORNA prosecution, the defendant was proved to have moved from Minnesota to Las Vegas and later traveled to Boston. Though the indictment was not duplicitous on its face, because of the manner in which the judge charged the jury, there was a likelihood that the jury may not have unanimously agreed on what conduct of the defendant constituted the offense.

United States v. Lloyd, 462 F.3d 510 (6th Cir. 2006)
Charging a violation of § 924(c) “in furtherance” and “during and in relation” to a crime of violence in one count violates the rule against duplicitous indictments. These are two separate crimes and should not be charged in the same count.

United States v. Savoires, 430 F.3d 376 (6th Cir. 2005)
18 U.S.C. § 924(c) sets forth two different crimes: (1) using or carrying a firearm during an in relation to a drug trafficking crime; and (2) possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. These two separate offenses may not be set forth in one count of the indictment.

United States v. Nattier, 127 F.3d 655 (8th Cir. 1997)
The defendant was charged in one count with conspiring to embezzle money and then to launder the proceeds of this embezzlement. The trial court cured any potential duplicity problem.
by instructing the jury that in order to convict the defendant on this count, the jury was required to unanimously agree on the particular object of the conspiracy the defendant agreed to commit (i.e., embezzlement, or money laundering, or both).

United States v. Prescott, 42 F.3d 1165 (8th Cir. 1994)

The indictment in this money laundering case charged that the defendant engaged in numerous transactions over a three-year period. The statute outlaws individual transactions which constitute money laundering, not a course of conduct. This indictment, therefore, was duplicitous. However, the failure to object pretrial waived the error.

United States v. Gordon, 844 F.2d 1397 (9th Cir. 1988)

The indictment charged the defendants in one count with conspiracy to defraud the government in the administration of a weapons program and conspiracy to obstruct the grand jury in its investigation of fraud. This constitutes the potential for jury confusion and created the possibility of a verdict based on less than unanimity. Some jurors may have believed the defendants engaged in one conspiracy, while other defendants believed the defendants engaged in another.

United States v. Schlei, 122 F.3d 944 (11th Cir. 1997)

Charging two sales of a security in one count of an indictment was duplicitous. Because of possible venue problems with regard to one of the sales, moreover, the error was not harmless. The dangers posed by a duplicitous count in an indictment are three-fold: (1) a jury may convict a defendant without unanimously agreeing on the same offense; (2) a defendant may be prejudiced in a subsequent double jeopardy defense; and (3) a court may have difficulty determining the admissibility of evidence.
INDICTMENTS
(Joinder)

See: Severance of Counts (Misjoinder)
INDICTMENTS
(Multiplicity)

SEE ALSO: MERGER OF OFFENSES

United States v. Chilaca, 909 F.3d 289 (9th Cir. 2018)

The defendant had a hard drive, a laptop and desktop computer, each of which had access to a dropbox account that had child pornography. This evidence only supports one count of possession of child pornography. The possession was simultaneous and in the same location (his house).

United States v. Vichitvongsa, 819 F.3d 260 (6th Cir. 2016)

The defendant used a firearm in the commission of a home invasion which was alleged to have furthered two conspiracies: Hobbs Act and drugs. This only supports one § 924(c) conviction.

United States v. Ajayi, 808 F.3d 1113 (7th Cir. 2015)

The defendant deposited an altered check into his bank account. Thereafter, he withdrew funds from the account that were only in the account as a result of the altered check. Each withdrawal was indicted as a separate count. The Seventh Circuit held that the bank fraud offense was the deposit of the altered check and the withdrawals were not separate indictable executions of the scheme, therefore the counts were multiplicitous.

United States v. Bloch, 718 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 2013)

The simultaneous possession of more than one firearm only supports one count of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, even if more than one firearm is possessed and even if there is more than one prior conviction, or reason that the defendant is prohibited from possessing the firearm. Charging the defendant with two counts under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) was multiplicitous.

United States v. Benjamin, 711 F.3d 371 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The defendant was twice found in possession of a firearm. He was a convicted felon. He was charged (and convicted) of two counts of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The Third Circuit, joining the decisions of various other Circuits, held that possession of a firearm is a continuing offense and cannot be prosecuted in several counts, unless there is proof that the possession was not continuous, including constructively.

Robertson v. Klem, 580 F.3d 159 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The opposite of a multiple conspiracy problem is where a defendant is convicted of two conspiracy charges where there was but one agreement. In this case, the defendant was convicted of two counts of conspiracy to commit murder (there were two victims). Both victims were killed at the same time as the result of one conspiratorial agreement. Only one conspiracy existed and only one count of conviction could be sustained.

United States v. Polouizzi, 564 F.3d 142 (2d Cir. 2009)
The unit of prosecution for possession of child pornography is the defendant’s entire collection, not one count per image. For receipt prosecutions, however, the proper unit of prosecution is for each episode that images were received.

United States v. Zalapa, 509 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2007)

The possession of a short-barreled machine gun violates two separate provisions of the registration act, 26 U.S.C. §5861. However, only one conviction and one sentence can be imposed for the possession of one weapon, regardless of the number of ways in which its possession is a violation of the registration law.

United States v. Parker, 508 F.3d 434 (7th Cir. 2007)

A defendant who possesses one firearm may not be convicted of both being a felon in possession of a firearm and being a drug user in possession of a firearm. Two convictions for this one offense are multiplicitous.

United States v. Hollis, 506 F.3d 415 (5th Cir. 2007)

A defendant may not be convicted of both being a felon in possession of a firearm and for being a fugitive in possession of a firearm. This would be multiplicitous.

United States v. Ankeny, 490 F.3d 744 (9th Cir. 2007)

The possession of several weapons by a convicted felon only amounts to one offense of possession of a weapon by a convicted felon unless the government proves that the weapons were acquired or stored at different times and places. The failure to prove this during the entry of the guilty plea required that the counts merged and all but one count should have been dismissed.

United States v. Buchanan, 485 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was convicted of several counts of receiving child pornography, but the evidence did not prove that there was more than one download with regard to the charged counts and even though there were several pictures, they were received as part of one transfer and, therefore, the defendant could only be convicted of one count of receiving child pornography.

United States v. Wallace, 447 F.3d 184 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant used a firearm to commit a drive-by shooting that was prompted by a dispute involving his drug empire. The government charged the defendant with two § 924(c) violations: using the gun in connection with the drive-by shooting and using the gun in connection with the drug conspiracy. The Second Circuit held that only one § 924(c) conviction could be sustained based on one use of the gun.

United States v. Stewart, 420 F.3d 1007 (9th Cir. 2005)

Repeating the same false statement to a law enforcement officer on two separate occasions does not constitute two separate crimes of violating § 1001, if the second false statement did not independently impair a government investigation.
United States v. Jones, 403 F.3d 604 (8th Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the indictment as multiplicitous. The defendant was charged in one count of the indictment with being a felon in possession of a firearm in August and another count of being a felon in possession of the same firearm in October. The crime, however, outlaws the continued possession of the weapon and this cannot be multiplied by however many days, or hours, the gun is possessed as a separate crime.

Valentine v. Konteh, 395 F.3d 626 (6th Cir. 2005)

The state indictment included twenty identically worded rape allegations (over a period of several months) and twenty more identically worded sexual assaults (over the same period of months). There was no differentiation between the charges. The child victim testified that she was sexually abused by the defendant many times (i.e., twenty), but could not identify any particular date. Each count of the indictment supposedly referenced another non-specific, but separate incident. The Sixth Circuit granted habeas relief: this violated due process. There was insufficient notice of the charges and a failure to prevent the possibility of double jeopardy. The jury was not able to consider each count individually and was left with an “all or nothing” type of decision.

United States v. Walters, 351 F.3d 159 (5th Cir. 2003)

The defendant delivered a home-made bomb to a military base. Two counts of the indictment charged that he (1) used the bomb to assault a federal officer and (2) used a bomb to damage a federal building. At sentencing, the court relied on the second conviction to impose a mandatory life sentence. This was error. There was only one bomb, which detonated only once. Relying on United States v. Phipps, 319 F.3d 177 (5th Cir. 2003), the Fifth Circuit held that only one conviction could be sustained for this offense.

United States v. Leftenant, 341 F.3d 338 (4th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was arrested in possession of several counterfeit notes. This constitutes one offense, not separate offenses for each note. See also United States v. Bennafield, 287 F.3d 320 (4th Cir. 2002) (only one offense can be charged when defendant possesses several packages of cocaine); United States v. Dunford, 148 F.3d 385 (4th Cir. 1998) (one offense for possession of several guns).

United States v. Johnson, 130 F.3d 1420 (10th Cir. 1997)

An indictment that charges the defendant with possession of a weapon in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), possession by a convicted felon; and possession of the same weapon in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(3), possession by a user of controlled substance, was multiplicitous. However, though the defendant could only be convicted and sentenced for one § 922(g) offense, the government was not necessarily required to "elect" which count to proceed on at trial. Whether to dismiss one of the counts pre-trial is left to the discretion of the trial court.

United States v. McIntosh, 124 F.3d 1330 (10th Cir. 1997)
One count in this indictment charged the defendant with concealing an asset. Another count charged him with filing a false report in the bankruptcy court. These counts were multiplicitous.

United States v. Stephens, 118 F.3d 479 (6th Cir. 1997)

The defendant possessed two separate quantities of cocaine on the same date, but at different locations. Even though the drugs were acquired at different times, this amounted to only one offense of possession with intent to distribute. Thus, the defendant could not receive a sentencing guideline gun enhancement pursuant to his possession of one cache of drugs (and a gun), and a § 942(c) sentence in connection with his possession of the other cache of drugs.

United States v. Lilly, 983 F.2d 300 (1st Cir. 1992)

In an effort to obtain one bank loan, the defendants submitted a number of fraudulent documents. This amounted to one scheme to defraud a bank under 18 U.S.C. §1344, not several schemes associated with each set of documents.

United States v. Seda, 978 F.2d 779 (2d Cir. 1992)

An indictment charging the defendant in two separate counts with bank fraud (18 U.S.C. §1344) and making a false statement to a bank in connection with a loan application (18 U.S.C. §1014) was multiplicitious. §1344 is a multi-faceted statute that is sufficiently broad to cover various types of misrepresentations and frauds. Here, the §1014 offense was simply a “species” of bank fraud. It is doubtful that this case survived the decision in United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688 (1993), which held that the “modified Blockburger test” is not valid.

United States v. Coiro, 922 F.2d 1008 (2d Cir. 1991)

The defendant coached several witnesses, during one meeting, to falsify testimony. This only constitutes one offense of obstruction of justice.

United States v. Dunford, 148 F.3d 385 (4th Cir. 1998)

The defendant’s simultaneous possession of six guns and ammunition supported only one conviction under 18 U.S.C. §922(g) which prohibits possession of a firearm or ammunition by a person who is either a convicted felon or an illegal drug user.

United States v. Kimbrough, 69 F.3d 723 (5th Cir. 1995)

The rule against multiplicity stems from the 5th Amendment to the Constitution which forbids placing a defendant twice in jeopardy for one offense. Here, the defendant was charged with possession of various items of pornography. In one count he was charged with possessing several items which had been shipped in interstate commerce. In the other count, he was charged with possessing several items which were produced with materials which had been transported in interstate commerce. These counts were multiplicitious. Each count charged that the defendant possessed “three or more” such items (and this is what the statute outlawed). Though one count charged that the items traveled in interstate commerce, and the other count charged that the items were produced with materials which had traveled in interstate commerce, this distinction was artificial. Because Congress outlawed possessing three or more items, the possession of many such items could not be broken down into several counts each of which included at least three items.
United States v. Heath, 970 F.2d 1397 (5th Cir. 1992)

Even if the defendant endeavors to secure two different loans, if there is only one victim bank, there is only one scheme to defraud and there can only be one count charging this offense.

United States v. Lemons, 941 F.2d 309 (5th Cir. 1991)

One scheme to defraud a bank which involves several separate acts only constitutes one offense of bank fraud under 18 U.S.C. §1344. The statute only imposes punishment for each execution of the scheme, not each act in furtherance of the scheme.

United States v. Evans, 854 F.2d 56 (5th Cir. 1988)

The defendant furnished false identification in order to obtain both a firearm and ammunition. Though the false identification was used for two purposes, this constitutes only one offense.

United States v. Forester, 836 F.2d 856 (5th Cir. 1988)

A defendant may not be prosecuted for both attempting to manufacture methamphetamine and possessing a precursor, P₂P. Possession of P₂P is an interim and indispensable step in the process of manufacturing methamphetamine.

United States v. Powell, 894 F.2d 895 (7th Cir. 1990)

The indictment charged the defendant with being a member of a conspiracy to distribute cocaine, and in a separate count, charged him with a conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine. This is a multiplicitous indictment because what was in fact one conspiracy was charged in two separate counts.

United States v. Podell, 869 F.2d 328 (7th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was charged with tampering with or altering VINs. The charges related to two stolen automobiles. The indictment was multiplicitous. The statute does not create distinct offenses, one for removing and tampering a VIN and a separate offense for altering the same VIN.

United States v. Graham, 60 F.3d 463 (8th Cir. 1995)

Repeating the same false statement several times during a bankruptcy proceeding only gives rise to one false statement conviction pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §152.

United States v. Dixon, 921 F.2d 194 (8th Cir. 1991)

Defendant’s possession of numerous packets of cocaine under the bed of his hotel room and in his pocket was only one offense. The packet in his pocket was a “specimen” of the larger quantity of drugs found in the room.

United States v. Molinaro, 11 F.3d 853 (9th Cir. 1993)

Each act in furtherance of a scheme to defraud cannot be prosecuted separately; rather, the proper unit of prosecution is each execution of the scheme. Thus, the preparation of several false documents in a scheme to defraud does not constitute different offenses under the bank fraud statute.

United States v. Ravel, 930 F.2d 721 (9th Cir. 1991)

Defendant’s simultaneous possession of several stolen items was only one offense, even though he attempted to sell the goods at different times. His possession of the items could not be fragmented into separate units of prosecution coinciding with his selling the items.
United States v. Sanchez-Vargas, 878 F.2d 1163 (9th Cir. 1989)
The defendant was charged in two counts with bringing an undocumented alien into the country and transporting the alien within the country. The convictions arose from the same act. This constitutes a multiplicitous indictment and only one conviction may be authorized for the illegal conduct.

United States v. Olsowy, 836 F.2d 439 (9th Cir. 1987)
The defendant repeated a false statement to the identical question posed by a Secret Service agent on a number of occasions. He may not be prosecuted more than once for making this same false statement repeatedly.

United States v. Jewell, 827 F.2d 586 (9th Cir. 1987)
The defendant was charged with thirteen counts of having a personal interest in a government contract. The Ninth Circuit holds that he can only be indicted once for having a conflict of interest in connection with multiple signings of authorizations of payment.

United States v. Arbelaez, 812 F.2d 530 (9th Cir. 1987)
Based on a single act, a defendant may not be convicted of aiding and abetting in the distribution of cocaine and aiding and abetting the possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

United States v. Hurt, 795 F.2d 765 (9th Cir. 1986)
The defendant’s use of the mails to place an order for three pornographic films was only one offense of using the mails for delivery of obscene materials, not three separate offenses. It is irrelevant that the films were delivered to the defendant in separate packages.

Mansfield v. Champion, 992 F.2d 1098 (10th Cir. 1993)
The defendant robbed a liquor store, taking cash from the cash register, liquor from the shelf and money from the clerk. He was prosecuted for two counts of robbery, one count dealing with the clerk’s money and the other count relating to the store’s property. This violated the double jeopardy clause. The defendant was being punished twice for the same act of robbery.

United States v. Dashney, 937 F.2d 532 (10th Cir. 1991)
The defendant split up one cash “hoard” in order to structure deposits in such a way that the bank would not file a CTR report. The government improperly charged the defendant with separate structuring offenses for each deposit. Only one offense is committed by the act of structuring transactions.

United States v. Jones, 841 F.2d 1022 (10th Cir. 1988)
A defendant may not be convicted separately for the unlawful receipt of firearms by a convicted felon as well as unlawful possession of firearms by a convicted felon.

United States v. Langford, 946 F.2d 798 (11th Cir. 1991)
In connection with the fraudulent sale of stock, the defendant made numerous mailings. Each such mailing should not have been listed as separate counts of securities fraud. A separate count should only be set forth for each separate sale or purchase of securities.

United States v. Bonavia, 927 F.2d 565 (11th Cir. 1991)
The simultaneous undifferentiated possession of multiple firearms constitutes only one offense under 18 U.S.C. App. §1202(a). Only one offense is charged under the terms of §1202(a) regardless of the number of firearms involved absent a showing that the firearms were stored or acquired at different times or places. However, if the government presents evidence at trial that the defendant, at some point in the period covered by the indictment, separated one of the weapons charged in the indictment and possessed that weapon separately – that is, at a different location – the government may treat that weapon as a separate unit of prosecution, even though that gun was seized at the same time and in the same location as other weapons charged in the indictment and had been received by defendant at the same time as the other weapons.

United States v. Winchester, 916 F.2d 601 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was a fugitive from justice and a convicted felon. He was arrested in possession of a firearm. He could not be sentenced for two offenses – possession of a weapon by a fugitive and possession of a weapon by a convicted felon – on the basis of the possession of the one gun.

United States v. Eaves, 877 F.2d 943 (11th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was charged with violating the Hobbs Act by accepting payments for certain votes as a county commissioner. He was convicted on three counts, two of which related to two separate payments which were part of one bribe. The Eleventh Circuit holds that this constitutes but one offense and cannot be the subject of separate convictions and sentences.

United States v. Anderson, 872 F.2d 1508 (11th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was charged with multiple conspiracy counts alleging that he conspired to possess an unregistered firearm, conspired to transfer an unregistered firearm, and conspired to sell, convert or dispose of property of the United States. The indictment was multiplicitous in this regard. Actually, there was only one conspiracy with several objects. Since there was only one agreement, there could be only one conviction.

The government established that on four occasions, the defendant possessed a gun in connection with his drug conspiracy activities. Each of the alleged §924(c) violations was tied to the same drug conspiracy. This could only give rise to one §924(c) conviction.

United States v. Johnson, 909 F.2d 1517 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

The defendant was prosecuted for his possession of liquid PCP as well as PCP mixed with marijuana and packaged in small foil packets for sale. This constitutes only one act of possession of PCP.
INDICTMENTS
(Variances and Amendments)

United States v. Davis, 854 F.3d 601 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with sexual exploitation of a minor. The indictment alleged that he recruited the child to participate in a sex video, “knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that the person had not attained the age of 18.” The jury instruction, however, the trial court instructed the jury that the knowledge requirement of the offense could be satisfied with proof that “the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to observe “the person].” This amounted to a constructive amendment of the indictment, because it provided the jury a path to conviction that was not alleged in the indictment. See also United States v. Dipentino, 242 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2001).

United States v. Mize, 814 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2016)

The proof at trial suffered from a prejudicial variance from the indictment. There were two separate conspiracies proven at trial, not one overarching conspiracy. Most of the evidence presented at trial focused on the other conspiracy, which was not the indicted conspiracy. The defendants were prejudiced by this variance and a new trial was necessary.

United States v. Centeno, 793 F.3d 378 (3rd Cir. 2015)

A constructive amendment of an indictment may occur as a result of a prosecutor’s closing argument. In this case, the defendant was charged with aiding and abetting an assault (in a federal park). In closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the defendant could be found guilty of aiding an abetting the assault if he drove the person who actually committed the assault away from the scene. But this would not be aiding and abetting an assault, because the crime was already completed; instead, this would be accessory after the fact. This argument had the effect of amending the indictment and required setting aside the verdict.

United States v. Ward, 747 F.3d 1184 (9th Cir. 2014)

The indictment alleged that the defendant used the credit card information of a specific information to commit fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1028A(a)(1). The court declined to instruct the jury that a specific person’s identity was stolen. The Ninth Circuit explained the difference between a variance and an amendment and concluded that in this case the indictment was constructively amended by allowing the jury to convict the defendant of an offense for which the grand jury did not specifically return an indictment (i.e., any person’s identity). Because the offense requires proof that the identity of an actual person was stolen, the court was obligated to instruct the jury that it was that person’s identity that was stolen in order to convict on that count.

United States v. Madden, 733 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 2013)

The indictment charged the defendant with a § 924(c) offense by knowingly using and carrying a firearm during an in relation to a crime of violence and knowingly possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. The judge instructed the jury that the defendant could be found guilty if he knowingly carried a in relation to a drug trafficking offense (which was not what was charged) or if he possessed a gun in furtherance of a drug trafficking offense (which was also incorrect, because he was charged with possessing a gun “in furtherance” of a drug offense, not “in relation to” a drug offense). This was an improper constructive amendment of the indictment that amounted to plain error.

United States v. Lander, 668 F.3d 1289 (11th Cir. 2012)

A prejudicial variance occurred in this mail fraud prosecution of the defendant, a county attorney. The indictment alleged that he defrauded the citizens of the county by accepting (in essence) a bribe from certain developers and that the developers were falsely told that they had to pay him money as part of a “performance bond.” At trial, however, the government proceeded on the theory that the defendant defrauded the developers by telling them that their “payments” to him were for certain development costs that he would escrow or to “ensure” that the project obtained approval from the county officials. No developer testified that the defendant said the money was needed to pay for a performance bond. The Eleventh Circuit held that this amounted to a material and prejudicial variance.

United States v. Dellosantos, 649 F.3d 109 (1st Cir. 2011)

The First Circuit concluded that the variance between the charged overarching conspiracy to distribute cocaine and marijuana, and the proof at trial, which showed separate conspiracies that involved a different combination of drugs, was prejudicial and required reversal of the conspiracy conviction. The separate conspiracies were not interdependent and involved different people.

United States v. Farr, 536 F.3d 1174 (10th Cir. 2008)

The indictment alleged that the defendant failed to pay quarterly employment taxes. At trial, however, the government argued (and the trial court instructed the jury) that she could be convicted based on her failure to pay a trust fund recovery penalty that was assessed against her personally. This was an improper constructive amendment of the indictment that tainted the conviction; this is an error not subject to harmless error analysis.

United States v. McKee, 506 F.3d 225 (3rd Cir. 2007)

The indictment alleged that the defendants committed tax evasion by filing false quarterly tax returns (Form 941). The judge instructed the jury that tax evasion may be committed in several ways, including filing false quarterly returns and by falsifying books to hide income. There was evidence at trial that the defendants did falsify their books, but this was not the conduct that was the subject of the indictment. The jury instruction amounted to a constructive amendment of the indictment that necessitated reversing the conviction.

United States v. Hoover, 467 F.3d 496 (5th Cir. 2006)

The trial court’s jury charge improperly expanded the indictment by offering a theory by which the jury could find that the statement made by the defendant was false, in a manner different than the manner set forth in the indictment. The indictment alleged that he made a false statement about how many people complained to him about a financing arrangement of his car dealership. Specifically, the indictment said that “he knew the statement was false because more than one person told him about the ‘double floorplanning.’” The jury was instructed, however, that he could be found guilty if he knew the statement he made to the police was false, but did not limit the basis upon which he knew it was false. The Sixth Circuit held that, pursuant to Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212 (1960), if the government chooses to specifically charge the manner in which the defendant’s statement is false, the government should be required to prove that it is untruthful for that reason.

United States v. Pacheco 434 F.3d 106 (1st Cir. 2006)

The trial court announced at the end of trial that he did not believe that the defendant was part of the large indicted conspiracy, but only a part of one spoke. Later, however, the court allowed the jury to consider the evidence of the defendant’s guilt of the charged conspiracy. The defendant’s right to a fair trial was violated, in part because this altered his closing argument strategy.

United States v. Stigler, 413 F.3d 588 (7th Cir. 2005)

The government alleged that the defendant was part of a larger conspiracy that involved the negotiation of several counterfeit checks. The evidence at trial, however, only demonstrated his knowledge of one check and that he had no role in, or knowledge of, the other checks being handled by other people. This amounted to an improper variance.

United States v. Ross, 412 F.3d 771 (7th Cir. 2005)

The indictment charged the defendant with possessing a firearm on September 8, 2002. The judge instructed the jury, however, that the crime could be shown to have been committed anytime between May, 1998 and the date the indictment was returned (thus ensuring that the offense occurred within the statute of limitations). This was an improper variance.

United States v. Chambers, 408 F.3d 237 (5th Cir. 2005)

The indictment alleged that the defendant possessed “rounds” (i.e., bullets) that had traveled in interstate commerce. The rounds were actually manufactured in the same state where they were found in possession of the defendant. The government argued that components of the rounds had traveled in interstate commerce prior to the manufacture of the completed rounds. This amounted to an amendment of the indictment. The evidence was insufficient to support a conviction on these counts of the indictment and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Milstein, 401 F.3d 53 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant was charged with violating 21 U.S.C. § 352 (misbranding drugs). The indictment alleged that the offense was committed by repackaging the drugs. At trial, however, the proof involved selling drugs that were contaminated. This is a different offense under § 352. Changing the theory of the prosecution violated the Fifth Amendment. The defendant was not on notice that he would have to defend the contamination allegation.

United States v. Hugs, 384 F.3d 762 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with involuntary manslaughter by committing an unlawful act not amounting to a felony. The jury was charged on two other methods of committing the offense, however. This was improper, but harmless, given another instruction that specifically told the jury that the defendant was only charged with the crime set forth in the indictment.

United States v. Bradley, 381 F.3d 641 (7th Cir. 2004)
The defendant entered a guilty plea to carrying a firearm in connection with a drug offense. The factual basis offered by the government recited that the defendant carried the gun in a car that was transporting marijuana. The indictment, however, alleged that he carried the gun in connection with a cocaine offense. The defendant then moved to withdraw the plea on the basis of this variance. The trial court erred in denying the defendant the right to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Narog, 372 F.3d 1243 (11th Cir. 2004)

The indictment charged the defendant with “possession and distribution of pseudoephedrine, knowing and having reasonable cause to believe that the listed chemical would be used to manufacture a controlled substance, that is, methamphetamine.” During deliberations, the jury asked if the defendant had to have knowledge or believe the drug would be used to make specifically methamphetamine. The court responded that the government was only required to prove that the defendant possessed the precursor with the knowledge that it would be used to manufacture any controlled substance. This amounted to an amendment of the indictment which required reversal per se. See United States v. Weissman, 899 F.2d 1111 (11th Cir. 1990).

United States v. Combs, 369 F.3d 925 (6th Cir. 2004)

In the 1998 amendment to § 924(c), Congress intended to create two separate violations: (1) using or carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime; and (2) possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime. “Use” requires active employment of the firearm by the person committing the drug offense. “In furtherance” requires proof that the firearm was possessed to advance or promote the commission of the underlying drug trafficking crime. An example of “use” without “in furtherance” would be if a buyer of drugs stole a gun from his dealer’s house during a drug deal. Thus, the two crimes are, in fact, conceptually different. The indictment in this case mismatched the elements of these two offenses. The indictment charged the defendant with “possessing a weapon during and in relation to a drug offense.” The indictment was fatally defective because it failed to allege the elements of an offense. In addition, with regard to a separate count, though the indictment properly alleged the elements of the possession offense, the jury instructions improperly “amended” the indictment by setting forth elements from the “use” prong of the statute (during and in relation to a drug offense) rather than the “possession” prong (in furtherance). The conviction on this count, therefore, had to be reversed.

United States v. Iacaboni, 363 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004)

Payments of gambling winnings to the bettors constituted a money laundering financial transaction and the amount of these payments could be forfeited. However, the court erred in forfeiting additional money that may have been a financial transaction that concealed the money, because the money laundering charge only alleged “promotion prong” money laundering and therefore, a financial transaction that concealed the nature, source, or ownership of the money could not be forfeited. This would improperly amend the indictment.

United States v. Collins, 350 F.3d 773 (8th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was charged under 18 U.S.C. § 922(d)(3) with disposing a firearm to a person that was known to be an unlawful user of controlled substances. The trial court instructed the jury that the offense could be proven if the defendant knew or had reasonable cause to believe there was a risk that the recipient would unlawfully use a controlled substance while in possession of the firearms. This amounted to an improper amendment of the indictment. The government is required to prove that the defendant knew or had reasonable cause to believe that the recipient was an unlawful user of a controlled substance.

United States v. Santa-Manzano, 842 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1988)

The indictment charged the defendant with issuing fake certificates of deposit in return for money. The evidence at trial indicated that the defendants gave the victim a $2,000,000 letter of credit in return for $18,000,000 worth of Venezuelan Bolivars. This constitutes a fatal variance and requires reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Glenn, 828 F.2d 855 (1st Cir. 1987)

The indictment alleged a broad drug importation conspiracy involving the importation of marijuana from Thailand and hashish from Pakistan. The evidence only connected the defendant to the conspiracy involving Pakistan hashish. The court holds that this is a fatal variance.

United States v. Wozniak, 126 F.3d 105 (2d Cir. 1997)

The indictment alleged that the defendant conspired to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. The jury was charged that the defendant could be convicted of conspiring to distribute marijuana. This amounted to an improper constructive amendment of the indictment.

United States v. Zingaro, 858 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1988)

This RICO indictment was drawn specifically to cover only loans made in connection with a social club’s gambling activities. Proof at trial involved a loan that did not involve gambling activity. This constitutes an improper constructive amendment of the indictment.

United States v. Mollica, 849 F.2d 723 (2d Cir. 1988)

An indictment which charged the defendant with fraud with respect to income taxes was constructively amended to allege a general conspiracy to defraud the government. The proof at trial demonstrated a money-laundering scheme which had no connection whatsoever to the payment of any income taxes. Reversible error.

United States v. Floresca, 38 F.3d 706 (4th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §1512(b)(1), witness tampering. In instructing the jury, however, the trial court included within its definition of §1512(b)(1), the offense described in §1512(b)(3), which describes an entirely separate offense of hindering or preventing another from reporting a federal offense. This represented an improper amendment to the indictment, permitting a conviction for an offense other than the indicted offense. A constructive amendment amounts to an error per se. See Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212 (1960).

United States v. Doucet, 994 F.2d 169 (5th Cir. 1993)

Defendant was charged with possession of an unlawful assembled machine gun. He prepared an entrapment defense, claiming that he modified the weapon because the informant asked him to do so. By the end of trial, the government had changed its theory and argued that the defendant illegally possessed the unassembled parts of a machine gun. This was an improper constructive amendment of the indictment. An indictment may be amended constructively by the actions of either the court or the prosecutor. In either event, the amendment violates the Fifth Amendment guarantee that a prosecution can only proceed on the basis of a grand jury indictment. “An indictment is not putty in the government’s hands.”

United States v. Harrill, 877 F.2d 341 (5th Cir. 1989)

The trial judge improperly broadened the indictment by permitting the jury to convict the defendants of filing false bank documents in connection with a “change or extension” of a loan rather than in connection with a request for a loan or advances as charged in the indictment.

United States v. Chandler, 858 F.2d 254 (5th Cir. 1988)

The indictment charged the defendant with embezzling $20,000 in her capacity as a bank teller. At trial, the jury was permitted to convict the teller if they found that over a long period of time she took small sums of more than $500. The large sum related to an embezzlement charge whereas the smaller sums related to making false entries. The jury acquitted her of embezzlement but convicted her of making false entries. This represented an impermissible constructive amendment of the indictment.

United States v. Trice, 823 F.2d 80 (5th Cir. 1987)

The indictment charged the defendant with making a false statement to a federal savings and loan in order to influence the bank’s action in making an advance on a loan to the defendant’s business. The court instructed the jury, however, that a conviction can be based on any false statement which was made with the intent to influence any change or extension of a loan. This constituted an improper expansion of the indictment and voids the conviction.

United States v. Haga, 821 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1987)

The indictment charged the defendant with a conspiracy to commit various offenses against the United States. The evidence however, demonstrated that the conspiracy was solely to defraud an agency of the United States. Both offenses arise under 18 U.S.C. §371, but the failure of the indictment to specify that the charge involved defrauding an agency constituted an improper variance.

United States v. Willoughby, 27 F.3d 263 (7th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with possessing a gun in connection with the offense of distributing cocaine, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §924(c). The evidence revealed that the defendant distributed cocaine several times at certain locations, but that the gun was possessed in a warehouse where the cocaine was being stored for future distribution. The gun, therefore, was possessed in connection with the offense of possession with intent to distribute cocaine, but not in connection with the actual distribution of cocaine. This is a fatal variance and required acquittal of the charged conduct.

United States v. Leichtnam, 948 F.2d 370 (7th Cir. 1991)

In a lengthy discourse on the law of material variances, the court holds that the “amendment” of the indictment in this case was prejudicial. The defendant was charged with possessing a particular weapon. At trial, the jury was allowed to convict if they found that any of a number of weapons were possessed in connection with the drug offense. This improperly enlarged the indictment. Here, the indictment did not offer several means of committing the offense, with the jury being offered one of these different means. Rather, the jury was offered a means of committing the offense (i.e., a particular weapon was possessed) other than the means set forth in the indictment. In short, any broadening of the possible bases for conviction from that which appeared in the indictment, is fatal. It is reversible per se.

United States v. Tsinhnahijinnie, 112 F.3d 988 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with molesting a young girl. The indictment alleged that the acts occurred between June and July of 1992. The trial, which was in 1995, was based on an accusation made by the child in 1994. The child never testified, however, that the molestation occurred in 1992. While the date of the offense is not an element of the charge, where the indictment alleges that a crime occurred on a particular date, a slight variance may be tolerable, but a complete failure of proof that the offense occurred anytime near the indicted time, amounts to a fatal variance. Moreover, in this case, the defense was prejudiced, because it established at trial that he was not on the reservation between June and July of 1992.

United States v. Solís, 841 F.2d 307 (9th Cir. 1988)

It was improper for the jury to have been instructed as to the elements of possession with intent to distribute when the defendants were charged only with conspiracy and distribution of heroin. This constitutes plain error and requires reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Pina, 974 F.2d 1241 (10th Cir. 1992)

The trial court dismissed one count of the false tax return indictment on the basis that the wrong year was set out in the indictment. The government’s request to amend the indictment was properly rejected: this was a material change, not a mere change of form, which the government was requesting. Even though the error was characterized as a typographical error, amending the indictment was not permitted.

United States v. Hill, 835 F.2d 759 (10th Cir. 1987)

An indictment which charges the defendant with stealing government property does not permit a conviction based on evidence indicating that the property was taken by embezzlement or conversion.

United States v. Cancelliere, 69 F.3d 1116 (11th Cir. 1995)

The indictment charged the defendant with knowingly and willfully committing the offense of money laundering. Under §1956, “willfulness” is not an element of the offense. Nevertheless, because this is what the indictment charged, the indictment could not be redacted or amended to delete this term. This was not simply the elimination of an unnecessary averment. The defendant’s defense was based on his good faith (i.e., the lack of willfulness) and the jury had already been read the indictment, which included the willfulness element.

United States v. Artrip, 942 F.2d 1568 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with defrauding a bank by submitting a financial statement of his wife with overstated assets. At trial, proof was introduced of additional unreported liabilities which was not listed in the indictment as part of the fraud. The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury that the only basis for the charge was overstated assets was reversible error. There was a substantial possibility that the jury convicted the defendant of understating liabilities, but that was not the charge as set forth in the indictment.

United States v. Keller, 916 F.2d 628 (11th Cir. 1990)

The trial court instructed the jury that in order to convict the defendant of the conspiracy count, the jury must find that the defendant conspired with “anyone” and not just the party named in the indictment. The indictment named only one other individual, and did not indicate the existence of any unindicted co-conspirators. The Eleventh Circuit concludes that this constitutes an amendment, not a mere variance of the indictment. “The proper distinction between an amendment and a variance is that an amendment occurs when the essential elements of the offense contained in the indictment are altered to broaden the possible basis for conviction beyond what is contained in the indictment. A variance occurs when the facts proved at trial deviate from the facts contained in the indictment but the essential elements of the offense are the same.” The court concludes that the trial court’s instructions in this case had the effect of adding the phrase “with other named and unnamed conspirators.” The conviction on this count had to be reversed.

United States v. Weissman, 899 F.2d 1111 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendants were charged with being members of a RICO conspiracy. The indictment alleged in various sections that the defendants were members of a particular family of La Cosa Nostra. In response to a question from the jury, however, the trial judge told the jury that it was not necessary for the government to prove that the RICO enterprise was that particular family, if, in fact, the government proved that there was an enterprise that met the definition of the term. This constituted a material variance from the indictment. The court concluded that it is a fundamental right in our system of criminal justice that a defendant has a substantial right to be tried solely on the charges presented in an indictment returned by a grand jury. This right was violated in this case.

United States v. Peel, 837 F.2d 975 (11th Cir. 1988)

The jury was instructed that the defendant could be convicted for being on board a vessel of the United States or being a citizen of the United States on board a vessel in connection with a drug conspiracy. The indictment only charged the defendant with being on board a vessel of the United States; it did not charge him with being a citizen of the United States on board any vessel. Because the jury may have convicted him of the latter offense, this constitutes a constructive amendment and violates the defendant’s Fifth Amendment right to be tried on charges presented to a grand jury and requires a reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Lawton, 995 F.2d 290 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

Defendant was charged with taking a union local’s money. The jury instructions, however, permitted the jury to convict the defendant if he took the money of the local, the district council, or the international union. This was an improper constructive amendment of the indictment. Moreover, the defendant was not an officer of the district council or the international, which was an essential element of the offense. This was plain error, requiring reversal of the conviction, even in the absence of an objection at trial.
INDICTMENTS
(Sealing)

United States v. Thompson, 287 F.3d 1244 (10th Cir. 2002)

Rule 6(e)(4) governs the sealing of indictments. The government violated the rule in this case. The defendant established that the violation was not harmless, because between the date that the indictment was returned and the date it was unsealed, the defendant destroyed records that were material to his defense. The Tenth Circuit agreed that this was a sufficient showing of harm to support dismissing the indictment.

INDICTMENTS
(Apprendi)

United States v. Gonzalez, 686 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2012)

The indictment did not state the quantity of drugs involved in the conspiracy, but merely recited the statutory penalty that would be applicable if there were an allegation that 500 or more grams of cocaine were involved. Failure to allege an amount of drugs involved was a violation of the defendant’s right to be charged by the grand jury with the offense. “Stating that an act is in violation of a cited statutory section adds no factual information as to the act itself. It declares the legal basis for claiming that the act is deserving of punishment, but does nothing to describe the act.”

United States v. Rodriguez-Gonzales, 358 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2004)

When proof of a prior conviction converts the charged offense from a misdemeanor into a felony, Apprendi applies and the prior offense must be identified in the indictment. The “prior conviction” exception embodied in Almendarez-Torres does not apply in this limited situation. That exception applies when the prior conviction alters the penalty; in this case, the prior conviction altered the nature of the crime.
INFORMANTS -- DISCOVERY INSANITY

It is not necessary to inform the jury about the consequences of their verdict, if the verdict is not guilty by reason of insanity. The rule might be otherwise if some type of misstatement of the consequences of a not guilty by reason of insanity verdict is made in the presence of the jury – for example, by a witness, or the prosecutor.

Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71 (1992)

A statute which permits an insanity acquittee to be committed to an institution, though he no longer suffers from any mental illness, until he can prove that he is not dangerous to himself or others violates the Fourteenth Amendment. Once the defendant has recovered his sanity, he cannot be committed to a psychiatric facility. Prior precedent, including Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354 (1983), permitted the continued commitment of the defendant, but only as long as he remained mentally ill.

United States v. Christian, 749 F.3d 806 (9th Cir. 2014)

Prior to a related state court trial, the defendant was examined by a doctor who was asked to assess the defendant’s competence to stand trial and the doctor concluded that the defendant was not competent. In the defendant’s federal criminal trial, he sought to call the same doctor to testify about the defendant’s defense of diminished capacity. The doctor testified that his competence examination was sufficient to support his conclusion about the defendant’s diminished capacity, but the trial judge held that the two standards are different and therefore, having only evaluated the defendant for purposes of determining his competence, the expert could not offer any opinion about diminished capacity. The Ninth Circuit reversed. The doctor should have been permitted to testify and explain why his examination was sufficient to enable him to formulate an opinion on the subject of the defendant’s diminished capacity.

United States v. Goodman, 633 F.3d 963 (10th Cir. 2011)

The defendant relied on the insanity defense in this armed robbery case. The trial court barred the defense from introducing evidence of his combat experiences and his mental health around the time of his army experience. He had received extensive treatment for mental illness after returning from Iraq and clearly suffered from mental illness as a result of his combat experience. Limiting the “lay” witness testimony to his behavior at the time immediately surrounding the time of the robberies was reversible error. The defendant’s mental health a few years prior to the armed robberies was not irrelevant to his insanity defense. In addition, the trial court erred in barring the defense to offer lay “opinion” testimony about the defendant’s mental condition. Rule 704(a) specifically allows testimony in the form of an opinion that embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact. Rule 704(b), however, provides an exception for experts, who are not permitted to offer opinions as to the state of mind of a criminal defendant if that mental state is an element of the crime of which the defendant is accused.

Wilson v. Gaetz, 608 F.3d 347 (7th Cir. 2010)

Trial counsel ineffectively developed the insanity defense evidence that was available in defense of the defendant who was charged with murder. The defendant was apparently operating under a delusional compulsion that required him to commit the crime. His delusion led him to believe that what he was doing was morally proper, even if it might have been a crime.

United States v. Long, 562 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2009)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the insanity defense. Expert testimony established that he suffered from schizotypal personality disorder that at times resulted in the defendant losing contact with reality.

Perez v. Cain, 529 F.3d 588 (5th Cir. 2008)

The evidence at the state trial demonstrated that the defendant was insane and the state courts unreasonably applied Constitutional standards regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to support a conviction.

United States v. Allen, 449 F.3d 1121 (10th Cir. 2006)

Insanity is a viable defense to a charge of being a felon in possession of a firearm, even though the offense is a general intent crime.

United States v. Southwell, 432 F.3d 1050 (10th Cir. 2005)

When the defendant raises the defense of insanity, in order for the jury to return a guilty verdict, not only must the jury unanimously find the defendant guilty; the jury must also unanimously reject the insanity defense. This applies to all affirmative defenses.

United States v. Rinaldi, 351 F.3d 285 (7th Cir. 2003)

Between the time the defendant entered his plea and the scheduled sentencing date, the defendant moved to withdraw his plea, claiming that he suffered from A.D.D. The trial court ordered that the defendant be committed for a 45-day evaluation. The Seventh Circuit held that the provisions of Fed.R.Crim.P. Rule 12.2 do not apply, because the defendant was relying on a defense of insanity: his claim related only to his intent to present a diminished capacity defense (lack of capacity to form specific intent).

The defendant was found not guilty only by reason of insanity. Before he was committed, another evaluation was performed and the district court determined that he was not in need of commitment, but imposed conditions on his release. This is not permitted by 18 U.S.C. § 4242. Conditions for release may only be imposed after someone has already been committed, not in lieu of commitment. Remand was appropriate to allow the district court to decide whether release was appropriate, given the fact that conditions could not be imposed.

Huminak v. Beyer, 871 F.2d 432 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The defendant based his defense in this murder prosecution on diminished capacity. It violated due process for the trial court to instruct the jury that the burden of proving diminished capacity is on the defendant. Because the diminished capacity defense seeks to negate the existence of the requisite intent to commit the crime, the burden cannot be placed on the defendant to establish this defense. Rather, the State must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had the requisite intent.
In re Newchurch, 807 F.2d 404 (5th Cir. 1986)

It is improper to commit a defendant to a penal institution for mental examination without a finding that such commitment is necessary to enable the government to prepare for trial. In this case, the defendant notified the government that he planned to plead that he was insane at the time of the charged offense but was presently mentally competent.

United States v. Freeman, 804 F.2d 1574 (5th Cir. 1986)

The Fifth Circuit approves the various provisions of 18 U.S.C. §20 which places the burden on establishing insanity on the defendant, precludes expert testimony on the ultimate issue of insanity, and permits a conviction despite a defendant’s inability to conform his actions to the requirements of the law.

Sulie v. Duckworth, 864 F.2d 1348 (7th Cir. 1988)

The defendant’s post-Miranda silence should not have been used against him to establish his sanity in a state criminal case. Though it was error, it was harmless in light of the overwhelming evidence of the defendant’s sanity and guilt.

United States v. Bartlett, 856 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988)

The Insanity Defense Reform Act provides that it is an affirmative defense that an accused was incapable of appreciating the nature and quality or wrongfulness of his acts as a result of a severe mental disease or defect and that “mental disease or defect does not otherwise constitute a defense.” This provision does not apply to a defense based on the inability to form the specific intent to commit the crime. Psychiatric evidence of a defendant’s inability to form the specific intent is admissible and not barred by 18 U.S.C. §17(a), or Fed.R.Evid. 704(b) which prohibit a psychiatric expert testifying about the mental condition of a defendant with regard to the “ultimate issue” of the accused’s capacity to form the requisite intent.

United States v. Samuels, 801 F.2d 1052 (8th Cir. 1986)

The evidence in this case was insufficient to establish that the defendant was sane at the time that he wrote a letter to the President threatening to kill him. The defendant introduced evidence that at the time he mailed the letter, he was in a mental health clinic experiencing acute exacerbation of chronic, psychotic process. The government’s evidence was based on evidence not relating to the defendant’s condition at the time of the offense.

United States v. Twine, 853 F.2d 676 (9th Cir. 1988)

The Insanity Defense Reform Act did not eliminate the defense based on diminished capacity. The court concludes that Congress was concerned with a defendant’s ability to excuse guilt, as opposed to disproving guilt. The insanity defense excused guilt while the inability to form the specific intent constitutes a denial of guilt.

United States v. Denny-Shaffer, 2 F.3d 999 (10th Cir. 1993)

An insanity instruction should be given when a defendant offers proof of multiple personality disorder. The inquiry focuses on the host personality, not just the acting personality. If the host personality was not aware of the offense when it was being committed, an insanity instruction would be appropriate. The trial court focused exclusively on the acting personality – the personality in control at the time of the offense.

United States v. Westcott, 83 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1996)

The Insanity Defense Reform Act, 18 U.S.C. §17 does not bar the defense from introducing evidence of a defendant’s mental disease or defect in contexts other than reliance on the insanity defense. If the defendant claims that he lacked the mens rea element of the offense (as opposed to lacking the capacity to form the mens rea element), he may offer expert psychiatric evidence.

United States v. Cameron, 907 F.2d 1051 (11th Cir. 1990)

The Court of Appeals holds that the District Court abused its discretion in prohibiting the defendant from raising an insanity defense on the grounds of the defendant’s failure to comply with Rule 12.2(a). That Rule requires a defendant to give notice of an intent to raise an insanity defense. The defendant filed a notice entitled “Notice of Intent to Rely Upon Expert Testimony of Defendant’s Mental Condition.” In response, the government filed various motions relating to the insanity defense including a request that the defendant be examined at the federal prisoner’s medical center. The defendant also filed a Motion in Limine requesting a ruling on whether she would be permitted to introduce evidence not only of insanity, but also her diminished capacity. The government sought to bar evidence of the insanity defense because of the defendant’s failure to comply with the requirements of Rule 12.2(a). The trial court granted the motion. The Eleventh Circuit reverses: This amounted to an abuse of the trial court’s discretion; the government was clearly aware of the intention of the defendant to raise the defense and the government was not prejudiced. The court also reviewed the admissibility of evidence relating to the diminished capacity defense. The court concludes that Congress meant to eliminate any form of legal excuse based upon one’s lack of volitional control. This includes a diminished ability or failure to reflect adequately upon the consequences or nature of one’s actions. Thus, “diminished capacity” is not a defense. However, there is a distinction between evidence of psychological impairment that supports an “affirmative defense” and psychological evidence that negates an element of the offense charged. Psychological evidence that aids the trier in determining the defendant’s specific state of mind with regard to the actions she took at the time the charged offense was committed is not an affirmative defense but is evidence that goes specifically to whether the prosecution has carried its burden of proving each essential element of the crime, at least when specific intent is at issue. Psychiatric evidence is admissible to negate specific intent to commit the crime. This is not to say that evidence which demonstrates an incapacity to reflect or control the behavior that produces the criminal conduct is admissible. Rather, such evidence must focus on the defendant’s specific state of mind at the time of the charged offense. The trial court did not err in excluding the evidence in this case because the defendant failed to establish that the evidence would be admissible under these standards.

United States v. Owens, 854 F.2d 432 (11th Cir. 1988)

Insanity as an affirmative defense applies to charges of possession of a firearm in violation of federal law.

Bailey v. Spears, 847 F.2d 695 (11th Cir. 1988)

A habeas petitioner alleged sufficient facts to raise questions about his sanity at the time of the offense, and his competence to stand trial, requiring a remand for the taking of additional evidence.

United States v. Marble, 940 F.2d 1543 (D.C. Cir. 1991)

The defendant was found competent to stand trial, but had a viable insanity defense. However, he refused to enter a not guilty by reason of insanity plea. Reversing prior precedent, the D.C. Circuit concludes that if a defendant is competent to stand trial, he has the right to waive the insanity defense and the trial court is not obligated to instruct the jury on that defense.
INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE SUMMONS

United States v. Norwood, 420 F.3d 888 (8th Cir. 2005)

The Eighth Circuit considers, and rejects, various challenges to an IRS summons. Though the IRS was engaged in a criminal investigation, as well as an investigation of unpaid taxes, this did not invalidate the summons. See generally United States v. Powell, 379 U.S. 48 (1964); United States v. LaSalle National Bank, 437 U.S. 298 (1978). The LaSalle National Bank case has limited precedential value in light of the amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 7602(b) which expressly permits the issuance of a summons as part of an investigation into the possibility of a tax offense. The court also considered and rejected a Fifth Amendment challenge to the enforceability of the summons.

United States v. Peters, 153 F.3d 445 (7th Cir. 1998)

This case contains a comprehensive discussion of the rules that regulate when the IRS civil division is required to cease an audit when the Service determines that a criminal prosecution is indicated. In short, “If, during an examination, an examiner discovers a firm indication of fraud on the part of the taxpayer, the tax return preparer, or both, the examiner shall suspend his activities at the earliest opportunity without disclosing to the taxpayer, the taxpayer’s representative, or employees the reason for such suspension.”

United States v. Gertner, 65 F.3d 963 (1st Cir. 1995)

When the IRS issues a subpoena to an attorney to obtain information about a fee-payor who was not identified on an 8300 form, the IRS must comply with the rules governing the issuance of John Doe summonses, including seeking judicial approval, 26 U.S.C. §7609(f). Though the IRS claimed that the summons was designed to obtain information about the law firm (and thus the John Doe procedure was not applicable), the First Circuit agreed with the lawyer that the intent of the IRS was to obtain information about the client, or fee-payor.

United States v. Michaud, 907 F.2d 750 (7th Cir. 1990)

After the IRS has referred a case to the Justice Department for criminal prosecution, it may not obtain enforcement of a summons issued pursuant to its civil jurisdiction.

United States v. Argomaniz, 925 F.2d 1349 (11th Cir. 1991)

The Fifth Amendment may be invoked by a taxpayer if he can establish that he is faced with substantial and real hazards of self-incrimination. The Supreme Court has held that the civil and criminal aspects of IRS enforcement are “inherently intertwined.” United States v. LaSalle Nat’l Bank, 437 U.S. 298 (1978). Therefore, the mere fact that the taxpayer in this case was facing a civil request for documents is not determinative.
INTERPRETERS

United States v. Murguia-Rodriguez, 815 F.3d 566 (9th Cir. 2016)

The trial court’s failure at sentencing to use an interpreter for the defendant who had used an interpreter throughout the trial, was error and a new sentencing proceeding was required.

United States v. Hasan, 526 F.3d 653 (10th Cir. 2008)

When the trial court determined during trial that the defendant needed an interpreter, the court should also have determined whether the defendant had been entitled to an interpreter at the grand jury. The defendant was on trial for committing perjury at the grand jury. The Court Interpreters Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1827, requires the appointment of an interpreter during trial and at the grand jury if the defendant needs an interpreter.

United States v. Huang, 960 F.2d 1128 (2d Cir. 1992)

At the first trial, it was discovered that the interpreter was not properly certified and had at one point been summarizing answers, as opposed to fully interpreting. Two of the four defendants moved for a mistrial, the other two objected to the request for a mistrial. A mistrial was granted. The double jeopardy clause barred a retrial for the two who contested the mistrial. There was no manifest necessity for a mistrial; there was no certainty that the error would have resulted in a reversal (one of the tests of manifest necessity) and the “summary interpreting” was not shown to have been inaccurate.

United States v. Mayans, 17 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 1994)

Though the trial court allowed the defendant to use an interpreter throughout the course of the trial, when the defendant took the stand and stated that he had been in the country since 1971 (having lived in the U.S. longer than his homeland, Cuba), the trial court removed the interpreter, over objection. The defense attorney complained and then withdrew the defendant as a witness when the judge would not bring the interpreter back. This was reversible error. 28 U.S.C. §1827(d)(1) requires that an interpreter be made available if English is not the defendant’s primary language. The judge in this case made no determination of the defendant’s ability to speak or understand English, insisting, instead, that the defendant “try” English. “Trying” to speak English under oath in front of the jury was not the proper way to make this determination. The attorney explained that the defendant could not express himself in English and this statement was nowhere contradicted by the government or any other evidence.

United States v. Gomez, 908 F.2d 809 (11th Cir. 1990)

An interpreter “embellished” on the testimony of a particular witness. This violates the requirement of a continuous word-for-word translation of everything relating to the trial. The translation in this case was plainly improper and resulted in prejudice to the defendant. Nevertheless, it was harmless error.

The defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights were violated by the trial judge’s refusal to inquire into his need for an interpreter and his ability to pay for one. The confrontation clause of the Sixth Amendment requires that a defendant be capable of understanding the testimony of the witnesses. Simultaneous translation is required.
INTERSTATE OFFENSES

Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1 (2005)

The United States Supreme Court holds that Congress may outlaw the possession or manufacturing of marijuana even if it is possessed for personal consumption and prescribed by a physician. The potential effect that intrastate, noncommercial cultivation and use of marijuana has on the interstate market for the drug is sufficient to allow Congress to exercise its power under the Commerce Clause to proscribe all production and use. The fact that the state authorized the medical use of marijuana had no bearing on Congress’s power to outlaw its possession or cultivation.

Proof that a defendant engaged in a robbery of marijuana and money from the victim is sufficient to establish an interstate nexus for Hobbs Act purposes.

Congress may not regulate noneconomic violent criminal conduct based solely on that conduct’s aggregate effect on interstate commerce. Therefore, the Violence Against Women Act is unconstitutional.

Arson of a private residence does not affect interstate commerce for purposes of the federal arson statute’s jurisdictional element, even though the residence was insured and mortgaged through out-of-state entities and heated with out-of-state natural gas.

The defendant was convicted of violating RICO by investing the proceeds of narcotics transactions in a gold mine in Alaska. Employees of the mine were recruited from outside the state; some of the gold was sold outside the state; and some of the equipment was purchased out of state. This satisfactorily established that the mine was “engaged in interstate commerce.” The court of appeals improperly focused solely on whether the operations of the mine “affected” interstate commerce. RICO, however, establishes jurisdiction if the enterprise’s activities affect interstate commerce, or if the enterprise is engaged in interstate commerce. The latter was sufficiently shown in this case.

The Gun Free School Zones Act outlaws possession of a gun in a school zone. This law exceeded Congress’ authority under the Commerce Clause. There is no jurisdictional element of the offense (requiring a demonstrated effect on interstate commerce); nor any congressional finding that such activity affected interstate commerce.

United States v. Needham, 604 F.3d 673 (2d Cir. 2010)

A Hobbs Act prosecution requires proof that the offense affected interstate commerce. Even in a robbery involving drugs, the government is required to prove that the offense affected interstate commerce. Because this is an essential element of the offense, the jury must be instructed that they must find that the robbery affected interstate commerce and the failure to do so is reversible error. See United States v. Parkes, infra.

United States v. Schaefer, 501 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2007)
A child pornography prosecution requires proof that the image traveled in interstate commerce (including via a computer). In this case, the only evidence was that the image arrived via the Internet, but no proof of any interstate nexus. The mere fact that the image arrived over the Internet does not ipso facto establish that the image traveled in interstate commerce. OVERRULED in part by United States v. Sturm, 672 F.3d 891 (10th Cir. 2012).

United States v. Parkes, 497 F.3d 220 (2d Cir. 2007)
Proof that a defendant’s robbery was designed to obtain illegal drugs – marijuana – is not alone sufficient to establish that the crime involved an effect on interstate commerce. The government must introduce evidence that the marijuana was, or was at least likely, to have traveled in interstate commerce. (The government satisfied its burden in this case).

United States v. Mann, 493 F.3d 484 (5th Cir. 2007)
The defendant was convicted of various offenses, including mail fraud, wire fraud, and Hobbs Act, based on stealing motorists’ speeding ticket money. Because the government failed to prove that some of the motorists were traveling interstate, those counts had to be dismissed because of failure to prove a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce.

United States v. Craft, 484 F.3d 922 (7th Cir. 2007)
While affirming several counts of conviction, the Seventh Circuit held that the arson of the Hells Angels “clubhouse” was not a federal offense, because the clubhouse was not sufficiently connected to interstate commerce. While some of the members’ dues were used to pay for members’ interstate trips, this was not a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce.

United States v. Groves, 470 F.3d 311 (7th Cir. 2006)
The defendant was convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm (a shotgun). The police never recovered the shotgun, but a neighbor testified that he saw the defendant with the weapon. At trial, in order to prove that the gun had traveled in interstate commerce, the prosecutor asked the expert whether any major shotgun manufacturers were located in Indiana. There are not, and, consequently, the expert opined that if the defendant possessed a shotgun in Indiana, it had to have traveled in interstate commerce. The Seventh Circuit reversed. There was no definition of what a “major manufacturer” of shotguns was, and consequently, there was insufficient proof that the defendant’s shotgun did, in fact, travel in interstate commerce.

United States v. Patton, 451 F.3d 615 (10th Cir. 2006)
The Tenth Circuit concluded that the statute that criminalizes the possession of bullet-proof vests by felons is unconstitutional insofar as it applies to all bullet-proof vests without proof that the particular vest traveled in interstate commerce. In this case, however, the vest was shown to have traveled in interstate commerce.

United States v. Macewan, 445 F.3d 237 (3rd Cir. 2006)
Any use of the Internet in connection with pornography satisfies the interstate commerce requirement, regardless of whether the government introduces evidence that the actual images traveled across a state line.

United States v. Reasor, 418 F.3d 466 (5th Cir. 2005)

Forged checks that were written on the bank account of a church were not sufficiently connected to interstate commerce to support a federal prosecution for forgery. There were insufficient facts stated during the guilty plea proceeding that the church’s activities were “in” or that they “affected” interstate commerce. The factual statement at the guilty plea proceeding was therefore insufficient to support the plea.

United States v. Chambers, 408 F.3d 237 (5th Cir. 2005)

The indictment alleged that the defendant possessed “rounds” (i.e., bullets) that had traveled in interstate commerce. The rounds were actually manufactured in the same state where they were found in possession of the defendant. The government argued that components of the rounds had traveled in interstate commerce prior to the manufacture of the completed rounds. This amounted to an amendment of the indictment. The evidence was insufficient to support a conviction on these counts of the indictment and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Davies, 394 F.3d 182 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The defendant burned a church which bought supplies from out-of-state and graduated students who moved out-of-state. This was insufficient evidence to establish an impact on interstate commerce. Note that this was an arson prosecution, not a prosecution under the church burning statute, as in Ballinger, infra.

United States v. Maxwell, 446 F.3d 1210 (11th Cir. 2006)

The initial panel decision (386 F.3d 1042) held that a blank computer disk that was transported in interstate commerce (while still blank), and later used to copy child pornography, but that was not transported in interstate commerce afterwards, did not provide federal jurisdiction. The panel held that the pornography must travel in interstate commerce, not just the disk (blank) onto which the pornography is later copied. This case contains a very lengthy analysis of the various theories of interstate commerce. – THIS CASE WAS SENT BACK TO THE ELEVENTH CIRCUIT FROM THE SUPREME COURT FOR RECONSIDERATION IN LIGHT OF GONZALEZ V. RAICH. ---- AND REVERSED on April 20, 2006 – 446 F.3d 1210 (11th Cir. 2006). The new decision held that copying pornography onto a disk that has previously traveled in interstate commerce is a federal offense.

Waucaush v. United States, 380 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 2004)

The Sixth Circuit concluded in the RICO case that a gang member who kills a member of a rival gang has not engaged in conduct that satisfies the interstate commerce element of the offense, unless the rival gang was involved in economic activity that affected interstate commerce. In this case, the rival gang was affiliated with another gang that was involved in drug dealing, but the Sixth Circuit held that this was an insufficient connection to interstate commerce. Violence, alone, even when considered in the aggregate, does not affect interstate commerce. See United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000).
United States v. Lamont, 330 F.3d 1249 (9th Cir. 2003)

Arson of a church will not necessarily amount to a federal offense, because of the absence of a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce, even if members of the church come from other states, the church has membership in an interstate organization, and there are interstate transfers of church funds.

United States v. Drury, 396 F.3d 1303 (11th Cir. 2003)

The initial panel decision in this case held that use of a telephone to make an intrastate phone call was not sufficient to create federal jurisdiction under the 2002 version of 18 U.S.C. § 1958, the murder for hire statute. Though the telephone system is an instrumentality in interstate commerce, the statute, as construed by the Eleventh Circuit, requires a call that actually travels in interstate commerce. The element was actually satisfied in this case, because the cell phone call relayed the signal from a place in south Georgia, to a tower in north Florida and then back to the recipient of the call in south Georgia. Though the caller and recipient of the call were in Georgia, the signal actually traveled in interstate commerce. The statute was subsequently amended to specifically provide for a conviction if a facility of interstate commerce was used – i.e., a telephone – even if the call was purely intrastate.

United States v. Ballinger, 312 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2002)

The Eleventh Circuit panel initially held that there was insufficient interstate commerce evidence to convict the defendant of burning down several churches in rural Georgia in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 247(a)(1). The statute expressly requires proof that the arson be “in or affect interstate commerce.” When purely intrastate activity is involved and the government argues that this activity affected interstate commerce, the proof must demonstrate a “substantial effect” on interstate commerce. REVERSED by the en banc court January 10, 2005. 395 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc). The en banc court upheld the conviction on the theory that the defendant was traveling from state-to-state and burning churches wherever he went, thus satisfying the interstate commerce requirement.

United States v. Perrotta, 313 F.3d 33 (2d Cir. 2002)

An extortion offense committed against a person who is employed by a company engaged in interstate commerce does not affect interstate commerce simply because the employee misses time at work.

United States v. Corp, 236 F.3d 325 (6th Cir. 2001)

The defendant’s possession of pornographic pictures of his wife and girlfriend having sexual relations could not be prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(4)(B), because of a lack of a sufficient interstate nexus. The fact that the photographic paper was manufactured out of state was not a sufficient nexus. This case was later distinguished in United States v. Andrews, 383 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 2004). Still later, the Sixth Circuit held that in light of Raich, the decision in Corp was no longer good law. United States v. Bowers, 594 F.3d 522 (6th Cir. 2010).

United States v. Wilson, 133 F.3d 251 (4th Cir. 1997)
The Clean Water Act does not authorize prosecutions where the water being polluted has not been shown to either be navigable, or affect interstate commerce. Regulations promulgated pursuant to the Act which outlaw polluting intrastate non-navigable waters that could affect interstate commerce, were not authorized by the Act and are not constitutional.

United States v. Leslie, 103 F.3d 1093 (2d Cir. 1997)

The government failed to prove that one of the money laundering transactions in this case affected interstate commerce. Just because the transaction involved a bank does not necessarily mean that interstate commerce was affected.

United States v. Pinckney, 85 F.3d 4 (2d Cir. 1996)

The government failed to prove that the defendant’s operation of a “chop shop” affected interstate commerce. There was no evidence that the stolen cars were transported to the shop from outside the state, or that the disassembled car parts were sold out-of-state. The failure of proof doomed both the substantive and the conspiracy conviction.

United States v. Coates, 949 F.2d 104 (4th Cir. 1991)

The murder-for-hire statute, 18 U.S.C. §1958, requires the use of a facility in interstate commerce in connection with the murder for hire scheme. In this case, the only interstate facility was a telephone call placed by the undercover agent to the defendant, across a state line, which was done for the purpose of “manufacturing” jurisdiction. The conviction was reversed. Though the jurisdictional link may be incidental in nature, it may not be contrived.

United States v. Buffey, 899 F.2d 1402 (4th Cir. 1990)

The government failed to demonstrate that the victim’s effort to pay the defendant’s demands were reasonably likely to affect interstate commerce. Therefore, the defendant’s Hobbs Act conviction was reversed. The court does not rely on the fact that there had been no actual effect on interstate commerce. Rather, the court focused on the fact that if the facts had been as the defendant believed, there would not have been any effect on interstate commerce.

United States v. Box, 50 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 1995)

The defendants, a bail bondsman and local law enforcement agents, would arrest people at a roadside rest area and agree to drop the charges after bond had been posted. With respect to the people arrested who had not traveled in interstate commerce, the facts did not show any impact on interstate commerce and the Hobbs Act convictions on these counts would be set aside.

United States v. Collins, 40 F.3d 95 (5th Cir. 1994)

The defendant stole the victim’s car and cellular phone while he was fleeing from the police after he robbed a restaurant. This latter robbery was not shown to have had a sufficient effect on interstate commerce under 18 U.S.C. §1951(a). The only effect on interstate commerce was the individual’s employment with a company whose business affected interstate commerce.

United States v. DiCarlantonio, 870 F.2d 1058 (6th Cir. 1989)

The defendant’s Hobbs Act conviction was reversed because of the government’s failure to establish any effect on interstate commerce. The money used to pay the bribe was FBI funds; the sought-after action of the government officials was to permit the use of propane tanks within the city limits. The defendants did nothing which either increased or decreased the flow of propane as the result of the bribe. As a result, there was no effect on interstate commerce by virtue of the money paid or the action undertaken by the officials.

United States v. Bruun, 809 F.2d 397 (7th Cir. 1987)

A broker who was proved to have received stolen securities did not cause their “transportation” merely by providing a ready market for them. Conviction for interstate transportation of stolen securities was reversed.

United States v. Johnson, 56 F.3d 947 (8th Cir. 1995)

The car-jacking statute, 18 U.S.C. §2119, requires proof that the vehicle traveled in interstate commerce after it was assembled. It is not enough to prove that the parts of the vehicle were shipped to the car manufacturer from out of state. Therefore, in one count of this case, where the car was assembled in Missouri, the government failed to satisfy this jurisdictional element where the offense was shown to have occurred in Missouri. (Nevertheless, the court did affirm several other counts of conviction, for which the defendant was sentenced to 1,235 months of imprisonment – after which there would be three years of supervised released).

United States v. Quigley, 53 F.3d 909 (8th Cir. 1995)

Pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §1951(a), it is unlawful to commit a robbery which in any way obstructs, hinders, delays, or affects commerce between the states. In this case, the defendants robbed two hitchhikers who were traveling to purchase beer in another town in the same state. This evidence did not satisfy the interstate commerce element of the offense. Usually, the statute is used in cases where the victim is a business which is involved in interstate commerce. The fact that the beer which the victims were intending to purchase had traveled in interstate commerce was not sufficient to establish the jurisdictional element of §1951.

United States v. Flynn, 852 F.2d 1045 (8th Cir. 1988)

Evidence that dynamite traveled in interstate commerce was not sufficient to convict the defendant of transportation and receipt of dynamite in interstate commerce. The only evidence was that the dynamite came from “across the river” which does not sufficiently establish that the dynamite came from another state.

United States v. Ripinsky, 109 F.3d 1436 (9th Cir. 1997)

An essential element of §1957 money laundering is a financial transaction involving the use of a financial institution that is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. The foreign commerce component of this element is an essential element of the offense that must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt and submitted to the jury.

United States v. Barone, 71 F.3d 1442 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defendants cashed over 130 checks on the accounts of fake, or defunct companies at local casinos or businesses. The defendants were charged with the federal offense of uttering forged securities in violation of 18 U.S.C. §513(a). The victim casinos and businesses had operations which affected interstate commerce. Nevertheless, the companies on whose accounts these checks were drawn were defunct and the statute requires that the securities be of an organization which operates in or the activities of which affect interstate commerce. Because those companies’ activities did not affect interstate commerce, the conviction could not be sustained. It is not enough to prove under §513(a) that the victim organizations affected interstate commerce.
$\text{United States v. Pappadopoulos}$, 64 F.3d 522 (9th Cir. 1995)

An essential element of a federal arson prosecution under 18 U.S.C. §844(i) is that the property was used in, or used in any activity affecting, interstate or foreign commerce. In this case, the defendant committed arson on a home which used natural gas which was shipped in interstate commerce. There was no additional showing of an effect on interstate commerce. This evidence did not satisfy the interstate commerce element of the offense. The relationship between the property and interstate commerce must be “substantial,” the court holds, relying on $\text{United States v. Lopez}$. Need to re-examine this case in light of $\text{Jones v. United States}$, 529 U.S. 848 (2000).

$\text{United States v. Cruz}$, 50 F.3d 714 (9th Cir. 1995)

18 U.S.C. §922(j) outlaws the possession of a firearm which has been stolen and which has traveled in interstate commerce. The court holds that the government must prove that the defendant knew the firearm was stolen and must also prove that after the gun was stolen it traveled in interstate commerce. It is not enough to prove that at some point in time the gun traveled and thereafter was stolen. In this case the defendant possessed grenades which had traveled in interstate commerce and were stolen in Guam. The defendant possessed the grenades in Guam.

$\text{United States v. Grey}$, 56 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir. 1995)

The defendant paid $200.00 to a club manager to add to the pool of an illegal video poker game. This was the basis for the defendant’s money laundering prosecution. The government’s argument that the $200.00 in federal reserve notes had traveled in interstate commerce was not sufficient to carry the day on the jurisdictional element that the transaction affect interstate commerce. The government’s theory would mean that all offenses involving currency automatically satisfy the interstate commerce element.

$\text{United States v. Denalli}$, 73 F.3d 328 (11th Cir. 1996), modified at 90 F.3d 444

The defendant burned down the house of his next door neighbor. Because the neighbors’ house was not used, and did not affect interstate commerce, a conviction under 18 U.S.C. §844(i) could not be sustained. The court concluded that to sustain a conviction under the “affecting interstate commerce” theory, the government would have to prove that the residence had a substantial effect on interstate commerce.

$\text{United States v. Frost}$, 61 F.3d 1518, modified, 77 F.3d 1319 (11th Cir. 1996), judgment vacated on other grounds, 117 S.Ct. 1816 (1997)

The defendants were political rivals of a city council member. They sent an extortion letter to their rival (threatening to expose his extramarital activity if he did not resign). The defendants were charged with a Hobbs Act violation. The evidence, however, failed to establish a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce. Although the indictment sufficiently alleged an interstate commerce nexus, the government’s proof fell short of its intended purpose. The affairs of the city council were linked to interstate commerce; but there was no showing that the resignation of one member of the six-member city council would have impacted the continuing business of that governing body in such a manner as to constitute a violation of the federal statute. Therefore, the extortion threat, if it had succeeded, was not shown to be likely to have the natural effect of obstructing commerce.
INTOXICATION DEFENSE

United States v. Kenyon, 481 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2007)

Attempt crimes require proof of specific intent to commit the crime. Consequently, a defendant may defend on the basis that he did not intend to commit the crime, even if the crime itself is not a specific intent crime. In this case, the defendant was charged with attempt to commit child sex abuse. He claimed that he was too intoxicated to have that intent. Even though intoxication is not a defense to the crime of sex abuse, it is a defense to the crime of attempt to commit sex abuse. There was sufficient evidence of the defendant’s intoxication in this case to warrant the giving of an intoxication instruction and the failure to do so was reversible error as to those counts.
JENCKS ACT

United States v. Gonzalez-Melendez, 570 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2009)

The First Circuit remands this case to the trial court to make findings regarding whether a “302” amounted to a statement of the witness who was interviewed by the FBI agent. The prosecutor’s statement in court that the 302 was not a “statement” was not sufficient. The judge must make an independent finding whether the interview constituted a substantially verbatim recital of what the witness said, or whether the witness adopted the statement after reviewing it. It is not necessary that a witness physically write or record the statement in order to qualify as a statement. 18 U.S.C. § 3500(e)(1).

United States v. Hodgkiss, 116 F.3d 116 (5th Cir. 1997)

Law enforcement agents interviewed various co-defendants during the course of the investigation and kept debriefing notes. The agents then testified at trial. The debriefing notes were Jencks material that should have been furnished to the defense, because the testimony of the agents related to the subject of the interviews, the interviews and the testimony related to the defendant’s relationship to other members of the conspiracy. The fact that the agents did not expressly rely on the interviews of the co-defendants did not mean that the notes did not qualify as Jencks material. Harmless error.

United States v. Neal, 36 F.3d 1190 (1st Cir. 1994)

18 U.S.C. §3500(e)(2), which requires the disclosure of written or recorded statements of a witness, includes statements which are written by a police officer during an interview of a witness if the written report represents a substantially verbatim account of what the witness said. It is not necessary that the witness’s statement be recorded stenographically or tape recorded.

United States v. Welch, 810 F.2d 485 (5th Cir. 1987)

A DEA agent made a number of reports in connection with his undercover investigation of a methamphetamine lab. An in camera hearing was required to determine whether these reports related to the subject matter of the agent’s testimony and thus were “statements” subject to disclosure under the Jencks Act. Since he had drafted the reports, they were clearly adopted by him or were verbatim recitations of his statements.

United States v. DeFranco, 30 F.3d 664 (6th Cir. 1994)

During the course of deliberations, the defense learned that it had been deprived of some Jencks material. The trial court erred in simply concluding that the inadvertent failure to produce the material was harmless. Alternative remedies, such as striking the witnesses’ testimony were more appropriate.

United States v. Tincher, 907 F.2d 600 (6th Cir. 1990)

Despite the defendant’s request for Jencks or Brady material, the government failed to disclose material which clearly fell within the scope of both requests. The prosecutor failed to give to the defendant grand jury testimony of the agent who was testifying. In light of the deliberate misrepresentation of the prosecutor, the conviction was reversed.
United States v. Allen, 798 F.2d 985 (7th Cir. 1986)

The conviction in this case was reversed because of the trial court’s refusal to conduct an in camera examination of the FBI reports pursuant to the Jencks Act. The court holds that when it is acknowledged that documents exist but disputed whether these documents contain “statements,” the district court must make an in camera examination of the documents. The trial court’s accepting the government’s word in this case, that no statements were contained in the documents, is not adequate compliance with the requirements of the Jencks Act. The court also notes that FBI reports, commonly known as 302’s, normally contain “statements” of witnesses.

United States v. Ogbuehi, 18 F.3d 807 (9th Cir. 1994)

The AUSA interviewed a witness and occasionally read the notes back to the witness. The witness testified that the AUSA would “from time to time” read something back to her and ask if he had it right. She would say, “Yes, that’s what I said” or if it were “no,” he would correct it. Pursuant to Goldberg v. United States, 425 U.S. 94 (1976), this type of statement may have been “adopted” by the witness, even if the witness never actually read the AUSA’s notes, had them read to her in full, or signed them. See also United States v. Boshell, 952 F.2d 1101, 1104 (9th Cir. 1991).

United States v. Brumel-Alvarez, 991 F.2d 1452 (9th Cir. 1992)

One informant for the government testified that he went to Bolivia and witnessed the source of the cocaine involved in the conspiracy alleged in this indictment. No other cocaine was introduced, seized, or known to have been in possession of any of the defendants. The prosecutor acknowledged in both his opening and his closing that the informant’s testimony was the key to the case. The prosecutor, however, failed to reveal to the defense a memorandum written by a DEA agent who severely criticized the operation and the credibility of the informant. Only a redacted version was provided to the defense. Among other things, the memorandum documented various false claims of the informant and his predilection to “run” the operation. The memorandum also revealed that the informant declined to make undercover calls to the supposed “higher-ups” who were involved in the smuggling venture. The memorandum also qualified as Jencks Act material of the author of the memorandum – the disgruntled DEA agent who testified on behalf of the government.

United States v. Smith, 984 F.2d 1084 (10th Cir. 1993)

When an attorney alerts the court to the existence of notes reflecting a witness interview, some inquiry is necessary to determine if the notes are producible under the Jencks Act.

United States v. Rivera Pedin, 861 F.2d 1522 (11th Cir. 1988)

The Eleventh Circuit reversed this conviction because of a Jencks Act violation. The government was in the possession of a diary of one of its witnesses which contained material statements about the witness having erased a tape which had been produced in connection with the taping of the defendant’s telephone calls.

United States v. Lloyd, 992 F.2d 348 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

As an aside in this opinion dealing with Rule 16, the court suggests that a tax return of a witness may be covered by the Jencks Act. This is clearly dictum in the opinion, however.

Witness statements which contain exculpatory information must be produced when Brady information is produced. Just because the information also falls under the Jencks Act does not mean that disclosure may be delayed.
SEE ALSO: PLEA AGREEMENTS (several cases in that section note that after a breached plea agreement, a new sentencing should be conducted before a different judge).

_{Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540 (1994)}_

28 U.S.C. §455(a) requires recusal of a judge in any proceeding in which his impartiality may be questioned. The Supreme Court holds that matters arising out of the course of judicial proceedings – either in this case, or in a prior case – are not a proper basis for recusal.

_{Williams v. Pennsylvania, --- S. Ct. --- (2016)}_

If a judge on the court that is reviewing a conviction was previously the prosecutor who had any decision-making role in the case, the judge must recuse himself. The Court “constitutionalized” via the Due Process Clause the ethical maxim that a person may not serve as both prosecutor and judge.

_{Fowler v. Butts, 829 F.3d 788 (7th Cir. 2016)}_

The defendant filed a § 2254 which challenged, in part, a prior state conviction’s eligibility to trigger recidivist punishment, and his state trial counsel’s failure to argue against the validity of the state conviction. The federal district court judge presiding over the habeas action was the state could judge who imposed the sentence in the prior case. The judge should have recused.

_{United States v. Herrera-Valdez, 826 F.3d 912 (7th Cir. 2016)}_

The defendant was charged with illegal re-entry. At his initial deportation proceeding, the judge presiding over the current criminal case was the INS District Counsel (though a different lawyer signed the pleadings). This created an appearance of impropriety and the district judge should have recused himself. The Seventh Circuit also discussed the requirement – unique to the Seventh Circuit – that the denial of a motion to recuse must be immediately challenged by a mandamus petition to the appellate court or the issue is waived. In this case, however, this waiver rule was relaxed, because the defendant promptly entered a conditional guilty plea reserving the right to appeal the denial of the recusal motion.

_{United States v. Smith, 775 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2015)}_

In this appeal of a supervised revocation proceeding, a remand to a new judge was necessary because the judge who presided over the revocation hearing had been the AUSA who initially participated in the prosecution of the defendant. This violation of the Judicial Code was not waivable.

_{United States v. Hernandez-Meza, 720 F.3d 760 (9th Cir. 2013)}_

The trial court erred in this case in permitting the government to re-open the evidence and introduce evidence that was no previously produced to the defense as required by Rule 16. The government protested that the defendant’s defense was unexpected (it was revealed when the defendant submitted his proposed requests to charge) and that the additional evidence was needed to refute the newly-revealed theory of defense. The Ninth Circuit held that allowing the government to re-open the evidence was reversible error. The fact that the new defense was factually not realistic is not relevant, the defense had the right to raise this defense and to point out the gaps in the government’s proof. Judge Kozinski wrote, “[A] criminal defendant, unlike the government, needn't have a good faith belief in the factual validity of a defense. So long as the defendant doesn't perjure himself or present evidence he knows to be false—and Hernandez–Meza presented no evidence at all—he's entitled to exploit weaknesses in the prosecution's case, even though he may believe himself to be guilty. What matters in satisfying the government's burden of proof in a criminal case is not objective reality nor defendant's personal belief, but the evidence the government presents in court. No competent prosecutor would be surprised, based on what he thinks defendant should know, to find defense counsel poking holes in the government's case. The argument is without merit, yet the government made it before the district court, and again on appeal.

The government’s failure to produce the evidence in its Rule 16 production was not justified. The Rule requires the production of all documents “material to the preparation of the defense.” Information is material even if it simply causes a defendant to completely abandon a planned defense and take an entirely different path. If the defendant in this case knew that government had this evidence, the defendant may not have relied on this defense. Moreover, a defendant need not spell out his theory of the case in order to obtain discovery. Nor is the government entitled to know in advance specifically what the defense is going to be. Discovery must still be provided pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(E)(i). The Ninth Circuit held that the trial judge’s summary rejection of the defendant’s Rule 16 argument, as well as his unsupported decision to allow the government to re-open the evidence, required that the case be remanded and that a new judge preside over the case.

In re Bulger, 710 F.3d 42 (1st Cir. 2013)

The judge to whom Whitey Bulger’s case was assigned following his capture in 2011 held various managerial posts in the U.S. Attorney’s Office in Boston that was involved in the investigation of Bulger and his associates decades earlier. The First Circuit (Justice Souter, sitting by designation), granted a writ of mandamus, requiring the trial judge to recuse himself from presiding over the case.

United States v. Dreyer, 693 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant, a psychiatrist, developed dementia at the age of 63 and entered into a drug conspiracy. He entered a guilty plea. The Ninth Circuit held that at the sentencing hearing, the judge should have sua sponte ordered a competency hearing. At the sentencing hearing, the defense attorney declined to have the defendant speak, because he didn’t know what the defendant would say and his dementia might lead him to deny responsibility and he might say something inappropriate. This should have prompted the trial judge to order a competency examination. The appellate court also ordered that the case be reassigned to a different judge on remand because of comments made by the trial judge that reflected her premature judgment about the defendant’s possible incompetence and his manipulative behavior. See also 705 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2013) (opinion regarding denial of rehearing en banc).
As a matter of due process, a judge who fails the “appearance of impartiality” test may not sit as the judge in the case. In this case, when a pretrial ruling concerning the appointment of additional counsel was appealed, the judge appeared as a nominal party in the appellate court but actually filed a pleading, urging that the ruling was proper and that the simplicity of the case (implying that the evidence of guilt was overwhelming) justified the decision to deny the appointment of two lawyers in this death penalty case. That pleading also questioned the ability of the lawyer who was representing the defendant. The Ninth Circuit held that the state trial judge’s participation in the appeal may have rendered her too biased to participate in the death penalty proceedings that ensued in the trial court. A remand for a full evidentiary hearing on the state judge’s impartiality was required.

United States v. Paul, 561 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 2009)
The Ninth Circuit previously reversed the defendant’s 16 month sentence, holding that it was unreasonably harsh. On remand, the district court judge imposed a 15 month sentence. The Ninth Circuit reversed again and ordered a change of judges on remand.

United States v. Demott, 513 F.3d 55 (11th Cir. 2008)
When a defendant is re-sentenced pursuant to a remand from the appellate court, he has the right to be present. The trial court’s summary imposition of the same sentence without announcing findings in open court and without the defendant present was error. On remand, the case would be assigned to a different judge because of the judge’s apparent lack of receptivity to the arguments of counsel (because he had not even given them an opportunity to be heard at the last proceeding).

United States v. Amico, 486 F.3d 764 (2d Cir. 2007)
In this mortgage fraud trial, one of the key government witnesses was a mortgage broker who had previously helped the district court judge obtain a mortgage (before he was a judge). There was considerable controversy surrounding this witness (and whether he had actually submitted false papers in connection with the judge’s application). Though the judge clearly was not involved in any misconduct, the appearance of a conflict was such that he should have recused himself. The defendants’ convictions were reversed.

United States v. Quattrone, 441 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2006)
Without providing much elaboration, the Second Circuit held that following reversal of the conviction, the case would be assigned to a different judge.

Franklin v. McCaughtry, 398 F.3d 955 (7th Cir. 2005)
The judge in this case had previously filed a memorandum in another case that referred to Mr. Franklin. A newspaper article was then written about the judge’s memorandum. Because the memorandum by the judge (in the other case) complained that when indigent defendants are released on bond pending appeal, they commit more crimes, his impartiality was in question and he should have recused himself from further participation in this case. The judge had already expressed an opinion that the defendant had in fact, committed the charged offenses.
In re Nettles, 394 F.3d 1001 (7th Cir. 2005)
Where the defendant is charged with targeting a federal courthouse for bombing, every judge (district court and court of appeals) should recuse himself from any participation in the case.

United States v. Andrews, 390 F.3d 840 (5th Cir. 2004)
The district court departed upward on the Guidelines, expressing dissatisfaction with the sentence that was dictated by the Guidelines. The Fifth Circuit reversed and held that a remand to a different judge was appropriate in this case.

United States v. Lentz, 383 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2004)
The trial court granted a motion for new trial based on his finding that the AUSA intentionally placed documents (that were not introduced in evidence) into the evidence cart that was provided to the jury during deliberations. The Fourth Circuit held that a new trial was required because of the presence of the inadmissible evidence in the jury room; however, there was no evidence that the AUSA intentionally caused this. In fact, it could have been caused by the trial court’s staff. The Fourth Circuit decided on remand that the case should be assigned to a different judge. The trial court could not reasonably be expected to erase the earlier impressions from his mind, or might tend to lean over backwards or overreact in an effort to be fair and impartial on retrial. Moreover, the AUSA would be understandably distracted from his task during the retrial.

Ellis v. U.S. District Court, 356 F.3d 1198 (9th Cir. 2004) (en banc)
When a trial court accepts a guilty plea, but subsequently rejects the plea agreement, the ball is then in the defendant’s court as to whether he wishes to withdraw his plea or go forward with sentencing, without the plea agreement in place. The trial court may not simply vacate the guilty plea and proceed to trial. See Rule 11(c)(5), Fed.R.Crim.P. The court reached this conclusion after reviewing the analysis of the Supreme Court in United States v. Hyde, 520 U.S. 670 (1997), which also explained that a trial judge may accept a guilty plea and defer acceptance of the plea agreement; but if the agreement is rejected, then the defendant must be given an opportunity to withdraw the plea. The Ellis court also held that upon remand, the case would be assigned to a different judge.

United States v. Doe, 348 F.3d 64 (2d Cir. 2003)
The district court judge indicated his displeasure with the government for failing to make a specific recommendation in connection with a § 5K1.1 motion. In a prior case, the judge had refused to reduce a sentence, because of the government’s refusal to make a specific recommendation and the Second Circuit reversed that sentence. The Second Circuit in this case ordered that the case be remanded to a different judge because the district court judge’s apparent inability to comply with the Sentencing Guidelines.

In the Matter of Jeffrey C. Hatcher, 150 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 1998)
The judge assigned to preside over this gang-related trial had a son who was an intern in the U.S. Attorney’s office and who had participated in the trial of a closely-related case. The judge had watched part of that trial in the audience. The Seventh Circuit concluded that the judge should have recused himself.

United States v. Anderson, 160 F.3d 231 (5th Cir. 1998)

The trial judge should have recused himself from further participation in this case after the defense counsel testified before a special investigatory committee of the Fifth Circuit Judicial Council which was investigating misconduct of the judge.

United States v. Avilez-Reyes, 160 F.3d 258 (5th Cir. 1998)

Same facts – and same judge – as United States v. Anderson, 160 F.3d 231 (5th Cir. 1998). Same result, as well.

United States v. Chantal, 902 F.2d 1018 (1st Cir. 1990)

The fact that a defendant pleads guilty does not waive his challenge to a trial judge’s qualifications if the impartiality of the judge is reasonably open to question. Furthermore, the alleged basis for asserting that the judge is biased or prejudiced can be his conduct in a prior judicial proceeding. In this case, the judge had described the defendant as an “unreconstructed drug trafficker.” This was in a prior sentencing; now, facing the defendant following his arrest on separate charges, the defendant moved to recuse the judge on the basis of his expressed bias. Because the trial judge refused to even consider the issue because the bias was revealed during a prior judicial proceeding, the First Circuit reverses and holds that the judge must make an adequate record in determining whether he should remain on the case.

United States v. Brinkworth, 68 F.3d 633 (2d Cir. 1995)

A defendant who pleads guilty unconditionally may still appeal the trial judge’s denial of a recusal motion under 28 U.S.C. §455.

United States v. Diaz, 797 F.2d 99 (2d Cir. 1986)

The trial judge wrote a letter to his Senator complaining about the Court of Appeals decision in this case. The letter urged the introduction of legislation regarding sentence enhancements. Such conduct calls into question the impartiality of the district judge who should have recused himself, permitting re-sentencing to be conducted before a different judge.

United States v. Antar, 53 F.3d 568 (3rd Cir. 1995)

The defendant was the subject of both a civil SEC action and a criminal contempt action for failing to comply with the court’s order in the civil case regarding the return of money. When imposing sentence, the judge stated that his object, “from day one . . . was to get back to the public that which was taken from it.” This unambiguously demonstrates that the judge had prejudged the case and lacked the impartiality required. Had the judge announced at the opening of the trial that this was his object, clearly he would be recused. The fact that he made this disclosure at the end of the trial makes no difference.

United States v. Furst, 886 F.2d 558 (3rd Cir. 1989)

Following his conviction, the defendant sought to recuse the trial judge from sentencing. The trial court held that this motion was untimely. However, the motion was based on the judge’s ex parte comments to the defense attorney about the defendant’s failure to enter a plea. agreement and his discussion of the sentences which might be imposed. The trial court erred in ruling this motion untimely.

United States v. Anderson, 70 F.3d 353 (5th Cir. 1995)

The judge’s refusal to accept a plea agreement, his refusal to dismiss an indictment at the request of the government and his insistence on using information which would have been used had he been sentenced under the original indictment led the appellate court to vacate the sentence and remand the case to the district court for re-assignment to a different judge.

United States v. Jordan, 49 F.3d 152 (5th Cir. 1995)

The defendant and an attorney were embroiled in numerous contentious dealings, which resulted, among other things, in the defendant’s daughter taking out an arrest warrant on the attorney for assault. The district court judge which tried and sentenced the defendant on charges which related to the transactions for which the attorney was dealing with the defendant, was a good friend and former classmate of the attorney (the trial judge’s husband was once a law partner of the attorney and tried to intervene with the district attorney when the attorney was arrested as a result of the defendant’s taking out a warrant). There was an appearance of impropriety and the case would be remanded for resentencing before a district court judge from another district.

United States v. Goldfaden, 959 F.2d 1324 (5th Cir. 1992)

The government agreed to make no recommendation as to the defendant’s sentence. Despite this pledge, the government wrote several letters to the probation officer advocating the use of certain Guideline ranges. This was a violation of the agreement. The fact that the government recommended guideline ranges, rather than a specific number of months or years is inconsequential. On remand, if the court concludes that specific performance is the appropriate remedy, the defendant must be sentenced by a different judge.

In re Faulkner, 856 F.2d 716 (5th Cir. 1988)

The district judge should have recused himself because a relative with a close relationship to the judge was an important participant in a significant financial transaction forming the basis of the indictment. Furthermore, the relative had communicated to the judge about material facts and related her opinions and attitudes regarding those instances. Though there was no showing of actual bias, under the facts presented, the judge’s partiality could reasonably be questioned; thus recusal was required.

United States v. Arnpriester, 37 F.3d 466 (9th Cir. 1994)

A district court judge who was formerly a United States Attorney may not sit on any case which was commenced during his tenure in the U.S. Attorney’s office.

Nichols v. Alley, 71 F.3d 347 (10th Cir. 1995)

The Oklahoma Bombing judge, whose chambers were rocked by the explosion, was required to recuse himself.

United States v. Greenspan, 26 F.3d 1001 (10th Cir. 1994)

After the FBI informed the judge that the defendant had conspired with others to kill him and members of his family, the judge should have recused himself prior to sentencing.

United States v. Cooley, 1 F.3d 985 (10th Cir. 1993)

The district court judge became embroiled in the Operation Rescue controversy by appearing on “Nightline.” Thereafter, he should have recused himself from further participation. in the case. The judge’s appearance on television conveyed an uncommon interest and degree of personal involvement which required him to recuse himself from further proceedings in the case.

Porter v. Singletary, 49 F.3d 1483 (11th Cir. 1995)

Prior to the sentencing hearing in this death penalty trial in Florida (where the trial judge is the ultimate finder of fact), the judge told the clerk, with whom he was drinking coffee, that he was going to listen to the evidence, then sentence the son-of-a-bitch to the chair. This evidence indicated a pre-disposition on the part of the judge to execute the defendant even before the evidence was heard. A remand to develop the record was appropriate.

United States v. Kelly, 888 F.2d 732 (11th Cir. 1989)

The trial court conducted a bench trial in this drug prosecution. During the trial, the defendant called as a witness an individual who was a close friend of the judge. The judge conducted a private conversation with the witness’ wife in chambers, and announced to the parties that he was troubled by the use of his friend as a witness. The judge himself stated that he had profound doubts about the propriety of continuing to sit on the case. He explained that he felt confronted by a personal dilemma between his friend and his duty to sit impartially. The judge later accused the defendant of having placed him in this “awkward position.” The purpose of 29 U.S.C. §455 is to promote confidence in the judiciary by avoiding even the appearance of impropriety whenever possible. The trial judge should have recused himself in this case. Furthermore, the defendant is not capable of waiving this issue. The practice of advising counsel of a possible conflict and asking them to indicate their approval of the judge’s remaining in a particular case is “fraught with potential coercive elements which make this practice undesirable.”

United States v. Torkington, 874 F.2d 1441 (11th Cir. 1989)

Because of the trial judge’s actions during the trial, upon remand from the Eleventh Circuit, it would be appropriate for the case to be assigned to a different judge.
JUDGES
(COMMENTING ON THE EVIDENCE)

United States v. Miller, 738 F.3d 361 (D.C. Cir. 2013)

During deliberations, the jury asked several questions about the relationship of certain evidence to certain counts (e.g., “does the phone call on a certain date apply to a certain count of the indictment?”). The judge answered the questions. This amounted to improper commenting on the evidence and required that the conviction be reversed.

Smith v. Curry, 580 F.3d 1071 (9th Cir. 2009)

After receiving a note that the jury was deadlocked, the judge read a model Allen charge. That instruction didn’t accomplish a unanimous verdict, so the judge provided his “comment” on the evidence that suggested that the jury should focus on the consistencies and inconsistencies in the evidence relating to a particular issue (which of the conspirators committed the sexual assault on the victim). That comment (which strongly favored the prosecution) was unmistakably directed at the hold-out juror. Using the Allen charge jurisprudence as a guide, the Ninth Circuit held that this amounted to an impermissibly coercive instruction that tainted the verdict. Though the Constitution does not prohibit judges from commenting on the evidence, in this case, the comment amounted to a denial of the right to a fair an impartial jury deciding the case.
JUDGES
(MISCELLANEOUS)

Jackson v. United States, 859 F.3d 495 (7th Cir. 2017)
If a magistrate makes a credibility determination after hearing live testimony, the district court judge may not reject that credibility determination without conducting a de novo hearing.

Norris v. United States, 820 F.3d 1261 (11th Cir. 2016)
After the defendant was convicted and sentenced, it was discovered that the judge was engaged in an affair with a dancer at a strip club. She was taping the judge. During the course of this taping, the judge revealed that he was racially prejudiced. The judge was later prosecuted (had he participated in a drug deal with the dancer). The defendant successfully persuaded the Eleventh Circuit that he was entitled to a full evidentiary hearing to test the validity of his conviction and sentence. An actually biased judge amounts to a structural error at trial.

United States v. Harden, 758 F.3d 886 (7th Cir. 2014)
A Magistrate may not accept a guilty plea. The Magistrate may conduct the plea colloquy and prepare a Report and Recommendation suggesting that the plea be accepted, but it cannot actually accept the plea.

Brown v. United States, 748 F.3d 1045 (11th Cir. 2014)
A Magistrate may not issue a final ruling on a § 2255 petition. Though a § 2255 petition is often referred to as a civil matter, it is a criminal motion for purposes of the Magistrate’s Act, JUDICIAL MISCONDUCT

United States v. Lefsih, 867 F.3d 459 (4th Cir. 2017)

The defendant entered the United States pursuant to a little-known immigration program known as the Diversity Immigrant Visa Program. He was accused of filing a false application, because he omitted his traffic citations. During the examination of the government’s agent, the judge engaged in lengthy questioning session during which he ridiculed the program (emphasizing that from many countries, the applicant must show that he or she is a doctor, or professional, or engineer, but from the “bottom” countries, you just get to come in on a lottery). This questioning was inappropriate and led the Fourth Circuit to reverse the conviction. When a judge interjects a negative impression of the defendant or conveys a “skepticism” of the defendant’s defense, the line has been crossed and the appearance of partiality requires reversal of the conviction. The fact that the judge instructed the jury that he had no interest in the outcome of the case and had no opinion about guilt or innocence did not cure the problem caused by his questioning of the government agent.

United States v. Rivera-Rodriguez, 761 F.3d 105 (1st Cir. 2014)

When cooperating witnesses testified, the judge questioned them and emphasized that if they testified untruthfully, they would not receive a sentence reduction and were subject to prosecution for perjury. The extensive questioning of the witness by the trial judge was improper. In addition, during closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the defendant, on cross-examination, made a particular statement. The defense attorney objected and the judge denied the objection adding the comment, “That’s exactly what he said.” Even though this was accurate, it amounted to an improper comment on the evidence. The cumulative effect of these errors required that the conviction be reversed.

United States v. Ottaviano, 738 F.3d 586 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The judge’s persistent questioning of the pro se defendant was improper and required reversing the conviction.

United States v. Barnhart, 599 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 2010)

The judge’s questioning of witnesses in this case was too prosecution-oriented and would have conveyed to the jury the impression that the judge disbelieved the defendant’s defense. The questioning was more like cross-examination. However, because there was no objection, the appellate court reviewed the error under a plain error standard and concluded that the error was not plain.

United States v. Melendez-Rivas, 566 F.3d 41 (1st Cir. 2009)

The judge asked a defense witness questions that elicited the response that the FBI had told the witness that the defendant was involved in a series of felony offenses that could lead to the death penalty. The FBI agents’ statements to the witness were not admissible and the judge’s behavior in eliciting these statements (even though the witness testified that he did not believe the FBI agent’s accusations), required a reversal of the conviction.
United States v. Blanchard, 542 F.3d 1133 (7th Cir. 2008)

During a suppression hearing, the judge made certain comments and questioned a witness in a manner which revealed the judge’s credibility determination about the witness – that is, that he was lying to protect the defendant (his father). At trial, the witness recanted his defense-favorable testimony and provided testimony that directly implicated the defendant. The defense attorney sought to show that the witness changed his testimony because of threats from the prosecutor. The prosecutor responded by showing that it was the judge who initially challenged the credibility of the witness. The dialogue between the judge and the witness at the suppression hearing was introduced to rebut the defense attorney’s theory. This was error. Admitting the judge’s statements was not permissible.

United States v. Christman, 509 F.3d 299 (6th Cir. 2007)

The district court judge acknowledged that she had had a conversation with the probation officer that affected her view of what an appropriate sentence should be. Prior to entering the written judgment (but after imposing sentence in court), the court revealed this to counsel and decided that a new sentencing hearing should be convened to allow the defendant to respond to the probation officer’s comments. The Sixth Circuit agreed.

United States v. Barnwell, 477 F.3d 844 (6th Cir. 2007)

During deliberations in this trial, an FBI agent in an unrelated case who was monitoring a wiretap determined that one of the deliberating jurors was possibly contacting people about her deliberations. Two prosecutors (not the trial prosecutors in this case), asked to speak to the judge and explained the situation. The trial prosecutors were aware of this ex parte communication. Over the next day or two, five ex parte meetings were held. The defendant and his attorneys had no idea this was occurring. There were also some meetings with the foreman (these were in the presence of the defense attorney, but he did not know exactly what prompted the meetings). Eventually, a mistrial was declared when the jury was unable to reach a verdict. The ex parte communications remained a secret. A new trial was held and the defendant was found guilty. After that trial, the events that occurred during the first trial were unsealed and furnished to defense counsel. The Sixth Circuit held that the ex parte communications violated the defendant’s right to counsel and his right to be present at all stages of the proceedings, as well as his right to be tried with an impartial judge. The court set aside the verdict in the second trial, even though it was not directly affected by the ex parte communication. The decision ends with a series of observations about the impropriety of conducting ex parte communications and the necessity of judicial impartiality.

Lyell v. Renico, 470 F.3d 1177 (6th Cir. 2006)

The judge’s clashes with defense counsel were so dramatic, and her questioning of witnesses was so one-sided that the defendant was denied due process. Among other instances of her bias was directing the prosecutor to ask questions that would elicit inadmissible evidence and sustaining objections that were never made by the prosecutor. The coup de grace was holding the defense attorney in contempt in front of the jury.

United States v. Nickl, 427 F.3d 1286 (10th Cir. 2005)
During the defendant’s cross-examination of the supposed principal in the crime with which the defendant was charged, the defendant suggested that the witness pled guilty without a factual basis. The judge interrupted and instructed the jury that they could assume that the principal actually committed the crime, based on the plea agreement and the factual basis that he, the judge, had accepted. This violated Rule 605’s prohibition on judicial testimony.

Cartalino v. Washington, 122 F.3d 8 (7th Cir. 1997)

The judge who presided at the defendant's jury trial had accepted a bribe from defendant's co-defendant, who proceeded with a bench trial. This may have tainted the defendant's trial, even absent proof that the judge conducted himself in any improper or biased manner and a full evidentiary was necessary.

United States v. Mortimer, 161 F.3d 240 (3rd Cir. 1998)

During the defendant’s closing argument, the judge left the bench. The Third Circuit concluded that this amounts to a structural error that necessitates reversing the conviction without a showing of prejudice.

United States v. Tilghman, 134 F.3d 414 (D.C.Cir. 1998)

The trial judge improperly cross-examined the defendant. The tone of the questions telegraphed to the jury the judge’s attitude that he doubted the credibility of the defendant's testimony.

United States v. Saenz, 134 F.3d 697 (5th Cir. 1998)

The trial court's questioning of the prosecution's key witness suggested that he believed the witness's testimony. The court elicited key details of the relationship between the witness and the defendant, and the particulars of the proposed transaction. The court expressed no skepticism of the witness's testimony, or questioned the witness's veracity. Then, when the defense counsel was cross-examining the witness, the court interrupted and once again elicited testimony about the proposed drug transaction and after the witness completed answering these questions, the court called a recess for lunch. Once the defendant took the stand, the judge's questioning continued, but rather then asking questions that supported the testimony, the judge asked questions that included phrases such as, "Is that what you are telling this jury?"

Considering the judge’s participation in the questioning throughout the course of the trial, the defendant was denied a fair trial and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Stavroff, 149 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to question a cooperating co-conspirator about his hopes in entering a plea agreement. The court also criticized the trial judge for sua sponte excluding this line of cross-examination, despite the government’s failure to raise an objection. If the trial judge believes that a question posed by the defense is inappropriate, but the government does not object, the trial court should ask the lawyers to approach the bench, rather than taking on an adversarial role with the defense counsel. Harmless error.
United States v. Filani, 74 F.3d 378 (2d Cir. 1996)

The judge continuously questioned witnesses in a manner which served only to discredit the defendant. The judge questioned both prosecution witnesses in this manner, as well as the defendant himself. Even the transcript conveyed to the appellate court the tone of incredulity that the judge used in questioning witnesses. The Second Circuit devoted several pages to the historical, as well as practical justification for limiting judicial questioning of witnesses. The court reversed the conviction under the plain error standard, because trial counsel did not object to the court’s repeated interrogation of his client and the government witnesses.

United States v. Edwaro-Franco, 885 F.2d 1002 (2d Cir. 1989)

The defendant was convicted of various drug-related offenses. During the course of the trial, the trial judge referred to the Colombian nationality of the defendants. Coupled with various evidentiary rulings which were erroneous the conduct of the trial gave an appearance of bias which warranted a new trial.

United States v. Victoria, 837 F.2d 50 (2d Cir. 1988)

The manner in which the trial court interrogated the defendants denied them a fair trial. The interrogation was clearly in the mode of cross-examination and compelled the defendants to characterize the law enforcement agents’ testimony as either true or false.

Brown v. Lynaugh, 843 F.2d 849 (5th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was denied a fair trial when the presiding judge testified as a witness for the prosecution. The judge testified about the defendant’s escape from the courtroom during a burglary prosecution.

United States v. Cowan, 819 F.2d 89 (5th Cir. 1987)

The trial judge conducted ex parte conversations with jurors at a time when it was clear that they were deadlocked. This is judicial misconduct and resulted in reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Segines, 17 F.3d 847 (6th Cir. 1994)

During a pretrial conference, the defense attorney refused to stipulate to the defendant’s prior record. The trial court criticized the attorney and stated that unnecessarily requiring a clerk to bring certified records to the trial would “be taken into account at sentencing.” Later, during trial, the judge criticized the attorneys for taking too long with the cross-examination; and (out of the jury’s presence) remarked that the attorneys were being “extremely obnoxious” and being repetitive with questioning witnesses and making objections. The Sixth Circuit holds that even in the absence of objection, or a motion for a mistrial, this type of judicial misconduct requires reversing the conviction and granting a new trial.

The judge’s repeated rebukes of defense counsel, both in front of the jury, and outside their presence, resulted in an unfair trial. In this case, the negative comments directed by the trial judge to the defense counsel (and on some occasions to the defendant herself, when she was testifying) warranted reversal because they revealed such a high degree of favoritism and antagonism as to make fair judgment impossible.
JUROR MISCONDUCT / EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE / ISSUES DURING DELIBERATIONS

Generally, cases involving ex parte communications between the court and a deliberating jury are collected in the topic “Defendant’s Right to Be Present”

The Supreme Court held that where a juror during deliberations makes a clear statement that indicates he or she relied on racial stereotypes to convict a defendant, the right to a jury trial under the Sixth Amendment requires that the trial court inquire into the circumstances of the statements, the effect it had on other jurors and whether the statements had an impact on the verdict. FRE 606, which generally bars any evidence about the contents of the deliberations must yield to the constitutional right to a fair trial in this situation.

Evidence that jurors had consumed alcohol during their deliberations was not admissible to impeach their verdict. Not only was such evidence inadmissible to impeach the verdict but the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to a trial by an impartial jury was not violated.

United States v. Pagan-Romero, 894 F.3d 441 (1st Cir. 2018)
It is not proper to send a dictionary into the jury room during deliberations at the request of the jury. In this case, the judge granted the jurors’ request over the objection of trial counsel. The subsequent investigation into this error, however, revealed no prejudice.

United States v. Lanier, 870 F.3d 546 (6th Cir. 2017)
During deliberations, a juror called an assistant district attorney (a state A.D.A. who was not involved in the case) and said that there was a problem with the jury. The prosecutor told the juror she could not discuss the case and advised the juror to contact a bailiff. This encounter was not discovered until after trial. The Sixth Circuit holds that a Remmer hearing should have been held, because the contact was intentional, not incidental.

Godoy v. Spearman, 861 F.3d 956 (9th Cir. 2017)
An alternate juror provided a declaration that another juror, throughout the course of trial, repeatedly said that she was communicating with “a judge up north” and that the juror was passing on messages to other jurors about the information learned from the judge. The state trial court declined to conduct a hearing into this issue, because the declaration did not, on its face, establish prejudice. The Ninth Circuit remanded the case to the district court that was considering the habeas petition. The declaration established (if true) that there was inappropriate outside influence on the jury that was potentially prejudicial. The hearing itself (not the declaration) is the place to determine whether the state could rebut the presumption that the outside influence was actually prejudicial.

United States v. Zimny, 857 F.3d 97 (1st Cir. 2017)
The defendant, post-trial, learned that one (or perhaps more than one) juror reviewed blog posts about the case (and about how evil the defendant was) during trial. The First Circuit remanded the case to the district court for further development of the record. (See 848 F.3d 458 for the initial appeal, which instructed, “A district court judge does not have discretion to refuse to conduct any inquiry at all regarding the magnitude of the taint-producing event and the extent of the resulting prejudice if confronted with a colorable claim of juror misconduct.”). The defendant moved for bond pending appeal. 18 USC § 3143(b)(1). The district court denied the request and the defendant immediately appealed and the First Circuit reversed, holding that the issues presented were sufficient to necessitate bond pending appeal. The defendant was neither a danger to society or a flight risk (which was evidenced by the district court’s willingness to allow him to self-surrender after sentencing). The First Circuit held that the facts relating to the jury misconduct were sufficient to satisfy the “substantial question of fact” prong and the “likelihood of reversal if facts were proven” prong of the bond pending appeal statute.

Tarango v. McDaniel, 837 F.3d 936 (9th Cir. 2016)

After the jury convicted the defendant, a juror wrote to the judge and the defense attorney advising them that during the second day of deliberations, a police squad car followed him for several miles and this unnerved him and caused him to change his vote to guilty. The trial court failed to conduct an adequate hearing to determine whether this conduct occurred and whether it tainted the verdict. The state trial court only inquired into whether this amounted to a “communication” but failed to inquire into whether it was an impermissible “contact” that was prejudicial. See Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363 (1966).

United States v. Mix, 791 F.3d 603 (5th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with obstruction of justice in connection with his role in the Deepwater Horizon investigation. In a separate case, other defendants were charged with similar offenses. One juror, on an elevator during the trial, overheard people talking about the other people who were charged with similar offenses. During deliberations, this juror reported to the other jurors that she heard something in the elevator that this “gave her comfort in voting guilty.” The other jurors told her not to reveal what she heard. When this was learned after trial, the defendant filed a motion for new trial. The district court, based on the juror’s acknowledgment that she heard this comment in the elevator (though she denied that this influenced her) granted a new trial. Even though the juror did not reveal the information to the other jurors, she “vouched” for the guilty verdict based on information that was extraneous to the evidence at trial. The Fifth Circuit affirmed.

United States v. Parse, 789 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2015)

During voir dire, a juror hid the fact that she was a disbarred attorney, an alcoholic and that she had a criminal record. There was some evidence that the defense attorneys were aware of these facts at some point during the trial and did not alert the court to their discovery. Nevertheless, the Second Circuit reversed the defendant’s conviction.

United States v. Miller, 738 F.3d 361 (D.C. Cir. 2013)

The trial court’s response to certain jury notes that questioned the evidence amounted to an improper interference in the jury’s deliberations. The judge confirmed for the jury, in response to one note from the jury that a certain wiretap call related to a specific count. Eliminating confusion is not the proper role of the judge during the deliberations. In response to other notes, the judge directed the jury to evidence supporting the charge about which the jury inquired. The responses to the jury questions also confirmed that the indictment had a specific scope, but once the case is submitted to the jury, it is up to the jury to decide whether the prosecution had met its burden of proof. The D.C. Circuit reversed all counts to which these jury notes related.

_Hurst v. Joyner_, 757 F.3d 389 (4th Cir. 2014)

During this death penalty trial, one juror went home during deliberations and discussed the difficulty of reaching a sentencing decision. Her father gave her the passage in the Bible that refers to “an eye for an eye”. The state court concluded that relief was not required. The Fourth Circuit holds that the state court failed to properly apply the presumption of prejudice required by _Remmer_ and remanded for a hearing on prejudice.

_Barnes v. Joyner_, 751 F.3d 229 (4th Cir. 2014)

During the deliberations in the state death penalty case, one juror brought a Bible into the jury room and another juror announced that she had consulted with her pastor. The pastor apparently explained that returning a death sentence would not be a sin. The juror shared the passage from the Bible that the pastor recommended. The Fourth Circuit held that this outside influence required further evidentiary hearings to determine whether there was actual prejudice.

_United States v. Haynes_, 729 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2013)

The trial judge erred in failing to inquire whether there were premature deliberations and the possibility that the jurors rejected the presumption of innocence when it was learned that a couple jurors had discussed prior to the commencement of deliberations the fact that the defendant was guilty because she was being tried.

_Hall v. Zenk_, 692 F.3d 793 (7th Cir. 2012)

The _Remmer_ presumption of prejudice when an outside source of information invades the jury is clearly established constitutional law and the state court’s failure to apply the presumption required that a remand was required to allow the state to show an absence of prejudice. _Remmer v. United States_, 347 U.S. 227 (1954).

_United States v. Lawson_, 677 F.3d 629 (4th Cir. 2012)

During deliberations, a juror consulted Wikipedia and looked up the term “sponsorship” that was at the heart of the criminal prosecution in this case. She shared with the other jurors the definition. The Fourth Circuit held that the conviction had to be reversed, because the government could not overcome the presumption of prejudice. The court’s opinion includes a lengthy discussion of the scope of permissible testimony of jurors under Rule 606(b) and the burden on the government to establish a lack of prejudice, as well as the presumption of prejudice.

_United States v. Blitch_, 622 F.3d 658 (7th Cir. 2010)
During the course of jury selection, jurors became concerned for their safety. The judge declined the defense request to question the jurors individually, but simply advised the jurors as a group not to be concerned for their safety. This was insufficient and the conviction was reversed. The trial court must do more than the judge did in this case to ensure a fair jury which does not start a trial with fear of the defendants.

_Ward v. Hall_, 592 F.3d 1144 (11th Cir. 2010)

The Eleventh Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus, setting aside a death sentence, where the petitioner established that during the penalty phase deliberations, two jurors asked a bailiff whether a sentence of life without parole was an available sentence. (At that time, such a sentence was not available in Georgia). The bailiff responded that only life and death were available. Had the bailiff passed the message on to the judge and the judge responded, the proper response would have included the admonition that “life means life” and the jury should not consider the possibility of parole. Because the bailiff provided inaccurate (or incomplete) advice, the inappropriate contact was not harmless and the death sentence was vacated.

_United States v. Villar_, 586 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 2009)

A judge who learns of possible juror prejudice in the jury room (racial prejudice, for example), is not powerless to conduct an inquiry. Though Rule 606(b) does not allow questioning of the jury to impeach the verdict, the judge may inquire – assuming there is a sufficient foundation for doing so – whether ethnically biased statements were made during deliberations and, if so, whether these comments affected the outcome of the trial. The authority to conduct such an inquiry is based on the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause and the Sixth Amendment right to a trial by an impartial jury.

_United States v. Bristol-Martir_, 570 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2009)

During jury deliberations, it was learned that a juror had gone home at night and done research on the Internet regarding the terms “possession with intent to distribute” and other terms in the case. The judge questioned the juror about this conduct and also talked to the foreman. However, the judge failed to interview all the other jurors (as a group, or individually) to determine whether they were influenced by what the errant juror had done, or said during the deliberations. The trial court abused its discretion in the manner in which it investigated the misconduct. A new trial was required.

_United States v. Villar_, 586 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 2009)

If there is information that indicates that during jury deliberations the jury relied on racial bias, Rule 606(b) does not prevent the court from making inquiry to determine if racial bias placed a part in the deliberations and verdict.

_Oliver v. Quarterman_, 541 F.3d 329 (5th Cir. 2008)

A Bible in the jury room during deliberations. The Fifth Circuit explores the various cases that have considered this issue, and concludes that it violates the Sixth Amendment, but then finds harmless error, because the state court concluded that it was not prejudicial and the habeas petitioner could not rebut this factual finding.
United States v. Vasquez-Ruiz, 502 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2007)

Jurors took notes in notebooks during the course of trial. During trial, someone (other than the juror) wrote “GUILTY” in one of the jurors’ notebooks. She complained that she found this intimidating. The government failed to establish that this was not prejudicial.

United States v. Simtob, 485 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2007)

On the second day of trial, a juror reported to the court that the defendant had been “eye-balling” the juror and the juror felt uncomfortable. The defendant asked that the juror be questioned about this feeling of intimidation, but the judge refused. This rendered the trial unfair and the conviction was vacated, though the appellate court remanded the case to the trial court to determine whether an interview of the juror at this time would enable the court to determine whether there actually was any prejudice, or sharing of information from this juror to the other jurors.

United States v. Vitale, 459 F.3d 190 (2d Cir. 2006)

After trial, it was learned that the husband of one of the jurors worked with the prosecutor’s husband. Though there was no reason to suspect any inappropriate contact, the proper course of action to take in this situation is to conduct a hearing to determine the circumstances. Among other questions is why the prosecutor did not say anything, when, during voir dire, the juror stated that both she and her husband worked at the same place where the prosecutor’s husband worked.

United States v. Rosenthal, 454 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 2006)

During deliberations, a juror called a lawyer friend to ask advice. The lawyer responded that the juror should follow the court’s instructions, explaining that she could get into trouble if she did not. The Ninth Circuit held that this outside influence tainted the verdict. Learning that she “faced trouble” for a particular conclusion was an improper influence on the jurors’ deliberations. A juror who fears retribution might change his or her determination of the issue for fear of being punished.

Conaway v. Polk, 453 F.3d 567 (4th Cir. 2006)

A juror who sat on this case was a cousin of a co-defendant who testified for the state. The habeas court should have conducted a further inquiry into this claim to determine whether an honest answer to the voir dire would have resulted in a challenge for cause.

Brooks v. Dretke, 444 F.3d 328 (5th Cir. 2006) on rehearing from 418 F.3d 430.

The Fifth Circuit re-affirmed its earlier decision holding that the arrest of a juror, mid-trial, on weapons charges (i.e., coming into the courthouse with a gun), required that the sentencing phase of this death penalty case be retried.

Wisehart v. Davis, 408 F.3d 321 (7th Cir. 2005)

A juror provided an affidavit decades after trial that she learned that the trial was delayed one day because the defendant was taking a polygraph. She did not hear what the results were. This affidavit from the juror should have prompted a hearing to determine what else she heard. See Remmer v. United States, 347 U.S. 227 (1954).
During deliberations, two day planners authored by the kidnapping/murder victim were inadvertently sent into the jury room (only two pages of the day planner had been admitted in evidence). This was prejudicial and required setting aside the conviction.

The defendant was tried for a highly-publicized murder. Jury selection lasted several days. Towards the end of the process, a juror revealed that all the prospective jurors were talking about the case while awaiting their turn to be voir dired. The trial court took inadequate steps to determine if these discussions had poisoned the jury and the Seventh Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus: “The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment entitles a state criminal defendant to an impartial jury, Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719 (1992), which is to say a jury that determines guilt on the basis of the judge’s instructions and the evidence introduced at trial, as distinct from preconceptions or other extraneous sources of decision. . . In addition, due process requires the trial judge, if he becomes aware of a possible source of bias, to determine the circumstances, the impact thereof upon the juror, and whether or not it was prejudicial.” Remmer v. United States, 347 U.S. 227 (1954); Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209 (1982). The court noted, but held that it was not determinative, that the defendant did not move for a change of venue, though one would have been granted if requested.

During the trial, the lead detective talked to three jurors during a lunch break. The conversation lasted about twenty minutes and addressed his heavy work load, baseball, exercise and other matters unrelated to the evidence in the case. The detective’s testimony at trial was central to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The Ninth Circuit held that the state failed to overcome the presumption of prejudice. Mattox v. United States, 146 U.S. 140 (1892); Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466 (1965). Where there is a de minimis contact between a juror and a witness, the defendant must demonstrate that the contact could have influenced the verdict. But where the communication is possibly prejudicial, not de minimis, the prosecution must overcome a presumption of prejudice with a showing that there is no reasonable possibility that the communication will influence the verdict. Whether the communication related to the evidence is only one factor to consider. The length of time that the contact lasted is another factor; so is the identity and role at trial of the parties involved; the possibility of eliminating the prejudice through a limiting instruction; and evidence of actual impact.

During the defendant’s tax evasion trial, several IRS agents sat behind the prosecution table. Post-trial interviews with jurors indicated that some of them felt intimidated by the agents. The lower court held that the defendant had to prove that the government acted with the intent to intimidate the jurors. The Ninth Circuit, however, held that the defendant was only required to prove a prejudicial impact on the jury; the defendant was not required to prove that this was the government’s intent. A remand for further development of the record was required. The defendant should be permitted to introduce evidence regarding the jurors’ perceptions of the agents’ conduct and any discussions among the jurors concerning the possibility of IRS retaliation if they voted to acquit.

Sanders v. Lamarque, 357 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 2004)

Though the state trial judge did not intend to elicit the numerical division from the deliberating jurors, the colloquy with individual jurors unmistakably conveyed the information that there was one hold-out: juror number 4. The judge also learned that Juror 4 was not entirely honest during voir dire – according to the state, she failed to answer correctly certain questions about her childrens’ gang affiliation and her prior residences. Actually, however, her answers were correct. Excusing this juror during deliberations was error and required granting a writ of habeas corpus.

United States v. Peters, 349 F.3d 842 (5th Cir. 2003)

During deliberations, the foreman sent out a note indicating that he was “not going to take insults and I ask to be relieved.” The parties agreed that the judge could talk to the juror in chambers alone. During the course of the meeting, however, the conversation between the court and the juror included a revelation about the current status of deliberations (11 – 1), the prospects of a mistrial (including a discussion akin to an Allen charge), and even a short explanation of the law, i.e., a substantive charge on the law. Conviction reversed.

Williams v. Price, 343 F.3d 223 (3rd Cir. 2003)

The state trial court’s refusal to consider certain post-verdict evidence relating to the overt racial hostility of certain jurors was erroneous and violated the defendant’s right to due process. The Constitutional basis for this holding is the defendant’s right to have a juror which answers questions honestly during voir dire (which, in this case, included questions dealing with racial bias). See Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107 (1987). The Third Circuit concludes that the “no impeachment of verdict by a juror” rule may be enforced. However, some of the information was recited by people to whom jurors had expressed racial hostility and other information related to extraneous information that was heard by the jurors during the deliberations.

United States v. Tucker, 137 F.3d 1016 (8th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was the Governor of Arkansas. One of the jurors failed to reveal during voir dire that the father of one of her children had sought clemency from the Governor. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to develop the facts of this claim. See generally McDonough Power Equipment, Inc. v. Greenwood, 464 U.S. 548 (1984). An evidentiary hearing was also necessary to inquire into the allegations that the juror’s husband talked to her during the course of trial.

United States v. Sylvester, 143 F.3d 923 (5th Cir. 1998)

The trial court improperly engaged in ex parte communications with jurors during its investigation of jury tampering. A couple jurors advised the judge that they had been called at home at night and one had actually been approached at his home. The judge questioned the jurors and determined that there was no prejudice and allowed the jurors to continue their service. Thereafter, the judge advised the parties of the incidents and his inquiries. This procedure violated the defendants’ rights to be present during all phases of the trial.

United States v. Keating, 147 F.3d 895 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was tried in federal court for bank fraud, securities fraud and related charges. He was previously convicted in state court for the same conduct. Following his conviction in federal court, it was determined that at least one juror, and perhaps more, knew about his state conviction (learning about it during the federal trial), and discussed it with other jurors during deliberations. The trial court properly set aside the verdict and granted a new trial. Moreover, this evidence supported vacating the co-defendant’s conviction, as well. “When a finding of guilt is dependent upon a connection between defendants, collateral information clearly prejudicial to one defendant is not harmless to the other defendant.”

Dyer v. Calderon, 151 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 1998)

In this death penalty prosecution, the jurors had been asked if they, or any family member or close relative had been the victim of any type of crime. One juror’s brother had been shot in the back of the head after being pistol-whipped. She did not respond and when later confronted with this discrepancy, she said that she thought his death was an accident, not a crime. The prosecutor in this case had also prosecuted the perpetrator in that case. The juror also did not respond to a question about relatives accused of crimes, despite the fact that her husband was prosecuted for rape, her uncle was arrested for murder and her father was arrested for kidnapping. In a bizarre twist, after the conviction and death sentence was imposed, the juror became a guard with the Department of Corrections and served as a guard on death row in San Quentin, where Dyer was being held awaiting execution. The Ninth Circuit ordered that the writ of habeas corpus be granted.

United States v. Herndon, 156 F.3d 629 (6th Cir. 1998)

During deliberations, the court learned that a juror realized that he may have had business dealings with the defendant previously. The trial court declined the defendant’s request to interview the juror and told the jurors to continue deliberating. This was error. This was an “extraneous” influence and there was no Rule 606(b) bar to questioning the juror about any influence that might have on his deliberations.

United States v. Gaston-Brito, 64 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 1995)

The defense attorney claimed that during a witness’s testimony, the case agent who was sitting at the prosecutor’s table pointed to the defendant when the witness had trouble identifying the defendant. The trial court’s failure to investigate this charge required that the conviction be reversed. Any unauthorized communication between jurors and persons associated with the case is presumptively prejudicial and obligates the court to conduct a sufficient inquiry to determine whether the communication was harmless.

United States v. Resko, 3 F.3d 684 (3rd Cir. 1993)

Jurors acknowledged during the course of trial that they had discussed the case among themselves. The trial court erred in merely asking each juror to state that he or she had not yet formed an opinion. Rather, an inquiry should have been conducted into the nature of the conversation and each juror should have been addressed individually, rather than allowing the group to submit written answers to the question regarding their ability to keep an open mind.

Keller v. Petsock, 853 F.2d 1122 (3rd Cir. 1988)

A habeas petitioner contended that a juror asked to see the judge during deliberations, but a bailiff informed them that they could not see the judge. This presents grounds for an evidentiary hearing and possibly habeas relief.

United States v. Cheek, 94 F.3d 136 (4th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was tried with a co-defendant. During the trial, the co-defendant attempted to bribe one of the jurors. This triggered a presumption of prejudice against the defendant which the government failed to rebut.

Stockton v. Virginia, 852 F.2d 740 (4th Cir. 1988)

During a recess in the defendant’s death penalty trial, a number of the jurors were approached by the owner of a restaurant who informed them that they should “fry the son-of-a-bitch.” The Fourth Circuit holds that such unauthorized conduct during jury deliberations creates a presumption of an unfair trial and absent rebuttal by the government, habeas relief is warranted.

United States v. Luffred, 911 F.2d 1011 (5th Cir. 1990)

The defendant’s conviction was reversed because the jury was permitted to bring into its deliberating room a chart reflecting the government’s theory of the case which blurred the evidence. The chart had never been admitted into evidence, but had been used as a trial aid during the government’s closing argument. Obviously, the jury considered it important because the jury specifically requested to see the chart during its deliberations.

United States v. Williams, 817 F.2d 1136 (5th Cir. 1987)

During the course of this trial, there was substantial publicity about the evidence. The trial court refused to voir dire the jury regarding the effect of the mid-trial publicity. The Court of Appeals reverses the conviction holding that mid-trial voir dire is appropriate in these circumstances.

United States v. Smith, 31 F.3d 469 (7th Cir. 1994)

During the course of trial, the jury asked to see the judge and, in private with the judge, expressed fear that their addresses were known to the defense based on a juror questionnaire which had been distributed to the lawyers. The judge ordered that these questionnaires be returned to the jurors and also instructed the jurors, in private, that there was no need to be fearful. This communication with the jury outside the presence of the defense counsel was erroneous and required reversing the conviction. The judge’s communication with the jury was more than a simple house-cleaning manner, but involved an issue which was fundamental: the dangerousness of the defendant and whether the defendant had already been adjudged by the jury to be guilty.

United States v. Smith, 26 F.3d 739 (7th Cir. 1994)

A juror indicated that she had received a “visitor” and that this caused her some concern. There was some indication that this juror communicated this fact to other jurors, before she was excused. The trial court should have inquired of other jurors whether this juror’s statement in any way affected their deliberations.
During the trial, new accounts of the guilty plea of a corporate co-defendant were read by certain jurors. After trial, questioning of the jurors revealed that some of the jurors considered this information in their deliberations. This extraneous influence on the jury’s deliberations supported the trial judge’s decision to grant a new trial.

After the defendant was convicted, a juror contacted the defense attorney and revealed that one of the other jurors had informed the jury that the defendant had a prior conviction. This was true, but there was no evidence of this prior conviction admitted at trial (in fact, any mention of it was prohibited). Further inquiry into this matter was not barred by Rule 606(b). The inquiry would not focus on the mental processes of the jurors, but on the possibility that they were tainted by information from a source outside the courtroom.

Bias must be presumed when a juror, during voir dire lies about significant and material matters. Here, the juror, in a death penalty case, failed to reveal that her brother had been the victim of a homicide and that other family members (including herself) had been victimized by crimes and had perpetrated crimes.

The defendant’s federal conviction for RICO, bank fraud and related charges was tainted by the knowledge of certain jurors – learned during the course of the trial – that the defendant had been convicted in state court for the same conduct. The jurors discussed this during deliberations.

A juror learned from sources around town that the defendant had a violent reputation. He relayed this information to the other jurors during their deliberations. Jury exposure to facts not in evidence deprives a defendant of the rights to confrontation, cross-examination and assistance of counsel embodied in the Sixth Amendment. Among the factors which the court considers in determining whether extrinsic evidence requires a new trial are the following: (1) whether the extrinsic material was actually received, and if so, how; (2) the length of time it was available to the jury; (3) the extent to which the jury discussed and considered it; (4) whether the material was introduced before a verdict was reached, and if so, at what point in the deliberations it was introduced; and (5) any other matters which may bear on the issue of whether the introduction of extrinsic material substantially and injuriously affected the verdict. Weighing each of these factors in this case resulted in a determination that a habeas writ would be granted.

After the jury returned its verdict, the parties learned that the jury had the 56-page case agent’s report in the jury room during deliberations. It was evident that the jurors had read the report. The government failed to establish that this did not prejudice the defendant. In such cases, the burden is on the defendant to prove that the extrinsic evidence was in the jury room and that the jurors were aware of the extrinsic evidence. Where the intrusion into the jury’s deliberations is by a law enforcement agent, the prejudice to the defendant is presumed. To overcome this presumption, the government must show beyond a reasonable doubt that there was no prejudice to the defendant.
\textit{United States v. Navarro-Garcia}, 926 F.2d 818 (9th Cir. 1991)

The defendant voluntarily opened her trunk at the border, revealing several hundred pounds of marijuana. She claimed that she had no idea the marijuana was in there. During a recess, a juror conducted a test to determine whether that much weight in the trunk would be noticeable to the driver. Such out-of-court experiments constitute extrinsic evidence. If such evidence affected the verdict, then a new trial would be necessary. The trial court erred in not holding an evidentiary hearing to inquire into this incident.

\textit{Marino v. Vasquez}, 812 F.2d 499 (9th Cir. 1987)

Two instances of jury misconduct lead to a reversal of the defendant’s murder conviction. First, one juror used a dictionary to ascertain the definition of “malice.” Second, a juror and a non-juror conducted an experiment with a handgun to evaluate the defendant’s theory of defense. The juror then reported back to the jury that the defense was not plausible. The jury had been out for 40 days in this case prior to the experiment leading to the juror changing his mind.

\textit{United States v. Scisum}, 32 F.3d 1479 (10th Cir. 1994)

Just before the jury returned to announce its verdict, one of the jurors told a marshal that she could not join the others in the courtroom to announce the verdict. The juror spoke privately with the judge and expressed a desire not to face the defendant with the verdict (apparently because of her dissatisfaction with the verdict, not because of fear). The judge gave the juror a Kleenex and suggested she step in the restroom. This was an improper \textit{ex parte} communication with a juror which required that the conviction be reversed. Among other problems was the failure of the trial judge to alert the attorneys that this communication had occurred so a hearing could be conducted to determine if there was any prejudice. At a minimum, counsel should have been notified immediately that the juror was in distress and a hearing could have been held to question the juror about her problem.

\textit{Burton v. Johnson}, 948 F.2d 1150 (10th Cir. 1991)

Defendant was charged in state court with killing her husband. She defended on the basis of the battered wife syndrome. A juror was the victim of spouse abuse, but failed honestly to answer specific questions about this during \textit{voir dire}. The juror lied about her background even during the new trial motion. This was a basis for federal \textit{habeas} relief. This juror was clearly dishonest about a material matter which affected the defendant’s choice of peremptory strikes. The reason that the juror did not answer these questions was because the \textit{voir dire} was conducted in open court, and was not sequestered, as requested by defense counsel.

\textit{United States v. Martinez}, 14 F.3d 543 (11th Cir. 1994)

During the deliberations, a juror read a newspaper article about the case and reported to the other jurors about the possible sentence of the defendant, as compared to the informants. What followed was a lengthy interrogation of all the jurors, inquiring into what the jurors heard and what they would consider and put out of their minds. Certain jurors were removed and alternates were added. Prejudice is presumed whenever there is extrinsic contact with the jury. In this case, the government failed to overcome this prejudice.

\textit{United States v. Heller}, 785 F.2d 1524 (11th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was convicted of tax evasion. During the course of deliberations, one juror advised the court that a number of religious slurs were being used during the deliberations. The jurors were questioned and assured the court that they would not let these prejudicial comments influence their deliberations. It was also learned that one of the jurors had contacted an accountant to ask questions about the defense offered by the defendant. The Eleventh Circuit reverses the conviction, Judge Tuttle noting that “the religious prejudice displayed by the jurors was shocking to the conscience and damaging to the public confidence in our system of justice.”

A juror lied during voir dire, failing to reveal that he had a felony conviction. A post-trial hearing was held to determine if “actual bias” justified granting a new trial. At the hearing, the lower court committed two errors: first, the court erred in refusing to permit the defense attorney to question the juror. Moreover, the judge only asked the juror two very general questions about his bias and this was not a sufficient inquiry into the juror’s potential bias. The juror’s possible desire to help the government, to prove that he was rehabilitated was not questioned; his vote of guilty may have been prompted by his desire to continue to hide his ex-con status. Finally, it was error to refuse, at counsel’s request, to question the juror about whether his felony status was revealed to other jurors during deliberations. Rule 606(b) did not bar this question from being asked.
JURY
(Alternates)

The trial court erred in allowing alternates to sit in during the jury’s deliberations without obtaining the defendant’s consent to this procedure. The consent of the defendant’s counsel is not sufficient. However, contrary to the Ninth Circuit’s decision, the Court held that the error was not plain error requiring reversal of the conviction. The defendants were unable to show prejudice from the alternates’ presence in the jury room.

United States v. Mendoza, 510 F.3d 749 (7th Cir. 2007)
Rule 24 does not permit the trial judge to choose alternates from among a jury of fourteen people who heard the evidence. The alternates must be designated at the time of jury selection and must be chosen sequentially from the jury pool after the jurors are chosen.

United States v. Delgado, 350 F.3d 520 (6th Cir. 2003)
The trial court’s method of choosing a jury was not permitted by the federal rules. The judge required the attorneys to exercise all their strikes resulting in a jury of 14 jurors. Then, just prior to deliberations, the two alternates were chosen. This random designation of alternates violates Rule 24.

United States v. Beard, 161 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 1998)
Just before deliberations began, the judge became aware of discord between two jurors. After deliberations began and the alternates were discharged, the two jurors’ animosity increased and the judge decided to excuse them both. This was an acceptable procedure. However, the trial court erred in substituting in two alternates. Even though the judge instructed the jury to begin deliberations again and select a foreman again, Rule 24(c) only allows the substitution of alternates if the defendant consents.

United States v. Acevedo, 141 F.3d 1421 (11th Cir. 1998)
Through oversight, the alternates were permitted to retire to the jury room with the jury and actually deliberated with them. After one hour of deliberations, all 14 jurors reached a unanimous verdict of guilty – one of the alternates served as the foreman. When the verdict form was returned and the judge realized what had happened, he required the 12 actual jurors to begin their deliberations again, which they did, returning a verdict in five minutes. The Eleventh Circuit affirmed the conviction. Though there was manifest error, it did not prejudice the final verdict of the jury.

United States v. Bendek, 146 F.3d 1326 (11th Cir. 1998)
The defendants, the prosecutor and the judge all agreed that the jury would begin deliberating with 13 jurors (the 12 jurors plus the alternate) because of the necessity of one of the jurors leaving the next day. The plan envisioned the jury deliberating with 13 jurors and if all 13 agreed on a verdict, that would conclude the case on the first day of deliberations. If, however, the deliberations lasted longer, the juror who was required to leave would be permitted to leave 1085 and that would leave 12 jurors. Because all parties agreed with this procedure, there was no basis for setting aside the conviction (which occurred on the first day, with all 13 jurors voting to convict).

United States v. Ottersburg, 76 F.3d 137 (7th Cir. 1996)

Two alternates were permitted to deliberate with the jury and were actually asked to sign the verdict form. Even under the standard of United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725 (1993), this constituted plain error, necessitating reversal of the conviction, even though the defendant never objected.

United States v. Ullah, 976 F.2d 509 (9th Cir. 1992)

A trial judge may not permit a non-unanimous verdict, even in exceptional circumstances, and even if the defendant acquiesces. Moreover, it is reversible error to permit alternates to participate in the deliberations.

Just prior to the commencement of deliberations, the judge asked the jury if there was any juror who was sick, or otherwise unable to continue. One juror indicated that she had to teach a course in Boise, Idaho and was leaving Monday night (this was Thursday afternoon). Without further inquiry, the district judge excused the juror and replaced her with an alternate. This was error. Pursuant to Rule 24(c), a juror may be excused only if there is a finding that a juror is unable or disqualified to perform her duties. The court made no findings that the juror was unable or disqualified.
JURY
(Anonymous Jury)

United States v. Wecht, 537 F.3d 222 (3rd Cir. 2008)

A lengthy decision that explores the extent to which a trial judge, in a highly publicized case, may restrict public (i.e., media) and defense counsel access, to jurors’ names. The Third Circuit concludes that the trial judge’s order restricting access was improper.

United States v. Mansoori, 304 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2002)

The Seventh Circuit concluded that empanelling an anonymous jury was not appropriate in this street gang prosecution. There was no showing that the defendants had intimidated witnesses in the past or otherwise obstructed justice. Harmless error.

United States v. Edwards, 303 F.3d 606 (5th Cir. 2002)

Empanelling an anonymous jury was appropriate in this extortion case, even though there was no organized crime involved. The overriding concern in this case was extensive publicity.
JURY
(Eleven-Member Jury)

During deliberations, a juror indicated that he was fearful that he would lose a job opportunity if he were not available for work the next week. Deliberations had been going on for several days at that point. The judge eventually excused the juror, even though it appeared that he would remain available for at least a few more days and a call from the court to the employer could also have alleviated the problem. Releasing the juror over the defendant’s objection was reversible error.

United States v. Curbelo, 343 F.3d 273 (4th Cir. 2003)

On the first day of trial, a juror became ill and the district court, over the objection of the defendant, proceeded with an eleven member jury. The Fourth Circuit held that this violation of Rule 23(b) (as it then existed) constituted structural error that necessitated reversing the conviction.

United States v. Spence, 163 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 1998)

The decision to remove a juror and proceed with eleven jurors should not be made until it is determined that the juror who is being excused is, in fact, not able to continue. In this case a juror became sick during deliberations, but no effort was made to determine if she would be available to continue the next day. The failure to make sufficient inquiry resulted in an inability to determine if there was “just cause” for the removal of the juror and the conviction was reversed.
JURY
(Evidence in Jury Room)

United States v. Lee, 573 F.3d 155 (3rd Cir. 2009)
The jury was given a document that was not admitted in evidence and which virtually eviscerated his defense. An instruction that admonished the jury not to consider the document was not adequate to eliminate the prejudice. The jury could not ignore the elephant in the jury room.

Eslaminia v. White, 136 F.3d 1234 (9th Cir. 1998)
The jury was given a tape of the defendant's statement to the police. Unbeknownst to the trial's participants – but learned by the jury – the other side of the tape contained a taped statement of the defendant's brother that supported the theory of the prosecution. This statement, needless to say, had not been introduced at trial. The Ninth Circuit ordered that a writ of habeas corpus be granted.

United States v. Cunningham, 145 F.3d 1385 (D.C. Cir. 1998)
The government offered into evidence the portion of a 911 tape that recorded the contemporaneous statements of a witness to a shootout. When the tape was given to the jury, however, inadvertently, the statements of eight other people who called 911 to report the incident were also included. Including this in the evidence supplied to the jury during their deliberations violated the Confrontation Clause. With regard to the relevant counts of the indictment, this was not harmless error.

United States v. Lampkin, 159 F.3d 607 (D.C. Cir. 1998)
A portion of a witness’s videotaped statement was introduced to rehabilitate the witness. During deliberations, the jury asked for the videotape, which included portions that were not presented in court. Providing the videotape to the jury during deliberations was reversible error.

United States v. Luffred, 911 F.2d 1011 (5th Cir. 1990)
The defendant’s conviction was reversed because the jury was permitted to bring into its deliberating room a chart reflecting the government’s theory of the case which blurred the evidence. The chart had never been admitted into evidence, but had been used as a trial aid during the government’s closing argument. Obviously, the jury considered it important because the jury specifically requested to see the chart during its deliberations.

United States v. Greene, 834 F.2d 86 (4th Cir. 1987)
Documents which had not been admitted into evidence were inadvertently sent to the jury room during deliberations. These documents indicated in this false claims prosecution that the defendant had made claims over $900,000 and received checks totaling $700,000. This constitutes reversible error.

United States v. Berry, 92 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 1996)
Unbeknownst to the judge and the parties, a disputed transcript of a conversation was submitted to the jury during their deliberations. Because this transcript was disputed and was not introduced in evidence – even though it was given to the jury when the tape was played during the trial – providing this to the jury was prejudicial and necessitated reversing the conviction.

United States v. Noushfar, 78 F.3d 1442 (9th Cir. 1996)

During deliberations, the jury was given a number of tapes that had been recorded during the undercover operation, but that were not played during the trial. This was reversible error.

United States v. Harber, 53 F.3d 236 (9th Cir. 1995)

After the jury returned its verdict, the parties learned that the jury had the 56-page case agent’s report in the jury room during deliberations. It was evident that the jurors had read the report. The government failed to establish that this did not prejudice the defendant. In such cases, the burden is on the defendant to prove that the extrinsic evidence was in the jury room and that the jurors were aware of the extrinsic evidence. Where the intrusion into the jury’s deliberations is by a law enforcement agent, the prejudice to the defendant is presumed. To overcome this presumption, the government must show beyond a reasonable doubt that there was no prejudice to the defendant.

United States v. Brown, 832 F.2d 128 (9th Cir. 1987)

During deliberations, the jury was given a tape recording of events which occurred in the courtroom during the time that the defendant allegedly committed the contempt for which he was on trial. It was error to permit this tape to be replayed during deliberations in the absence of the defendants, defense counsel and judge. The error was not shown to be harmless beyond a reasonable doubt.
JURY
(Fair Cross Section)

The Supreme Court reversed the decision of the Sixth Circuit which had granted habeas relief based on the petitioner’s fair cross section claim. The Sixth Circuit had held that various factors contributed to a systematic exclusion of minority jurors. The Supreme Court, however, using the AEDPA standard, held that the state court’s decision regarding the fair cross section claim was not unreasonable, given the lack of clarity in the Supreme Court precedent about the methods by which fair cross section claims should be evaluated. The method and standards which governed the local jurisdiction’s decision to excuse jurors for cause, for example, does not necessarily support a fair cross section claim, even if statistical evidence establishes an effect on the minority representation in the jury pool.

Garcia-Dorantes v. Warren, 801 F.3d 584 (6th Cir. 2015)

As a result of a computer “glitch” minorities were systematically excluded from the jury lists for nearly a year. The Sixth Circuit concludes that the defendant established that he was prejudiced by this denial of the right to a fair cross section of the community on his jury pool.

United States v. Hernandez-Estrada, 749 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 2014)(en banc)

The Ninth Circuit in this en banc decision holds that the “absolute disparity” method of proving a “fair cross section” claim is not the only method. Other methods of proving the lack of a fair cross-section must be considered by the court if offered by one of the parties, including statistical analyses. The absolute disparity method can lead to somewhat absurd results: for example, if a distinctive group comprised 90% of the population, but only 80% of the jury pool, this would be deemed unconstitutional under the absolute disparity analysis.

United States v. Stanko, 528 F.3d 581 (8th Cir. 2008)

The defendant moved to have the jury lists – both the grand jury list and the petit jury list and information used to formulate these lists – provided to him prior to trial. The trial court denied the motion, because the defendant showed no particularized need for these records. This was error. Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1867(f), a litigant has an unqualified right to have this information in order to pursue a jury challenge.

United States v. Rodriguez-Lara, 421 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2005)

In raising a fair cross section claim, the defendant is only required, initially, to demonstrate a disparity between a cognizable group’s representation in the jury wheel and the group’s population in the district. It is not necessary (though it is preferable) to compare the group’s representation in the wheel, with the jury-eligible population in the district. See generally Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977); Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357 (1979). As discussed above this case was OVERRULED in United States v. Hernandez-Estrada, 749 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir 2014).

United States v. Ovalle, 136 F.3d 1092 (6th Cir. 1998)
In order to eliminate disparities in the petit jury pool, the district court randomly eliminated one out of every five non-African Americans from the jury pool. The Sixth Circuit concluded that this violated the Jury Selection and Service Act, as well as the Fifth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause.
Brewster v. Hetzel, 913 F.3d 1042 (11th Cir. 2019)

After receiving three notes that the jury was deadlocked (the last two notes stating that the deadlock was 11-1 for conviction), the judge repeatedly told the jury to continue its deliberations. When told that the holdout was doing crossword puzzles, the judge ordered all reading material removed from the jury room. The judge also issued an Allen charge. The defense lawyers voiced no objection and did not request a mistrial. The lawyers provided ineffective assistance of counsel and the trial judge improperly coerced a verdict. A write of habeas corpus was granted.

United States v. Wecht, 541 F.3d 493 (3rd Cir. 2008)

The trial court consulted with the attorneys shortly after the jury sent in a note that the deliberations were deadlocked. However, a couple days later, when the judge declared a mistrial based on the jury’s inability to reach a verdict, he did not consult with the attorneys. Rule 26.3 provides that before granting a mistrial, the court must give each defendant and the government an opportunity to comment on the propriety of granting a mistrial. In this case, the Third Circuit held that the “before” language in the Rule does not mean “days before” but means shortly before.
JURY
(PARTIAL VERDICT)

United States v. Moore, 763 F.3d 900 (7th Cir. 2014)

This case contains a discussion of the propriety of accepting a partial verdict when the jury announces that it has reached a verdict on some, but not all counts. In this case, accepting a partial verdict was error. Count One charged carjacking and Count Two charged that the defendant committed a § 924(c) violation during the commission of the Count One offense. The jury informed the court that it had not reached a verdict on Count One, but did reach a verdict on Count Two. Though inconsistent verdicts may be reached, in this situation, it was not appropriate to accept a partial verdict where the jury did not announce that it was deadlocked.
JURY

(QUESTIONING WITNESSES)

United States v. Sykes, 614 F.3d 303 (7th Cir. 2010)

When jurors are permitted to question a witness, it should be done in writing so a witness does not inadvertently answer a question that should not have been asked. In this case, the court permitted the jury to engage in a free-wheeling “discussion” with the witnesses, but the defendant did not object, so the error was not preserved.
JURY
(Removal of Juror During Deliberations)

Williams v. Cavazos, 646 F.3d 626 (9th Cir. 2011)

In deciding whether to discharge a juror mid-deliberation, the critical Sixth Amendment questions are whether, after an appropriately limited inquiry, it can be said that there is no reasonable possibility that the jury’s discharge stems from his views of the merits, and whether the grounds on which the trial court relied are valid and constitutional. In this case, the state trial judge removed a deliberating juror without adherence to these principles, because the juror who was removed was not shown to have been unable or unwilling to deliberate – he just stated that he was uncomfortable with the sufficiency of the evidence. In addition to other precedents, the Ninth Circuit cited Twelve Angry Men. See also United States v. Symington, 195 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 1999). CERT GRANTED 1/13/12 and the Supreme Court reversed on AEDPA deference grounds. 133 S. Ct. 1088 (2013).
JURY
(Replaying Testimony – Questions During Deliberations)

See also: Jury Instructions (Re-Charge)

United States v. Martinez, 850 F.3d 1097 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with unlawful re-entry. One issue that had to be decided unanimously by the jury was the date of his prior removal. A special verdict form required the jury to answer whether the defendant’s prior removal occurred after a specific date. The jury sent in a note during deliberations asking what the significance of his question was. The judge, without telling counsel, answered, “It is a matter for the court to consider, not the jury. The jury has to consider whether the defendant was deported or removed after that date.” Shortly thereafter the jury returned a verdict. The Ninth Circuit reversed. Answering the question without advising the attorneys or the defendant was erroneous. Proceeding in the absence of the defendant violated Rule 43(a).

Trial counsel would have insisted that the judge advise the jury that the response to the question required the jury to believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the removal occurred after a specific date.

United States v. Miller, 738 F.3d 361 (D.C. Cir. 2013)

During deliberations, the jury asked several questions about the relationship of certain evidence to certain counts (e.g., “does the phone call on a certain date apply to a certain count of the indictment?”). The judge answered the questions. This amounted to improper commenting on the evidence and required that the conviction be reversed.

United States v. Evanston, 651 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2011)

Though the procedure is allowed in some state courts, the Ninth Circuit holds that in federal court, it is not appropriate to allow the prosecution and the defense to provide a supplement argument to a deliberating jury in response to a question from the jury that has announced that it is deadlocked.

United States v. Newhoff, 627 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir. 2010)

Consistent with the decision in Richard annotated below, the Ninth Circuit held that when the jury expresses an interest in hearing the testimony of a witness again, this should be done in open court with the parties present; the entire testimony should be re-played; and the court should admonish the jury not to place undue emphasis on the testimony of one witness. The trial court erred in this case, but it was not plain error.

United States v. Ofray-Campos, 534 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2008)

During the deliberations, the jury asked if the cooperating witnesses who testified were in jail for the same conspiracy, to which the judge responded “yes.” This was improper, because no evidence of the witnesses’s status was introduced in evidence and adding this evidence during the deliberations was impermissible. Harmless error as to some defendants, reversible error as to others.

United States v. Richard, 504 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir. 2007)
The trial court abused its discretion when only a portion of a witness’s testimony was replayed for the jury during deliberations without cautioning the jury not to emphasize that portion of the testimony. Generally, when the jury wants to hear the testimony of a witness, all the testimony should be replayed – direct and cross-examination.

United States v. Ayeni, 374 F.3d 1313 (D. C. Cir. 2004)

During deliberations, the jury asked a factual question about the evidence. The trial judge decided to allow both the defense and the government to argue for ten additional minutes. This was reversible error.

United States v. Sabetta, 373 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004)

During deliberations, the jury indicated that it had a question. The jury was brought back to the courtroom and a note was handed to the judge. The note asked for the definition of certain terms in the instructions. Prior to consulting with counsel, the judge answered the questions. This was improper. Prior to answering a jury’s question, counsel should be consulted. Harmless error.

United States v. Barragan-Devis, 133 F.3d 1287 (9th Cir. 1998)

When the jury sends a note to the judge during deliberations, it should be answered in open court and the attorneys should be given an opportunity to be heard before the trial judge responds. In this case, the jury sent a lengthy note to the judge, but the judge did not show it to the attorneys, and did not respond. This was improper, but harmless error.

United States v. Duran, 133 F.3d 1324 (10th Cir. 1998)

The trial court failed to instruct the jury in connection with the entrapment instruction that the government had the burden of disproving entrapment. That is, in order to convict the defendant who raises an entrapment defense, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was predisposed to commit the crime. The failure to instruct the jury on this principle was plain error requiring reversal of the conviction. The trial court also erred in failing to adequately answer jury questions about the status of "agents" (such as non-government employees who were acting as informants) in connection with the entrapment defense. The jury repeatedly asked if certain informants who were acting on behalf of the government were "agents" within the definition of the entrapment defense. Failing to answer these questions was reversible error.

United States v. Sylvester, 143 F.3d 923 (5th Cir. 1998)

Prior to answering a question from the jury during deliberations, the trial court should consult with counsel about the proper response.

United States v. Rivera-Santiago, 107 F.3d 960 (1st Cir. 1997)

The jury asked a question about the facts which were established at trial. The judge directed the court reporter to read back a portion of the witness’s testimony, though there was contradictory evidence from this witness, as well as other evidence inconsistent with this testimony. The jury did not ask to have certain testimony read back, as opposed to getting the answer to certain factual questions. Providing this “answer” was reversible error.
United States v. Argentine, 814 F.2d 783 (1st Cir. 1987)

The jury asked for certain testimony to be replayed. The judge, rather than replaying the testimony itself, summarized the testimony. The Court of Appeals reverses, holding that the trial judge’s response gave the appearance that the judge certified the testimony as true and impermissibly trespassed upon the jury’s fact-finding prerogative.

United States v. Arboleda, 20 F.3d 58 (2d Cir. 1994)

During deliberations, on the same day that closing arguments were given, the jury asked to have the prosecutor’s final argument read back to them. Shortly thereafter, the jury convicted each of the defendants. This was reversible error. While the prosecutor gets the last word, he does not get the last word twice.

United States v. Criollo, 962 F.2d 241 (2d Cir. 1992)

During the defendant’s closing argument, the trial judge announced that there would be no “read-backs” of trial testimony. This blanket prohibition on read backs was erroneous and required reversal – even though the jury never requested a read-back. In the Second Circuit, read-backs are preferred.

United States v. Rodgers, 109 F.3d 1138 (6th Cir. 1997)

When the jury requests a portion of the trial transcript during deliberations, if the court provides a transcript to the jury, it should caution the jury to rely principally on its memory and to weigh all the evidence in making its decision, and not focus just on one portion of the trial. The failure to admonish the jury in this case was not plain error.

United States v. Hernandez, 27 F.3d 1403 (9th Cir. 1994)

Providing to the jury during their deliberations the transcribed portion of one witness’s testimony was reversible error. The trial court failed to caution the jury to weigh all the evidence and failed to warn that the transcript was not authoritative. Even though both direct and cross-examination were provided, this was not a sufficient protection. Counsel must be given an opportunity to review the transcript to ensure its accuracy and to ensure that all bench conferences are deleted.
JURY
(Right To Jury Trial)

A defendant who is prosecuted in a single proceeding for multiple petty offenses does not have a Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial, even where the aggregate prison term authorized for the offenses exceeds six months.

Under Nevada law, a DUI is punishable with a prison term of between two days and six months imprisonment. The Supreme Court holds that this offense does not require trial by jury. The fact that the defendant can also be sentenced to a license suspension, 48 hours of community service, a $1,000 fine and that the prison term carries a mandatory minimum even for First Offenders, does not change the analysis. This constitutes a petty offense and the Sixth Amendment does not guarantee a jury for the resolution of such cases.

United States v. Salazar, 751 F.3d 326 (5th Cir. 2014)
The defendant testified and confessed. The trial judge instructed the jury to retire and deliberate and return a guilty verdict. This violated the Sixth Amendment. The trial court may not direct a verdict of guilty. The government’s suggestion that this was harmless error was rejected.

United States v. Kimsey, 668 F.3d 691 (9th Cir. 2012)
The trial court erred in denying the defendant the right to a jury trial in a prosecution for contempt of court under 18 USC § 402. See 18 U.S.C. § 3691. The defendant was accused of ghost-writing pleadings in a civil case, though he was not a lawyer. The government alleged that this violated the Rules of the court that adopted state criminal offenses.

United States v. Mendez, 102 F.3d 126 (5th Cir. 1996)
Though defendant’s counsel waived a jury trial (the central issue was whether the evidence would be suppressed), the defendant himself never waived his right to a jury trial pursuant to Rule 23(a). The only exception to the requirement that a waiver be in a written format is the attorney expressly waives the right to a jury trial and the defendant acquiesces to the waiver through silence as the bench trial is being conducted. Here, however, the defendant was an uneducated Colombian who was not aware of his right to a jury trial.

United States v. Duarte-Higareda, 113 F.3d 1000 (9th Cir. 1997)
The non-English speaking defendant’s trial was conducted as a bench trial. The Ninth Circuit holds that where the defendant is non-English speaking, an on-the-record colloquy is necessary to determine if the defendant is knowingly, and voluntarily waiving his right to a jury trial.

United States v. Christensen, 18 F.3d 822 (9th Cir. 1994)
Criminal defendants may waive their constitutional right to a jury trial if the waiver is made in writing and has the approval of the government and of the court. Fed.R.Crim.P. 23(a).
Furthermore, the defendant must be competent to waive the jury right, and the waiver must in fact be voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The better practice in assessing a defendant’s waiver is for the defendant to be told that, (1) twelve members of the community compose a jury; (2) the defendant may take part in jury selection; (3) jury verdicts must be unanimous; (4) the court alone decides guilt or innocence if the defendant waives a jury trial. Though these warnings are not absolutely essential, here, the trial court was aware of the defendant’s possible psychiatric problems, but did not explain these matters to the defendant. Therefore, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Robertson, 45 F.3d 1423 (10th Cir. 1995)

Rule 23(a) requires that waivers of the right to a jury trial must be in writing. The failure to waive the right in writing is not necessarily fatal to the waiver. However, there must be a record that the defendant herself voluntarily and knowingly made the waiver. Counsel’s oral waiver is not alone sufficient to satisfy the requirement of Rule 23.
JURY
(Unanimous Verdict)

See also: Jury Instructions (Unanimous Verdict)

Jones v. United States, 119 S.Ct. 1215 (1999)

The federal carjacking statute provides for three different punishments, depending on whether death results, serious bodily injury results, or if there is no serious injury. The Court, distinguishing Almendarez-Torres v. United States, 523 U.S. 224, 118 S.Ct. 1219 (1998), held that these amounted to three separate crimes and the indictment had to spell out which crime was alleged, and the jury was required to unanimously agree on which crime was proved.

In a CCE prosecution, the jury must unanimously agree on the three predicate offenses the defendant committed. Thus, if the government alleges that the defendant committed more than three predicate drug offenses, the jury must agree on the three (or more) predicate offenses the defendant committed. Merely agreeing that there were three predicates (while disagreeing on which three) is not sufficient.

United States v. Newell, 658 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2011)

This case contains a thorough discussion of the requirement that a jury be instructed that a verdict must be unanimous when an indictment contains duplicitous allegations, such as numerous fraudulent acts in one count of the indictment, or numerous false statements. The failure to object, however, resulted in affirmance of the conviction, because it did not amount to plain error.

United States v. Russell, 134 F.3d 171 (3rd Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that they must agree on the specific three predicate offenses committed by the defendant in order to convict him of a CCE charge. Merely instructing the jury that they had to unanimously agree that there were three predicate offenses is not sufficient.
JURY
(Special Verdict Forms)

United States v. Reed, 147 F.3d 1178 (9th Cir. 1998)

The Ninth Circuit concludes that in certain circumstances, the use of special verdict forms is permissible in criminal cases. Though there is a risk that a special verdict form will provide a “roadmap” for conviction, in this case, the form was appropriate.
(Waiver of Right to Jury)

United States v. Shorty, 741 F.3d 961 (9th Cir. 2013)

After being advised that the defendant had a low I.Q. and had a learning disability, the trial court did not engage in a sufficient colloquy or obtain a written waiver to ensure that the defendant was knowingly and voluntarily waiving his right to a jury trial.

United States v. Diaz, 540 F.3d 1316 (11th Cir. 2008)

The defendant made numerous inconsistent (and incoherent) statements about his willingness to proceed without a jury. He also insisted on representing himself. Though there was considerable information that he was borderline incompetent to go to trial, the court ultimately determined that he was ultimate to be tried. Ultimately, standby counsel signed the jury trial waiver form, claiming that he did so at the defendant’s request (with the understanding that it did not waive the defendant’s claim that the court had no jurisdiction to try him). Considering the confusing state of the record, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that the defendant did not voluntarily and knowingly waive his right to a jury trial.

United States v. Bailon-Santana, 429 F.3d 1258 (9th Cir. 2005)

A trial judge must personally address a defendant – particularly a non-English speaking defendant (through an interpreter) – and not simply rely on an attorney’s claim that he translated a pre-printed form for the defendant that contained standard jury trial waiver language. See also United States v. Duarte-Higareda, 113 F.3d 1000 (9th Cir. 1997).
JURY INSTRUCTIONS

(Allen Charge)

Brewster v. Hetzel, 913 F.3d 1042 (11th Cir. 2019)

After receiving three notes that the jury was deadlocked (the last two notes stating that the deadlock was 11-1 for conviction), the judge repeatedly told the jury to continue its deliberations. When told that the holdout was doing crossword puzzles, the judge ordered all reading material removed from the jury room. The judge also issued an Allen charge. The defense lawyers voiced no objection and did not request a mistrial. The lawyers provided ineffective assistance of counsel and the trial judge improperly coerced a verdict. A writ of habeas corpus was granted.

United States v. Williams, 819 F.3d 1026 (7th Cir. 2016)

When the jury was initially polled after announcing that they had a verdict, one of the jurors said that the verdict was not her verdict. The judge continued to poll the rest of the jury, thus revealing that only one juror was not with the majority. After some confusion, the judge sent the jury back to the room to deliberate and simply said that the verdict must be unanimous. Shortly thereafter, the jury announced that it had a verdict and returned to the courtroom and the initial juror said that she had misunderstood the polling question and said that her verdict was guilty. The Seventh Circuit held that continuing the polling was error, because it isolated the one juror and revealed her lone holdout status. The instruction to the jury to return and reach a unanimous verdict, without any cautionary instruction typical of an Allen instruction was also error.

United States v. Haynes, 729 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2013)

The Allen charge in this case encouraged the jurors to exchange views with one another, consider each other’s views, and work diligently to reach a verdict, but did not contain the admonition not to give up conscientiously held beliefs. The charge did more than simply advise jurors to continue their deliberations. The charge did not suggest that failing to reach a unanimous verdict was permissible. To the contrary, the Court stated that it “believe[d]” that the jury would “arrive at a just verdict” on Monday. The charge was improper and, along with other errors, required setting aside the verdict. A reasonable juror could view this instruction as lending the Court’s authority to the incorrect and coercive proposition that the only just result was a verdict. However, a verdict is just only it if represents the conscientiously held beliefs of all jurors.

United States v. Blitch, 622 F.3d 658 (7th Cir. 2010)

The jury requested that they be excused at 3:30 which the judge agreed to do. At about 3:15, the jury announced that it had reached a verdict, but when the jury was polled, one juror said that the verdict was not her verdict. Without any inquiry about the need to be excused at 3:30, the judge instructed the jury to return and continue deliberating. In the context of these developments, this instruction was improperly coercive, because there was no indication from the judge that the jury would be able to adjourn at 3:30, which might have resulted in a verdict that was coerced by the concern that the jury would not be excused anytime in the near future.

Hooks v. Workman, 606 F.3d 715 (10th Cir. 2010)

When the jury informed the court that its penalty phase deliberations were deadlocked, the court declined the defendant’s request to instruct the jury that if they could not reach a unanimous verdict, a sentence of life without parole would be imposed. Instead, the judge repeatedly told the jury to continue deliberating and then advised the jury that they would spend a night in the hotel and continue deliberations the next day. The court also gave the jury an Allen charge that was generally applicable to the guilt-innocence phase of a trial. In this context, the Allen charge was improperly coercive.

Smith v. Curry, 580 F.3d 1071 (9th Cir. 2009)

After receiving a note that the jury was deadlocked, the judge read a model Allen charge. That instruction didn’t accomplish a unanimous verdict, so the judge provided his “comment” on the evidence that suggested that the jury should focus on the consistencies and inconsistencies in the evidence relating to a particular issue (which of the conspirators committed the sexual assault on the victim). That comment (which strongly favored the prosecution) was unmistakably directed at the hold-out juror. Using the Allen charge jurisprudence as a guide, the Ninth Circuit held that this amounted to an impermissibly coercive instruction that tainted the verdict. Though the Constitution does not prohibit judges from commenting on the evidence, in this case, the comment amounted to a denial of the right to a fair and impartial jury deciding the case.

United States v. Williams, 547 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2008)

The trial court’s Allen instruction was improper, because the judge was made aware that one juror, a holdout, was feeling pressured by the other jurors to convict the defendants. The coercive feature of the instruction is not so much the content of the instruction, but the fact that the judge knows there is one holdout for acquittal and the juror knows that the judge knows that she is the one holdout for acquittal. Thus, the juror would reasonably believe that the instruction encouraging a unanimous verdict would be directed primarily at her and would encourage her to relent.

United States v. Jones, 504 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2007)

Shortly after deliberations began, the jury sent in a note that they were deadlocked and the judge sent them home for the evening and directed them to return in the morning. When they returned, one of the jurors was absent and an alternate was installed. The judge announced, “There is no need of sending the court any notes that the jury cannot agree, because you are going to stay here for a long time.” Shortly thereafter the jury returned a guilty verdict. The trial court’s instruction was improper and a new trial was required. At no time did the court emphasize that in reaching a verdict, no juror should abandon an honestly held belief.

United States v. Zabriskie, 415 F.3d 1139 (10th Cir. 2005)

An Allen charge should not be issued to a single juror. Though an individual juror may be questioned in certain circumstances about an irregularity, it is not proper to encourage an individual juror to reach a verdict. In this case, the jury sent out a note complaining about a single hold-out juror who was frustrating the attempt to reach a verdict. Questioning that juror alone was improper.

United States v. Yarborough, 400 F.3d 17 (D.C. Cir. 2005)

The trial court’s Allen charge that invited questions to the court to help understand the evidence or the jury instructions was improper.

United States v. Clinton, 338 F.3d 483 (6th Cir. 2003)

The suggestion in the Allen charge that if “many” people are in favor of acquittal, the others should re-examine their views (thus being overly coercive if there was only one person in favor of acquittal) was discouraged, but not cause for reversal of the conviction. The court also questioned the wisdom of referring to the cost of a retrial and recommended that it be deleted from future instructions.

United States v. McElhinney, 275 F.3d 928 (10th Cir. 2001)

In a lengthy decision that reviews the history of Allen charges and the various proper and improper components of Allen charges, the Tenth Circuit condemned the instruction that was given in this case. First, the court noted that one way to avoid the coercive impact of an Allen charge is to instruct the jury on the duty to deliberate during the initial instruction, rather than when a deadlock is envisioned. Second, the court criticized the lower court for omitting the required cautionary language (no juror should surrender an honestly held view; burden of proof remains with the government to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt). Third, the court erred in its extemporaneous embellishments on the instruction, including a reminder to the jury about the cost of the security – to deal with danger – that was used during the trial, and the cost in time and expense of the trial itself. The court devotes seventeen pages of its decision to this lengthy analysis of the Allen jurisprudence.

United States v. Paniagua-Ramos, 135 F.3d 193 (1st Cir. 1998)

The trial court's Allen charge was defective and required a new trial. The trial court failed to explain to the jury that they had the right to disagree.

Tucker v. Catoe, 221 F.3d 600 (4th Cir. 2000)

In evaluating an Allen charge for coerciveness, the appellate court considers the charge in its entirety and in context; suggestions or threats that the jury would be kept until unanimity is reached; suggestions or commands that the jury must agree; indications that the trial court knew the numerical division of the jury; indications that the charge was directed at the minority; the length of deliberations following the charge; the total length of deliberations; whether the jury requested additional instruction; and other indications of coerciveness. In this death penalty case, the trial court was informed that the jury was deadlocked 11 – 1 for death. The instruction, as a whole, moreover, applauded the collective reasoning of the jury and did not stress the importance of the individual determination. Though the judge did advise the jury that no juror is expected to give up an opinion, the charge was too coercive. The Fourth Circuit also pointed out that in the death penalty context, because a re-trial was not going to occur, there was no concern with the cost of not reaching a verdict (i.e., a life sentence would be imposed if the jury could not unanimously agree on the death penalty).
United States v. Manning, 79 F.3d 212 (1st Cir. 1996)

The jury sent a note to the judge explaining that they were deadlocked and that it was apparent that they would not change their minds on one count. The note asked whether it was necessary to continue deliberating until a verdict was reached. The judge responded simply, “Would reading any portion of the testimony assist you in reaching a decision?” This response contained none of the appropriate Allen charge ingredients: (1) members of both the majority and the minority should reexamine their positions; (2) a jury has the right to fail to agree; and (3) the burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt remains with the government. The conviction on this count was reversed.

United States v. Burgos, 55 F.3d 933 (4th Cir. 1995)

When coaxing a jury with an Allen instruction, the court should encourage the minority to consider the views of the majority, but should also encourage the majority to consider the minority’s position. This is mandatory and the failure to do so is reversible error.

United States v. Robinson, 953 F.2d 433 (8th Cir. 1992)

The trial court’s Allen charge suggested that it was unpatriotic to “hang” and repeatedly implied that the minority should re-evaluate its view. This was reversible error.

United States v. Webb, 816 F.2d 1263 (8th Cir. 1987)

The giving of an incomplete Allen charge after having determined the numerical division of the jury, was error. Furthermore, the Allen charge did not advise the jury once again that the government had the burden to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and the charge also failed to instruct both the minority and majority to re-examine their position.

Jiminez v. Myers, 40 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 1993)

Over the course of several days of deliberations, the trial court repeatedly asked what the division was (without asking which side was winning) and probed whether there had been any “movement.” The judge stated that “movement” was what was important to him. This amounted to a de facto Allen charge, urging the jury to work towards unanimity, without cautioning the holdout juror not to give up a strongly held belief. This was reversible error.

United States v. Strothers, 77 F.3d 1389 (D.C.Cir. 1996)

In the D.C. Circuit, when giving an Allen charge to the jury, it is reversible error to fail to instruct the jury that no juror should surrender his honest conviction as to the weight or effect of the evidence solely because of the opinion of his fellow jurors, or for the mere purpose of returning a verdict.

United States v. Berroa, 46 F.3d 1195 (D.C.Cir. 1995)

The district court’s Allen charge did not comply with the requirements set forth by the D.C. Circuit 25 years ago in United States v. Thomas, 449 F.2d 1177 (D.C.Cir. 1971). Specifically, the charge informed the jury that there was no reason to believe that a better jury, or clearer evidence would be presented in a new trial. These comments have been disapproved by the D.C. Circuit.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Burden of Proof)

Assuming that duress is a defense to possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, or by a person under indictment, it is not unconstitutional to place the burden of proving duress on the defendant.

United States v. Southwell, 432 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2005)
When the defendant raises the defense of insanity, in order for the jury to return a guilty verdict, not only must the jury unanimously find the defendant guilty; the jury must also unanimously reject the insanity defense. This applies to all affirmative defenses.

Sanders v. Cotton, 398 F.3d 572 (7th Cir. 2005)
The state trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury, in accordance with state law, that if the issue of heat of passion is raised, the state was obligated to prove the absence of heat of passion beyond a reasonable doubt before it could convict the defendant of murder. The trial counsel requested the instruction. Appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to raise this meritorious issue in the state appeal.

Gilbert v. Moore, 134 F.3d 642 (4th Cir. 1998)
In this murder prosecution, it was improper to instruct the jury on the definition of malice, as follows: "Malice is implied or presumed from the willful, deliberate and intentional doing of an unlawful act without just cause or excuse" and from the use of a deadly weapon. Though improperly burden-shifting, it was harmless error.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Defendant’s Failure To Testify)

Woodall v. Simpson, 685 F.3d 574 (6th Cir. 2012)

After pleading guilty at the guilt-innocence phase of this death penalty case, the defendant did not testify during the penalty phase. He requested an instruction that no adverse inference could be drawn by the penalty phase jury from his failure to testify. The trial court’s failure to provide this instruction was error of constitutional proportions requiring that the writ of habeas corpus be granted. The United States Supreme Court reversed: Though the Sixth Circuit decision might be correct on the merits, the state court decision was entitled to AEDPA deference and the state court decision did not contradict established law on this subject, because no court has held that the “no adverse inference” instruction must be given during the penalty phase of a trial. White v. Woodall, 134 S. Ct. 1697 (2014).

United States v. Soto, 519 F.3d 927 (9th Cir. 2008)

Though a trial court is obligated to instruct the jury that no adverse inference may be drawn from a defendant’s failure to testify, Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. 288 (1981), the failure to do so may be harmless error.

United States v. Medina-Martinez, 396 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2005)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that no adverse inference could be drawn from the defendant’s failure to testify. However, there was no objection and the trial judge did give an instruction containing this information in the opening instruction prior to trial. The failure to give the instruction was not plain error, though it was plain, clear and did affect substantial rights of the defendant.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(DEFENDANT’S CREDIBILITY)

United States v. Waller, 654 F.3d 430 (3rd Cir. 2011)

The trial court instructed the jury that in ascertaining the defendant’s intent, it could consider any statements made or omitted by the defendant. The defendant had invoked his right to remain silent when he was arrested. This instruction was an improper invitation to consider the defendant’s post-Miranda silence. Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976). Conviction reversed.

United States v. Gaines, 457 F.3d 238 (2d Cir. 2006)

Trial courts should not instruct the jury that a defendant has an interest in the outcome of the case and therefore, his testimony should be considered with great care. This instruction adversely impacts on the defendant’s presumption of innocence. Moreover, it is obvious that the defendant has an interest in the outcome of the case, so instructing the jury in this manner is entirely superfluous. The trial court should give a general instruction on the credibility of witnesses and then instruct the jury to consider the defendant’s testimony just as any other witness. See also United States v. Brutus, 505 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2007).
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Defendant's Theory or Defense)

SEE ALSO: Various Defenses, such as Mistake of Law; Public Authority; Entrapment; for cases relating to the failure to instruct the jury on the defendant’s theory.

The Court holds that the defendant is entitled to present inconsistent defenses, including “I didn’t do it” and “If I did I was entrapped.”

United States v. Toledo, 739 F.3d 562 (10th Cir. 2014)

In this prosecution for murder on an Indian reservation, the evidence was sufficient to authorize an instruction on self-defense and for the lesser included offense of involuntary manslaughter. The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on self defense and the lesser included offense was error.

United States v. Baird, 712 F.3d 623 (1st Cir. 2013)

The defendant purchased a firearm from another person. Several days later, he determined that the gun was stolen and returned it to the seller shortly thereafter. He requested an instruction on the defense of “innocent possession.” Because the evidence was sufficient to support this requested instruction and the content of the instruction was integral to his defense (and not covered by other instructions), the trial court’s refusal to give the instruction was reversible error.

United States v. Wisecarver, 598 F.3d 982 (8th Cir. 2010)

Because of the inadvertent use of a double-negative in explaining the defense of justification, the jury instruction in this case was erroneous. Though it was inadvertent (and defense counsel did not object), the error was plain and necessitated setting aside the verdict.

United States v. Adams, 583 F.3d 457 (6th Cir. 2009)

The trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that it could not convict the defendant based solely on the defendant’s own confession, without corroborating evidence. The fact that there was other corroborating evidence does not eliminate the need to properly instruct the jury if a request is made.

United States v. Theagene, 565 F.3d 911 (5th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was entitled to an entrapment instruction in this case involving an allegation of bribing an IRS revenue agent. There was sufficient evidence in the trial to support a jury’s determination that the defendant was not predisposed to commit the offense and that the agent encouraged the defendant to bribe him. Failing to instruct the jury on this defense was reversible error.

Harris v. Alexander, 548 F.3d 200 (2d Cir. 2008)

Under New York State law, a person who buys drugs for a particular person and then distributes the drugs to that person is not guilty of “distribution” pursuant to what is known as an agency defense. The state trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on this “defense” was a due process violation that warranted habeas relief.

United States v. Kayser, 488 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2007)

When a defendant is indicted for tax evasion based on failing to report income, he may introduce evidence that there were unreported deductions that offset the income. He may do so, even if the “deductions” were reported in some different manner in the false tax return. In other words, a defense at trial which disproves the existence of a deficiency need not be consistent with the tax return that was filed. The defendant is also entitled to have the jury properly instructed on this theory.

United States v. Kenyon, 481 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2007)

Attempt crimes require proof of specific intent to commit the crime. Consequently, a defendant may defend on the basis that he did not intend to commit the crime, even if the crime itself is not a specific intent crime. In this case, the defendant was charged with attempt to commit child sex abuse. He claimed that he was too intoxicated to have that intent. Even though intoxication is not a defense to the crime of sex abuse, it is a defense to the crime of attempt to commit sex abuse. There was sufficient evidence of the defendant’s intoxication in this case to warrant the giving of an intoxication instruction and the failure to do so was reversible error as to those counts.

United States v. Bear, 439 F.3d 565 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant had been working for law enforcement officers, but was indicted for continuing her drug offenses “off the reservation.” Her defense was that she believed that she was still working undercover. The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the defendant’s public authority defense was plain error.

United States v. Bello-Bahena, 411 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2005)

The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the defendant’s theory of defense was reversible error. The defendant was charged with an immigration offense, but claimed that he was not “found in” the United States, because he was under constant surveillance since the time of his entry, which is a valid defense.

United States v. Burt, 410 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was initially stopped for transporting illegal aliens across the border. She attended a meeting with agents during which, she claimed, she was told to gather information for them, but don’t do anything illegal; but that during the course of gathering information, she was protected from illegal acts. Shortly thereafter, she was stopped again transporting aliens across the border. She requested an instruction on a public authority defense. The trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury on this defense.

Jackson v. Edwards, 404 F.3d 612 (2d Cir. 2005)

The state trial court deprived the defendant of due process of law by failing to instruct the jury on the law of justification. The evidence at trial, as well as the defendant’s post-arrest statement, supported a self-defense claim.
Bradley v. Duncan, 315 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2002)

The state trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment amounted to a due process violation and the Ninth Circuit ordered that the petitioner’s § 2254 petition should have been granted. The defendant helped a decoy who was addicted and going through withdrawal, purchase a small amount of drugs. The Ninth Circuit held that the right to have the jury instructed on a defense provided by state law is protected by the Due Process Clause.

United States v. Allen, 127 F.3d 260 (2nd Cir. 1997)

18 U.S.C. § 892 outlaws, in part, an extortionate extension of credit which is defined as any extension of credit with respect to which it is the understanding of the creditor and the debtor at the time it is made that delay in making repayment or failure to make repayment could result in the use of violence or other criminal means to cause harm to the person, reputation, or property of any person. In this case, the defendant made a loan to an undercover agent. In explaining the elements of the offense, the trial court repeatedly pointed out the factors that could support a conviction (the usurious interest rate, for example) and failed to explain clearly the defendant's theory of defense. This was reversible error.

United States v. McIntosh, 124 F.3d 1330 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud and money laundering on the basis of his failure to disclose during his bankruptcy proceeding that he had received certain money and deposited some of those funds in a bank account he controlled through an unincorporated business he managed. The defendant's bankruptcy attorney testified that he was aware of the existence of the unincorporated business and was remiss in failing to inquire further and determine if its existence should have been disclosed to the bankruptcy court. This evidence was sufficient to prompt an "advice-of-counsel" instruction and the failure to instruct the jury on this defense was error.

United States v. Benally, 146 F.3d 1232 (10th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of involuntary manslaughter, as well as the defense of self-defense.

United States v. Durham, 825 F.2d 716 (2d Cir. 1987)

In this arson conspiracy prosecution, the defendant’s defense was that although they obtained money as part of an agreement to commit the arson, the defendants were simply extorting money from the contractor, and had no intent to commit the arson. They requested an instruction that in order to be found guilty of conspiracy to commit arson, the jury must find that they had the specific intent to actually commit the arson. The trial court’s failure to give this instruction was reversible error.

United States v. Lewis, 53 F.3d 29 (4th Cir. 1995)

The defendant participated in a deal to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. Arguably, however, the only other “conspirators” were government informants/agents. The defendant requested an instruction which advised the jury that a conspiracy can only occur if at least one of the other conspirators is not a government agent. The trial court committed reversible error by failing to instruct the jury in accordance with this request.
United States v. Newcomb, 6 F.3d 1129 (6th Cir. 1993)

A defendant is entitled to an instruction on the defense of justification if he is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm and contends that he grabbed the gun from someone who was assaulting a third person.

United States v. Douglas, 818 F.2d 1317 (7th Cir. 1987)

In this drug conspiracy trial, the defendant claimed that he was a mere purchaser, and not a member of any conspiracy. In light of this defense, it was error for the trial court to refuse to give an instruction that a buyer-seller relationship is not enough to convict one of drug conspiracy charges. In this case, the defendant offered a buyer-seller instruction but failed to object when the trial court omitted that charge. Nevertheless, the Seventh Circuit holds it to be plain error to have failed to give this instruction where it is the sole defense.

United States v. Brown, 33 F.3d 1002 (8th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with armed bank robbery. He was apprehended trying to recover the money which the robber had hidden in the woods. The government argued that he was the robber and that he had hidden the money there and was apprehended on his way to recover the loot. The defendant testified that he had not placed the money in the woods and that he had gone there at the behest of a friend to recover the duffel bags. The defendant’s testimony was sufficient to raise the issue of whether he was an accessory after the fact and therefore not guilty of the armed robbery. The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on this defense was reversible error.

United States v. Hairston, 64 F.3d 491 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defendant offered an alibi shortly after being arrested, but did not offer the alibi at trial. The government introduced evidence of the alibi in order to ridicule it. The trial court should have given an alibi instruction to the jury. Even when a defense is offered by government witnesses, the defendant is entitled to an instruction on the defense.

United States v. Zuniga, 6 F.3d 569 (9th Cir. 1993)

The trial court’s failure to give an alibi instruction to the jury was reversible error. Defendant’s wife testified that at the time of the robbery, the defendant was at home with the baby. Even if alibi evidence is weak, insufficient, inconsistent, or of doubtful credibility, the instruction should be given.

United States v. Migliaccio, 34 F.3d 1517 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant, a doctor, was charged with mail fraud and conspiracy to defraud the government by means of filing false CHAMPUS health insurance forms. He claimed that the language in the CHAMPUS regulations is ambiguous, that his interpretations were reasonable and that he lacked criminal intent. He requested a jury instruction which explained his theory of the defense, instructing the jury that if it found ambiguity in the forms, then the government would have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that there was no reasonable interpretation of the situation that would make the defendant’s statements factually correct. The trial court declined to give this instruction. This was reversible error. Even the court’s general good faith defense instruction failed to adequately address the defense theory.

United States v. Ruiz, 59 F.3d 1151 (11th Cir. 1995)

The defendant acknowledged that she participated in a multi-kilo cocaine deal, but claimed that she did so in order to enable her son-in-law to earn credit with law enforcement in an effort to reduce his sentence. In short, she claimed that she thought she was engaged in undercover work for the FBI, along with another of the co-conspirators who (she claimed) told her that she was engaged in undercover work with the FBI. The defendant requested an instruction on the law of mistake of fact. The trial court committed reversible error in refusing this request. The general “willfulness” instruction did not satisfactorily cover the points of law included in the defendant’s mistake of fact request. The defendant is entitled to have presented instructions relating to a theory of defense for which there is any foundation in the evidence. In deciding whether a defendant has met her burden, the court is obliged to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the accused.

United States v. Vicaria, 12 F.3d 195 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant requested a theory of the defense instruction at trial, which the trial court refused to give. After the defendant was convicted, the trial court granted a new trial under Rule 33, holding that it would have been better to give the defendant’s theory of the defense instruction. Though the trial court did not err in refusing to give the instruction, it was within the trial court’s discretion to give the instruction and it was thus within the trial court’s discretion to grant a new trial.

United States v. Edwards, 968 F.2d 1148 (11th Cir. 1992)

Because there was conflicting evidence as to when a drug importation offense was completed, the trial court committed reversible error in refusing to give an instruction on the statute of limitations defense.

United States v. Banks, 942 F.2d 1576 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was convicted of violating §1503 because of his refusal to testify at the grand jury investigating one of his previous drug suppliers. First, the court concludes that the willful refusal to give testimony to the grand jury may amount to obstruction of justice. However, the conviction in this case had to be reversed because of the trial judge’s refusal to instruct the jury on the law of “fear of reprisal.” The defendant testified that he feared for his safety and the safety of his family if he testified against the supplier. This is a valid defense to obstruction of justice, insofar as it negates the motive element of the offense.

United States v. Opdahl, 930 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with bribing an IRS official. As a defense, the defendant argued that his attempted payment of money to the IRS official represented an attempt to compromise the tax deficiency. The trial court committed reversible error by refusing to give an instruction to the jury on the legal authority of an IRS official to reach a compromise settlement of delinquent taxes. An instruction on the intent requirement of the offense was not an adequate substitute for fully explaining the law of compromise settlements. “The defendant is entitled to have presented instructions relating to a theory of defense for which there is any foundation in the evidence, even though the evidence may be weak, insufficient, inconsistent, or of doubtful credibility.”

United States v. Hedges, 912 F.2d 1397 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was charged with conflict of interest — that is, that he took government action while having a financial stake in the outcome. He defended on the basis that he had consulted with his Standards of Conduct Counselor about the transaction. The trial court committed reversible error in refusing to instruct the jury on the theory of entrapment by estoppel. This defense applies even in cases of strict liability. The defense applies when an official tells a defendant that certain conduct is legal and the defendant believes that official.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Deliberate Ignorance)

Global-Tech Appliances Inc. v. SEB S.A., 131 S. Ct. 2060 (2011)

In this patent case, the United States Supreme Court explained the concept of “willful blindness” in terms that should equally apply in criminal cases: Willful blindness is more than deliberate indifference to a known risk. Instead, willful blindness requires that the defendant (1) subjectively believed there was a high probability that a fact existed and (2) took deliberate actions or active efforts to avoid learning the fact. This is a higher standard than negligence and even recklessness.

United States v. Oti, 872 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2017)

The trial court erred, but it was harmless, in giving a deliberate ignorance instruction in this pill mill prosecution. This case, like so many others, involved either actual knowledge or actual ignorance. There was no evidence of deliberate ignorance.

United States v. Little, 829 F.3d 1177 (10th Cir. 2016)

Though the error was harmless, the trial court erred in delivering a deliberate ignorance instruction to the jury in this case involving constructive possession of a firearm and ammunition.

United States v. Willner, 795 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2015)

A deliberate ignorance instruction is permissible to establish that a defendant knew of the unlawful purpose of a conspiracy, but not to establish that he willfully joined in the conspiracy.

United States v. Macias, 786 F.3d 1060 (7th Cir. 2015)

Even if a defendant is aware of facts that “pique” his interest and he then restricted his “natural curiosity,” this is not enough to justify an instruction on deliberate ignorance after Global-Tech. In this case, Judge Posner wrote, “An ostrich instruction should not be given unless there is evidence that the defendant engaged in behavior that could reasonably be interpreted as having been intended to shield him from confirmation of his suspicious that he was involved in criminal activity.”

United States v. Esquenazi, 752 F.3d 912 (11th Cir. 2014)

The trial court erred in providing a deliberate ignorance instruction to the jury in this case, though the error was harmless. There was no evidence of a purposeful contrivance to avoid learning the facts.

United States v. Mathauda, 740 F.3d 565 (11th Cir. 2014)

The Eleventh Circuit considered whether the theory of “deliberate ignorance” applied in applying an enhancement under the Sentencing Guidelines for violation of an administrative order. The Court accepted the holdings in other Circuits that the deliberate ignorance principle applied when either: (1) the defendant purposely contrived to avoid learning all the facts; or (2) the defendant was aware of a high probability of the fact in dispute and consciously avoided confirming that fact. Neither option applied in this case. There was no evidence to support a finding that the defendant purposely contrived to avoid learning the fact and he had no reason to be aware of a high probability that an administrative order had been entered previously.

United States v Roussel, 705 F.3d 184 (5th Cir. 2013)

The evidence did not support a deliberate ignorance instruction. There was no evidence that the defendant took steps to remain ignorant of the essential facts that would establish his knowledge of fraud. Though he disguised various transactions, these were designed to hide his involvement in the fraud, not to avoid knowledge of it altogether. Harmless error.

United States v. Kaiser, 609 F.3d 556 (2d Cir. 2010)

A conscious avoidance instruction must include the concept that a jury may infer knowledge of the existence of a particular fact if the defendant is aware of a “high probability of its existence, unless the defendant actually believes that it does not exist.” See United States v. Feroz, 848 F.2d 359 (2d Cir. 1988). The error in omitting these two components of the conscious avoidance instruction was plain error necessitating the reversal of the defendant’s securities fraud conviction.

United States v. Ciesiolka, 614 F.3d 347 (7th Cir. 2010)

A deliberate ignorance instruction in a child-enticement prosecution was reversible error. The defendant was chatting with an undercover police officer. The officer said that she was 13 years old. But when asked what her interests were, the officer responded, Perdue University and beer. Then, when asked to send a photo, the officer twice sent a photo of a twenty year old woman. The Seventh Circuit opinion questions why, in a sting operation, the police would send a photo of a twenty year old, and then claim that the defendant remained deliberately ignorant of the girl’s age. The instruction suggested that the defendant’s negligent misunderstanding of the girl’s age was sufficient to support an enticement of a minor conviction. The instruction is only appropriate when the defendant claims a lack of knowledge and there is evidence suggesting that he deliberately avoided the truth. Here, the defendant did not take deliberate steps to avoid learning the truth.

United States v. Alston-Graves, 435 F.3d 331 (D.C. Cir. 2006)

In a lengthy opinion that traces the development of the deliberate ignorance jury instructions in various Circuits, the D.C. Circuit apparently held that a deliberate ignorance instruction should not be given where the proof at trial demonstrates actual knowledge. Though the opinion ultimately holds that it was harmless error to instruct the jury on the principle of deliberate ignorance, the D.C. Circuit also held that the instruction should generally be reserved for cases in which there is proof of an affirmative effort to remain ignorant in order to have a defense at trial.

United States v. Carrillo, 435 F.3d 767 (7th Cir. 2006)

While approving the use of a deliberate ignorance instruction in this case (drugs in car that the defendant was driving), the court cautioned that the prosecutor should not have argued to the jury that deliberate ignorance is somehow equivalent to “what a reasonable person would have known.” That formulation of the rule comes too close to a negligence standard. The proper focus is not on what a reasonable person would have known, but on what this defendant did know, and what this defendant deliberately avoided learning.

United States v. Heredia, 429 F.3d 820 (9th Cir. 2005)

The trial court erred in instructing the jury on deliberate ignorance. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the government offered insufficient evidence that the defendant deliberately avoided investigating her suspicions in order to provide herself with a defense in the event of prosecution. The Ninth Circuit also held that an essential feature of deliberate ignorance cases is that the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to reverse or abandon their course of conduct once the suspicion had formed. In this case, once it became apparent to the defendant that her passengers were carrying drugs in the car, it was too late for her to do anything about it.

DECISION REVERSED. 483 F.3d 913. THE EN BANC COURT CONCLUDED THAT A DELIBERATE IGNORANCE INSTRUCTION MAY BE GIVEN, EVEN IN THE ABSENCE OF PROOF THAT THE DEFENDANT REMAINED IGNORANT FOR THE EXPRESS PURPOSE OF PRESERVING HIS ABILITY TO CLAIM LACK OF KNOWLEDGE AT TRIAL.

United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003)

Though it was harmless error, the trial court should not have given a deliberate ignorance instruction in this case. Where the jury is asked to decide simply between two versions of the facts: one in which defendant had actual knowledge; the other in which the defendant was no more than negligent or stupid, the deliberate ignorance instruction is inappropriate. To justify the instruction, the evidence must establish (1) that defendant was actually aware of a high probability of the existence of the illegal conduct; and (2) that he purposely contrived to avoid learning of the illegal conduct. In short, there must be proof that the defendant consciously attempted to escape confirmation of the conditions or event that he strongly suspected to exist.

United States v. Ferrarini, 219 F.3d 145 (2d Cir. 2000)

The trial court erred in giving a conscious avoidance jury instruction in this case, but the error was harmless. The predicates for such an instruction are (1) the defendant asserts the lack of some specific aspect of knowledge required for conviction; and (2) the appropriate factual predicate for the charge exists, i.e., the evidence is such that a rational juror may reach the conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was aware of a high probability of the fact in dispute and consciously avoided confirming that fact. It is not enough only to show that the factual context should have apprised the defendant of the unlawful nature of his conduct. In this case, there was no suggestion that the defendant consciously avoided learning of the fraudulent loans that were at the center of his prosecution.

United States v. Sicignano, 78 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 1996)

The defendant was the go-between delivering money to a narcotics supplier, and returning with drugs to an undercover agent. He claimed that he did not know what was in the bag he delivered in either direction. The trial court’s deliberate ignorance instruction was flawed, because it failed to explain that if the defendant actually believed the bag did not contain drugs, then he could not be charged with knowledge of its contents. That is, if the defendant affirmatively believes that he is not committing a crime, he cannot be found to have knowingly committed the crime. It is only when the defendant consciously remains ignorant of some fact (i.e., “Don’t tell me what is in the bag”) that he can be found to have deliberately remained ignorant.

United States v. Adeniji, 31 F.3d 58 (2d Cir. 1994)

The trial court erroneously instructed the jury that the element of knowledge may be found to be present if the evidence established that the defendant deliberately closed his eyes to what would otherwise have been obvious. The defendant testified, however, that the suits in which the heroin was discovered at the airport had never been in his bag before, but were placed there by mistake at the customs counter. This did not raise the issue of conscious avoidance. Harmless error.

United States v. Soto-Silva, 129 F.3d 340 (5th Cir. 1997)

It was reversible error in this case to give a deliberate ignorance instruction in connection with the offense of maintaining premises for the purpose of distributing marijuana. The court held that as a matter of law, this instruction should never be given in a prosecution under 21 U.S.C. §856(a)(1).

United States v. Ojebode, 957 F.2d 1218 (5th Cir. 1992)

Defendant was detained at the Houston Airport after a plane in which he was traveling from Germany to Mexico made a brief stop there. He was found to be in possession of heroin. He defended a charge of importation on the basis that he never intended to import the heroin into the United States. Though the evidence was sufficient to support the conviction, the failure to charge the jury that the defendant had to specifically intend to bring the contraband into the United States was reversible error. Moreover, it was error to instruct the jury that knowledge of the plane’s flight schedule could be found if the defendant remained deliberately ignorant. There was no basis in the record for this deliberate ignorance instruction.

United States v. Giovannetti, 919 F.2d 1223 (7th Cir. 1990)

The defendant owned a lot with two houses on it. An undercover informant asked him if he could rent one of the houses. The house was then used as a “wire house” – a gambling house. The trial court improperly gave an “ostrich” instruction. The problem with the instruction is that it has a tendency to allow juries to convict upon a finding of negligence for crimes that require intent. The instruction is designed for cases in which there is evidence that the defendant, knowing or strongly suspecting that he is involved in shady dealing, takes steps to make sure that he does not acquire full or exact knowledge of the nature and extent of those dealings. A deliberate effort to avoid guilty knowledge is all the guilty knowledge the law requires. When the facts require the jury to make a “binary choice” between “actual knowledge” and “complete innocence,” the ostrich instruction should not be given. The error was grounds to reverse the conviction.

United States v. Barnhart, 979 F.2d 647 (8th Cir. 1992)

If the evidence demonstrates only that the defendant either possessed or lacked actual knowledge of the facts in question – and did not also demonstrate some deliberate efforts on his part to avoid obtaining actual knowledge – a willful blindness instruction should not be given. The instruction should not be given unless there is evidence to support the inference that the defendant was aware of a high probability of the existence of the fact in question and purposely contrived to avoid learning all of the facts in order to have a defense in the event of a subsequent prosecution. In this bank fraud prosecution, the error in giving the instruction was reversible error.

United States v. White, 794 F.2d 367 (8th Cir. 1986)

Though considered to be harmless error in this case, the Eighth Circuit holds that it was error to give a “conscious avoidance” instruction in light of the absence of any evidence that the defendant made a conscious effort to avoid learning of the contents of a bag which contained stolen mail. Because the evidence was overwhelming that the defendant was a direct participant in the mail theft scheme, the error was harmless.

United States v. Baron, 94 F.3d 1312 (9th Cir. 1996)

The trial court committed plain error in giving a deliberate ignorance instruction to the jury. There was no evidence that the defendant took steps to remain deliberately ignorant of the presence of drugs in his car. This decision may not have survived the later Ninth Circuit holding in United States v. Heredia, 483 F.3d 913 (9th Cir. 2007), noted above.

United States v. Aguilar, 80 F.3d 329 (9th Cir. 1996)

On remand from the Supreme Court, the issue is whether the trial court erred in instructing the jury on the element of knowledge in this prosecution of a federal judge for disclosing the existence of a wiretap in violation of 18 U.S.C. §2232(c). The trial court instructed the jury that “knowledge” could be found if the defendant had actual knowledge of the existence of the wiretap, or if he was aware of a high probability of the existence of a wiretap. This was erroneous. The latter alternative, “awareness of a high probability,” does not equate with actual knowledge unless there is evidence of willful blindness, that is, deliberate ignorance. Even irrational, or negligent ignorance is not sufficient.

United States v. Mapelli, 971 F.2d 284 (9th Cir. 1992)

Where the evidence points to actual knowledge, there is no reason to give a deliberate ignorance instruction. It was reversible error to instruct the jury on this principle in this case. Here, either the defendant had knowledge or she did not. If she did not, then she was not guilty. There was no evidence of conduct designed to avoid acquiring confirmation of a fact which was “all but known.”

United States v. Sanchez-Robles, 927 F.2d 1070 (9th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was riding in a van that reeked of the odor of marijuana. The trial court should not have given a deliberate ignorance instruction. The evidence of the odor pointed either directly or circumstantially only to actual knowledge of illegality, not deliberate ignorance. If the defendant recognized the smell, then she knew of the illegal contraband. If she did not recognize the smell, then she would have no reason to be suspicious. In other words, either she had actual knowledge, or she had no knowledge. There was no evidence of conscious avoidance.

United States v. Alvarado, 817 F.2d 580 (9th Cir. 1987)

The Ninth Circuit sets forth the rules for the giving of a deliberate ignorance instruction. The court cautions that it is a rare case where a deliberate ignorance instruction is appropriate. Here, the evidence established that the defendant had actual knowledge of the presence of cocaine in the suitcase. It was error to instruct the jury on the deliberate ignorance theory. Such an instruction is appropriate only where proof indicates that the defendant was aware of a high probability of the existence of the fact in question and purposely contrived to avoid learning all the facts in order to have a defense in the event of prosecution. This is a far cry from a standard of negligence. See also 838 F.2d 311. Note that the later decision in Heredia – the Ninth Circuit en banc decision – questioned the holding in this case and limited the Ninth Circuit’s jurisprudence of deliberate ignorance.

United States v. Hilliard, 31 F.3d 1509 (10th Cir. 1994)

A deliberate ignorance instruction is appropriate only when evidence has been presented showing the defendant purposely contrived to avoid learning the truth. Here, the defendant was shown to be aware of an agency’s civil regulatory position with regard to certain transactions, but disputed that interpretation. He was prosecuted for tax violations based on these same transactions. There was no evidence, however, that he intentionally remained ignorant of the tax laws, however. In order to justify a deliberate ignorance instruction, the government must prove that the defendant intentionally remained ignorant of a fact, not a law.

United States v. Barbee, 968 F.2d 1026 (10th Cir. 1992)

A deliberate ignorance instruction does not authorize a conviction of one who in fact does not have guilty knowledge. The deliberate ignorance instruction, however, is rarely appropriate because it is a rare occasion when the prosecution can present evidence that the defendant deliberately avoided knowledge. The deliberate ignorance instruction should be given only when evidence has been presented showing the defendant purposely contrived to avoid learning the truth. The defendant must deny knowledge and must engage in conduct that includes deliberate acts to avoid actual knowledge of the operant fact.

United States v. de Francisco-Lopez, 939 F.2d 1405 (10th Cir. 1991)

Deliberate ignorance and actual knowledge are mutually exclusive. In order to justify an instruction on the law of deliberate ignorance, therefore, there must be some evidence of deliberate ignorance other than the proof of actual knowledge – that is, there must be proof of a deliberate attempt to remain ignorant.

United States v. Rivera, 944 F.2d 1563 (11th Cir. 1991)

A deliberate ignorance instruction should not be given in every case in which a defendant claims a lack of knowledge, but only in those comparatively rare cases where there are facts that point in the direction of deliberate ignorance. The instruction is only warranted when the facts support the inference that the defendant was aware of a high probability of the existence of the fact in question and purposely contrived to avoid learning all of the facts in order to have a defense in the event of a subsequent prosecution. The trial court erred in giving the instruction in this case. Either the defendant knew that she was carrying contraband across the border, or she did not. There was no evidence that she consciously avoided acquiring the knowledge. There was no evidence, for example, that the defendant came into possession of the suitcase under suspicious circumstances. Harmless error.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Elements of the Offense or Defense)

If the jury is instructed on alternative methods by which the offense can be convicted, and one of the alternative methods is legally incorrect, the verdict is subject to challenge, if it cannot be determined whether the jury relied on the improper method. In this case, the Supreme Court held that this type of error is not “structural error” that necessarily requires setting aside the verdict.

The failure to submit a sentencing factor to the jury for their determination is a Blakely error, but is not a structural error. Therefore, as in Neder, such error may be deemed harmless.

In this pre-United States v. Gaudin trial, the judge failed to submit the issue of materiality to the jury. The trial attorney objected. Thus, rather than analyzing whether it was plain error to fail to submit this issue to the jury (Johnson v. United States), the Court had to decide whether it was harmless error. The Court held that in this case it was harmless error. Justice Scalia dissented, concluding that it was reversible error per se to omit to instruct the jury on an element of the offense if there is a proper objection.

The district court erred in its jury instruction by removing the issue of materiality from the jury’s consideration. The Court reviewed this error under the plain error standard and concluded that the error, though plain, did not affect the fairness, integrity or public reputation of the judicial proceedings.

The question of the materiality of a false statement is a jury question. The Constitution gives a criminal defendant the right to have a jury determine, beyond a reasonable doubt, his guilt of every element of the crime with which he is charged. This includes the “materiality” element of a §1001 offense.

United States v. Latorre-Cacho, 874 F.3d 299 (1st Cir. 2017)
The defendant was charged with being a member of a RICO conspiracy. Firearm offenses are not “racketeering acts” under the RICO statute. Nevertheless, the trial court twice instructed the jury that “firearms” were racketeeting acts. This was plain error requiring reversal of the defendant’s conviction.

United States v. Vazquez-Hernandez, 849 F.3d 1219 (9th Cir. 2017)
At the border in Nogales, Arizona, people coming into the United States actually enter the border for a short distance prior to entering the inspection station. The defendant was in this area, offering to wash car’s windows. The defendant was charged with attempted reentry. The court failed to instruct the jury that attempted illegal reentry requires as an element the intent to reenter free from official restraint. The Ninth Circuit held that the area approaching the inspection station comes within the definition of “official restraint” and the failure to instruct the jury on this element was reversible error.

United States v. Wolframe, 835 F.3d 1214 (8th Cir. 2016)

Assault is an element of the offense of resisting or interfering with an officer under 18
U.S.C. § 111(a)(1). Omitting this element of the offense from the jury instruction was plain error which required setting aside the verdict, even absent an objection from trial counsel.

United States v. Murphy, 824 F.3d 1197 (9th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with numerous tax offenses and also with a violation of 18
U.S.C. § 514, which makes it a crime to present false financial instruments. The instruction failed to explain that the crime required that the instrument purport to be issued under the authority of the United States. This was plain error, requiring reversal of the conviction on those counts.

United States v. Makkar, 810 F.3d 1139 (10th Cir. 2015)

The district court erred when it instructed the jury that it could infer the defendant had the requisite mens rea in this Analogue Drug prosecution if the defendant knew that inhaling the “incense” had the same effect as marijuana. The government did not attempt to argue that the defendant knew the drug was illegal (one method of establishing intent under McFadden), and the instruction failed to include the second element of the mens rea requirement (knowledge of the chemical structure) which is part of the second McFadden method of proving intent. Instead, the instruction simply explained that if the chemical structure was the same and the defendant knew it had the same effect as a listed drug, the jury could infer that the defendant knew the chemical structure was the same. The effect of the lower court’s instruction was to eliminate one of the elements of the offense as explained by McFadden: the defendant’s knowledge that the drug had the same chemical composition as a listed drug. This was plain error.

United States v. Montoya-Gaxiola, 796 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with possession of a sawed-off shotgun. Pursuant to Staples v. United States, the government was required to prove that the defendant knew the characteristics of the firearm that brought it within the scope of the registration act. The jury instruction did not explain the proper mens rea element.

United States v. Hughes, 795 F.3d 800 (8th Cir. 2015)

If wildlife is hunted in violation of state law and transported across state lines, it is a misdemeanor unless the market price of the item is more than $350, in which case it is a felony.
“Market price” is the price that a willing buyer would pay a willing seller on the open market. In this case, however, the trial court instructed the jury to determine if the offense was a misdemeanor or a felony there were other measures of market price, including the cost of guide services. This was erroneous and required that the conviction be set aside.

United States v. Borrero, 771 F.3d 973 (7th Cir. 2014)
The defendants were prosecuted for various offenses, including mail fraud. The mail fraud count alleged that the defendants defrauded the State of Indiana by submitting applications for car titles with false information. This theory of fraud does not pass muster under Cleveland, because a car title is not “property” in the hands of the State. The fact that there was another legal theory that may have supported the conviction does not rescue the conviction, because if the jury is given two options for conviction, one of which is legally correct, and the other legally incorrect, the verdict cannot be upheld. Griffin v. United States, 502 U.S. 46 (1991).

United States v. Catone, 769 F.3d 866 (4th Cir. 2014)
If a defendant receives federal benefits in an amount in excess of $1,000, it is a felony (18 U.S.C. § 1920). If the defendant receives less than $1,000, it is a misdemeanor. The jury must find the amount of the benefits beyond a reasonable doubt, pursuant to Apprendi, in order to sustain a felony conviction.

Dixon v. Williams, 750 F.3d 1027 (9th Cir. 2014)
In the state murder trial, the judge erroneously instructed the jury that an honest, but reasonable belief that self defense was necessary is not a defense to malice murder. The proper instruction is that an honest, but unreasonable belief that self defense is necessary is not a defense. This erroneous instruction violated the defendant’s right to due process and necessitated granting the writ of habeas corpus.

United States v. McKye, 734 F.3d 1104 (10th Cir. 2013)
Whether a particular transaction involves a “security” is a mixed question of fact and law that, pursuant to Gaudin, must be submitted to the jury to be decided under the reasonable doubt standard. In this case the judge instructed the jury that a “note” constitutes a security. This was reversible error. Not all notes are securities, so the instruction erroneously explained the law and removed from the jury’s consideration whether the notes in this case were securities.

United States v. Zhen Zhou Wu, 711 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2013)
The defendant was charged with violating the Arms Export Control Act by selling a specific product (phase shifters) to China. The law provides that the President will designate certain items that may not be sold to certain countries. The President delegated the designation determination to the State Department. The State Department did not identify particular products that qualify, except by generic categories (thus, as one Court analogized, the Department identified “bicycles” without specifying every conceivable manufacturer, make and model of every bicycle). The question in this case is whether the jury was required to decide whether the phase shifters were covered by the law. The First Circuit held that this is a fact question that the jury must decide, despite the fact that the law specifically states that a defendant may not challenge the President’s determination that a particular product may not be sold to China. Moreover, the fact that the State Department later specified that the defendant’s phase shifters were covered could not be applied to the defendant, whose sales occurred prior to the State Department determination. Finally, the First Circuit held that the fact that the defendant was obviously aware of that the product was covered by the prohibition (based on their conduct) did not eliminate the fact that they were outlawed from what the government was required to prove. to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. Even if the defendant’s conduct exhibited a guilty mens rea, this does not alleviate the government’s burden of proving the actus reus to the jury.

United States v. Bader, 678 F.3d 858 (10th Cir. 2012)

The trial court instructed the jury on a theory of guilt that was not alleged in the indictment and which was inconsistent with the government’s theory of prosecution. The conviction on the pertinent counts was reversed.

United States v. Johnson, 652 F.3d 918 (8th Cir. 2011)

The evidence was insufficient to support a conviction for receiving child pornography, though there was sufficient evidence to prove possession. The defendant’s computer had child pornography images. The indictment alleged that he possessed child pornography that had been shipped and transported in interstate commerce, a violation of § 2252(a)(2). However, when the judge instructed the jury, the jurisdictional element was explained as follows: “The materials containing the illicit visual depictions were produced using materials that had been mailed, shipped, or transported by computer in interstate or foreign commerce.” There was no evidence at trial that the components of the computer were shipped in interstate commerce. The Eighth Circuit held that where the jury instructions limit the manner in which the offense may be committed, this also limits the sufficiency-of-the-evidence review by the appellate court. The evidence was insufficient in this case.

United States v. Ferguson, 676 F.3d 260 (2d Cir. 2011)

In this securities fraud trial, one theory of culpability was aiding and abetting, i.e., “willfully caused an act to be done which, if directly performed by him or another would be an offense against the United States.” The trial court properly defined “willfully” but failed to explain that the defendant’s willful conduct must cause the act to be done by the other person. This was plain error requiring a reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Needham, 604 F.3d 673 (2d Cir. 2010)

A Hobbs Act prosecution requires proof that the offense affected interstate commerce. Even in a robbery involving drugs, the government is required to prove that the offense affected interstate commerce. Because this is an essential element of the offense, the jury must be instructed that they must find that the robbery affected interstate commerce and the failure to do so is reversible error.

United States v. Wisecarver, 598 F.3d 982 (8th Cir. 2010)

Because of the inadvertent use of a double-negative in explaining the defense of justification, the jury instruction in this case was erroneous. Though it was inadvertent (and defense counsel did not object), the error was plain and necessitated setting aside the verdict.

United States v. Gomez, 580 F.3d 1229 (11th Cir. 2009)

The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury in accordance with Flores-Figueroa was not harmless error in this case and required reversal of the conviction. The element of the offense that was omitted in the jury instruction (the fact that the stolen identity applied to a real person), was a contested issue at trial and the error, therefore, was not harmless.
United States v. Rush-Richardson, 574 F.3d 906 (8th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking offense, but the just instruction defined the crime in the language that applies to possession of a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking offense. The “in furtherance” offense requires a greater relationship between the possession of the weapon and the drug crime than the “during and in relation” offense. See also United States v. Brown, 560 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 2009).

United States v. Tureseo, 566 F.3d 77 (2d Cir. 2009)

The trial court’s erroneous instruction about the elements of aggravated identity theft (this case was tried pre-United States v. Flores-Figueroa, 129 S.Ct. 1886 (2009)), required vacating the conviction for aggravated identity theft.

United States v. Pereyra-Gabino, 563 F.3d 322 (8th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with harboring illegal aliens. The instruction explained that the jury must find (1) that a person was in the country illegally; (2) that the defendant knew that a person was in the country illegally; and (3) that the defendant harbored or attempted to harbor one of the people identified in #1. The problem with this instruction is that there were several aliens identified in the case and the instruction permitted a jury to find that the defendant harbored one of the illegal aliens, but not that he knew that particular alien was in the country illegally. That is, the court failed to explain that all three elements must apply to at least one of the aliens.

United States v. Tureseo, 566 F.3d 77 (2d Cir. 2009)

The trial court failed to instruct the jury in this identity theft case that the defendant must have known that the identity he stole was of a “real person.” See Flores-Figueroa v. United States, 129 S.Ct. 1886 (2009). Even though there was considerable evidence that the defendant was aware that it was a real person whose identity he stole, the failure to instruct the jury on this essential element of the offense was reversible error.

United States v. Hassan, 578 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2008)

The defendant was prosecuted for conspiring to import “khat” a plant grown in the Africa that sometimes contains a controlled substance known as cathinone. The plant itself is not illegal, but cathinone is. The evidence was sufficient to prove that he conspired to import khat containing cathinone. However, the jury instruction explaining the offense to the jury was erroneous. The jury instruction suggested that if the defendant conspired to import any controlled substance, the jury could convict the defendant. In this case, however, because of the confusion about whether khat was a controlled substance (it is not, but many government witnesses erroneously testified that it is), the judge should have specifically instructed the jury that the government had to prove that the defendant conspired to import khat containing cathinone in order to convict him of the conspiracy offense.

Medley v. Runnels, 506 F.3d 857 (9th Cir. 2007)

The trial court erred in instructing the jury that a flare gun qualified as a firearm. The defendant was convicted in state court of using a firearm in the commission of a felony.
Whether a flare gun qualified as a firearm involved the resolution of certain factual questions which must be decided by a jury, not the judge.

Polk v. Sandoval, 503 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2007)

The trial court’s instruction to the jury failed to accurately define the elements of the offense of murder, specifically it omitted the element of “deliberation.” The conviction was tainted by this error and the writ was granted. A similarly defective instruction also led to habeas relief in Chambers v. McDaniel, 549 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 2008).

United States v. Holly, 488 F.3d 1298 (10th Cir. 2007)

The judge instructed the jury on the offense of aggravated sexual assault explaining that this offense may be committed in one of two ways. One of the ways suggested by the judge was legally incorrect, the other theory was correct. With regard to certain counts of conviction, it could not be determined if the jury relied on the incorrect, or correct theory. In this situation, the conviction must be reversed. See Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931); Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862 (1983); Griffin v. United States, 502 U.S. 46 (1991).

United States v. Korey, 472 F.3d 89 (3rd Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with using a firearm during and in relation to a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. A correct instruction on the law of conspiracy to distribute cocaine was required. The evidence established that the defendant was asked by a cocaine dealer to kill someone, in exchange for which the dealer would pay the defendant with cocaine. The district court judge instructed the jury that if they found that the defendant agreed to accept cocaine in payment for killing the victim, that is a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. This was erroneous. This instruction failed to explain correctly that a conspiracy to distribute cocaine requires proof of a “unity of purpose” between the conspirators to distribute cocaine and this instruction did not include that concept. Merely accepting payment in the form of cocaine is not the same as sharing a purpose with the dealer to distribute cocaine. Reversible error.

United States v. Hoover, 467 F.3d 496 (5th Cir. 2006)

The trial court’s jury charge improperly expanded the indictment by offering a theory by which the jury could find that the statement made by the defendant was false, in a manner different than the manner set forth in the indictment.

United States v. Alferahin, 433 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with a violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1425(a), knowingly procuring naturalization contrary to law. The trial court did not instruct the jury on the concept of materiality in connection with the false statement that the defendant allegedly made on his naturalization application. The trial defense attorney acquiesced to the failure to instruct the jury on the concept of materiality. The Ninth Circuit held that materiality is an element of the offense, the failure to instruct the jury on this essential element was plain error and the attorney was ineffective in failing to object.

United States v. Southwell, 432 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2005)
When the defendant raises the defense of insanity, in order for the jury to return a guilty verdict, not only must the jury unanimously find the defendant guilty; the jury must also unanimously reject the insanity defense. This applies to all affirmative defenses.

United States v. Nickl, 427 F.3d 1286 (10th Cir. 2005)
In connection with the allegation that the defendant was an aider and abetter, the judge instructed the jury that they could assume that the principal actually committed the crime, based on his plea agreement. This violated Rule 605’s prohibition on judicial testimony.

United States v. Zhou, 428 F.3d 361 (2d Cir. 2005)
In a §924(c) firearm prosecution, the evidence of the underlying felony must establish its commission beyond a reasonable doubt, because the commission of the underlying felony is an essential element of the firearm offense. Nevertheless, it is not necessary that the defendant actually be convicted of the predicate offense.

United States v. Serawop, 410 F.3d 656 (10th Cir. 2005)
In defining voluntary manslaughter to the jury, the trial court explained the concept of “heat of passion” but failed to explain that the homicide must be intentional. Consequently, the jury may have convicted the defendant of voluntary manslaughter without finding that the killing was intentional – for example, it could have been in the heat of passion, but still negligent (in which case it might have been involuntary manslaughter). The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Cassel, 408 F.3d 622 (9th Cir. 2005)
The defendant was charged with interfering with a sale of federal land by intimidation (18 U.S.C. § 1860). He defended on First Amendment grounds. The Ninth Circuit held that the government must prove that the defendant subjectively intended to intimidate the victim. Absent this requirement, the First Amendment would bar a prosecution. The trial court’s failure to properly instruct the jury on this element – subjective intent to intimidate – was harmful error.

Sanders v. Cotton, 398 F.3d 572 (7th Cir. 2005)
The state trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury, in accordance with state law, that if the issue of heat of passion is raised, the state was obligated to prove the absence of heat of passion beyond a reasonable doubt before it could convict the defendant of murder, because the absence of heat of passion was an essential element of the offense of murder. The trial counsel requested the instruction. Appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to raise this meritorious issue in the state appeal.

United States v. McLaughlin, 386 F.3d 547 (3rd Cir. 2004)
Materiality is an essential element of an offense under 29 U.S.C. § 439(b) (False reports in Department of Labor filings). The trial court erred in failing to submit the question of materiality to the jury. Harmless error.

United States v. Hugs, 384 F.3d 762 (9th Cir. 2004)
The defendant was charged with involuntary manslaughter by committing an unlawful act not amounting to a felony. The jury was charged on two other methods of committing the offense, however. This was improper, but harmless, given another instruction that specifically told the jury that the defendant was only charged with the crime set forth in the indictment.

Martinez v. Garcia, 379 F.3d 1034 (9th Cir. 2004)

With regard to ambiguous jury instructions, in some instances, when a case is submitted to the jury on alternative theories, the unconstitutionality of any of the theories requires that the conviction be set aside. In those cases, a jury is clearly instructed by the court that it may convict a defendant on an impermissible legal theory, as well as on a proper theory or theories. Although it is possible that the guilty verdict may have had a proper basis, it is equally likely that the verdict rested on an unconstitutional ground and the court will decline to choose between two such likely possibilities. The jury’s verdict must be set aside if it could be supported on one ground but not on another, and the reviewing court is uncertain which of the two grounds was relied upon by the jury in reaching the verdict. See Boyde v. California, 494 U.S. 370 (1990); Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988). See also United States v. Holly, 488 F.3d 1298 (10th Cir. 2007), discussed above.

Defendant was charged with murdering his girlfriend’s young child. The girlfriend was also charged with the homicide and ultimately entered a guilty plea to a lesser charge. The defendant claimed that if he was the cause of death, it was accidental. In the jury instruction, the trial court erroneously failed to tell the jury that in order to be found guilty, the defendant had to knowingly cause the death of the victim. Instead, the instruction simply stated that the defendant had to cause the death. Trial counsel’s failure to object to this omission in the instruction was ineffective assistance of counsel necessitating a new trial.

Evanchyk v. Stewart, 340 F.3d 933 (9th Cir. 2003)

It is a violation of due process for a jury instruction to omit an element of the crime. United States v. Gaudin, 515 U.S. 506 (1995); Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990); Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979); In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970). In this case, the jury instruction on the law of conspiracy to commit murder omitted the element of the offense of intent to murder (the trial court offered the jury the option of finding the defendant guilty of conspiracy to commit felony murder which is not an offense under the applicable state law). Only if the omission of the element is harmless will such an error not lead to reversal. Neder v. United States, 527 U.S. 1, 119 S.Ct. 1827 (1999). The error was not harmless in this case.

Powell v. Galaza, 328 F.3d 558 (9th Cir. 2003)

Instructing the jury that the defendant’s testimony amounted to an acknowledgement of one of the elements of the offense was reversible error. The defendant tried to explain why he failed to appear in court for sentencing (he was charged with failure to appear). The judge told the jury that his explanation was not a valid defense and that his testimony was sufficient to satisfy the intent element of the offense.

United States v. Syme, 276 F.3d 131 (3rd Cir. 2002)

The Third Circuit explains that where a conspiracy alleges that the defendants conspired to commit an offense in several ways, if the evidence is sufficient with regard to certain ways, but not others, a general verdict of guilty will be sustained on the theory that the jury properly evaluated the evidence and convicted on the sufficient basis. However, where the judge instructs the jury incorrectly about one of the ways, the verdict will not be upheld, because the jury may not have realized the legal elements of one of the alternative methods of committing the offense. In this case, the conviction was upheld. See generally Griffin v. United States, 502 U.S. 46 (1991); Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957); Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931).

Smith v. Horn, 120 F.3d 400 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with capital murder in Pennsylvania. The trial court charged the jury (and the prosecutor argued), that as long as the defendant and his colleague were "accomplices" in the robbery, it did not matter who actually shot the victim. This was erroneous under state law. The defendant must have had the specific intent to kill in order to be guilty of first degree murder under state law and the failure to properly instruct the jury amounted to a violation of due process.

United States v. Baird, 134 F.3d 1276 (6th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with making a false statement to the government in an effort to obtain a progress payment on a government construction project. The defendant submitted a claim for payment based on "incurred costs," though the defendant had not yet paid for the product for which he was requesting a progress payment. Because of the confusion over the definition of the term "incurred costs," the trial court should have instructed the jury on this aspect of the charge.

United States v. Allen, 129 F.3d 1159 (10th Cir. 1997)

18 U.S.C. § 1957 requires that the monetary transaction be "in, or affecting interstate or foreign commerce." This requirement is both jurisdictional and an element of the offense that should be submitted to the jury for decision.

United States v. Bordeaux, 121 F.3d 1187 (8th Cir. 1997)

Omitting to include the element of force in the court's instruction to the jury in a case alleging abusive sexual contact by force (18 U.S.C. § 2244(a)(1)) was plain error. A new trial was required even though the defendant did not object at trial.

United States v. Gallerani, 68 F.3d 611 (2d Cir. 1995)

In order to be guilty of a conspiracy offense, there must be an unlawful object of the conspiracy. Thus, proving that there was an unlawful object is an essential element of the offense. In this case, the trial court failed to instruct the jury about the need to prove an unlawful object of the conspiracy. Even absent an objection, this was reversible error. The fact that the court made reference to the indictment, and sent the indictment to the jury did not ameliorate the error. With respect to counts of the indictment which relied on a Pinkerton theory of liability, the error in the conspiracy charge tainted the convictions on those counts, as well.
The trial judge, over the objection of both the government and the defense, refused to instruct the jury on all the elements of the offense, instructing them, instead, only on the disputed elements. This was reversible error, not subject to harmless error analysis.

The defendant was charged with a violation of 18 U.S.C. §1512(a)(1)(C), attempting to kill a witness to prevent him from communicating with a federal law enforcement officer about a federal offense, but the jury was instructed pursuant to §1512(b)(3): intimidating, or using physical force, to prevent a person from communicating with a federal law enforcement officer about a federal offense. This was not what the defendant was charged with, or tried for, and thus, the conviction was reversed. Other aspects of this decision were abrogated by the United States Supreme Court decision in Fowler v. United States, 131 S. Ct. 2045 (2011).

The “series” element of a CCE prosecution requires proof that the defendant committed at least three related predicate offenses. In this case, the government alleged that there were eight predicate offenses. The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that there must be unanimity among the jurors as to which three (at least) predicates formed the series. Harmless error.

The defendant was charged with robbing a credit union. At trial, the government offered undisputed conclusive proof that the victim was, in fact, a credit union as defined in federal law. The judge instructed the jury that the victim met the statutory definition of a credit union. This instruction violated the defendant’s right to have the jury make findings on every element of the offense. This type of error is not subject to harmless error analysis.

The defendant, who was not a public official, was charged with a Hobbs Act violation. The theory was that he threatened his victims into paying him money to ensure that he would get favorable treatment from a public official with whom he was affiliated. The government could proceed on a theory of extortion by use of fear of economic harm, but could not proceed on a “color of official right” theory. The trial court, however, provided both options to the jury. This was erroneous and required reversal of the conviction on this count: “When disjunctive theories are submitted to the jury and the jury renders a general verdict of guilty, appeals based on evidentiary deficiencies must be treated differently than those based on legal deficiencies. If the challenge, as here, is legal and any of the theories was legally insufficient, then the verdict must be reversed.”

The defendant was charged with a conspiracy which had three illegal objects, one of which was structuring financial transactions. The trial court instructed the jury erroneously about the mens rea element of the structuring offense (see Ratzlaf v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 655 (1994)). The conspiracy conviction had to be set aside. Because the jury may have relied on the invalid object – that is, the object that was improperly defined – the general verdict could not be upheld.

The defendant was charged with possessing a weapon in connection with a drug offense in violation of 18 U.S.C. §924(c). It is not necessary in such a case for the government to also charge the defendant with the underlying drug offense. However, the government must prove that the defendant engaged in the underlying drug offense. In the judge’s instructions to the jury, he mentioned the need to prove that a drug offense be found to be the predicate, but there was no definition of the elements of the underlying drug offense. Failing to instruct the jury about the elements of the underlying drug offense amounts to omitting an element of the §924(c) offense. Even absent an objection, this is plain error requiring reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Mentz, 840 F.2d 315 (6th Cir. 1988)

In this bank robbery trial, the trial judge instructed the jury that the victim-bank was insured by the FDIC. This improperly removed from the jury’s consideration one of the elements of the offense and violated the defendant’s right to have a jury determine his guilt or innocence and to make such a finding with regard to each element of the offense. The error was not harmless.

United States v. Locklear, 97 F.3d 196 (7th Cir. 1996)

Defendant was prosecuted for uttering counterfeit cashier’s checks in violation of 18 U.S.C. §493. That statute requires proof that the instrument was purported to have been issued by a bank authorized or acting under the laws of the United States. The indictment did not charge this element of the offense, the government offered no evidence on this element of the offense and the jury was not instructed on this element of the offense. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Ripinsky, 109 F.3d 1436 (9th Cir. 1997)

An essential element of §1957 money laundering is a financial transaction involving the use of a financial institution which is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. The foreign commerce component of this element is an essential element of the offense which must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt and submitted to the jury.

United States v. Tagalicud, 84 F.3d 1180 (9th Cir. 1996)

Several defendants were charged with conspiracy and several substantive counts involving marriage fraud, immigration fraud, and submitting false immigration documents. The trial judge singled out one defendant and explained the offenses to the jury using that defendant as an example. The Ninth Circuit concluded that omitting to define the offenses for the other defendants, or even referring to the instructions as applying to the other defendants, required reversing their convictions. Moreover, because the judge singled out the one defendant, this amounted to an improper judicial implication that the case against her was more important and her conviction was reversed, as well.

United States v. Nguyen, 73 F.3d 887 (9th Cir. 1995)

8 U.S.C. §1324(a) makes it an offense to bring any alien into the United States other than through a port of entry. The statute contains no explicit mens rea requirement. Nevertheless, the court concluded that Congress intended such a requirement. See Staples v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 1793 (1994); United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422 (1978); Morisette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952). The government must prove that the defendant knew that the individuals he was transporting were aliens and that he off-loaded them at other than a port of entry, intending to violate the law.
Harmon v. Marshall, 69 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 1995)
Failing to instruct the jury on all elements of an offense is constitutional error, because it precludes the jury from finding each fact necessary to convict a defendant. Such error is plain and cannot be harmless. In this case, with regard to two counts, the trial court did not give the jury any instructions regarding the elements of the offense. This required setting aside the verdicts on those counts.

United States v. Smith, 82 F.3d 1564 (10th Cir. 1996)
Where two methods of committing a crime are charged disjunctively in the indictment and the appellate court concludes that there was insufficient evidence to support one of the methods, a conviction will still be upheld. However, where the trial court gives an erroneous instruction about one of the methods, even if the other method is explained properly, the conviction cannot be sustained, because there is no assurance that the jury did not convict the defendant on the basis of the method that was misdefined. Here, for example, the defendant was charged with “using” and “carrying” a firearm in connection with a drug offense. 18 U.S.C. §924(c). The court instructed the jury in the pre-Bailey language, which provided an overly broad definition of “using” a firearm. Because the jury may have convicted the defendant based on the defendant’s “use” of the firearm – in the overly broad sense of “use” – the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Rogers, 94 F.3d 1519 (11th Cir. 1996)
The trial court erred by failing to instruct the jury, in accordance with Staples, that the government must prove that the defendant knew the characteristics of the weapon which brought it within the definition of the Firearms Act (i.e., that it was a machine gun, or a silencer). The error, however, even though it amounted to omitting an element of the offense, was harmless error.

United States v. DeFries, 129 F.3d 1293 (D.C.Cir. 1997)
In the midst of instructing the jury on the elements of a RICO offense, the judge instructed the jury that they should presume that the union was an enterprise. Because the existence of an enterprise is an essential element of the offense, this instruction was erroneous.

United States v. Rawlings, 73 F.3d 1145 (D.C.Cir. 1996)
The defendant was charged with knowingly possessing an unregistered firearm. He contended that he did not knowingly possess the weapon. During the jury instructions, the judge explained to the jury that the most important element of the offense was the “possession” element. The trial court also erred in instructing the jury that the critical issue in this case was one of credibility – that this was a classic swearing contest. Actually, the defendant admitted holding a box that contained the gun, but did not know the gun was in the box; and the police simply testified that the defendant was in possession of the box. Thus, this was not simply a swearing contest between the police and the defendant and the sole issue was not “possession.” Even if the court were to put one element above another (and it should not), the most important issue in the case was whether the defendant had knowledge of what he was possessing. Also important was whether the police were accurate in their identification of the defendant as someone they saw in possession of the gun; this was not a matter of credibility, but of perception.
United States v. Jones, 909 F.2d 533 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

Four women were prosecuted under the Travel Act for their participation in a “prostitution ring.” In order to prosecute someone for using a facility in interstate commerce for the purpose of violating a state law, the prosecution must show the activity was, in fact, unlawful under a specific state law. Furthermore, the government must prove that the defendant had the intent, with respect to each element of the relevant state offense. In instructing the jury in this case, the district court read the prostitution-related statutes of the relevant states, but did not adequately charge the jury, as a state court would, on the elements of those offenses. Because of this failure, all travel act convictions in this case were reversed.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Flight)

SEE ALSO: EVIDENCE (Flight)

United States v. Blanco, 392 F.3d 382 (9th Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred (though it was harmless) in instructing the jury on flight as consciousness of guilt. The evidence did not establish that the defendant fled from the agents after learning that they had a warrant for his arrest. Rather, his flight was not in response to an attempt to effectuate an arrest.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Good Faith)

SEE ALSO: ADVICE OF COUNSEL OR OTHER EXPERT; MAIL FRAUD

United States v. Wallen, 874 F.3d 620 (9th Cir. 2017)

The Endangered Species Act makes it a crime to kill a grizzly bear unless, in good faith, the defendant believed it was necessary in self defense. The good faith element is judged under subjective standard, not an objective standard. In other words, did the defendant believe that he needed to kill the bear in self defense, as opposed to, “would a reasonable person” have believed that it was necessary to kill the grizzly bear in self-defense.

United States v. Certified Environmental Services, Inc., 753 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2014)

Federal and State laws regulate the removal of asbestos from buildings, including OSHA regulations and the Clean Air Act. A company that removes asbestos must comply with various laws regarding the method of removal and a separate “monitoring” company must monitor the air after the removal is accomplished. The defendants in this case (a company and several employees) were involved in monitoring asbestos removal and were charged with not properly monitoring the asbestos removal and submitting false monitoring reports. The defense sought to introduce evidence at trial about certain conversations with officials about their monitoring practices, specifically, whether particular monitoring practices were required if the location was not sufficiently “contained” (i.e., the area where the asbestos was being removed was not fully contained which might result in the monitoring causing more contamination in nearby areas). The government objected that these conversations were hearsay. The trial court’s exclusion of this evidence was reversible error. The evidence relating to the conversations with regulators was not offered to prove the truthfulness of the information provided by the regulators, but to prove that the defendants were acting in good faith when they engaged in certain monitoring practices. The fact that some of the conversations occurred after the criminal conduct did not make the evidence irrelevant, because it was consistent with what the defendants claimed was there long-standing understanding of the monitoring rules.

United States v. Kottwitz, 627 F.3d 1383 (11th Cir. 2010)

The trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction on good faith reliance on advice of an accountant in this tax fraud prosecution. The defendant bears an extremely low threshold to justify the good faith reliance instruction and does not need to prove good faith. Whether the defendant fully disclosed the relevant facts, failed to disclose all relevant facts, or concealed information from his advisor, and relied in good faith on his advisor are matters for the jury – and not the court – to determine, under proper instruction. See also United States v. Morris, 20 F.3d 1111 (11th Cir. 1994); United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540 (11th Cir. 1984). (Note, rehearing resulted in reversal of additional counts on 12/22/2010, 627 F.3d 1383).

United States v. Hurwitz, 459 F.3d 463 (4th Cir. 2006)

In a lengthy opinion explaining the law governing the prosecution of doctors for prescribing pain medication, the Fourth Circuit concludes that reversible error occurred when the
The trial court instructed the jury that good faith is not a defense to a § 841 prosecution of a doctor. The core holding is that an objective standard is appropriate, but this is not necessarily inconsistent with a good faith defense.

United States v. Rosomando, 144 F.3d 197 (2d Cir. 1998)

It may be appropriate in some cases to instruct the jury that the defendant’s expectation that no harm will ultimately befall the victim is not a defense. The point of this instruction, however, assumes that the defendant did, in fact, believe that there would be at least temporary harm. Thus, if a defendant makes a false statement in a loan application, knowing that this will facilitate a loan, but honestly believes that he will ultimately re-pay the loan, this is not a valid “good faith” defense. In this case, however, the defendant did not ever intend that the victim suffer any loss. In this situation, the caveat to the good faith instruction was inappropriate.

United States v. Cavin, 39 F.3d 1299 (5th Cir. 1994)

Instructing the jury that it “may” acquit if they find that the defendant acted in good faith, was improper. If the defendant acted in good faith, the jury was obligated to find the defendant not guilty. Acquittal is not optional in such circumstances; it is mandatory, because a finding of good faith precludes a finding of fraudulent intent.

United States v. Haddock, 956 F.2d 1534 (10th Cir. 1992)

The trial court erred in not instructing the jury on defendant’s good faith defense to §656 misapplication charges. Instructions on the law of willfulness and “intent to defraud” are not adequate substitutes for a charge on good faith. This decision was later abrogated in United States v. Wells, 519 U.S. 482 (1997), on the grounds that materiality is not an element of a false statement charge.

United States v. Morris, 20 F.3d 1111 (11th Cir. 1994)

The trial court committed reversible error by failing to instruct the jury on the good faith defense, as requested by the defendant in this prosecution for filing a false income tax return. The court’s instruction defining the terms “willfully” and “knowingly” was not an adequate substitute. Among other things, the charge did not explain that a good faith – yet objectively unreasonable – belief in the correctness of the return, would be a complete defense.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Inconsistent Verdicts)

United States v. Randolph, 794 F.3d 602 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy with various members of his family. On the verdict form, the jury was asked to first mark whether the defendant was “guilty” or “not guilty” of the conspiracy charge and then, “If you unanimously find that a particular controlled substance was not involved in the offense [i.e., cocaine, crack cocaine, marijuana], mark ‘none’ on the appropriate special verdict form.” The jury returned a verdict of guilty against Randolph, but marked “none” beside each of the three drugs. The Sixth Circuit held that this amounted to an acquittal, because the jury had to find that the conspiracy had as its object at least one of the drugs. This is not a case in which there are inconsistent verdicts (which generally do not require a reversal). This was one count of the indictment for which the jury apparently found insufficient evidence with regard to one of the elements of the offense.

United States v. Moran-Toala, 726 F.3d 334 (2d Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy and with accessing a computer unlawfully. The computer offense was a misdemeanor, unless the access was related to a separate felony offense. The jury was initially properly instructed that the computer offense required a separate finding regarding whether it was committed in connection with a felony offense (i.e., the drug conspiracy). During deliberations, the jury asked if the verdicts had to be consistent. The judge, over objection from the defense, answered that the verdicts on the two counts were not required to be consistent. The jury acquitted the defendant of the drug conspiracy, but convicted on the computer offense with the felony enhancement. The Second Circuit held that the supplemental instruction was reversible error. The jury, in essence, was instructed that jury nullification was permissible.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Intent / Willfulness)

The “misappropriate theory” of securities fraud involves a corporate “outsider” who violates Rule 10b-5 by misappropriating confidential information for securities trading purposes, in breach of a fiduciary duty owed to the source of the information, rather than to the persons with whom he trades. In this case, the Court holds that this conduct amounts to a criminal violation of the securities laws. The Court also held that the willfulness requirement in the criminal provision required the government to prove that the defendant knew about Rule 10b-5 before a sentence of imprisonment may be imposed.

The defendants were charged with willfully structuring currency transactions at banks—that is, exchanging $9,500 for cashier’s checks. The defendants acknowledged knowing about the bank’s reporting requirement and conceded that their conduct was intended to avoid the filing of a report. They insisted that they did not know that structuring a transaction was a criminal offense (18 U.S.C. § 5324). The Supreme Court held that this was a valid defense: the term “willfully” in the statute requires proof that the defendants knew that their conduct was unlawful.

Note: In 1994 Congress “legislatively overruled” Ratzlaf.

In this tax evasion prosecution, the district court erroneously instructed the jury that the defendant could be found guilty of tax evasion if he unreasonably believed that he had no obligation to pay taxes. That is, in order to establish the element of willfulness, the government must prove that the defendant in fact knew that he was evading taxes. A good faith misunderstanding of the law or a good faith belief that one is not violating the law negates willfulness, whether or not that claimed belief or misunderstanding is objectively reasonable.

It is a federal offense to engage in the sale of firearms without a license. The question in this case is what is the government required to prove about the defendant’s knowledge of the law before he may be convicted of willfully violating the statute. The Court concludes that the defendant must be shown to know that he is violating the law, but the government is not required to show that the defendant was aware of the specific licensing requirement that he violated.

In order to be guilty of making an unlawful interstate threat, it is not enough that the defendant’s rants (on Facebook) would be perceived by others as threatening. The government must prove that the defendant intended the statements as threats. There must be subjective intent to threaten the listener, which is not satisfied simply with proof that a reasonable listener would feel threatened.

United States v. Tydingco, 909 F.3d 297 (9th Cir. 2018)

The crime of harboring a fugitive requires proof that the defendant intended to violate the law.
Omitting term “corruptly” when defining the elements of a § 1512(b)(3) offense was reversible error. The Seventh Circuit also noted the divergent opinions about what exactly the mens rea is for a § 1512(b)(3) offense: whether the defendant must specifically intent to impair a criminal investigation or if it is sufficient to intend to violate the law. But in either event, the lack of any mens rea in the instruction in this case was reversible error.

The defendant was charged with illegally bringing guns into California. Under the Bryan standard, a defendant can be found guilty of a crime requiring a “willful” mens rea if the defendant knew that he was committing an illegal act, even if he was not necessarily aware of the specific illegality of his conduct. In this case, the court instructed the jury on this principle in the standard Bryan jury language. However, during the course of trial, the government introduced evidence that the defendant may have been engaged in other illegal conduct after he engaged in the charged offense. The jury may have believed that this subsequent illegal conduct qualified to satisfy the willfulness requirement of the charged offense. The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction. The defendant’s bad purpose must involve the charged offense, not some other (and in particular subsequent) offense.

The defendant was charged with second degree murder for his role in a “hazing” incident involving another soldier on a military base. The hazing involved several soldiers beating another soldier (with his consent) for a few minutes. The incident resulted in the death of the hazee. The defendant argued that the victim’s consent was relevant to the defendant’s state of mind. Second degree murder requires the government to prove malice and malice can be proven by showing that a defendant intended to kill or, as the government argued here, that he consciously disregarded an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury. While it is true that the defendant cannot “blame the victim,” the defense is still entitled to offer evidence that negates his culpable state of mind. The defense counsel argued that the victims’ consent to being hazed was relevant to the determination whether the defendant acted with malice. In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jury that that was entirely erroneous and that the victim’s consent was not relevant to any issue in the case. After closing argument, the judge declined to issue an instruction that explained that the victim’s consent could be relevant to the issue of malice. The D.C. Circuit reversed the conviction. The victim’s consenting behavior—that is, his “continued, and enthusiastic, statements that he wanted the initiation to continue”—suggested that Williams was not conscious of an extreme risk that Johnson might die or be seriously injured.

The statute that outlaws exporting munitions illegally (The Arms Export Control Act) requires that the government prove that the offense was committed willfully. 22 U.S.C. § 2778(b)(2) and (c). The Seventh Circuit holds that the term “willfully” in this statute requires proof that the defendant had knowledge that he needed a license to export the munitions that he exported. The instruction should specifically reference the necessity of proving that the defendant knew that the specific item that he was exporting was not allowed to be exported.

United States v. Gray, 780 F.3d 458 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant was prosecuted for falsely reporting a bomb threat on a flight. The required mens rea instruction is that the hoax must have been perpetrated with “malice” which is defined as acting with “evil purpose or evil motive.” The trial judge instructed the jury that “malice” means “evil purpose or improper motive.” This was reversible error. “Improper” is not the same as “with malice” or “evil.”

United States v. Montgomery, 747 F.3d 303 (5th Cir. 2014)

In a tax prosecution, when the trial court instructs the jury in accordance with Cheek, the instruction must include the concept that a defendant’s belief in the legality of his conduct is a defense and the belief need not be reasonable. Even an unreasonable belief in the lawfulness of one’s conduct is sufficient to require acquittal.

United States v. Liu, 731 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2013)

In a criminal copyright prosecution, 17 U.S.C. § 506(a), the term “willfully” requires proof that the defendant intended to violate a criminal law, not just that he or she intended to make a copy of a copyrighted work. In a case involving counterfeit labels, the term “knowingly” requires proof that the defendant knew that the labels were counterfeit, not just that he knew that he was trafficking in labels that happen to turn out to be counterfeit.

United States v. Sasso, 695 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2012)

18 U.S.C. § 32(a)(5) makes it a crime to willfully interfere with anybody engaged in the authorized operation of an aircraft with intent to endanger the safety of any person or with reckless disregard for the safety of human life. The trial court instructed the jury, “If a person’s actions interfere with an aircraft operator, you may infer that the person acted willfully if his actions were deliberate and intentional and had the natural and probable effect of interfering with the aircraft operator.” The First Circuit held that this instruction diluted the willfulness element by allowing the jury to infer willfulness from the fact that the defendant acted purposefully, without proof that he knew that interference was the natural and probable effect of his action
(i.e., pointing a laser at a helicopter). See also United States v. Rodriguez, 790 F.3d 951 (9th Cir.
2015); United States v. Gardenhire, 784 F.3d 1277 (9th Cir. 2015).

United States v. Phillips, 688 F.3d 802 (7th Cir. 2012)

Judge Easterbrook and Judge Posner face off on the question of whether a defendant is guilty of making a false statement to a bank if the defendant is not aware that the false statement would influence the bank (because the defendant is lured into believing that the bank does not care about this particular statement). Judge Easterbrook in the panel opinion, concluded (for the majority) that the defendant need only be shown to have known that the statement was false and it was submitted to the bank with the understanding that the bank would consider the loan application when deciding whether to authorize the loan. Judge Posner, in dissent, wrote that the trial court erred in prohibiting the defendant from introducing evidence that the defendant, though knowing that the statement was false, was led to believe that it was not something the bank cared about. This case involved the typical “stated income” mortgage fraud case in which the mortgage broker told the customer/defendant that it made no difference what was written on the loan application, because “no doc” loans were known as “liar’s loans” and the bank was not interested in the customer’s recitation of income, because all that mattered was the customer’s credit score. NOTE: Rehearing en banc was granted on December 7, 2012. REHEARING EN BANC GRANTED, and the conviction was reversed: In the en banc decision, Judge Posner wrote the majority opinion, and held that the evidence about what the defendants were told was admissible and could have disproved that they had the required state of mind to commit the offense. 731 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2013).

United States v. Berry, 683 F.3d 1015 (9th Cir. 2012)

Though the error was harmless, the trial court erred in its definition of “willfulness” because the definition simply reiterated the concept of knowledge. Willfulness involves an act committed with the purpose of violating the law. Knowledge simply means that the act is committed not through accident or mistake.

United States v. Tobin, 676 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2012)

The court held that “willfulness” is not an element of a § 841 offense (distribution of a controlled substance) and therefore, it is no defense that the defendant did not realize that his conduct was illegal or that he had consulted with a lawyer and the lawyer said the conduct was not illegal (this was an Internet Pharmacy prosecution). However, to be convicted of conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance, the defendant is required to act with knowledge of the illegality of his conduct, because under § 846, willfulness is an element of the offense and therefore, advice of counsel is a defense to a § 846 offense.

United States v. Waller, 654 F.3d 430 (3rd Cir. 2011)

The trial court instructed the jury that in ascertaining the defendant’s intent, it could consider any statements made or omitted by the defendant. The defendant had invoked his right to remain silent when he was arrested. This instruction was an improper invitation to consider the defendant’s post-Miranda silence. Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976). Conviction reversed.

United States v. Weeks, 653 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2011)

In the context of reviewing an ineffective assistance of counsel claim for a defendant who entered a guilty plea to a conspiracy offense, the Tenth Circuit emphasized that a conspiracy conviction requires proof that the defendant knew that his agreement involved a violation of the law, not simply an agreement to engage in certain conduct: “An agreement with others that certain activities be done, without knowing at the time of the agreement that the activities violate the law, is therefore insufficient to establish conspiracy.”

United States v. Mousavi, 604 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir. 2010)

The Bryan standard of wilfullness – the defendant must be shown to have known that he was acting illegally, but the government is not required to prove that the defendant knew the specific licensing requirement that he violated – applies in a prosecution for the International Economic Emergency Powers Act, which outlaws selling certain goods to Iran.
United States v. Hassan, 578 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2008)

The defendant was prosecuted for conspiring to import “khat” a plant grown in the Africa that sometimes contains a controlled substance known as cathinone. The plant itself is not illegal, but cathinone is. The evidence was sufficient to prove that he conspired to import khat containing cathinone. However, the jury instruction explaining the offense to the jury was erroneous. The jury instruction suggested that if the defendant conspired to import any controlled substance, the jury could convict the defendant. In this case, however, because of the confusion about whether khat was a controlled substance (it is not, but many government witnesses erroneously testified that it is), the judge should have specifically instructed the jury that the government had to prove that the defendant conspired to import khat containing cathinone in order to convict him of the conspiracy offense.

United States v. Griffin, 524 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2008)

At least in the context of a tax case, the trial court may not equate willfulness with recklessness. Thus, in a case involving filing a false tax return, the jury should not be told that recklessness is sufficient to prove the mens rea of the offense. Rather, “‘Willfully’ for purposes of the statute, means a voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty.”

United States v. Fields, 500 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2007)

The Child Support Recovery Act (18 U.S.C. § 228) requires proof that the defendant willfully failed to pay a past due support obligation to his child who resided in another state. Is the state required to prove that the defendant knew that his child resided in another state? According to this decision, the answer is “yes.” Though the “out of state” requirement is also a federal jurisdictional element of the offense, the court concludes that defendant’s knowledge of the location of the child is also an element of the offense that the government must prove.

United States v. Kenyon, 481 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2007)

Attempt crimes require proof of specific intent to commit the crime. Consequently, a defendant may defend on the basis that he did not intend to commit the crime, even if the crime itself is not a specific intent crime. In this case, the defendant was charged with attempt to commit child sex abuse. He claimed that he was too intoxicated to have that intent. Even though intoxication is not a defense to the crime of sex abuse, it is a defense to the crime of attempt to commit sex abuse. There was sufficient evidence of the defendant’s intoxication in this case to warrant the giving of an intoxication instruction and the failure to do so was reversible error as to those counts.

Laird v. Horn, 414 F.3d 419 (3rd Cir. 2005)

Two defendants were tried for first degree murder in a Pennsylvania state court. The accomplice liability jury instruction did not clearly inform the jury that in order to be found guilty of aiding and abetting murder in the first degree (as opposed to being the actual killer), the defendant must have the intent to kill, not just the intent to engage in criminal activity that resulted in an accomplice killing the victim.

United States v. Cassel, 408 F.3d 622 (9th Cir. 2005)
The defendant was charged with interfering with a sale of federal land by intimidation (18 U.S.C. § 1860). He defended on First Amendment grounds. The Ninth Circuit held that the government must prove that the defendant subjectively intended to intimidate the victim. Absent this requirement, the First Amendment would bar a prosecution. The trial court’s failure to properly instruct the jury on this element – subjective intent to intimidate – was harmful error.

Smith v. Horn, 120 F.3d 400 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with capital murder in Pennsylvania. The trial court charged the jury (and the prosecutor argued), that as long as the defendant and his colleague were "accomplices" in the robbery, it did not matter who actually shot the victim. This was erroneous under state law. The defendant must have had the specific intent to kill in order to be guilty of first degree murder under state law and the failure to properly instruct the jury amounted to a violation of due process.

United States v. Ladish Malting Co., 135 F.3d 484 (7th Cir. 1998)

The defendant corporation was charged with violating OSHA laws, because a fire escape was in an unsafe condition, resulting in the death of an employee. The statute, 29 U.S.C. § 666, requires that the violation be willful before certain criminal penalties can be imposed. The judge instructed the jury that "willful" in this context means that the corporation either knew of the unsafe condition of the fire escape, or "should have known" of the hazardous condition. This was reversible error. "Should have known" is a civil negligence standard. In order to have knowledge, the corporation must have had actual knowledge, or remained deliberately ignorant of the unsafe condition.

United States v. King, 122 F.3d 808 (9th Cir. 1997)

The crime of mailing threatening communications (18 U.S.C. § 876) requires proof that the defendant had the specific intent to threaten. The trial court's failure to instruct the jury on this element was reversible error.

United States v. Starks, 157 F.3d 833 (11th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with violation of the Medicare Antikickback Statute, 42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b(b). The court concluded that the “willful” requirement was properly explained to the jury in these terms: “The word “willfully,” as that term is used from time to time in these instructions, means the act was committed voluntarily and purposely, with the specific intent to do something the law forbids, that is with a bad purpose, either to disobey or disregard the law.” The defendant sought a “Ratzlaf” instruction that would have required the jury to find that the defendant was aware of the actual law he was violating. Based on Bryan v. United States, 118 S. Ct. 1939 (1998), however, the court concluded that the government was only required to prove that the defendant was aware that he was violating the law – not that he was aware of the specific law that he was violating.

United States v. Regan, 937 F.2d 823 (2d Cir. 1991)

The trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury on the specific mistake of law defense offered by the defendants. A general mistake of law instruction was not sufficient. Rather, the court should have specifically instructed the jury clearly that the theory of the defendants, if believed, justified acquittal on the tax charges.

United States v. Hayden, 64 F.3d 126 (3rd Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with a violation of 18 U.S.C. §922(n), possessing a firearm while under a felony charge. An essential element of this offense is that the defendant know that he is currently charged with a felony. This knowledge is part of the “willful” element of the offense. The defendant must act with the knowledge that he is violating the law. Here, the defendant offered evidence of his low I.Q. to support an inference that he was unaware of the pending felony charge. Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

United States v. Curran, 20 F.3d 560 (3rd Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged under §1001 with causing the filing of a false statement to the Federal Election Commission relating to campaign contributions. The defendant had his company’s employees make personal contributions to political candidates and then reimbursed them, a practice which violates the Federal Election Campaign Act. The court holds that the Ratzlaf definition of willfulness applies in this context – therefore, the jury must be instructed that the defendant was aware of the law and knew that his conduct was illegal. The election law, like the structuring laws, does not outlaw conduct which is “obviously evil” and represents a “regulatory statute.” Thus, the jury should have been instructed that the defendant must have been shown to know of the campaign treasurers’ reporting obligations, that he attempted to frustrate those obligations, and that he knew his conduct was unlawful.

United States v. Rogers, 18 F.3d 265 (4th Cir. 1994)

The trial court’s jury instruction was infected with a Ratzlaf error: the jury was not instructed that the defendant had to know that structuring was a criminal offense.

United States v. Ojebode, 957 F.2d 1218 (5th Cir. 1992)

Defendant was detained at the Houston Airport after a plane in which he was traveling from Germany to Mexico made a brief stop there. He was found to be in possession of heroin. He defended a charge of importation on the basis that he never intended to import the heroin into the United States. Though the evidence was sufficient to support the conviction, the failure to charge the jury that the defendant had to specifically intend to bring the contraband into the United States was reversible error. Moreover, it was error to instruct the jury that knowledge of the plane’s flight schedule could be found if the defendant remained deliberately ignorant. There was no basis in the record for this deliberate ignorance instruction.

United States v. Buford, 889 F.2d 1406 (5th Cir. 1989)

The trial court instructed the jury as follows: “It is not necessary for the government to prove that either defendant knew that a particular act or failure to act is a violation of law. Unless and until outweighed by evidence in the case to the contrary, the presumption is that every person knows what the law forbids, and what the law requires to be done.” This is an improper burden-shifting instruction. Any crime which has willfulness as an element requires that the defendant’s conduct represent a voluntary intentional violation of a known legal duty. Thus, the defendants must be shown to have known the legal duty which they violated.
United States v. Burroughs, 876 F.2d 366 (5th Cir. 1989)

The trial judge committed reversible error in failing to define the term “willfully” in this conspiracy trial. Because the defendant claimed that he lacked the intent to form the agreement, the error could not be deemed harmless.

United States v. Obiechie, 38 F.3d 309 (7th Cir. 1994)

Certain provisions of the Gun Control Act (18 U.S.C. §924) require that the defendant act knowingly; other provisions require that the defendant act willfully. The difference is this: to act knowingly is to act with knowledge of what one is doing, that is, to act with the intent to do the act that is proscribed by the law. To act willfully requires that the defendant act with knowledge of what the law proscribes and to act in violation of the law, knowing that he is doing so. In short, willfully requires knowledge of what the law is; to act knowingly does not require knowledge of the law.

United States v. Shortman, 91 F.3d 80 (9th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was charged with involuntary manslaughter under 18 U.S.C. §1112, 1153. The court instructed the jury that if the defendant acted in a manner without due caution, this was sufficient to constituted gross negligence which could support an involuntary manslaughter conviction. This was erroneous. The absence of due care is not equivalent to gross negligence.

United States v. Grigsby, 111 F.3d 806 (11th Cir. 1997)

The African Elephant Conservation Act, 16 U.S.C. §4223(l), makes it a crime to knowingly violate the provisions of the act. The court in this case held that even though there is no “willful” element of the act, the government must prove that the defendant knew the provisions of the law and knowingly violating the law.

United States v. Rhone, 864 F.2d 832 (D.C.Cir. 1989)

The trial judge informed the jury that the defendant’s ignorance of the law was no excuse. The defendant had attempted to obtain unemployment benefits while he was working full time. The trial judge’s instruction could have been misinterpreted to mean that the defendant did not have to defraud the government, which would be erroneous. The defendant did have to realize his ineligibility for the benefits in order to have been guilty of committing mail fraud. Because of this possible confusion, a reversal was required.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Knowledge)

The United States Supreme Court held that the statute outlawing the interstate transportation of obscene material depicting minors, 18 U.S.C. §2252, has an implicit requirement that the offender know that the actor depicted is a minor.

Staples v. United States, 511 U.S. 600 (1994)

The National Firearm Act outlaws the possession of a machine gun. There is no explicit scienter requirement in the Act. The Supreme Court holds that there is an implicit knowledge requirement. Thus, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant knew that the weapon he possessed had automatic firing capability.

In a normal prosecution for possession, possessing with intent to distribute, or distributing a controlled substance, the government can satisfy the element of “knowledge” in one of two ways: (1) the defendant knew that he was possessing/distributing a controlled substance (though not necessarily which one – he or she did know however, that the object possessed was a controlled substance); or (2) the defendant knew that he or she was in possession of a particular substance (e.g., heroin, marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine) which is, in fact, a controlled substance, even if the defendant did not know that the particular substance that he knew he was possessing was in fact a controlled substance. In other words, the defendant must either know that the substance possessed was some kind of controlled substance (though not necessarily which one) or that the substance was a particular substance, even if he did not know that that substance was a controlled substance. In a case involving an Analogue Drug, the same rule applies: the defendant must either be shown to know that the substance possessed was a particular substance that he knew to be an analogue, or he must be shown to have known that he possessed a particular substance which is, in fact, a qualifying analogue.

United States v. Davis, 854 F.3d 601 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with sexual exploitation of a minor. The indictment alleged that he recruited the child to participate in a sex video, “knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that the person had not attained the age of 18.” However, the trial court instructed the jury that the knowledge requirement of the offense could be satisfied with proof that “the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to observe “the person].” This amounted to a constructive amendment of the indictment, because it provided the jury a path to conviction that was not alleged in the indictment. See also United States v. Dipentino, 242 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2001).

United States v. White, --- F.3d ----, 15-2027 (8th Cir. 2017)

Finally coming into line with the Staples decision, the Eighth Circuit holds that in order to be convicted of possession of an unregistered firearm, the government must prove that the defendant had knowledge of the facts relating to the gun that it made it subject to the registration requirement (i.e., the diameter of the barrel).
This case was tried prior to the decision in McFadden v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2298 (2015), but that Supreme Court decision was issued while this appeal was pending. The jury instruction at trial did not comply with McFadden’s knowledge requirement. The error was not harmless, even though a special interrogatory correctly included the knowledge requirement for a prosecution under the Analogue Act, because the special interrogatory did not repeat that the element of knowledge had to be found beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Stanford, 823 F.3d 814 (5th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with possession of a sawed-off shotgun. Pursuant to Staples v. United States, the government was required to prove that the defendant knew the characteristics of the firearm that brought it within the scope of the registration act. The jury instruction did not explain the proper mens rea element.

United States v. Montoya-Gaxiola, 796 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with conspiracy to fraudulently import contraband cigarettes. The Eighth Circuit held that although this is a general intent crime, the government is still required to prove “knowledge” that the defendant was transacting in contraband cigarettes. She undeniably knew that she was receiving cigarettes from overseas, but there was insufficient proof that she knew that they were contraband. A knowingly violation of the law requires proof that the defendant knew the essential facts, even if she did not know the law regarding contraband cigarettes.

United States v. Horse, 747 F.3d 1040 (8th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with criminal sexual conduct (rape), pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 2242(2), by having sex with the victim who lacked the capacity to consent. The issue addressed by the Eighth Circuit was whether the government must prove that the defendant knew that the victim lacked capacity to consent. The Eighth Circuit concluded that the defendant must, indeed, have known that the victim lacked the capacity to consent and the failure to instruct the jury on this point was plain error.

United States v. Liu, 731 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2013)

In a criminal copyright prosecution, 17 U.S.C. § 506(a), the term “willfully” requires proof that the defendant intended to violate a criminal law, not just that he or she intended to make a copy of a copyrighted work. In a case involving counterfeit labels, the term “knowingly” requires proof that the defendant knew that the labels were counterfeit, not just that he knew that he was trafficking in labels that happen to turn out to be counterfeit.

United States v. Rouillard, 701 F.3d 861 (8th Cir. 2012)

It is a federal crime to have sex with a person who lacks the capacity to consent (e.g., because of intoxication) if the offense occurs on federal property. 18 U.S.C. § 2242. Does the defendant have to be shown to know the victim lacked consent? In this case, the Eighth Circuit held that knowledge of the victim’s lack of capacity is an element of the offense. Because sexual conduct is not inherently illegal, knowledge of the fact that makes the conduct illegal must be an element of the offense that must be proven by the government. REHEARING EN BANC
GRANTED ON MARCH 3, 2013. See 740 F.3d 1170 (8th Cir 2014) (affirming the panel decision) and United States v. Bruguier, 735 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 2013).

United States v. Munguia, 704 F.3d 596 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with possessing pseudoephedrine knowing or having reasonable cause to believe it would be used to manufacture meth. 21 U.S.C. § 841(c)(2). The Ninth Circuit holds that “reasonable cause to believe” is to be applied in a subjective, not an objective, manner. Thus, the question is whether this defendant had reasonable cause to believe that the listed chemical was destined to be used to manufacture meth, not whether a reasonable person would have cause to believe this.

United States v. Huping Zhou, 678 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant accessed personal patient records in violation of HIPAA. The question posed to the Ninth Circuit is whether the government was required to prove that the defendant knew that this was a crime. The statute provides that “A person who knowingly and in violation of this part – (2) obtains individually identifiable health information relating to an individual . . . shall be punished.” The Ninth Circuit concluded that the defendant must be shown to know what he was doing, but not that what he was doing was a violation of the statute.

United States v. Chappell, 665 F.3d 1012 (8th Cir. 2012)

When the defendant committed his prostitution offense, the law required proof that the defendant “knew” that the prostitute was younger than 18. Prior to trial, however, the law was amended to provide that the offense was committed if the defendant “knew, or acted in reckless disregard of the fact that the person was younger than 18.” The trial court instructed the jury under the new standard, even though that was not the law when the crime was committed. This was plain error.

United States v. Shim, 584 F.3d 394 (2d Cir. 2009)

In a Mann Act prosecution, 18 U.S.C. § 2421, the government must prove that the defendant knew that the woman was transported in interstate commerce. It is not sufficient to only prove that the defendant knowingly transported the woman.

United States v. Fields, 500 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2007)

The Child Support Recovery Act (18 U.S.C. § 228) requires proof that the defendant willfully failed to pay a past due support obligation to his child who resided in another state. Is the state required to prove that the defendant knew that his child resided in another state? According to this decision, the answer is “yes.” Though the “out of state” requirement is also a federal jurisdictional element of the offense, the court concludes that defendant’s knowledge of the location of the child is also an element of the offense that the government must prove.

United States v. Cacioppo, 460 F.3d 1012 (8th Cir. 2006)

The defendants were prosecuted for making a false statement in connection with ERISA reports, 18 U.S.C. §1027. The trial court erroneously instructed the jury that a conviction could be predicated on a finding that the defendant recklessly disregarded whether his statement was false, or not. The statute requires proof of “knowing” false statements and reckless disregard for the truthfulness of a statement is not the same as knowing that a statement is false.

United States v. Murphy, 406 F.3d 857 (7th Cir. 2005)

Two defendants were charged with threatening and beating up a government witness. Both defendants participated in the beating. However, one of the defendants was not shown to have known that the victim was being beaten because she was a witness. While she was guilty of assaulting the victim, she was not guilty of obstructing justice because of the absence of proof that she knew the reason for the assault.

United States v. Valencia, 394 F.3d 352 (5th Cir. 2004)

The Commodities Exchange Act makes it a crime to knowingly deliver or cause to be delivered false or misleading or knowingly inaccurate reports. Does this mean that a person can be found guilty if he (1) knowingly delivers; (2) a false report that he does not know is false? The Fifth Circuit held that pursuant to United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994), the law would be interpreted to mean that the “knowledge” requirement applies not only to the delivery, but also to the falsity of the report.

United States v. Hussein, 351 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2003)

Claiming that it is an issue of first impression, the First Circuit holds that it is no defense to a § 841 charge that the defendant did not know the type, or quantity of drugs that he possessed. In this case, the defendant acknowledged that he possessed a controlled substance knowingly, but claimed he did not know what type of drug, or the quantity. The First Circuit held that even post-Apprendi, this is not a defense.

United States v. Jackson, 124 F.3d 607 (4th Cir. 1997)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the defendant, charged with possessing an unregistered firearm, had to be shown to have known the characteristics of his sawed-off shotgun that made it a firearm subject to the requirements of the Firearm Act. See Staples v. United States, 511 U.S. 600 (1994). The failure to instruct the jury consistent with Staples, however, was not plain error.

United States v. Wilson, 133 F.3d 251 (4th Cir. 1997)

In order to prove a violation of the Clean Water Act, the government must prove that the defendant had knowledge of each of the facts -- the elements of the offense -- that constitute the crime, though the defendant need not be shown to have knowledge of the illegality of his conduct. Thus, the defendant must know that he was discharging a substance; must know the identity of the substance he was discharging; must know the instrumentality or method by which the pollutants were discharged; must know the physical characteristics of the property into which the pollutant was discharged that identify it as a wetland; must know the link between the wetlands and waters of the United States; and must know that he did not have a permit. The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the government was required to prove the defendant's knowledge with regard to each element of the offense.

United States v. Ladish Malting Co., 135 F.3d 484 (7th Cir. 1998)
The defendant corporation was charged with violating OSHA laws, because a fire escape was in an unsafe condition, resulting in the death of an employee. The statute, 29 U.S.C. § 666, requires that the violation be willful before certain criminal penalties can be imposed. The judge instructed the jury that "willful" in this context means that the corporation either knew of the unsafe condition of the fire escape, or "should have known" of the hazardous condition. This was reversible error. "Should have known" is a civil negligence standard. In order to have knowledge, the corporation must have had actual knowledge, or remained deliberately ignorant of the unsafe condition.

United States v. MacDonald & Watson Waste Oil Co., 933 F.2d 35 (1st Cir. 1991)

The trial court improperly instructed the jury that a corporate officer could be guilty of violating the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act either by having actual knowledge of the violation or by proof that the defendant is the responsible corporate officer who had direct responsibility for the activities that are alleged to be illegal. The judge also cautioned the jury that the proof must show that the defendant must have known or believed that the illegal activity of the type alleged occurred. While knowledge may be inferred from various circumstances, including the defendant’s position and responsibility – and while willful blindness may suffice in certain circumstances – the instruction in this case allowed the government to establish knowledge simply by proving that the defendant occupied a certain position and knew of prior violations. This was reversible error.

United States v. Hastings, 918 F.2d 369 (2d Cir. 1990)

After being asked by jurors to elaborate on the difference between “possession” and “knowing possession” in connection with a firearm offense, the trial judge’s incomplete charge could have left the jury with the belief that a finding of knowledge was not necessary in order to convict the defendant.

United States v. Cedelle, 89 F.3d 181 (4th Cir. 1996)

As explained by the Supreme Court in United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 115 S.Ct. 464 (1994), in a prosecution for possession of child pornography under 18 U.S.C. §2252(a)(2), the government must prove not only that the defendant knew he was in possession of a videotape, but also that he knew the participants were children and that they were engaged in explicit sexual activity. The trial court erred in its instruction to the jury in this case, but the error did not amount to plain error necessitating a reversal because the defendant expressly ordered child pornography from the undercover agents.

United States v. Ahmad, 101 F.3d 386 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was charged with a violation of 33 U.S.C. §1319(c)(2)(A), the Clean Water Act. The Act makes it a crime to knowingly discharge a pollutant into a navigable water. The question in this case was what the defendant had to “know?” The Fifth Circuit concluded that the government had to prove that the defendant knew (1) that he discharged; (2) a pollutant; (3) into a navigable water of the U.S. The trial court erroneously instructed the jury that the knowledge requirement only applied to the element that there was a discharge. Thus, in this case, the defendant should have been able to argue that he thought he was discharging water (as opposed to a pollutant) into the navigable waters.
United States v. Burian, 19 F.3d 188 (5th Cir. 1994)

The federal statute criminalizing the knowing receipt of visual depictions of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct has an implicit knowledge requirement that the defendant be aware (or be recklessly disregarding) the age of the performer.

United States v. Hooker, 997 F.2d 67 (5th Cir. 1993)

18 U.S.C. §922(k) outlaws the knowing transportation of firearms with altered serial numbers. The Fifth Circuit concluded that the knowledge element of the offense includes actual knowledge that the firearm had an altered serial number, not just knowledge of the interstate transportation.

United States v. Garrett, 984 F.2d 1402 (5th Cir. 1993)

Though the statute is silent on the mens rea element of the offense, the crime of carrying a weapon on an aircraft requires that the defendant know that he is carrying a gun, or at least that he should have known. The government urged a strict liability theory. Absent a clear indication from Congress that this was to be a strict liability offense, however, the court concluded that the minimum level of scienter – “should have known” – applies.

United States v. Obiechie, 38 F.3d 309 (7th Cir. 1994)

Certain provisions of the Gun Control Act (18 U.S.C. §924) require that the defendant act knowingly; other provisions require that the defendant act willfully. The difference is this: to act knowingly is to act with knowledge of what one is doing, that is, to act with the intent to do the act that is proscribed by the law. To act willfully requires that the defendant act with knowledge of what the law prescribes and to act in violation of the law, knowing that he is doing so. In short, willfully requires knowledge of what the law is; to act knowingly does not require knowledge of the law.

United States v. Nguyen, 73 F.3d 887 (9th Cir. 1995)

8 U.S.C. §1324(a) makes it an offense to bring any alien into the United States other than through a port of entry. The statute contains no explicit mens rea requirement. Nevertheless, the court concluded that Congress intended such a requirement. See Staples v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 1793 (1994); United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422 (1978); Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952). The government must prove that the defendant knew that the individuals he was transporting were aliens and that he off-loaded them at other than a port of entry, intending to violate the law.

United States v. Stein, 37 F.3d 1407 (9th Cir. 1994)

In its money laundering instruction, the trial court correctly informed the jury that the defendant must have knowledge that the money engaged in the transaction was derived from a specified felony. In a later general charge to the jury, the judge explained that, “An act is done knowingly if the defendant is aware of the act and doesn’t act through ignorance, mistake or accident. The government is not required to prove that the defendant knew that his acts or omissions were unlawful.” This latter instruction conflicted with the former instruction and therefore tainted the money laundering conviction. Where the jury is offered inconsistent instructions, one right and the other wrong, the jury cannot be presumed to have followed the correct instruction.
United States v. Rubio-Villareal, 967 F.2d 294 (9th Cir. 1992)

A trial court should not give an instruction to the jury to the effect that an inference can be drawn that the driver of a vehicle knows of the existence of any contraband in the vehicle. In effect, this instruction could lead the jury to ignore other relevant facts and make a decision based solely on the facts giving rise to the inference.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(MISCELLANEOUS)

United States v. McKnight, 671 F.3d 664 (7th Cir. 2012)

Judge Posner authors an interesting dissent to the denial of rehearing en banc on the question of the propriety of instructing the jury on an irrelevant issue. In this case, the government requested an instruction that explained that the use of wiretaps was a legitimate tool for investigating criminal offenses and the trial judge instructed the jury on this topic. According to Judge Posner, the judge should not have done so.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Missing Witness)

United States v. Leal-Del Carmen, 697 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 2012)

Deporting a potentially exculpatory witness prior to providing the defense an opportunity to interview the witness violates the defendant’s right to compulsory process and to due process. The defendant, however, is required to show that the government acted in bad faith, a showing that was, in fact, made in this case, because the government had interviewed the witness prior to deporting him. The Ninth Circuit held that once the government is aware that a witness has exculpatory evidence, the government must alert the defense. If defense counsel has not yet been appointed or retained, the government may not deport the witness until after counsel is appointed or retained and given an opportunity to preserve the testimony. The Ninth Circuit also held that the trial court should have permitted the defendant to introduce the witness’s statement to the border agent prior to being deported. The out-of-court declaration was admissible pursuant to Rule 804(b)(6) – the forfeiture by wrongdoing hearsay exception – because the government rendered the witness unavailable. Finally, the appellate court held that the defendant was entitled to a “missing witness” instruction that would have advised the jury that the failure of a party to produce a material witness who could elucidate matters under investigation gives rise to a presumption that the testimony of that witness would be unfavorable to that party if the witness is peculiarly within the party’s control. The deported witness could have been paroled back into the country, but only the government could produce the witness under that procedure. “For the government to say that it isn’t responsible for her absence because it no longer knows where to find her comes close to the classic definition of chutzpah.”
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Presumptions)

United States v. Cessa, 785 F.3d 165 (5th Cir. 2015)

A legitimate business that accepts money from a drug dealer, knowing that the money is tainted and knowing that the effect of taking the money would be to conceal the source of the money, is not necessarily guilty of conspiracy to launder the money. It is one thing to be in the business of laundering money and another to simply do business with a drug dealer: the former is a money launderer, the latter is not (at least not necessarily, simply by doing business with the drug dealer). The court also reversed the conviction of one defendant because of a mandatory presumption jury instruction: the trial court instructed the jury that, “The commingling of illegal proceeds with legitimate business funds is evidence of intent to conceal or disguise.” This instruction created a mandatory presumption. The appropriate instruction should state that the jury “may infer,” such intent, not that such conduct “is evidence” of such an intent.

Owens v. McLaughlin, 733 F.3d 320 (11th Cir. 2013)

In Georgia, if the location where a murder occurred cannot be determined with certainty, a pattern jury instruction advises the jury, “If a dead body is discovered in this state and it cannot be readily determined in what county the cause of death was inflicted, it shall be considered that the cause of death was inflicted in the county in which the dead body was discovered.” In Georgia, venue is an essential element of an offense and, therefore, the state must prove venue beyond a reasonable doubt. This instruction operates as a mandatory presumption by instructing the jury what it shall consider to be the proper venue in certain circumstances. As such, the instruction is unconstitutional, though it was harmless error in this case.

United States v. Sasso, 695 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2012)

18 U.S.C. § 32(a)(5) makes it a crime to willfully interfere with anybody engaged in the authorized operation of an aircraft with intent to endanger the safety of any person or with reckless disregard for the safety of human life. The trial court instructed the jury, “If a person’s actions interfere with an aircraft operator, you may infer that the person acted willfully if his actions were deliberate and intentional and had the natural and probable effect of interfering with the aircraft operator.” The First Circuit held that this instruction diluted the willfulness element, by allowing the jury to infer willfulness from the fact that the defendant acted purposefully, without proof that he knew that interference was the natural and probable effect of his action (i.e., pointing a laser at a helicopter).

Stark v. Hickman, 455 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2006)

The trial court’s “presumption of sanity” instruction in this state court prosecution was constitutionally infirm.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Lesser Included Offenses)

The Supreme Court affirmed the Seventh Circuit en banc decision, holding that a defendant is entitled to a lesser-included offense instruction only if the “elements test” is satisfied. That is, a defendant may only be found guilty of a lesser-included offense if that offense is necessarily included in the offense which is charged in the indictment. It is not proper to examine the “inherent relationship” between the offenses in light of the specific facts of the case. Rather, the Court need only examine the elements of the offense to determine whether one offense is a lesser-included offense of another.

Hopkins v. Reeves, 118 S.Ct. 1895 (1998)

In a death penalty case, the trial court is not required to instruct the jury on lesser included offenses that are not, as a matter of state law, lesser included offenses of the charged offense. In Nebraska, for example, manslaughter is not a lesser-included offense of felony murder. Therefore, in a felony murder prosecution in which the state is seeking the death penalty, it is not required that the jury be instructed on the law of manslaughter.

A death sentence cannot constitutionally be imposed unless the jury is permitted to consider a verdict of guilt as to a lesser-included non-capital offense, provided that the evidence would support such a verdict.

United States v. LaPointe, 690 F.3d 434 (6th Cir. 2012)

Defendant was charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute oxycodone. He requested an instruction on the lesser included offense of conspiracy to possess oxycodone (a conspiracy). The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury as requested. First, the court held that the fact that the indictment alleged that the defendants conspired to distribute and to possess with intent to distribute did not mean that a conspiracy to possess was no a lesser included offense because it is not a lesser offense of the conspiracy to distribute. (An indictment frequently charges in the conjunctive, but a jury can convict of either of the methods). Second, the fact that all conspirators did not share the limited conspiracy to simply possess the drugs did no mean that the defendant did not have that limited agreement with others.

United States v. Pillado, 656 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was enlisted by undercover agents to help unload a kilogram of marijuana from a truck. The defendant was at first reluctant, but later agreed to help. He was prosecuted for possession with intent to distribute the marijuana. He requested an instruction on simple possession. Though he obviously did not possess the marijuana for personal use, that is not the only type of simple possession that exists. The government failed to prove that the defendant’s only possession could have been for the purpose of distributing it. The defendant may have simply abandoned the marijuana, in which case he would not have possessed it with the intent to distribute it.
United States v. Boidi, 568 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 2009)
A conspiracy to possess drugs is a lesser included offense of a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute. The government acknowledged that possession is a lesser included offense of possession with intent to distribute; but argued that this logic does not apply to conspiracy offenses. The First Circuit rejected this argument, but held that in order to insist on such an instruction, the defendant must show that, on the evidence presented, it would be rational for the jury to convict only on the lesser included offense and not the greater one. Failure to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense in this case was error.

United States v. Gentry, 555 F.3d 659 (8th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was entitled to a lesser included offense instruction in this case involving possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute. The evidence would have supported the conclusion that she possessed the drugs without the intent to distribute and therefore a simple possession instruction was appropriate.

Taylor v. Workman, 554 F.3d 879 (10th Cir. 2009)
The state trial court erred in failing to accurately define the elements of a lesser included offense in this murder case, thus depriving the defendant of the ability to avoid a death sentence.

United States v. Hernandez, 476 F.3d 791 (9th Cir. 2007)
The trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury in this possession with intent to distribute methamphetamine case on the lesser offense of simple possession. The quantity involved was not sufficient to preclude the possibility that it was possessed for personal consumption. The burden is on the defendant to prove that it was for personal consumption; the burden is on the government to prove that the quantity could not have been for personal consumption. The amount in this case was somewhere between 50 and 100 doses (115 grams), valued in a range of $2,000 to $4,000.

United States v. Trujillo, 390 F.3d 1267 (10th Cir. 2004)
A defendant is not prohibited from having the jury instructed on a lesser included offense just because he denies participation in the offense at all. Consistent with the Supreme Court decision in Mathews v. United States, 485 U.S. 58 (1988) (defendant may inconsistently argue “I didn’t do it; and if I did, I was entrapped”) a defendant can argue that he had no involvement in a drug deal, but if he did, it was personal use, not trafficking.

United States v. McCullough, 348 F.3d 620 (7th Cir. 2003)
Defendant was charged with willfully selling firearms without recording the name, age, and residence of the buyer. 18 U.S.C. § 922(b)(5). At trial, he requested a jury instruction on the lesser record keeping offense. 18 U.S.C. § 922(m). Because it is impossible to violate § 922(b)(5) without also violating § 922(m), the trial court should have given the lesser included instruction. The fact that it is possible to commit the record keeping violation without committing the greater offense (for example, by making some other false entry that does not relate to the buyer’s name, age or residence) does not mean that the record keeping offense is not a lesser included offense. Moreover, the lesser offense requires proof that the defendant acted... knowingly, while the greater offense requires proof that the defendant acted willfully. This does not preclude the record keeping offense from being characterized as a lesser offense of the false recording offense. The failure to instruct the jury on the lesser offense was reversible error.

United States v. Mendez, 117 F.3d 480 (11th Cir. 1997)

The offense of possessing stolen mail (18 U.S.C. § 1708) is a lesser included offense of forcibly taking mail from a mail carrier (18 U.S.C. § 2114), when the two crimes are committed contemporaneously.

United States v. Gonzalez, 122 F.3d 1383 (11th Cir. 1997)

The offense of obstruction of a federal officer (18 U.S.C. § 1501) is a lesser included offense of forcibly assaulting, resisting, impeding or interfering with a federal official (18 U.S.C. § 111). The failure to instruct the jury on the lesser offense resulted in reversing the conviction.

United States v. Benally, 146 F.3d 1232 (10th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of involuntary manslaughter, as well as the defense of self-defense.

United States v. Estrada-Fernandez, 150 F.3d 491 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with assault with a dangerous weapon pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 113(a)(3). He requested a charge on the lesser included offense of simple assault, pursuant to § 113(a)(5). The trial court erred in failing to charge the jury as requested. Though the defendant testified that he was not involved in the altercation, “at all,” the Fifth Circuit held that the jury was entitled to believe none, all, or any part of his testimony. “Even if the defendant presents a totally exculpatory defense, the lesser-included offense instruction should be given if the prosecution’s evidence provides a rational basis for the jury’s finding the defendant guilty of a lesser offense.”

United States v. Barrett, 870 F.2d 953 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The trial judge instructed the jury that they could return a verdict of guilty, guilty of a lesser-included offense, or not guilty. The verdict form, however, only provided for a verdict of guilty or not guilty. Thus, when the jury returned a verdict of guilty, it was not possible to determine whether they were convicting him of the charged offense or the lesser-included offense. This requires reversal of the conviction.

Vujosevic v. Rafferty, 844 F.2d 1023 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The defendant admitted to having engaged in aggravated assault of the victim, but claimed that the co-defendant was responsible for the murder. He was entitled to a lesser-included charge on aggravated assault. Failing to do so constituted reversible error.

United States v. Baker, 985 F.2d 1248 (4th Cir. 1993)

Defendant was charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. There was a plausible theory that he intended to purchase the cocaine in order to consume it. It was reversible error to fail to instruct the jury on the lesser offense of conspiring to possess cocaine.
United States v. Ahmad, 101 F.3d 386 (5th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred in declining to instruct the jury on the lesser-included offense of negligent violations of the Clean Water Act. The defendant was charged with a knowing violation of the Act.

United States v. Lucien, 61 F.3d 366 (5th Cir. 1995)

The police searched the defendant’s house and discovered sixteen grams of cocaine base, foil wrappings, $1,200 in currency, and three guns. The defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute. He was denied a request for a lesser-included instruction on possession of a controlled substance under 21 U.S.C. §844(a). The trial court erred in this regard. The packaging was consistent with the defendant’s purchasing several packages of the cocaine base; the money was not necessarily indicative of an intent to distribute cocaine and the guns are not inconsistent with simple possession. The error also required reversal of the conviction for possessing a firearm in connection with the offense set forth in the indictment – because the conviction for the offense set forth in the indictment was reversed.

United States v. Deisch, 20 F.3d 139 (5th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with violating 21 U.S.C. §841, possessing with intent to distribute cocaine base. The trial court instructed the jury on what the government urged was a lesser-included offense, possession of cocaine base under the third sentence of 21 U.S.C. §844. The Fifth Circuit holds that the §844 offense is not a lesser-included offense of the §841 offense. This is because §841 outlaws the possession of any controlled substance, and then sets forth a scheme of punishments, depending on the nature of the contraband that is possessed. §844, on the other hand, expressly outlaws the possession of cocaine base in the third sentence. Thus, §844 contains an element lacking in §841: the controlled substance must be cocaine base.

United States v. Browner, 937 F.2d 165 (5th Cir. 1991)

Assault with a deadly weapon is not a lesser-included offense of voluntary manslaughter under the Schmuck standard. There must be a deadly weapon for the assault offense, but not for the voluntary manslaughter offense. Therefore, over the defendant’s objection, it was improper to charge the jury on the law of assault with a deadly weapon.

Cordova v. Lynaugh, 838 F.2d 764 (5th Cir. 1988)

The evidence in the defendant’s death penalty trial suggested that four men attacked a couple in a parked car, killed and robbed the man and raped his female companion. The evidence would have supported a finding that the petitioner did not have the intent to rob the man thus rendering him not guilty of the capital offense but only of the rape. This would not have made him eligible for the death penalty. The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the lesser-included offense.

United States v. Sitton, 968 F.2d 947 (9th Cir. 1992)

The police seized a large quantity of a mixture containing methamphetamine from a storage facility. The defendants were charged with possession with intent to distribute. The defendant claimed that this was the waste from a prior manufacture of meth and that this was going to be discarded, not distributed. The government’s chemist could not state how much methamphetamine was in the mixture and acknowledged that it could have been waste, based on the acetone content. The trial court erred in not instructing the jury on the law of simple possession.
United States v. Spencer, 905 F.2d 1260 (9th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was charged with taking property under 18 U.S.C. §661. The evidence did not support this charge, and the government requested an instruction on the “lesser included offense” of receiving stolen property, 18 U.S.C. §662. The trial judge agreed that the evidence was insufficient for a conviction under §661 and gave an instruction on the lesser-included offense. The jury returned a verdict of guilty on the lesser-included offense. However, a §662 offense is not a lesser-included offense of a §661 offense. Having found insufficient evidence under §661, the court should have entered a judgment of acquittal and dismissed the indictment.

Vickers v. Ricketts, 798 F.2d 369 (9th Cir. 1986)

The defendant offered evidence of a brain disorder which may well have reduced his culpability in this murder trial with respect to the element of premeditation. It was error for the state trial court to refuse to give the lesser-included offense instruction.

Wiggerfall v. Jones, 918 F.2d 1544 (11th Cir. 1990)

The state trial court violated the defendant’s due process rights by failing to instruct the jury on a lesser non-capital offense. The defendant was tried under Alabama’s then-existing death penalty statute, which, in essence, required that if a defendant was indicted under this section, the jury had only two options: guilty with the sentence being death and innocence. The jury could not recommend life, and could not find the defendant guilty of a lesser-included offense.

United States v. Gibbs, 904 F.2d 52 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

Though the evidence was sufficient to convict the defendants of possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, a jury could also have found the defendants guilty only of simple possession. Therefore, it was error to fail to give the lesser-included offense instruction to the jury.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Reasonable Doubt)

A charge which mischaracterizes the concept of reasonable doubt can never be harmless error. The state trial court equated reasonable doubt with “a doubt which would give rise to a grave uncertainty” and “a substantial doubt” and “a serious doubt, for which you could give good reason.” This violates the ruling in Cage v. Louisiana, 498 U.S. 39 (1990), and is not harmless error. No harmless error analysis would be undertaken in such cases.

United States v. Stanford, 823 F.3d 814 (5th Cir. 2016)

This case was tried prior to the decision in McFadden v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2298 (2015), but that Supreme Court decision was issued while this appeal was pending. The jury instruction at trial did not comply with McFadden’s knowledge requirement. The error was not harmless, even though a special interrogatory correctly included the knowledge requirement for a prosecution under the Analgue Act, because the special interrogatory did not repeat that the element of knowledge had to be found beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Nur, 799 F.3d 155 (1st Cir. 2015)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the lesser-included offense of simply possession of crack cocaine (the defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute). Though the defendant denied committing any crime (he represented himself at trial), this did not foreclose the availability of a lesser-included offense instruction. A lesser offense instruction is not unavailable simply because the defendant denies committing any offense at all if a rational jury could convict of the lesser offense given the evidence presented at trial.

Payne v. Stansberry, 760 F.3d 10 (D. C. Cir. 2014)

The trial judge instructed the jury (according to the transcript), “If you find that the government has failed to prove any element of the offense, beyond a reasonable doubt, you must find that defendant guilty.” Though this may have been a transcription error, the government failed to prove that it was. And if it were simply a slip of the tongue, that does not alter the fact that it was obvious and plain error affecting the defendant’s substantial rights. Appellate counsel’s failure to raise this issue on appeal amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Gibson v. Ortiz, 387 F.3d 812 (9th Cir. 2004)

The California state jury instruction in this case provided that a prior sexual offense need only be proven by a preponderance of the evidence; and that a prior sexual offense, if proven, could lead to the inference that the defendant committed the charged offense. This violated the due process clause, because it suggested a burden of less than proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The court also held that inconsistent instructions that emphasized the proper burden of proof did not cure the infirmity. “Language that merely contradicts and does not explain a constitutionally infirm instruction will not suffice to absolve the infirmity. A reviewing court has no way of knowing which of the two irreconcilable instructions the jurors applied in reaching their verdict.” Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 322 (1985). See also Doe v. Busby, 661 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2011).
The Ninth Circuit later overruled Gibson v. Ortiz, on the basis that it applied the incorrect AEDPA standard of review. Byrd v. Lewis, 566 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 2009).

Wansing v. Hargett, 341 F.3d 1207 (10th Cir. 2003)

When the jury asked the judge to provide guidance on the definition of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, the state judge explained at some length (and somewhat unintelligibly) that proof beyond a reasonable doubt could be compared to the doubt that a groom or bride might rely on to call off a wedding at the last minute while standing at the alter. Yet, he also cautioned that each juror had to decide for himself what the real definition of proof beyond a reasonable doubt was. Citing Victor v. Nebraska, 511 U.S. 1 (1994) and Cage v. Louisiana, 498 U.S. 39 (1990), the Tenth Circuit grants the writ of habeas corpus.

Humphrey v. Cain, 138 F.3d 552 (5th Cir. 1998) (en banc)

The state trial court's jury instruction on reasonable doubt was defective pursuant to Cage and Sullivan. The trial court instructed the jury that reasonable doubt meant "grave uncertainty," "moral certainty," "actual or substantial doubt," and "a serious doubt, for which you could give good reason." The full court hearing the case en banc also concluded that this claim was not Teague barred and amounted to "structural error" that could be remedied in a habeas petition.

Bloomer v. United States, 162 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 1998)

The district court’s numerous “embellishments” on the definition of proof beyond a reasonable doubt were erroneous. The trial court instructed the jury that if they did not find the elements proven beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury “could” return a not guilty verdict. Actually, absent such proof, the jury would be required to return a not guilty verdict. In addition, the trial court misleadingly explained, “To support a verdict of guilty, you need not find every fact beyond a reasonable doubt.” The court also incorrectly stated, “So a reasonable doubt means only a substantial doubt.” The Second Circuit also concluded that the failure to object to these improper instructions was probably ineffective assistance of counsel, but additional testimony was required in the lower court before this decision could be made with finality.

Lanigan v. Maloney, 853 F.2d 40 (1st Cir. 1988)

The First Circuit concludes that the harmless error rule will almost never apply in a case where the trial jury was incorrectly instructed with regard to guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Birbal, 62 F.3d 456 (2d Cir. 1995)

In the court’s instructions on reasonable doubt, the judge stated, “You need not find every fact beyond a reasonable doubt” and “So a reasonable doubt means only a substantial doubt.” Both of these statements were erroneous and even without objection, amounted to plain error requiring reversal of the conviction. Moreover, the court’s statement that “Should the prosecution fail to prove the guilt of a defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, you may acquit the defendant” was also erroneous.

Perez v. Irwin, 963 F.2d 499 (2d Cir. 1992)

The state trial court instructed the jury that a reasonable doubt meant “a doubt to a moral certainty of guilty.” This instruction inappropriately cast the burden on the defense to establish a doubt. Moreover, the “moral certainty” language suggests that the doubt should be based on feelings rather than fact.

United States v. Woods, 812 F.2d 1483 (4th Cir. 1987)
Elaborating on the meaning of “reasonable doubt” in jury instructions is not permitted.

United States v. Glass, 846 F.2d 386 (7th Cir. 1988)
It is inappropriate for a judge to give an instruction which defines reasonable doubt.

United States v. Nolasco, 926 F.2d 869 (9th Cir. 1991)
The trial court has discretion in all cases to define the meaning of “reasonable doubt.”

United States v. May, 68 F.3d 515 (D.C.Cir. 1995)
The trial court instructed the jury that “Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is proof that leaves you with a strong belief in a defendant’s guilt” and that “if based on your consideration of the evidence you have a strong belief that the defendant is guilty of one or more of the crimes charged, it is your duty to find him guilty.” This is incorrect, and cannot be harmless error. However, the error does not amount to plain error and a remand was necessary to determine if an objection was made during an unrecorded jury charge conference.

United States v. Merlos, 8 F.3d 48 (D.C.Cir. 1993)
Instructing the jury that they could find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt if the evidence caused them to have a “strong belief” in the defendant’s guilt is constitutionally deficient. While this error is not harmless, it was not plain error and the failure to object waived the error. See also United States v. Loriano, 996 F.2d 424 (D.C.Cir. 1993).
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Recharge)

See also: Jury (Replaying Testimony – Questions during deliberations)

United States v. Duran, 133 F.3d 1324 (10th Cir. 1998)

The trial court failed to instruct the jury in connection with the entrapment instruction that the government had the burden of disproving entrapment. That is, in order to convict the defendant who has raised an entrapment defense, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was predisposed to commit the crime. The failure to instruct the jury on this principle was plain error requiring reversal of the conviction. The trial court also erred in failing to adequately answer jury questions about the status of "agents" (such as non-government employees who were acting as informants) in connection with the entrapment defense. The jury repeatedly asked if certain informants who were acting on behalf of the government were "agents" within the definition of the entrapment defense. Failing to answer these questions was reversible error.

McDowell v. Calderon, 130 F.3d 833 (9th Cir. 1997)

The jury indicated through a note they provided to the court that they were confused about the proper role of mitigating evidence in this death penalty trial. The judge simply instructed the jury to reconsider the jury instructions which were provided before they began deliberations. This was insufficient. Though the initial jury instructions were accurate, there is no point in reiterating language that has failed to enlighten the jury. Where the jury expresses uncertainty, or indicates that it did not understand the original instructions -- especially in cases involving the death penalty -- the judge should answer the jury's question clearly.

United States v. Stevens, 38 F.3d 167 (5th Cir. 1994)

A picture of a handgun was introduced in evidence. The handgun itself had been destroyed in a fire. During deliberations, the jury asked if they could consider the picture of the weapon to be evidence of the defendant’s possession of the gun. The trial court’s answer, “Consider all the evidence,” was not a proper response. The gun with which the defendant was charged possessing was another gun. Therefore, the picture of the gun was not evidence of his possession offense. The improper response was reversible error.

United States v. Flitcraft, 863 F.2d 342 (5th Cir. 1988)

During its deliberations, the jury expressed confusion as to what evidence applied to the withholding tax counts as opposed to the failure to file tax return counts. The trial judge erred in assisting the jury by designating certain counts as “W-4” counts and the other counts as “1040” counts.

United States v. Bustamante, 805 F.2d 201 (6th Cir. 1986)

The jury requested a re-charge on a certain point of law. In the absence of counsel, the trial court issued a further written instruction providing an answer to the question. Though error, it was not reversible in this case.
United States v. Warren, 984 F.2d 325 (9th Cir. 1993)

Defendant was charged with murder. During deliberations, the jury inquired if the premeditation requirement related to the intent to kill, or if it could be satisfied by a showing of premeditated intent to hurt. The judge simply referred to his initial instruction which did not specifically answer this question. The failure to clear up any uncertainty was error. Also, the jury later asked if they could consider second degree murder if they could not agree on first degree murder. The judge’s response did not clearly instruct the jury that they could consider second degree even before they unanimously agreed to find the defendant not guilty of first degree murder. That is, the lesser offense could be considered if even just one juror was not satisfied that the greater offense was proven. This, too, was error, even though the initial instruction properly advised the jury about when they could consider the lesser offense.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
* (Sentence – Mandatory Minimums)

United States v. Polouizzi, 564 F.3d 142 (2d Cir. 2009)

In certain limited circumstances, the trial court may instruct the jury on an applicable mandatory minimum sentence that the defendant faces. In this case, the judge did not instruct the jury on the mandatory minimum sentence in a child pornography possession case and it was not error to fail to do so. The district judge’s decision to grant a new trial on the basis that he should have instructed the jury on the mandatory minimum sentence was not appropriate. However, the Second Circuit noted one circumstance where it would be appropriate to instruct the jury on a mandatory minimum and that is where a prosecutor or witness suggests that a conviction on a lesser offense (that carries a mandatory minimum sentence), or a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity, would allow the defendant to “go free.” See Shannon v. United States, 512 U.S. 573 (1994).
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Special Interrogatories)

United States v. Stanford, 823 F.3d 814 (5th Cir. 2016)

This case was tried prior to the decision in McFadden v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2298 (2015), but that Supreme Court decision was issued while this appeal was pending. The jury instruction at trial did not comply with McFadden’s knowledge requirement. The error was not harmless, even though a special interrogatory correctly included the knowledge requirement for a prosecution under the Analogue Act, because the special interrogatory did not repeat that the element of knowledge had to be found beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Perez, 129 F.3d 1340 (9th Cir. 1997)

The indictment charged the defendant with using three guns in connection with a drug offense. The sentence would be dramatically different if the defendant used an assault weapon, versus a pistol. In this situation, the trial court must submit a special verdict form to the jury to determine which gun(s) they unanimously agreed the defendant used.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Spoliation)

United States v. Sivilla, 714 F.3d 1168 (9th Cir. 2013)

A remedial jury (adverse inference) instruction is appropriate in a case in which the government destroys physical evidence prior to trial that may have been useful in establishing a defense, even if the government’s conduct was not in bad faith. Bad faith is required to grant a motion to dismiss, but is not required to warrant a jury instruction.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Standard of Review)

_Gibson v. Ortiz_, 387 F.3d 812 (9th Cir. 2004)

The California state jury instruction in this case provided that a prior sexual offense need only be proven by a preponderance of the evidence; and that a prior sexual offense, if proven, could lead to the inference that the defendant committed the charged offense. This violated the due process clause, because it suggested a burden of less than proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The court also held that inconsistent instructions that emphasized the proper burden of proof did not cure the infirmity. “Language that merely contradicts and does not explain a constitutionally infirm instruction will not suffice to absolve the infirmity. A reviewing court has no way of knowing which of the two irreconcilable instructions the jurors applied in reaching their verdict.” _Francis v. Franklin_, 471 U.S. 307, 322 (1985). The Ninth Circuit later overruled _Gibson v. Ortiz_, on the basis that it applied the incorrect AEDPA standard of review. _Byrd v. Lewis_, 566 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 2009).

_Martinez v. Garcia_, 379 F.3d 1034 (9th Cir. 2004)

With regard to ambiguous jury instructions, in some instances, when a case is submitted to the jury on alternative theories, the unconstitutionality of any of the theories requires that the conviction be set aside. In those cases, a jury is clearly instructed by the court that it may convict a defendant on an impermissible legal theory, as well as on a proper theory or theories. Although it is possible that the guilty verdict may have had a proper basis, it is equally likely that the verdict rested on an unconstitutional ground and the court will decline to choose between two such likely possibilities. The jury’s verdict must be set aside if it could be supported on one ground but not on another, and the reviewing court is uncertain which of the two grounds was relied upon by the jury in reaching the verdict. See _Boyle v. California_, 494 U.S. 370 (1990); _Mills v. Maryland_, 486 U.S. 367 (1988).

_United States v. Perez_, 116 F.3d 840 (9th Cir. 1997)

Even if the defendant proposed the erroneous jury instruction, the appellate court may review the erroneous instruction under a plain error standard. If the error is affirmatively invited (that is, there was a knowing relinquishment of a right), the error may not be reviewed. But where the defendant was not aware of the error in the proposed instruction (here, the prosecution and the trial court were also unaware of the fault in the proposed instruction), the appellate court may review the error for plain error.

_United States v. High_, 117 F.3d 464 (11th Cir. 1997)

The defendants were charged in one count with conspiring to violate several criminal laws, one of which was structuring currency transactions in violation of the CTR laws (31 U.S.C. § 5324). The trial was held prior to the decision in _Ratzlaf v. United States_, 510 U.S. 135 (1994), which held that a defendant had to be shown to have known the illegality of his conduct before he could be convicted of a CTR structuring violation. The trial court erroneously instructed the jury on this object of the conspiracy (incorrectly stating that ignorance of the criminal law was no defense). The Eleventh Circuit held that where the trial court erroneously sets forth the elements of one of the objects of a multi-object conspiracy, the conviction on the conspiracy count may not be sustained, even if there is sufficient evidence on the other objects and the other objects were property defined.

United States v. Edmonds, 80 F.3d 810 (3rd Cir. 1996)

In a CCE prosecution, the jury must be instructed that they must reach unanimous decision on the three predicate offenses that constitute the series. Failing to do so in this case was harmless error.

United States v. Echeverri, 854 F.2d 638 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The trial court committed reversible error when it failed to give an instruction requested by the defense that the jury must unanimously agree on the “continuing series” of narcotics violations which served as the predicate for the defendant’s CCE conviction.

United States v. Beros, 833 F.2d 455 (3rd Cir. 1987)

Generally, a basic unanimity instruction is sufficient in a criminal prosecution. However, a more specific instruction is necessary in complex cases in which a statute provides alternative means by which a crime can be committed and numerous acts are alleged in the indictment which would satisfy the statute. In this case, the defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §664 which outlaws embezzling, stealing, abstracting, or converting union pension funds. The defendant asked that the judge instruct the jury that they must reach a unanimous decision with regard both to the theory of criminality and the specific transaction which it believed the defendant was guilty of. The trial court agreed with the former suggestion but not the latter. The Third Circuit reverses because of the trial judge’s refusal to require a unanimous decision with regard to the “specific transaction” request.

United States v. Holley, 942 F.2d 916 (5th Cir. 1991)

The jury in this perjury prosecution was not instructed that they must unanimously agree that at least one statement in each count of the indictment was false. This was reversible error, as it could not be determined whether the jury unanimously agreed that the defendant lied with respect to any one statement.

United States v. Duncan, 850 F.2d 1104 (6th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was charged with making false statements on his tax return. In light of pretrial motions raising the issue as well as a question from the jury during the course of deliberations, it was error for the trial court to fail to instruct the jury that they must unanimously agree on a particular false statement in the tax return prior to returning a verdict of guilty.

United States v. Gordon, 844 F.2d 1397 (9th Cir. 1988)

The indictment charged the defendants in one count with conspiracy to defraud the government in the administration of a weapons program and conspiracy to obstruct the grand jury in its investigation of fraud. This constitutes the potential for jury confusion and created the possibility of a verdict based on less than unanimity. Some jurors may have believed the defendants engaged in one conspiracy, while other defendants believed the defendants engaged in others.

United States v. Gilley, 836 F.2d 1206 (9th Cir. 1988)

The trial court failed to instruct the jury in this gambling prosecution that they had to unanimously agree on the thirty-day period during which the gambling enterprise was in existence. This thirty-day period was an element of the offense and the jury had to agree on a specific period before a guilty verdict would be justified.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Unanimity)

Richardson v. United States, 119 S.Ct. 1707 (1999)

The jury must be unanimous as to the "series" of underlying offenses in a CCE prosecution. That is, the jury must unanimously agree not only that the defendant committed some "continuing series of violations," but also about which specific "violations" make up that continuing series.

United States v. Lapler, 796 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with conspiracy to sell drugs over a fifteen-month period. The proof at trial, however, showed two separate conspiracies, one with one supplier, another with a second supplier. In this situation, the jury should have been instructed that the jurors must unanimously agree on what conspiracy the defendant was involved in (or both). There was a genuine possibility of jury confusion in this case.

United States v. Newell, 658 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2011)

This case contains a thorough discussion of the requirement that a jury be instructed that a verdict must be unanimous when an indictment contains duplicitous allegations, such as numerous fraudulent acts in one count of the indictment, or numerous false statements. The jury must unanimously agree that at least one of the false statements or fraudulent acts occurred and they must agree which one. The failure to object, however, resulted in affirmance of the conviction, because it did not amount to plain error.

United States v. Mannava, 565 F.3d 412 (7th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged under 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b) with attempting to persuade a child to engage in sexual activity that constitutes a violation of state law. The indictment alleged two state laws that would qualify. In this situation, the jury should be instructed that they must be unanimous as to which (or both) of the state laws were violated. A conviction cannot be sustained if half the jurors believe the defendant committed one underlying offense and half believe he committed another offense.

United States v. Southwell, 432 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2005)

When the defendant raises the defense of insanity, in order for the jury to return a guilty verdict, not only must the jury unanimously find the defendant guilty; the jury must also unanimously reject the insanity defense. This applies to all affirmative defenses. The trial court’s failure to explain this to the jury when the jurors asked a question during deliberations was reversible error.

United States v. Garcia-Rivera, 353 F.3d 788 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was alleged to have been a felon in possession of a firearm on three different dates. The judge instructed the jury that it had to agree unanimously that the possession occurred either on date A, date B, or date C. This could have led the jury to believe that unanimity was only required to establish that the possession was on any of the days, but not necessarily on a particular date. In other words, four jurors could have believed that the possession was on Date A, four different jurors on Date B, and the remaining jurors on Date C. This was plain error and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Bobo, 344 F.3d 1076 (11th Cir. 2003)

Generally, the overt acts in a conspiracy indictment may not be utilized to describe the “scheme” in related fraud counts. But if they are used in this manner, then the jury must unanimously agree on which overt acts occurred in order to sustain a verdict.

United States v. Fawley, 137 F.3d 458 (7th Cir. 1998)

The perjury indictment alleged in one count that the defendant made two false statements when testifying before the grand jury. The defendant requested an instruction that explained that the jury must reach a unanimous verdict on whether a particular statement was proven to be false. It was not sufficient that the jury reach a unanimous verdict that a false statement was made. Failing to give the defendant's instruction was reversible error.
JURY INSTRUCTIONS
(Witness Credibility)

United States v. Luck, 611 F.3d 183 (4th Cir. 2010)
Trial counsel was ineffective and the conviction was required to be set aside, because he failed to request a jury instruction that cautioned the jury that an informant’s testimony needed to be examined and weighed with greater care than the testimony of an ordinary witness. Even a general credibility instruction does not substitute for an instruction that specifically points out the potential for perjury born out of self-interest.

United States v. Gaines, 457 F.3d 238 (2d Cir. 2006)
Trial courts should not instruct the jury that a defendant has an interest in the outcome of the case and therefore, his testimony should be considered with great care. This instruction adversely impacts on the defendant’s presumption of innocence. Moreover, it is obvious that the defendant has an interest in the outcome of the case, so instructing the jury in this manner is entirely superfluous. The trial court should give a general instruction on the credibility of witnesses and then instruct the jury to consider the defendant’s testimony just as any other witness. See also United States v. Brutus, 505 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2007).

United States v. Bruno, 383 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2004)
The trial court erred in suggesting in the jury instruction that the trial court had the authority to sentence the government witnesses below the mandatory minimum sentence, even without a § 5K1.1 motion by the government. In fact, absent such a motion, the court lacked the authority to sentence the “snitches” to a sentence under the mandatory minimum statutory sentence.

United States v. Lampkin, 159 F.3d 607 (D.C. Cir. 1998)
The trial court repeatedly – and erroneously – instructed the jury that two juvenile witnesses for the government could not be prosecuted by the AUSA, thus negating the defendant’s theory that the witnesses were testifying for the government in exchange for not being prosecuted. This erroneous instruction deprived the defense of its ability to mount a defense and was reversible error.
JURY SELECTION

(Batson v. Kentucky)

Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. 1737 (2016)

In this 7-1 decision, the Supreme Court holds that the state prosecutor’s intent in exercising his peremptory strikes was racially-motivated. Based on a review of the prosecutor’s notes on the jury selection forms, as well as the explanations offered by the prosecutor at the habeas hearing, the Supreme Court holds that the evidence established that the reasons offered by the prosecutor were pretextual and the death penalty defendant was entitled to a new trial.

The state prosecutor’s exercise of a peremptory strike was upheld by the state trial court, the state appellate court and the federal habeas trial court. The Ninth Circuit disagreed, but simply found different facts. The Supreme Court reversed the Ninth Circuit decision, holding that it violated the AEDPA in its methodology. Justices Breyer and Souter concurred, but again decried the entire Batson enterprise.

Johnson v. California, 545 U.S. 162 (2005)

The United States Supreme Court considers the standard to be applied in deciding whether a prima facie Batson showing had been made. The appropriate standard requires the movant to: “Produc[e] evidence sufficient to permit the trial judge to draw an inference that discrimination has occurred.” It is not proper to hold that the movant must make a showing by a preponderance of the evidence.

The Court identified factors that should inform the trial court’s assessment of whether the proffered explanations rebutted the prima facie case. In this death penalty case, the manner in which the prosecutor questioned prospective jurors showed a discriminatory motive. When “death-qualifying” the jurors, for example, different questions were asked of white jurors than black jurors. In addition to disparate questioning, the Court focused on the percentage of strikes used against blacks versus whites, noting that “happenstance is unlikely to produce this disparity.” Other factors included a policy of the prosecutor’s office to strike minority potential jurors and proof that the reasons proffered for striking black jurors in this case applied to white jurors who were not struck. The Supreme Court reviewed the conviction again, after the Fifth Circuit re-considered the case, and this time the Supreme Court held that the defendant made a sufficient Batson showing and the conviction was set aside. Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. 231, 125 S.Ct. 2317 (2005).

The Court held that a prosecutor failed to provide adequate race-neutral reasons for exercising a disproportionate number of peremptory strikes against black jurors. The Court wrote,

In other circumstances, we have held that, once it is shown that a discriminatory intent was a substantial or motivating factor in an action taken by a state actor, the burden shifts to the party defending the action to show that this factor was not determinative . . . We have not previously applied this rule in a Batson case, and we need not decide here whether that standard governs in this context. For present purposes, it is enough to recognize that a peremptory strike shown to have been motivated in substantial part by discriminatory intent could not be sustained based on any lesser showing by the prosecution.

When a party has been challenged under Batson to provide a race-neutral explanation for a peremptory strike, the reason offered need not be persuasive, or even plausible. Whatever the reason offered, the burden then shifts to the challenger to establish that the party who exercised the strike was purposefully exercising the strike in a discriminatory manner. In this case, the prosecutor struck two jurors because they had facial hair. The trial court may not terminate the inquiry at that point, simply holding that the explanation was frivolous. The trial court must then proceed to the next step and determine whether, considering the prima facie case and the explanation offered by the party who exercised the strike, the opponent of the strike carried his burden of establishing purposeful discrimination.

Batson applies to peremptory strikes exercised on the basis of gender.

Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42 (1992)

Batson applies to defense strikes, as well. The defendant’s exercise of peremptory strikes amounts to state action and the exercise of those strikes against jurors based on their race violates those jurors’ constitutional rights.

The prosecutor excused two Hispanics and explained that he excused them because they were bilingual and was fearful that they would not listen to the interpreter who would be translating witnesses who spoke Spanish. This was not a violation of Batson. The three-step inquiry under Batson requires (1) the defendant make a prima facie showing that the prosecutor exercised his strikes in a discriminatory manner; (2) the prosecutor must then articulate a race-neutral reason for the exercise of his peremptory strikes; (3) the trial court must then decide whether the defendant has carried his burden of proving purposeful discrimination. Though excusing jurors in a case solely on the basis of their language may in some cases serve as only a surrogate for race discrimination, in this case, the explanation was acceptable.

In order to assert a Batson claim based on equal protection grounds, the defendant need not share the racial identity of the excluded minority. That is, a white defendant may complain that the prosecutor improperly exercised peremptory strikes against black prospective jurors. The rights being protected are the rights of the excluded jurors to be selected as jurors. Holland held that this rule did not apply when considered in the context of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights, as opposed to the jurors’ Fourteenth Amendment rights.
A state procedural bar to raising a Batson claim could not be constitutionally applied because Batson did not even exist at the time of the prosecution in this case and the defense took all reasonable steps to protect the issue.

The Sixth Amendment’s guarantee of an impartial jury does not protect a defendant against a prosecutor’s racially motivated exercise of peremptory jury challenges. Therefore, a white defendant from whose jury blacks were struck, has no Sixth Amendment objection. The Court indicated, however, that a white defendant may have an equal protection argument under such circumstances.

Chamberlin v. Fisher, 855 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 2017)
Writ granted based on Batson violation. The prosecution’s “race neutral” explanations why black jurors were struck applied equally to white jurors who were not struck. Under the comparison juror analysis required by Supreme Court precedent, the defendant’s Batson claim was meritorious.

United States v. Atkins, 843 F.3d 625 (6th Cir. 2016)
The prosecutor struck a black venireman because he had a checkered work history and eight children. White jurors with the same work history, however, were not struck and the prosecutor asked no questions about the juror’s eight children (i.e., whether they would “distract” the juror as the prosecutor hypothesized during the Batson inquiry). The conviction was reversed.

Currie v. McDowell, 825 F.3d 603 (9th Cir. 2016)
The defendant’s first trial resulted in a grant of habeas relief in the Ninth Circuit based on a Batson violation. At the retrial, the district court decided that the same prosecutor once again violated Batson, and the judge declared a mistrial. The case was retried again – with the same prosecutor – and the Ninth Circuit, once again on habeas review, held that the prosecutor violated Batson yet again, by using one peremptory strike against an African American juror. The Ninth Circuit held that the prosecutor’s reasons were either unreasonable, demonstrably false, or applied just as well to the non-black jurors who were not struck.

United States v. Mahbub, 818 F.3d 213 (6th Cir. 2016)
The defendant, who was Muslim, was charged with health care fraud. The government exercised a peremptory against the only Muslim in the venire. The judge found that there was no prima facie case because the defendant failed to prove that the defendant was in a cognizable group and because the prosecutor asked no questions of the juror that focused on his religion. Neither reason was a sufficient basis to find the absence of a prima facie case. Pursuant to Powers v. Ohio, the defendant’s membership in a particular racial group is irrelevant. Regarding the questions that were asked during voir dire, it is true that questions that focus on race might raise an inference of discrimination, there is no requirement that the lawyer ask such questions in order for a Batson challenge to be successful. Sometimes, for example, the fact that a lawyer asks different questions of members of the venire based on their race, might raise an inference of discrimination. See, e.g., Miller-el v. Dretke, discussed above.
Shirley v. Yates, 807 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2015)

The Ninth Circuit orders that a writ be granted setting aside defendant’s conviction because of the trial judge’s erroneous findings regarding the reasons that certain prosecution strikes were exercised. The prosecution recited race neutral reasons for exercising its strikes, but the trial court’s findings that these were, in fact, the reasons for the strikes was not supported by the record. Pursuant to Batson, once a prima facie case is made, the opposing party must recite the race-neutral reasons for exercising its strikes and thereafter, the trial court must make findings whether the strikes were, or were not race-based, after providing the moving party an opportunity to argue that the reasons were pretextual, or simply not the actual reasons. Comparing the prosecution’s stated reasons for striking one black juror – and the failure to strike a white juror with similar characteristics – the Ninth Circuit held that the record failed to support a finding that the strikes were not racially motivated.

Crittenden v. Chappell, 804 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2015)

The Ninth Circuit holds that the district court’s decision that the state prosecutor’s peremptory strikes were substantially motivated by race was supported by the record and habeas relief was appropriate. The court applied the standard announced in Cook v. LaMarque, 593 F.3d 810 (9th Cir. 2010), which clarified that a peremptory challenge violates the Equal Protection Clause if it is motivated in substantial part by race, regardless of whether the strike would have issued if race had played no role.

Castellanos v. Small, 766 F.3d 1137 (9th Cir. 2014)

The Batson hearing conducted in the state court revealed that the prosecutor explained the basis for certain strikes on demonstrably false grounds (i.e., the prosecutor struck one juror based on the juror having no children, when, in fact, the transcript revealed that the juror had two children). Thus, under AEDPA review, the state court findings were based on an unreasonable determination of the facts.

United States v. Tomlinson, 764 F.3d 535 (6th Cir. 2014)

The defendant raised his Batson challenge prior to the time the jury was sworn, but after the prosecution had exercised several of its strikes and jurors had left the courtroom. The challenge was timely, nevertheless, because a Batson challenge cannot be effectively raised after each strike because the existence of a pattern (the prima facie) cannot be ascertained in the midst of the striking process.

Sanchez v. Roden, 753 F.3d 279 (1st Cir. 2014)

The petitioner established that he had established a prima facie Batson violation in his state court prosecution and the prosecutor should have been required to articulate his race-neutral reason for striking a juror. A remand to further develop the record was necessary.

SmithKline Beecham Corp. v. Abbott Labs., 740 F.3d 471 (9th Cir. 2014)

Striking a potential juror on the basis of his sexual orientation (a homosexual male) violated Batson.
Adkins v. Warden, Holman CF, 710 F.3d 1241 (11th Cir. 2013)

The Eleventh Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus, concluding that the state trial court failed to undertake the type of inquiry that is necessary to determine whether facially neutral explanations were mere pretexts. Among the circumstances that the trial court failed to consider were (1) the strength of the prima facie case; (2) the fact that the prosecution explicitly noted the race of every black veniremember (and only black veniremembers) on the jury list the state prepared during jury selection; (3) the fact that specific proffered reasons provided by the prosecutor were incorrect and/or contradicted by the record; (4) the fact that the trial court relied upon facts not part of the record, such as the trial court’s personal experience with the prosecutor in unrelated matters. After deciding that the state court’s decision was not entitled to AEDPA deference, the court undertook a de novo review of the record and concluded that the state prosecutor did intentionally excuse jurors on the basis of their race.

Ayala v. Wong, 693 F.3d 945 (9th Cir. 2012)

It is not proper to permit the prosecutor to present the race-neutral reasons for the exercise of strikes in an ex parte proceeding. The defense has the right to be present and to argue that the reasons are pretextual. See also 756 F.3d 656. The Supreme Court reversed: Davis v. Ayala, 135 S. Ct. 2187 (2015).

United States v. McAllister, 693 F.3d 572 (6th Cir. 2012)

The district court merged the stage-two and stage-three determinations. In essence, the court simply listened to the government’s explanations for the strikes and made no additional finding whether the strikes were pretextual. The district court must do more than simply perfunctorily listen to the government’s explanations and then declare those explanations to be race-neutral. Remand for further proceedings was necessary to enable the district court to make the proper findings.

Harris v. Hardy, 680 F.3d 942 (7th Cir. 2012)

Habeas petitioner established that the prosecution exercised its strikes in its death penalty murder case in a discriminatory manner. Comparing the reasons that strikes were exercised with the failure to strike other jurors, and the statistical evidence was sufficient to prove intentional discrimination.

Madison v. Commissioner, Ala. Dept. of Corrections, 677 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2012)

The defendant offered sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie Batson violation and the trial court erred in denying the defendant’s motion for a Batson hearing. In addition to the statistics (the prosecutor used six of his eighteen peremptory strikes to remove black jurors; there were 13 black jurors on the venire), the prosecutor asked no questions at all of three of the black jurors, the case was “racially charged” (black defendant, white victim); and the prosecutor’s office had a history of racially discriminatory practices.

Johnson v. Finn, 665 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 2011)

The Federal Magistrate concluded that the state prosecutor had violated Batson. The district court judge rejected the Magistrate’s finding without conducting a new hearing. This was error. The Magistrate conducted a comparative analysis of the struck juror with other jurors.
who were not struck and determined that the state prosecutor had struck the juror on the basis of race and not the reasons offered at the habeas hearing.

Rice v. White, 660 F.3d 242 (6th Cir. 2011)

The state trial court found that the prosecutor’s race-neutral reasons for striking two jurors were not supported by the record. One of the jurors, however, had already left the courthouse. The trial judge decided that if a racially balanced jury was selected, the error would be cured. This was erroneous and the federal court properly granted a writ.

United States v. Rutledge, 648 F.3d 555 (7th Cir. 2011)

The trial judge afforded the AUSA the opportunity to offer race neutral reasons for exercising certain strikes, but failed to make any finding of fact after listening to the reasons. A remand was required for the trial court to make findings. It is not sufficient for the judge to simply state that the AUSA “offered a race neutral reason;” the judge must also decide whether the prosecutor was credible in explaining the basis for the strike, given the facts offered by the opposing party, as well as the prima facie evidence. Also, the AUSA’s statement that she is an African American was not a proper factor to consider, because minorities are equally capable of discriminating against other minorities.

United States v. Taylor, 636 F.3d 901 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant raised a Batson challenge that was denied in the trial court. The appellate court remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the Batson claim, specifically, to analyze credibility of the prosecutor’s reason for exercising the strikes. On remand, the trial court allowed the prosecutor to offer any additional reasons for exercising the strikes. The Seventh Circuit reversed: the remand only permitted the trial court to analyze the strikes for the reasons initially offered by the prosecutor, not to afford the prosecutor an opportunity to advance additional reasons.

Coombs v. Diguglielmo, 616 F.3d 255 (3rd Cir. 2010)

In the habeas petitioner’s state trial, he raised a Batson claim. The prosecutor provided race neutral reasons, but the defendant was not provided an opportunity to rebut those race-neutral reasons to show that those reasons were pretextual. Batson requires that the court engage in the three-step process (1. prima facie case; 2. race-neutral reasons; 3. opportunity to rebut the validity of the race-neutral reasons). The prosecutor’s explanations included statements such as, “I just didn’t like” that juror; and “that juror gave me badk looks.” These types of explanations are particularly susceptible to rebuttal.

Ali v. Hickman, 584 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2009)

The prosecutor exercised two of his peremptory strikes to eliminate the only two African American jurors on the panel. The reasons for striking one of the jurors applied equally to white jurors who were not struck, thus establishing that the prosecutor was offering pretextual reasons for exercising the strike. The Ninth Circuit engaged in an exhaustive review of each of the “pretextual” reasons offered by the prosecutor and demonstrated that the reasons were either non-sensical (not “case related”), applied equally to white jurors, or were not supported factually by the voir dire. Writ granted.
In this case that was tried several months after Batson was decided in 1986, the state moved to excuse eight jurors for cause, all of whom were African-Americans. The state removed all African-Americans from the jury with its exercise of 16 peremptory strikes against African-Americans (there were 24 on the venire) and the jury was all white. In response to the Batson challenge, the prosecutor assured the court that his strikes were not race-based. The Eleventh Circuit granted the writ.

Reed v. Quarterman, 555 F.3d 364 (5th Cir. 2009)

During a “reconstruction” Batson hearing – that is, a hearing that is conducted years after the initial trial, following a remand, or habeas hearing – the trial judge must review the entire transcript of the voir dire to determine whether the defendant’s “comparative analysis” was meritorious. In this case, the trial judge simply looked at the struck jurors and the prosecutor’s statement about why that juror would have been struck. The comparative analysis, however, would have shown that the same reasons applied equally to jurors who were not in the cognizable group. The court noted that the strongest case on the importance of the comparative analysis is Miller-El v. Dretke, cited above. The Fifth Circuit, conducting the comparative analysis, concluded that a Batson violation was established.

Jones v. West, 555 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 2009)

The lower courts failed to properly evaluate the defendant’s claim that a prima facie Batson claim had been satisfied. The Second Circuit considers different ways in which a prima facie case is made, including the “challenge rate” method (comparing the number of strikes against a cognizable racial group, versus strikes of others) and the “exclusion rate” (which focuses on the number of minority jurors who end up left on the jury, regardless of the ratio of strikes that are used. Thus, in the exclusion method, one strike of the only black juror, may establish a prima facie case. In this case, the defendant established a prima facie case. His argument was added by the trial judge’s conclusion, at one point during voir dire, that the prosecutor was, in fact, offering pretextual reasons.

Dolphy v. Mantello, 552 F.3d 236 (2d Cir. 2009)

The state trial court’s Batson findings were insufficient. The court simply accepted at face value all the prosecutor’s “race neutral” explanations for his strikes, without making any findings that the prosecutor actually relied on those reasons, as opposed to simply offering pretexts. Among the explanations offered by the prosecutor was that he struck all “overweight” people, because in his experience, overweight people are more sympathetic to defendants. When the defense attorney pointed out that the prosecutor had allowed overweight jurors to sit in other cases, the judge responded, “that’s neither here nor there; I’m satisfied that is a race neutral explanation.”

United States v. Collins, 551 F.3d 914 (9th Cir. 2009)

Only one African-American juror remained in the venire and the prosecutor exercised a strike against her. From one point of view, the prosecutor excused “100% of the African-Americans in the venire” but only exercised 25% of their strikes against African-Americans (the government only used four strikes). The Ninth Circuit concluded that considering various factors (including a comparison of that juror’s answers to voir dire questions with other jurors’ answers, the evidence was sufficient to establish a prima facie case and the trial court erred in not requiring the government to set forth a race neutral reason for exercising the strike. The appellate court explains in some detail the law governing the existence of a prima facie case.

Paulino v. Harrison, 542 F.3d 692 (9th Cir. 2008)

The state court prosecutor used five out of six peremptory strikes to remove African-American venire members. The defense attorney objected. The trial judge looked at his notes and said that statistically “it looks bad” but based on his review of the voir dire, he could understand each of the strikes. The prosecutor was never asked to explain her strikes. The first time the case reached the federal appellate court, the case was sent back to the district court so that the prosecutor could explain her strikes. She said she had no memory of any aspect of jury selection. However, she gave “hypothetical” explanations, based on her review of the voir dire transcript, though she said she did not remember her actual reasons. The Ninth Circuit set aside the conviction. “It does not matter that the prosecutor might have had good reasons . . . what matters is the real reason the jurors were stricken.” Johnson v. California, 545 U.S. 162, 172 (2005).

United States v. Williamson, 533 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 2008)

The trial court clearly erred in rejecting defense counsel’s Batson challenge to the government exercise of peremptory strikes. The government struck both black venire members. The government’s explanation (the jurors had friends and relatives with drug convictions), applied equally to numerous white jurors who were not struck.

Green v. Lamarque, 532 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 2008)

The state defendant established that the prosecutor’s exercise of peremptory strikes was motivated by race and the state courts’ determination otherwise was an unreasonable determination of the facts. The prosecutor’s race-neutral explanations applied equally to white jurors who were not struck. Habeas relief granted.

United States v. Kimbrell, 532 F.3d 461 (6th Cir. 2008)

The trial court granted the government’s Batson challenge to the defendant’s use of a peremptory strike against a white juror. However, the trial court placed the burden of proof on the defendant to prove a non-discriminatory basis for the strike. In “step three” of the Batson procedure, the burden is on the party challenging the strike to prove a discriminatory motive (after the party exercising the strike has offered a race-neutral reason during step two). The Sixth Circuit reversed defendant’s conviction. See also United States v. McFerron, 163 F.3d 952 (6th Cir. 1995).

United States v. Odeneal, 517 F.3d 406 (6th Cir. 2008)
The prosecutor failed to offer a sufficiently convincing race neutral reason for excusing the African-American jurors that he struck. The juror indicated that she was going through a divorce, but this was information contained on a questionnaire that was over a year old. Also, the juror indicated that she had previously served on a jury that acquitted a defendant. But a white prospective juror served on that same jury, and was not struck by the prosecutor.

Kesser v. Cambra, 465 F.3d 351 (9th Cir. 2006)
The Ninth Circuit concluded that none of the facially neutral explanations offered by the prosecutor for striking Native American jurors was sincere and held that the defendant’s Batson challenge should have been granted.

Williams v. Runnels, 432 F.3d 1102 (9th Cir. 2006)
The Ninth Circuit concluded that the habeas petitioner was entitled to a full Batson hearing. The petitioner established the existence of a prima facie Batson violation and the state did not sufficiently rebut that inference – in large measure because the state trial judge wasn’t interested in hearing the explanation and summarily rejected the petitioner’s Batson claim during the course of jury selection.

Wilson v. Beard, 426 F.3d 653 (3rd Cir. 2005)
Based on the prosecutor’s training tape that the defendant unearthed years later, the defendant was able to show that the prosecutor regularly and intentionally removed African Americans from his juries.

United States v. Esparza-Gonzalez, 422 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2005)
Even the failure to exercise a strike may constitute a Batson violation. In this case, the government did not exercise all of its strikes, thus eliminating the possibility that the jurors on the bottom of the list could be chosen. This effectively eliminated the only Hispanic in the jury venire. Coupled with other evidence, this failure to strike could be considered as part of the prima facie case. The trial court also erred in failing to make a determination whether the government’s stated reason for not exercising a strike established that there was no discriminatory motive.

United States v. Stephens, 421 F.3d 503 (7th Cir. 2005)
If a statistical prima facie showing of discriminatory use of peremptories is made, the trial court may not reject the showing on the basis of apparent non-discriminatory reasons for exercising the strikes. That is, during phase one of the Batson challenge, the trial court may not abort the process by summarily finding that there were race-neutral reasons for exercising the strikes. This type of analysis is appropriate during phase three of the Batson challenge. The court also noted that the prosecution struck African-Americans, Hispanics and an Asian juror, and the trial court properly “combined” these strikes to find a pattern of removing non-white jurors. The Seventh Circuit later affirmed the conviction, holding that the evidence developed on remand was sufficient to establish that there was no Batson violation. 514 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2008).

Walker v. Girdich, 410 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2005)

In explaining why she exercised one of her peremptory strikes against a potential black juror, the prosecutor stated, “because he was a black man with no family . . .” The state argued that the prosecutor was simply describing the juror, as opposed to explaining the basis for the strike. The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that the “reason” offered by the prosecutor was that he was a black man with no family, and this is not a racial neutral explanation.

Brinson v. Vaughn, 398 F.3d 225 (3rd Cir. 2005)

A prima facie case of a Batson violation may be made out even if the party being challenged does not use all of its strikes and some members of the targeted class are seated on the jury. In other words (as in this case), if the prosecutor strikes a disproportionate number of black jurors, but does not exhaust all of the strikes available and some blacks are seated, the prima facie case may still exist. The state trial court in this case erred in failing to require the state to offer explanations for its disproportionate use of strikes against black jurors. The trial court also erred in holding that “where the victim, the defendant, and the witnesses are all black, there is no Batson violation.”

Paulino v. Castro, 371 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant voiced a Batson challenge and the trial judge then reviewed his notes and stated that he could see reasons for each of the strikes – but never made the prosecutor announce her reasons for exercising the strikes that she did. The trial court’s procedure was not in compliance with the procedures required by Batson.

Hardcastle v. Horn, 368 F.3d 246 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The initial state trial was conducted pre-Batson. Nevertheless, the trial lawyer preserved a Batson objection (relying on Swain). The state habeas court failed to properly evaluate whether the state’s proffered explanations supported its claim that its strikes were not motivated by race. A remand for an additional hearing in the district court is the appropriate remedy.

Holloway v. Horn, 355 F.3d 707 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The prosecutor violated Batson. Though many of his race neutral reasons were suspect, one particular explanation, “black male, same age as defendant” was clearly a pretext, given that three white jurors were also the same age as the defendant. The court noted that other reasons that a review of the record might reveal are irrelevant when the prosecutor, in court, specifically states what the reasons were that prompted the strike.

Excluding jurors based on their religion would violate Batson. In this case, it was the juror’s participation in religious activities, not his religion that was the basis for the prosecutor’s strike and this was permissible.

Harris v. Kuhlmann, 346 F.3d 330 (2d Cir. 2003)
The prosecutor used five peremptory strikes to excuse every potential black juror. The prosecutor initially accepted a black juror, but that juror was later struck, still during the jury selection process, when he revealed that he actually had a misdemeanor conviction. “The fact that the prosecutor was initially willing to accept one black juror is not sufficient to exempt from scrutiny the prosecutor’s later decisions to strike all four of the remaining black potential jurors.” These facts establish a prima facie case and remand was necessary to assess whether there were race-neutral reasons supporting the state’s exercise of peremptory strikes. (The state murder trial was held in 1985).

Aki-Khuam v. Davis, 339 F.3d 521 (7th Cir. 2003)

The trial court deviated from the standard Batson procedure by requiring the parties to explain the purpose of each peremptory strike as the jury selection process went along. Five of the defendant’s peremptory challenges were rejected by the trial judge, despite the fact that there were no objections by the state. This procedure violated the defendant’s right to due process and equal protection and required that his conviction and death sentence be set aside. The fact that the trial judge found the explanations offered by the defendant to be “terrible” is not the same as finding that the strikes were racially motivated. Moreover, requiring the lawyers to explain the basis for each strike, without an objection from the opponent is not consistent with the requirements of Batson.

United States v. Alanis, 335 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2003)

The trial court denied the defendant’s Batson challenge, but failed to complete the “step-three” analysis by reviewing the persuasiveness of the prosecutor’s gender-neutral explanations. Instead, the court simply stated that gender-neutral explanations were offered and that was the end of the inquiry. Conducting its own inquiry, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the explanations offered by the prosecutor were pretextual and that the strikes were actually used in a gender-based manner.

Eagle v. Linahan, 279 F.3d 926 (11th Cir. 2001)

At trial, defense counsel raised a Batson claim. The prosecutor responded that the ratio of blacks on the jury mirrored the ratio in the venire, thus there could be no Batson claim. The judge agreed with this argument, but commented at the conclusion of the Batson hearing, “I think both of you were doing what you could to get the different races off.” Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise what was a blatant error of law committed by the trial court in denying the Batson claim on an improper basis (comparing the venire with the jury), especially in light of the judge’s comment that demonstrated that the Batson claim was meritorious.

United States v. Nelson, 277 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2002)

This case involved the notorious prosecution of two African Americans for the killing of an orthodox Jew in Brooklyn during a riot. The District Court judge stressed the need to have a jury that was diverse. To achieve this result, the judge denied a Batson challenge, made decisions regarding excusals for cause, and shifted the order of jurors. The Second Circuit holds that a jury that is selected intentionally to achieve racial and religious objectives is not a valid jury, particularly where an unqualified juror (i.e., a biased juror) is allowed to sit in order to achieve this goal.
Riley v. Taylor, 277 F.3d 261 (3rd Cir. 2001)

The prosecutor struck all three black potential jurors. The habeas petitioner offered evidence demonstrating a pattern of discriminatory use of peremptory strikes by the prosecutor’s office in death penalty trials. The state’s explanation of its use of peremptory strikes (at the habeas hearing years later) was not supported by the record of the voir dire. The death penalty was set aside.

United States v. McFerron, 163 F.3d 952 (6th Cir. 1998)

The trial court improperly placed the burden on the defendant to articulate a race-neutral basis for exercising peremptory strikes against certain jurors. When one party challenges the exercise of strikes by the adversary, the party voicing the objection has the burden of proving that the strikes were racially-motivated. This amounted to structural error that is not subject to harmless error analysis.

Tankleff v. Senkowski, 135 F.3d 235 (2d Cir. 1998)

A defendant may raise a Batson challenge, regardless of whether he is the same race as the jurors who, he claims, were improperly excused. Moreover, there is no harmless error analysis when evaluating a Batson challenge. In this case, the prosecutor attempted to strike the three blacks on the panel; this establishes a prima facie case and the trial court should have conducted a full Batson inquiry.

Mahaffey v. Page, 162 F.3d 481 (7th Cir. 1998)

The state exercised strikes against all seven African-American members of the jury venire. This evidence was sufficient to establish a prima facie Batson claim.

United States v. Serino, 163 F.3d 91 (1st Cir. 1998)

The trial court initiated a Batson challenge and re-seated a juror struck by the defense. The First Circuit reversed: the defendant offered a race-neutral reason for striking the only Asian-American juror – she was a social worker and her husband was a financial analyst. The defendant’s proffered explanation was not inherently unbelievable and there was no basis for the judge’s factual finding that the explanation was not believable.

United States v. Blotcher, 142 F.3d 728 (4th Cir. 1998)

The defendant provided a race-neutral reason for striking a white juror (he appeared to be very conservative based on the way he was dressed) and the trial court’s decision to re-seat that juror required that the conviction be reversed.

United States v. Hill, 146 F.3d 337 (6th Cir. 1998)

There was one black potential juror. She was struck by the prosecutor. When asked why he struck that juror, the prosecutor was unable to provide a reason, but reassured the court that it was not based on the juror’s race. The Sixth Circuit remanded. The trial court made insufficient findings to deny the Batson challenge.

Coulter v. Gilmore, 155 F.3d 912 (7th Cir. 1998)
Nine of the ten strikes exercised by the prosecutor were against black potential jurors. Though the prosecutor did not use all of his peremptory strikes and there were three black jurors and two black alternates ultimately on the jury, the state failed to rebut the prima facie case. The state trial court failed to consider the totality of the circumstances and never evaluated the differential manner in which the state handled – or rather failed to handle – nonminority jurors who were similarly situated to the African-Americans the prosecution struck.

_United States v. Alvarado_, 923 F.2d 253 (2d Cir. 1991)

The government exercised 57% of its peremptory strikes against minorities. Although the record did not establish what the percentage of minorities was on the venire, the court would accept as a surrogate, the percentage of minorities in the entire district. Because the minority population in the district was 29% and the government exercised strikes against 57%, _a prima facie_ case was established.

_Harrison v. Ryan_, 909 F.2d 84 (3rd Cir. 1990)

A prosecutor’s race-conscious exclusion of even one juror is sufficient grounds to require a new trial under _Batson_. During the trial, six blacks were excluded by the State. The prosecutor was later able to identify reasons for only five of these strikes. Because of the failure to identify a reason for the sixth juror, a new trial was required.

_Virgin Islands v. Forte_, 865 F.2d 59 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The Third Circuit holds that _Batson_ applies to the intentional removal of white jurors as well as black jurors. Thus, a white defendant has the right to complain about a prosecutor’s discrimination-based exercise of strikes against white veniremen.

_United States v. Clemons_, 843 F.2d 741 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The Third Circuit holds that it is inappropriate to search for a particular percentages in evaluating a _Batson_ claim. Rather, a fact-specific determination must be made by the trial judge in determining whether the prosecutor has exercised his peremptory strikes in a discriminatory manner.

_United States v. Garrison_, 849 F.2d 103 (4th Cir. 1988)

The Fourth Circuit holds that an adversary hearing is the proper means of conducting a _Batson_ inquiry. Unless the government makes an extraordinary showing why an _ex parte_ proceeding is required (as, for example, if a current investigation involves a prospective juror) the proceedings should be fully adversarial.

_United States v. Huey_, 76 F.3d 638 (5th Cir. 1996)

One defendant can raise a _Batson_ challenge to a co-defendant’s racially motivated peremptory strikes. Here, the court found that the co-defendant did exercise his strikes in a racially discriminatory manner and then reversed the conviction not only of the complaining defendant, but also of the co-defendant (i.e., the party whose attorney violated the constitutional rights of the prospective jurors).

_United States v. Romero-Reyna_, 867 F.2d 834 (5th Cir. 1989)

The prosecutor exercised six peremptory challenges to strike Mexican-Americans from the jury. A remand was required to make findings on the _Batson_ issue since the record contained no findings by the district court on the issue. Following remand and finding by the trial judge that there was no discriminatory intent, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the conviction. 889 F.2d 559.
During the hearing on remand, the prosecutor stated that he always struck jurors whose occupations began with the letter “p.” He explained that he at first thought such a rule was irrational, until he suffered two mistrials, one of which he attributed to a holdout who was a pharmacist and the other to a juror who was a postal worker. The trial court, however, rejected this particular explanation for the prosecutor’s exercise of his strikes because he did not strike Anglos who were employed as a payroll clerk, a part-time secretary, and an area production supervisor. Nevertheless, non-discriminatory reasons were given for the exercise of each of the prosecutor’s strikes against Mexican Americans.

_Splunge v. Clark_, 960 F.2d 705 (7th Cir. 1992)

The prosecutor struck both black veniremen. One knew the defendant, but the prosecutor’s only explanation for the other strike was that “he had a feeling” about that juror; and he felt she did not understand the concept of reasonable doubt. The prosecutor’s attitude was exemplified by his asking the black jurors if they knew anybody who had been charged with murder, or robbery; and asking the white jurors if they knew anybody who was a victim of either robbery or murder. The writ was properly granted by the district court.

_Ford v. Norris_, 67 F.3d 162 (8th Cir. 1995)

The defendant established that the prosecutor violated the defendant’s rights under the _Swain v. Alabama_ standard. This violation of the defendant’s rights in the jury selection process amounts to structural error in the trial and is not subject to harmless error analysis in a habeas proceeding.

_Miller v. Lockhart_, 65 F.3d 676 (8th Cir. 1995)

The petitioner established that the prosecutor used all of his peremptory strikes against blacks, and had systematically excluded blacks over a period of time. This evidence was sufficient to make out a _Swain_ violation.

_Devose v. Norris_, 53 F.3d 201 (8th Cir. 1995)

A state prosecutor claimed to have exercised peremptories on certain black jurors because they had previously served on juries and might have been suffering from juror burnout. White jurors who had previous jury service, however, were not struck (the prosecutor claimed that this experience would give them a clearer understanding of the issues). This led the court to conclude that the state’s explanations were pretextual and because of this Batson violation, the conviction was set aside.

_Walton v. Caspari_, 916 F.2d 1352 (8th Cir. 1990)

The Eighth Circuit holds that there is no presumption that prosecutors act lawfully in connection with their exercise of peremptory strikes. The prosecutor in this case excluded fourteen out of fifteen black venire persons in the defendant’s state trial. The district court did not abuse its discretion in finding that this constituted the discriminatory use of peremptory strikes and required vacating the conviction.

_United States v. Johnson_, 873 F.2d 1137 (8th Cir. 1989)

Although two blacks did serve on the jury which convicted the defendant of escaping from lawful custody, this did not excuse the prosecutor from exercising his other peremptory challenges against blacks. The prosecutor exercised his peremptory strikes against blacks who did not respond during _voir dire_ but did not strike any whites who also did not respond.
United States v. Wilson, 884 F.2d 1121 (8th Cir. 1989)

The prosecutor’s use of all six of its strikes against six black people from the jury violated Batson. On rehearing en banc, the court finds that the prosecutor failed to assert race neutral grounds for the exercise of peremptory strikes against the black veniremen. Though the prosecutor gave acceptable race neutral explanations for five of his six strikes against blacks, the failure to offer a race neutral explanation for the sixth strike against a black requires that the conviction be reversed.

United States v. Hughes, 864 F.2d 78 (8th Cir. 1988)

The prosecutor struck three of the five jurors who were on the jury venire. This constitutes a prima facie Batson violation requiring the prosecutor to offer reasons other than race, for striking those jurors. The Court of Appeals took judicial notice of the number of times that prosecutors in the Eastern District of Missouri were charged with exercising peremptory strikes in a discriminatory manner.

United States v. Townsley, 843 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1988)

The prosecutor exercised ten of twelve peremptory challenges to remove black jurors. White defendants had standing to join the black defendants’ challenge because if the peremptory challenges were improperly used, the white defendants were treated differently because they were tried together with black defendants.

United States v. Battle, 836 F.2d 1084 (8th Cir. 1987)

The prosecutor’s use of five out of six peremptory challenges to strike five of seven blacks from the jury panel established the prima facie evidence of purposeful discrimination. Remand was required to afford the government the opportunity to set forth racially neutral reasons for its use of peremptory challenges.

Garrett v. Morris, 815 F.2d 509 (8th Cir. 1987)

The State violated Batson by the exercise of its preemptory challenges in a way that excluded all black jurors from the petit jury panel. The prosecutor’s stated reasons for excluding all black prospective jurors, that they lacked background, education and knowledge to understand the scientific evidence, was clearly a pretext for rank racial discrimination.

Turner v. Marshall, 121 F.3d 1248 (9th Cir. 1997)

Although the prosecutor did not utilize all of the state’s peremptory challenges and there were African-Americans left on the jury, the prosecutor failed to articulate race-neutral reasons for striking one of the African-American prospective jurors. The reason articulated for striking the juror (a hesitancy about looking at gruesome crime scene photographs) would have supported striking white jurors who were not struck. Though other African-American jurors were not struck, this did not defeat the Batson claim: “Where the prosecutor’s explanation for striking a minority juror is unsupported by the record, empanelling other minority jurors will not salvage her discredited justification.”

United States v. Annigoni, 96 F.3d 1132 (9th Cir. 1996)

In this en banc decision, the court concludes that automatic reversal of a conviction is the proper remedy where a trial court erroneously deprives a criminal defendant of the right of exercising a peremptory challenge. In this case, the trial court concluded, incorrectly, that one of the defendant’s peremptory strikes was racially motivated. The defendant, therefore, was denied the right to exercise that strike. This error, the Ninth Circuit holds, is automatically grounds for reversal. This holding did not survive the decision in Rivera v. Illinois, 556 U.S. 148 (2009), which held that denying a defendant a peremptory strike is not grounds for automatic reversal.

United States v. Sammaripa, 55 F.3d 433 (9th Cir. 1995)

In a jury trial, jeopardy attaches when the jury is impaneled and sworn. In this case, after the jury was impaneled and sworn, the prosecutor voiced a Batson challenge and the trial court thereafter granted a mistrial. There was no manifest necessity for doing so, because the prosecutor should have made the Batson challenge before the jury was impaneled and sworn. Therefore, the double jeopardy clause barred trying the defendant after this first aborted attempt.

United States v. Omoruyi, 7 F.3d 880 (9th Cir. 1993)

The prosecutor explained that he struck two women jurors because they were single females who may have been attracted to the defendant. The exercise of peremptory strikes on the basis of gender is impermissible. Even though half of the seated jurors were women, the prosecutor’s concession that he struck the two jurors because they were women necessitated a reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Bishop, 959 F.2d 820 (9th Cir. 1992)

The prosecutor excused one black juror because she lived in a predominantly black neighborhood and probably thought the police picked on people. This was not a “race-neutral” explanation and the conviction was reversed. This explanation was a surrogate for impermissible racial biases. Also, the fact that the jury ended up being “representative” is not determinative. Though this may be probative of the prosecutor’s intent, the exclusion of even one juror on the basis of race violates Batson no matter how many black jurors ultimately serve.

United States v. Chinchilla, 874 F.2d 695 (9th Cir. 1989)

The Hispanic defendants were denied due process when the prosecutor exercised his peremptory challenges to remove the only Hispanic juror and the only Hispanic alternate juror.

United States v. Thompson, 827 F.2d 1254 (9th Cir. 1987)

In order to fulfill its Batson duty, the trial court conducted an in camera ex parte conference with the prosecutor. This is error and is not harmless. The defense has a right to be present during the prosecutor’s explanation of the use of his peremptory instructions and may make comments during this conference.

Hollingsworth v. Burton, 30 F.3d 109 (11th Cir. 1994)

Though the prosecutor satisfactorily explained his basis for striking potential black jurors, the court holds that the proper way to analyze a Batson claim is to compare the characteristics of the excluded jurors with jurors who were not struck by the government. Thus, if a seated juror had the same characteristic as a juror who was struck, and that characteristic was the asserted basis for striking the juror, then the explanation offered by the prosecutor will not be sufficient to overcome the prima facie Batson claim.

Hollis v. Davis, 941 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1991)

The state defendant was able to establish in this habeas action that all blacks had been excluded from grand and petit juries in this jurisdiction in Alabama in 1959. That was all that was required to vacate this thirty-one year old conviction. Furthermore, his attorney’s failure to challenge the composition of the grand and petit juries excused any procedural default in this habeas action.
Horton v. Zant, 941 F.2d 1449 (11th Cir. 1991)

Under the Swain standard, the prosecutor failed to rebut the prima facie case that he had exercised his peremptory strikes in a discriminatory manner. Among the evidence relied upon by the defendant was evidence that the DA had engaged in other types of discriminatory actions in the past in addition to his practice of excusing prospective black jurors.

United States v. Rodriguez, 935 F.2d 194 (11th Cir. 1991)

Following the Supreme Court’s decision in Powers v. Ohio, the court holds that an Hispanic defendant may raise a Batson challenge if the prosecutor exercises strikes against black jurors on the basis of their race.

Love v. Jones, 923 F.2d 816 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant’s conviction was tainted as a result of the prosecutor’s discriminatory exercise of peremptory strikes to eliminate all the blacks from the jury. This case was tried prior to the decision in Batson, but the prosecutor’s conduct was outlawed by Swain v. Alabama. That is, the prosecutor’s actions were shown to be part of a systematic exclusion of blacks from petit juries in that county.

United States v. Horsley, 864 F.2d 1543 (11th Cir. 1989)

The prosecutor exercised one of his peremptory strikes against the only black venireman. When asked why he exercised his strike against the black juror, the prosecutor responded, “I just got a feeling about him.” Despite the fact that only one peremptory strike was used against a potential black juror, the Court of Appeals holds that the prosecutor must offer an explanation better than “I got a feeling about him.” The defendant is not required to show a pattern of peremptory strikes against a certain number of veniremen in order to establish a prima facie case of purposeful discrimination.

Jones v. Davis, 835 F.2d 835 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant in this case attempted to apply Batson to a conviction which was final long before the Batson decision was issued by the U.S. Supreme Court. The Eleventh Circuit holds that the exercise of peremptory strikes by the prosecutor was so blatantly discriminatory in this case, and part of a pattern and practice of discriminatory use of peremptory strikes, that the defendant could rely on Swain v. Alabama in vacating his conviction.
JURY SELECTION
(True Voir Dire Answers)

English v. Berghuis, 900 F.3d 804 (6th Cir. 2018)

The defendant was tried in a state court on a charge of sexual assault involving a teenager visiting at his house. During voir dire one juror did not reveal that she had been the victim of a sexual assault by a family member. Based on the post-trial record, this false statement – which was intentional – would have provided a basis to excuse the juror for cause and therefore, the defendant was deprived of a fair trial. Habeas granted.

United States v. Parse, 789 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2015)

During voir dire, a juror hid the fact that she was a disbarred attorney, an alcoholic and that she had a criminal record. There was some evidence that the defense attorneys were aware of these facts at some point during the trial and did not alert the court to their discovery. Nevertheless, the Second Circuit reversed the defendant’s conviction.

Sampson v. United States, 724 F.3d 150 (1st Cir. 2013)

This case provides an excellent primer on the various issues relating to the discovery, after trial, that a juror had not been honest in answering voir dire questions. The defendant challenging the conviction must show that the material false statements were made. A statement is material if it had a natural tendency to influence, or is capable of influencing, the judge’s impartiality determination. A finding that an accurate answer would demonstrate actual bias is not necessary. The determination of materiality must be gauged on a case-by-case basis. The evidence was sufficient in this case to establish that the false voir dire answers were material and would have led to the excusal of the juror for cause.

United States v. Colombo, 869 F.2d 149 (2d Cir. 1989)

The defendant offered evidence that a juror intentionally concealed the fact that her brother-in-law was a government attorney. The juror apparently did so in the hope that this would help her get a seat on the jury. If this could be proved at an evidentiary hearing, it would be grounds for a new trial. The misrepresentation not only deprived the defendant of his right to exercise his peremptory strikes intelligently, it also revealed that the juror withheld information which indicated a partiality on her part.

United States v. Tucker, 137 F.3d 1016 (8th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was the Governor of Arkansas. One of the jurors failed to reveal during voir dire that the father of one of her children had sought clemency from the Governor. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to develop the facts of this claim. See generally McDonough Power Equipment, Inc. v. Greenwood, 464 U.S. 548 (1984). An evidentiary hearing was also necessary to inquire into the allegations that the juror's husband talked to her during the course of trial.
JURY SELECTION
(Peremptory Strikes)

A trial judge’s good faith error in denying a defendant’s preremptory challenge to a prospective juror did not automatically deny the defendant the right to a fair trial. In this case, the defendant sought to exercise a peremptory strike against a potential juror, the prosecutor objected on Batson grounds and the trial judge sustained the objection, so the defendant was not permitted to strike that juror. The juror was not shown to be biased, or otherwise unqualified to serve, so the defendant’s constitutional rights were not violated. In fact, peremptory strikes are not a constitutional right.

United States v. Reid, 751 F.3d 763 (6th Cir. 2014)

If a defendant’s objection for cause is mistakenly viewed as a peremptory strike, and the defendant is thus denied his right to a full allotment of his peremptory strikes, this can be grounds for review, even though the jury that was ultimately selected was fair. This denial of the rights conferred by Rule 24 is different, the Sixth Circuit held, than the situation in United States v. Martinez-Salazar, 528 U.S. 304 (2000), where the Supreme Court held that the wrongful denial of a motion to excuse for cause was not grounds for reversal if the resulting jury was otherwise fair. The conviction was affirmed, however, because the defendant did not exercise all of his peremptory strikes, thus common sense proves that the error was harmless in this case.

United States v. Yepiz, 685 F.3d 840 (9th Cir. 2012)

The trial court’s “use-it-or-lose-it” method of excercising strikes denied the defendant the right to the full right to exercise peremptory strikes as guaranteed by Rule 24. The trial court counted as a peremptory strike a lawyer’s failure to strike anybody from a panel.

United States v. Underwood, 122 F.3d 389 (7th Cir. 1997)

All defense counsel were confused by the trial judge's explanation of the method of jury selection. After exercising their peremptory strikes, the attorneys believed that the remaining eighteen jurors would serve as the twelve jurors and the six alternates in the order in which they were seated. The judge, however, selected the twelve jurors and the six alternates from a list that he maintained, but did not show the attorneys. The failure to correctly explain the procedure to the lawyers, or to remedy the problem when the lawyers complained, operated to deny defendants their right to exercise peremptory strikes. A new trial was required. Not clear if this decision would survive the decision in United States v. Martinez-Salazar, 120 S. Ct. 774 (2000)
JURY SELECTION
(Voir Dire – Excusals for Cause)

United States v. Martinez-Salazar, 120 S.Ct. 774 (2000)

If the trial court fails to remove a juror for cause and the defendant then exercises a peremptory strike against the juror, there is no appellate review of the trial court’s error because any challenge to the impartiality of the jury must focus on the actual jurors who considered the case. The fact that the defendant was required to use a peremptory strike against a juror who should have been excused for cause does not diminish his rights under Rule 24.

United States v. Shepard, 739 F.3d 286 (6th Cir. 2014)

After being selected to serve on the jury in this child pornography case, one juror sent a note to the clerk saying that he couldn’t do it because she could not look at the pictures or videos. Further voir dire of the juror did not alter his views; he said that he could not look at the videos. The trial court erred in not excusing the juror and replacing him with an alternate.

United States v. Littlejohn, 489 F.3d 1335 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

The trial court posed compound questions to jurors such as this: are you, or any member of your family member employed (or ever been employed) by law enforcement, and, if so, would that make it hard for you to be impartial? If the answer to the second question was “no”, the juror was not expected to respond whether he or she was ever employed by law enforcement. This method of questioning jurors violated the defendant’s right to an impartial jury.

Virgil v. Dretke, 446 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel’s failure to conduct further voir dire, or to move to remove certain prospective jurors for cause or peremptorily was ineffective assistance of counsel. The jurors expressed an inability to be fair. One juror said that because his mother had been mugged, he could not be fair. Another juror said that his relationship to law enforcement officers would preclude him from being an impartial juror. Failing to move to strike the jurors for cause – and failing to exercise a peremptory strike against these jurors – was not a matter of strategy. In addition to the decision’s analysis of the ineffective claim, the court extensively reviews the case law relating to the requirement of ensuring that jurors are impartial.

Franklin v. Anderson, 434 F.3d 412 (6th Cir. 2006)

Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise the trial court’s error in failing to excuse a prospective juror for cause. The juror demonstrated during voir dire that the juror could not comprehend the legal standard she was supposed to apply.

White v. Mitchell, 431 F.3d 517 (6th Cir. 2005)

Reviewing the voir dire at length, the Sixth Circuit concluded that the state courts were incorrect in upholding a conviction where a juror clearly indicated that she had a fixed opinion about the defendant’s guilt and could not be fair.

Miller v. Webb, 385 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2004)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request that a juror be excused for cause – and then failing to utilize a peremptory strike on the juror. During voir dire, the juror expressed her bias in favor of the government’s key witness in this murder case. She knew the witness from Bible study courses. The juror should have been removed for cause. See also Wolfe v. Brigano, 232 F.3d 499 (6th Cir. 2000) (failure to excuse juror for cause was reversible error).

Oswald v. Bertrand, 374 F.3d 475 (7th Cir. 2004)

The state trial involved one of the most highly-publicized cases in the history of the County, the killing of a police officer and a hostage-taking. Towards the end of several days of voir dire a prospective juror stated that he had learned more about the case sitting in the jury room over the past three days than he had learned from the newspapers previously. Nevertheless, the trial court refused to re-question any jurors about their discussions in the jury room and the remaining jurors who had not yet been questioned confirmed that there were discussions occurring in the jury room. The Seventh Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus. Inadequate measures were taken by the state judge to ensure that the jury was not biased, or that the jury pool was not poisoned. “Even a clearly guilty criminal is entitled to be tried before an impartial tribunal, something the jurors in this case may well have failed to understand.”

United States v. Nelson, 277 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2002)

This case involved the notorious prosecution of two African Americans for the killing of an orthodox Jew in Brooklyn during a riot. The District Court judge stressed the need to have a jury that was diverse. To achieve this result, the judge denied a Batson challenge, made decisions regarding excusals for cause, and shifted the order of jurors. The Second Circuit holds that a jury that is selected intentionally to achieve racial and religious objectives is not a valid jury, particularly where an unqualified juror (i.e., a biased juror) is allowed to sit in order to achieve this goal.

United States v. Tucker, 137 F.3d 1016 (8th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was the Governor of Arkansas. One of the jurors failed to reveal during voir dire that the father of one of her children had sought clemency from the Governor. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to develop the facts of this claim. See generally McDonough Power Equipment, Inc. v. Greenwood, 464 U.S. 548 (1984). An evidentiary hearing was also necessary to inquire into the allegations that the juror's husband talked to her during the course of trial.

Mach v. Stewart, 137 F.3d 630 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with child molestation. During voir dire, one member of the panel stated that she worked for the welfare department and she was aware of no false reports of abuse. Later, she revealed that she had considerable psychological training and she reiterated that in her experience, she was not aware that children ever fabricated allegations of abuse. The entire venire was tainted by these answers – surely at least one juror remembered these comments and believed them when deliberations began – and the Ninth Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus.

United States v. Polichemi, 219 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 1998)
The trial court erred in failing to strike for cause a fifteen-year employee of the U.S. Attorney’s office. However, because the defendants exercised a peremptory strike against this juror, there was no cause to set aside the conviction.

United States v. Mendoza, 157 F.3d 730 (9th Cir. 1998)

Two jurors raised their hands in response to the question, “Is there any of you that feel that our approach to the problem of marijuana is all wrong, that we should permit it like smoking nicotine, something like that?” The court summarily excused those jurors without any further inquiry. This was improper. The court should have made some effort to determine whether the jurors could, despite their beliefs, perform their duties as jurors. Harmless error.

United States v. Torres, 128 F.3d 38 (2d Cir. 1997)

A juror who admitted during voir dire that she structured financial transactions. This provided sufficient basis for the judge to excuse the juror for cause. The court distinguished cases in which bias is presumed – for example, cases in which a juror is related to a party, or admits to being partial for some other reason – from cases, such as this one, where a juror may be inferred to be biased. In the inferred bias cases, a judge has discretion whether to excuse a juror for cause.

United States v. Colombo, 869 F.2d 149 (2d Cir. 1989)

The defendant offered evidence that a juror intentionally concealed the fact that her brother-in-law was a government attorney. The juror apparently did so in the hope that this would help her get a seat on the jury. If this could be proved at an evidentiary hearing, it would be grounds for a new trial. The misrepresentation not only deprived the defendant of his right to exercise his peremptory strikes intelligently, it also revealed that the juror withheld information which indicated a partiality on her part.

United States v. Severino, 800 F.2d 42 (2d Cir. 1986)

The defendant was denied a fair trial by the Court’s denial of his request to exercise preemptory challenges outside of the presence of prospective jurors.

United States v. Calabrese, 942 F.2d 218 (3rd Cir. 1991)

Any jurors who indicated on a juror questionnaire that they “knew” the defendant were automatically excused. This was reversible error. 28 U.S.C. §1866(c)(2) and (4) directs that jurors may be excused for cause if they are unable to render impartial jury service or for other good cause. Simply knowing the defendant is not enough to excuse the juror. Some further inquiry is necessary to determine if the juror is capable of rendering impartial service.

United States v. Salamone, 800 F.2d 1216 (3rd Cir. 1986)

The District Court decided that no one who was affiliated with the National Rifle Association would be permitted to serve on the jury in this firearms case. The Court of Appeals reverses holding that this violates the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury. The decision to exclude seven prospective jurors solely on the basis of their affiliation is not subject to harmless error analysis.

United States v. Ricks, 802 F.2d 731 (4th Cir. 1986)

It is improper in the jury selection procedure if a “struck jury” system is employed to use an overly large list of venire persons. If the list of venire persons contains more names than are needed, it is the duty of the District Court to state in unequivocal language the portion of the list which contains not in excess of the number of venire persons necessary to achieve the jury from which the actual jury selection will be made.

United States v. Rowe, 106 F.3d 1226 (5th Cir. 1997)

When a juror responded during voir dire that she was not sure she could be impartial, because her brother was an undercover officer, the trial judge chastised her and eventually directed the clerk to require the juror to return to court repeatedly in subsequent terms. This conduct on the part of the judge tainted the entire panel. The judge’s abuse of the juror would have led other jurors not to be honest in answering voir dire questions. Conviction reversed.

United States v. Beckner, 69 F.3d 1290 (5th Cir. 1995)

The defendant, a former U.S. Attorney and a prominent lawyer in Baton Rouge, was indicted for fraud, obstruction of justice and perjury. A first trial ended in a mistrial. The judge denied the motion of the government and the defendant for individual voir dire at the second trial. Instead, he questioned the jurors as a group about their knowledge of the case and the pretrial publicity. A defendant’s right to an impartial jury includes the right to an adequate voir dire to identify unqualified jurors. Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719 (1992). But see Mu’Min v. Virginia, 500 U.S. 415 (1991). The standard for gauging the effectiveness of the voir dire procedure is as follows: first, the defendant must establish that pretrial publicity raised a significant possibility of prejudice; second, the issue is whether the court’s voir dire procedure failed to provide a reasonable assurance that prejudice would be discovered if present. The publicity in this case consisted of several dozen newspaper articles, as well as television reports of the first trial (including the prosecutor’s statement that the vote was 11 - 1 for conviction). The voir dire procedure was inadequate. In sum, the judge simply asked the jurors whether they felt that they could be impartial and relied on their opinion, rather than making an independent assessment of the jurors’ impartiality.

United States v. Scott, 854 F.2d 697 (5th Cir. 1988)

The foreman of the jury had a brother who was a deputy sheriff in the police office which performed some of the investigation in this case. The foreman failed to reveal that fact in voir dire despite being specifically asked by the judge whether any of the jurors had close relatives who were in law enforcement. The failure of the juror to respond affirmatively to this question required that the defendant be granted a new trial.

United States v. Amerson, 938 F.2d 116 (8th Cir. 1991)

The prosecution turned on the credibility of law enforcement officers. The judge committed reversible error by failing to excuse jurors who stated that they would believe the testimony of officers over other witnesses.

Dyer v. Calderon, 151 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 1998)

Bias must be presumed when a juror, during voir dire lies about significant and material matters. Here, the juror, in a death penalty case, failed to reveal that her brother had been the victim of a homicide and that other family members (including herself) had been victimized by crimes and had perpetrated crimes.

Mach v. Stewart, 137 F.3d 630 (9th Cir. 1997)

During a voir dire in this sexual assault of a minor case, one of the prospective jurors, in the presence of the other jurors explained that she was a social worker and every case of alleged sexual abuse of a minor in which she was involved turned out to be true. Moreover, she was aware of no instance in which a child lied about being abused. This tainted the entire panel and the conviction was set aside.

United States v. Sinigaglio, 942 F.2d 581 (9th Cir. 1991)

26 U.S.C. §6103(h)(5) provided that the Treasury Department must (upon request) provide information to the defendant about any prospective juror who has been investigated or audited by the IRS if the defendant is charged with a tax offense. The audit history may not be arbitrarily limited by the government (as in this case to the past six years). Though the court does not hold that this is reversible error per se, it was reversible in this case where the voir dire did not eliminate the significant risk of prejudice.

United States v. Contreras-Castro, 825 F.2d 185 (9th Cir. 1987)

It was reversible error for the trial court to fail to ask venire persons if the testimony of law enforcement officers would unduly influence them in this narcotics prosecution. The government’s entire case was based on the uncorroborated testimony of two DEA agents.

United States v. Washington, 819 F.2d 221 (9th Cir. 1987)

It is an abuse of discretion for a trial court to fail to ask the jurors if they know any of the government witnesses. The proper remedy is reversal, not a remand to then question the witnesses. To remand the case after two years would not have satisfied the guaranty of an impartial jury.

United States v. Iribe-Perez, 129 F.3d 1167 (10th Cir. 1997)

When the jury first entered the courtroom, they were told by the trial judge that the defendant had decided to enter a guilty plea. Plea negotiations broke down, however, and the same jury pool was then used to strike a jury. The district court erred in selecting the jury from a panel comprised of individuals who were informed by the trial judge that the defendant was going to plead guilty to the very crime of which they ultimately convicted him.
JURY SELECTION
(Voir Dire – Excusals For Cause – Death Penalty Cases)

A defendant has a right to voir dire a juror about whether the juror would automatically impose the death penalty in certain circumstances, regardless of the presence of any mitigating circumstances. This type of reverse-Witherspoon inquiry must be permitted and a juror who says that he would automatically vote for death, regardless of any mitigating circumstance, should be excused.

The United States Supreme Court holds that the improper exclusion of a juror on the basis that she equivocated about her ability to impose a death sentence is per se reversible error. No harm need be shown.

Wheeler v. Simpson, 779 F.3d 366 (6th Cir. 2015)
Improperly excusing a juror for cause in a death penalty case is structural error and requires setting aside the death penalty.

White v. Mitchell, 431 F.3d 517 (6th Cir. 2005)
Reviewing the voir dire at length, the Sixth Circuit concluded that one juror should have been excused because she held a fixed opinion that the death penalty was the appropriate sentence.
JUVENILE CASES

United States v. Juvenile Male, 492 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 2007)
The lower court abused its discretion in its findings pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 5032. Among the factors that were required to be considered was the juvenile’s social background. The district court incorrectly found that the juvenile experienced no domestic violence growing up with his grandparents.

United States v. C.M., 485 F.3d 492 (9th Cir. 2007)
The police failed to comply with the Juvenile Delinquency Act requirements of prompt notification of parents, notification of the consulate, and prompt arraignment. 18 U.S.C. § 5033. The appropriate remedy was not just the suppression of the juvenile’s statements but the dismissal of the charges.

United States v. Female Juvenile, A.F.S., 377 F.3d 27 (1st Cir. 2004)
The prosecution of the juvenile was barred because of the government’s failure to comply with the speedy trial provision of the Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act 18 U.S.C. § 5036. This provision requires trial within thirty days of detention.

United States v. Juvenile, 347 F.3d 778 (9th Cir. 2003)
A lengthy opinion detailing the sentencing rules for juveniles. Ultimately, the Ninth Circuit concludes that the sentence imposed on the juvenile in this case was too harsh.

United States v. Ramirez, 297 F.3d 185 (2d Cir. 2002)
The Juvenile Delinquency Act continues to apply even if the defendant who is being treated as an adult (his case having been transferred) reaches age 21 during the courses of the proceedings. 18 U.S.C. § 5031.

United States v. Male Juvenile, 148 F.3d 468 (5th Cir. 1998)
In order to prosecute a juvenile, the United States Attorney must certify that the case should be prosecuted in federal court. 18 U.S.C. § 5032. In this case, an Assistant United States Attorney filed the certificate. Because there was no evidence that the U.S. Attorney delegated his authority to the AUSA, there was no jurisdiction to try the juvenile in district court.

United States v. Doe, 219 F.3d 1009 (9th Cir. 2000)
The government violated 18 U.S.C. § 5033 by failing to advise the juvenile’s parents promptly after his arrest; failing to promptly advise him of his rights; and by failing to promptly bring him before a magistrate. There was a three and a half hour delay in advising him of his rights. There was a day and a half delay in bringing the defendant to a magistrate and the parents were not promptly notified of the juvenile’s rights. The juvenile’s confession should have been suppressed.
KIDNAPPING

United States v. Valle, 807 F.3d 508 (2d Cir. 2015)

The defendant was a participant in an online chat room whose participants fantasized about various brutal and graphic schemes of kidnapping, torturing, cooking, raping, murdering and cannibalizing various women. The defendant also participated outside the chatroom with other people (whom he never met, talked to, or even knew the true identities of) about the same topics. The government offered no evidence that the defendant ever engaged in any criminal activity, to say nothing of any of the activity described in the chats, though he did post pictures of some of the women whom he fantasized killing or torturing. He was charged with conspiracy to kidnap the women. The district court granted a Rule 29 motion after trial and the Second Circuit affirmed. The fantasy chats and the “real chats” were, for purposes of determining the existence of a conspiracy, indistinguishable and there was, therefore no proof of an agreement to actually commit any crime. The fact that the some of the “victims” were real women; and the fact that the defendant engaged in internet searches to learn how to “cannibalize” a person, did not convert the fantasy into a conspiracy. Not only did the government fail to prove that the defendant had a real conspiratorial intent, it also failed to prove that the people with whom he was chatting had conspiratorial intent and, of course, it takes two to tango.

United States v. Rodriguez, 587 F.3d 573 (2d Cir. 2009)

The Hostage Taking Act requires an enhanced sentence for any defendant found guilty of its provisions. The Second Circuit concluded in this case that the defendants’ conduct of briefly detaining a taxicab passenger to extort money from her did not constitute hostage taking under the terms of the statute. This statute requires some element of international terrorism, or some other international element (either the victim, or the defendant is an alien) plus confinement of the victim for an appreciable period of time.

United States v. Clenney, 434 F.3d 780 (5th Cir. 2005)

Venue in this kidnapping case was not proper in the district of the child’s primary residence, or the residence of his mother. The court rejected the government’s argument that in a case of international parental kidnapping, venue is proper in the district where the parent (whose parental rights were violated) resides.

United States v. Lentz, 383 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2004)

At some length, the court reviews the elements of a kidnapping resulting in death prosecution. 18 U.S.C. § 1201(a). The district court granted a judgment of acquittal, finding insufficient evidence to support the element of “held for ransom, reward, or otherwise.” See Chatwin v. United States, 326 U.S. 455 (1946). The Fourth Circuit ultimately reversed (over one dissent), finding sufficient evidence that the defendant/husband, killed his wife after holding her “otherwise.”

United States v. Boone, 959 F.2d 1550 (11th Cir. 1992)

Kidnapping can be committed without the use of force. That is, the victim can be inveigled across state lines and the use of force reserved. Nevertheless, the entirely voluntary act of the “victim” to cross the state line – even if occasioned by the deceit of the defendant – does not amount to kidnapping. In order to be kidnapping, the inveiglement requires the alleged kidnapper to have formed the intent to use forcible action, in the event his deception failed, to complete the kidnapping. The trial court’s instructions in this case failed to make this clear.

United States v. Howard, 918 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1990)

The evidence was not sufficient to support the defendant’s conviction for conspiring or attempting to kidnap a DEA agent. The defendants were attempting to “rip-off” the undercover DEA agent. When he was inspecting the cocaine which he was about to purchase, the agent was pushed into a car and guns were drawn. He immediately drew his gun and escaped. This was not sufficient evidence to prove that the defendants were attempting to kidnap, or conspiring to kidnap him.
LESSER INCLUDED OFFENSES

This topic is different than the topic that focuses on when a jury should be instructed on a lesser included offense. Those cases are at Jury Instructions (Lesser Included Offenses)

United States v. Jackson, 443 F.3d 293 (3rd Cir. 2006)
Possession with intent to distribute drugs is a lesser included offense of possession with intent to distribute drugs within 1,000 feet of a school and a defendant cannot be convicted and sentenced for both offenses.

United States v. Downer, 143 F.3d 819 (4th Cir. 1998)
After the defendant was convicted by a jury of aggravated sexual abuse, the court realized that the definition of the offense given to the jury violated the Ex Post Facto Clause, because the offense, as defined, did not exist at the time of the alleged conduct. The trial court then entered judgment on a lesser included offense. The Fourth Circuit reversed: entering judgment on the lesser offense, which was not the subject of the indictment, violated the Grand Jury Clause.
MAIL FRAUD

(Proof of Fraud)

See also: Jury Instructions (Good Faith)

MATERIALITY

Though there is no explicit materiality element set forth in the mail fraud, wire fraud and bank fraud statutes, this element is implicit in the concept of fraud. Thus, the government must prove that any misrepresentation involved in a mail, wire or bank fraud prosecution must relate to a material fact. This issue, pursuant to United States v. Gaudin, must be submitted to the jury.

The defendants were charged with engaging in fraudulent activity in connection with their efforts to obtain video poker licenses from the state of Louisiana. The court held these licenses are not property; therefore, a mail fraud conviction was invalid. Though the state receives substantial money in exchange for issuance of the license, the money is primarily received after the license is issued. In short, the license may be property in the hands of the defendant (it has economic value), but it was not property in the hands of the victim (the state) before it was issued.

United States v. Berroa, 856 F.3d 141 (1st Cir. 2017)

The defendants fraudulently obtained medical licenses in Puerto Rico, by conspiring with an employee of the medical board to improperly score their test. They were charged with mail fraud. The indictment alleged that the doctors, through this deceit, obtained money from patients. The First Circuit reversed: the fraud did not cause the “victims” to lose money or property. The Court noted that the government could not prosecute on theory that the doctors obtained their licenses by fraud, because of the Cleveland precedent (above). The Court relied on Loughrin v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2384 (2014), that there must be a closer connection between the fraud and the obtaining of property from the victim. A simple “but for” test is not sufficient. In both the bank fraud statute (interpreted in Loughrin) and the mail fraud statute (interpreted in this case), the link between the fraud and the victim’s loss is the phrase “by means of” (the victim loses money by means of the fraud).

United States v. Takhalov, 827 F.3d 1307, amended 838 F.3d 1168 (11th Cir. 2016)

To deceive is not the same as to defraud. Deception that is used to induce a person to buy a product is not necessarily fraudulent. In this case, the defendant owned nightclubs in Miami. They employed women who posed as tourists to encourage businessmen and tourists to take them to the nightclub. Unbeknownst to the men, the women were paid by the nightclubs to induce the men to take them to the clubs. This was deceptive. But it was not fraudulent, because the men, once they arrived at the nightclub got what they paid for: drinks. And they were accompanied by the pretty women. Though they were deceived, this was not fraudulent. It is not enough for the government to prove that the “victims” would not have entered into the transaction but for the deception. The government must prove that the victims did not get what

United States v. Weimert, 819 F.3d 351 (7th Cir. 2016)

The mail and wire fraud statutes may not be stretched to criminalize deception about a party’s negotiating positions, such as a party’s bottom-line reserve price or how important a particular non-price term is. Buyers and sellers negotiate prices and other terms. They will often try to mislead the other party about the prices and terms they are willing to accept. Such deceptions are not criminal and neither party to the negotiation expects complete candor about the counter-party’s “bottom line:” “In the Restatement (Second) of Torts treatment of fraud … statements about a party's opinions, preferences, priorities, and bottom lines are generally not considered statements of fact material to the transaction. See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 538A cmts. b, g (distinguishing between representations of facts—where the maker has definite knowledge—and opinions—including a “maker's judgment as to quality, value, authenticity or similar matters as to which opinions may be expected to differ”).” In this case, Weimert, an employee of the bank, told the buyer of the bank’s asset, that the bank insisted that he be a partner of the buying entity; he told the bank that the buying entity insisted that he be its partner. Neither statement was true, but neither of these statements was a material misrepresentation about the actual terms of the deal. The Seventh Circuit reversed the conviction in this case because the alleged deceptive statements were not criminally fraudulent.

United States v. Litvak, 808 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2015)

Litvak was a securities broker who worked for Jefferies & Company and was involved in selling residential mortgage backed securities (“RMBS”). He was charged with fraud in connection with his sales of RMBS’s. There were three categories of misrepresentations: (1) He lied about the cost at which Jefferies acquired certain RMBS in his effort to convince a purchaser to pay more for the same RMBS’s; (2) He lied when he said that he was negotiating for the purchase of certain RMBS’s at a certain price in his efforts to re-sell the RMBS’s, when, in fact, Jefferies already owned the RMBS’s at a lower price than the price he was about to pay to purchase the RMBS’s; (3) In the process of purchasing RMBS’s, he lied about the price at which he had negotiated to re-sell the RMBS’s (falsely saying that the price was less than it actually was) and thereby induced the seller to sell the RMBS’s to him at a cheaper price to enable Jefferies to make a profit. On the basis of these representations, Litvak was convicted of securities fraud and also making a false statement to the U.S. Treasury which was overseeing certain RMBS sales in connection with TARP. The Second Circuit reversed the false statement count, based on the failure to prove that Litvak’s false statements were material. Though the U.S. Treasury was aware and monitored these types of sales, the Treasury made no “decision” that was affected by the price of the sales. The Second Circuit held, however, that the materiality of the false statements to counter-parties was a jury question that could not be decided as a matter of law for purposes of the securities fraud convictions under Rule 10b-5. Litvak argued that the “price” of the RBMS’s to Jefferies was not what was important to the counter-parties; what mattered was the value. The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that the jury was the proper fact-finder on the question of materiality. However, the securities fraud convictions were reversed, because the district court improperly excluded expert testimony offered by Litvak on the topic of materiality. The expert was prepared to testify that a reasonable counter-party would not rely on representations made by Litvak and that they would normally make their own determination of value, rather than relying on Litvak’s representation about Jefferies’ price in purchasing (or the intended sales price of) the RMBS’s. This was the proper subject of expert testimony. Finally, the Second Circuit held that the trial court erred in excluding evidence offered by Litvak that his supervisors permitted these types of sales practices by other brokers, which, according to Litvak, demonstrated his good faith and his lack of intent to defraud. The evidence was relevant to show that Litvak held an honest belief that he was not engaged in improper or illegal conduct.

United States v. Camick, 796 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2015)
The defendant’s real name is Leslie Lyle Camick. But over ten years ago, he took the name of his deceased brother, Wayne Camick and had used that name ever since. He was charged with mail fraud, wire fraud and identity theft when he wrote a letter to a court and claimed an interest in certain property that was the subject of a Quiet Title action by another person. He used the name Wayne Camick in this correspondence. He also claimed that he had been wrongfully detained in jail and that was the reason his response to the court was late. He had been arrested and released recently, but, according to the government, his detention was not “wrongful.” The Tenth Circuit held that claiming that he was “wrongfully detained” was not a material misstatement, nor was using the name Wayne Camick a material misstatement. In an entirely separate holding, the court held that using the name Wayne Camick on a provisional patent application was also not a materially false statement. Because his mail and wire fraud convictions were reversed on sufficiency grounds, the court also reversed the aggravated identity theft convictions which were predicated on those fraud convictions.

United States v. Borrero, 771 F.3d 973 (7th Cir. 2014)
The defendants were prosecuted for various offenses, including mail fraud. The mail fraud count alleged that the defendants defrauded the State of Indiana by submitting applications for car titles with false information. This theory of fraud does not pass muster under Cleveland, because a car title is not “property” in the hands of the State.

United States v. Sadler, 750 F.3d 585 (6th Cir. 2014)
The operator of a pill mill lied to a pharmaceutical supplier about who was to receive the drugs. Nevertheless, the operator paid full price. This does not constitute wire fraud and will not support a conviction under 18 U.S.C. § 1343 or § 1346. The seller’s right to “accurate information” is not an intangible right that is cognizable under the honest services fraud provision.

United States v. Farinella, 558 F.3d 695 (7th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was charged with wire fraud and introducing misbranded food in interstate commerce in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 331(a). The defendant purchased a million bottles of salad dressing that had a label that stated, “best when purchased by” a certain date and then pasted another label over that label that extended the date by approximately one year. The government contended at trial that the salad dressing “expired” on the original date, but this was not true.
The “best when purchased by” date was not an expiration date. The salad dressing did not expire and was not rancid or unhealthy if purchased after the “best when purchased by” date. There was no evidence introduced at trial what was meant by “best when purchased by” or whether this was a decision made by the manufacturer to generate sales quicker (as opposed to having anything to do with the quality of the food).

United States v. Svete, 556 F.3d 1157 (11th Cir. 2009)

The original panel opinion held that the pattern jury instruction in the Eleventh Circuit failed to adequately explain the definition of fraud. According to United States v. Brown, 79 F.3d 1550 (11th Cir. 1996), the scheme to defraud must be “reasonably calculated to deceive persons of ordinary prudence and comprehension.” The pattern instruction simply requires that the scheme represent a “plan or course of action intended to deceive or cheat someone out of money or property by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representation, or promises.” The en banc court vacated the panel decision and concluded that Brown should be overruled and the “reasonable prudent victim” rule has thus been abolished in the Eleventh Circuit.

United States v. Ratcliff, 488 F.3d 639 (5th Cir. 2007)

The Fifth Circuit holds that a mail fraud conviction cannot be sustained where the offense involves the violation of state election laws (i.e., campaign finance disclosure requirements and ethics rules), because of the absence of any property or money that the “victim” loses. The government’s argument that the scheme involved an effort to obtain a public salary and other employment benefits (if the defendant had been elected), was rejected by the Fifth Circuit.

United States v. Lake, 472 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 2007)

In this highly-publicized corporate fraud prosecution, the underlying basis was the defendants’ failure to reveal their use of a corporate jet in SEC filings which were designed to reveal the benefit to the defendants of their use of the jet for personal use. However, the SEC form only required the disclosure of this personal benefit under specific circumstances (threshold amount and proof of actual cost to the corporation), none of which the government proved at trial. Absent this proof, the evidence was insufficient that the forms filed by the defendants were actually false.

United States v. Brown, 459 F.3d 509 (5th Cir. 2006)

The court reversed these Enron-related convictions on various grounds, including a rejection of the government’s honest-services fraud theory (discussed below in the honest services section). In addition, one defendant was not shown to have been knowledgeable of the fraud perpetrated by the others.

United States v. Novak, 443 F.3d 150 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant engaged in an unlawful scheme, but the victim was not the party that issued checks to him. The defendant organized the payment to certain construction workers from the contractor. He victimized some of the workers by requiring them to give to him a certain kickback of their pay. The indictment alleged, however, that the defendant defrauded the contractor who mailed the payments. The contractor, however, was not defrauded: he paid what he intended to pay for the service he intended to receive. The mail fraud counts of the indictment could not be sustained. See also United States v. Starr, 816 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987).
United States v. Dobson, 419 F.3d 231 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The defendant claimed that she was an unwitting participant in her employer’s fraud scheme. The trial court’s jury instructions failed to adequately explain that the defendant had to be a knowing participant in the charged scheme to defraud in order to be found guilty. Though the instruction that the defendant had to knowingly participate in “a” scheme to defraud, this may have misled the jury into believing that she could be found guilty based on her own misrepresentations in the sales presentations, as opposed to the overall fraudulent nature of the entire company. See also United States v. Pearlstein, 576 F.2d 531 (3rd Cir. 1978).

United States v. Chandler, 388 F.3d 796 (11th Cir. 2004)

Forty-three defendants were charged with conspiring to commit mail fraud. The conspiracy involved cheating in a McDonald’s game. The leader of the alleged conspiracy worked for McDonald’s. He stole winning “stamps” from McDonald’s products and then, through a series of transfers, would “sell” the winning stamps to other members of the conspiracy. In fact, down the “food chain” some of the purchasers did not know the source of the winning pieces. The four defendants who were tried in this part of the case were not even alleged to have known that the winning pieces were embezzled. Instead, the government alleged that these people claimed to be legitimate “winners” when, in fact, they knew that they had purchased the winning pieces from someone else. The definition of “legitimate” was quite problematic, because the McDonald’s game rules did not clearly set forth who was a “legitimate” winner (the transfer of a winning piece from one person to another was not specifically prohibited). The Eleventh Circuit reversed the convictions. First, the appellate court addressed the allegation that the defendant conspired to commit mail fraud by defrauding McDonalds. The fraudulent representation was alleged to be the representation that the game piece was acquired through legitimate means. Yet, it was never clear what this meant. McDonald’s representatives acknowledged that winning pieces were traded on E-bay and that pieces could even be traded on McDonald’s own web site. Thus there was no unequivocal prohibition on trading or selling winning pieces and the act of redeeming the piece did not amount to a representation that the piece was acquired in any one particular manner. Again, there was no proof that these defendants ever knew that the pieces were initially stolen. Second, the court focused on the absence of an agreement that united the alleged conspirators. Given the fact that the ultimate purchasers of the game pieces were unaware that they were stolen, or even obtained illegally, the government failed to prove the existence of one conspiracy with members all having agreed to commit a crime. Moreover, the initial thief – the person who embezzled the pieces – kept it a secret from each of the people he recruited to sell the pieces that there were other sellers and buyers. This was a classic hub-and-spoke conspiracy without a rim. Each spoke in this scenario amounts to a separate conspiracy.

United States v. Wood, 364 F.3d 704 (6th Cir. 2004)

The government failed to prove venue with regard to several of the mail fraud counts in this case. Though the scheme to defraud was centered in the district where the charges were brought, the actual mailings involved in the challenged counts did not start, end, or move through that district.

United States v. Pendergraft, 297 F.3d 1198 (11th Cir. 2002)
The defendants threatened a County with a lawsuit, but premised the lawsuit, in part, on false allegations which were contained in an affidavit prepared by one of the defendants. The Eleventh Circuit held that threatening a lawsuit is not “wrongful” within the meaning of the Hobbs Act. Particularly in this case, where the threat involved a lawsuit against a governmental entity, First Amendment considerations also came into play (the right to petition the government for the redress of grievances). In short, the Hobbs Act does not criminalize the fabrication of evidence, or perjury if the “threat” to use the evidence or testimony relates to a civil lawsuit. The court also concluded that this conduct did not amount to mail fraud, because the false affidavits were known to the “victims” to be false, so the victims were not being deceived.

Schemes to defraud that target the revenue laws of foreign governments are covered by the federal mail and wire fraud statutes. Here, the defendants participated in a scheme to smuggle alcohol into Canada in order to deprive Canada of excise taxes. See also Fountain v. United States, 357 F.3d 250 (2d Cir. 2004) (wire fraud statute covers schemes to defraud foreign governments out of tax revenues). The United States Supreme Court affirmed: Pasquantino v. United States, 544 U.S. 349 (2005).

United States v. Gabriel, 125 F.3d 89 (2d Cir. 1997)

In order to prove fraudulent intent, the government must prove that the defendant intended to harm the victim. Here, the trial court charged the jury that the defendant need only "contemplate" harm to the victim. This is not sufficient. One can contemplate harm, without intending that it occur. The error in this case was harmless.

United States v. Beckner, 134 F.3d 714 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant, an attorney, was charged with aiding and abetting his client's fraudulent efforts to raise money for a real estate venture. The Fifth Circuit held that the evidence was insufficient to show the attorney's knowledge that his client was engaged in fraudulent activity. "For an attorney to be convicted for aiding and abetting a client's fraud, that attorney must have had actual knowledge of the fraud and must have taken an active role in advancing the wrongdoing."

United States v. Frost, 125 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 1997)

Defendants were students and professors at a graduate science program. The students were also government employees. The defendants agreed that the students would be awarded their Masters and Phd's (without properly earning these degrees), in exchange for which the students would use their influence in their government jobs to award contracts to the professors in their private venture. To the extent that the indictment charged in certain counts that this amounted to a fraud of a property right (as opposed to an "honest services" fraud), the evidence was insufficient. With regard to other counts, the government failed to prove that the defendant's deception caused the "victim" to part with any property (in those counts, the defendant simply failed to reveal to his employer, the government, that he had a relationship with the beneficiary of the contracts).

United States v. Rossonamo, 144 F.3d 197 (2d Cir. 1998)
It may be appropriate in some cases to instruct the jury that the defendant’s expectation that no harm will ultimately befall the victim is not a defense. The point of this instruction, however, assumes that the defendant did, in fact, believe that there would be at least temporary harm. Thus, if a defendant makes a false statement in a loan application, knowing that this will facilitate a loan, but honestly believes that he will ultimately re-pay the loan, this is not a valid “good faith” defense. In this case, however, the defendant did not ever intend that the victim suffer any loss. In this situation, the caveat to the good faith instruction was inappropriate.

United States v. Shotts, 145 F.3d 1289 (11th Cir. 1998)

While 18 U.S.C. § 1346 added “honest services” to the concept of fraud, this did not mean that all intangible property rights could be the subject of a mail fraud prosecution. In this case, the defendant was charged with mail fraud in connection with his scheme to obtain a bail bond license in the state of Alabama. The court held that the license was not “property” under Alabama law and therefore could not be the basis of a mail fraud prosecution.

United States v. Bloom, 149 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 1998)

The defendant, a lawyer, was also a City Alderman for Chicago. Advice that he gave to a client operated to the financial detriment of the City. The Seventh Circuit upheld the lower court’s dismissal of this aspect of the mail fraud indictment. Not every breach of a fiduciary duty works a criminal fraud. In the intangible rights context, there must be a showing that the defendant’s conduct of depriving his employer of his honest services was part of a scheme to secure some type of private gain. This decision, like so many others, needs to be re-examined in light of Skilling.

United States v. Czubinski, 106 F.3d 1069 (1st Cir. 1997)

The defendant was an IRS employee who had access to confidential information on the IRS computer. He abused this access by browsing through taxpayer’s files. This did not amount to “fraud” under the wire fraud statute and did not deprive taxpayers of their right to honest services.

United States v. Loder, 23 F.3d 586 (1st Cir. 1994)

The evidence failed to support defendant’s conviction for aiding and abetting his employer’s mail fraud conviction. The defendant helped his employer “cut up” a vehicle which was fraudulently reported to an insurance company as being stolen. There was no evidence, however, that the defendant had any knowledge of the scheme to defraud the insurance company. Even circumstantial evidence failed to establish that the defendant was aware of the purpose of cutting up the car. Cars can be cut up for numerous purposes, other than to accomplish a mail fraud scheme, such as recovering parts from a stolen car, or destroying evidence used in an armed robbery or kidnapping.

United States v. D’Amato, 39 F.3d 1249 (2d Cir. 1994)

The defendant, a lobbyist, was the brother of the Senator from New York. He agreed with a client of his to lobby the Senator. In invoices that he submitted to his client, he disguised his name and the purpose of his services. This did not amount to defrauding the client, because the client knew what services he was performing. Though the corporate board of directors may not have known the true state of affairs, the defendant was nevertheless acting on behalf of the corporation and was not victimizing the corporation in any way – although his conduct was deceptive.

United States v. Starr, 816 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987)

The owners of a bulk mailing service hid higher rate mailings in large lower rate bulk mailings. The postal service was not paid the correct amount for these higher rate mailings. However, the customers received their mailings at the correct destination and paid the appropriate amounts to the bulk mailing company. Thus, the customers were not defrauded.

United States v. Sokolow, 91 F.3d 396 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The error was harmless, but the government should not have elicited from the mail fraud victims’ stories about the consequences of the fraud. Such evidence has little probative value and is outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

United States v. Ham, 998 F.2d 1247 (4th Cir. 1993)

The evidence failed to support defendant’s mail fraud conviction. The defendant was the print shop foreman in a Hare Krishna community. The community prepared counterfeit copyrighted materials. There was no evidence that he had the intent to defraud. He simply carried out the orders to prepare certain materials.

United States v. Grossman, 117 F.3d 255 (5th Cir. 1997)

The government failed to prove that defendant’s dealings in connection with the real estate transactions set forth in the indictment were fraudulent. “No criminality can be attached to real estate purchasers or lending institutions because the bottom dropped out of the real estate markets.”

United States v. Tencer, 107 F.3d 1120 (5th Cir. 1997)

Though there was sufficient evidence to prove that the defendant was engaged in a scheme to defraud medical insurers, the government failed to link certain insurance checks with the fraudulent scheme, so certain counts of the conviction were set aside.

United States v. Ragan, 24 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 1994)

The evidence failed to link the defendant to the mail, or wire fraud scheme which were the indicted offenses in this case. Though the defendant was the manager of the brokerage house which engaged in government securities trading, the particular trading irregularities which were the subject of the indictment were never shown to have been initiated or perpetrated by the defendant.

United States v. Walters, 997 F.2d 1219 (7th Cir. 1993)

The defendant, a sports agent, induced college athletes to sign agency contracts prior to their graduation, a practice that is not permitted by the NCAA. The agent was prosecuted for mail fraud. The conviction was reversed for several reasons: (1) the only alleged mailing was a form which the colleges mailed to the Big Ten conference, certifying that the players were eligible. This mailing was not instrumental to the fraud and was probably not even known to the defendant; (2) the supposed victims of the fraud were the colleges, which awarded scholarships to the players, despite their ineligibility. Yet, the defendant did not receive any of this money, thus the defendant did not defraud the schools out of any money; (3) in essence, this fraud amounted to no more than cheating the NCAA, and was not fraud.
United States v. Spudic, 795 F.2d 1334 (7th Cir. 1986)

In this mail fraud prosecution, the jury was not instructed on a Pinkerton theory of culpability. That is, the jury was not instructed that the acts of one co-conspirator can be attributed to the defendant if he had agreed to be a member of the conspiracy. If the jury so found, the defendant could be found guilty of the substantive offenses committed by other co-conspirators. Because the jury was not instructed on a Pinkerton theory, the substantive conviction could not stand.

United States v. Goodman, 984 F.2d 235 (8th Cir. 1993)

Defendant sent mailgrams to over a million people, advising them that they had won a valuable prize and all that was required by the recipient was to call a “900” number. The “prizes” were merchandise that was sold to the purchaser at a discount, but above the cost of the items to the defendant. This did not amount to a scheme to defraud. The essence of a scheme is a plan to deceive persons as to the substantial identity of the things they are to receive in exchange. Here, the mailgrams were literally true; the cost of the “900” call is accurately stated; the coupons were worth some value. Many shrewd advertising schemes are concocted to persuade the consumer into purchasing products of questionable worth, without amounting to mail fraud. “Perhaps the naive and gullible consumer needs more protection from the wily promoter than the sophisticated customer. . . But in today’s society, criminal prosecution cannot be used to punish those who run promotional schemes to make money simply because some persons are more susceptible to try their luck than a more prudent recipient of the mail.”

United States v. Thomas, 32 F.3d 418 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant bought fruit from growers and sold it to wholesalers. He kept a percentage and remitted the balance back to the growers. At some point, he decided to start averaging the prices. He would then send a fixed amount to the growers, sometimes paying them more than he actually received, sometimes keeping more than the agreed upon commission. By an agreed upon final accounting, this averaging scheme resulted in losses to him of over $700,000. Nevertheless, the government indicted him for mail fraud. At trial, the government called as witnesses certain growers who were underpaid. The defendant was denied the right to call growers who were overpaid, in order to prove that there was no “scheme to defraud.” This was reversible error. Such testimony would have been relevant in establishing the defendant’s intent in devising the averaging system. Individuals accused of criminal behavior should be permitted to present, within reason, the strongest case they are able to marshal in their defense. See also United States v. Garvin, 565 F.2d 519 (8th Cir. 1977); United States v. Foshee, 569 F.2d 401 (5th Cir. 1978); United States v. Etheridge, 948 F.2d 1215 (11th Cir. 1991).

United States v. Cochran, 109 F.3d 660 (10th Cir. 1997)

Greed and criminal liability are not necessarily synonymous. The defendant in this case worked for an investment firm which was underwriting municipal bonds. He received a fee from a bank that he did not disclose to the municipality. Because there was no duty to disclose this fee, there was no fraud. The courts cannot create duties, and thus common law crimes if there was no deceit inherent in the defendant’s conduct.

United States v. Hanson, 41 F.3d 580 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant hired another person to raise money for her investment firm. The solicitations made by this other person were untrue. There was insufficient evidence, however, that the defendant participated in this fraud. Moreover, with regard to certain wire fraud counts, the supposed victim could recount nothing about the phone call that was the core of that wire fraud count. No rational finder of fact could have found that the phone call facilitated a scheme to defraud.

United States v. Jackson, 26 F.3d 999 (10th Cir. 1994)

Defendant had a power of attorney that authorized him to receive and cash his father’s pension checks. He did so for many years, including eight years after his father’s death. The evidence in the record failed to establish that he was aware of his father’s death during this eight-year period; therefore, the government failed to prove that the defendant was engaged in a scheme to defraud. Also, though the defendant did tell the pension fund at one point that his father was living with him – and this was obviously false, since his father had already died – this misrepresentation did not necessarily mean that he was aware that his father had died. Therefore, even this misrepresentation did not suffice to establish that the defendant was engaged in a scheme to defraud the pension fund.

United States v. Cronic, 900 F.2d 1511 (10th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was engaged in a simple check-kiting scheme. This does not constitute a violation of 18 U.S.C. §1341.

United States v. Mann, 884 F.2d 532 (10th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was convicted of wire fraud based on a radio spot involving the IRS. The government failed to prove any scheme to defraud in connection with the conduct of the defendant. The conviction could not be sustained.

United States v. Brown, 79 F.3d 1550 (11th Cir. 1996)

The defendants were owners and managers of a large real estate development company which sold lots and homes in Florida primarily to northern customers. There was no fiduciary relationship between the sellers and purchasers. The court assumed that various sales practices involved telling lies to customers, such as the investment value of, or the potential rental income which could be derived from, the homes. However, a person of ordinary prudence would not rely on such representations of a seller. This did not amount to fraud under the mail fraud statute. THIS DECISION WAS OVERRULED IN 2009, See above, United States v. Svete, 556 F.3d 1157 (11th Cir. 2009).

United States v. Copple, 24 F.3d 535 (3rd Cir. 1994)

Though there is no prohibition in a fraud case on calling the victims to testify about their losses, there is no reason to allow the government to overdo it. Testimony that the victims lost their children’s college education funds or that the losses affected their health, was unnecessary and not relevant to any issue relating to the defendant’s fraudulent intent. The evidence, even if marginally relevant, should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403. See also United States v. Holloway, 826 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2016).

United States v. Ethridge, 948 F.2d 1215 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendants were charged with mail fraud. They filed false claims to an insurance company in connection with a fire loss. At trial, they sought to introduce evidence that the claimed losses exceeded the policy limits, therefore, even excluding the falsely claimed items, they could not have received more than that to which they were entitled. While this is not a defense to the mail fraud charge, the trial court committed reversible error by excluding the evidence. The evidence tended to show that the defendants did not intentionally try to defraud the insurance company, because the inclusion in the proof of loss of items not in fact lost, would not have netted them any additional money.

United States v. Parker, 839 F.2d 1473 (11th Cir. 1988)

Defendants sold short-term investments and had been told by their employer that the investments were collateralized by zero coupon bonds. They had no reason to suspect that the investments were in fact fraudulent. The sellers’ convictions for mail fraud were reversed on sufficiency grounds.
MAIL FRAUD
(Proof of Mailing or Wiring)

It is not necessary that a mailing constitute an essential element of the scheme to defraud; it is enough if the mailings are an incident to an essential part of the scheme and that the defendant could foresee that the mails would be used. In this case, the mailings did not contribute directly to the fraud but did constitute a necessary element of the successful passage of title of the cars which were fraudulently sold by the defendant. Without the mailing of the car titles to the Motor Vehicles Bureau, title to the car could not be passed from the defendant to his victims.

_United States v. Tavares_, 844 F.3d 46 (1st Cir. 2016)

The defendants were officials in the Massachusetts State Probation Department. They were charged with a RICO, bribery/gratuites and mail fraud offenses based on their practice of hiring people for various Probation Department positions based on requests by State Legislators, who, in turn, would vote favorably on Probation legislation (including increased budgets). The First Circuit reversed the conviction on all counts: there was insufficient proof of a nexus between any act of the Probation Department officials (rigging the hiring process) and any official act of the legislature. Regarding the mail fraud counts, there was insufficient proof that any mailing was linked to any fraudulent conduct. Each mailing was a rejection letter to an applicant who was allegedly more qualified for a position than the person who was hired at the request of a legislator.

_United States v. Biyiklioglu_, 652 Fed.Appx. 274 (5th Cir. 2016)

Use of the Internet, alone, is not sufficient to prove an interstate wire transmission. There must be some proof that the communication crossed a state line.

_United States v. Eglash_, 813 F.3d 882 (9th Cir. 2016)

The defendant applied for social security disability and made fraudulent statements about his physical and mental condition. As part of the application process, the Social Security Administration wrote a letter to the defendant confirming receipt of his statements and noting that the statements were recorded in the SSA computers. This mailing did not satisfy the _Schmuck_ standard and could not be the basis for one of the mail fraud counts. (Other communications were sufficient to support other counts of conviction).

_United States v. Tanke_, 743 F.3d 1296 (9th Cir. 2014)

A post-fraud “lulling” letter or “cover-up” letter can be considered a mailing in connection with the mail fraud scheme only if the lulling or cover-up letter was conceived before the fraud was completed. Otherwise, the mailing is not part of the scheme to defraud. The evidence was sufficient to support the conviction in this case.

_United States v. Phillips_, 704 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant defrauded a company and then used the proceeds to purchase a watch. The watch was mailed to the defendant. This mailing was not connected to the fraud; it simply represented his expenditure of the fraud proceeds. Pursuant to United States v. Maze, 414 U.S. 395 (1974), this did not support a mail fraud conviction.

United States v. Dooley, 578 F.3d 582 (7th Cir. 2009)
The defendant, a police officer, stole money from the evidence room that was evidence in an armed robbery case. A supervisor sent him an email, instructing him to retrieve the evidence in preparation for the FBI which was going to assume responsibility for the case. Though this “wire” alerted the defendant to the need to cover-up his crime, it was not a sufficient wire to support a wire fraud prosecution. The defendant did not “cause” the wire to be sent.

United States v. Lazarenko, 564 F.3d 1026 (9th Cir. 2009)
Wires that occurred four years after the money was obtained by fraud were not in furtherance of the fraud. The fact that the wires were intended to hide the existence of the fraud is not sufficient.

United States v. Redcorn, 528 F.3d 727 (10th Cir. 2008)
In a wire fraud case, wiring money that has been embezzled is a sufficient wiring to support a conviction. In this case, however, after the defendant wired money into their accounts, they later wired the money out of the accounts into different accounts, such as investment accounts. These wirings were not designed to further conceal the money or the embezzlement. Therefore, these subsequent wirings were not in furtherance of the scheme to embezzle the money, or part of the scheme to defraud, as opposed to post-fraud/embezzlement transfers of the money. Those transfers could not form the basis for separate wire fraud convictions. See Parr v. United States, 363 U.S. 370 (1960); Kann v. United States, 323 U.S. 88 (1944); United States v. Maze, 414 U.S. 395 (1974).

United States v. Ingles, 445 F.3d 830 (5th Cir. 2006)
The defendant was charged with burning a “camp” that belonged to another member of his family. The mailings on which the government relied to make out its mail fraud prosecution were sent to the other member of his family from the insurer and the other member of the family was not involved in the arson. Moreover, regardless of whether the fire was caused by arson, the insurer was required to pay the family member. Therefore, those mailings were not “part of the scheme” and could not form the basis for a mail fraud prosecution. The government argued that the family member was planning on turning the insurance proceeds over to the arsonist, thus the mailings were part of the arsonist’s scheme, but this fact did not alter the Fifth Circuit’s reasoning.

United States v. Strong, 371 F.3d 225 (5th Cir. 2004)
The mailings in this case were insufficiently linked to the scheme to defraud. The defendant was involved in a fraudulent scheme by which he obtained cars at an auction and promptly applied for a new title using various forged documents. A certified copy of an original title was given to the defendant at the office where he filed the application. The applications were then sent to a state agency for processing. The fraud was complete, however, when he obtained his certified copy. The mailings to the state office, therefore, were tangential mailings that occurred after the fraud scheme was completed.
United States v. Frost, 125 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 1997)

In this complex mail fraud case, with respect to one series of counts, the government failed to prove that the mailings were related to the fraud. 125 F.3d at 358-359.

United States v. Lefkowitz, 125 F.3d 608 (8th Cir. 1997)

The government failed to prove that the phone call that was the subject of one of the wire fraud counts involved an interstate call. Though circumstantial evidence can supply the proof that a call was interstate, there was no evidence in this case that the call was not intrastate.

United States v. Evans, 148 F.3d 477 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was a parole officer. She received bribes from one of her parolees in exchange for which she protected him from dirty urine results. She also accepted drugs and started having sexual relations with him. The defendant visited the parolee in his home periodically (as part of her job) and submitted travel vouchers for reimbursement from the state. She submitted false travel vouchers, as well, and these, too, were mailed by her office to the state capital for reimbursement. The Fifth Circuit reversed the mail fraud convictions: the government’s evidence did not establish that Evans’s travel vouchers were mailed in furtherance of her scheme to defraud the state. See Kann v. United States, 323 U.S. 88 (1944); Parr v. United States, 363 U.S. 370 (1960); United States v. Maze, 414 U.S. 395 (1974); United States v. Vontsteen, 872 F.2d 626 (5th Cir. 1989). The vouchers and the defendant’s reimbursement were not part of the scheme to defraud the state. The scheme focused on the defendant’s receipt of bribes in exchange for depriving the state of her honest services. Though the defendant was required to travel to the parolee’s house (and the vouchers verified that this occurred – falsely), the voucher was submitted to her supervisor, who later mailed it to the state capital. Once the supervisor reviewed the voucher, the scheme to defraud was complete and the subsequent mailing to the state was irrelevant to the scheme.

United States v. Pietri-Giraldi, 864 F.2d 222 (1st Cir. 1988)

The evidence did not support the defendant’s wire fraud conviction because the telexes which formed the basis of the indictment were not in furtherance of the financial institution fraud. The wires were used in communications between financial institutions. These telexes led to the discovery that the defendant was engaged in a fraudulent scheme, and were not a part of the scheme envisioned by the defendant.

United States v. LaBarbara, 129 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 1997)

The government failed to prove that checks were mailed in this mail fraud prosecution. There was evidence that other checks were hand-delivered. There was no direct evidence that the checks involved in this case were mailed.

United States v. Altman, 48 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 1995)

The government failed to prove that the mail fraud counts in this indictment involved mailings which were sufficiently related to the fraud to sustain the conviction. In this scheme to defraud, the mailings were not necessary to avoid jeopardizing a relationship of trust and good will; were not part of the business of processing a claim or transaction; and in general were not sufficiently related to the defendant’s scheme to be said to be in furtherance of it. See also Kann Employees of the court system in Allegheny County, Pennsylvania participated in a scheme to deprive litigants of impartial justice. The only mailing involved in the mail fraud counts was the court notice that was sent to the litigant after the case was resolved. Because the deprivation of the honest services of government employees occurred prior to the time these notices were mailed out, these mailings could not serve as the foundation for the mail fraud convictions.

The government failed to offer sufficient evidence of a mailing to support this mail fraud conviction. Though there was testimony from an insurance company employee about the normal procedures of the company (checks were stuffed in envelopes and then sent to the mail room), and a computer printout was in evidence which suggested that the check was handled in this manner, there was no evidence about what happened in the usual circumstance with regard to envelopes once they ended up in the mail room. Only by speculation could the jury assume that the US mail was used by the “mail room” as opposed to messenger, or private carrier.

The Court of Appeals reverses this mail fraud conviction on the basis that the government failed to establish that the mails were actually used to further the scheme. Simply relying on evidence that it was standard business practice to use the mail was not sufficient to establish that the mail was in fact used to further the scheme in this case. It is questionable whether this case is still good law. See United States v. Hannigan, 27 F.3d 890 (3rd Cir. 1994).

The defendant, a parole officer, accepted bribes from one of her charges in exchange for not supervising him. The defendant submitted travel vouchers to her officer, falsely claiming that she had made trips in the field to supervise the parolee. The office later mailed these vouchers to the state office. These mailings were not sufficiently connected to the crime to satisfy the mailing element of a mail fraud offense. The crime was completed once the defendant submitted the vouchers to her office. No part of the crime depended on the subsequent mailing of the vouchers to the state office.

A mail fraud conviction cannot be based on the fact that a victim mails a related document after the fraud has been committed. Although mailing of invoices of a defrauded seller may in some cases provide a basis for a mail fraud conviction, the mailings must somehow advance, or be an integral part of, the fraud. Mere “post-fraud accounting” by the victims of the fraud is not a sufficient mailing to allow for a mail fraud conviction.

The defendant was convicted of mail fraud. The only evidence that there was a mailing was evidence of the usual office procedure regarding the transmittal of mail. The Fifth Circuit reverses holding that this was insufficient evidence of the existence of a mailing.
United States v. Castile, 795 F.2d 1273 (6th Cir. 1986)

A fire insurer served various documents to an insured who in this mail fraud prosecution was accused of burning down his restaurant and using the mails in connection therewith. The mailings by the insurance company did not further the mail fraud scheme. On the contrary, these mailings were designed to frustrate the scheme. In the absence of any evidence that the mails were used to further the scheme to defraud, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Walters, 997 F.2d 67 (7th Cir. 1993)

The defendant, a sports agent, induced college athletes to sign agency contracts prior to their graduation, a practice which is not permitted by the NCAA. The agent was prosecuted for mail fraud. The conviction was reversed for several reasons: (1) the only alleged mailing was a form which the colleges mailed to the Big Ten conference, certifying that the players were eligible. This mailing was not instrumental to the fraud and was probably not even known to the defendant; (2) the supposed victims of the fraud were the colleges, which awarded scholarships to the players, despite their ineligibility. Yet, the defendant did not receive any of this money, thus the defendant did not defraud the schools out of any money; (3) in essence, this fraud amounted to no more than cheating the NCAA, and was not fraud.

United States v. Swinson, 993 F.2d 1299 (7th Cir. 1993)

The circumstantial evidence that a mailing had occurred in this case was not sufficient to support a mail fraud conviction. The government relied on “normal” business practice, but also established that this particular transaction was not handled in a normal fashion; thus, the fact that normal business practice would have involved a mailing was not sufficient proof that a mailing occurred in this case.

United States v. Kwiat, 817 F.2d 440 (7th Cir. 1987)

The defendants were bank officers who made collateralized loans on real estate. The conduct of the officers clearly deprived the bank’s shareholders and depositors of the defendants’ honest services as directors. However, the only mailings involved in this scheme were the mailing of the mortgage instrument by the recorder of deeds. These mailings did not make the fraud possible or facilitate it in any way. Thus, there was an absence of proof that the mailings were made for the purpose of executing the fraudulent scheme. The convictions of the bank employees were reversed.

United States v. Leyden, 842 F.2d 1026 (8th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was convicted of mail fraud with the predicate mailing being a responsive pleading filed by an insurance company in the plaintiff’s fraudulent lawsuit. The Court holds that the mailing by the insurance company cannot be the predicate mailing for the basis of a mail fraud conviction. The insurance company’s pleading denied coverage in this case and thus in no way could it have furthered the defendant’s fraudulent scheme to collect insurance.

United States v. Hanson, 41 F.3d 580 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant hired another person to raise money for her investment firm. The solicitations made by this other person were untrue. There was insufficient evidence, however, that the defendant participated in this fraud. Moreover, with regard to certain wire fraud counts, the supposed victim could recount nothing about the phone call which was the core of that wire fraud count. No rational finder of fact could have found that the phone call facilitated a scheme to defraud.
United States v. Smith, 934 F.2d 270 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant participated in a scheme to defraud an insurance company by filing a false claim. There was insufficient evidence to show that he reasonably should have known that the mails would be used in connection with his scheme. The only actual mailing involved occurred after he received a draft settlement from his local agent, a copy of the draft was mailed by the agent to the regional headquarters for approval to pay the draft. This is not a sufficient mailing to bring this offense within the scope of 18 U.S.C. §1341. Because the indictment alleged that the mailing consisted solely of the mailing of the accounting copy of the draft from the agent to the headquarters of the insurer, and because the mailing was not reasonably foreseeable to the defendant, his convictions on the substantive mail fraud counts were reversed.
MAIL FRAUD
(Intangible Rights -- Honest Services)

SEE ALSO: BRIBERY AND GRATUITIES

Reviewing the conviction of the CEO of Enron, the Supreme Court concludes that the honest services fraud component of the mail fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1346, is constitutional, but only if it is limited to situations in which the defendant accepts a bribe or a kickback in connection with his work either in the private context (i.e., without the consent of his employer) or as a public official. Under this construction of the statute, Skilling’s conviction for honest services fraud was reversed. See also Black v. United States, 130 S. Ct. 2963 (2010) and United States v. Weyhrauch, 130 S.Ct. 2971 (2010).

United States v. Silver, 864 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2017)

Sheldon Silver’s conviction for honest services fraud and Hobbs Act violations were reversed based on an error in the jury instructions, which failed the McDonnell requirements for an “official act.” The trial court incorrectly explained that an “official act” was any action taken or to be taken under color of official authority.

United States v. Boyland, 862 F.3d 279 (2d Cir. 2017)

The district court’s instruction to the jury on the law of honest services fraud for a public official did not satisfy the standard of McDonnell, because it included within the definition of “official act,” “contacting or lobbying other government agencies.” But the error in the instruction in this case did not satisfy the plain error standard.

United States v. Aunspaugh, 792 F.3d 1302 (11th Cir. 2015)

The Eleventh Circuit held that post-Skilling, the government must prove more than simple self-dealing. There must be a kickback or bribe and not simply a conflict of interest, in order to sustain an honest services fraud conviction. The Aunspaugh court noted that the Eleventh Circuit had yet to decide whether an actual quid pro quo is required; perhaps an unlawful reward is sufficient. What is required in order for the conduct to amount to an unlawful kickback is proof that the payment to the defendant was for the purpose of inducing the employee to steer business in the direction of the payor, or rewarding the employee for doing so. Simply paying the employee for rendering a service (even if the payment or the service is not disclosed to the employer) is not an unlawful kickback under § 1346. The court’s instructional error in this case required that the conviction be reversed, because it included “self-dealing” within the definition of a kickback.

United States v. Hawkins, 777 F.3d 880 (7th Cir. 2015)

Though 18 U.S.C. § 666 covers both bribes and gratuities, in order to violate § 1346, the payment must amount to a bribe, not a gratuity. There must be a quid pro quo, not a mere “reward” in order to violate the honest services fraud provision.
United States v. Sadler, 750 F.3d 585 (6th Cir. 2014)

The operator of a pill mill lied to a pharmaceutical supplier about who was to receive the drugs. Nevertheless, the operator paid full price. This does not constitute wire fraud and will not support a conviction under 18 U.S.C. § 1343 or § 1346. The seller’s right to “accurate information” is not an intangible right that is cognizable under the honest services fraud provision.

United States v. Avery, 719 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2013)

The factual basis of defendant’s plea demonstrated that the defendant’s plea was based on a theory of honest services fraud that did not survive Skilling. The factual basis established that the defendant violated his fiduciary duty to a trust by spending money on speculative investments that benefitted him.

United States v. Garrido, 713 F.3d 985 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendants’ honest services mail fraud convictions, predicated on a “failure to disclose a conflict of interest” theory, were reversed.

United States v. Ring, 706 F.3d 460 (D. C. Cir. 2013)

The D.C. Circuit provides a thorough post-Skilling review of the honest services mail fraud theory and the law of gratuities in the context of a lobbyist providing gifts to federal officials.

United States v. Jiminez, 705 F.3d 1305 (11th Cir. 2013)

18 U.S.C. § 666 is often applied to employees of an entity that receives federal funds and who accepts money (either a bribe or a gratuity) to benefit the payor. The statute also applies, however, to agents of an entity that receives federal funds who misapplies money of the entity. In this case, the defendant encouraged his employer to purchase books that, unbeknownst to his employer, were actually written by the defendant’s wife. The defendant failed to reveal his conflict of interest. The Eleventh Circuit held that this was neither an honest service fraud offense, or a § 666 violation. Skilling foreclosed the theory that a conflict of interest could be the basis for an honest services fraud prosecution. The § 666 offense was invalid, because the defendant was not the person responsible for spending the funds of the agency.

United States v. Milovanovic, 678 F.3d 713 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc)

In this post-Skilling en banc decision, the Ninth Circuit reinstates an indictment against a company that contracted with the State to provide driving tests to commercial drivers, but which accepted bribes. The court held that a fiduciary duty is required, but not necessarily a formal fiduciary duty (a trust relationship is sufficient). The court also held that foreseeable economic harm is not a necessary ingredient of honest services mail fraud – at least not in a public honest services fraud case – though materiality is an essential element.

United States v. Hornsby, 666 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. 2012)

Honest services fraud counts were invalid in light of Skilling.

United States v. Wright, 665 F.3d 560 (3rd Cir. 2012)
The jury was instructed on different theories under which the defendant could be convicted of honest services mail fraud, including bribery and conflict of interest. The latter, post-Skilling was invalid. Not only were the honest services mail fraud counts reversed, but the traditional mail fraud counts were also reversed because of the prejudicial spillover effect caused by the admission of evidence relating to the honest services counts that would not have been admitted in a traditional mail fraud trial.

United States v. Siegelman, 640 F.3d 1159 (11th Cir. 2011)

Certain counts of the Siegelman / Scrushy prosecution did not survive Skilling and were reversed on remand from the U.S. Supreme Court.

United States v. Riley, 621 F.3d 312 (3rd Cir. 2010)

The defendants’ honest services fraud convictions were not based on either a kickback, or bribe theory and for that reason, under plain error review, the convictions could not be sustained post-Skilling. One defendant was the mayor of Newark and the other co-defendant was apparently his intimidate friend. City business was sent her way and the honest services fraud prosecution was based on this misconduct which did not amount to either a kickback or a bribe.

United States v. Kincaid-Chauncey, 556 F.3d 923 (9th Cir. 2009)

The Ninth Circuit affirms the defendant’s Hobbs Act and Honest Services Mail Fraud convictions, concluding that the court properly explained to the jury that the government was required to prove that there was a quid pro quo arrangement between the unlawful payment and an official act, even though the words “quid pro quo” were not used. The court noted that the quid quo pro requirement must be proven in the Hobbs Act context whether the payment is made in the context of a campaign contribution, or not. In the context of an Honest Services Mail Fraud prosecution of a public official, a specific quid pro quo is not required if the theory is an undisclosed conflict of interest, but a quid quo pro, at least an implicit quid pro quo, is required in an honest service “bribe” case. Though not necessarily requiring a definite and identifiable quid pro quo as required by McCormick and its progeny, the minimum proof that is required is similar to what is required in a gratuity case (18 U.S.C. § 201(c)), as explained in United States v. Sun-Diamond Growers of Cal., 526 U.S. 398 (1999) (mere payments to public official that are designed to build a reservoir of goodwill are not sufficient to prove a gratuity violation). Portions of this case did not survive the decision in Skilling and Weyhrauch.

United States v. Sorich, 523 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 2008)

The Seventh Circuit re-affirms that “private gain” is a prerequisite for an honest services fraud prosecution. However, accommodating the various decisions from other Circuits that questioned the Seventh Circuit’s position, the court notes that “private gain” does not necessarily have to inure to the benefit of the defendant. This case contains a useful Circuit-by-Circuit review of the caselaw in the area of honest services fraud.

United States v. Howard, 517 F.3d 731 (5th Cir. 2008)

The trial court properly vacated one count of the defendant’s conviction, because the jury may have relied on an improper theory of guilt; that is, a theory that the Fifth Circuit rejected in United States v. Brown, 459 F.3d 509 (5th Cir. 2006) relating to honest services fraud of an employee.

United States v. Urciuoli, 513 F.3d 290 (1st Cir. 2008)

In this honest services fraud prosecution, the defendants were two hospital administrators who hired a legislator to provide “consulting” services. The evidence relating to what the legislator did in connection with the hospitals was to urge local municipalities to comply with the law regarding where ambulances should take patients; and urging health insurance companies to settle disputed claims with the hospitals. Because urging the municipalities to comply with the law was not improper and did not involve work on pending legislation, this could not be the basis of an honest services fraud prosecution. Pressuring insurance companies was an activity that could be prosecuted as honest services fraud. However, because the jury’s verdict could have relied on the improper theory, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Thompson, 484 F.3d 877 (7th Cir. 2007)

An honest services fraud prosecution may not be predicated on proof that the defendant made decisions about awarding contracts for state work based on the contractor’s political affiliation or alliance with the political party in power. The court reversed not only the § 1346 honest services conviction, but also the § 666 bribery/gratuity/misapplication conviction. The defendant did not “misapply” the money by making a procurement decision based in part on political considerations, even if her decision was not completely in accordance with state procurement rules. With regard to the honest services conviction, even though the defendant received a raise, based in part on her work on this contract, this did not convert her state regulatory violation into a federal mail fraud offense.

United States v. Turner, 465 F.3d 667 (6th Cir. 2006)

A candidate for public office does not violate § 1346 (honest services mail fraud) by buying votes and engaging in illicit campaign contribution schemes. The Sixth Circuit held that this conduct does not violate the honest services provision because a candidate (unlike an office-holder) does not have a fiduciary duty to the public. Additionally, a candidate does not provide a “service” to the public.

United States v. Brown, 459 F.3d 509 (5th Cir. 2006)

The Fifth Circuit reversed the honest services fraud conviction of certain Enron employees. The employees engaged in a scheme to overstate corporate earnings and received a bonus for their efforts. The conduct benefited Enron and the employees. The Fifth Circuit held that although the conduct was illegal, it did not violate the defendants’ honest services obligation to their employer in a manner that is covered by § 1346. Unlike most private honest services fraud cases, this case did not involve any self-dealing, or the receipt of kickbacks from a customer. The court wrote, “Where an employee intentionally aligns the interests of the employee with a specified corporate goal, where the employee perceives his pursuit of that goal as mutually benefiting him and his employer, and where the employee’s conduct is consistent with that perception of the mutual interest, such conduct is beyond the reach of the honest-services theory of fraud as it has hitherto been applied.” 459 F.3d at 522.
United States v. Murphy, 323 F.3d 102 (3rd Cir. 2003)

The defendant was a political party official, but was not a public official. He took bribes and steered business in the direction of the bribe-payer. However, he owed no duty of honest service to the public and could not be prosecuted, therefore, under § 1346.

United States v. Handakas, 286 F.3d 92 (2d Cir. 2002)

18 U.S.C. § 1346 is unconstitutionally void for vagueness as applied in this case in which the defendant was charged with mail fraud in connection with his breach of a nonfiduciary obligation under a contract with a state governmental entity. The defendant submitted false reports regarding the wages he was paying workers on state construction sites. The state was not deprived of property or money, so the government pursued the defendant on an intangible rights / honest services theory under § 1346. The Second Circuit held that applying the statutes to this conduct violated due process, because the statute does not sufficiently identify the prohibited conduct. The court reasoned that under the state’s theory, filing a false state tax return would amount to federal mail fraud. Even the breach of a contract “in the vicinity of a telephone” would suddenly amount to a federal felony. In a subsequent decision, the Handakas decision was overruled. United States v. Rybicki, 354 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 2003) (en banc). The Rybicki en banc decision held the conduct of the defendant in Handakas did not amount to a violation of § 1346, because he was not an employee of a private entity purporting to act for and in the interest of his employer and he was not rendering services in which the relationship between him and the person to whom the service was rendered gave rise to a duty of loyalty comparable to that owed by employees to employers. Thus, the defendant in Handakas, according to the Rybicki court was not guilty of a § 1346 offense and the court should never have reached the constitutional issue. This decision, of course, pre-dates Skilling.

United States v. Rybicki, 287 F.3d 257 (2d Cir. 2002)

The defendants – personal injury lawyers – paid insurance adjustors to settle their claims quickly. However, the settlement amounts were reasonable. The Second Circuit considered whether this qualified as honest services fraud. Every breach of fiduciary duty does not rise to the level of § 1346 mail fraud. In addition, there must be proof that there is some kind of foreseeable economic harm that results from the conduct. Additionally, the harm must be more than de minimis. In this case, the original panel opinion concluded that the evidence was sufficient, because the quick settlement deprived the insurance company of the money that would have remained in the insurance company due to typical delays in settling a case. Also, the adjustors presumably offered more money to succeed in quickly settling the case. Finally, the jury could have concluded that the plaintiffs would have accepted a lower settlement that did not include the kickback to the adjustor. The en banc court affirmed. 354 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 2003) (en banc). The en banc decision contains an extensive review of the history of the intangible rights / honest services theory of mail fraud and sets forth certain limitations of that section. Finally, the en banc opinion reversed the panel opinion’s conclusion that there must be proof of a foreseeable economic harm. Instead, the en banc opinion held that there must be proof that the misrepresentation (or omission) has the natural tendency to influence or is capable of influencing the employer to change his behavior. This decision pre-dates Skilling.

United States v. Bloom, 149 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 1998)
The defendant, a lawyer, was also a City Alderman for Chicago. Advice that he gave to a client operated to the financial detriment of the City. The Seventh Circuit upheld the lower court’s dismissal of this aspect of the mail fraud indictment. Not every breach of a fiduciary duty works a criminal fraud. In the intangible rights context, there must be a showing that the defendant’s conduct of depriving his employer of his honest services was part of a scheme to secure some type of private gain. This decision, like so many others, needs to be re-examined in light of Skillling.
MAILING THREATENING COMMUNICATIONS

SEE: THREATENING COMMUNICATIONS

In order to be guilty of making an unlawful interstate threat, it is not enough that the defendant’s rants (on Facebook) would be perceived by others as threatening. The government must prove that the defendant intended the statements as threats. There must be subjective intent to threaten the listener, which is not satisfied simply with proof that a reasonable listener would feel threatened.

United States v. Martinez, 800 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2015)

Conviction reversed based on a jury instruction that was erroneous in light of Elonis.

United States v. Havelock, 664 F.3d 1284 (9th Cir. 2012)

The statute that makes it a federal crime to mail a threatening communication to another person – 18 U.S.C. § 876(c) – requires that the mailing be to a person, not to an institution, or a company.
MATERIALITY

United States v. Wells, 519 U.S. 482 (1997)
Materiality is not an element of a bank fraud offense under 18 U.S.C. §1014.

The question of the materiality of a false statement is a jury question. The Constitution gives a criminal defendant the right to have a jury determine, beyond a reasonable doubt, his guilt of every element of the crime with which he is charged. This includes the “materiality” element of a §1001 offense.

United States v. Weimert, --- F.3d --- (7th Cir. 4/8/16)
The mail and wire fraud statutes may not be stretched to criminalize deception about a party’s negotiating positions, such as a party’s bottom-line reserve price or how important a particular non-price term is. Buyers and sellers negotiate prices and other terms. They will often try to mislead the other party about the prices and terms they are willing to accept. Such deceptions are not criminal and neither party to the negotiation expects complete candor about the counter-party’s “bottom line.” “In the Restatement (Second) of Torts treatment of fraud … statements about a party's opinions, preferences, priorities, and bottom lines are generally not considered statements of fact material to the transaction. See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 538A cmts. b, g (distinguishing between representations of facts—where the maker has definite knowledge—and opinions—including a “maker's judgment as to quality, value, authenticity or similar matters as to which opinions may be expected to differ”).” In this case, Weimert, an employee of the bank, told that buyer of the bank’s asset, that the bank insisted that he be a partner of the buying entity; he told the bank that the buying entity insisted that he be its partner. Neither statement was true, but neither of these statements was a material misrepresentation about the actual terms of the deal. The Seventh Circuit reversed the conviction in this case because the alleged deceptive statements were not criminally fraudulent.

United States v. Litvak, 808 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2015)
Litvak was a securities broker who worked for Jefferies & Company and was involved in selling residential mortgage backed securities (“RMBS”). He was charged with fraud in connection with his sales of RMBS’s. There were three categories of misrepresentations: (1) He lied about the cost at which Jefferies acquired certain RMBS in his effort to convince a purchaser to pay more for the same RMBS’s; (2) He lied when he said that he was negotiating for the purchase of certain RMBS’s at a certain price in his efforts to re-sell the RMBS’s, when, in fact, Jefferies already owned the RMBS’s at a lower price than the price he was about to pay to purchase the RMBS’s; (3) In the process of purchasing RMBS’s, he lied about the price at which he had negotiated to re-sell the RMBS’s (falsely saying that the price was less than it actually was) and thereby induced the seller to sell the RMBS’s to him at a cheaper price to enable Jefferies to make a profit. On the basis of these representations, Litvak was convicted of securities fraud and also making a false statement to the U.S. Treasury which was overseeing certain RMBS sales in connection with TARP. The Second Circuit reversed the false statement count, based on the failure to prove that Litvak’s false statements were material. Though the U.S. Treasury was aware and monitored these types of sales, the Treasury made no “decision” that was affected by the price of the sales. The Second Circuit held, however, that the materiality of the false statements to counter-parties was a jury question that could not be decided as a matter of law for purposes of the securities fraud convictions under Rule 10b-5. Litvak argued that the “price” of the RBMS’s to Jefferies was not what was important to the counter-parties; what mattered was the value. The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that the jury was the proper fact-finder on the question of materiality. However, the securities fraud convictions were reversed, because the district court improperly excluded expert testimony offered by Litvak on the topic of materiality. The expert was prepared to testify that a reasonable counter-party would not rely on representations made by Litvak and that they would normally make their own determination of value, rather than relying on Litvak’s representation about Jefferies’ price in purchasing (or the intended sales price of) the RMBS’s. This was the proper subject of expert testimony. Finally, the Second Circuit held that the trial court erred in excluding evidence offered by Litvak that his supervisors permitted these types of sales practices by other brokers, which, according to Litvak, demonstrated his good faith and his lack of intent to defraud. The evidence was relevant to show that Litvak held an honest belief that he was not engaged in improper or illegal conduct.

United States v. Camick, 796 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2015)

The defendant’s real name is Leslie Lyle Camick. But over ten years ago, he took the name of his deceased brother, Wayne Camick and had used that name ever since. He was charged with mail fraud, wire fraud and identity theft when he wrote a letter to a court and claimed an interest in certain property that was the subject of a Quiet Title action by another person. He used the name Wayne Camick in this correspondence. He also claimed that he had been wrongfully detained in jail and that was the reason his response to the court was late. He had been arrested and released recently, but, according to the government, his detention was not “wrongful.” The Tenth Circuit held that claiming that he was “wrongfully detained” was not a material misstatement, nor was using the name Wayne Camick a material misstatement. In an entirely separate holding, the court held that using the name Wayne Camick on a provisional patent application was also not a materially false statement. Because his mail and wire fraud convictions were reversed on sufficiency grounds, the court also reversed the aggravated identity theft convictions which were predicated on those fraud convictions.

United States v. Tuyet Thi-Bach Nguyen, 565 F.3d 668 (9th Cir. 2009)

Materiality is an element of the offense of misbranding of medical devices. 21 U.S.C. § 331. Failing to instruct the jury on this element of the offense, however, was not plain error.

United States v. Alferahin, 433 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with a violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1425(a), knowingly procuring naturalization contrary to law. The trial court did not instruct the jury on the concept of materiality in connection with the false statement that the defendant allegedly made on his naturalization application. The trial defense attorney acquiesced to the failure to instruct the jury on the concept of materiality. The Ninth Circuit held that materiality is an element of the offense, the failure to instruct the jury on this essential element was plain error and the attorney was ineffective in failing to object.
Materiality is an essential element of an offense under 29 U.S.C. § 439(b) (False reports in Department of Labor filings). The trial court erred in failing to submit the question of materiality to the jury. Harmless error.

The defendant was a law enforcement agent with HUD. His car was towed and despite his efforts to bully the towing company to release his car, the company refused to release the car without being paid. He eventually enlisted the aid of a colleague to drive the car off the lot, running through a fence. When he realized that there would be trouble, he had the friend take some petty cash from the HUD office and reimburse the towing company. On the government expenditure form and receipt, the defendant crossed out the phrase “damage to fence” and added the word “storage.” The Tenth Circuit concludes that changing the term “damage to fence” to “storage” was not a material false statement.

The element of materiality in a perjury or false declaration prosecution must be submitted to the jury.

The trial court erred in concluding that materiality was established as a matter of law in this false tax return prosecution. Though the false reporting of gross receipts on a tax return is presumably always material, it is still one of the essential elements of the offense and must be submitted to the jury.

The government failed to prove that the defendant’s false statement on a form filed with a bank was material.

The defendant was the mother of a young man who was charged with murder. The defendant testified at a suppression hearing for her son and explained that she went to the police station when her son was arrested; and also testified about a conversation she had with investigators several days later at her house. The government claimed she lied about these matters and prosecuted her for perjury and obstruction of justice. The Fourth Circuit reversed both convictions on the grounds that her statements, even if false, were not material to the suppression hearing at which she testified. With regard to the obstruction count, there was no showing that the defendant intended to obstruct the proceedings involving her son.

A defendant’s statements to a grand jury which was investigating a fire at a funeral home were not material to the investigation and thus could not support a prosecution for having made a false statement to the grand jury. At the grand jury, the defendant testified that he had smelled a strong odor at the funeral home on the morning of the fire. To investigators he denied having smelled any such odor.
United States v. Pettigrew, 77 F.3d 1500 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendants’ conviction for making false entries in the records of a lending institution was reversed because of a Gaudin error. Because one of the objects of the conspiracy count was also a false entry offense, the conspiracy offense was also required to be set aside.

United States v. Beuttenmuller, 29 F.3d 973 (5th Cir. 1994)

With regard to the false entry on the bank record count of this indictment, the government contended that the documentation of a transaction on the bank’s books erroneously described a payment to one of the conspirators as a commission, as opposed to a payment for his equity in the purchased property. The government failed to prove that this mischaracterization of the payment was a material misrepresentation. No witness testified about why this would be material to any agency of the government reviewing the transaction.

United States v. Lueben, 816 F.2d 1032 (5th Cir. 1987)

In this mail fraud prosecution, the defendant offered expert testimony on the materiality of the statements, that is, whether the false statements would have had any bearing on the lender’s decision to make the requested bank loans. The Court holds that expert testimony is admissible and does not constitute impermissible expert testimony about a legal conclusion.

Waldemer v. United States, 106 F.3d 729 (7th Cir. 1996)

The Gaudin error was cognizable in a federal habeas attack on the defendant’s perjury conviction, even absent an objection at the time of trial, or on direct appeal.

United States v. Ross, 77 F.3d 1525 (7th Cir. 1996)

The court held that materiality is an issue in a §1001 prosecution and the trial court erred in removing the issue of materiality from the jury’s consideration. However, though this amounted to plain error, the appellate court exercised its discretion not to reverse the conviction, because the district court’s error did not seriously affect the fairness, integrity and public reputation of judicial proceedings.

United States v. Kwiat, 817 F.2d 440 (7th Cir. 1987)

An attorney misstated a broker’s commission in applications made to HUD for agency funds. The Seventh Circuit holds that this is not a material misstatement because it was the FDIC, not HUD that was defrauded. The essential fact revealed by the forms for FDIC purposes was that a member of the bank’s board of directors was engaged in self-dealing. The exact amount of the commission received by the broker was unimportant in this respect.

United States v. Allen, 892 F.2d 66 (10th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was prosecuted for perjury in connection with his application for the appointment of an attorney in a pending criminal case. The defendant used an alias on the application. The use of the alias, however, was not a material misstatement and therefore a perjury prosecution could not be sustained.

United States v. De Castro, 113 F.3d 176 (11th Cir. 1997)

Relying on the decision in United States v. Wells, 519 U.S. 482 (1997), the Eleventh Circuit concluded that materiality is not an element of a §1010 offense, making false statements to HUD.

The defendant’s false statement at another’s bench trial was not material and his conviction under 18 U.S.C. §1623 on this count was reversed.
MERGER OF OFFENSES

SEE ALSO: DOUBLE JEOPARDY

United States v. Benjamín, 711 F.3d 371 (3rd Cir. 2013)
The defendant was twice found in possession of a firearm. He was a convicted felon. He was charged (and convicted) of two counts of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The Third Circuit, joining the decisions of various other Circuits, held that possession of a firearm is a continuing offense and cannot be prosecuted in several counts, unless there is proof that the possession was not continuous, including constructively.

United States v. Chiaradio, 684 F.3d 265 (1st Cir. 2012)
The possession of several items of child pornography on different computers in one location can only support one count of “possession one or more items of child pornography.” 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(4)(B). A different result might apply to charges brought under 18 U.S.C. § 2252A, which makes it a crime to possess “any” items of child pornography.

United States v. Hector, 577 F.3d 1099 (9th Cir. 2009)
When two counts of an indictment merge (or where one conviction must be vacated to ensure no violation of the double jeopardy clause), the court, not the prosecutor, must decide which count survives.

United States v. Tann, 577 F.3d 533 (3rd Cir. 2009)
Convictions for both possession of a firearm and possession of ammunition for that firearm violate the double jeopardy clause. See Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81 (1955) (transporting two women across state lines in violation of Mann Act is only one offense).

United States v. Davenport, 519 F.3d 940 (9th Cir. 2008)
A defendant may not be found guilty of both receiving and possessing child pornography. See also United States v. Miller, 527 F.3d 54 (3rd Cir. 2008) (same); United States v. Schales, 546 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2008); United States v. Johnston, 789 F.3d 934 (9th Cir. 2015).

United States v. Fenton, 367 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 2004)
The offense of distribution of a controlled substance is a lesser included offense of distribution of a controlled substance within 1,000 feet of a school.

United States v. Stephens, 118 F.3d 479 (6th Cir. 1997)
The defendant possessed two separate quantities of cocaine on the same date, but at different locations. Even though the drugs were acquired at different times, this amounted to only one offense of possession with intent to distribute. Thus, the defendant could not receive a sentencing guideline gun enhancement pursuant to his possession of one cache of drugs (and a gun), and a § 924(c) sentence in connection with his possession of the other cache of drugs.
MISPRISION OF A FELONY

United States v. Solis, 915 F.3d 1172 (8th Cir. 2019)

Where the person who knows about a felony is the same person who committed the felony, there are obvious Fifth Amendment implications if the person is charged with failure to report the crime. In this case, the conviction was barred by the Fifth Amendment.

United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 480 F.3d 62 (1st Cir. 2007)

At great length, the First Circuit reviews the elements of a misprision of a felony offense, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 4. This case arose in the context of a defendant who avoided considerably more serious charges by entering a guilty plea to a misprision offense, and then challenged the sufficiency of the factual basis for the plea. The First Circuit devoted considerable attention to the issue of when the failure to report a crime may be prosecuted under the statute. In this case, the evidence supported the guilty plea, because the defendant was a law enforcement officer who had a duty to report a crime and his failure to do so was misprision of a felony. The court noted that there is considerable tension between the crime of misprision and the Fifth Amendment when the person who failed to report the offense was also a participant in the criminal conduct. The court also observed that there is no clear rule regarding when a duty to report a crime arises in situation where the defendant is not a law enforcement officer.
MISTAKE OF FACT

The National Firearm Act outlaws the possession of a machine gun. There is no explicit scienter requirement in the Act. The Supreme Court holds that there is an implicit knowledge requirement. Thus, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant knew that the weapon he possessed had automatic firing capability.

The United States Supreme Court held that the statute outlawing the interstate transportation of obscene material depicting minors, 18 U.S.C. §2252, has an implicit requirement that the offender know that the actor depicted is a minor.

United States v. Encarnacion-Ruiz, 787 F.3d 581 (1st Cir. 2015)

In a child pornography production case, if a defendant is charged with aiding and abetting the production of child porn, a mistake of fact (the child’s age) is a defense. Unlike the principal perpetrator, who cannot raise this defense, pursuant to Rosemond v. United States, an aider and abettor must have the intent to commit the offense including all elements of the crime.

United States v. Bowling, 770 F.3d 1168 (7th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with making a false statement on a firearms form that he filled out in order to purchase a gun. He denied that he was a convicted felon. In fact he was a convicted felon (a fact that he acknowledged at trial), but he claimed that he was laboring under a mistake of fact when he filled out the form, because when he pled guilty to the predicate offense, he thought it was a misdemeanor offense. He sought to introduce evidence at the false statement trial that the prosecutor in the prior case had communicated an offer to the defense attorney in that case offering a misdemeanor disposition which the lawyer then communicated to the defendant. This, he claimed, was the source of his confusion. Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

United States v. Fields, 500 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2007)

The Child Support Recovery Act (18 U.S.C. § 228) requires proof that the defendant willfully failed to pay a past due support obligation to his child who resided in another state. Is the state required to prove that the defendant knew that his child resided in another state? According to this decision, the answer is “yes.” Though the “out of state” requirement is also a federal jurisdictional element of the offense, the court concludes that defendant’s knowledge of the location of the child is also an element of the offense that the government must prove.

United States v. Murphy, 406 F.3d 857 (7th Cir. 2005)

Two defendants were charged with threatening and beating up a government witness. Both defendants participated in the beating. However, one of the defendants was not shown to have known that the victim was being beaten because she was a witness. While she was guilty of assaulting the victim, she was not guilty of obstructing justice because of the absence of proof that she knew the reason for the assault.
United States v. Valencia, 394 F.3d 352 (5th Cir. 2004)

The Commodities Exchange Act makes it a crime to knowingly deliver or cause to be delivered false or misleading or knowingly inaccurate reports. Does this mean that a person can be found guilty if he (1) knowingly delivers; (2) a false report that he does not know is false? The Fifth Circuit held that pursuant to United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994), the law would be interpreted to mean that the “knowledge” requirement applies not only to the delivery, but also to the falsity of the report.

United States v. Johnson, 381 F.3d 506 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm with an obliterated serial number. The Fifth Circuit held that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was aware that the gun had this characteristic.

Bartlett v. Alameida, 366 F.3d 1020 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was convicted in state court of rape. This triggered a life-long obligation under California state law to register as a sex offender. He was then charged in state court with failing to register. He defended on the basis that he thought he was only required to register while on parole. The state court held that this misunderstanding about the duty to register was not a defense. The Ninth Circuit reversed. Citing Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 225 (1957) (state law that required convicted felons to register with the chief of police was unconstitutional as applied to a person who had no actual knowledge of his duty to register, if there is no showing of the probability of such knowledge), the Ninth Circuit held that knowledge of a duty to register is an essential element of such an offense and to deny a defense on this basis would violate the due process clause of the United States Constitution.

United States v. Hussein, 351 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2003)

Claiming that it is an issue of first impression, the First Circuit holds that it is no defense to a § 841 charge that the defendant did not know the type, or quantity of drugs that he possessed. In this case, the defendant acknowledged that he possessed a controlled substance knowingly, but claimed he did not know what type of drug, or the quantity. The First Circuit held that even post-Apprendi, this is not a defense.

United States v. King, 345 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2003)

Drug dealers convicted under §841(a) need not know the type and quantity of drugs in their possession in order to be subject to sentencing enhancements contained in § 841(b). The court notes that this holding is consistent in virtually every Circuit.

United States v. Wilson, 133 F.3d 251 (4th Cir. 1997)

In order to prove a violation of the Clean Water Act, the government must prove that the defendant had knowledge of each of the facts -- the elements of the offense -- that constitute the crime, though the defendant need not be shown to have knowledge of the illegality of his conduct. Thus, the defendant must know that he was discharging a substance; must know the identity of the substance he was discharging; must know the instrumentality or method by which the pollutants were discharged; must know the physical characteristics of the property into which the pollutant was discharged that identify it as a wetland; must know the link between the wetlands and waters of the United States; and must know that he did not have a permit. The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the government was required to prove the defendant's knowledge with regard to each element of the offense.

1239

United States v. Graves, 143 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998)

In order to be convicted of accessory after the fact the crime of possession of a weapon by a convicted felon, the defendant must be shown not only to have known about the principal’s possession of the weapon, but also that the principal had a felony offense. This is true, even though the government is not required to prove that the principal (in order to be guilty of being a felon in possession of a weapon) was aware that he had a felony conviction. It is true, moreover, even though someone may be found guilty of aiding and abetting another person’s possession of a weapon by a convicted felon, even though the aider is unaware of the principal’s status.

United States v. Abernathy, 83 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 1996)

Defendant was charged with possession of a weapon with an obliterated serial number. At the guilty plea, the government and the court advised the defendant that the government was not required to prove that the defendant had actual knowledge that the weapon had this characteristic. This was erroneous and the defendant should have been allowed to withdraw his plea.

United States v. Hayden, 64 F.3d 126 (3rd Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with a violation of 18 U.S.C. §922(n), possessing a firearm while under a felony charge. An essential element of this offense is that the defendant know that he is currently charged with a felony. This knowledge is part of the “willful” element of the offense. The defendant must act with the knowledge that he is violating the law. Here, the defendant offered evidence of his low I.Q. to support an inference that he was unaware of the pending felony charge. Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

United States v. Langley, 62 F.3d 602 (4th Cir. 1995)

The government is not required to prove, in a case in which a defendant is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm, that the defendant knew that he was a convicted felon.

United States v. United States District Court For The Central District of California, 858 F.2d 534 (9th Cir. 1988)

A mistake of fact defense must be available in a prosecution under 18 U.S.C. §2251(a) in order to comply with the First Amendment. That statute prohibits producing materials which depict a minor engaged in sexually explicit conduct. A defendant may assert a mistake of fact defense contending that he reasonably in good faith believed that he was engaged in activities protected by the First Amendment.

United States v. Migliaccio, 34 F.3d 1517 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant, a doctor, was charged with mail fraud and conspiracy to defraud the government by means of filing false CHAMPUS health insurance forms. He claimed that the language in the CHAMPUS regulations is ambiguous, that his interpretations were reasonable and that he lacked criminal intent. He requested a jury instruction which explained his theory of the defense, instructing the jury that if it found ambiguity in the forms, then the government would have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that there was no reasonable interpretation of the situation that would make the defendant’s statements factually correct. The trial court declined to give this instruction. This was reversible error. Even the court’s general good faith defense instruction failed to adequately address the defense theory.

United States v. Ruiz, 59 F.3d 1151 (11th Cir. 1995)

The defendant acknowledged that she participated in a multi-kilo cocaine deal, but claimed that she did so in order to enable her son-in-law to earn credit with law enforcement in an effort to reduce his sentence. In short, she claimed that she thought she was engaged in undercover work for the FBI, along with another of the co-conspirators who (she claimed) told her that she was engaged in undercover work with the FBI. The defendant requested an instruction on the law of mistake of fact. The trial court committed reversible error in refusing this request. The general “willfulness” instruction did not satisfactorily cover the points of law included in the defendant’s mistake of fact request. The defendant is entitled to have presented instructions relating to a theory of defense for which there is any foundation in the evidence. In deciding whether a defendant has met her burden, the court is obliged to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the accused.
MISTAKE OF LAW

The “misappropriate theory” of securities fraud involves a corporate “outsider” who violates Rule 10b-5 by misappropriating confidential information for securities trading purposes, in breach of a fiduciary duty owed to the source of the information, rather than to the persons with whom he trades. In this case, the Court holds that this conduct amounts to a criminal violation of the securities laws. The Court also held that the willfulness requirement in the criminal provision required the government to prove that the defendant knew about Rule 10b-5 before a sentence of imprisonment could be imposed.

The defendants were charged with willfully structuring currency transactions at banks – that is, exchanging $9,500 for cashiers checks. The defendants acknowledged knowing about the bank’s reporting requirements and conceded that this conduct was intended to avoid the filing of a report. They insisted that they did not know that structuring a transaction was a criminal offense (18 U.S.C. § 5324). The Supreme Court held that this was a valid defense: the term “willfully” in the statute requires proof that the defendants knew that their conduct was unlawful. Note: The 1994 Congress “legislatively overruled” Ratzlaf.

In this tax evasion prosecution, the District Court erroneously instructed the jury that the defendant could be found guilty of tax evasion if he unreasonably believed that he had no obligation to pay taxes. That is, in order to establish the element of willfulness, the government must prove that the defendant in fact knew that he was evading taxes. A good faith misunderstanding of the law or a good faith belief that one is not violating the law negates willfulness, whether or not that claimed belief or misunderstanding is objectively reasonable.

It is a federal offense to engage in the sale of firearms without a license. The question in this case is what is the government required to prove about the defendant’s knowledge of the law before he may be convicted of willfully violating the statute. The Court concludes that the defendant must be shown to know that he is violating the law, but the government is not required to show that the defendant was aware of the specific licensing requirement that he violated.

United States v. Ibisevic, 675 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant carried over $10,000 into an international flight from Dulles Airport heading to Bosnia. An ICE agent who had a Puerto Rican accent questioned the defendant and his mother (the mother spoke no English) about whether they were carrying cash. The defendant responded that they had $5,000.00. During this “questioning” the defendant turned to his mother and translated, “They are asking how much the luggage is worth if it is lost.” The defendant and his mother actually had about $40,000 in the luggage, on their persons and in the mother’s purse. At trial, the defendant claimed that he did not understand the question and that the mother’s testimony (about what the defendant said to the mother) was admissible as a “present sense impression” to show a lack of understanding. The trial court held that this was hearsay and inadmissible. The Fourth Circuit reversed: The defendant’s statement was not hearsay (it was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted; it nevertheless would qualify as a present sense impression; and it was important to his defense regarding his lack of understanding that he was making a false statement or knowingly failing to file a currency form in violation of the law.

United States v. Pulungan, 569 F.3d 326 (7th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with attempting to export defense articles without a license. This case contains an analysis of what the government must prove regarding the defendant’s knowledge of the licensing requirement and suggests that even if the defendant is aware that what he is doing might be illegal (as evidenced by his suspicious conduct in connection with the sales), the government is required to prove that he knew the guns he was exporting were in fact covered by the licensing statute.

United States v. Ali, 557 F.3d 715 (6th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with making a false statement on a naturalization document. He had been married to a Canadian woman and then, prior to the divorce being finalized, he married a woman in Georgia. He answered a question on a naturalization form that he had never been married to two women at the same time. The defendant claimed that he could not be guilty of making a false statement because a bigamous marriage, under Georgia law, was void ab initio, therefore he was never actually married to the woman in Georgia. The government moved to bar this defense on the theory that it represented a “mistake of law” defense. The Sixth Circuit disagreed, holding that if the defendant in fact believed that he was not married, based on the void ab initio principle, then he was not guilty of knowingly making a false statement.

United States v. Moore, 504 F.3d 1345 (11th Cir. 2007)

The defendants, husband and wife, were charged with theft of Veterans Benefits. After the death of the mother of one of the defendants, the VA continued to direct deposit his benefits into an account which the defendant then converted to his own use. The defendants contended that they did not realize that they were not entitled to continue to receive the benefits upon the death of the veteran. That is, they claimed that they lacked knowledge that the money was “government funds” that they were using and that they did not take the money “willfully.” Based on the evidence presented during the government’s case in chief, there was simply no evidence that the defendants were aware that they were not entitled to the money. All that the government proved is that the mother died, the benefits continued to be deposited into the account and the defendants continued to use the money. There was no evidence of any notice to the defendants that they were not entitled to use the money, or continue to receive benefits based on the death of the veteran.

United States v. Caseer, 399 F.3d 828 (6th Cir. 2005)

Khat is a substance that contains both cathinone and cathine, both of which are controlled substances. Khat is a vegetation that is frequently chewed (apparently like chewing tobacco) by people in Africa, the Middle East and elsewhere. The Sixth Circuit held that the scheduling of the substance was proper. However, the appellate court reversed the defendant’s conviction in light of the failure of the government to prove that he had the requisite mens rea to commit the offense. The general rule that citizens are presumed to know the requirements of the law is not absolute, and may be arrogated when a law is so technical or obscure that it threatens to ensnare individuals engaged in apparently innocent conduct, because to presume knowledge of such a law would violate a core due process principle, namely that citizens are entitled to fair warning that their conduct may be criminal. Outlawing “cathinone” and “cathine” did not provide clear warning that khat was illegal to possess. To overcome this flaw in the statute, the court held that the government would be required to prove actual knowledge that the possession and importation of khat was illegal. The evidence was insufficient to prove the defendant’s actual knowledge in this case.

United States v. Wilson, 159 F.3d 280 (7th Cir. 1998)

A good discussion of ignorance of the law as a defense. Not a favorable case, however.

United States v. Curran, 20 F.3d 560 (3rd Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged under §1001 with causing the filing of a false statement to the Federal Election Commission relating to campaign contributions. The defendant had his company’s employees make personal contributions to political candidates and then reimbursed them, a practice which violates the Federal Election Campaign Act. The court holds that the Ratzlaf definition of willfulness applies in this context – therefore, the jury must be instructed that the government was required to prove that the defendant was aware of the law and knew that his conduct was illegal. The election law, like the structuring laws, does not outlaw conduct which is “obviously evil” and represents a “regulatory statute.” Thus, the jury should have been instructed that the defendant must have been shown to know of the campaign treasurers’ reporting obligations, that he attempted to frustrate those obligations, and that he knew his conduct was unlawful.

United States v. Grigsby, 111 F.3d 806 (11th Cir. 1997)

The African Elephant Conservation Act, 16 U.S.C. §4223(l), makes it a crime to knowingly violate the provisions of the act. The court in this case held that even though there is no “willful” element of the act, the government must prove that the defendant knew the provisions of the law and knowingly violated the law. The evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the law in this case was lacking and the conviction, therefore, was reversed on sufficiency grounds.

United States v. Morris, 20 F.3d 1111 (11th Cir. 1994)

The trial court committed reversible error by failing to instruct the jury on the good faith defense, as requested by the defendant in this prosecution for filing a false income tax return. The court’s instruction defining the terms “willfully” and “knowingly” was not an adequate substitute. Among other things, the charge did not explain that a good faith – yet objectively unreasonable – belief in the correctness of the return, would be a complete defense.

United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992)

In defense of tax evasion charges, the defendant sought to introduce expert evidence that the money he received could be characterized as a gift rather than a loan. The trial court committed reversible error by excluding this evidence. Such expert testimony is highly relevant to the assessment of whether the defendant willfully violated the tax laws.
United States v. Manapat, 928 F.2d 1097 (11th Cir. 1991)

The application form for an FAA medical certificate was so inherently ambiguous that a false answer could not form the basis of a prosecution under 18 U.S.C. §1001.

United States v. Hedges, 912 F.2d 1397 (11th Cir. 1990)

18 U.S.C. §208(a) is a strict liability offense. One who takes government action while having a conflicting financial interest is guilty of the offense even if he has no intent to violate the statute. However, in this case, the conviction had to be reversed because the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment by estoppel. The defendant asked his Standards of Conduct Counselor to counsel him about the transactions in which he was engaged. Entrapment by estoppel applies when an official tells a defendant that certain conduct is legal and the defendant believes that official. This defense applies even in cases of strict liability, because entrapment does not negate the intent element of an offense, it relies on the principle of fairness.

United States v. Markovic, 911 F.2d 613 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was prosecuted for attempting to export firearms. The defendants, Yugoslavian seamen, were at port in Mobile, Alabama. They were given warnings in English, regarding the Arms Export Control Act. That Act outlaws exporting any firearms by a foreign person. Because the Yugoslavian defendant did not understand a word of English, his conviction for knowingly and voluntarily violating the law could not be upheld.

United States v. Heller, 830 F.2d 150 (11th Cir. 1987)

An attorney relied on the “case-closed” method of reporting advance payments of cost and fees in filing his taxes. Though this is no longer a valid method of computing taxes and income, the defendant/attorney could rely on the uncertainty-of-law-defense in his prosecution for federal income tax evasion.
MONEY LAUNDERING

There is no requirement that the government prove an overt act in a money laundering conspiracy case brought under 18 U.S.C. § 1956(h).

In a 4-1-4 decision, the Supreme Court held that the term “proceeds” in § 1956 refers to “profits” and not gross receipts. Thus, in a gambling case, such as this case, the money that is paid to runners and other participants/employees of the gambling activity does not amount to a transaction in proceeds, because this money does not represent the profit of the gambling venture. Justice Stevens, who provided the fifth vote, limited the holding (perhaps) to cases in which the money is not derived from the sale of contraband. NOTE: Congress amended the money laundering law in 2009 and legislatively overruled this decision by including the following definition: “the term ‘proceeds’ means any property derived from or obtained or retained, directly or indirectly, through some form of unlawful activity, including the gross receipts of such activity.” 18 U.S.C.A. § 1956(c)(9).

The defendant was stopped near the Mexico border and was found to be in possession of approximately $80,000 in currency hidden in the car. The statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(2)(B)(i), requires proof that: (1) the money was destined to cross a border; (2) the money was the proceeds of specified unlawful activity; (3) the defendant must know that funds were proceeds of specified unlawful activity; (4) the transportation of the funds must have been designed to conceal or disguise the nature, location, source, or control of the proceeds; (5) the defendant must have known that the transportation was for the purpose of concealing the proceeds. The Supreme Court holds that merely hiding money in a car that is traveling from the United States to Mexico does not amount to “concealment” in the money laundering statute.

United States v. Cessa, 785 F.3d 165 (5th Cir. 2015)

A legitimate business that accepts money from a drug dealer, knowing that the money is tainted and knowing that the effect of taking the money would be to conceal the source of the money, is not necessarily guilty of conspiracy to launder the money. It is one thing to be in the business of laundering money and another to simply do business with a drug dealer: the former is a money launderer, the latter is not (at least not necessarily, simply by doing business with the drug dealer). The court also reversed the conviction of one defendant because of a mandatory presumption jury instruction: the trial court instructed the jury that “The commingling of illegal proceeds with legitimate business funds is evidence of intent to conceal or disguise.” This instruction created a mandatory presumption. The appropriate instruction should state that the jury “may infer,” such intent, not that such conduct “is evidence” of such an intent.

United States v. Simmons, 737 F.3d 319 (4th Cir. 2013)

This case, controlled by Santos (pre-$1956(c)(9)) holds that Ponzi payments are not money laundering transactions, because the payments merge with the charged fraud offense.
United States v. Abdulwahab, 715 F.3d 521 (4th Cir. 2013)

This pre-$$1956(c)(9)$ case held that the fraud and the money laundering transactions merged under the Santos rationale and the court vacated the money laundering convictions, noting, however, that post-$$1956(c)(9)$ cases would not be treated similarly.

United States v. Demmitt, 706 F.3d 665 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant defrauded her customers and deposited the money into her credit union account. A couple weeks later, she transferred the money to her son. This did not amount to concealment money laundering. There was no evidence that the purpose of these transactions (as opposed to their effect) was to hide or conceal the money. This illicit purpose is an essential element of a concealment money laundering offense.

United States v. Cloud, 680 F.3d 396 (4th Cir. 2012)

Pursuant to Santos (pre-$$1956(c)(9)$), the money laundering conviction in this mortgage fraud case was invalid. The transactions involved “essential expenses of the underlying fraud” and thus these payments “merged” with the fraud offense. The payments in this case involved money transferred to recruiters, buyers and other coconspirators for the role each person played in the mortgage fraud scheme. The court noted in footnote 6 that the holding in this case would likely not be relevant post-$$1956(c)(9)$.

United States v. Chi Tong Kuok, 671 F.3d 931 (9th Cir. 2012)

The extra-territorial provision of $$1956$ only applies if the transaction involves more than $10,000.00. That threshold amount was not reached in this case and the money laundering conviction, therefore, could not be sustained.

United States v. Harris, 666 F.3d 905 (5th Cir. 2012)

Harris, in California, sold drugs to Miller, who was in Texas. Miller sent money to Harris. There was no evidence, however, that the money sent by Miller to Harris represented the proceeds of prior sales, or any other illegal activity. The fact that the money was used to buy drugs did not mean, necessarily, that the money represented the proceeds of some prior illegal activity. Unless the money in a particular transaction is dirty, it cannot be laundered. Buying drugs with clean money is not money laundering. Conviction reversed on sufficiency grounds.

United States v. Blair, 661 F.3d 755 (4th Cir. 2011)

Rejecting the reasoning of the Eleventh Circuit in United States v. Velez, 586 F.3d 875 (11th Cir. 2009), the Fourth Circuit holds that a lawyer who knowingly receives tainted money from a client (in this case, drug money) and uses it for his fee, as well as the fee for criminal lawyers representing co-conspirators, may be prosecuted for money laundering, notwithstanding the safe harbor provision of 18 U.S.C. § 1957(f)(1). The facts in this case are not the typical case in which a legitimate criminal defense attorney accepted a fee. The lawyer was involved in various crimes with the client and others. Nevertheless, the Fourth Circuit rejected the notion that § 1957(f)(1) protects a lawyer when he knowingly accepts drug money to represent a criminal defendant.
United States v. Richardson, 658 F.3d 333 (3rd Cir. 2011)

The defendant was the girlfriend of a drug dealer. She participated in certain financial transactions with the proceeds of her boyfriend’s drug dealing. The evidence was insufficient to prove, however, that the defendant knew that the purpose of these transactions was to conceal the source or location of the money, or, more importantly, that the earlier transactions that demonstrated an attempt to conceal the money were either conducted by the defendant or known to her. The fact that the defendant engaged in a final financial transaction with proceeds that had previously been moved in a suspicious manner does not establish that the defendant knew that the final transaction was designed to conceal the money.

United States v. Wright, 651 F.3d 764 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with § 1957 money laundering. The defendant obtained $8,000 in drug proceeds and purchased real estate. Several years later, the defendant sold the real estate for $49,623.00. The government claimed that it could satisfy the $10,000 minimal threshold with the sale of the real estate. The Seventh Circuit disagreed, holding that there must be tainted money in the amount of $10,000 in order to trigger a § 1957 violation.

United States v. Heid, 651 F.3d 850 (8th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was the mother of a drug dealer. When her son was in jail, she agreed to help him post bond. She retrieved several thousand dollars that she acknowledged was derived from drug dealing and gave the money to bondsmen to post the bond. She was indicted for conspiracy to launder money, with the object of the conspiracy being a § 1956(a)(1)(B)(i) violation (i.e., concealment money laundering). She entered a guilty plea with the factual basis essentially including no more facts than recited above. She later moved to withdraw her plea on the basis that the factual basis was insufficient to set forth a crime (i.e., there was no evidence of an intent, or an agreement, to conceal the proceeds). The Eighth Circuit held that the trial court erred in failing to grant the motion to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Warshak, 631 F.3d 266 (6th Cir. 2010)

One defendant’s concealment prong money laundering conviction was reversed. Though the principal perpetrator of the predicate offenses may have intended to conceal the money by giving the money to his mother, this did not suffice to prove that the mother was guilty of concealment prong money laundering, because there was no evidence that she knew her son’s purpose or that she engaged in any concealment activity.

United States v. Adams, 625 F.3d 371 (7th Cir. 2010)

One of the defendants in this case was a drug courier and was asked by another conspirator to take cash and purchase money orders in relatively small denominations. The courier knew the money represented drug proceeds and she probably could have been convicted of concealment money laundering. However, this evidence was not sufficient to convict her of promotion money laundering, because there was insufficient evidence to show that she knew how the money orders were later used.

Garland v. Roy, 615 F.3d 391 (5th Cir. 2010)
A § 2255 petition can be used to challenge a money laundering conviction on the basis that the proof failed to satisfy the Santos definition of profits. The Fifth Circuit also weighs in on the parameters of Santos, disagreeing with the decisions of virtually every other Circuit, some of which severely limited Santos, others of which read the decision expansively.

United States v. Hall, 613 F.3d 249 (D.C. Cir. 2010)

A money laundering transaction must not be the same as the transaction that is fraudulent. In other words, funds that are laundered must already be tainted. In this case, the money laundering indictment listed the transaction that was the fraudulent transaction itself. The money laundering conviction was reversed by the D.C. Circuit.

United States v. Moreland, 622 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 2010)

The trial court’s instruction to the jury violated the principle of Santos and required reversing the money laundering convictions in this case.

United States v. Faulkenberry, 614 F.3d 573 (6th Cir. 2010)

Just as Cuellar held that the purpose of the transportation of money must be to conceal the money (as opposed to showing that the money was concealed while being transported) under § 1956(a)(2)(B)(i), in a case involving transaction money laundering for the purpose of concealing the money, the government must show that the transaction was designed to conceal the money. 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(1)(B)(i). In this case, the defendant was defrauding investors. Though the transaction at issue (making an unsecured loan with the investor’s money) concealed the source of the money – it had that effect – that was not the purpose of the transaction. Even if there is deliberate concealment, this does not mean that the purpose of the transaction was to conceal the money.

United States v. Trejo, 610 F.3d 308 (5th Cir. 2010)

Evidence that a defendant knowingly transported a large of quantity of tainted cash is not, alone, sufficient to prove that he is guilty of promotion money laundering. Promotion money laundering requires proof that the defendant intended to promote additional criminal acts. Accepting a guilty plea with an inadequate factual basis, however, was not plain error.

United States v. Kratt, 579 F.3d 558 (6th Cir. 2009)

The Sixth Circuit decided that Santos was not limited to gambling cases. Any money laundering case in which there is a merger problem as envisioned by the Court would be covered by the Santos holding. Of course, this only applies to pre-2009 convictions (after which § 1956(c)(9) reversed the Santos decision).

United States v. Velez, 586 F.3d 875 (11th Cir. 2009)

Applying 18 U.S.C. § 1957(f)(1) (“any transaction necessary to preserve a person’s right to representation as guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the Constitution” is not a monetary transaction), the Eleventh Circuit held that paying money – even “dirty” money – to an attorney for purposes of retaining the attorney for a criminal case, is not money laundering under 18 U.S.C. § 1957. This is the case involving the prosecution of Ben Kuehne in Miami. The government argued that § 1957(f)(1) was meaningless, because it assumes that a defendant has... the constitutional right to pay an attorney with dirty money, which according to the forfeiture decisions in United States v. Monsanto and Caplin & Drysdale v. United States a person does not have the right to do. The Eleventh Circuit rejected this argument, noting that Congress did not write § 1957(f)(1) for no reason, and therefore, attorneys may not be prosecuted for knowingly engaging in a monetary transaction with dirty money.

United States v. Bah, 574 F.3d 106 (2d Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 1969 with operating a money transmitting business without a license as required by state law. The defendant claimed that he received the money in New York, but transmitted it from an office in New Jersey. He requested a jury instruction that it was not a crime to receive the money for the purpose of transmitting it in New York. The failure to instruct the jury consistent with this defense was error.

United States v. Van Alstyne, 584 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2009)

The Ninth Circuit concludes that Santos applies in the context of a Ponzi scheme: payments made to earlier investors to maintain the appearance of legitimacy, are not payments of “proceeds” of the criminal fraud scheme. Of course, this only applies to pre-2009 convictions (after which § 1956(c)(9) reversed the Santos decision).

United States v. Garcia, 587 F.3d 509 (2d Cir. 2009)

The fact that the defendant, a truck driver, accepted dirty money and then transported it in a hidden manner, and that he knew the recipients of the money would not report the money on their income taxes, was not sufficient, under the Cuellar decision, to establish a factual basis for a guilty plea to a money laundering charge. The key to concealment money laundering under § 1956(a)(1)(B)(i) is proof that the purpose of the transaction was to conceal the funds, not just that the effect of the transaction was concealment. Not reporting the money as income is not the same as “concealing” the source, location, or ownership of the money. Accepting a guilty plea based on the factual basis in this case was plain error.

United States v. Ness, 565 F.3d 73 (2d Cir. 2009)

The defendant’s international money laundering conviction (§ 1956(a)(1)(B)(i)) conviction was reversed based on Cuellar v. United States. The defendants helped drug dealers transfer currency out of the country. Though the money was concealed when it was transported, it was not transported to conceal it. The latter is required to satisfy the “conceal” element of the money laundering statute. The government must prove “why” the money was being transported, not “how” it is being transported, to prove money laundering. This case also contains a discussion of the term “financial institution” for purposes of a § 1957 offense, including the various definitions that incorporate 31 U.S.C. § 5312 and 31 C.F.R. § 103.11. The court ultimately concludes that an armored car business does not qualify as a financial institution.

United States v. Caldwell, 560 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2009)

The evidence was sufficient to convict the defendant of wire fraud, but the expenditure of the money did not amount to money laundering, because there was no effort to conceal the transaction. The fact that the money was transferred quickly does not mean that it was concealed.
Applying the Santos rationale (prior to the Congressional re-definition of “proceeds” in 18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(9)), the Seventh Circuit held that a defendant who runs a house of prostitution cannot be prosecuted for money laundering for all expenditures of the money received, because the cost of doing business must be deducted from the term “proceeds.” The court spent some time deciding whether “advertising” costs should be included in the term “proceeds” under the pre-$1956(c)(9)$ definition. See also United States v. Lee, 558 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 2009).

United States v. Hassan, 578 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2008)

The defendant was prosecuted for conspiring to import “khat” a plant grown in the Africa that sometimes contains a controlled substance known as cathinone. The plant itself is not illegal, but cathinone is. The evidence was sufficient to prove that he conspired to import khat containing cathinone. The defendant was also prosecuted for several substantive money laundering offenses. However, the government never proved that any of the shipments of khat that the defendant received actually contained cathinone. Therefore, substantive money laundering counts, based on transactions involving the proceeds of khat sales could not be sustained, because there was insufficient proof that the money represented proceeds of cathinone sales.

United States v. Law, 528 F.3d 888 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

The defendant used drug profits to make mortgage payments on rental property where he collected the rent. This amounted to spending money, not money laundering. Even though he made the mortgage payments in another person’s name, this was because the other person held the mortgage, and there was insufficient evidence that this reflected an intention to conceal the money.

United States v. Adefehinti, 510 F.3d 319 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

The defendant’s mortgage fraud scheme involved inflating property values and then having settlement checks issued in the name of fictitious buyers. He deposited some of the fictitious buyer checks into an account with his name. This did not amount to concealment money laundering. Depositing the checks into an account in his name did not conceal the money. The act of laundering the money must have some element of “concealment” above and beyond the actual fraudulent crime itself that involved concealing the defendant’s identity as the recipient of the proceeds.

United States v. Khanani, 502 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 2007)

A defendant who employs illegal aliens and thereby saves money does not commit money laundering when he engages in a financial transaction with the “saved money” because this money does not represent proceeds. The Third Circuit reached a contrary conclusion in United States v. Yusuf, 536 F.3d 178 (3rd Cir. 2008), where the court concluded that if the defendants fail to pay taxes on gross revenue at their grocery store and then mail fraudulent tax returns to the government (mail fraud), the retained money, when deposited into a bank, constitutes the proceeds of the mail fraud and the deposit can be prosecuted as a money laundering offense.

United States v. Malone, 484 F.3d 916 (7th Cir. 2007)

Another Seventh Circuit money laundering conviction falls victim to the analysis of United States v. Scialabba, 282 F.3d 475 (7th Cir. 2002). The defendant participated in transferring money from drug purchasers to the sellers, but because of the absence of any showing that the “proceeds” were net, rather than gross sales, the conviction could not be sustained.

United States v. Johnson, 440 F.3d 1286 (11th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with money laundering and conspiracy to launder money. The court reversed several counts of the conviction. First, the court held that the mere transfer of money from one account to another (even overseas) did not satisfy the “concealment prong” of a money laundering prosecution, without further proof of the defendant’s efforts to conceal the location or source of the money. Second, the court held that the conspiracy conviction could not be sustained, because the only alleged co-conspirator was not shown to have had knowledge of the tainted source of the money. If the other member of the conspiracy, as a matter of law, was not proven to be guilty, then a conspiracy conviction could not be sustained.

United States v. Elso, 422 F.3d 1305 (11th Cir. 2005)

The attorney’s fee exception to a money laundering prosecution embodied in 18 U.S.C. § 1957(f) does not apply in a prosecution of the lawyer under § 1956. The exception applies in § 1957 prosecutions, because the exception endeavors to shield an attorney who receives a fee (in excess of $10,000) that comes from specified unlawful activity. A § 1956 prosecution, however, also requires proof of an unlawful purpose in engaging in the transaction (e.g., concealing the money, or promoting the unlawful activity). Thus, if an attorney is prosecuted under § 1956, the government is required to prove that the transaction was designed by the attorney to either conceal the money, or promote the unlawful activity, in which case the fact that the money was paid as an attorney fee would not excuse the conduct.

United States v. Blankenship, 382 F.3d 1110 (11th Cir. 2004)

The Eleventh Circuit reversed the defendant’s money laundering conviction because the government failed to prove that his conduct with the tainted funds amounted to “concealing” the proceeds. The defendant deposited the money into a bank account with his name on it. Though it was a different bank account than the one into which he normally made business deposits, this did not satisfy the “concealment” requirement of §1956(a)(1)(B)(i). Among the factors the courts consider in deciding whether there is concealment is whether the defendant engages in unnecessary transactions to add extra degrees of separation between himself and the source of the funds. This is not a requirement however, because any conduct that makes the proceeds more concealed after the transaction, than before the transaction, will satisfy the concealment element. The transactions in this case did not meet this threshold.

United States v. Anderson, 391 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 2004)
When the government initiates a money laundering sting involving money supposedly derived from bank fraud, the agent must convey information to the target that the bank was insured by the FDIC – otherwise, the proceeds would not be from specified unlawful activity (i.e., federal bank fraud). Because no such representation was made to the target in this case, the conviction was not supported by sufficient evidence.

United States v. Miles, 360 F.3d 472 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was indicted for money laundering, the government alleging that his company was engaged in Medicare fraud. The company began as a legitimate enterprise, however, and continued to conduct legitimate business, even after the time that it began its fraudulent activity. The indictment charged the defendant with money laundering under 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(1)(A)(i) – engaging in financial transactions with proceeds of illegal activity with the intent to promote illegal activity. Many of the financial transactions, however, involved paying rent, payroll and payroll taxes. The Fifth Circuit held that these transactions did not satisfy the “promotion” element of the offense. The court held that, “When a business as a whole is illegitimate, even individual expenditures that are not intrinsically unlawful can support a promotion money laundering charge.” See United States v. Peterson, 244 F.3d 385 (5th Cir. 2001). However, when the business is legitimate, the payment of operating expenses for the company – even with unlawful proceeds – does not constitute “promotion” money laundering. See also United States v. Brown, 186 F.3d 661 (5th Cir. 1999). The court concluded that promotion money laundering is a crime that focuses on transactions that funnel dirty money directly back into the criminal activity.

United States v. Carucci, 364 F.3d 339 (1st Cir. 2004)

The defendant was a known associate of a mobster. He purchased real estate for the mobster and part of the transaction was structured. The mobster had no apparent legitimate income. This evidence, alone, was not sufficient to prove that the real estate purchase was with “dirty” money and therefore a § 1957 money laundering conviction could not be sustained. A § 1957 conviction cannot be based solely on the finding that a known criminal had no other legitimate income.

United States v. Iacaboni, 363 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004)

Payments of gambling winnings to the bettors constituted a money laundering financial transaction and the amount of these payments could be forfeited. However, the court erred in forfeiting additional money that may have been a financial transaction that concealed the money, because the money laundering charge only alleged “promotion prong” money laundering and therefore, a financial transaction that concealed the nature, source, or ownership of the money could not be forfeited. This would improperly amend the indictment.

United States v. Scialabba, 282 F.3d 475 (7th Cir. 2002)

The Seventh Circuit rejected the government’s argument that the use of gross receipts to fund ongoing criminal activity constitutes money laundering. The defendants were convicted of unlawful gambling, and money laundering (as well as certain tax offenses). The money laundering charge was based on the defendants’ use of revenue from their gambling operations to meet the ongoing expenses of the business. The court explained that the government’s theory amounted to saying that every drug dealer who uses money to purchase more drugs is thereby engaged in money laundering. The court held that the money laundering statute only applies when the defendant invests the profits of the criminal venture, as opposed to any receipts, into further criminal activity. The Seventh Circuit’s decision was later rejected in United States v. Grasso, 381 F.3d 160 (3rd Cir. 2004), which held that reinvesting money earned from criminal activity in the criminal venture does amount to money laundering. The Seventh Circuit reaffirmed Scialabba in the 2006 decision Santos v. United States, 461 F.3d 886 (7th Cir. 2006), annotated above). The Supreme Court affirmed the Santos decision, thus agreeing with this decision. See above. However, as noted in the annotation to Santos, Congress has legislatively overruled these decisions by re-defining “proceeds” as including “gross receipts” from any specified unlawful activity. 18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(9).

United States v. Garza, 118 F.3d 278 (5th Cir. 1997)
During a search, police discovered $5 million in cash, as well as ledgers and notebooks detailing the sale of nearly $8 million worth of cocaine and receipts of over $6 million. Nevertheless, the government failed to prove the elements of a § 1956 offense, because there was no proof of a financial transaction. A "transaction" is defined as "a purchase, sale, loan, pledge, gift, transfer, delivery, or other disposition or some action involving a financial institution or its facilities." Thus, if a financial institution is not involved, there must be some kind of "disposition." The mere presence of a large sum of currency, and evidence of sales, is not, alone, sufficient to support a money laundering conviction.

United States v. McIntosh, 124 F.3d 1330 (10th Cir. 1997)
The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud and money laundering on the basis of his failure to disclose during his bankruptcy proceeding that he had received certain money and deposited some of those funds in a bank account he controlled through an unincorporated business he managed. The money laundering counts were based on his concealment of income that should have been reported. The evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction. Money that is lawfully received, but not reported to the bankruptcy court, is not tainted money. It is not derived from, nor the proceeds of, a criminal offense. Moreover, when he engaged in a financial transaction, he was not at that time under an immediate duty to report the receipt of the money.

United States v. Allen, 129 F.3d 1159 (10th Cir. 1997)
18 U.S.C. § 1957 requires that the monetary transaction be "in, or affecting interstate or foreign commerce." This requirement is both jurisdictional and an element of the offense that should be submitted to the jury for decision.

United States v. Shoff, 151 F.3d 889 (8th Cir. 1998)
The defendant induced numerous people to invest money with him so that he could invest the money in stock options. Actually, he defrauded these people and used the money for his own purposes. Two transactions formed the basis for money laundering charges. In both instances, he deposited money invested by his victims in a “Shoff Trading” account and then had a cashier’s check drawn on the account (listing him as the remitter). Both cashier’s checks were used to purchase cars, both of which were titled in his name. Though the money was clearly the proceeds of fraud, and the purchase of the cars was a financial transaction, these transactions... were not designed in whole or in part to conceal or disguise the nature, the location, the source, the ownership, or the control of those proceeds.

United States v. Holmes, 44 F.3d 1150 (2d Cir. 1995)

Charges of money laundering and violating the CTR laws with respect to the laundered funds merge when the money laundering violation is based on the transaction which also constitutes the structuring transaction.

United States v. Voigt, 89 F.3d 1050 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The defendant claimed that in order to sustain a money laundering conviction, the government must prove that at least some of the money engaged in transaction is, in fact, tainted money. This is conceivably difficult where the defendant deposits tainted money into an account that contains untainted money and the prosecution focuses on a transaction withdrawing money from that account (in an amount that could have included only the untainted money). The court noted the problem, but decided that the issue did not have to be decided here, where the money withdrawn was conceded by a co-defendant to include tainted money.

United States v. Heaps, 39 F.3d 479 (4th Cir. 1994)

The defendant, a drug dealer, instructed his colleague to wire him money that was the proceeds of drug sales. This, alone, does not amount to money laundering. The government argued that §1956(a)(1)(A)(i) proscribes transactions that promote the criminal venture. However, every transaction relating to the payment for the purchase of drugs is not a money laundering offense. There was no showing that when the defendant received the money that the money was reinvested in drugs.

United States v. Baker, 985 F.2d 1248 (4th Cir. 1993)

The government prosecuted the defendant for money laundering; he allegedly purchased a boat with drug proceeds. However, the government failed to establish with sufficient evidence that a boat was ever purchased by the defendant, or that its ownership was concealed through the use of nominee owners. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Tencer, 107 F.3d 1120 (5th Cir. 1997)

The appellate court affirmed the lower court’s decision to grant a judgment of acquittal on one money laundering count where the government failed to prove that the defendant’s deposit of fraud proceeds in a brokerage account was accompanied by an intent to conceal the nature, or source of the money, an element of a §1956 prosecution.

United States v. Gaytan, 74 F.3d 545 (5th Cir. 1996)

Funds do not become the proceeds of drug trafficking until a sale of drugs is completed. Hence, a transaction to pay for illegal drugs is not money laundering, because the funds involved are not proceeds of an unlawful activity when the transaction occurs, but become so only after the transaction is completed.

United States v. Dobbs, 63 F.3d 391 (5th Cir. 1995)

Merely spending money which is obtained by fraud does not amount to money laundering under §1956 absent some effort to disguise the money, or its source. The government must show that the defendant had a desire to create the appearance of legitimate wealth or otherwise to conceal the nature of funds so that it might enter the economy as legitimate funds. Here, the defendant obtained money by fraud, but spent the money in an open and notorious manner. Some of the funds were deposited into the wife’s account and the other money was converted to cashier’s checks, but spent on the ordinary costs of the defendant’s farm. This did not amount to money laundering.

United States v. Puig-Infante, 19 F.3d 929 (5th Cir. 1994)

The defendants were charged with money laundering. Two “transactions” were the focus of this count of the indictment. First was the purchase of marijuana with cash; second was the transportation of this cash, by car, to another location. Neither event represented the substantive offense of money laundering. The purchase of marijuana does not qualify, because the money, at that point, does not represent “proceeds.” The transportation of the money does not qualify, because that does not amount to a “transaction.” Merely being in possession of drug proceeds is not sufficient to support a money laundering conviction. United States v. Ramirez, 954 F.2d 1035 (5th Cir. 1992).

United States v. Gonzalez-Rodriguez, 966 F.2d 918 (5th Cir. 1992)

Evidence that the defendant was travelling with drug proceeds is not sufficient to support a money laundering prosecution. The government offered no evidence that the defendant was attempting, in any manner, to conceal the source, location, nature, ownership, or control of the proceeds.

United States v. Reed, 77 F.3d 139 (6th Cir. 1996)

Giving drug trafficking proceeds to a courier is a financial transaction for purposes of §1956. The Reed court, en banc, overruled several prior cases that had held that the transfer of money from one person to another did not qualify as a financial transaction, including United States v. Samour, 9 F.3d 531 (6th Cir. 1993) and United States v. Oleson, 44 F.3d 381 (6th Cir. 1995). The court noted that the mere transportation of money does not suffice; there must be a “transaction,” but this includes a transfer from one person to another.

United States v. McDougald, 990 F.2d 259 (6th Cir. 1993)

Even viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the government, there was insufficient evidence that the proceeds of any drug transaction. Proof that the purchaser had insufficient legitimate funds to afford the purchase is not alone sufficient to establish that the funds came from a tainted source. Also, the fact that the car purchase was made in a way designed to conceal the ownership is not sufficient, because the purchaser may have been attempting to hide the purchase from tax agents or other creditors. Finally, there was insufficient evidence that the defendant had the requisite knowledge of the source of the funds, even if the funds were tainted. The defendant was indisputably not a drug dealer.

United States v. Bell, 936 F.2d 337 (7th Cir. 1991)

Depositing cash into a safety deposit box is not a “transaction” under 18 U.S.C. §1956(c)(3). NOTE: The statute was amended after this decision and the law now expressly provides that a transaction involving a safe deposit box does qualify as a financial transaction.

United States v. Herron, 97 F.3d 234 (8th Cir. 1996)

A prosecution under 18 U.S.C. §1956(a)(1)(B)(ii) requires proof that the financial transaction was designed to disguise or conceal the nature or source of the proceeds. This element was not proved in this money laundering prosecution. Though the money was undeniably drug money, and the wire transfers were undeniably financial transactions, the defendants used their own names and the recipients used their own names, as well. The court cautioned that the money laundering statutes are not intended to outlaw money spending, even if the money being spent represents proceeds.

United States v. Termini, 992 F.2d 879 (8th Cir. 1993)

The defendant worked for a video company which illegally allowed customers to gamble on the machines. The defendant was a “route man” who went to the various stores where the videos were located and collected the money from the machines – both the machines which illegally permitted gambling and various other vending machines, including cigarette machines. The money which was collected was commingled with other legitimate receipts from the vending machines. This could satisfy the “concealment” element of a money laundering offense. However, the evidence did not support the allegation that the defendant, who was little more than a deliveryman, had willingly joined a money laundering venture. There was no evidence, for example, that he had any interest in hiding the money, concealing it, or disguising its source. His money laundering conviction, therefore, was reversed.

United States v. Rutgard, 116 F.3d 1270 (9th Cir. 1997)

A significant amount of fraudulently obtained money was deposited into the defendant’s account. The account also had considerable legitimate money. The government charged the defendant with §1957 money laundering in connection with a large withdrawal. Obviously, the government did not prove that the specific money withdrawn was tainted. The Ninth Circuit concludes that §1957 money laundering cannot be sustained on this basis. There must be proof of a transaction in excess of $10,000 of tainted funds. The court refused to adopt the presumption that once an account has tainted funds, any transfer out of that account is deemed to be the tainted money. The government should have alleged money laundering with regard to the deposit of one of the fraudulent checks (in excess of $10,000), rather than focusing on the withdrawal from the commingled funds. Of course, if the intent of the defendant is to hide the tainted funds in the commingled account, then §1956 money laundering could be charged.

United States v. Ripinsky, 109 F.3d 1436 (9th Cir. 1997)

An essential element of §1957 money laundering is a financial transaction involving the use of a financial institution which is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. The foreign commerce component of this element is an essential element of the offense which must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt and submitted to the jury.

United States v. Stein, 37 F.3d 1407 (9th Cir. 1994)

In its money laundering instruction, the trial court correctly informed the jury that the defendant must have knowledge that the money engaged in the transaction was derived from a specified felony. In a later general charge to the jury, the judge explained that, “An act is done knowingly if the defendant is aware of the act and doesn’t act through ignorance, mistake or accident. The government is not required to prove that the defendant knew that his acts or omissions were unlawful.” This latter instruction conflicted with the former instruction and therefore tainted the money laundering conviction. Where the jury is offered inconsistent instructions, one right and the other wrong, the jury cannot be presumed to have followed the correct instruction. See also United States v. Turman, 122 F.3d 1167 (9th Cir. 1997).
United States v. Monroe, 943 F.2d 1007 (9th Cir. 1991)

An international wire transfer constitutes the transportation of funds (for purposes of §1956) from a place in the United States to a place outside the United States.

United States v. Dimeck, 24 F.3d 1239 (10th Cir. 1994)

The delivery of alleged drug-money by one courier to a second courier, who was to deliver the money to the seller of the drugs, does not constitute money laundering under §1956(a)(1)(B)(i). The court disagrees with other circuits which hold that the delivery of money does not amount to a “transaction.” Rather, the court finds that though the delivery amounts to a transaction, it was not shown to have been designed to conceal or disguise the nature, the location, the source, the ownership, or the control of the proceeds. This is a required element of money laundering. The purpose of the money laundering laws is to prohibit efforts to legitimize the proceeds – something which Dimeck did not do in this case.

United States v. Garcia-Emanuel, 14 F.3d 1469 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant converted substantial proceeds which he acquired in the drug trade into cashier’s checks (in his own name) and then bought horses, land and companies. The property was either listed in his name or was conspicuously owned by him. This does not constitute §1956 money laundering. The defendant clearly was not endeavoring to conceal his assets. Spending money does not constitute money laundering.

United States v. Johnson, 971 F.2d 562 (10th Cir. 1992)

The defendant received wire transfers from his fraud victims. This is not §1957 money laundering. The receipt of the fraudulently obtained money does not constitute engaging in a transaction with the proceeds of specified criminal activity. The funds could not be characterized as criminally derived until the fraud was completed, which had not occurred when the victims sent the defendant the money. When the money was taken out of the defendant’s account, however, that was a transaction with criminally derived property. Also, had the money been given to the defendant and then he deposited the funds into his account, this would be an outlawed transaction. The fact that the funds were wired from the victim straight into the defendant’s account, however, spoiled the conviction in this case.

United States v. Lovett, 964 F.2d 1029 (10th Cir. 1992)

The defendant withdrew several hundred thousand dollars from his grandmother’s various accounts, while purporting to take care of her. His purchase of a car and a ring with that money, however, could not support a money laundering charge. There was no effort to conceal the source or identity of this money in these transactions.

United States v. Sanders, 928 F.2d 940 (10th Cir. 1991)

Under §1956(a)(1)(B)(i), a person who merely spends money which is derived from an illicit source is not guilty of money laundering unless the defendant intended to conceal the nature or source of the funds. The transactions in this case involved the purchase of two expensive cars by the defendant, knowing the funds used to make the purchases was derived from a drug transaction. However, no steps were taken to conceal the identity of the purchaser, no steps were taken to hide the purchase price and the defendant drove the car conspicuously. The proof failed to establish that the defendant engaged in a financial transaction with the prohibited intent and the conviction was reversed.
United States v. Christo, 129 F.3d 578 (11th Cir. 1997)

The defendant participated in a check-kiting scheme. The act of withdrawing the funds from the bank was the conduct that satisfied the elements of the bank fraud and misapplication of bank fund offenses. Those same transactions could not qualify as money laundering because the money was not tainted until the transaction was completed.

United States v. Kramer, 73 F.3d 1067 (11th Cir. 1996)

In order to be guilty of money laundering under 18 U.S.C. §1956(a)(2), the funds must be transported from a place in the United States to or through a place outside the United States. The transfer of funds between two foreign countries does not suffice.

United States v. Jenkins, 58 F.3d 611 (11th Cir. 1995)

18 U.S.C. §1957 outlaws engaging in a transaction with more than $10,000 derived from specified unlawful activity. It is not clear whether the law applies only to single transactions involving more than $10,000, or if a series of transactions which total more than $10,000 would also be illegal. Applying the rule of lenity, the court concludes that only single transactions involving more than $10,000 are covered by the law.

United States v. Newton, 44 F.3d 913 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant rented an apartment for the leader of a drug conspiracy so that the leader could have a place for his girlfriend to live. There was no evidence that the defendant used (or knowingly used) tainted funds to make any of the rent payments, or that the apartment was used to facilitate the drug conspiracy in any way. This evidence did not support a money laundering conviction or a conviction for aiding and abetting the drug conspiracy.

United States v. Awan, 966 F.2d 1415 (11th Cir. 1992)

Defendant, a banker, was charged with conspiring to launder money. The evidence upon which the government relied in establishing his knowledge that the funds were derived from unlawful activity included: (1) the lead defendant suggested that the undercover agent utilize the bank where the defendant worked – but this established nothing, since the defendant himself was not mentioned; (2) another agent talked to the defendant about other people involved in cocaine sales – but again, there was no specific statement that the agent’s funds were actually derived from cocaine; (3) the defendant participated in the transfer of drug proceeds – the problem with this argument is that this does not establish that the defendant knew that the funds represented drug proceeds. On this evidence, the defendant could not be found guilty of conspiring to launder money in violation of 18 U.S.C. §1956. The court also rejects several challenges to the constitutionality of the Money Laundering Control Act of 1986.
MURDER IN AID OF RACKETEERING

SEE: RICO
MURDER / MANSLAUGHTER

United States v. Williams, 836 F.3d 1 (D.C. Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with second degree murder for his role in a “hazing” incident involving another soldier on a military base. The hazing involved several soldiers beating another soldier (with his consent) for a few minutes. The incident resulted in the death of the hazee. The defendant argued that the victim’s consent was relevant to the defendant’s state of mind. Second degree murder requires the government to prove malice and malice can be proven by showing that a defendant intended to kill or, as the government argued here, that he consciously disregarded an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury. While it is true that the defendant cannot “blame the victim,” the defense is still entitled to offer evidence that negates his culpable state of mind. The defense counsel argued that the victims’ consent to being hazed was relevant to the determination whether the defendant acted with malice. In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jury that that was entirely erroneous and that the victim’s consent was not relevant to any issue in the case. After closing argument, the judge declined to issue an instruction that explained that the victim’s consent could be relevant to the issue of malice. The D.C. Circuit reversed the conviction. The victim’s consenting behavior—that is, his “continued, and enthusiastic, statements that he wanted the initiation to continue”—suggested that Williams was not conscious of an extreme risk that Johnson might die or be seriously injured.

United States v. Garcia, 729 F.3d 1171 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with murder and involuntary manslaughter as a result of his killing a person with whom he was fighting. He claimed the shooting was an accident. He was convicted of involuntary manslaughter and acquitted of murder. The instruction on the law of involuntary manslaughter failed to explain that the defendant must have acted with gross negligence and allowed the jury to convict the defendant based only on a finding that the defendant committed “an unlawful act” that resulted in the death of the victim.

United States v. Pineda-Doval, 614 F.3d 1019 (9th Cir. 2010)

This case involves a charge of smuggling illegal aliens resulting in death. The question presented to the Ninth Circuit is whether the defendant’s offense “caused” the death of the aliens. The aliens were in the van which the police were chasing. The police placed “spike strips” on the road as part of the pursuit and this resulted in the van crashing, killing numerous illegal aliens in the vehicle. The Ninth Circuit held that excluding evidence of the policies that governed the use of spike strips was error, because the question of proximate cause was hotly disputed. Harmless error.
MURDER FOR HIRE

United States v. Chong, 419 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2005)
There was insufficient evidence that the “hitmen” were offered anything of value in exchange for attempting to kill the victim. The hitmen were members of a gang and the defendant was the leader. There was no evidence that the hitmen were offered any quid pro quo for killing the victim.

United States v. Frampton, 382 F.3d 213 (2d Cir. 2004)
The hit man shot the victim in exchange for “a favor in the future” from the person who hired him to kill the victim. This “favor in the future” was never identified. The Second Circuit affirmed the district court which granted a judgment of acquittal on the murder for hire prosecution. In order to be prosecuted under § 1958, the murder must be in exchange for “anything of pecuniary value.” A favor in the future does not qualify.

United States v. Hernandez, 141 F.3d 1042 (11th Cir. 1998)
To be guilty of conspiring to commit murder-for-hire the government must show an agreement by two or more persons to achieve the unlawful purpose of murder-for-hire, the defendant’s knowing and voluntary participation in the agreement, and an overt act committed by any one of the conspirators in furtherance of the conspiratorial objective. In this case, the court found insufficient evidence, where the defendant was present when other family members discussed a murder-for-hire, but he did not participate in the discussion or participate in the actual homicide.

United States v. Delpit, 94 F.3d 1134 (8th Cir. 1996)
The elements of the murder for hire statute, 18 U.S.C. §1958, as applied in this case, are that the defendant caused another to travel in interstate commerce, intending that a murder be committed in violation of state law, and that the murder was to be committed for hire. Here, one of the defendants joined the murder plot after the “hit man” had already traveled in interstate commerce. Thus, the crime of murder for hire had already been accomplished. While the defendant was guilty of participating in a state law murder, she was not guilty of participating in the federal offense. She could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the crime, because the crime was completed – the hit man had already traveled in interstate commerce – before she became involved. The same rule applied to bar a conspiracy conviction.

United States v. Wicklund, 114 F.3d 151 (10th Cir. 1997)
The defendant asked a friend to kill the ex-spouse of his wife, but never had any agreement that he would pay his friend for doing so. The defendant, himself, also was not being paid to do so (for example, by his new wife). This evidence was insufficient to support a murder-for-hire conviction under 18 U.S.C. §1958. There must be some “contracted-for” pecuniary gain associated with the plan to murder the victim. It is not enough that there may be some pecuniary gain associated with the death of the victim (such as a termination of the surviving spouse’s obligation to pay child support).
Defendant’s motion for judgment of acquittal on all counts of this murder for hire prosecution was granted. Though there was evidence of defendant’s participation in the murder of his wife, there was insufficient evidence that the particular phone calls set forth in the separate counts of the indictment were related to the murder for hire scheme. The district court declined to decide whether the phone call must “facilitate” the murder or just “relate to” the murder. On either standard, the government’s proof was insufficient.
NEW TRIAL / NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE

_Eberhart v. United States_, 126 S.Ct. 403 (2005)

The seven-day deadline for filing a motion for new trial pursuant to Rule 33 is not jurisdictional. If the defendant is tardy (or files a timely initial motion with some claims, but adds more claims after the seven-day period) and the government does not object, focusing instead on the merits, the motion may be considered by the court.

_United States v. Knight_, 800 F.3d 491 (8th Cir. 2015)

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial in this case. The defendant, an attorney, was convicted of bankruptcy fraud and related offenses in connection with his representation of a real estate client. The government’s theory of the fraudulent conduct of the attorney was vague and authorized the trial court to grant a new trial based on the weakness of the case, even though there was sufficient evidence to support a conviction.

_United States v. Moore_, 709 F.3d 287 (4th Cir. 2013)

After trial, the defense learned that a photograph of the person that the defendant claimed was the actual perpetrator was taken at a different time than what was described by the government. The actual date that the photograph of the other person was taken showed that he did, in fact, look like the person who the victim described as his assailant. A new trial, based on newly discovered evidence, should have been granted by the trial court.

_United States v. Piazza_, 647 F.3d 559 (5th Cir. 2011)

The trial court acted within its discretion in granting the defendant’s motion for new trial based on the discovery of newly discovered evidence. The evidence was unknown to the defense; the failure to discover the evidence earlier was not due to a lack of diligence; the evidence was not merely cumulative or impeaching; and the evidence was material and would probably produce an acquittal.

_United States v. Banks_, 546 F.3d 507 (7th Cir. 2008)

A crime lab expert testified at trial about the nature of the substance tested, as well as its weight. Unbeknownst to the prosecutor and the defendant (but known to the DEA), the expert was under investigation by the DEA for misuse of a government credit card. At the point she testified, she did not know the outcome of this investigation. Shortly thereafter, she received an informal reprimand. When the defendant learned about this after trial, he moved for a new trial and the trial court granted the motion. The Seventh Circuit affirmed, holding that the district judge was within the bounds of his discretion in granting the new trial based on this _Brady_ violation.

_United States v. Velarde_, 485 F.3d 553 (10th Cir. 2007)

Post-trial, in preparation for a new trial motion, the trial court should have empowered the defendant to subpoena records relating to the government’s chief witness, whose prior inconsistent statements (or prior false accusations directed at others) were not disclosed to the defense prior to trial.
United States v. Hernandez-Rodriguez, 443 F.3d 138 (1st Cir. 2006)

The trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant a new trial. The defendant’s co-defendant provided an affidavit that exculpated the defendant with evidence that was not available to the defendant at trial. The affidavit was more than a simple denial of the defendant’s participation. Even viewed, as the court requires, with “great skepticism” this affidavit meaningfully demonstrated that the defendant was wrongfully convicted.

United States v. Robinson, 430 F.3d 537 (2d Cir. 2005)

The trial court granted a new trial motion, concerned about the reliability of the evidence that linked the defendant to the murder. The court concluded that judicial intervention was necessary to prevent a manifest injustice.

United States v. Hernandez, 433 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 2005)

The difference between granting a post-trial judgment of acquittal (Rule 29) and a post-trial new trial (Rule 33) is this: On a motion for new trial based on the weight of the evidence, the court need not view the evidence in a light most favorable to the verdict and may weigh the evidence and consider the credibility of the witnesses. If the court determines (despite the abstract sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict) that the evidence preponderates sufficiently heavily against the verdict that a serious miscarriage of justice may have occurred, it may set aside the verdict, grant a new trial and submit the issues for determination by a new jury.

United States v. Tarango, 396 F.3d 666 (5th Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s co-defendant was a fugitive and was tried in absentia, but the defendant had to endure a joint trial with the fugitive. The vast majority of the evidence focused on the absent co-defendant. The defendant was prejudiced by this joinder and the trial court correctly granted a Rule 33 Motion for New Trial.

United States v. Scroggins, 379 F.3d 233 (5th Cir. 2004)

A trial court may order a new trial pursuant to Rule 33, even if there had been no specific trial error. In order to avoid a miscarriage of justice a new trial may be ordered if, for example, critical defense witnesses did not appear in response to a subpoena.

United States v. Wilkins, 139 F.3d 603 (8th Cir. 1998)

After the government rested its case-in-chief, the trial court granted a judgment of acquittal on several counts. Thereafter, the jury acquitted the defendant on some counts and convicted him on one count. The trial court granted defendant's Motion for New Trial, on the grounds that the spillover effect of the evidence heard on the counts that the judge threw out prejudiced the defendant on the remaining count. The Court of Appeals concluded that this was not an abuse of discretion.

United States v. Montilla-Rivera, 115 F.3d 1060 (1st Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with two others in connection with a drug transaction. The other two pled guilty and were awaiting sentencing. At defendant’s trial, he contended that he was just an innocent bystander, but when he called the other two defendants to testify on his behalf, they indicated their intention of pleading the Fifth. After the defendant was convicted, he obtained an affidavit from both of the co-defendants who averred that the defendant had nothing to do with the drug transaction. This evidence justified conducting a full hearing on the new trial motion. This evidence was unavailable at the first trial, so it satisfied the requirements of Rule 33 that was newly discovered. The court notes, however, that this is a minority view not accepted by most other Circuits.

United States v. Graciani, 61 F.3d 70 (1st Cir. 1995)

Even if a case is on direct appeal, the defendant should file his motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence in the district court. The district court may deny the motion, or may indicate to the appellate court its intention to grant the motion, in which case the appellate court should remand the case to the district court.

United States v. Reyes, 49 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 1995)

The two-year time limit for filing a motion for new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence commences the date the appellate court issues its mandate affirming the conviction.

Sanders v. Sullivan, 863 F.2d 218 (2d Cir. 1988)

The Second Circuit concludes that if a material witness recants his testimony, the due process clause requires a new trial if the recantation is credible and the perjured testimony is highly material. It is not necessary to show that the prosecutor was aware of the witness’s perjury. The Second Circuit revisited this decision at 900 F.2d 601 (2d Cir. 1990) and again offered relief to the defendant.

United States v. Ouimette, 798 F.2d 47 (2d Cir. 1986)

A favorable witness in this prosecution was dissuaded from testifying by the police. Although the defendant had interviewed this witness prior to trial, the police conduct in dissuading the witness occurred after that interview. Consequently, the newly discovered evidence could not have been discovered prior to trial and the defendant was entitled to a hearing on his motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence.

United States v. Biberfeld, 957 F.2d 98 (3rd Cir. 1992)

If the prosecutor has access to information which would reveal that a prosecution witness has committed perjury, a §2255 hearing is necessary to determine what relief is appropriate. The fact that the defendant knew that the witness was lying at trial does not amount to a waiver of this collateral attack. The key to the waiver issue is whether the defendant is aware that the prosecutor has the information in his possession which establishes that the witness is committing perjury.

United States v. Robertson, 110 F.3d 1113 (5th Cir. 1997)

In deciding whether to grant a new trial pursuant to Rule 33, the trial judge may weigh the evidence and may assess the credibility of the witnesses. In this case, the trial judge acted within his discretion in deciding to grant a new trial in light of the ambiguous evidence establishing his guilt of being a member of a drug conspiracy.

United States v. Garland, 991 F.2d 328 (6th Cir. 1993)

The defendant borrowed $75,000 for the claimed purpose of investing in a 5,000-ton cocoa bean purchase from Ghana. When the beans did not materialize, the defendant was prosecuted for transporting the $75,000 that was fraudulently obtained. The defendant testified at trial that he had been defrauded by the Ghana coca bean dealers and that he, too, was a victim.
and he did not knowingly obtain the money by fraud. After the defendant was convicted, the two cocoa bean dealers in Ghana were found by the Ghana court to have defrauded the defendant. This was grounds for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence. The Ghana judgment would have been admissible in court and surely may have altered the outcome of the defendant’s case. Also, a witness who had been out of the country at the time of the trial and who had had no contact with the defendant or his attorney at trial, had been found and he would testify that he played an instrumental role in setting up the coca purchase in Ghana. His testimony, too, was newly discovered evidence warranting a new trial.

United States v. Young, 17 F.3d 1201 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was arrested at a house where a methamphetamine lab was located. Other than his presence at the scene, the strongest evidence linking him to the crime was the discovery of notebooks in his truck with directions how to set up a lab. At trial, he explained that a resident of the house had thrown the books into the back of the truck. A law enforcement officer, however, testified that the notebooks were found by another officer taped underneath the dashboard. After the defendant was convicted, the officer who discovered the notebooks heard about this testimony and revealed that the notebooks were actually found in the back of the pickup and claimed that she told the AUSA this during the trial, before the other officer testified. Regardless of whether the AUSA purposefully introduced perjured testimony, or did so in good faith, a new trial was required. If the use of the perjured testimony was knowing, then the conviction must be set aside if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury. If the government unwittingly presents false evidence, a defendant is entitled to a new trial if there is a reasonable probability that without the evidence the result of the proceeding would have been different.

United States v. Culliver, 17 F.3d 349 (11th Cir. 1994)

After the defendant was convicted of possessing a firearm as a convicted felon, a key government witness recanted his trial testimony, indicating that the gun belonged to him. The trial court properly set the matter down for an evidentiary hearing to inquire into the basis of the recanting witness’s testimony.

United States v. Vicaria, 12 F.3d 195 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant requested a theory of the defense instruction at trial, which the trial court refused to give. After the defendant was convicted, the trial court granted a new trial under Rule 33, holding that it would have been better to give the defendant’s theory of the defense instruction. Though the trial court did not err in refusing to give the instruction, it was within the trial court’s discretion to give the instruction and it was thus within the trial court’s discretion to grant a new trial.

United States v. Gates, 10 F.3d 765 (11th Cir. 1993)

Six months after the defendant was convicted of armed bank robbery, a co-defendant offered an affidavit that the defendant was not guilty. This affidavit was sufficient to require a hearing to determine whether there was any merit to the motion.

United States v. Dayton, 981 F.2d 1200 (11th Cir. 1993)

In order to move for a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence, the motion must be filed within two years of the final judgment. The two year period is measured from the date the court of appeals issues the mandate, not the date the trial court enters judgment.
The defendant was entitled to a new trial based on the newly discovered evidence of prior instances of perjury committed by the informant, as well as conflicting evidence offered by the government agent. Pursuant to Rule 33, this evidence of the witness’ perjury was more than “merely impeaching” and called into question the integrity of the verdict. The court cited United States v. Stofsky, 527 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1975) and United States v. Taglia, 922 F.2d 413 (7th Cir. 1991).
OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE

The Supreme Court reversed the accounting firm’s obstruction of justice conviction for two reasons: First, the instructions to the jury failed to adequately explain the knowledge requirement. Second, there was an erroneous instruction regarding the relationship between the destruction of evidence and the defendant’s knowledge of a pending, or any particular, proceeding. The mens rea element of § 1512(b)(2)(A) requires that the defendant knowingly corruptly destroy evidence (or persuade another to destroy evidence) to be used in an official proceeding. The Supreme Court held that the “knowingly corruptly” element requires proof that the defendant have consciousness of wrongdoing. It is not enough that he destroys, or persuades another to destroy, evidence. The Court noted that destroying or withholding evidence may be done lawfully (for example, a parent may tell a child not to answer questions; or a lawyer may encourage a client to plead the Fifth Amendment; or a wife may insist that a husband respect the marital privilege). The instructions in the trial court suggested that a person could be guilty of § 1512 even if he (or the corporation) honestly believed impeding the investigation would occur, but that the conduct was lawful (i.e., the corporation believed that compliance with the document retention/destruction policy was lawful, even if it had the effect of impeding the government’s investigation). This instruction was erroneous. In order to act “knowingly corruptly” the defendant must be aware that what he is doing is illegal. Second, with regard to the nexus requirement, though the statute does not require proof of a specific pending proceeding, the government is required to prove that the defendant engaged in the prohibited conduct with the intention of impeding a proceeding in which the documents would be material. See also United States v. Aguilar, 515 U.S. 593 (1995).

Uttering false statements to an investigating agent who might or might not testify before a grand jury is not sufficient to make out a violation of §1503. Making a false statement to an investigating officer is not a §1503 violation merely because the agent may relate this information to the grand jury. Such statements cannot be said to have the natural and probable effect of interfering with the due administration of justice.

Fowler v. United States, 131 S. Ct. 2045 (2011)

18 U.S.C. § 1512(a)(1)(C) makes it a federal crime to kill someone to prevent that person from communicating information about a crime to federal law enforcement. In this Supreme Court case, the Court held that the government must prove a “reasonable likelihood” that the person killed would have communicated something about the crime to federal law enforcement. It is not necessary that the defendant be aware of the likelihood of a report being made to a federal official, but the government must prove that it is reasonable likely.

Employing numerous rules of statutory construction, the Court concluded that the term “tangible object” in 18 U.S.C. § 1519 refers only to tangible objects that record or preserve information (such as hard drives and flash drives). It does not apply to tangible objects that do not record or preserve information (such as under-size fish, as in this case), that are concealed or destroyed, in order to prevent law enforcement from investigating a crime.

_Lobbins v. United States_, 900 F.3d 799 (6th Cir. 2018)

Two sections of § 1512 apply to witness tampering: § 1512(a)(1)(C) applies to killing or attempting to kill a witness and § 1512 (a)(2)(C) applies to the use of physical force to prevent a witness from communicating with federal law enforcement. In _Fowler_, discussed above, the Court held that the government must prove in a § 1512(a)(1)(C) case a “reasonable likelihood” that the witness was communicated with federal law enforcement. In this case, the Sixth Circuit holds that the same proof is required in a § 1512 (a)(2)(C) case: the government must prove a reasonable likelihood that the witness against whom the defendant used physical force would have communicated with federal law enforcement about a federal offense. Trial counsel’s failure to object to a jury instruction that incorrectly explained this element of the offense was ineffective assistance of counsel requiring that this conviction be set aside.

_United States v. Acevedo_, 882 F.3d 251 (1st Cir. 2018)

The defendant, a lawyer, visited a co-defendant who was represented by counsel in a jail and encouraged him to lie (and exculpate the defendant’s/lawyer’s client). At trial, the court instructed the jury on Rule 4.2 of the Cannons of Professional Conduct, which dictates that a lawyer may not communicate with a represented party about a subject matter of the other client’s representation. The trial court instructed the jury on this Rule. The First Circuit held that this was not error. The Rules of Professional Conduct may be considered as some evidence of the defendant’s _mens rea_, or corrupt intent, though a violation of such a rule is not sufficient to convict a defendant of obstruction of justice.

_United States v. Johnson_, 874 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant a guard at a county jail, struck an inmate and later falsified a report. He was prosecuted for obstruction of justice based on § 1512(b)(3). The government was required to prove that it was “reasonably likely” that the false report would reach a federal officer. (See _Fowler_, above). The government failed to prove that in this case.

_United States v. Edwards_, 869 F.3d 490 (7th Cir. 2017)

Omitting term “corruptly” when defining the elements of a § 1512(b)(3) offense was reversible error. The Seventh Circuit also noted the divergent opinions about what exactly the _mens rea_ is for a § 1512(b)(3) offense: whether the defendant must specifically intent to impair a criminal investigation or if it is sufficient to intend to violate the law. But in either event, the lack of any _mens rea_ in the instruction in this case was reversible error.

_United States v. Snyder_, 865 F.3d 490 (7th Cir. 2017)

As noted above in _Fowler_, in a federal witness murder case, the government must prove a “reasonable likelihood” that the person killed would have communicated something about a crime to federal law enforcement had she not been killed. In this case, the defendant fled from a convenience store robbery and later killed his getaway driver because he suspected she would snitch. The Seventh Circuit held that the defendant could not be prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. §1512(a)(1), because it was unlikely that this convenience store robbery would have been investigated or prosecuted by the feds, so it was not likely that the victim would have ever been a witness in a federal case. This case became a federal case because she was killed and otherwise would have been a state prosecution.

United States v. Liew, 856 F.3d 585 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with various offenses, including obstruction of justice, based on his “general denial” of certain allegations in a related civil lawsuit. While an express false statement in a civil case may constitute obstruction of justice pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 1512(c), a general denial of liability does not amount to obstruction of justice. A separate count of the indictment alleged a violation of §1512(b)(1) based on the defendant’s statement to a colleague “not to mention” anything about a former employee at the victim’s business, because doing so would not be good for the colleague or the colleague’s family. The Ninth Circuit held that this statement “keep your mouth shut” does not, alone, amount to improper coercion and the “would not be good for you or your family” was not an express threat of harm. Rather, it was not unlike what an attorney tells a client: “Keep your mouth shut or it won’t be good for you or your family.”

United States v. Natal, 849 F.3d 530 (2d Cir. 2017)

Based on the decision in Yates, the Second Circuit reversed the conviction of the defendant who was convicted under § 1519 of obstructing justice by altering his vehicle (painting it) to obstruct the government’s investigation. A blue car was seen leaving the scene of a crime. The defendant painted his car black after the crime was committed.

United States v. McRae, 795 F.3d 471 (5th Cir. 2015)

The defendant, a police officer during the Hurrican Katrina disaster, was aware that his colleague had fatally shot a citizen and left the citizen in a car. The defendant burned the car to hide the evidence. He was prosecuted for a § 1519 violation. Based on Yates, the Fifth Circuit reversed: neither the car, nor the body, constituted a “record” under the Yates standard.

United States v. Bonds, 784 F.3d 582 (9th Cir. 2015)

In this en banc review of the conviction of Barry Bonds for obstruction of justice, in a brief per curiam opinion, the court holds that the defendant’s unresponsive, rambling answer to the question posed by the prosecutor in the grand jury proceeding was not “material” and did not support a § 1503 conviction for obstructing justice. The question and answer that formed the basis for the § 1503 conviction were as follows:

Q: Did Greg[, your trainer,] ever give you anything that required a syringe to inject yourself with?

A: I've only had one doctor touch me. And that's my only personal doctor. Greg, like I said, we don't get into each others' personal lives. We're friends, but I don't—we don't sit around and talk baseball, because he knows I don't want—don't come to my house talking baseball. If you want to come to my house and talk about fishing, some other stuff, we'll be good friends. You come around talking about baseball, you go on. I don't talk about his business. You know what I mean?

Q: Right.
A: That's what keeps our friendship. You know, I am sorry, but that—you know, that—I was a celebrity child, not just in baseball by my own instincts. I became a celebrity child with a famous father. I just don't get into other people's business because of my father's situation, you see.

In concurring opinions, the judges relied on a number of reasons to reverse the conviction, including lack of materiality, failure to “pin the witness down” as required for a perjury prosecution (Bronston v. United States, 409 U.S. 352 (1973)), and the fact that the answer, though unresponsive, was true. In one of the concurring opinions, the judges observed that evasive, but truthful answers cannot constitute obstruction:

The government also contended that the statute criminalizes a truthful but intentionally evasive or misleading answer during appellate oral argument:

Q: I think it's a common experience among all of us on the appellate court to ask of the lawyer in front of us in a criminal case that's come up on appeal: “Counsel, could you please explain to me what happened at trial?” and for the lawyer arguing from the U.S. Attorney's Office to say, “Your Honor, I was not the trial attorney.” Now, sometimes that's an evasive answer. They may well know the answer, but it's true that they weren't the trial attorney.... Has the lawyer just committed a crime? ... [T]he answer that I just hypothesized was designed to put me off the track.... A truthful but evasive answer....

A: I think that would be obstructive, Your Honor.

When asked how many San Francisco lawyers it planned to throw in jail, the government declined to specify.

United States v. Petruk, 781 F.3d 438 (8th Cir. 2015)

In order violate 18 U.S.C. § 1512(c)(2), the defendant must obstruct justice and know of, or foresee, a particular proceeding that qualifies as an “official proceeding” as defined in section 1515. It is not necessary that the defendant know that the proceeding that he foresaw is a federal proceeding, but the proceeding that he foresaw must, in fact, be a federal proceeding. In this case, the defendant was only contemplating a pending state prosecution, so his conviction was reversed. The court relied on similar rulings in Aguilar and Arthur Andersen, both of which applied the same mens rea requirement for other obstruction statutes.

United States v. Katakis, 800 F.3d 1017 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with bid-rigging and obstruction of justice. The defendant received a notice from his bank that a subpoena had been received from federal investigators. The defendant then purchased a “scrubber” that was designed to erase deleted items from his computer (erasing previously deleted items that were then located in free space). The FBI later seized three computers from the office. On the computer seized from his partner were ten emails written by, or to, the defendant that implicated him in the bid-rigging conspiracy. On the office computer and on the defendant’s computer, however, there was no evidence of any of these ten emails. On the basis of this evidence, the defendant was charged and convicted of obstruction of justice (§ 1519) for destroying the emails. The district court granted a judgment of acquittal and the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The evidence may have been sufficient to convict the defendant of attempted obstruction (a crime with which he was not charged), but the evidence presented at trial was insufficient to prove that his actions actually resulted in the elimination of the emails. from the other two computers. One theory advanced by the government, that hitting the “delete” key one time, thus moving emails from the inbox to the deleted box is sufficient to prove “concealment” under § 1519, was rejected by the Ninth Circuit. Simply moving an item of evidence from one location to another does not qualify as “concealment” under § 1519. The deleted file folder is not like a trashcan that eventually results in the destruction of anything that is thrown out, because the deleted file folder’s contents remain in existence. Thus, hitting the delete button just one time is no different than moving an item of evidence from one location to another.

United States v. Miner, 774 F.3d 336 (6th Cir. 2014)

In order to convict a defendant of obstructing or impeding the due administration of federal tax laws (26 U.S.C. § 7212), the government must prove that the defendant was aware of and tried to thwart a pending IRS action and not simply routine administrative procedures such as those required to accept and process tax filings in the ordinary course. The court noted that § 7212’s language is identical to 18 U.S.C. § 1503, and the construction of § 1503 in United States v. Aguilar, 515 U.S. 593 (1995), requires an awareness of the proceeding that the defendant is allegedly endeavoring to obstruct.

United States v. Tyler, 732 F.3d 241 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The defendant was convicted for obstruction of justice under § 1512 prior to the decision in Arthur Andersen. In this, his second habeas corpus petition, he claimed that he could bring this petition because under the standards announced in both Arthur Andersen and Fowler, he was actually innocent because he was not shown to have been aware of the pendency of a federal proceeding and he was not shown to have reasonably known that the informant/victim was likely to report his crimes to a federal law enforcement officer. See United States v. Shavers, discussed below.

United States v. Ermoian, 752 F.3d 1165 (9th Cir. 2013)

It is not a violation of § 1512(c)(2) for someone to tip off others of the pendency of an undercover FBI operation, because an investigation by the FBI is not an “official proceeding” as defined in § 1515(a)(1). Section 1512(c)(2) makes it a crime to “corruptly obstruct, influence, or impede any official proceeding.” Section 1515(a) defines “official proceeding” as including (among other things) “a proceeding before a Federal Government agency which is authorized by law.” The Ninth Circuit held that an investigation is not a proceeding.

In re Kendall, 712 F.3d 814 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The state appellate court held a lower court judge in contempt on the basis of what the judge wrote in an order that criticized the appellate court’s granting a writ of mandamus against him. The Third Circuit held that the judge’s statements in the order were protected by the First Amendment.

United States v. Shavers, 693 F.3d 363 (3rd Cir. 2012)

In order to prosecute a person under § 1512(b)(1), the prosecution must prove that the defendant contemplated a particular “official proceeding” that was foreseeable when he or she engaged in the proscribed conduct. The government is not required to prove that the defendant knew the proceeding was federal in nature, but it does, in fact, have to be a federal official proceeding. In this case, the Third Circuit held that Fowler does not apply to § 1512(b)(1) cases. Fowler dealt with § 1512(a)(1)(C) and § 1512(b)(3) cases, which relate to investigative-related situations, while § 1512(b)(1) focuses on anticipated testimony in a particular official proceeding. Arthur Andersen’s holding also does not apply to § 1512(b)(3) investigative stage proceedings. A successful prosecution under § 1512(b)(1) requires proof that the defendant contemplated a particular, foreseeable proceeding, and that the contemplated proceeding constituted an “official proceeding.” In this case, the defendants sought to prevent the testimony of particular individuals at a particular state court proceeding. There was no evidence that they contemplated any other proceeding. The convictions were reversed.

United States v. McGarity, 669 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2012)

An indictment charging a defendant with a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1512(c), obstruction of justice, must identify the official proceeding that was the object of the obstruction. Even if the indictment mirrors the elements of the offense in the statute, the indictment must specifically identify the particular proceeding that the government will prove was the object of the obstruction.

United States v. Friske, 640 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2011)

The government failed to prove that the defendant was aware of, or foresaw, an official proceeding that he was obstructing. The defendant had a friend in jail. The friend in jail asked him to go to his house and dig up some money that was buried in the backyard. The defendant was not shown to have had any knowledge that this had any relationship to a forfeiture case. Absent any evidence that the defendant was aware of a forfeiture proceeding, a prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 1512(c)(2) could not be sustained. Though there is no requirement under § 1512(c)(2) that an official proceeding be pending at the time the obstructive conduct occurs, the defendant must be shown to have intended to obstruct a proceeding at some point, even if his conduct was designed to obstruct a future proceeding.

United States v. Doss, 630 F.3d 1181 (9th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with sex trafficking of minors. He urged his wife to assert the marital privilege and on that basis, was charged with obstruction of justice under 18 U.S.C. § 1512. The Ninth Circuit, relying on Arthur Andersen, held that in order to violate § 1512, the defendant must know that what he is doing (in an effort to impede justice) is illegal. Simply encouraging a wife to assert a legitimate privilege does impede the administration of justice, but it is not wrongful and therefore does not violate § 1512.

United States v. Sanchez, 615 F.3d 836 (7th Cir. 2010)

The defendants was convicted (among other offenses) of retaliating against a witness, 18 U.S.C. § 1513(c). The evidence, however, failed to show that the defendant was aware that the victims had testified; the motive for the kidnapping appeared to be to recover money that the victims owed to the defendant’s colleague.

United States v. Phillips, 583 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2009)
Following the logic of United States v. Aguilar, the Tenth Circuit held that 18 U.S.C. § 1512(c)(2), which makes it a crime to obstruct an official proceeding, requires proof of a nexus between a defendant’s conduct and its effect on the proceeding purportedly obstructed. Aguilar held that the same hurdle must be overcome in a § 1503 prosecution.

United States v. Draper, 553 F.3d 174 (2d Cir. 2009)

The federal “witness retaliation” statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1513(b)(2) makes it federal offense to injure, or damage to the property of, a person with intent to retaliate against any person for information given by that person relating to a federal offense to a federal law enforcement officer. (§ 1515(a)(4) defines “a law enforcement officer” as that term is used in § 1513(b)(2) to mean a “federal law enforcement officer”). In this case, the evidence did not prove that the victim was providing information to federal law enforcement officers, as opposed to local police. The trial court’s jury instruction failed to properly define the term “law enforcement officer,” but because the evidence was insufficient to prove this element of the offense, the conviction was reversed and retrial was barred.

United States v. Ramos, 537 F.3d 439 (5th Cir. 2008)

In order to be convicted under § 1512, there must be an “official proceeding.” In this case, the defendants (Border Patrol agents) where charged with obstruction based on their conduct in connection with the Border Patrol internal investigation of the use of a firearm. The Ninth Circuit concludes that the internal investigation relating to the use of a firearm is not an official proceeding under § 1512. “The term ‘official proceeding’ does not aply to routine agency investigations of employee misconduct.”

United States v. Quattrone, 441 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2006)

Based on the decisions in Arthur Andersen and Aguilar the defendant’s § 1503, § 1505 and §1512 convictions in this highly-publicized case were reversed. The defendant was aware that grand jury subpoenas had been issued to his company (Credit Suisse First Boston) and shortly thereafter sent an email to employees reminding them of the document retention policy (i.e., instructed them to shred old documents). The Second Circuit reviewed both Aguilar and Arthur Andersen: A conviction requires proof that the defendant’s conduct was sufficiently connected to the pending investigation that it had the potential to obstruct the investigation. And the defendant must be shown to have known that the documents he intended to be destroyed were those that were sought by the grand jury. The trial court’s instruction in this case mistakenly failed to explain that the defendant must be aware of the relationship between the documents destroyed and the scope of the subpoena.

United States v. Plavcak, 411 F.3d 655 (6th Cir. 2005)

It is a federal crime to destroy evidence that is subject to seizure. 18 U.S.C. § 2232. In order to prosecute a person for committing the offense, the government must prove that there was either a valid warrant authorizing the seizure of the evidence, or an applicable warrant exception that would have resulted in the seizure of the evidence.

United States v. Murphy, 406 F.3d 857 (7th Cir. 2005)
Two defendants were charged with threatening and beating up a government witness. Both defendants participated in the beating. However, one of the defendants was not shown to have known that the victim was being beaten because she was a witness. While she was guilty of assaulting the victim, she was not guilty of obstructing justice because of the absence of proof that she knew the reason for the assault.

The defendants were charged with a conspiracy to obstruct justice (§ 1503) by agreeing, after committing a murder, that they “wouldn’t tell nobody who did nothing” – i.e., to lie to investigators. The federal grand jury that actually investigated the murder was not convened until six years after the murder. In fact, it could hardly have been envisioned at the time of the murder that this would become a federal investigation, as opposed to a state murder investigation. Moreover, statements that they later made to their relatives (which were not true) could not reasonably have been envisioned to be passed on to the grand jury.

United States v. Lopez, 372 F.3d 86 (2d Cir. 2004)

18 U.S.C. § 1512(a)(1)(C) makes it a federal crime to commit a murder to prevent communications to a federal official about a federal crime. In this case, the Second Circuit held that the government must show more than the “possibility” that the decedent would report a crime to federal authorities. The court held that the government must prove that the decedent was aware of a federal crime that had been committed and that some other evidence established that the decedent was going to be a witness. In this case, the only evidence offered by the government was the fact that a crime had been committed that violated both federal and state law and the decedent had previously reported his knowledge of crimes to state authorities. This was insufficient to prove a federal offense under § 1512(a)(1)(C). Need to re-examine this holding in light of Fowler, noted above.

United States v. Cooper, 121 F.3d 130 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The defendant sold a bag of what was claimed to be cocaine to an informant on one occasion. The substance turned out to be procaine, which is not a controlled substance. The defendant and the informant then planned another transaction, but the defendant detected the surveillance and aborted the transaction. He then threatened the informant and was charged with tampering with a witness. To be guilty of that offense, the underlying crime must be a federal offense. No such federal offense existed in this case. The defendant was not guilty of attempted sale of cocaine, because he knew the substance he was selling was not a controlled substance and therefore he did not "attempt" to commit that crime.

United States v. Lowery, 135 F.3d 957 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with obstruction of justice in connection with his actions relating to the tax evasion trial of one of his employees (who was also his girlfriend). He claimed that his conduct was directly related to his efforts to prevent the IRS from pressuring witnesses to testify falsely in that trial. During the course of his obstruction trial, the trial court barred him from introducing evidence about the outcome of the girlfriend's trial (the trial court set aside the conviction) and other evidence relating to that prosecution. This was reversible error. A criminal defendant is entitled to present his theory of defense, and barring him from doing so denied him a fair trial.

United States v. Cintolo, 818 F.2d 980 (1st Cir. 1987)

A lawyer was convicted of obstruction of justice in connection with his representation of a witness before the grand jury. The lawyer also represented the target of the grand jury and unbeknownst to the witness was taking directions from the target and giving advice to the witness which was solely for the benefit of the target and not in the best interests of the witness. Among other things, the lawyer advised the witness to not testify despite a grant of immunity and to take the 18-month contempt time rather than provide the testimony against the target. The lawyer was also aware that the target had hired a hit man to kill the witness.

United States v. Masterpol, 940 F.2d 760 (2d Cir. 1991)

The defendant induced witnesses to lie to the district court at his sentencing. This is not a §1503 violation. Such conduct may only be prosecuted under §1512. The defendant was also prosecuted for a §1001 violation for submitting a false letter of recommendation to the sentencing judge. This, too, was not the proper charge: the false statement statute does not cover false statements made to a court in its adjudicative capacity.

United States v. Coiro, 922 F.2d 1008 (2d Cir. 1991)

The defendant coached several witnesses, during one meeting, to falsify testimony. This only constitutes one offense of obstruction of justice.

United States v. Farrell, 126 F.3d 484 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The defendant urged a co-conspirator not to reveal to the FBI his knowledge of the crime. This evidence, alone, does not amount to a violation of 18 U.S.C. §1512(b) which requires proof that the defendant “corruptly” persuade another person to hinder or prevent the communication to a law enforcement officer information relating to the commission of a federal offense.

United States v. Nelson, 852 F.2d 706 (3rd Cir. 1988)

A prosecutor issued subpoenas in connection with a grand jury investigation. The defendant allegedly mounted a “cover-up” effort after the issuance of the grand jury subpoenas. During trial, the defense sought to cross-examine the United States Attorney regarding his intentions in securing the subpoenas, especially with regard to whether there was, in fact, a “pending grand jury investigation.” The restrictions on the defendant’s cross-examination of the United States Attorney required reversal of the conviction. The mere existence of a sitting grand jury does not necessarily determine when an investigation begins; the critical issue is whether the government had the requisite intention to present the evidence to the grand jury at the time the subpoena was requested.

United States v. Littleton, 76 F.3d 614 (4th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was the mother of a young man who was charged with murder. The defendant testified at a suppression hearing for her son and explained that she went to the police station when her son was arrested; and also testified about a conversation she had with investigators several days later at her house. The government claimed she lied about these matters and prosecuted her for perjury and obstruction of justice. The Fourth Circuit reversed both convictions on the grounds that her statements, even if false, were not material to the suppression hearing at which she testified. With regard to the obstruction count, there was no showing that the defendant intended to obstruct the proceedings involving her son.

United States v. Bashaw, 982 F.2d 168 (6th Cir. 1992)

Following the conviction of a colleague, the defendant allegedly made intimidating remarks to some of the jurors. This does not amount to obstruction of justice, because the remarks could not have had the effect of obstructing justice, because the jurors’ work was done. There was no evidence that the jurors were continuing in their jury service. Had the defendant injured a juror, this would be outlawed by the second clause of §1503; but the “interference with duties” clause, does not cover interference after the jurors’ duties are over.

United States v. Frederick, 835 F.2d 1211 (7th Cir. 1987)

The appropriate venue for prosecuting a defendant for witness tampering is in the district in which the judicial proceeding was affected, not in the place where the witness was assaulted.

United States v. Machi, 811 F.2d 991 (7th Cir. 1987)

Two individuals, one an attorney, the other not, told a convicted drug dealer that if he gave them $50,000, they could get his prison term reduced. Among other things, the drug dealer then dropped his appeal and was lulled into a false sense of security and failed to take any proper steps to appeal his conviction or reduce his term. This constitutes obstruction of justice under §1503. It matters not that the defendants had no intention of actually interfering with the administration of justice; it is enough that they intended to swindle their victim and induce him not to use proper legal channels in his own behalf.

United States v. Kulczyk, 931 F.2d 542 (9th Cir. 1991)

Under the pre-1988 version of 18 U.S.C. §1512, it was a crime to influence or threaten witnesses. Merely urging a witness to lie to investigators and to a jury was not covered by this offense. That is, under that version of the code, suborning perjury was not obstruction of justice. However, §1512 was amended subsequent to the criminal act in this case to include instances in which one “corruptly persuades” a witness to commit perjury.

United States v. Banks, 988 F.2d 1106 (11th Cir. 1993)

On retrial following the prior reversal (See, infra), the trial court instructed the jury that in order to find that the defendant did not obstruct justice by refusing to testify at the grand jury based on his defense of fear of the target, the defendant was required to establish that his fear was genuine and substantiated. This improperly set up a mandatory rebuttable presumption. The government must prove a corrupt motive; the defendant is not required to prove an innocent or non-corrup motive. Also, the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the defendant must have known or should have known, that the failure to testify would be likely as a natural and probable consequence, to obstruct the grand jury’s investigation.

United States v. Banks, 942 F.2d 1576 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was convicted of violating §1503 because of his refusal to testify at the grand jury investigating one of his previous drug suppliers. First, the court concludes that the willful refusal to give testimony to the grand jury may amount to obstruction of justice. However, the conviction in this case had to be reversed because of the trial judge’s refusal to instruct the jury on the law of “fear of reprisal.” The defendant testified that he feared for his safety and the safety of his family if he testified against the supplier. This is a valid defense to obstruction of justice, insofar as it negates the motive element of the offense.
United States v. Thomas, 916 F.2d 647 (11th Cir. 1990)

The evidence was insufficient to sustain the defendant’s conviction for obstruction of justice. The defendant was an attorney, and testified at one of his client’s forfeiture hearings. He was asked at that trial whether he was aware that his client had used aliases. He responded that he did not. “Because proof that the false testimony was of the kind having a probable effect of obstructing justice is critical in distinguishing a Section 1503 offense from mere perjury, the trial court must clearly and explicitly instruct the jury of the necessity of finding this relationship between the statements and obstruction.” The trial court’s instructions were inadequate in this case. There was no instruction that the alleged false testimony must have had a natural and probable effect of obstructing justice. The evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction anyway and thus a new trial was not allowed.
OPENING STATEMENT

United States v. Sloan, 36 F.3d 386 (4th Cir. 1994)
   During his opening statement, the attorney for the defendant described the defendant’s Horatio Alger life. Throughout the course of the trial, moreover, the trial court stated that it based evidentiary rulings on the defendant’s asserted intention to take the stand. At the close of the government’s case, however, the defendant opted not to testify. The trial court declared a mistrial. There was no manifest necessity to do so and a retrial was barred by the double jeopardy clause. With regard to the evidentiary rulings, the record demonstrated that the few times the issue of the defendant’s expected testimony was raised, it was when the district court ruled out certain defense-offered testimony, on the basis that such evidence would have to wait until the defendant testified. With regard to the opening statement, the trial court did not entertain options short of declaring a mistrial. Here, unlike in Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497 (1978), the attorney did not refer to clearly inadmissible evidence. Rather, as in Frazier v. Culp, 394 U.S. 731 (1969), the attorney had a good faith belief in the availability of the evidence which he referred to in the opening statement.

United States v. Murrah, 888 F.2d 24 (5th Cir. 1989)
   During the prosecutor’s opening statement, he alluded to a witness who would testify that the defendant had earlier approached him to torch his business. There was no such witness, or at least the prosecutor never called him to testify, and the comment in opening statement necessitated reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Cardenas Alvarado, 806 F.2d 566 (5th Cir. 1986)
   During the government’s opening statement, the prosecutor made reference to the defendant’s post-arrest silence. This is error. However, in this case, the error was harmless in light of the strong evidence of guilt and lack of any trial testimony concerning the post-arrest silence.

United States v. Shaw, 829 F.2d 714 (9th Cir. 1987)
   During opening statements, the prosecutor stated that as long as the witness was truthful, the prosecutor would present his truthful cooperation to a local prosecutor at the time of sentencing. This constitutes improper vouching for a witness. Implicit in such a comment is the suggestion that a prosecutor has a method of determining whether the testimony of the witness is truthful.

United States v. Novak, 918 F.2d 107 (10th Cir. 1990)
   A mistrial should have been granted after the prosecutor utterly failed to back up his factual statements made during the opening statement about a tip received from an informant and also about the purity of cocaine which had been found at the defendant’s house. The prosecutor should have known that the evidence would not have been admitted because of its hearsay nature and thus the failure to back up this opening statement was grounds for a mistrial.

United States v. Adams, 74 F.3d 1093 (11th Cir. 1996)
During opening statements prosecutors should avoid referring to evidence that is even of questionable admissibility. Here, the prosecutor recited to the jury the statements of a person that implicated the defendants – statements that were not admissible, because they were hearsay. Harmless error.

United States v. Sawyer, 799 F.2d 1494 (11th Cir. 1986)

During opening statements, the prosecutor stated that the defendant had confessed to the crimes charged and that there would be testimony to that effect. In fact, there was no such testimony and none intended. However, there was no objection and the remark did not amount to plain error requiring a reversal.
OPINION TESTIMONY

SEE: EVIDENCE RULE 701
PARALLEL PROCEEDINGS

United States v. Stringer, 535 F.3d 929 (9th Cir. 2008)

Reversing the decision of the district court, the Ninth Circuit held that parallel proceedings by both the SEC and the local United States Attorney’s office did not violate the defendant’s due process rights. The district court stressed the arguably dishonest representations (or omissions) made by SEC lawyers about the status of a criminal case. The Ninth Circuit rejected the lower court’s analysis. This case contains a lengthy discussion of the various rules governing parallel civil and criminal proceedings.

In this district court decision, the judge held that the government could not offer the deposition testimony of the defendant that was taken before the SEC. The SEC lawyer taking the deposition failed to reveal to the defendant that the Department of Justice was coordinating the deposition between the criminal prosecutors and the SEC investigators.
PERJURY

Wilkinson v. Gingrich, 806 F.3d 511 (9th Cir. 2015)

At his speeding trial, the defendant claimed that he was not the driver of the car. That was the only defense and he was found not guilty. Later he was prosecuted for perjury on the basis that he was, in fact, the driver of the car. The collateral estoppel prong of double jeopardy barred this prosecution.

United States v. Hale, 762 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2014)

At the meeting of creditors in a bankruptcy case, the defendant was asked, “To your best knowledge and belief, is the information contained in your petition, statements, schedules and related bankruptcy documents true, complete and accurate?” There is an ambiguity in this question, because it is not clear if the truthfulness of the answer is measured at the time the statement was made (i.e., the bankruptcy schedules were filed) or at the time of the creditors’ meeting. In this case, the ambiguity was important, because the defendant learned after filing the schedules that one of the assets was worth substantially more than what he had listed on the schedule. Because of this ambiguity, the defendant could not be convicted of making a false statement in a bankruptcy proceeding.

United States v. Wiggan, 700 F.3d 1204 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with committing perjury at the grand jury. At trial, the foreman was called to the stand by the government and asked not only what the defendant said, but also whether the foreman found her to be credible. The foreman testified that he did not find the defendant credible. This was reversible error. While the foreman can be asked about the circumstances of the testimony and the defendant’s appearance (and, for example, the defendant’s nervousness, etc), it is not proper for the foreman to testify whether he believed that defendant’s testimony was false.

United States v. Awadallah, 436 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with committing perjury in the grand jury. He defended on the basis that he was exhausted, confused and intimidated. The government wanted to call grand jurors as witnesses and have them testify about the circumstances of the defendant’s testimony, as well as their opinion of the witness’s state of mind (i.e., exhaustion, confused, etc). The trial court entered an order providing that a grand juror witness would be permitted to describe the objectively observable circumstances of the grand jury testimony, but would not be permitted to express any opinion about the defendant’s state of mind or express any opinion about the defendant’s demeanor. The Second Circuit held that this was a proper Rule 403 limitation on the grand jurors’ testimony.

Chein v. Shumsky, 373 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was a doctor who testified as an expert witness in a personal injury case. He was charged with perjury because of his inflated testimony about his credentials. The Ninth Circuit held that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to establish that this testimony was “material” as defined by California law (the substantive law of the state in which the defendant was convicted). The Jackson v. Virginia standard of sufficiency must be applied with explicit reference to the substantive elements of the criminal offense as defined by state law.

The AUSA improperly advised the defendant that when he appeared at the grand jury, he had no right to plead the Fifth, because he had already been convicted of drug charges about which he was being questioned (his case was still on appeal). The defendant’s answers led to a perjury prosecution. While condemning the misconduct of the AUSA, the Fourth Circuit holds that the erroneous advice did not provide a defense to the perjury charges.

United States v. Keys, 133 F.3d 1282 (9th Cir. 1998)

The element of materiality in a perjury or false declaration prosecution must be submitted to the jury.

United States v. Farmer, 137 F.3d 1265 (10th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was asked the following questions during her testimony at a pretrial hearing: "Prior to your coming to testify here today, did you speak to anyone about your testimony here today?" “Have you talked to Mr. McMahon, the defendant about your testimony here today?” The witness had talked to Mr. McMahon about her testimony, but had not talked to him that day. The appellate court held that the questions were fundamentally ambiguous, because they may have been interpreted as asking whether she had spoken to the defendant that day. This was not a matter which would be left up to the jury to decide. Given the ambiguity in the question, a jury could not find the defendant guilty of perjury beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Shotts, 145 F.3d 1289 (11th Cir. 1998)

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant’s grand jury testimony was perjurious. The defendant was asked if he “owned” a bail bond business and he answered “no,” because, technically, as a matter of state law, the shareholders own the corporation and the defendant was not a shareholder, even though they were just nominees for the defendant. An answer to a question may be non-responsive, or may be subject to conflicting interpretations, or may even be false by implication. Nevertheless, if the answer is literally true, it is not perjury. Bronston v. United States, 409 U.S. 352 (1973).

United States v. Reveron Martinez, 836 F.2d 684 (1st Cir. 1988)

A misleading statement that is literally true may not be the basis for a perjury conviction.

United States v. Regan, 103 F.3d 1072 (2d Cir. 1997)

The court explained the concept of the “perjury trap” doctrine. The “defense” applies when the government is not legitimately seeking to obtain the answers to any questions when the defendant is questioned in the grand jury, but is only asking the questions in order to elicit false answers to trigger a perjury prosecution. The defense did not apply in this case.

United States v. Littleton, 76 F.3d 614 (4th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was the mother of a young man who was charged with murder. The defendant testified at a suppression hearing for her son and explained that she went to the police. station when her son was arrested; and also testified about a conversation she had with investigators several days later at her house. The government claimed she lied about these matters and prosecuted her for perjury and obstruction of justice. The Fourth Circuit reversed both convictions on the grounds that her statements, even if false, were not material to the suppression hearing at which she testified. With regard to the obstruction count, there was no showing that the defendant intended to obstruct the proceedings involving her son.

United States v. Flowers, 813 F.2d 1320 (4th Cir. 1987)

A witness testified inconsistently at a grand jury and at a post-conviction hearing on a third party’s motion for new trial. The Fourth Circuit holds that the inconsistency in the testimony – the amount of money the defendant had received from the third party for cocaine – was not material. The defendant had acknowledged while giving testimony that the differences in the amount of money specified was due to his faulty memory.

United States v. Earp, 812 F.2d 917 (4th Cir. 1987)

The defendant, a Klansman, was asked before the grand jury whether he had burned crosses at residences of interracial couples. The witness answered in the negative. Although the witness had participated in attempted cross burnings, the government failed to specifically ask about any attempted burnings or whether the witness was at or near a particular residence on the night of an alleged cross-burning attempt.

United States v. Holley, 942 F.2d 916 (5th Cir. 1991)

The jury in this perjury prosecution was not instructed that they must unanimously agree that at least one statement in each count of the indictment was false. This was reversible error, as it could not be determined whether the jury unanimously agreed that the defendant lied with respect to any one statement.

United States v. Chaplin, 25 F.3d 1373 (7th Cir. 1994)

Under the rule established in Bronston v. United States, 409 U.S. 352 (1973), an answer under oath that is literally true but not responsive to the question, and arguably misleading, is not a violation of 18 U.S.C. §1621. In order to establish falsity, the “two-witness” rule provides that the uncorroborated testimony of one witness is not sufficient to establish falsity. There must be at least some corroboration of the witness’s testimony. Another rule provides that a conviction may not be obtained based solely on circumstantial evidence. However, this second rule does not apply in cases in which the perjury relates to the defendant’s state of mind, since that is a matter which can only be proved by circumstantial evidence. In this case, the evidence was sufficient on some counts, but insufficient on other counts.

United States v. Smith, 35 F.3d 344 (8th Cir. 1994)

Under 18 U.S.C. §1623(d), a defendant can avoid a perjury prosecution if he recants either (1) before it becomes manifest to her that the false testimony would be exposed; or (2) if she can show that the proceeding was not substantially affected by her false testimony. Though this may not be good logic, the words of the statute are not ambiguous. Thus, if a witness lies to a judicial tribunal and then, upon learning that she had been discovered, grudgingly recants before the proceeding was substantially affected, this would be a defense to the charge.

United States v. Swink, 21 F.3d 852 (8th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was prosecuted for committing perjury during an SEC investigation. His allegedly perjurious testimony related to his knowledge about the securities in which he was dealing. The evidence at trial did not establish that he lied about his lack of knowledge about the securities.

United States v. Porter, 994 F.2d 470 (8th Cir. 1993)

18 U.S.C. §1623(c) provides that if a person makes two irreconcilably inconsistent statements under oath and both are material to the inquiry in question and are within the statute of limitations, the defendant can be prosecuted for perjury without the government having to prove which statement is false. The defendant entered a guilty plea to mail fraud and later filed a habeas petition and denied his guilt. He was prosecuted under §1623. The Eighth Circuit reversed: the two statements of the defendant were not such that one had to be false. The statute requires “a variance in testimony that extends beyond mere vagueness, uncertainty, or equivocation. . . Even though two declarations may differ from one another, the §1623(c) standard is not met unless, taking them in context, they are so different that if one is true there is no way that the other can also be true.” Among other things, because the questions were slightly different at the two proceedings, the defendant’s answers were not necessarily irreconcilable: “The burden is on the questioner to pin the witness down to the specific object of the questioner’s inquiry . . . Precise questioning is imperative as a predicate for the offense of perjury.”

United States v. Jaramillo, 69 F.3d 388 (9th Cir. 1995)

18 U.S.C. §1623(c) provides that, if two statements are made by a defendant which are inconsistent, the government may convict the defendant of making a false statement without showing which statement was false. The Ninth Circuit holds that, in order for this section to apply, both statements must be made under oath.

United States v. Boone, 951 F.2d 1526 (9th Cir. 1991)

Though literally true, the defendant’s answer in the grand jury was misleading. This could not support a perjury conviction. The burden is on the questioner to pin the witness down to the specific object of the questioner’s inquiry.

United States v. Schulman, 817 F.2d 1355 (9th Cir. 1987)

The allegations in the indictment in this perjury prosecution did not sufficiently set out the allegedly perjurious statements and objective truths in stark contrast so that the claim of the falsity was clear to all who read the charge.

United States v. Allen, 892 F.2d 66 (10th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was prosecuted for perjury in connection with his application for the appointment of an attorney in a pending criminal case. The defendant used an alias on the application. The use of the alias, however, was not a material misstatement and therefore a perjury prosecution could not be sustained.
PHOTOGRAPHS

Spears v. Mullin, 343 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2003)

The victim was severely beaten and stabbed, but the medical experts agreed that he was either dead, or certainly unconscious long before the stabbings began and shortly after the beating began. During the penalty phase, the state introduced several gruesome photographs that showed the results of the stabbings and the beating. This violated the defendant’s right to due process and required that the death sentence be set aside.
PLEA AGREEMENTS

(Breach of Plea Agreement)

SEE ALSO: GUILTY PLEA (RIGHT TO WITHDRAW)

If the defendant claims that the government breached a plea agreement at sentencing, but does not object until he is in the appellate court, the plain error standard applies.

_United States v. King-Gore_, --- F.3d --- (D.C. Cir. 2017)

After he was arrested, the defendant met with the prosecutors and agents and after being assured that nothing he said would be used against him at sentencing, he acknowledged being a drug wholesaler. The government used this information against him at sentencing. Even though the district court judge did not know that there was a breach of the plea agreement and the defendant did not object in the lower court, this was plain error.

_United States v. Doe_, 865 F.3d 1295 (10th Cir. 2017)

When the government agrees “in its discretion” to move for a § 5K1.1, the government must act in good faith and this determination is subject to judicial review.

_United States v. Kirkland_, 851 F.3d 499 (5th Cir. 2017)

The plea agreement required the government to request a low-end sentence. At sentencing, the government requested a high-end sentence. The defendant did not object. The trial court imposed a mid-range sentence. The Fifth Circuit held that the government’s failure to honor the plea agreement satisfied the plain error test for reversal.

_United States v. Hunter_, 835 F.3d 1320 (11th Cir. 2016)

The government agreed in the plea agreement to recommend a three-level reduction for acceptance of responsibility. At sentencing, however, the government reneged and argued that it was not obligated to make the recommendation because the defendant had committed perjury at the suppression hearing. The appellate court rejected this argument because the suppression hearing occurred prior to the time the plea agreement was executed, so the government had no basis to abjure its obligation. Noteworthy is the fact that the district court granted the three-level reduction based on the terms of the plea agreement notwithstanding the government’s refusal to make the recommendation. However, the court then granted the government’s upward departure motion. The Eleventh Circuit held that reversal of the judgment was required. It was the government’s obligation to make the recommendation and the government breached, not the district court. The government was required on remand to make the recommendation it agreed to make and the case would be assigned to a different judge.

_Cuero v. Cate_, 827 F.3d 879 (9th Cir. 2016)

After the defendant entered a guilty plea subject to a plea agreement that was accepted by the trial court, the prosecution “amended” the plea agreement that added an additional prior offense and substantially increased the punishment due to California’s three-strikes law. The Ninth Circuit granted habeas relief: the California court’s remedy (allowing the defendant to withdraw the plea), was not a sufficient remedy. The defendant was entitled to specific performance. “In other words, a guilty plea seals the deal between the state and the defendant, and vests the defendant with a due process right to enforce the terms of his plea agreement.”

United States v. Williams, 821 F.3d 656 (5th Cir. 2016)

The plea agreement required the government to recommend a sentence at the low end of the guidelines. It failed to do so. The defendant had the option of requesting a re-sentencing by a different judge at which the government would be required to comply with its obligation, or to withdraw his plea. On rehearing, the appellate court re-affirmed that the defendant was entitled to make that choice. 833 F.3d 449.

United States v. Warner, 820 F.3d 678 (4th Cir. 2016)

The government agreed to “take the position” that a particular guideline enhancement did not apply. After receiving the PSR, however, it apparently recognized that its position was legally wrong. The government advised the court that it had changed its “position” but honored the plea agreement by requesting that the enhancement not be applied. The court applied the enhancement. The Fourth Circuit held that the government violated the plea agreement. The agreement required the government to maintain the same position, not just to make a recommendation – especially because the recommendation was inconsistent with its new position.

United States v. Reyes-Santiago, 804 F.3d 453 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant was one of numerous individuals sentenced in a Puerto Rico federal drug conspiracy case. The plea agreements in these cases set various drug quantities that would set the base offense level. The district court abided by most of the recommended quantities, but with the defendant, the court found a considerably higher drug quantity. The First Circuit reversed, holding that the sentence was substantively unreasonable. The court also held that the government arguably breached the plea agreement by failing to properly argue the disparity between the defendants’ sentences that resulted in a disproportionately higher sentence for the defendant. The court also criticized the government failure to argue for the drug quantity that was in the plea agreement, and its objections to the defense attorney’s efforts to convince the court to accept the agreed-upon amount. “The government’s duty to bring all facts relevant to sentencing to the judge’s attention . . . does not come with license to impede defense counsel’s effort to persuade the court to adopt the parties’ agreed-upon sentencing recommendation.”

United States v. Navarro, 817 F.3d 494 (7th Cir. 2015)

The plea agreement provided that the government would not seek an upward departure. At the sentencing hearing, the government suggested that a three-level role adjustment was appropriate (which the government was permitted to argue, according to the agreement), but then added to the argument that even if the role adjustment technically did not apply (because the defendant managed and organized assets, not people), the application notes suggest that an upward departure may be appropriate. The court accepted the invitation to upwardly depart. The Seventh Circuit held that the government breached the plea agreement.
United States v. Chavful, 781 F.3d 758 (5th Cir. 2015)

The plea agreement provided section § 1B1.8 protection to the defendant for the defendant’s statements made during a debriefing. At sentencing, however, the government relied on evidence of the transactions revealed during the debriefing to increase the defendant’s sentence. This violated the plea agreement and required that the sentence be set aside.

United States v. Morales Heredia, 768 F.3d 1220 (9th Cir. 2014)

Despite paying lip service to the low-end recommendation in the plea agreement, the government’s “incendiary” presentation of information about the defendant’s criminal history undermined its agreement to recommend the low-end sentence. Based on the government’s sentencing memorandum, the trial court rejected the binding plea, but claimed that the rejection was not based on what the government had written. The Ninth Circuit reversed and ordered that the case be sent back to the district court and assigned to a different judge. The court noted that though the government is not obligated to “enthusiastically” recommend a sentence that is in the agreement, it may not do the opposite, especially in the context of a fast-track binding plea offer as was the situation in this case. The Ninth Circuit also held that where the defense objects to the government’s breach of an agreement, the error is not reviewed for harmlessness. Automatic reversal is required.

United States v. Lara, 690 F.3d 1079 (8th Cir. 2012)

The prosecution breached the plea agreement when it introduced evidence of a larger quantity of drugs than the amount stipulated to in the agreement. The fact that the plea agreement also stated that the government could introduce evidence of relevant conduct did not supercede the specific agreement about drug quantity.

United States v. Hanshaw, 686 F.3d 613 (8th Cir. 2012)

The plea agreement provided that the defendant would be present at any hearing on a Rule 35 reduction of sentence motion. When the motion was heard, the defendant was not present and the defense attorney was only present on the phone. This violated the plea agreement.

United States v. Hebron, 684 F.3d 554 (5th Cir. 2012)

The government breached the plea agreement by advocating for a loss figure under the fraud guidelines higher than the loss figure agreed to in the plea agreement. Not plain error, however.

United States v. Lara-Ruiz, 681 F.3d 914 (8th Cir. 2012)

A plea agreement provided that the government would not prosecute the defendant for any crime, other than a crime of violence if he entered a plea in the first indictment. He entered the plea and then was later prosecuted in the same district for additional offenses. One count of the second prosecution involved trading guns for drugs. Prosecuting the defendant for that offense breached the plea agreement, because that offense did not qualify as a crime of violence as envisioned by the initial plea agreement.
United States v. Manzo, 675 F.3d 1204 (9th Cir. 2012)

The government agreed that the defendant’s guideline range, after acceptance of responsibility would be at a level 31 and agreed to recommend the low end of that range. The trial court concluded that the sentencing range was actually 38 because of the grouping rules. The government recommended the low end of guideline range 34. This was a breach of the plea agreement. The trial court should have vacated the plea instead of holding the defendant to his bargain and excusing the government from having to honor its obligation.

United States v. Lewis, 673 F.3d 758 (8th Cir. 2012)

The government breached the plea agreement by proceeding with a Rule 35 without affording the defendant the right to be present during that hearing. Because of this breach, an appeal waiver did not bar appellate review.

United States v. Whitney, 673 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2012)

The government breached the plea agreement when it revealed to the court (and argued the significance of) the defendant’s debriefing statements. The government’s entire presentation was inconsistent with its obligation to request a “low-end” sentence.

United States v. Alcala-Sanchez, 666 F.3d 571 (9th Cir. 2012)

The government and the defense reached a plea agreement about a particular guideline enhancement. The government then wrote a sentencing memo that recommended a higher guideline enhancement. When the defense objected, the AUSA realized her mistake and promptly withdrew the memo and told the judge that the lower enhancement was appropriate. The judge rejected the recommendation and sentenced the defendant using the higher enhancement as the Guideline calculation. The Ninth Circuit held that the government’s breach was not cured by the withdrawal of the recommendation, because the trial judge was likely led to believe that the higher enhancement was probably the accurate enhancement even though it was not ultimately recommended by the government simply because of the agreement.

United States v. Harper, 643 F.3d 135 (5th Cir. 2011)

The defendant entered into a plea agreement that included a U.S.S.G. § 1B1.8 use immunity provision that barred the government from using his debriefing statements at sentencing. The PSR calculated the drug quantity at 18 kilograms of crack cocaine. The defendant objected, claiming that the information was unreliable. The government responded, stating the information was accurate and was consistent with the defendant’s debriefing. The defendant objected to the government’s argument, claiming a violation of the plea agreement. At sentencing, the court heard testimony from different witnesses that the quantity involved was 18 kilograms of crack and there was no evidence of the defendant’s debriefing that was introduced. The defendant maintained that the government’s written response to the defendant’s objections constituted a violation of the immunity agreement, notwithstanding the fact that no evidence of the debriefing was introduced at the sentencing hearing. The Fifth Circuit agreed, reversed the judgment of the trial court, and remanded for sentencing before a new judge. The Fifth Circuit held that the defendant’s insistence that the information in the PSR was unreliable was not a “false statement” that justified breaching the immunity agreement.
United States v. Roberts, 624 F.3d 241 (5th Cir. 2010)
Where the plea agreement stipulates that a particular base offense level is appropriate, the government breaches that agreement when it then advocates for the use of the career offender “enhancement” that increases the base offense level. Even though the government reserved the right to advocate for different enhancements in this case, the use of the career offender guideline is not simply an enhancement, but a different base offense level than the level that was embodied in the plea agreement.

United States v. Diaz-Jiminez, 622 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2010)
Where the government agrees to recommend a low-end sentence, it must do so and not in a “mixed” message sort of way. In this case, the government mistakenly recommended a high-end sentence and when the plea agreement was brought to the attention of the prosecutor, he apologized said that a longer sentence might be appropriate, but he would recommend low-end. The Seventh Circuit held that this conduct amounted to a breach of the agreement. Recommending leniency is an important part of the plea agreement and that cannot be done as the prosecutor did it in this case. Remand to a different judge was required.

United States v. Dawson, 587 F.3d 640 (4th Cir. 2009)
The government’s failure to abide by the plea agreement and advocate for a minor role adjustment amounted to plain error. There was nothing in the record to justify the government in reneging on its agreement to recommend the two-point reduction.

United States v. Lovelace, 565 F.3d 1080 (8th Cir. 2009)
If a defendant appeals the government’s breach of a plea agreement after failing to challenge the breach in the lower court and after signing an appeal waiver, the appellate court will consider the allegation of breach under the plain error standard of review.

United States v. Cudjoe, 534 F.3d 1349 (10th Cir. 2008)
The government agreed to stand mute at sentencing after the defendant made his recommendation. At sentencing, the government urged the court to impose a sentence that would protect the community “in any and all future events.” This argument amounted to a violation of the plea agreement. The Tenth Circuit remanded the case for re-sentencing before a different judge.

United States v. Villa-Vazquez, 536 F.3d 1189 (10th Cir. 2008)
The government is bound by the terms of a plea agreement, even if the court has not yet accepted the plea agreement if the defendant has entered his guilty plea. In this case, the government agreed to recommend a reduction for acceptance of responsibility and no upward departure. It violated both facets of the agreement. The fact that the district court deferred accepting the plea agreement did not alter the government’s obligation to comply with its obligations under the agreement that it reached with the defendant.

United States v. Mosley, 505 F.3d 804 (8th Cir. 2007)
The government breached the plea agreement by arguing that the defendant should not receive acceptance of responsibility based on her pre-plea statements. The agreement stated that “as of now” the defendant was entitled to the reduction for acceptance of responsibility. Because the government was then aware of her statements minimizing her role in the offense, the government could not advocate for a denial of the reduction at sentencing based on those statements. Harmless error analysis may not be invoked in this situation; thus, it does not matter if the trial judge states that his decision was not based on the prosecutor’s recommendation. A remand to a different judge was required.

United States v. Griffin, 510 F.3d 354 (2d Cir. 2007)

The plea agreement provided that the government would recommend a three-point acceptance of responsibility reduction. In response to the defendant’s statements to the probation officer minimizing his guilt, the government filed a brief that reiterated its recommendation, but stated that it was troubled by the defendant’s objections to the presentence report. The Second Circuit held that this amounted to a breach of the plea agreement. The government’s “skepticism” was inconsistent with its obligation to advocate for the acceptance of responsibility reduction. A remand to a different judge was required so that the government could comply with its obligation.

United States v. Jordan, 509 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2007)

In the plea agreement in a drug conspiracy prosecution, the government agreed not to prosecute the defendant in the future for any “conduct” set forth in the indictment to which he was entering a guilty plea. Inconsistently, the agreement also stated that the defendant could be prosecuted for different “crimes” that were not the subject of the indictment to which he was entering his plea. The Fourth Circuit concluded that the government could not prosecute the defendant for a murder that was “conduct” that was recited in the original drug conspiracy indictment.

United States v. Yah, 500 F.3d 698 (8th Cir. 2007)

In the plea agreement, the government agreed to recommend the low end of the Guidelines. Because of the wording of the plea agreement, this was not conditioned on defendant’s acceptance of responsibility, or any other condition precedent. The defendant committed additional crimes after the plea (but before sentencing) and the government argued for a high-end sentence. The Eighth Circuit reversed, holding that the language of the plea agreement obligated the government to recommend a low-end sentence.

United States v. Vandam, 493 F.3d 1194 (10th Cir. 2007)

The government breached its plea agreement by failing to recommend a sentence at the low end of the guideline range. Though the sentencing court calculated a guideline range lower than the range envisioned by the government, it was still obligated to recommend a low-end sentence of the applicable guideline range. Interestingly, the court held that the government’s failure to comply with his obligation may (almost) be deemed harmless error, because of the institutional harm caused by the government’s breach. Thus, even if the court sentenced the defendant at the low end of the range (as the court did in this case), the appellate court will remand so that the government can fulfill its obligation.

United States v. Cachucha, 484 F.3d 1266 (10th Cir. 2007)
The prosecutor’s protestation that the “agreed-upon” sentence was way too low amounted to a breach of the plea agreement, even though he begrudgingly argued for that sentence, in the end. The prosecutor owes the defendant a duty to pay more than lip service to a plea agreement.

United States v. Harris, 473 F.3d 222 (6th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with counterfeiting and entered into a plea agreement that provided that he would be debriefed and fully reveal his knowledge of counterfeiting operations, in exchange for which the government would not bring any additional charges. Another investigation was ongoing unbeknownst to the AUSA and the defendant (apparently). An investigator approached the defendant and asked him some questions. He declined to respond. The government then indicted the defendant on additional charges. The government claimed that the attempted interview amounted to a “debriefing” and because the defendant did not cooperate, the government could bring additional charges. The Sixth Circuit remanded for additional hearings on the nature of the attempted interview and whether the defendant was made aware that this was his debriefing opportunity. If he did not know, then the government was obligated to afford him an opportunity to debrief and thereby avoid new charges.

United States v. Scott, 469 F.3d 1335 (10th Cir. 2006)

After agreeing to a guideline calculation that provided for two enhancements, but not others, the government, in response to questioning by the trial judge noted that other enhancements might also apply. This violated the plea agreement and required that the case be remanded for re-sentencing.

Davis v. Woodford, 446 F.3d 957 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant had previously entered a guilty plea to eight robbery counts. When that plea was entered, the state prosecutor expressly stated that the eight robbery convictions would be treated as one conviction for subsequent recidivist purposes. Later, the defendant was sentenced in a new case and the prior convictions were treated as eight prior convictions. The Ninth Circuit held that the earlier plea bargain governed the way in which the prior counts could be considered in the new case.

United States v. Fowler, 445 F.3d 1035 (8th Cir. 2006)

The government agreed to advocate for a sentence under a particular guideline range, but, at sentencing, advocated the application of the career-offender enhancement. This violated the plea agreement. The Eighth Circuit decided to remand to the district court to fashion an appropriate remedy.

United States v. Roe, 445 F.3d 202 (2d Cir. 2006)

If there is no reference in the plea agreement to the government’s obligation to file a substantial assistance downward departure, the court will rarely inquire into the government’s failure to do so. But where the plea agreement does state that the government will file such a motion if it determines that the defendant has provided substantial assistance, a court’s review is more searching and focuses on whether the government has acted in good faith. If the government is dissatisfied with the defendant’s proffers, this may justify the refusal to move for a downward departure. However, if the information that prompts the government not to file the motion was known prior to the execution of the plea agreement, this would not be acting in good faith, because when it entered into the agreement, the government already knew it would not file the motion. That was the situation in this case. Prior to entering the plea agreement, the government was skeptical about the defendant’s cooperation. No further efforts at cooperating occurred after the date of the agreement. Based on this limited information, a hearing was required to determine whether the government breached the agreement, or acted in bad faith.

United States v. Transfiguracion, 442 F.3d 1222 (9th Cir. 2006)

The plea agreement provided that the defendant would enter a guilty plea to one count of importation of drugs (from California to Guam) and in exchange, the defendant would not be prosecuted for any other offenses. Later, the Ninth Circuit held that the transfer of drugs from California to Guam does not qualify as “importation” under 21 U.S.C. § 952. The government then sought to cure the “mutual mistake of fact” in the plea agreement by bringing other charges against the defendant. The Ninth Circuit held that the non-prosecution clause of the agreement was still enforceable and no additional charges could be brought against the defendant. The government’s failure to provide for the contingency that the importation prosecution might fail barred it from claiming that it could be excused from performing its obligation under the contract. See also United States v. Barron, 172 F.3d 1153 (9th Cir. 1999).

United States v. O’Neill, 437 F.3d 654 (7th Cir. 2006)

What should a judge do when she decides that she is not going to accept a “binding” plea pursuant to Rule 11(c)(1)(c) (formerly known as 11(e)(1)(C))? In this case, the Seventh Circuit offered a number of different opinions on the subject, concluding, that “the less said, the better.” When initially provided with the binding plea, the court rejected it as a binding plea, explaining that maybe it was appropriate, maybe not, but that she was not going to be bound by the specific sentence envisioned by the agreement. The parties then reached a new agreement which appeared to reflect the judge’s “range” for the appropriate sentence. The court acknowledged that in evaluating a binding plea agreement, the court should take an active role in evaluating the plea agreement, but if the plea is ultimately rejected, the court may take no role in further plea negotiations, even though the comments made by the judge in rejecting the binding plea may lead the parties to refine the agreement in accordance with the comments of the court. There is no easy solution to this quandary, Judge Posner, concurring, acknowledged.

United States v. Floyd, 428 F.3d 513 (3d Cir. 2005)

The government agreed to move for a downward departure if the defendant provided substantial assistance. The plea agreement reserved the decision whether to file such a motion to the government’s discretion. At sentencing, the government acknowledged that the defendant provided substantial assistance, but refused to move for a downward departure because the “charge bargain” ended up being such a good deal for the defendant. The Third Circuit held that this amounted to a breach of the plea agreement. Refusing to move for a downward departure on the basis of something other than the nature and quality of the assistance was not part of the bargain reached between the defendant and the government.

United States v. Hodge, 412 F.3d 479 (3rd Cir. 2005)
The government breached its plea agreement when it advocated a sentence that suggested to the trial court that a life sentence was appropriate. The prosecutor queried, “whether the community at large had to wonder, once the defendant’s sentence is completed and he’s released back into the community, whether he made a genuine change or not.” He also argued that the defendant “had his chance to be a positive influence in the community.” Given the government’s agreement to recommend a Guideline sentence (which was less than life), the argument breached this agreement.

United States v. Munoz, 408 F.3d 222 (5th Cir. 2005)

The government entered into a plea agreement that provided for a specific application of the sentencing guidelines. The agreement did not anticipate an “abuse of position of trust” enhancement. The PSR recommended that the enhancement be applied. At sentencing, the government argued for the enhancement. This violated the plea agreement. Though this enhancement was not mentioned in the plea agreement, the parties agreed to a specific application of the guidelines that did not envision this enhancement and, therefore, arguing for the enhancement violated the agreement.

United States v. Vaval, 404 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 2005)

The plea agreement envisioned a Criminal History Category II and a Role in the Offense enhancement of two points. The government agreed not to take a position about where in the guideline range the sentence should be. At sentencing, the government pointed out that the role should actually have been a three point enhancement and that the Criminal History should be III. In addition, after the defendant asked for mercy, the AUSA described the defendant’s conduct as appalling and that he was a persistent recidivist and “I ask the court to consider all of that when making the court’s decision about where to sentence this defendant.” This amounted to a breach of the plea agreement. Though the plea agreement permitted the government to advise the court about the facts of the case and the defendant’s background, there is a difference between providing information and advocating a stiff sentence. Re-sentencing before a different judge was required.

United States v. Thompson, 403 F.3d 1037 (8th Cir. 2005)

The defendant and the government agreed that the appropriate Guideline range was §2K2.1(a), but the PSR recommended the application of §2K2.1(c). The prosecutor, at sentencing, simply stated, in essence that he was bound by the agreement, but the facts supported the probation officer’s assessment. The Eighth Circuit held that the prosecutor did not act in bad faith, but the plea agreement did not permit him to advocate for the higher sentence.

United States v. Copeland, 381 F.3d 1101 (11th Cir. 2004)

The defendant signed a plea agreement that obligated the government not to bring any additional charges based on information that he provided to the government. Thereafter, the defendant was charged with firearms offenses that significantly increased his sentence. He challenged the firearms charges on the basis that the parties intended that conduct to be covered by the plea agreement. The government disputed this contention. The Eleventh Circuit held that plea agreements must be viewed against the background of the negotiations and should not be interpreted to directly contradict an oral understanding. The court must also consider whether the government’s actions are inconsistent with what the defendant reasonably understood when he entered his guilty plea. In this case, there was ambiguity in the plea agreement, because it was not clear whether the defendant had to have already provided the information (that was considered immunized) or whether he could provide the information after the plea agreement was signed. The opinion also discusses the concept that a plea agreement that envisions being debriefed creates an obligation on the part of the government to actually conduct a debriefing. See United States v. Ringling, 988 F.2d 504 (4th Cir. 1993) and United States v. Laday, 56 F.3d 24 (5th Cir. 1995). Ultimately, the court remanded the case to the lower court for further inquiry into the defendant’s reasonable belief at the time he signed the plea agreement.

United States v. Graves, 374 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2004)
The plea agreement provided that the defendant would be sentenced to fifteen years. However, there was an oral understanding between the parties that if he cooperated enough, he could receive a shorter sentence. The Second Circuit invalidated the guilty plea (which the defendant attempted to withdraw after he was not allowed to engage in proactive cooperation): “If Graves was induced to enter into the plea agreement by representations that were made and not intended to be carried out, that sort of improper inducement might well provide a basis for invalidating the agreement, or at least for permitting withdrawal of the plea.”

United States v. White, 366 F.3d 291 (4th Cir. 2004)
The defendant entered into a guilty plea, but claimed in a § 2255 petition that he was orally assured by his attorney and the AUSA that he could appeal the denial of the suppression motion. Both parties in the § 2255 proceeding agreed that defense counsel made this assurance. Both parties also agreed that this rendered the plea involuntary, because the defendant did not understand the consequences of his plea. The Fourth Circuit held that the trial court should have conducted a full evidentiary hearing to determine if the government did, in fact, orally assure the defendant that he could enter a conditional plea.

United States v. Dewitt, 366 F.3d 667 (8th Cir. 2004)
The government agreed to a specific drug quantity in the plea agreement, but offered evidence in support of the probation officer’s higher calculation. This amounted to a violation of the plea agreement. Though the trial court was not bound by the plea agreement and could have found a greater amount of drugs, this did not excuse the government’s failure to abide by its agreement.

United States v. Gonczy, 357 F.3d 50 (1st Cir. 2004)
Though the government was required to recommend a sentence at the low end of the sentencing guidelines, at sentencing, the AUSA stressed the serious nature of the crime, the defendant’s unrepentant behavior and the fact that many lives had been ruined by the defendant’s conduct. Though paying lip service to the “low end” recommendation, this argument violated the spirit of the plea agreement. Because the defendant waives numerous rights when he enters a guilty plea, “the government is required to meet the most meticulous standards of both promise and performance.”

United States v. Rivera, 357 F.3d 290 (3rd Cir. 2004)

1298
The plea agreement provided for a stipulation of the drug quantity and a three level reduction for acceptance of responsibility. There was no reference to a Role enhancement, but the plea agreement did provide that the applicable guideline total offense level would be 35. The PSR recommended a four-point leadership role enhancement and the government argued that this was not precluded by the plea agreement. The government was incorrect. The total offense level was the final guideline range that the parties agreed to in the plea bargain. To the extent that the plea agreement suffered from “poor draftsmanship,” the agreement would be construed against the government.

United States v. Bennett, 332 F.3d 1094 (7th Cir. 2003)

Where a plea agreement is part of a package deal involving other defendants, or third parties, the trial court should be apprised of the existence of this “package” and should ensure that the plea has been entered into voluntarily by the defendant.

United States v. Palladino, 347 F.3d 29 (2d Cir. 2003)

The plea agreement included an estimate by the government about the expected sentencing guideline calculation. The probation officer noted that an unanticipated enhancement might apply. The government then furnished additional evidence to the probation officer – evidence that it had when it entered the plea agreement – and the district court concluded that based on that evidence, the enhancement should be applied. The Second Circuit holds that this amounted to a breach of the plea agreement. The estimated offense level in the plea agreement was expressly based on information known to the government at the time of bargaining. Absent new information, the government should not be allowed to advocate for a higher offense level.

Brown v. Poole, 337 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2003)

The prosecutor stated at the time of the plea that the defendant would only be required to serve half her sentence if she had no disciplinary infractions in prison. Seventeen years later, she filed for a writ to enforce this provision. The Ninth Circuit agreed that the writ had to be granted. The only appropriate remedy was specific performance: release from prison.

United States v. Gebbie, 294 F.3d 540 (3rd Cir. 2002)

When a plea agreement refers to “the government” or “The United States,” it will be construed as binding on U.S. Attorneys in every federal district in the nation (though not necessarily on other agencies, such INS). Only when the plea agreement unambiguously refers to the local U.S. Attorney will the breadth of the plea agreement be narrowed to that district. In this case, the plea agreement expressly stated that it was binding on two U.S. Attorneys’ offices, but then added that the defendant could still be prosecuted for other crimes that the United States discovers by independent investigation. This ambiguity in the plea agreement would be construed against the government.

United States v. Quach, 302 F.3d 1096 (9th Cir. 2002)

If the government agrees in a plea agreement to recommend a § 5K1.1 substantial assistance departure if the defendant cooperates, then the government must fully assess the defendant’s cooperation at the time of sentencing, even if the defendant’s cooperation has not finished, as of that time.
United States v. Barnes, 278 F.3d 644 (6th Cir. 2002)

The plea agreement provided that the government would request a sentence at the low end of the guidelines. The government failed to do so, but the defendant failed to object. Nevertheless, the government’s failure to comply with its obligation amounted to plain error. In Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971), the Supreme Court held that a defendant was entitled to relief, even if the government’s obligation involved nothing more than a “recommendation” which the trial court said he would disregard in any event.

United States v. Franco-Lopez, 312 F.3d 984 (9th Cir. 2002)

The government agreed to recommend application of the safety valve, if the defendant qualified, according to the probation department and the government was satisfied that the defendant truthfully cooperated. The plea agreement also provided that the government would limit its argument about drug relevant conduct. The government then represented to the probation officer that the defendant was an organizer — including an organizer of a smuggling venture that was part of the “excluded” relevant conduct. The Ninth Circuit held that the government was bound to maintain neutrality with respect to matters that would impact on the safety valve determination. Recommending a role enhancement precluded application of the safety valve.

United States v. Gilchrist, 130 F.3d 1131 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The government and the defense entered into a Fed.R.CrimP. Rule 11(e)(1)(C) plea agreement that provided that the sentence would be nine months incarceration, one month of home detention and a $10,000 fine. The court sentenced the defendant in accordance with the agreement, but added a one-year period of supervised release. This amounted to a breach of the plea agreement and the case had to be remanded to provide for specific performance of the plea agreement, or to allow the defendant to withdraw his plea.

United States v. Mitchell, 136 F.3d 1192 (8th Cir. 1998)

The government breached its plea agreement to move for a § 5K1.1 downward departure of up to 50%. At sentencing, after filing the motion, the government stated that the reduction in charges was a substantial benefit to the defendant. The government also introduced victim-impact evidence that clearly counseled against a reduction in the defendant's sentence. These tactics of the government violated the "spirit" of the plea agreement.

United States v. Sandoval-Lopez, 122 F.3d 797 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendants were charged with drug offenses and § 924(c) charges. The parties entered into a plea agreement that provided that the defendants would plead guilty to the gun counts, agree to certain forfeitures, and the government would dismiss the drug counts. The pleas were then entered. After the Supreme Court decided Bailey v. United States, 116 S.Ct. 501 (1995), it was clear that the defendants had actually not committed the § 924(c) offenses. They successfully collaterally attacked those convictions. The government moved to reinstate the drug counts on the basis that the defendants breached their plea agreements. The Ninth Circuit rejected the government's argument: the defendants did what they agreed to do (they entered guilty pleas). They did not agree not to challenge the convictions at a later time. Having lived up to their side of the bargain, the defendants had the right to insist that the government honor its obligation, the dismissal of the drug charges.

United States v. Johnson, 132 F.3d 628 (11th Cir. 1998)

The plea agreement provided that the government agreed that 100 pounds of marijuana should be attributed to the defendant. The day after the plea was entered, the government learned from debriefing an informant that 1,400 pounds of marijuana was attributable to the defendant. The presentence report relied on the greater amount. At sentencing, the government stated that the presentence report contained correct information, but did not expressly advocate for the greater amount. This conduct amounted to a violation of the plea agreement. The appropriate remedy was re-sentencing before a different judge.

United States v. Wolff, 127 F.3d 84 (D.C. Cir. 1997)

The plea agreement provided that the government would recommend a three level reduction for acceptance of responsibility. The government recommended no reduction, however, because it discovered various efforts the defendant made to obstruct justice. However, the government should have moved to set aside the agreement, not simply breached the agreement at sentencing. The appropriate remedy was to remand for re-sentencing -- on all issues -- and not reassignment to a new judge.

United States v. Brye, 146 F.3d 1207 (10th Cir. 1998)

The government agreed that the defendant could request a downward departure under § 5K2.0 and “the government would defer to the Court’s determination of this point.” At sentencing, however, the government argued against the departure. On appeal, the government claimed that “to defer” meant that the government would agree to submit the question of a departure to the court. Of course, the sentencing court already had the authority to consider this motion. The government’s argument against the motion violated the plea agreement. Remand to a different sentencing judge was required.

United States v. Carrero, 77 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 1996)

In the plea agreement, the government agreed to recommend no adjustment in the Guidelines for the defendant’s role. At sentencing, the government said that it would take no position. This breached the plea agreement. The government did not agree to remain neutral; it agreed to recommend no role adjustment. The court held that the defendant should be re-sentenced by a different judge.

United States v. Clark, 55 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1995)

The government entered into a plea agreement which required it to recommend a three level reduction for acceptance of responsibility. After the plea was entered, the government learned that the defendant, before the plea, had induced his co-defendants to commit perjury, thus authorizing an obstruction of justice enhancement. In its sentencing memorandum, the government noted this fact and suggested that the reduction may not be appropriate in light of the obstruction of justice enhancement. This violated the plea agreement. It is improper for the prosecutor to inject material reservations about the agreement to which the government has committed itself. The fact that the government was not aware of the obstruction of justice conduct previously does not entitle it to withdraw from its agreement. On remand, the defendant was entitled to specific performance of the plea agreement before a different sentencing judge.

Bemis v. United States, 30 F.3d 220 (1st Cir. 1994)

The petitioner claimed that he had an oral agreement with the government to enter the witness protection program. Though he testified at the Rule 11 guilty plea that there were no additional promises which induced him to enter the plea, he was entitled to a hearing to establish that this promise was made. Moreover, if it was made, it could be enforced, even though the prosecutor may have lacked the authority to make such a promise.

United States v. Mercedes-Amparo, 980 F.2d 17 (1st Cir. 1992)

The government was obligated, pursuant to the plea agreement, to recommend a sentence within the applicable guideline range. At sentencing, the government made no recommendation and the court departed upward. Though the defendant did not complain at trial about the government’s failure to honor its agreement, the error would be considered by the appellate court and required that the sentence be vacated.

United States v. Canada, 960 F.2d 263 (1st Cir. 1992)

The plea agreement provided that the government would recommend a sentence of thirty-six months. At sentencing, however, the government urged the court to adjust the guideline range upward two levels to reflect defendant’s role in the offense and the prosecutor repeatedly urged the court to “send a strong message” and otherwise impose a harsh sentence. The prosecutor also failed to fully reveal the extent of defendant’s cooperation, as required by the plea agreement. This conduct on the part of the prosecutor violated the plea agreement. Paying mere lip service to the plea agreement is not sufficient; the prosecutor’s reference to the plea agreement was grudging and apologetic. The most meticulous standards of both promise and performance must be met by prosecutors in plea bargaining.

United States v. Kurkculer, 918 F.2d 295 (1st Cir. 1990)

The First Circuit holds that the remedy for a prosecutor’s breach of a plea agreement cannot be requiring the defendant to replead. At the defendant’s sentencing, the prosecutor recommended the maximum sentence, instead of the lower one he had agreed to recommend. The defendant requested sentencing before a different judge; the judge gave the defendant the opportunity to withdraw his guilty plea. The defendant should have been given the right to be sentenced by a different judge. Where specific performance is “feasible” the plea should not be disturbed, rather, it should be enforced.

United States v. Fagge, 101 F.3d 232 (2d Cir. 1996)

As part of his initial debriefing, the defendant entered into a “proffer” agreement with the government which provided that nothing he said would be used at sentencing to enhance his sentence. Later, he entered a plea agreement which contained no such limitation and expressly provided that there were no other agreements between the defendant and the government. The plea agreement superceded the proffer agreement and the defendant’s statements during the proffer session could be used to enhance his sentence.

United States v. Pollack, 91 F.3d 331 (2d Cir. 1996)

During his debriefing, the defendant neglected to mention that he was the subject of an unrelated arson investigation. This did not violate the plea agreement, as argued by the government because there was nothing in the agreement that expressly required the defendant to disclose all other cases in which he was being investigated.

United States v. Russo, 801 F.2d 624 (2d Cir. 1986)

A plea agreement between the United States Attorney’s office and the defendant may be binding upon the United States Attorney’s office in another district even in the absence of an express statement in the agreement to that effect. The plea agreement is binding on another office if it affirmatively appears that the agreement contemplates broader restrictions.

United States v. Nolan-Cooper, 155 F.3d 221 (3rd Cir. 1998)

The government agreed not to oppose either the defendant’s request that the “special skill” enhancement not apply, or that she receive the maximum acceptance of responsibility reduction. The government lived up to neither promise: the government presented evidence that was inconsistent with both positions. That is, it presented evidence that supported the special skill enhancement and that negated the applicability of the acceptance of responsibility reduction.

United States v. Moscahlaidis, 868 F.2d 1357 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The plea agreement provided that the government would “take no position” regarding a custodial sentence for the defendant. In its sentencing memorandum, the government described the conduct of the defendant and stated that this evidence reflected “the depth of [the defendant’s] greed and moral bankruptcy . . . it is well within the reach of most white collar criminals to assume an air of irreproachable virtue especially when they are about to be sentenced. [The defendant] cannot maintain even the air of irreproachable virtue with any degree of legitimacy . . . this demonic pursuit demonstrates his utter contempt for the welfare of his fellow man . . . to preserve his fetid empire, he relentlessly pursued a course of corruption and obstruction of justice . . . the United States will make no recommendation as to an appropriate sentence.” This sentencing memorandum violated the government’s agreement to take no position as to a custodial sentence for the defendant.

United States v. McQueen, 108 F.3d 64 (4th Cir. 1997)

The government breached its oral plea agreement to recommend acceptance of responsibility, as well as a 63 months sentence. Even though the defendant did not object at sentencing, the government’s failure to live up to its obligation was plain error.

United States v. Beltran-Ortiz, 91 F.3d 665 (4th Cir. 1996)

If the plea agreement anticipates that the government will debrief the defendant so that he could qualify for the safety valve (U.S.S.G. §5C1.2), then the government must, in fact, give the defendant the opportunity to provide to the government information about the offense and the related course of conduct.

United States v. Peglera, 33 F.3d 412 (4th Cir. 1994)

Though the plea agreement provided that the government would recommend the low end of the guideline range (and the trial judge was aware of this provision), the government failed to do so at sentencing. The government contended that the defendant’s statements at sentencing (where he claimed that he only distributed powder cocaine, not crack) were not true and therefore, the government was not bound by its pledge to recommend low end. Yet, the plea agreement specifically provided that the defendant could argue for the applicability of the powder guideline, rather than the crack guideline. Thus, this did not amount to a changed circumstance which would absolve the government from its duty under the plea agreement.

United States v. Dixon, 998 F.2d 228 (4th Cir. 1993)

The defendant’s plea agreement provided that if the defendant cooperated in the investigation or prosecution of any cases, the government would move for a downward departure. The defendant provided assistance in the investigation of another case, but the government wanted to wait until he testified at the other trial. This was a breach of the plea agreement. The government’s discretion in the plea agreement was limited to deciding whether the defendant provided substantial assistance (which the government agreed he had done), and not whether to file the §5K1.1 motion. Because the defendant provided substantial assistance – a fact which the government did not dispute – the government was obligated to file the motion for a downward departure.

United States v. Ringling, 988 F.2d 504 (4th Cir. 1993)

The plea agreement provided that the government would inform the court of the defendant’s cooperation. No explicit promise was made to move for a downward departure, however. Nevertheless, this agreement implicitly required the government to at least interview the defendant so that he would be able to provide information. Failing to interview the defendant deprived him of the benefit of the bargain to which he was entitled.

United States v. Garcia, 956 F.2d 41 (4th Cir. 1992)

As part of the plea agreement, the government told the defendant that he would not have to cooperate. This was not made an explicit part of the plea agreement, but was a provision contained in a cover letter sent to the defendant’s counsel. After the plea was taken, the government brought the defendant to the grand jury and immunized him. He refused to testify.
He was held in contempt for eighteen months. The Fourth Circuit granted his §2255 petition. The failure of the government to include the no-cooperation provision in the plea agreement was its oversight, or overreaching. All parties agreed that it was a part of the agreement which was actually reached. The proper remedy is specific performance. The defendant would re-plead, again get the fifteen-year sentence, but be given credit for the eighteen months he served in dead time on the contempt case.

United States v. Harvey, 791 F.2d 294 (4th Cir. 1986)

In this plea agreement, it was agreed that “the Eastern District of Virginia further agrees not to prosecute the defendant for any other possible violation of criminal law arising from the offenses set out in the indictment or the investigation giving rise to those charges.” The Fourth Circuit holds that this language is sufficiently ambiguous that it will prevent any further prosecution from any agency of the government in any district in the United States.

United States v. Crowell, 60 F.3d 199 (5th Cir. 1995)

The government and the defense entered into a binding plea agreement. The district court conditionally accepted the defendant’s guilty plea, but later allowed him to withdraw it when the judge concluded that the possible sentence (there was a five-year cap) was not sufficient. The parties then began to re-negotiate and approached the court before the agreement was reached, with their tentative proposal. The district court indicated that a longer sentence would be necessary than was envisioned by the first plea. The government and the defendant then drafted an agreement. Once again, the court conditionally accepted the guilty plea, and again allowed the defendant to withdraw the plea when he rejected the binding sentence which he calculated under the Guidelines for the mail fraud offenses. The defendant was then tried and convicted (on mail fraud and money laundering counts) and the court sentenced the defendant to a total of ten years imprisonment. The court of appeals concluded that the trial court improperly participated in the plea negotiations when he indicated what he thought was necessary in terms of the sentence prior to the time the second agreement was reached. This violation does not require that the verdict be set aside, or that a specific sentence should be entered. Rather, the remedy is to remand the matter for resentencing by a different judge.

United States v. Laday, 56 F.3d 24 (5th Cir. 1995)

When the government agrees to move for a downward departure pursuant to §5K1.1 if the defendant provides substantial assistance, the government breaches the agreement if it fails to interview the defendant. That is, the government must give the defendant the opportunity to provide substantial assistance.

United States v. Goldfaden, 959 F.2d 1324 (5th Cir. 1992)

The government agreed to make no recommendation as to the defendant’s sentence. Despite this pledge, the government wrote several letters to the probation officer advocating the use of certain Guideline ranges. This was a violation of the agreement. The fact that the government recommended guideline ranges, rather than a specific number of months or years is inconsequential. On remand, if the court concludes that specific performance is the appropriate remedy, the defendant must be sentenced by a different judge.

United States v. Birdwell, 887 F.2d 643 (5th Cir. 1989)

The defendant pled guilty in federal court in partial consideration of a plea offer made by state authorities in a connected case. The State subsequently reneged on its agreement. Though the federal court cannot require the State to honor its agreement, since the state offer was a significant factor in inducing the defendant to plead guilty in federal court, that plea was tainted and the defendant would be given an opportunity to replead.

United States v. Crowell, 997 F.2d 146 (6th Cir. 1993)

The trial court permitted the government to withdraw from a plea agreement without showing by a preponderance of the evidence that there was a substantial breach on the part of the defendant. This was error.

United States v. Barrett, 982 F.2d 193 (6th Cir. 1992)

Before the defendant decided whether to plead or not, the trial court held a conference call with the prosecution and defense counsel to resolve a dispute concerning the sentencing guidelines. The defense counsel advised the court that the minimum was probably seven years. The judge responded that there was no way he would impose such a light sentence. The judge also told the attorney that he thought there was no defense and that he had heard that the investigator had found none of the defendant’s witnesses (which didn’t surprise him). The defendant entered a guilty plea shortly thereafter. The Sixth Circuit reversed: the judge’s comments amounted to improper participation in the plea negotiation process. Note that pursuant to Davila, automatic reversal is no longer appropriate for a Rule 11 violation.
United States v. Fitch, 964 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1992)

Though defendant lied during his de-briefing, attempting to shift blame to another person, this did not amount to a material breach of his plea agreement. Even if this was a material breach, the government’s remedy was to prosecute the defendant for perjury.

United States v. Moore, 916 F.2d 1131 (6th Cir. 1990)

Merely complaining that a plea agreement was not filed until the date set for trial is not an adequate reason for rejecting a plea agreement.

United States v. Ritsema, 89 F.3d 392 (7th Cir. 1996)

The district court initially accepted the defendant’s guilty plea and imposed sentence and granted the government’s motion to dismiss the remaining counts. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit reversed and remanded for re-sentencing, a decision which necessitated a considerably shorter sentence. On remand, the district court announced that the plea agreement would not be accepted and the dismissed counts would proceed. The Seventh Circuit reversed. Once the plea agreement was accepted, the court could not later change its mind, even if the appellate court reversed the initial sentence that was imposed.

United States v. Verrusio, 803 F.2d 885 (7th Cir. 1986)

The prosecution sought to try the defendant after a plea agreement had purportedly disposed of the charges. The defendant sought to prevent his indictment but the Seventh Circuit holds that a defendant has no due process right to be free from indictment; the defendant’s due process rights are triggered by the trial. Thus, the government must establish that the defendant has breached his part of the agreement prior to trial, but not prior to going to the grand jury. In this case, the hearing which ultimately was conducted to determine whether the defendant had breached his plea agreement was defective in two respect: First, the court improperly thrust the burden on the defendant to prove that he had not breached the plea agreement when in fact the burden is on the government to prove that a breach has occurred. Second, the hearing consisted primarily of inadmissible hearsay. The Seventh Circuit rejects the defendant’s contention that prior to indictment on the charges for which he had already entered a plea, if the government’s contention is that the breach consisted of perjury before the grand jury, the government must first obtain a conviction for perjury. The court disagrees. The proof that the defendant had breached his plea agreement does not have to rise to proof beyond a reasonable doubt that he committed perjury. The government need only prove a breach by a preponderance of the evidence.

United States v. Anzalone, 148 F.3d 940 (8th Cir. 1998)

The government agreed to file a §5K1.1 motion in light of the defendant’s substantial assistance. After entering the plea, the defendant engaged in additional criminal conduct. This did not justify the government’s decision not to file the §5K1.1 motion. Even though the agreement provided that any breach of the agreement by the defendant would support the government’s refusal to make any motion it was otherwise bound to make, this did not apply to the §5K1.1 motion.

United States v. Barresse, 115 F.3d 610 (8th Cir. 1997)

In a plea agreement, the government usually reserves for itself the discretion to move for a U.S.S.G. §5K1.1 downward departure if the defendant provides substantial assistance. In this case, however, the plea agreement stated that the government would move for a downward departure if the defendant provided substantial assistance. The defendant did, but the government didn’t. This amounted to a violation of the plea agreement.
United States v. Van Thournout, 100 F.3d 590 (8th Cir. 1996)

Absent an express limitation, any promises made by an Assistant United States Attorney in one district will bind an Assistant United States Attorney in another district. Here, the assistant in the District of Wyoming entered into an agreement with the defendant that any sentence imposed in that district would be concurrent with any sentence imposed in the Iowa district court, where the defendant was awaiting sentencing. The Iowa AUSA recommended a consecutive sentence. This was a breach of the agreement and required that the case be remanded for resentencing with the proper recommendation by the government.

United States v. Mendoza-Alvarez, 79 F.3d 96 (8th Cir. 1996)

When the government agrees in the plea agreement to remain silent at sentencing, this includes remaining silent when asked a legal question, or asked for the government’s “position” by the court.

United States v. Feldewerth, 982 F.2d 322 (8th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was given transactional immunity (a non-prosecution agreement) if he would tell the police who was leaking information to him from the law enforcement community. He agreed, and then revealed that no one was supplying him information. The government prosecuted the defendant, claiming that he was not truthful and relied on the information supplied by a confidential informant who alleged that the defendant did have an inside source. The trial court erred in not requiring the government to produce this confidential informant.

United States v. Van Horn, 976 F.2d 1180 (8th Cir. 1992)

The government agreed not to move for an upward departure from the range calculated by the probation office. The probation department recommended a certain range, but the court determined that the appropriate range was ten levels lower. The government then urged an upward departure. This violated the plea agreement. Just because one aspect of the pre-sentence report was rejected, the government was not permitted to move for an upward departure.

United States v. Olesen, 920 F.2d 538 (8th Cir. 1990)

After unconditionally accepting a plea agreement which defined a specific sentence, the trial court later modified the plea agreement. Once the court accepts a plea agreement under Rule 11(e)(2), however, it may not reject or modify it. If the government or the court later rejects the plea, the defendant may seek specific performance or the right to withdraw the plea.

United States v. Vogt, 901 F.2d 100 (8th Cir. 1990)

The government breached an agreement not to prosecute the defendant. The trial court ordered suppression of certain evidence; the Eighth Circuit holds that an evidentiary hearing must be conducted to decide whether specific performance – that is dismissal of the indictment – is the appropriate remedy.
United States v. McCray, 849 F.2d 304 (8th Cir. 1988)

The prosecutor agreed to “stand mute” at sentencing but then, after sentence, told the Court that it would resist any request for early parole. The Eighth Circuit holds that the defendant is entitled to resentencing as a result of the government’s comment.

Thomas v. I.N.S., 35 F.3d 1332 (9th Cir. 1994)

An assistant United States Attorney entered into an agreement with an informant that the “government” would not oppose his application for discretionary relief from deportation. The INS did oppose the application. This violated the agreement: An AUSA can bind the INS. Using ordinary principles of agency, such authority is implicit in the prosecutor’s authority to prosecute for all offenses against the United States. A U.S. Attorney’s authority to commit the government not to oppose deportation as part of a plea bargain is incidental to his or her statutory authority to prosecute crimes.

United States v. Myers, 32 F.3d 411 (9th Cir. 1994)

The government agreed to recommend low end of the applicable guideline range. The court was aware of this provision of the plea agreement, but the government failed to make the recommendation. This was a violation of the plea agreement and the case would be remanded for resentencing.

United States v. De la Fuente, 8 F.3d 1333 (9th Cir. 1993)

The defendant entered into a plea agreement which required the government to urge the court to recommend the minimum term under the guidelines. The guidelines provided for a sentence of 41 - 51 months. The statutory mandatory minimum, however, required a sentence of five years. Given the wording of the plea agreement, the government was obligated to move, pursuant to §3553(e), for a sentence below the statutory minimum. The agreement could not have envisioned a sentence (given the wording of the agreement) which was actually at least nine months more than the guidelines.

United States v. Caro, 997 F.2d 657 (9th Cir. 1993)

Whenever a plea agreement with multiple defendants is offered as a “package deal” – all plead, or the deal is off – the district court must make additional inquiries as part of the Rule 11 colloquy to ensure that there has not been any coercion between the defendants. Though such agreements are not impermissible, there is the inherent risk that a defendant who perceives that he is getting a good deal will influence other defendants to get on board. The district court in this case did not adequately address this potential problem.

United States v. Fagan, 996 F.2d 1009 (9th Cir. 1993)

The plea agreement entered into by the government and the defendant required two guilty pleas before two different judges. The defendant entered one plea, but prior to entering the second plea, the government moved to vacate the agreement. The second judge, concluding that there had been no agreement in his court, permitted the government to prosecute the defendant. The Ninth Circuit reversed: though the second trial judge was not required to accept the plea agreement, the government was bound to follow through with the recommendation.

United States v. Bruce, 976 F.2d 552 (9th Cir. 1992)

The guilty plea in this case was void for two reasons: (1) the trial judge participated in the plea bargaining; (2) the trial judge failed to correctly explain the nature of the charges during the plea colloquy. The judge discussed the proposed plea with the defendants at length – on the record – and suggested that in light of the fact that they were parents, he thought it was a good idea to accept the plea. He suggested that this was far better than the life sentence the defendants were facing if convicted. Such discussions and participation in the plea negotiation is barred by Rule 11(e)(1). Though the judge’s advice was sound and compassionate, Rule 11(e)(1) has no exceptions.

United States v. Escamilla, 975 F.2d 568 (9th Cir. 1992)

Defendant entered into a plea agreement which required him to be debriefed and polygraphed. The agreement provided that if he were to fail the polygraph, the deal would be void and the government would not be bound by its obligation under the plea agreement. Defendant was fully debriefed, and then failed the polygraph. The plea was withdrawn and the defendant went to trial. At trial, the defendant’s debriefing statements were introduced against him. This was reversible error. The government obtained the benefit of the bargain and could not use the defendant’s statements against him at trial. Moreover, there was no provision in the agreement which would permit the government to use the defendant’s statements in the event the plea agreement was voided.

United States v. Fisch, 863 F.2d 690 (9th Cir. 1988)

Pursuant to the plea agreement, the prosecutor was obligated to inform the sentencing court about the defendant’s cooperation. The prosecutor attempted to fulfill this obligation by merely stating that “the defendant had cooperated.” This was a violation of the plea agreement.

United States v. Partida-Parra, 859 F.2d 629 (9th Cir. 1988)

The defendant and the government entered into a plea agreement which obligated the defendant to plead guilty to a felony. However, because of a clerical mistake, the plea agreement which was accepted by the trial court indicated that the defendant was to plead to a misdemeanor. The government sought to obtain release from this “mistake of fact” utilizing contract law theories as the basis for its argument. The Ninth Circuit disagreed: While contract law doctrine may apply to cases of breach, such theories cannot be used to amend a plea agreement where there has been no breach. The government must live by the terms of the agreement as accepted by the trial court.

United States v. Brye, 146 F.3d 1207 (10th Cir. 1998)

The government agreed in the plea agreement to “defer to the court” regarding the defendant’s request for a downward departure. At sentencing, however, the government presented facts inconsistent with granting a downward departure and suggested that the court focus on certain facts (unfavorable to the defendant) in making the decision. This advocacy on the part of the government amounted to a breach of the plea agreement.

United States v. Belt, 89 F.3d 710 (10th Cir. 1996)

The prosecutor agreed in the plea agreement not to make a recommendation regarding a particular sentence. At sentencing, the defendant asked that he be sentenced to probation based on his substantial assistance, as well as his vulnerability in prison to abuse, because of his homosexuality. The prosecutor initially said that he would make no recommendation, but then challenged the logic of the defendant’s argument for probation and reminded the court of the seriousness of the offense. This argument violated the plea agreement.
United States v. Cooper, 70 F.3d 563 (10th Cir. 1995)

The government agreed in the plea agreement that the relevant conduct began on a certain date and further agreed to recommend a sentence of probation. The parties believed that the sentencing range would be 0-6 months. At sentencing, however, the government argued that the loss to the government was over $300,000 in this fraud case and therefore, the sentencing range was actually Level 13 (which does not allow for a sentence of probation). This violated the plea agreement: The government may not accomplish through indirect means what it promised not to do directly. Though the government has an ethical duty not to lie to the court, all the information which it had at sentencing was known to it at the time the plea was entered, so the “ethical” duty was apparently ignored in order to induce the defendant to enter the plea. “It is disappointing that the government seeks to create an ethical conflict between its duty to inform the court and its duty to keep its promises.”

United States v. Greenwood, 812 F.2d 632 (10th Cir. 1987)

The government had an agreement with the defendant that the prosecutor would make no comment regarding the sentence at sentencing. Nevertheless, the government advised the trial judge that the defendant showed no remorse and that a period of incarceration would be needed to deter others from committing similar crimes. This constituted a violation of the plea agreement and required that the guilty plea and sentencing be set aside.

United States v. Johnson, 132 F.3d 628 (11th Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor executed a plea agreement that stipulated the defendant was accountable for 100 pounds of marijuana. The next day, an informant revealed credible evidence that the defendant was responsible for 1,400 pounds of marijuana. This amount was reflected in the pre-sentence report. The prosecutor’s advocacy of the greater amount breached the plea agreement and required re-sentencing. While the court did not suggest that the prosecutors should misrepresent the facts to the sentencing judge, they should not advocate a finding other than that which they agree to in the plea agreement.

United States v. Dean, 80 F.3d 1535 (11th Cir. 1996), modified 87 F.3d 1212 (11th Cir. 1996)

Where a plea agreement provides that the defendant will forfeit certain property, or withdraw his claim to the property, the court may accept the plea agreement, and later order that some of the property be returned on the basis that the forfeiture would amount to an excessive fine. The forfeiture provision in the plea agreement amounts to simply a “recommendation” under Rule 11(e)(1)(B).

United States v. Taylor, 77 F.3d 368 (11th Cir. 1996)

The government agreed to recommend a sentence of ten years. The pre-sentence report, however, indicated that the relevant conduct would result in a sentence of fifteen years. The defendant challenged the applicability of the relevant conduct. The government responded that the evidence supported the pre-sentence report’s conclusion and the government was prepared to prove that the relevant conduct occurred. Nevertheless, at sentencing, the government recommended a sentence of ten years. This amounted to a breach of the plea agreement. When the government’s statements regarding the pre-sentence investigation are inconsistent with the plea agreement the government has breached that agreement. The fact that the government recommended ten years at the sentencing did not cure the breach. That recommendation, which merely paid lip service to the agreement, was insufficient to rectify the breach committed when the government advocated a position requiring a longer sentence than it had agreed to recommend.

United States v. Casallas, 59 F.3d 1173 (11th Cir. 1995)

Any participation by the judge in the plea negotiation process taints a guilty plea and entitles the defendant to withdraw his plea. Here, the defendant changed his mind about entering a guilty plea. The judge cautioned the defendant that if he were to go to trial and be found guilty, there was a mandatory minimum sentence. The defendant then changed his mind again and entered a guilty plea. Though the judge’s motive was simply to ensure that the defendant was aware of the dangers of going to trial, this crossed over the Rule 11(e) line and entitled the defendant to withdraw his plea. NOTE: The automatic reversal rule was abolished in United States v. Davila, 133 S. Ct. 2139 (2013).

United States v. Corbitt, 996 F.2d 1132 (11th Cir. 1993)

At the scheduled change of plea hearing, one defendant’s attorney asked for more time. The judge responded that all pleas must be submitted by noon that day. He also advised the attorneys and the defendants that if the defendants were convicted, he generally gave “high sentences.” The plea agreements were tendered that day. The Eleventh Circuit reversed: the judge’s comments violated Rule 11(e)(1) which strictly outlaws any judicial participation in plea negotiations, which would include the judge’s threat that convicted defendants received higher sentences. The case would be remanded to the district court for assignment to a different judge and to permit the defendant to withdraw his plea. NOTE: The automatic reversal rule was abolished in United States v. Davila, 133 S. Ct. 2139 (2013).

United States v. Yesil, 991 F.2d 1527 (11th Cir. 1992)

Pursuant to a plea agreement, the government was obligated to inform the court of the full extent of three defendants’ cooperation with the government. Because the court accepted the plea agreement, the court was obligated to conduct an evidentiary hearing on the motion to reduce the sentence. The court, of course, retains the authority to refuse to reduce the sentence, but having accepted the plea agreement, the court could not refuse to hear evidence at a Rule 35 proceeding about the defendants’ cooperation.

United States v. Rewis, 969 F.2d 985 (11th Cir. 1992)

The plea agreement provided that the government would make no recommendation concerning the actual sentence, but reserved the right to make known the facts of the offense to the sentencing judge. In a sentencing memorandum the government criticized the defendant for failing to cooperate or sever ties with his co-conspirators. The memorandum discussed at length the defendant’s failure to cooperate despite being urged to do so and the fact that this showed that the defendant was not rehabilitated. The government also urged the court to consider the defendant’s failure to cooperate in setting a sentence, so as to encourage others to cooperate. This violated the plea agreement in two respects: first, the memorandum amounted to a recommendation of a harsh sentence and the plea agreement prevented the government from doing this; second, the discussion of the defendant’s failure to cooperate was not a statement of the “facts of the offense” which was the limit of the government’s right under the plea agreement.
United States v. Boatner, 966 F.2d 1575 (11th Cir. 1992)

In this pre-Guideline plea agreement, the government agreed that the amount of cocaine involved in the offense was two ounces. In the pre-sentence report, however, the probation officer indicated that the conduct involved three kilograms of cocaine. This amount was based on the statements of a cooperating witness. The government agent furnished this information to the probation officer. This was a violation of the plea agreement. Though the court is not bound by the stipulation, the government, nevertheless, must honor its commitment.

United States v. One Parcel of Real Estate at 136 Plantation Drive, Tavernier, Fla., 911 F.2d 1525 (11th Cir. 1990)

As part of the defendant’s plea agreement relating to a drug conspiracy charge, the government agreed “not to use” any statements he made during his cooperation. During a confederate’s trial, the defendant testified that he purchased certain property with drug proceeds. A forfeiture proceeding had already been instituted against that property, and the defendant had filed a claim. The Eleventh Circuit holds that the plea agreement was ambiguous about the extent of the immunity and the trial court was required to make explicit findings about the intent of the parties.

United States v. Jefferies, 908 F.2d 1520 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant entered into a plea agreement which stipulated that the quantity of cocaine involved in the drug offense was thirteen grams. The plea agreement also indicated that the parties had agreed that the sentence would be at most ten years on the drug count and left the sentence on the tax count to the court’s discretion. In an earlier draft of the plea agreement, there was a reference to allowing the court discretion to fine the defendants; but this was later deleted. At the time of sentencing, the government provided to the probation officer information indicating that the defendant had been involved in large scale drug trafficking. This evidence was also presented to the judge at the time of sentencing. The trial court concluded that the offense involved fifteen kilograms of cocaine and sentenced the defendant accordingly. The trial court also imposed a $100,000 fine in connection with the tax offense. The Eleventh Circuit concludes that the fine violated the plea agreement between the parties: There was substantial negotiation over the financial implications of the plea, and the record indicated that the government agreed that no fine would be imposed. The Eleventh Circuit also concludes that finding that fifteen kilos was involved in the offense was prohibited by the plea agreement. While the government and the defendant cannot stipulate the parole consequences of a particular sentence, they can agree that the defendant will admit to particular conduct and the government will not attempt to show that other conduct was involved. That is precisely the agreement the parties made in this case. The proper remedy was the elimination of the $100,000 fine and a finding that the quantity of cocaine involved was thirteen grams. This finding would govern the actions of the parole commission.

United States v. Foster, 889 F.2d 1049 (11th Cir. 1989)

Following the defendant’s conviction, but prior to sentencing, the defendant agreed to meet with the DEA agent and discuss his involvement in drug trafficking activities. The government agreed not to disclose to the sentencing judge any information provided by the defendant. Nevertheless, the government breached this agreement by disclosing to the trial judge some of the drug trafficking activities which had not been disclosed during the trial, but which had been revealed by the defendant after the trial. It was not a sufficient remedy that the trial judge agreed not to consider that evidence in imposing sentence. Rather, the case would be remanded and a different judge would impose sentence.

United States v. Tobon-Hernandez, 845 F.2d 277 (11th Cir. 1988)

As part of his plea agreement, the defendant persuaded the government to limit its contentions as to the defendant’s participation in the conspiracy to certain sub-events. The government breached this agreement by indicating that the defendant participated in the conspiracy involving 432 kilograms of cocaine. The Court opted to compel the government to comply with its agreement under the plea agreement – a specific performance remedy as opposed to permitting the defendant to withdraw his guilty plea.

United States v. Nelson, 837 F.2d 1519 (11th Cir. 1988)

The government and the defendant had a plea agreement which provided that the government would reveal no further drug conspiracy involvement than that stipulated in the counts of the indictment to which the defendant was pleading guilty. The government violated its obligation by implying further involvement by the defendant. The District Court stated that it would consider no facts other than those listed in the pre-sentence investigation. However, the Court of Appeals holds that the defendant would be entitled to withdraw his plea or to have the plea agreement specifically enforced. Even if the trial court would not consider the additional information, it would be available to the Parole Commission.

In re Arnett, 804 F.2d 1200 (11th Cir. 1986)

As part of his plea agreement, the defendant agreed to forfeit all money which was found in his possession at the time of his arrest. Subsequently, the government sought to forfeit additional assets of the defendant. The court holds that the plea agreement impliedly prevented the government from moving to forfeit any additional assets of the defendant. However, the court will permit the government to forfeit additional assets but the defendant then has the right to vacate his plea agreement.

A convicted but unsentenced defendant retains a Fifth Amendment right not to testify as to incriminating matters that could have an impact on his sentence. This is true even if the plea agreement calls for the defendant to cooperate and results in the dismissal of other counts. In this case, co-defendants sought to call individuals to the stand who had pled guilty but who had not yet been sentenced. Those witnesses’ refusal to testify was upheld by the Court over the objection of the defendants who went to trial and sought their testimony.

The defendant’s transactional immunity plea agreement prohibited any further prosecution for the transaction in question, even if the government did not have “substantial knowledge” of the offense when the plea agreement was entered.
PLEA AGREEMENTS
(Improper Judicial Participation)

In re Benvin, 791 F.3d 1096 (9th Cir. 2015)
The district court’s participation in the plea bargain process violated Rule 11. During in-chambers proceedings, the court stated that portions of the proposed plea agreement were not acceptable because of certain limitations on restitution. The Ninth Circuit held these discussions violated Rule 11. Mandamus was an appropriate remedy and reassignment to a different judge was required.

United States v. Braxton, 784 F.3d 240 (4th Cir. 2015)
The defendant was facing ten years in prison for heroin distribution and the government filed a § 851 enhancement setting the mandatory minimum at 20 years. The government agreed to withdraw the § 851 notice if the defendant would plead guilty. The defendant insisted on a trial and sought to replace his attorney who strenuously urged the defendant to accept the plea. The judge, on the first day of trial, also urged the defendant to accept the plea, warning him that he was walking “into a buzz saw” “putting his head in a vice [sic]” and “I am not favorably inclined towards havint you go to trial.” The defendant eventually agreed to plead guilty and was sentenced to eleven and one-half years. These comments by the court tainted the guilty plea.

United States v. Sanya, 774 F.3d 812 (4th Cir. 2014)
The proper standard in deciding whether a judge’s participation in plea negotiations warrants setting aside a plea is whether the defendant can demonstrate “a reasonable probability” that the defendant would not have pleaded guilty without the judge’s interference. In this case, the judge repeatedly intimated that a plea was in the defendant’s best interest. The defendant’s proof was sufficient to satisfy the Fourth Circuit standard and the plea was vacated. The court expressly rejected the “but for” standard required by the Eleventh Circuit in its post-Davila decision, United States v. Davila, 749 F.3d 982 (11th Cir. 2014).

United States v. Hemphill, 748 F.3d 666 (5th Cir. 2014)
After the government offered a defendant a 5-year deal, the court engaged in lengthy discussions with the defendant about what had happened in other cases, e.g., two defendants rejected good offers and were sentenced to lengthy prison sentences and were not released early, and other defendants were successful in getting substantially reduced sentences who accepted deals. These comments crossed the boundary of what was permissible participation in plea negotiations and were coercive. The judge did not simply provide generic commentary about the pros and cons of plea offers. He provided only examples of the negative results for those who went to trial and positive results for those who accepted plea deals. Even post-Davila, setting aside the conviction was required based on this record.

United States v. Harrell, 751 F.3d 1235 (11th Cir. 2014)
The trial court addressed the defendant prior to trial and explained that the charges were very serious and that after trial, the options for fashioning a lower sentence was less likely than if a guilty plea were entered. The judge explained to another defendant that he was facing 22 years if convicted after trial, but only 7 years if he accepted the plea offer. The judge then remarked that the defendant’s desire to go to trial “is so far removed from logical, intelligent consideration that I have a doubt about his mental ability and mental capabilities.” The dialogue continued and eventually, the defendant entered a guilty plea. The Eleventh Circuit held that the judge violated Rule 11(c)(1) and set aside the judgment.

United States v. Kyle, 734 F.3d 956 (9th Cir. 2013)

The parties advised the court that a plea agreement in this case had been reached that provided for a 360-month sentence, which was within the guideline range for this child sex abuse case. The judge said that he would not accept that plea and wanted an above-guideline sentence, albeit not a life sentence. In a second hearing, the court indicated that a life sentence was appropriate. Eventually, the defendant entered a plea and was sentenced to 450 months. The Ninth Circuit held that the participation of the judge in the plea negotiations violated Rule 11, was plain error, and was prejudicial under the Davila standard. Remand to a new judge was the appropriate remedy. The court wrote, “We take this opportunity to emphasize that Rule 11(c)(1) is intended to eliminate all judicial pressure from plea discussions . . . We join other circuits in holding that “[w]hen a court goes beyond providing reasons for rejecting the agreement presented and comments on the hypothetical agreements it would or would not accept, it crosses over the line established by Rule 11 and becomes involved in the negotiations.”

United States v. Davila, 664 F.3d 1355 (11th Cir. 2011)

A magistrate judge who encouraged a defendant to think seriously about rejecting a plea and risking a long prison sentence violated Rule 11 and tainted a subsequent plea. The conversation with the magistrate occurred when the defendant sought to replace his court-appointed attorney (or proceed pro se), based on the attorney’s encouragement to plead guilty. The Magistrate essentially encouraged the defendant to seriously consider the wisdom of the attorney’s advice and also informed him about the two versus three point acceptance of responsibility reduction. The Eleventh Circuit held that prejudice is presumed whenever the judge contrasts the sentence that would be imposed if the defendant enters a guilty plea and the sentence that would be imposed following a conviction. THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED: Absent a showing of prejudice, vacating the plea is not necessary. United States v. Davila, 133 S. Ct. 2139 (2013).

United States v. Pena, 720 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2013)

During an in-chambers status conference that was not reported, the district court was informed that plea negotiations were occurring. The judge stated something to the effect that he expected that a related civil case would be resolved. The parties had somewhat different memories of what precisely the judge stated. The relationship between the civil case and the criminal case created a conflict for defense counsel. He later alerted the court about the conflict. The court responded by stating that the parties should disregard any comments the court made about the civil case during the in-chambers conference. The Fifth Circuit held that the court violated Rule 11’s prohibition on the court participating in plea negotiations and the plea should have been withdrawn when the defendant made the request to withdraw the plea. Note that this case is post-Davila.
United States v. Gonzalez-Melchor 648 F.3d 959 (9th Cir. 2011)

A judge who actively negotiated an appeal waiver in exchange for a shorter sentence violated Rule 11 and rendered the appeal waiver unenforceable.

United States v. Cano-Varela, 497 F.3d 1122 (10th Cir. 2007)

When the defendant attended a pretrial conference intending to request a new lawyer to prepare for trial, the judge cautioned the defendant that the proposed plea agreement would result in a much shorter sentence than he would face if he were to go to trial and be convicted. This violated Rule 11(c)(1) and necessitated setting aside the guilty plea. Though the judge was genuinely trying to be helpful and provide accurate advice to the defendant, “there is no avuncular-judge exception” to the Rule.

During the course of plea negotiations between the defendant and the government, the judge noted that in a similar case, he had given a sentence below what the government had offered in this case (implying that if the defendant accepted the offered plea, the court would impose a sentence at the same level, which was below what the government was offering). This amounted to improper participation in the plea negotiations. At sentencing, the court imposed a sentence well-above the sentence he imposed in the previous case.

In re Morgan, 506 F.3d 705 (9th Cir. 2007)

A district court judge may not summarily reject all plea agreements that contain a recommendation by the prosecution as a matter of policy. The district court must make an individualized decision regarding any plea agreement and whether to accept or reject the agreement and cannot establish his own policy of rejecting all government recommendations that are contained in a plea agreement.

United States v. Bradley, 455 F.3d 453 (4th Cir. 2006)

In the midst of trial, the judge excused the prosecutors and talked directly to the defendants about the enormous risks they faced if they proceeded until the end of trial. The court inquired of the defense attorneys about the status of failed plea negotiation efforts. The defendant then started the process of tendering a plea, but refused to acknowledge his guilt of participation in the conspiracy. The trial proceeded for another two weeks, and the court again addressed the defendants about whether they really wanted to proceed through the conclusion of trial, which would include evidence of various murders and autopsies. The court expressed shock that the defendants would not accept a ten-year deal that had been offered by the government. Later, the federal judge contacted a state court judge to negotiate a concurrent sentence if the defendant were to plead in both courts. After they entered guilty pleas, the court sentenced the three defendants to, 24 years, 60 years and life. Not surprisingly (and with the government’s agreement), the Fourth Circuit held that this process represented a blatant violation of Rule 11(c)(1)’s prohibition on court participation in the plea negotiation process.

United States v. O’Neill, 437 F.3d 654 (7th Cir. 2006)

What should a judge do when she decides that she is not going to accept a “binding” plea pursuant to Rule 11(c)(1)(c) (formerly known as 11(e)(1)(C))? In this case, the Seventh Circuit offered a number of different opinions on the subject, concluding, that “the less said, the better.” When initially provided with the binding plea, the court rejected it as a binding plea, explaining that maybe it was appropriate, maybe not, but that she was not going to be bound by the specific sentence envisioned by the agreement. The parties then reached a new agreement which appeared to reflect the judge’s “range” for the appropriate sentence. The court acknowledged that in evaluating a binding plea agreement, the court should take an active role in evaluating the plea agreement, but if the plea is ultimately rejected, the court may take no role in further plea negotiations, even though the comments made by the judge in rejecting the binding plea may lead the parties to refine the agreement in accordance with the comments of the court. There is no easy solution to this quandary, Judge Posner, concurring, acknowledged.

United States v. Diaz, 138 F.3d 1359 (11th Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor and the defense counsel were engaged in plea negotiations and advised the court that they were awaiting word from the U.S. Attorney's office whether the government would agree that the drug offense involved powder cocaine, not crack. The judge responded that such an agreement would not be made by the government, in his experience. The court also remarked about the strength of the government's case against the defendant and briefly discussed the applicable guideline range. This conversation occurred in the midst of a co-defendant's guilty plea on the morning of trial. The defendant ended up going to trial and was convicted. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that the trial judge's comments violated Rule 11(c)(1), but it was harmless error. The defendant did not claim that he would not have gone to trial, but for the judge's comments and there was no showing that the judge was biased, or incapable of conducting a fair trial and sentencing.

United States v. Kraus, 137 F.3d 447 (7th Cir. 1998)

The guilty plea was tainted by the fact that a court clerk communicated with the prosecutor about whether in the clerk's mind the judge would accept a particular 11(e)(1)(C) plea. The prosecutor repeated these observations to the defense attorney, who repeated them to the defendant. Though the clerk did not expressly state what the judge would do, the clerk's expression of her opinion created an appearance of impropriety.

United States v. Barrett, 982 F.2d 193 (6th Cir. 1992)

Before the defendant decided whether to plead or not, the trial court held a conference call with the prosecution and defense counsel to resolve a dispute concerning the sentencing guidelines. The defense counsel advised the court that the minimum was probably seven years. The judge responded that there was no way he would impose such a light sentence. The judge also told the attorney that he thought there was no defense and that he had heard that the investigator had found none of the defendant’s witnesses (which didn’t surprise him). The defendant entered a guilty plea shortly thereafter. The Sixth Circuit reversed: the judge’s comments amounted to improper participation in the plea negotiation process. Note that pursuant to Davila, automatic reversal is no longer appropriate for a Rule 11 violation.
POLYGRAPHS

Though a defendant has a constitutional right to introduce evidence in his defense, this is subject to appropriate rules of evidence. In military prosecutions, polygraph evidence is per se inadmissible. The Supreme Court held that this per se ban does not violate the defendants’ constitutional rights, because it is neither arbitrary, nor disproportionate.

United States v. Harvey, 829 F.3d 586 (8th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was improperly sentenced for both possession and receipt of child pornography. This violated the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Posado, 57 F.3d 428 (5th Cir. 1995)

Under the Daubert standard, polygraph evidence may be admitted, but a remand to further develop the record was necessary. The lower court must also consider whether Rule 403 would constrain the use of polygraph evidence.

United States v. Cordoba, 104 F.3d 225 (9th Cir. 1997)

A per se bar on polygraph evidence is inconsistent with the requirements of Daubert that the lower courts make a determination whether an expert’s testimony both rests on a reliable foundation and is relevant to the task at hand.

United States v. Miller, 874 F.2d 1255 (9th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was charged with espionage. The government sought to introduce the fact that he failed a polygraph not to rely on the results, but to explain why he subsequently made certain admissions. The Ninth Circuit agrees that the fact that a defendant failed a polygraph test may be admissible, as in the Hall case discussed above, not to prove the results of the polygraph test but to explain subsequent events. In this case, however the government went too far: The government went through a question by question and test result by test result review of the polygraph. This was unnecessary to explain the defendant’s subsequent confession. The impact of the polygraph examination evidence prejudiced the defendant and required a new trial.

United States v. Bowen, 857 F.2d 1337 (9th Cir. 1988)

Despite the government’s assurances to the defense and the court that it would not seek admission of the polygraph evidence, evidence of a polygraph examination and the surrounding circumstances of the examination were introduced requiring reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Hall, 805 F.2d 1410 (10th Cir. 1986)

Though polygraphs are generally inadmissible in a criminal trial, the Tenth Circuit affirms a conviction where the government introduced polygraph evidence for the sole purpose of refuting the defendant’s repeated arguments and suggestions during cross-examination that the government had failed to adequately investigate this case. A government agent was permitted to testify that no further investigation was performed because the polygraph results revealed that the defendant had blatantly mischaracterized the events.
United States v. Piccinonna, 885 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1989)

In a lengthy decision reviewing the law and science of polygraphs, the Eleventh Circuit decides that such evidence will henceforth be admissible in the following circumstances: First, if both parties stipulate to the admissibility of a polygraph, including the manner in which the test is conducted, the nature of the questions asked and the identity of the examiner who administers the test; second, a polygraph may be admitted when used to impeach or corroborate the testimony of a witness. If the test results are admitted under this theory, three preliminary conditions must be met: (a) the party planning to use the evidence must provide adequate notice to the opposing party; (b) the opposing party must be given an opportunity to have his own expert administer a test covering substantially the same questions to the witness; (c) the Federal Rules of Evidence governing corroboration or impeachment must otherwise be met. Thus, evidence that a witness passed a polygraph test may only be used if that witness’s credibility has been attacked. In any case, if the polygraph is being used for purposes of impeachment or corroboration, the trial judge is left with the discretion to determine admissibility.

The defendant is entitled to introduce polygraph evidence for corroboration, or impeachment of the defendant. Polygraph evidence satisfies the standard of Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals.

Following remand from the Eleventh Circuit, the trial court held the questions and answers given by the defendant during a polygraph session were not relevant to the issues in his perjury trial and thus the evidence would be excluded. The court went on to question whether a polygraph could ever be used to corroborate or impeach a witness’s testimony, because under Rule 608(a) only “character” evidence is admissible for this purpose. One polygraph session would not be adequate to enable a polygrapher to give character testimony. Affirmed: 925 F.2d 1474.

United States v. Henderson, 409 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2005)

A district court may reject the admissibility of polygraph evidence under the Daubert standard, despite the earlier ruling by the same court that such evidence may be admitted. United States v. Piccinonna, 885 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1989).
PORNOPHROGRAPHY

The Supreme Court upheld the child pornography pandering provision that had earlier been held unconstitutional by the Eleventh Circuit. The statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2252A(a)(3)(B) makes it a crime to solicit, or to offer to sell or distribute material that is purported to be child pornography. The Court rejected the defendant’s claim that it violates the First Amendment to make it a crime to offer to sell or distribute material as child pornography, if, in fact, the material being offered for sale is not, in fact, child pornography. The Court also rejected a Fifth Amendment vagueness challenge.

The Supreme Court holds that the “virtual” pornography provision contained in the 1996 Child Pornography Prevention Act is unconstitutional. This provision is not intrinsically related to the protection of children or to the sexual abuse of children, because, by definition, no children are involved in the production of the images. In addition, the statute is defective because it does not incorporate the community standards test of obscenity requiring that the artistic merit of a work be judged considering the work as a whole.

The Child Online Protection Act is not unconstitutionally overbroad just because it uses a community standards test to regulate speech on the World Wide Web.

The United States Supreme Court held that the statute outlawing the interstate transportation of obscene material depicting minors, 18 U.S.C. §2252, has an implicit requirement that the offender know that the actor depicted is a minor.

United States v. Chilaca, 909 F.3d 289 (9th Cir. 2018)

The defendant had a hard drive, a laptop and desktop computer, each of which had access to a dropbox account that had child pornography. This evidence only supports one count of possession of child pornography. The possession was simultaneous and in the same location (his house).

United States v. Brown, 859 F.3d 730 (9th Cir. 2017)

18 U.S.C. § 2251(d)(1) makes it a crime to advertise the availability of child pornography. The defendant had a bulletin board on his website that advertised the availability of child pornography, but it was a “closed” bulletin board. The government moved in limine to bar the defendant from arguing to the jury that the fact that the bulletin board was “closed” meant that it did not qualify as an advertisement. The trial court granted the motion. The Ninth Circuit reversed. While the defense counsel’s proposed argument did not suggest that a “closed” bulletin board was legally incapable of qualifying as an advertisement, it was fair game to argue that the jury could decide that the closed nature of the bulletin board meant that it did not qualify. as an advertisement. It was a fact question, not a legal question and the defendant was entitled to make his argument to the jury.

United States v. Palomino-Coronado, 805 F.3d 127 (4th Cir. 2015)

In order to be convicted of violating § 2251, the defendant must engage in sexual conduct with the minor for the purpose of producing a visual depiction of such conduct. It is not enough to engage in sexual conduct and to produce a visual depiction: the defendant must engage in the sexual conduct for the proscribed purpose. In most cases – many of which are cited by the court – the purpose is proven through circumstantial evidence (the number of images taken; the defendant’s statements during the sexual conduct that indicate that he is “directing” the filming; the number of images; the defendant’s subsequent distribution of the images). But in this case, there were numerous sexual acts and only one sexually explicit photo was found and that photo had been deleted. The evidence was insufficient to prove that the sexual conduct occurred with the specific intent and purpose to produce a visual depiction of the conduct.

United States v. Lowe, 795 F.3d 519 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant lived in the house with his wife and until recently with a young relative. Child pornography was on a file sharing program in one of the computers found in the house that was not password protected, but which had the defendant’s first name as the username. This evidence, standing alone, was not sufficient to convict the defendant of possessing, receiving and distributing child pornography. There must be some evidence linking him to the contraband when it is shown that the computer was accessible to others.

United States v. Encarnacion-Ruiz, 787 F.3d 581 (1st Cir. 2015)

In a child pornography production case, if a defendant is charged with aiding and abetting the production of child porn, a mistake of fact (the child’s age) is a defense. Unlike the principal perpetrator, who cannot raise this defense, pursuant to Rosemond v. United States, an aider and abettor must have the intent to commit the offense including all elements of the crime.

United States v. Husmann, 765 F.3d 169 (3rd Cir. 2014)

Possessing child pornography and a file-sharing program is not alone sufficient to convict the defendant of distributing child pornography. There must be evidence that someone else downloaded the pornography from the defendant’s computer. This holding applies to the code section that makes it a crime to distribute child pornography, but does not apply to the sentencing guideline, which defines “distribute” to include possession with intent to distribute.

United States v. Emly, 747 F.3d 974 (8th Cir. 2014)

The possession of several images of child pornography only amounts to one offense under 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(4)(A) and (B). Unlike § 2252A, the former sections make it a crime to possess “one or more” items of child pornography.

United States v. Grzybowicz, 747 F.3d 1296 (11th Cir. 2014)

A defendant who transfers images of child pornography from his phone to his computer has not committed the offense of distribution of child pornography under 18 U.S.C. §2252A(a)(2).
Boland v. Holder, 682 F.3d 531 (6th Cir. 2012)

Neither a defense attorney, nor his forensic expert, are exempt from the laws proscribing the possession or creation of child pornography and therefore, the creation of child pornography (even for purposes of a demonstration at trial), by photo-shopping a child’s head on a nude adult body is a criminal offense.

United States v. Chiaradio, 684 F.3d 265 (1st Cir. 2012)

The possession of several items of child pornography on different computers in one location can only support one count of “possession one or more items of child pornography.” 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(4)(B). A different result might apply to charges brought under 18 U.S.C. § 2252A, which makes it a crime to possess “any” items of child pornography.

United States v. Huether, 673 F.3d 789 (8th Cir. 2012)

Possession of child pornography is a lesser included offense of receipt of child pornography if both charges involve the same images. In this case, the trial court did not identify for the jury which images applied to which count and therefore, there was no way to determine that the jury did, in fact, convict the defendant of the two offenses based on separate images.

United States v. Moreland, 665 F.3d 137 (5th Cir. 2011)

The evidence was insufficient to support the defendant’s conviction of possessing child pornography that was found in the “slack space” of a computer the defendant shared with others in the house. The defendant’s father was known to be a pornography “enthusiast” and the evidence equally pointed to him as the possessor.

United States v. Johnson, 652 F.3d 918 (8th Cir. 2011)

The evidence was insufficient to support a conviction for receiving child pornography, though there was sufficient evidence to prove possession. The defendant’s computer had child pornography images. The indictment alleged that he possessed child pornography that had been shipped and transported in interstate commerce, a violation of § 2252(a)(2). However, when the judge instructed the jury, the jurisdictional element was explained as follows: “The materials containing the illicit visual depictions were produced using materials that had been mailed, shipped, or transported by computer in interstate or foreign commerce.” There was no evidence at trial that the components of the computer were shipped in interstate commerce. The Eighth Circuit held that where the jury instructions limit the manner in which the offense may be committed, this also limits the sufficiency-of-the-evidence review by the appellate court. The evidence was insufficient in this case.

United States v. Ehle, 640 F.3d 689 (6th Cir. 2011)

Convictions for both possessing and receiving child pornography violated the double jeopardy clause. The convictions could not stand, even though the defendant entered a guilty plea.

United States v. Lynn, 636 F.3d 1127 (9th Cir. 2011)

1322
It violates double jeopardy to convict a person of both receiving and possessing child pornography. Even if the offenses were alleged to have occurred on different dates, this does not necessarily alleviate the constitutional problem.

United States v. Muhlenbruch, 634 F.3d 987 (8th Cir. 2011)

The double jeopardy clause prohibits a conviction for both receiving and possession child pornography. The Eighth Circuit remanded to the district court to determine which conviction should be vacated.

United States v. Steen, 634 F.3d 822 (5th Cir. 2011)

The surreptitious video recording of a naked minor girl on a tanning salon bed was not lascivious, because the video did not draw attention the girl’s genital area for the purpose of sexual stimulation of the viewer. The court cited the five factors originally detailed in United States v. Dost, 636 F.Supp. 828 (S.D.Cal. 1986), in reaching its decision.

United States v. Szymanski, 631 F.3d 794 (6th Cir. 2011)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to receiving child pornography under 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(2). However, during the plea colloquy, it was not made clear to the defendant that the scienter requirement of the statute required that he know when he received the pornography that it included images of children engaged in sexual activity. See United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994). This defect in the plea necessitated setting aside the guilty plea.

United States v. Dobbs, 629 F.3d 1199 (10th Cir. 2011)

Child pornography that was only located in a temporary internet folder, or cache, on the defendant’s computer and not shown to have ever been viewed by the defendant cannot support a “receiving child pornography” conviction under § 2252 (as it existed at the time of the events in this case). The statute was amended in 2007 and now also outlaws “knowingly accessing sexually explicit images with the intent to view them,” which might have changed the result in this case.

United States v. Wright, 625 F.3d 583 (9th Cir. 2010)

Prior to the 2008 amendments to 18 U.S.C. § 2252A, the child pornography had to be mailed or transported in interstate or foreign commerce. (Now the statute outlaws receiving or sending child pornography “using any means or facility of interstate or foreign commerce or in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce by any means, including by computer”). Under the former version (which was the statute in force when the defendant’s conduct occurred), the government had to prove – and did not succeed in this case – that the pornography crossed a state line, not simply that the Internet was used. In this case, the undercover agent received the pornography from the defendant’s computer directly, computer-to-computer, without a server in another state being involved. The evidence was insufficient to support the conviction on that count. Based on Wright, the Ninth Circuit also reversed the conviction in United States v. Flyer, 633 F.3d 911 (9th Cir. 2011).

United States v. Broxmeyer, 616 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2010)
The defendant was charged with production of child pornography. 18 U.S.C. § 2251(a). The theory of the prosecution is that he induced his young girl friend to take sexually explicit photographs of herself and send the pictures to him. Though the evidence established that over the course of the relationship, he did encourage her to provide him sexually explicit photographs, there was insufficient evidence that he encouraged her to produce the particular photographs that were the subject of the indictment. In fact, the evidence indicated that the girl sent him the photographs prior to the time that they began their sexual relationship. Because of the absence of evidence proving that he induced or encouraged her to take the two pictures that were the subject of those two counts of the indictment, he could not be convicted of producing those pictures.

United States v. Kilbride, 584 F.3d 1240 (9th Cir. 2009)

In determining whether speech which is communicated online is obscene, the Ninth Circuit held that a “national standard” rather than a local community standard must be applied.

United States v. Polouizzi, 564 F.3d 142 (2d Cir. 2009)

The unit of prosecution for possession of child pornography is the defendant’s entire collection, not one count per image. For receipt prosecutions, however, the proper unit of prosecution is for each episode that images were received.

United States v. Lewis, 554 F.3d 208 (1st Cir. 2009)

18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(2) makes it a crime to receive child pornography that has traveled in interstate commerce. The First Circuit holds that the images must, in fact, travel in interstate commerce in order for this statute to be violated. However, if the images are received over the Internet, this jurisdictional fact is established. NOTE: the statute has now been amended and the crime can be proven if the images traveled in or affected interstate commerce (2008 amendment to § 2252(a)(2)).

United States v. Rivera, 546 F.3d 245 (2d Cir. 2008)

Though ultimately upholding the conviction in this child pornography case, the Second Circuit thoroughly analyzes the requirement that an image be “lewd and lascivious” before it can qualify as pornography under 18 U.S.C. § 2256(2)(A)(v). The court concludes that a nude photo of a 16-year old male on a bed satisfied the requirement of the statute. The leading case on the definition of “lascivious” is United States v. Dorst, 636 F.Supp. 828 (S.D.Cal. 1986).

United States v. Schales, 546 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2008)

The double jeopardy clause prohibits a conviction on charges of both possessing and receiving material involving the sexual exploitation of minors.

United States v. Schene, 543 F.3d 627 (10th Cir. 2008)

The fact that a hard drive was manufactured in a foreign country, and that child pornography was found on the hard drive does not suffice to establish the jurisdictional prong in § 2252A(a)(5)(B) that the pornography was “produced using materials that have been mailed, or shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce.” The hard drive did not “produce” the images, nor did the hard drive “produce” the images by portraying the images on the computer.
monitor. However, under the plain error standard of review, the evidence was sufficient to establish that the images were created elsewhere and the hard drive was used to copy the images onto the defendant’s computer.

United States v. Davenport, 519 F.3d 940 (9th Cir. 2008)

   A defendant may not be found guilty of both receiving and possessing child pornography. See also United States v. Miller, 527 F.3d 54 (3rd Cir. 2008) (same); United States v. Johnston, 789 F.3d 934 (9th Cir. 2015).

United States v. Schaefer, 501 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2007)

   A child pornography prosecution requires proof that the image traveled in interstate commerce (including via a computer). In this case, the only evidence was that the image arrived via the Internet, but no proof of any interstate nexus. The mere fact that the image arrived over the Internet does not ipso facto establish that the image traveled in interstate commerce. OVERRULED in part by United States v. Sturm, 672 F.3d 891 (10th Cir. 2012).

United States v. McDowell, 498 F.3d 308 (5th Cir. 2007)

   The defendant was charged with aiding and abetting a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1461, mailing obscene material using the U.S. Postal Service. Though the obscene material was, in fact, mailed, there was in sufficient evidence that the defendant was aware that the mails were being used or that he aided and abetted the offense with the knowledge that the mails were being used to distribute the obscene videos.

United States v. Buchanan, 485 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2007)

   The defendant was convicted of several counts of receiving child pornography, but the evidence did not prove that there was more than one download with regard to the charged counts and even though there were several pictures, they were received as part of one transfer and, therefore, the defendant could only be convicted of one count of receiving child pornography.

United States v. Kuchinski, 469 F.3d 853 (9th Cir. 2006)

   A defendant may not be held responsible for images of child pornography that are contained in a computer’s internet cache file, unless there is proof that the defendant endeavored to access the images in the cache file, or was knowingly in possession of the images in that compartment of the computer.

United States v. Macewan, 445 F.3d 237 (3rd Cir. 2006)

   Any use of the Internet in connection with pornography satisfies the interstate commerce requirement, regardless of whether the government introduces evidence that the actual images traveled across a state line.

American Civil Liberties Union v. Ashcroft, 322 F.3d 240 (3rd Cir. 2003)

   On remand from the Supreme Court (535 U.S. 564) which upheld certain portions of the “Child Online Protection Act” 47 U.S.C. § 231, the Third Circuit found other provisions unconstitutional. First, because the Internet has no geographical limits, the Act is too broad in invoking “community standards” for determining what constitutes pornography. Second, the Act’s definition of “material harmful to minors” fails to allow for an evaluation of the material in context, thus the “taken as a whole” definition fails to meet First Amendment strictures. AFFIRMED: 542 U.S. 656 (2004).

United States v. Maxwell, 446 F.3d 1210 (11th Cir. 2006)

The initial panel decision (386 F.3d 1042) held that a blank computer disk that was transported in interstate commerce (while still blank), and later used to copy child pornography, but that was not transported in interstate commerce afterwards, did not provide federal jurisdiction. The panel held that the pornography must travel in interstate commerce, not just the disk (blank) onto which the pornography is later copied. This case contains a very lengthy analysis of the various theories of interstate commerce. – THIS CASE WAS SENT BACK TO THE ELEVENTH CIRCUIT FROM THE SUPREME COURT FOR RECONSIDERATION IN LIGHT OF GONZALEZ V. RAICH. ---- AND REVERSED on April 20, 2006 – 446 F.3d 1210 (11th Cir. 2006). The new decision held that copying pornography onto a disk that has previously traveled in interstate commerce is a federal offense.

United States v. Hilton, 363 F.3d 58 (1st Cir. 2004)

In a prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 2252, if the defendant is alleged to have possessed photos of children in sexually explicit poses, the government must prove with relevant evidence – in addition to the pictures themselves – that the images appearing in the photo are, in fact, real children. The defendant is entitled to have this element proved affirmatively without entering any evidence to the contrary. NOTE: This decision was subsequently withdrawn and a new decision was issued on Sept. 27, 2004 – United States v. Hilton, 386 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2004). In the new decision, the court again granted post-conviction relief, but this time only on the basis that the trial judge (this was a bench trial) failed to make any finding of fact regarding whether the materials the defendant possessed depicted real children. This is an element of the offense. The First Circuit did not allude to the necessity of presenting any evidence to affirmatively disprove the possibility that the images were not real.

United States v. Corp, 236 F.3d 325 (6th Cir. 2001)

The defendant’s possession of pornographic pictures of his wife and girlfriend having sexual relations could not be prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 2252(a)(4)(B), because of a lack of a sufficient interstate nexus. The fact that the photographic paper was manufactured out of state was not a sufficient nexus. This case was later distinguished in United States v. Andrews, 383 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 2004). Still later, the Sixth Circuit held that in light of Raich, the decision in Corp was no longer good law. United States v. Bowers, 594 F.3d 522 (6th Cir. 2010).

United States v. Burian, 19 F.3d 188 (5th Cir. 1994)

The federal statute criminalizing the knowing receipt of visual depictions of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct has an implicit knowledge requirement that the defendant be aware (or be recklessly disregarding) the age of the performer.

United States v. Easley, 942 F.2d 405 (6th Cir. 1991)

In instructing the jury on the definition of obscenity, the judge explained that whether the material “lacked serious literary, artistic, political or scientific merit” was judged by an average person applying contemporary community standards. This was erroneous. The material is not to be judged on a local community standard in deciding the third prong of the Miller test. That test focuses only on the reasonable person, not a reasonable person in that community.

United States v. Shumway, 911 F.2d 1528 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was prosecuted for violating 18 U.S.C. §1461, mailing obscene matter. The defendant, a woman, had posed for various sexual videotapes which were made by her boyfriend. Unbeknownst to her, after she and her boyfriend broke up, the boyfriend sold the videotapes through magazine advertisements. The evidence was not sufficient to convict the woman since there was no proof that she was aware that the tapes would be used for that purpose. The act of posing for tapes does not provide proof of the defendant’s knowledge that her boyfriend would later mail the tapes in interstate commerce.
POSSE COMITATUS ACT

United States v. Dreyer, 804 F.3d 1266 (9th Cir. 2015)

The Posse Comitatus Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1385 forbids Army and Air Force military personnel from participating in civilian law enforcement activities. Regulations extend this to all branches of the military. In this case, a civilian Navy Criminal Investigative Service investigator launched a child pornography investigation. The panel held that the evidence he obtained should have been suppressed. Reviewing the case en banc, the Ninth Circuit held that the Navy’s conduct did violate the Posse Comitatus Act, but that the evidence would not be suppressed.
POST-ARREST SILENCE AND INVOCATION OF RIGHT TO COUNSEL

In this murder prosecution, the state prosecutor asked the defendant why he did not give his version of the story to the police at the time of arrest. An objection by the defendant was sustained and the judge told the jury to disregard the question. The United States Supreme Court holds that this does not constitute a violation of Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976), because the defendant’s silence was not used against him. The state trial court specifically ruled that evidence inadmissible and told the jury to disregard the statement. Thus, the question, though improper, constitutes harmless error.

United States v. Wilchcombe, 838 F.3d 1179 (11th Cir. 2016)

Several cases in the Eleventh Circuit have held that the government may comment on a defendant’s silence if it occurred prior to the time that he was arrested and given his Miranda warning. That is, the defendant’s silence after he is placed in custody, if he has not yet been advised of his Miranda rights, is admissible to prove the defendant’s guilt. In this case, Judge Jordan authored a concurring opinion advocating that these decisions were decided erroneously and advocated en banc reconsideration of this issue. En Banc consideration was denied and the Supreme Court subsequently denied a petition for certiorari. The Supreme Court has held that post-arrest pre-Miranda silence may be used to impeach the defendant. Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 628 (1993).

United States v. Edwards, 792 F.3d 355 (3rd Cir. 2015)

The government repeatedly referred during trial and during closing argument to the defendant’s failure to speak, after having received his Miranda warning and having invoked his right to remain silent. This was reversible error.

United States v. Shannon, 766 F.3d 346 (3rd Cir. 2014)

The prosecutor was permitted to ask the defendant, on cross-examination, whether he had ever told anybody about his exculpatory version of the facts. This violated Doyle, because it amounted to a comment on his post-arrest, post-Miranda silence. It matters not that some of the questions were directed to his pre-arrest silence. Even a couple questions about post-Miranda silence may violate Doyle’s prohibition.

Ford v. Wilson, 747 F.3d 944 (7th Cir. 2014)

Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976) prohibits impeaching a defendant with the defendant’s post-Miranda silence (i.e., “You didn’t tell this story after you were arrested, did you?”). In Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), the Supreme Court held that a prosecutor may not comment during closing argument about the defendant’s failure to testify at trial. Both of these decisions address the improper suggestion that invoking the Fifth Amendment can be costly to the defendant. Griffin, however, is subject to exceptions if the defense attorney’s closing argument raises the issue and the prosecutor is simply responding. United States v. Robinson, 485 U.S. 25 (1988). In this case, the defendant was charged with murder. The defense attorney argued in his closing that the prosecutor failed to prove any motive why the defendant would kill the victim. In response, in his closing, the prosecutor argued that there were only two people were there who could explain what happened and one of them was dead. “The next possible source is the person who committed the offense. If that person who committed the offense don’t talk, how would we ever know?” In this habeas case, the Seventh Circuit ultimately held that habeas relief was not required for procedural reasons.

United States v. Andaverde-Tinoco, 741 F.3d 509 (5th Cir. 2013)

The prosecutor improperly referenced the defendant’s post-arrest silence during closing argument in an effort to imply that this disproved the defendant’s defense that he was justified in illegally crossing the border after being beaten and robbed before crossing the Rio Grande. Not plain error, however.

Jaradat v. Williams, 591 F.3d 863 (6th Cir. 2010)

The state court prosecutor elicited testimony from the arresting officer that the defendant invoked his right to counsel rather than answering any questions and that he always wants to hear both sides of the story, but the defendant did not tell his side of the story and never admitted that he had sexual contact with the victim (at trial, the defendant contended that the sexual contact was consensual). The Sixth Circuit held that this testimony represented a direct comment on the defendant’s post-arrest silence and were impermissible under Doyle. Harmless error.

United States v. Waller, 654 F.3d 430 (3rd Cir. 2011)

The trial court instructed the jury that in ascertaining the defendant’s intent, it could consider any statements made or omitted by the defendant. The defendant had invoked his right to remain silent when he was arrested. This instruction was an improper invitation to consider the defendant’s post-Miranda silence. Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976). Conviction reversed.

Gov’t. of Virgin Islands v. Davis, 561 F.3d 159 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The prosecutor cross-examined the defendant about his failure to make a statement to the police post-arrest/post-Miranda. Reversible error.

United States v. Gentry, 555 F.3d 659 (8th Cir. 2009)

The defendant claimed at trial that the drugs in the car belonged to someone else. She made no such statement to the police when she was arrested. Cross-examining her about this failure to alert the police about the real culprit was reversible error. A defendant may not be impeached with her post-arrest silence, or failure to provide exculpatory information.

United States v. Caruto, 532 F.3d 822 (9th Cir. 2008)

Generally, a defendant who invokes his Miranda rights may not be impeached by evidence that he invoked his rights or that he remained silent. Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976); Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284 (1986). In this case, the defendant started making a statement – waiving her right to remain silent – but then stopped and invoked her right to remain silent. At trial, when she was cross-examined, she expanded on her statement. The prosecutor then cross-examined her, pointing out that various facts included in her testimony at trial were not included in her statement to the police. The “omission” was the result of her invocation of the right to remain silent. In other words, the only way the defendant could explain that certain portions of her trial testimony were omitted from her statement to the police, was to explain that she invoked her right to remain silent. The Ninth Circuit held that in this limited circumstance, the prosecutor should not be permitted to cross-examine the defendant about the omitted portion of the statement.

United States v. Andujar-Basco, 488 F.3d 549 (1st Cir. 2007)

If a defendant initially waives his right to remain silent and begins answering questions, he still retains the right to terminate questioning and invoke his right to remain silent. If he does so, the government may not introduce the subsequent invocation of his right to remain silent at trial.

United States v. Hernandez, 476 F.3d 791 (9th Cir. 2007)

Introducing the defendant’s post-arrest, pre-Miranda silence, when asked, “What is this?” by an officer who was holding up a brick of cocaine, was error. Harmless error.

United States v. Lopez, 500 F.3d 840 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant claimed that he fled across the border into the United States to avoid being killed by a Mexican drug dealer. The AUSA cross-examined him about his failure to make this claim when he was apprehended by border patrol agents. The question arguably included post-arrest/post-Miranda silence. This was an improper comment on his right to remain silent. Harmless error.

People of Territory of Guam v. Veloria, 136 F.3d 648 (9th Cir. 1998)

The government called to the stand a police officer who arrested the defendant. The only testimony elicited from the officer was that the defendant invoked his right to remain silent and his right to counsel. This was plain error.

Hill v. Turpin, 135 F.3d 1411 (11th Cir. 1998)

Repeatedly during the course of trial, the prosecutor made reference to the defendant’s invocation of his right to counsel, and to remain silent, after receiving Miranda warnings. This violated the rule of Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976) and required setting aside the death penalty conviction.

Brown v. Dugger, 831 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987)

It was improper for the prosecutor to make reference during his closing argument to the defendant’s silence in the face of accusatory statements made by his co-defendant when the police put the two together in a room. The Court further holds that this argument was not “invited” by any statements of defense counsel.

Matire v. Wainwright, 811 F.2d 1430 (11th Cir. 1987)

During closing argument, the prosecutor referred to the defendant’s silence after having been warned of his Miranda rights. The government argued that evidence of post-arrest silence was probative on the defendant’s insanity defense. The Eleventh Circuit reverses on the basis of this Fifth Amendment violation.
Prior to his arrest and prior to being placed in custody, the defendant invoked his privilege against self-incrimination in a “bragging tone of voice.” The trial court committed reversible error in allowing a trooper to describe the defendant’s invocation of his privilege.

After being arrested, the defendant stated, “I’m in a lot of trouble and I want to speak to my lawyer.” The government introduced this statement into evidence. This was reversible error as it amounts to evidence of the defendant’s post-Miranda post-arrest silence.

The prosecutor improperly introduced evidence, and argued to the jury the significance of this evidence, relating to the defendant’s post-Miranda silence. This “egregious” conduct required that the conviction be set aside.

The state trial court committed reversible error in permitting the state to introduce evidence in support of the state’s theory that the defendant was sane, and that the defendant remained silent after being read his Miranda rights. This evidence is clearly inadmissible under Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976) and Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284 (1986).

Counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the state offered evidence of the defendant’s silence after being advised of his Miranda rights.

The prosecutor violated the defendant’s rights under Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976), by asking an officer about the defendant’s post-arrest post-Miranda silence. With respect to post-Miranda warnings “silence,” silence does not mean only muteness; it includes the statement of a desire to remain silent, as well as of a desire to remain silent until an attorney has been consulted. Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284 (1983). The error was not harmless, and the writ would be granted.

The trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce evidence of the defendant’s post-arrest / post-Miranda silence. Though the defendant later waived his Miranda rights and made a statement, this does not amount to a waiver of the right not to have post-arrest silence admitted. Harmless error.

The prosecutor’s references to the petitioner’s post-arrest silence violated the defendant’s rights under the Fifth Amendment. The district court correctly granted the writ vacating the conviction.

The defendant was charged with tax evasion. When he was cross-examined by the prosecutor, he was asked whether he had ever told the IRS agent that he was innocent; and asked whether he had hired a criminal defense attorney when he was first approached by the IRS. Both of these lines of questioning were improper and merited a reversal of the conviction, even though the trial court later directed the jury to disregard these questions and answers. The questions amounted to improper Doyle v. Ohio questions. Even with regard to non-custodial questioning by the IRS agent, because the agent advised the defendant of his right to an attorney, and his right to remain silent, the invocation of that right could not be used to impeach the defendant or suggest that he was demonstrating a consciousness of guilt. With regard to the curative instruction, the instruction merely repeated the offensive questions and answers and then urged the jury to ignore the testimony. This was not an adequate curative instruction.

United States v. Newman, 943 F.2d 1155 (9th Cir. 1991)

The prosecutor’s repeated efforts to elicit testimony about the defendant’s post-arrest silence necessitated a reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Canterbury, 985 F.2d 483 (10th Cir. 1993)

Defendant claimed that he purchased a silencer after being set up (entrapped). At trial, he was cross-examined about this failure to make this claim at the time of his arrest. Because this cross was designed to impeach the defendant’s claim of entrapment, this amounted to reversible error.

United States v. Harrold, 796 F.2d 1275 (10th Cir. 1986)

It was error to admit evidence of the defendant’s post-Miranda silence. The error was harmless in this case.

United States v. Tenorio, 69 F.3d 1103 (11th Cir. 1995)

When entering customs at Miami Airport, the defendant was searched by a customs agent who discovered heroin in his suitcase. Shortly thereafter, the defendant was Mirandized and he declined to waive his rights. The next day, the defendant told an agent that the suitcase had been given to him by a cab driver. At trial, the prosecutor argued that this excuse, coming as it did a day after the discovery of the heroin, was indicative of guilt. If the defendant had been given the suitcase by a cab driver, the prosecutor argued, he would have revealed this immediately after the heroin was discovered. This was not harmless error, since the defendant’s silence was the touchstone of the government’s case.

United States v. Rivera, 944 F.2d 1563 (11th Cir. 1991)

After the defendant was arrested and while his bags were being searched, he said nothing. In fact, the defendant, along with her companions, remained “deadpan” during the entire encounter with Customs officials, including after being Mirandized and as their bags were being searched. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that this reaction was pre-planned by the defendants. The court thoroughly reviews the law governing the use of a defendant’s post-Miranda silence – including a discussion of whether one’s facial expressions or demeanor can amount to “silence” – and concludes that even if there was error, it was harmless.

United States v. Pena, 897 F.2d 1075 (11th Cir. 1990)

Following his arrest, the defendant was asked if he wanted to make a statement. He responded, “I really want to but I can’t. They will kill my parents.” This amounted to at least an ambiguous invocation of his right to remain silent. The government should have clarified the defendant’s desire before continuing the interrogation. His subsequent incriminating statements should not have been used, though it was harmless error. Also, the Court notes that a defendant’s post-Miranda ambiguous expression of a desire to remain silent is not admissible in evidence. The same is true, of course, for an unambiguous expression of intent to remain silent. This case probably did not survive the decision in Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994). See Coleman v. Singletary, 30 F.3d 1420 (11th Cir. 1994).
Brown v. Dugger, 831 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987)

Following the arrest of the defendant and his confederate, the two were placed in a room together in the presence of the investigating officer. The co-defendant implicated the defendant in the murder; the defendant remained silent. At trial, the investigating officer was permitted to testify that the defendant remained silent and the prosecutor relied on this incriminating silence in his closing argument. The Eleventh Circuit holds this is reversible error.

Maire v. Wainwright, 811 F.2d 1430 (11th Cir. 1987)

The testimony of two police officers as well as the prosecutor’s closing argument regarding the defendant’s silence after being informed of his Miranda rights was impermissible. The evidence was argued by the prosecutor to demonstrate the defendant was not, in fact, insane as he contended in his defense. Because the issue of sanity was not overwhelming, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Moore, 104 F.3d 377 (D.C.Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with possession of cocaine that was found under the hood of his car. After the police discovered the cocaine under the hood, the defendant made no comment and expressed no surprise. He was in custody when this occurred. In closing argument, the prosecutor queried why, if the defendant were unaware that there were drugs under the hood, he said nothing, and failed to register surprise when the drugs were found there. This was an impermissible comment on the defendant’s post-arrest silence. The court further held that the fact that the defendant had not received Miranda warnings did not alter the result. After a defendant is in custody, whether Mirandized or not, his silence cannot be used by the prosecution as evidence of his guilty knowledge, or state of mind. The use of un-Mirandized silence may, however, be used for impeachment purposes, the court notes. Harmless error. The court denied re-hearing en banc, with a lengthy dissent by Judge Silberman, explaining the significance of the court’s holding.

United States v. Johnson, 802 F.2d 1459 (D.C.Cir. 1986)

It was error for the prosecutor to call a witness for the sole purpose of bringing out the post-arrest statement which was not otherwise admissible. However, the defendant’s failure to object to the statement renders the error harmless.
PRIVILEGES

(Accountant-Client)

United States v. BDO Seidman, 337 F.3d 802 (7th Cir. 2003)

The IRS issued a summons to the large accounting firm, asking for documents that would reveal the identity of every client who sought advice regarding, and ultimately invested in, certain tax shelters. The clients invoked the privilege of confidential communications between an accountant and his client. See 26 U.S.C. § 7525. Because the information being sought did not include actual communications, the summons was permissible. This decision reviews in depth the law surrounding the issuance of IRS summonses and the law of privilege in the context of IRS inquiries.
PRIVILEGES

(Journalist)

United States v. Sterling, 724 F.3d 482 (4th Cir. 2013)

The court reaffirmed that there is no reporter’s privilege protecting a reporter from revealing his source.

In re: Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller, 438 F.3d 1141 (D.C. Cir. 2006)

The First Amendment does not allow reporter’s to shield their sources from the grand jury. Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972). Even if there were a common law recognizing a reporter’s privilege, it would not be absolute and would have been overcome in this case, where the special counsel was investigating unlawful disclosures of a CIA agent’s identity.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller, 438 F.3d 1131 (D. C. Cir. 2005)

The New York Times reporter was properly held in contempt for failing to comply with a grand jury subpoena relating to her coverage of a story involving the improper leaking of the identity of a CIA agent. See Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972).
PRIVILEGES
(Marital)

United States v. Jarvison, 409 F.3d 1221 (10th Cir. 2005)

The evidence supported the district court’s decision that the defendant and the witness were married pursuant to Navajo law. The court also held that a witness’s right to invoke the spousal privilege applies even in cases of familial child abuse.

United States v. Gilbert, 391 F.3d 882 (7th Cir. 2004)

When the defendant’s spouse refused to testify at trial, relying on the marital privilege, the trial court allowed the government to play her previous statement, because the court found that it had circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness. Post-Crawford, this was erroneous.

United States v. Montgomery, 384 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2004)

The Ninth Circuit explains the difference between the marital communication privilege (which the defendant and/or the witness may invoke, to bar the disclosure of a communication with his/her spouse) and the spousal privilege (which allows a witness to refuse to testify against his/her spouse). In this case, the trial court erroneously permitted the government to introduce a letter written from the spouse to the defendant accusing him (and his sister) of perpetrating a fraud in their business. The court also held that the communication in this case was not in furtherance of the criminal activity (in fact, it was made in an effort to stop the crime), so that exception to the privilege did not apply.

United States v. Rakes, 136 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with perjury. He was the victim of extortion and had been called to the grand jury to testify about the crime, but denied that he had been victimized. He confided in his wife, and his attorney about the extortion. The government then sought to compel the testimony of his wife and attorney. The district court upheld the marital communication and attorney-client privilege claims. The First Circuit affirmed. There is no exception to the privileges in cases in which the client is the victim of a crime. The court also held, with respect to the marital privilege, that it applies to conversations that relate to events that occurred prior to the marriage; and also applies after divorce. Finally, there is no exception for conversations that relate to financial matters, assuming the discussion is intended to be confidential.

United States v. Montgomery, 384 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2004)

A wife wrote a letter to her husband, encouraging him to talk to a third party about the third party’s criminal conduct. This communication was covered by the spousal privilege. The court also noted that the privilege belongs not only to the communicating spouse, but to the spouse who receives the communication.

In re Grand Jury, 111 F.3d 1083 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The government subpoenaed the wife of a subject of the grand jury (a subject, not a target) to testify before the grand jury. She asserted the marital privilege. The government offered her immunity – a promise not to use her testimony either directly, or indirectly against her husband, or to seek an indictment against her husband by this grand jury. This was permissible.

United States v. Hall, 989 F.2d 711 (4th Cir. 1993)

The defendant’s wife made statements to an investigator, prior to trial, revealing conversations she had had with her husband about his drug use. Prior to trial, however, she indicated that she would not testify, relying on the marital privilege. When the defendant testified, however, the prosecutor questioned him about the statements made by the wife. When the defense counsel objected because of the lack of foundation, the prosecutor responded (in front of the jury) that the wife had made these statements. Even with a curative instruction, this was reversible error.

United States v. Morris, 988 F.2d 1335 (4th Cir. 1993)

At the grand jury, the defendant’s wife refused to testify, relying on the marital privilege. At trial, however, she testified on behalf of her husband. When cross-examined, she was asked by the prosecutor about her prior invocation of the marital privilege. This was reversible error. Just as a witness may not be asked about the prior invocation of the Fifth Amendment privilege, a witness may not be asked about a prior invocation of the marital privilege. The privilege should not be undermined by permitting the prosecutor to capitalize on a witness’s reliance on the privilege.

United States v. Ramos-Oseguera, 120 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 1997)

A spouse’s exercise of the marital privilege not to testify against her husband is not waived by evidence that she was jointly involved in the criminal activity with her husband. That is, there is no “joint participation in crime exception” to the spousal testimonial privilege.

United States v. Marchini, 797 F.2d 759 (9th Cir. 1986)

During the course of the grand jury investigation, the defendant’s wife, who was not married to the defendant at that time, gave testimony which inculpated the defendant. Prior to trial the witness married the defendant. The district court held that the wife’s grand jury testimony could be admitted at the trial since she was now an unavailable witness. The Ninth Circuit affirms.
PRIVILEGES
(Pre-trial Services Worker)

United States v. Perez, 473 F.3d 1147 (11th Cir. 2006)

Information gathered by a pretrial services worker is considered to be confidential and may only be used to assess the defendant’s eligibility for bond. 18 U.S.C. § 3153(c)(1). Allowing a pretrial services worker to identify the defendant’s voice and cell phone number was inappropriate, but not plain error.
PRIVILEGES
(Psychiatrist-patient)

The Supreme Court recognized a psychotherapist-patient privilege.

United States v. Ghane, 673 F.3d 771 (8th Cir. 2012)

In Jaffee v. Redmond, 518 U.S. 1 (1996), the Supreme Court recognized the psychotherapist-patient privilege. In this case, the court held that the defendant’s statements to an intake physician’s assistant were not covered by the privilege. However, later statements to a treating psychiatrist were privileged. The court rejected a “dangerous patient” exception to the privilege in the context of a criminal trial.

United States v. Chase, 340 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defendant’s psychiatrist was permitted to testify about specific threats made by the defendant directed to specific people. However, it was error to permit the psychiatrist to testify about other matters revealed to her during therapeutic sessions. Harmless error.

United States v. Glass, 133 F.3d 1356 (10th Cir. 1998)

The defendant told his psychotherapist that he wanted to kill Bill Clinton and Hillary. Based on this statement, the government prosecuted him for threatening the life of the President. The Tenth Circuit held that using this statement violated the psychotherapist-patient privilege, because there was no finding by the trial court that the threat amounted to a serious threat of danger to the President, or that the psychotherapist’s disclosure of the statement was the only way of averting the danger. Absent these findings, the privilege applied.
PRIVILEGES
(Reporter’s Privilege)

McKevitt v. Pallasch, 339 F.3d 530 (7th Cir. 2003)

Judge Posner explains the history and scope of the journalist privilege (to the extent that such a privilege exists) and concludes that it does not apply in this case where the reporter was not interviewing a non-confidential source and the person being interviewed did not object to disclosure of the full interview.
United States v. Moslavac, 779 F.3d 661 (7th Cir. 2015)

The trial court’s failure to conduct a balancing test under Fed.R.Crim.P. 32.1(b)(2)(C) to gauge the reliability of the hearsay evidence presented against the defendant was reversible error. In fact, the trial court must consider other factors – not just reliability – in deciding whether the government should be permitted to introduce hearsay evidence.

United States v. Lloyd, 566 F.3d 341 (3rd Cir. 2009)

Though the Rules of Evidence do not apply at a supervised release revocation hearing, Due Process requires that evidence used to revoke a person’s release status must meet some level of reliability and the defendant must be given some opportunity to confront the evidence against him. The Third Circuit concludes that the government must provide good cause for a declarant’s absence.

United States v. Taveras, 380 F.3d 532 (1st Cir. 2004)

Rule 32.1(b)(2)(C) provides that the defendant should be allowed to confront the witnesses against him unless the judge concludes that countervailing interests weigh against this right. The Rules were designed to assure the defendant the rights envisioned by Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972). In this case, the probation officer simply recited the evidence that supported the petition for revocation. This was improper. The declarant’s statements did not qualify as an excited utterance and did not otherwise have indicia of reliability.

United States v. Poellnitz, 372 F.3d 562 (3rd Cir. 2004)

If a supervised release revocation is predicated on a violation of conditions, and the alleged violation is the commission of another criminal offense, the government is not required to establish that the defendant was actually convicted of another criminal offense. Rather, the government must simply prove that the defendant did, in fact, commit the crime. In this case, the government relied exclusively on the defendant’s entry of a nolo contendere plea in state court to another criminal offense. The Third Circuit holds that the entry of a nolo plea in Pennsylvania does not, by itself, establish that the defendant committed another criminal offense. In Pennsylvania, a nolo plea does not constitute an admission of factual guilt.

United States v. Guagliardo, 278 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2002)

A condition of the defendant’s supervised release prohibited him from possessing any “pornography.” Because of the lack of any definition of this term, it could not be enforced. Delegating to the probation officer the determination of what qualifies as pornography, moreover, could result in an interpretation that was more strict than that envisioned by the trial judge who imposed the sentence. Also, a term of supervised release that prohibited the defendant from residing “in close proximity” to places frequented by children, was too vague to be enforced.

United States v. Bass, 121 F.3d 1218 (8th Cir. 1997)
The defendant was convicted of crack cocaine offenses. The trial court abused its discretion in ordering, as part of the conditions of supervised release, that the defendant refrain from using any alcohol. See also United States v. Prendergast, 979 F.2d 1289 (8th Cir. 1992).

United States v. Strager, 162 F.3d 921 (6th Cir. 1998)

The defendant’s threat to sue his probation officer, and his threat to “research the law” did not provide a sufficient basis to revoke his probation.
PROSECUTORIAL MISCONDUCT

SEE: GOVERNMENTAL MISCONDUCT
PUBLIC AUTHORITY DEFENSE

United States v. Canty, 499 F.3d 729 (7th Cir. 2007)

The police found counterfeit money on the defendant’s printer. There was no question that the money was counterfeit and the defendant was manufacturing the bills. The defendant claimed, however, that he was manufacturing the bills as a favor to the government, because he was going to give the bills to the police who could then use them as “flash money.” The defendant was facing a pending drug charge and thought that this “assistance” could inure to his benefit. At trial, the court precluded the defendant from offering this defense, because the defense did not give pretrial notice of public authority defense pursuant to Rule 12.3(a)(1). The Seventh Circuit reversed: the defendant’s defense was not that he actually had the public authority to counterfeit the money, but that he lacked the intent to defraud, which is an essential element of a counterfeiting charge under 18 U.S.C. § 471.

United States v. Giffen, 473 F.3d 30 (2d Cir. 2006)

The Second Circuit discusses at some length – all of which is dicta – the concept of entrapment by estoppel and the defense of “public authority.”

United States v. Bear, 439 F.3d 565 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant had been working for law enforcement officers, but was indicted for continuing her drug offenses “off the reservation.” Her defense was that she believed that she was still working undercover. The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the defendant’s public authority defense was plain error.

United States v. Burt, 410 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was initially stopped for transporting illegal aliens across the border. She attended a meeting with agents during which, she claimed, she was told to gather information for them, but don’t do anything illegal; but that during the course of gathering information, she was protected from illegal acts. Shortly thereafter, she was stopped again transporting aliens across the border. She requested an instruction on a public authority defense. The trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury on this defense.
PUBLIC TRIAL

The Supreme Court reversed a Georgia state court conviction because the trial court excluded the public from jury selection because the courtroom was too small to accommodate the public and the prospective jurors. The Supreme Court held that the right to a public trial is rooted in both the Sixth Amendment right to a public trial, as well as the First Amendment, which guarantees press access to the courts. The Court concluded that the command in prior cases under both the First Amendment and the Sixth Amendment that a decision to close the courtroom must only occur after considering all reasonable alternatives to closure, applies to voir dire. “Trial courts are obligated to take every reasonable measure to accommodate public attendance at criminal trials.” Id. at 725.

Reversing the Ninth Circuit, the Supreme Court held that the defendant’s right to due process was not clearly violated when spectators in the courtroom wore buttons that depicted the face of the murder victim, and habeas relief under the standards of AEDPA was not warranted. This case is distinguishable from prior decisions such as Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501 (1976) (defendant compelled to wear prison clothing during trial); and Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 U.S. 560 (1986) (troopers sitting in courtroom), because the conduct in this case was purely private – there was no state sponsorship of the courtroom conduct of the spectators.

United States v. Candelario-Santana, 834 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2016)

A witness expressed fear about testifying because of a perceived threat to himself and his family. The district court judge decided to tell the public that the proceedings were done for the day and once everybody left, court reconvened and the witness testified. This was a violation of the defendant’s right to a public trial and amounted to structural error, requiring reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Simmons, 797 F.3d 409 (6th Cir. 2015)

Three of the defendant’s alleged co-conspirators were sitting in the back of the courtroom when a government witness was about to testify. The prosecutor asked that the three leave the courtroom because it was feared that they would intimidate the witness. The defense attorney objected, but the “spectators” were removed. This violated the defendant’s right to a public trial and the conviction was set aside. The trial court made no findings of fact and failed to adequately develop the record to support the partial closure of the courtroom.

United States v. Negron-Sostre, 790 F.3d 295 (1st Cir. 2015)

The Sixth Amendment was violated when the court ordered the defendant’s family and friends removed from the courtroom during jury selection. This was apparently standard practice in Puerto Rico. The result was that a three-month trial was doomed from the beginning and all convictions were reversed.
United States v. Pickard, 733 F.3d 1297 (10th Cir. 2013)
This case contains a useful discussion of the right of litigants to seek to unseal records that are filed in an earlier criminal case. Here, the litigants were defendants who had previously been convicted of criminal offenses based on the testimony of an informant, whose DEA file was submitted to the court by the AUSA, but placed under seal. Years later, the defendants sought to unseal the records.

United States v. Gupta, 699 F.3d 682 (2d Cir. 2012)
Excluding the public entirely from the voir dire portion of defendant’s trial was a Sixth Amendment violation that required vacating the conviction.

United States v. Rivera, 682 F.3d 1223 (9th Cir. 2012)
The trial court excluded the defendant’s family from the sentencing proceeding. The judge thought it was “shameful” and manipulative that the defendant (a motorcycle gang defendant) had his young child, among others, in the courtroom. The Ninth Circuit held that this violated the Sixth Amendment and remanded for sentencing before a different judge.

United States v. Waters, 627 F.3d 345 (9th Cir. 2010)
The trial court erred in barring the public from attending a pre-trial omnibus hearing on various substantive motions and administrative matters.

United States v. Withers, 638 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2010)
The defendant made a colorable claim that the trial court had violated his right to a public trial by ordering all spectators to leave in anticipation of the beginning of jury selection. The transcript simply indicated that the trial judge directed all spectators to leave as the jurors were brought to the courtroom, though it was not clear if this was just a momentary clearing of the courtroom, or if the courtroom remained inaccessible to spectators throughout the jury selection proceedings.

United States v. Agosto-Vega, 617 F.3d 541 (1st Cir. 2010)
Prior to jury selection, the defendant’s family members were instructed to leave the courtroom. The defense objected. The court explained that there was not enough room for the family members and the jurors. This was structural error requiring reversal of the conviction.

Johnson v. Sherry, 586 F.3d 439 (6th Cir. 2009)
Trial counsel was arguably ineffective in failing to object to the closure of the courtroom during the testimony of two prosecution witnesses. A remand was necessary to determine whether there was any strategy involved and if not, whether the deficient performance was prejudicial to the defendant.

Gibbons v. Savage, 555 F.3d 112 (2d Cir. 2009)
Excluding one spectator from the courtroom during voir dire was error and amounts to structural error. However, the structural error was so trivial that it does not require granting a writ.
Owens v. United States, 483 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2007)

The trial court may not bar the public from the courtroom because of the need to accommodate the jury pool during jury selection. If the defendant is denied his right to a public trial, a new trial is required without a showing of prejudice. Counsel’s failure to object to the closure would constitute ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hoi Man Yung v. Walker, 468 F.3d 169 (2d Cir. 2006)

The court discusses the requirements of a hearing to close the courtroom when an undercover testifies and claims that his safety and ongoing investigations require that he testify in a closed courtroom, and the prosecutor requests that members of the defendant’s family be excluded as well. The Waller requirement that closure be no broader than necessary (Waller v Georgia, 467 U.S. 39 (1984)) remains the same, but as applied to family members may result in a different finding of necessity. The findings by the state trial court in this case were insufficient. Remand.

Smith v. Hollins, 448 F.3d 533 (2d Cir. 2006)

The state trial court made insufficient findings to support requiring that the defendant’s siblings sit behind a screen during the testimony of an undercover agent.

Carson v. Fischer, 421 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2005)

Excluding members of the defendant’s family during the testimony of a witness was error. Violations of the right to a public trial, moreover, are not subject to harmless error review. However, some violations are sufficiently insubstantial that they do not necessitate granting habeas relief. In this case, only one member of the defendant’s family was excused during the testimony of a confidential informant.

United States v. Thunder, 438 F.3d 866 (8th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in closing the courtroom during the testimony of the children who were alleged to be victims of the defendant’s sexual assault. Though 18 U.S.C. § 3509(e) permits closure during the testimony of children in certain limited circumstances, the court must make particularized findings before closure is permitted. No showing of actual prejudice is required; closure of the courtroom necessitates reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Ochoa-Vasquez, 428 F.3d 1015 (11th Cir. 2005)

The lower court’s decision to seal various parts of the record (i.e., documents and transcripts) in a related case violated the First Amendment.

United States v. Quattrone, 402 F.3d 304 (2d Cir. 2005)

In an effort to protect the integrity of the trial process, the district court entered an order that prohibited the press from publishing the names of jurors whose names were used in open court. This prior restraint violated the First Amendment and was not justified by any compelling Sixth Amendment concern.

United States v. Alcantara, 396 F.3d 189 (2d Cir. 2005)
Conducting the plea colloquy and sentencing in chambers was error. The closure of the proceedings, without notice or an on-the-record finding of necessity warranted setting aside the judgment. See also 18 U.S.C. § 3553(c) (the reason for imposing a particular sentence shall be announced in open court).

United States v. Abuhamra, 389 F.3d 309 (2d Cir. 2004)

A district court’s order of detention pending sentencing is a final order that may be appealed to the court of appeals. 18 U.S.C. § 3145(c). In this case, the Second Circuit held that an appeal bond may not be denied based on an ex parte showing to the district court relating to the defendant’s alleged risk of flight and dangerousness. An ex parte proceeding violates the Sixth Amendment public trial right.

United States v. Rutherford, 371 F.3d 634 (9th Cir. 2004)

During the defendant’s tax evasion trial, several IRS agents sat behind the prosecution table. Post-trial interviews with jurors indicated that some of them felt intimidated by the agents. The lower court held that the defendant had to prove that the government acted with the intent to intimidate the jurors. The Ninth Circuit, however, held that the defendant was only required to prove a prejudicial impact on the jury; the defendant was not required to prove that this was the government’s intent. A remand for further development of the record was required. The defendant should be permitted to introduce evidence regarding the jurors’ perceptions of the agents’ conduct and any discussions among the jurors concerning the possibility of IRS retaliation if they voted to acquit.

Walton v. Briley, 361 F.3d 431 (7th Cir. 2004)

Conducting a trial in the evening, after the courthouse has been closed and locked is impermissible under the Sixth Amendment. The failure to object is not a waiver of the right. There was no showing of a knowing and voluntary waiver of his right to a public trial.

ABC, Inc. v. Stewart, 360 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in closing the voir dire proceedings in Martha Stewart’s case. There was no showing made that jurors would not be candid if the press was allowed in the courtroom during voir dire.

Judd v. Haley, 250 F.3d 1308 (11th Cir. 2001)

The Eleventh recognized that there is a difference between total closure, where all spectators are excused from a portion of the trial, and partial closure, where members of the defendant’s family or the press are permitted to remain. Partial closures may be justified by a “substantial reason” for the partial closure, which is a less demanding standard than the Waller standard. The total closure of a courtroom, even for a limited period of time (during one witness's testimony, for example), must satisfy the Waller standard. In Judd, the court concluded that an Alabama trial judge who closed the courtroom entirely during the testimony of a minor sexual assault victim — without any of the Waller steps having been taken — violated the defendant's Sixth Amendment public trial guarantee.

English v. Artuz, 164 F.3d 105 (2d Cir. 1998)
The exclusion of courtroom observers, especially a defendant’s family members and friends, even from part of a criminal trial, is not a step to be taken lightly. The unwarranted exclusion of a defendant’s family member justifies granting habeas corpus relief, and petitioner need not show prejudice. Nor does the doctrine of harmless error apply in such circumstances. In this case, excluding family members because a witness feared for his life if his identity was revealed was insufficient to justify excluding the defendant’s family from the courtroom.

Ayala v. Speckard, 131 F.3d 62 (2d Cir. 1997)

In this en banc decision, the Second Circuit reviews the jurisprudence dealing with closing courtrooms and concludes that the lower courts in these consolidated cases acted properly in closing the courtroom during the testimony of undercover police officers in order to preserve their identity.
RAPE

United States v. Horse, 747 F.3d 1040 (8th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with criminal sexual conduct (rape), pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 2242(2), by having sex with the victim who lacked the capacity to consent. The issue addressed by the Eighth Circuit was whether the government must prove that the defendant knew that the victim lacked capacity to consent. The Eighth Circuit concluded that the defendant must, indeed, have known that the victim lacked the capacity to consent and the failure to instruct the jury on this point was plain error.

United States v. Peters, 277 F.3d 963 (7th Cir. 2002)

The defendant was charged with having sexual intercourse with a woman who was incapacitated. 18 U.S.C. § 2242(2)(B). The woman was drunk. The Seventh Circuit held that there was insufficient evidence to prove that she was incapable of declining participation in the sexual act at the time that the two had sex, though she could not remember the evening and claimed that she would not have voluntarily had sex with the defendant.
RE-OPENING EVIDENCE

United States v. Hernandez-Meza, 720 F.3d 760 (9th Cir. 2013)

The trial court erred in this case in permitting the government to re-open the evidence and introduce evidence that was not previously produced to the defense as required by Rule 16. The government protested that the defendant’s defense was unexpected (it was revealed when the defendant submitted his proposed requests to charge) and that the additional evidence was needed to refute the newly-revealed theory of defense. The Ninth Circuit held that allowing the government to re-open the evidence was reversible error. The fact that the new defense was factually not realistic is not relevant, the defense had the right to raise this defense and to point out the gaps in the government’s proof. Judge Kozinski wrote,

“[A] criminal defendant, unlike the government, needn't have a good faith belief in the factual validity of a defense. So long as the defendant doesn't perjure himself or present evidence he knows to be false—and Hernandez-Meza presented no evidence at all—he's entitled to exploit weaknesses in the prosecution's case, even though he may believe himself to be guilty. What matters in satisfying the government's burden of proof in a criminal case is not objective reality nor defendant's personal belief, but the evidence the government presents in court. No competent prosecutor would be surprised, based on what he thinks defendant should know, to find defense counsel poking holes in the government's case. The argument is without merit, yet the government made it before the district court, and again on appeal.

The government’s failure to produce the evidence in its Rule 16 production was not justified. The Rule requires the production of all documents “material to the preparation of the defense.” Information is material even if it simply causes a defendant to completely abandon a planned defense and take an entirely different path. If the defendant in this case knew that government had this evidence, the defendant may not have relied on this defense. Moreover, a defendant need not spell out his theory of the case in order to obtain discovery. Nor is the government entitled to know in advance specifically what the defense is going to be. Discovery must still be provided pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(E)(i). The Ninth Circuit held that the trial judge’s summary rejection of the defendant’s Rule 16 argument, as well as his unsupported decision to allow the government to re-open the evidence, required that the case be remanded and that a new judge preside over the case.

United States v. Crawford, 533 F.3d 133 (2d Cir. 2008)

During closing argument, defense counsel noted that the government failed to trace the provenance of the firearm. During deliberations, the jury asked about the “trace report” on the weapon; evidence of the tracing of the weapon had been supplied to the defense in discovery, but evidence was not introduced at trial about tracing the evidence. After receiving the jury’s note, the judge decided to let the government offer additional evidence about tracing the weapon. The government also asked the agent whether the defense counsel had actually been given the report in discovery, and the agent confirmed that it was. This was reversible error. The error was compounded by the testimony relating to the defense counsel’s knowledge of the evidence, because it insinuated that the attorney was dishonest with the jury during his closing argument. The government’s suggestion that the defense was engaged in improper “gamesmanship” by referring to the absence of evidence relating to the tracing of the weapon, and the government was merely accurately revealing this to the jury, was meritless: the government failed to introduce the tracing evidence at trial and the defense attorney properly pointed this out to the jury during his argument.

United States v. Nunez, 432 F.3d 573 (4th Cir. 2005)

During the jury’s deliberations, a note was sent indicating that the jury could not find a particular agent’s report. The report had actually not been entered into evidence. The trial court improperly permitted the government to introduce the report into evidence during deliberations.

United States v. Peay, 972 F.2d 71 (4th Cir. 1992)

After the evidence was closed, the government was permitted to re-open the evidence and a witness offered additional testimony against the defendant. The defendant was denied the right to offer rebuttal evidence. This was reversible error. While the judge has discretion to re-open the evidence, this discretion can be abused if the defendant is denied the opportunity to confront this evidence or to offer rebuttal. Such rebuttal might include traditional impeachment of the evidence offered in rebuttal.

United States v. Parker, 73 F.3d 48 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was charged with armed robbery. He claimed that he used a toy gun. His attorney’s investigator interviewed the victim, who conceded that the gun may have been a toy gun. At trial, the victim testified that the gun was real. The parties rested just before lunch. After lunch, the defendant requested an opportunity to re-open his case to introduce the testimony of the investigator which would impeach the witness. The trial court abused his discretion in denying this request. The motion was not untimely – it was made immediately after the conclusion of the lunch recess; the testimony was important, because it impeached the only testimony offered by the government that the gun was real; finally, allowing the defendant to re-open the evidence would not have unfairly prejudiced the government, or confused the jury. Another portion of this opinion was overruled in en banc reconsideration, but not this portion. 104 F.3d 72 (5th Cir. 1997).
RICO

The enterprise element of a RICO allegation may be proven with evidence of an “association-in-fact” enterprise. Though the enterprise must have certain characteristics, such as an ongoing organization” it is not necessary to instruct the jury that the “structure” must be distinct from the pattern of racketeering activity.

In a RICO conspiracy case, if the government proves an agreement on an overall objective, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant agreed personally to commit two predicate acts.

The defendant was convicted of violating RICO by investing the proceeds of narcotics transactions in a gold mine in Alaska. Employees of the mine were recruited from outside the state; some of the gold was sold outside the state; and some of the equipment was purchased out of state. This satisfactorily established that the mine was “engaged in interstate commerce.” The court of appeals improperly focused solely on whether the operations of the mine “affected” interstate commerce. RICO, however, establishes jurisdiction if the enterprise’s activities affect interstate commerce, or if the enterprise is engaged in interstate commerce. The latter was sufficiently shown in this case.

It is not necessary to prove that a RICO defendant engaged in multiple criminal schemes in order to establish the requisite pattern of racketeering activity. It is enough to show at least two predicate acts of racketeering activity that are related and that amount to or threaten the likelihood of continued criminal activity.

United States v. Tavares, 844 F.3d 46 (1st Cir. 2016)

The defendants were officials in the Massachusetts State Probation Department. They were charged with a RICO, bribery/gratuites and mail fraud offenses based on their practice of hiring people for various Probation Department positions based on requests by State Legislators, who, in turn, would vote favorably on Probation legislation (including increased budgets). The First Circuit reversed the conviction on all counts: there was insufficient proof of a nexus between any act of the Probation Department officials (rigging the hiring process) and any official act of the legislature. Regarding the mail fraud counts, there was insufficient proof that any mailing was linked to any fraudulent conduct. Each mailing was a rejection letter to an applicant who was allegedly more qualified for a position than the person who was hired at the request of a legislator.

United States v. Pinson, 860 F.3d 152 (4th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with a RICO conspiracy with some of the predicate acts being § 666 violations. The various crimes, however, were not related to each other, though a couple grew out of his receipt of money from individuals or companies that benefitted from his role on the Board of Trustees of South Carolina State University. The Fourth Circuit held that the crimes did not demonstrate the type of continuity, relationship between the members of the supposed enterprise and longevity to qualify as an association in fact enterprise. The evidence also failed to support the § 666 violations, because the person receiving the illicit payments was not proven to be an agent of the covered entity. Finally, with regard to a third § 666 count, the evidence failed to show that the recipient of federal funds qualified under the $10,000 threshold, because the money received was earmarked for the construction of housing and this does not qualify as a grant, loan or contract.

United States v. Cain, 671 F.3d 271 (2d Cir. 2012)

The district court erred in failing to instruct the jury that, in order to establish a “pattern of racketeering” for the purposes of securing a RICO conviction, the government is required to show that the predicate acts were related to one another and threatened continued criminal activity. This “horizontal relatedness” requirement is essential to proving a “pattern.” See United States v. Indelicato, 865 F.2d 1370 (2d Cir. 1989).

United States v. Warner, 498 F.3d 666 (7th Cir. 2007)

A state may be an enterprise. Former Governor George Ryan’s conviction was affirmed.

United States v. Cummings, 395 F.3d 392 (7th Cir. 2005)

The government alleged that the enterprise in this case was a state agency. Low level employees of the agency were bribed to provide to outsiders confidential personal information from the agency’s databases. The Seventh Circuit held that the low level employees did not satisfy the “operation or management” test of Reves v. Ernst & Young, 507 U.S. 170 (1993). That test requires a showing (with respect to insiders) of some degree of direction, so that a person charged with conducting or participating in the enterprise’s affairs within the meaning of § 1962(c) must have some part in directing those affairs. The same standard applies in a § 1962(d) conspiracy case.

United States v. Bruno, 383 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2004)

The evidence was insufficient to support the defendants’ RICO and Murder in Aid of Racketeering convictions. The Murder charge (18 U.S.C. § 1959) requires proof that the murder was committed for the purpose of maintaining or increasing a defendant’s position in an enterprise. See also United States v. Ferguson, 246 F.3d 129 (2d Cir. 2001); United States v. Palanco, 145 F.3d 536 (2d Cir. 1998); United States v. Thai, 29 F.3d 785 (2d Cir. 1994). The government failed to prove that the defendants murdered the victim for the required purpose. One theory, that the defendants wanted to “switch crews” within the organized crime family (and for that reason, murdered the victim) does not qualify as “maintaining or increasing” the defendant’s position in the enterprise. Moreover, there were considerably more motivations (such as avoiding paying a debt). In addition, the shooting violated organized crime protocol. Regarding the RICO conviction, the evidence failed to establish that the murder was “related” to the affairs of the enterprise.

Waucaush v. United States, 380 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 2004)

The Sixth Circuit concluded in the RICO case that a gang member who kills a member of a rival gang has not engaged in conduct that satisfies the interstate commerce element of the offense, unless the rival gang was involved in economic activity that affected interstate commerce. In this case, the rival gang was affiliated with another gang that was involved in drug dealing, but the Sixth Circuit held that this was an insufficient connection to interstate commerce. Violence, alone, even when considered in the aggregate, does not affect interstate commerce.

United States v. Miller, 116 F.3d 641 (2d Cir. 1997)

Under the "operation and management" test of Reves v. Ernst & Young, 507 U.S. 170 (1993), to be prosecuted for a RICO violation, the defendant must participate in the operation or management of the enterprise itself to be subject to liability. It is not sufficient, therefore, to charge the jury that "to participate in the conduct of an enterprise includes the performance of the acts, functions or duties that are necessary or helpful to the operation of the enterprise." The error in this case was harmless, because the defendants were shown to be managers of the enterprise.

United States v. To, 144 F.3d 737 (2d Cir. 1998)

With regard to one defendant in this RICO conspiracy case, the evidence was insufficient. Even assuming that the defendant participated in at least one robbery, this was insufficient evidence that he agreed to an overall objective of supporting the enterprise through a series of robberies. His association with other members of the enterprise was also insufficient evidence of his guilt of being a member of the RICO conspiracy.

United States v. Polanco, 145 F.3d 536 (2d Cir. 1998)

The defendant was a leader of a substantial criminal enterprise engaged in drug dealing and gun sales. One of the defendant’s other interests was selling guns to another enterprise with which he did not compete. On one occasion, he sold a machine gun to the leader of the other organization, and the other leader, in defendant’s presence, tested the machine gun by killing an innocent bystander. The government charged the defendant with violating 18 U.S.C. § 1959 which makes it a separate crime to commit murder for the purpose of gaining entrance to or maintaining or increasing position in an enterprise engaged in racketeering activity. The indictment alleged that the defendant committed the murder to enhance his position in the other criminal enterprise. The Second Circuit reversed. The defendant was a mere “vendor” with respect to his relationship to the other enterprise and the murder was not committed to enhance his position in that enterprise.

United States v. Goldin Industries, Inc., 219 F.3d 1268 (11th Cir. 2000)

The RICO defendant must be distinct from the enterprise in the indictment. Thus, a corporation named as a defendant in the indictment cannot also be the enterprise. In this case, the panel then decided that the defendants were individual corporations, but the enterprise was the association of these corporations. 219 F.3d 1271.

United States v. Posado-Rios, 158 F.3d 832 (5th Cir. 1998)

The Fifth Circuit reversed one defendant’s RICO conspiracy conviction, 158 F.3d at 858, though his convictions for various drug offenses were affirmed.

United States v. Lopez, 851 F.2d 520 (1st Cir. 1988)
The predicate acts which the defendant allegedly committed in connection with this RICO violation were not committed within the last five years and thus the substantive RICO conviction was time-barred; however, the RICO conspiracy conviction was not barred because the statute of limitations did not begin to run until the accomplishment of, or the abandonment of the objectives of, the conspiracy.

United States v. Viola, 35 F.3d 37 (2d Cir. 1994)

The district court’s charge to the jury did not properly address the issue decided by Reves v. Ernst & Young, 113 S.Ct. 1163 (1993). The court did not explain to the jury that a defendant could only be convicted of violating RICO if he had some part in directing the RICO enterprise’s affairs. Thus, an errand boy, who aided the enterprise, could not be convicted of violating RICO.

United States v. Long, 917 F.2d 691 (2d Cir. 1990)

The Second Circuit requires proof of both horizontal and vertical relatedness between the predicate offenses and the enterprise in order to sustain a RICO conviction. The judge instructed the jury that they had to find relatedness between the offenses and the activities of the enterprise, but failed to instruct them that there had to be relatedness between the predicate offenses themselves.

United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990)

The defendant accepted a bribe and later lied to investigators about taking the money. This does not constitute a “pattern of racketeering activity” under the RICO Act. The act of lying to investigators was pled by the government as a violation of 18 U.S.C. §1503. Though the acceptance of the bribe and the obstruction count were “related,” they lacked the requisite “continuity” which is necessary to establish the pattern requirement.

United States v. Indelicato, 865 F.2d 1370 (2d Cir. 1989)

The Second Circuit substantially revamps its analysis of the “pattern” requirement of a RICO prosecution in a case involving the killing of three Mafia men in a restaurant. The Court concludes that this triple slaying sufficed to establish a pattern of racketeering activity.

United States v. Persico, 832 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1987)

The Second Circuit holds that the statute of limitations with regard to RICO conspiracy charges does not begin to run until the objectives of the conspiracy have been accomplished or abandoned, regardless of when the last predicate act occurred. With regard to a substantive RICO violation, the government must prove the defendant committed at least one predicate racketeering act within the period of limitations; it is not enough to show that any member of the illegal enterprise committed an overt act during the period.

United States v. Pelullo, 14 F.3d 881 (3rd Cir. 1994)

Defendant was convicted of wire fraud in his first trial. At his second trial, which included a RICO count, the judge instructed the jury that the wire fraud conviction – one of the predicate offenses – was committed “as a matter of law.” The judge further instructed the jury that they did not have to further consider whether that offense had been committed, because, as a matter of law, it had been committed. This was reversible error. In a criminal trial, the prosecution must prove every element beyond a reasonable doubt, including the predicate offenses. The Third Circuit noted that the goal of collateral estoppel (efficiency and public policy concerns) is not necessarily consistent with the Sixth Amendment’s guarantee of a jury trial in all cases.
Among the predicate acts offered to the jury in this RICO prosecution were certain mail and wire fraud counts which were invalid since they were based on an intangible right theory. Because there was no way to determine upon which predicate acts the jury based its decision, the RICO conviction had to be reversed.

The government failed to prove that the defendant engaged in two predicate offenses thus spoiling his RICO conviction. One of the acts relied on by the government was a telephone call in which the defendant’s name was mentioned, but the defendant was not a party to that telephone conversation.

Defendant was convicted of a RICO offense with predicate acts that were not alleged in the indictment. While these acts would be admissible as circumstantial evidence that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy, they were actions outside the scope of the specific RICO conspiracy charged and could not be used to establish the pattern of racketeering activity defined in the indictment.

The Eighth Circuit holds that one action that violates two statutes may not be charged as two separate predicate acts under RICO. The pattern of racketeering requirement of the act requires the commission of at least two continuous, related acts of racketeering. Thus, the importation, and subsequent possession of marijuana with the intent to distribute does not represent two predicate acts for a RICO prosecution.

The trial court improperly allowed the government to change the “enterprise” from that which was alleged in the indictment. The indictment charged the defendant with participating in a pattern of racketeering activity with the “DeCavalcante Family.” At trial, however, the Court instructed the jury that they could find him guilty if there was proof of any enterprise.

In the midst of instructing the jury on the elements of a RICO offense, the judge instructed the jury that they should presume that the union was an enterprise. Because the existence of an enterprise is an essential element of the offense, this instruction was erroneous.
RICO
(Forfeiture)

United States v. Saccoccia, 354 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2003)

The government could not seize attorney’s fees that had been paid and spent by the attorneys as substitute assets in this RICO case. The district court concluded that the attorneys did not know the money represented proceeds of money laundering until after the client was convicted. The government argued that the attorneys’ knowing violation of a pre-trial restraint of the defendant’s assets justified entering a judgment against the lawyers. With regard to substitute assets, the First Circuit wrote that the forfeiture statute does not provide an avenue through which the government may reach a third party’s untainted assets as a substitute for tainted assets which the third party had already transferred prior to the date of forfeiture. Back in the District Court, the lower court held the lawyers in contempt (civilly) until they returned the money. 91-115-T (10/25/04). The First Circuit reversed the contempt judgment, however, at 433 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2005).

United States v. Gotti, 155 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 1998)

The RICO statute, 18 U.S.C. §1963(d)(1), does not authorize the pretrial, post-indictment seizure of substitute assets.

United States v. Carson, 52 F.3d 1173 (2d Cir. 1995)

The provision in 18 U.S.C. §1964 (civil RICO) which permits the court to disgorge an enterprise’s assets may not be used to remedy a past act of racketeering. Rather, the provision may only be invoked to prevent future illegal activity.

United States v. Pelullo, 14 F.3d 881 (3rd Cir. 1994)

The standard of proof in a RICO criminal forfeiture proceeding is proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The court distinguished the standard which most courts have applied in the CCE forfeiture context, based on the different Congressional intent in enacting the statutes.

United States v. Ofchinick, 877 F.2d 251 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The evidence did not support the jury’s verdict that the defendant should forfeit $6,000,000 which represented his stock in the corporate defendant.

United States v. Horak, 833 F.2d 1235 (7th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was convicted of RICO, and the issue was what would be forfeited. The defendant, the head of a garbage collection company, was convicted of bribery offenses. The government sought to forfeit his salary, profit sharing and other benefits from his company. The Seventh Circuit rejected the government contention that a defendant acquires or maintains an interest in violation of the racketeering law simply by virtue of the fact that his racketeering activities “enhance” his performance within an enterprise. Instead, a “but for” test is required. The Seventh Circuit also held that it would not review the trial court’s refusal to order forfeiture of the defendant’s stockholding in a parent corporation. The Court held that such an order is not appealable under 18 U.S.C. §3731.

United States v. Riley, 78 F.3d 367 (8th Cir. 1996)

Pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §1963(a), the government may seek forfeiture of a defendant’s interest in an enterprise, or the proceeds of racketeering activity. In this case, the government... sought to seize pretrial an insurance company that was described as the enterprise. This was not permissible. The enterprise is not forfeitable, only the defendant’s interest in the enterprise and the proceeds of racketeering activity. Moreover, the statute does not permit seizure of substitute assets.

United States v. Reed, 924 F.2d 1014 (11th Cir. 1991)

Property which was transferred prior to the enactment of the substitute asset provision of RICO (18 U.S.C. §1963(m)) may still be subject to the substitute asset provision. That is, the government may seize substitute assets if the forfeitable property was transferred before the enactment of the substitute asset provision. This does not violate the ex post facto clause.

United States v. Kramer, 912 F.2d 1257 (11th Cir. 1990)

Claimants are entitled to an immediate hearing on their claim to property which has been ordered forfeited by a jury in a criminal trial. Pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §1963(l), the trial judge cannot delay the hearing for an indefinite period of time.
ROBBERY

United States v. Ornelas, 906 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 2018)

In a case involving a charge of attempted robbery, the government must prove that the defendant had the specific intent to rob and that the force he used was designed to accomplish the robbery. The trial court’s failure to charge on the specific intent element of the offense was plain error.

United States v. Salgado, 519 F.3d 411 (7th Cir. 2008)

The defendants attempted to rob a person who they thought was bringing money to purchase drugs. Actually, the person was an informant, working with the DEA. The informant had no money in his possession. The government prosecuted the defendant for attempting to rob a person who was in possession of money belonging to the United States (18 U.S.C. § 2114) and conspiracy to commit that offense. The Seventh Circuit held that neither theory could be used. The defendants could not be convicted of conspiracy, because the defendants did not know they were attempting to rob a government employee, thus, their agreement could not be to steal government money. They could not be convicted of attempting to steal government money, because the informant had no money in his possession.
SABOTAGE

United State v. Walli, 785 F.3d 1080 (6th Cir. 2015)

Two veterans and a nun defaced property at a site that was used to enrich uranium. This evidence did not support a sabotage conviction (18 U.S.C. § 2155(a)), because they lacked the mens rea to injure, obstruct or interfere with the national defense.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE

(Abandonment)

United States v. Griffith, 867 F.3d 1265 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

The police had reason to believe that the defendant had participated (perhaps as the getaway driver) in a homicide that occurred a year earlier. The search warrant affidavit reviewed all the facts amounting to probable cause and then sought permission to search the defendant’s current apartment (where he had moved after the homicide and a brief stint in jail). The warrant only sought authority to seize cell phones, because criminals communicate by phone. During the execution of the search warrant, the defendant threw a gun out the window. The D.C. Circuit held that (1) the warrant was deficient, because there was no probable cause that the defendant even had a cell phone or that it had any incriminating information contained in it; (2) there was no probable cause that a phone would be found in the apartment (as opposed to on his person if he were not present at the apartment when the warrant was executed); (3) the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply because the warrant was so lacking in probable cause to search or seize a cell phone; (4) the “abandonment” of the gun was the fruit of the execution of the defective search warrant and therefore the gun that was thrown out of the window was subject to the exclusionary rule. Abandonment that is occasioned by an illegal arrest or search is not voluntary abandonment.

United States v. Harrison, 689 F.3d 301 (3rd Cir. 2012)

The Third Circuit noted that if the police make a reasonable mistake of fact (such as whether an apartment is abandoned, as in this case), that does not negate probable cause. A mistake of law, on the other hand, is per se unreasonable.

United States v. Nicholson, 144 F.3d 632 (10th Cir. 1998)

A police officer “felt” the outside of the defendant’s carry-on and checked luggage on a bus in such a way that he was able to determine that the bags contained some tightly-wrapped bundles. While the touching of a bag’s exterior is not a search, in this case, the officer acknowledged that he “manipulated” the bags; this constituted a search. After having his suspicions aroused, the officer asked the bus passengers to whom the bag belonged. Nobody answered. Because of the initial illegal search, this did not amount to an abandonment of the property.

United States v. Infante-Ruiz, 13 F.3d 498 (1st Cir. 1994)

The defendant placed his briefcase in the trunk of a car being driven by a colleague. This did not deprive the defendant of a legitimate expectation of privacy in the briefcase, even though he allowed his colleague to drive with the briefcase when the defendant was not present, and even though he permitted his colleague to place objects in the briefcase.

United States v. Mulder, 808 F.2d 1346 (9th Cir. 1987)

The defendant left his suitcase in a hotel after intending to check out. The Court holds that this does not constitute abandonment. Consequently, when the DEA subsequently used a sophisticated piece of machinery to test the pills and tablets found inside the suitcase, a search warrant was required. The type of test conducted by the DEA did not fall within the “field test” exception to the warrant requirement.

United States v. Garzon, 119 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1997)

Police boarded a bus in Denver and asked all the passengers to disembark, holding their carry-on luggage in their right hand so a drug dog could sniff the luggage. The defendant exited the bus, but left two bags on the bus. The police took the bags off the bus, put them on a cart and a drug dog alerted to the bags. The bags were opened and found to contain cocaine. The Tenth Circuit held that the bags were not abandoned by the defendant. The government conceded that the officer had no lawful authority to order all the passengers off the bus. The lower court’s only basis for finding abandonment was the court’s holding that the defendant failed to heed the officer’s unlawful order that all luggage be removed from the bus. This did not support a conclusion that the defendant abandoned his luggage.

United States v. Ramos, 12 F.3d 1019 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant rented a condo for two months. The day he was supposed to leave, the cleaning personnel arrived and discovered that his belongings were still present, including a partially opened suitcase. The suitcase was examined by the cleaning people, who then summoned the police who made a warrantless search, discovering cocaine in the suitcase. The government argued that the suitcase was abandoned. In determining whether there was abandonment, the critical inquiry is whether the person prejudiced by the search . . . voluntarily discarded, left behind, or otherwise relinquished his interest in the property in question so that he could no longer retain a reasonable expectation of privacy with regard to it at the time of the search. The defendant has the burden of establishing an expectation of privacy; the government has the burden of proving abandonment. This case is distinguishable from the cases in which an overnight guest at a hotel overstays his “welcome.” Here, the defendant had initially signed up for the condominium for a five month period. Also, though both cleaning personnel and the police had a right to enter the room, this did not confer upon them the right to break into the locked suitcase.

United States v. Most, 876 F.2d 191 (D.C.Cir. 1989)

The defendant was followed to a grocery store by police officers who believed he was acting suspiciously. The defendant carried a bag into the store and checked it with the clerk behind the counter. When the defendant left the store, he asked the clerk to continue watching it. After the defendant left, the police went into the store, retrieved the bag from the clerk, and based on touching the contents, opened the bag and discovered cocaine. The government argued that the bag was abandoned when the defendant left the store. The Court of Appeals disagrees. The defendant did not leave the object unattended in a public place; the law does not insist that a person assertively clutch an object in order to retain the protection of the Fourth Amendment. In light of the defendant’s insistence that the clerk continue to watch the bag after he left, it is clear the defendant did not abandon his expectation of privacy in the bag.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Access to Warrant)

Even pre-indictment, the target of a search has a right to see the affidavit that was used to obtain a search warrant. Only if the government can present evidence of a compelling need to keep the affidavit under seal is it entitled to do so. The District Court relied on the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness requirement. See also United States v. Sealed Search Warrants, 868 F.3d 385 (5th Cir. 2017).
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Administrative and Regulatory Searches)

The City of Los Angeles adopted a regulation that requires hotel operators to provide police a list of registrants upon request. The Supreme Court held that the regulation was facially unconstitutional because it provided no procedure by which a hotel could challenge a police officer’s demand for its records. The Court rejected the City’s argument that hotels are closely regulated businesses.

A New York statute permits warrantless searches of certain businesses. In this case, the statute was employed to authorize the search of a junkyard which is a “closely regulated” business. The U.S. Supreme Court upholds this search holding that when the business is closely regulated, the owner has a reduced expectation of privacy and a warrantless search is permissible.

United States v. Orozco, 858 F.3d 1204 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant’s truck was pulled over because the police received a tip that he was hauling drugs. There was insufficient basis under Terry to stop the truck, so the government relied on the administrative warrant exception to support the legality of the stop (which led to a consent search). The Ninth Circuit held that the evidence was clear that the police did not pull the truck over on the basis of the administrative search provisions, but solely based on the tip. This was a classic “pretextual” stop and therefore the stop was not legitimate and the resulting consent to search was invalid. The Court emphasized that in the context of administrative searches (and roadblocks), the actual motive of the police does matter.

United States v. Rahman, 805 F.3d 822 (7th Cir. 2015)

A restaurant owner has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the business area of the restaurant and has standing to contest a warrantless search of the area. In this case, the defendant, the owner of a restaurant that burned down, consented to a search of the basement of the building “for the cause and origin” of the fire that consumed the restaurant and apartments above the restaurant. At the time the search was conducted, however, the investigators already knew that the fire’s origin was upstairs, thus the “cause and origin” was not the object of the search in the basement. Rather, the investigators were looking for circumstantial evidence of the defendant’s guilt, such as records, business receipts and a laptop. This search exceeded the scope of the consent that the defendant provided, and the evidence should have been suppressed.

Bruce v. Beary, 498 F.3d 1232 (11th Cir. 2007)

Though the Supreme Court has approved warrantless administrative searches in certain cases for regulated businesses, such as auto-salvage yards, in this case, the warrantless search was conducted by 20 SWAT officers who searched all the people on the premises personally, as well as every file in the office. This went beyond the scope of a reasonable administrative or regulatory search and subjected the defendants to a civil damage award.
United States v. Herrera, 444 F.3d 1238 (10th Cir. 2006)

A state administrative law permitted the inspection of any vehicle weighing over 10,000 pounds. The police officer in this case believed that the defendant’s pickup truck weighed over 10,000 pounds and stopped the vehicle to perform an inspection. Actually, the truck did not weigh over 10,000 pounds. The officer’s mistake of fact rendered the search unlawful. In contexts of searches other than administrative searches, a reasonable mistake of fact does not render a search unlawful. But with regard to administrative searches, because the exception to the warrant requirement is based on the “target’s” acquiescence to being searched by engaging in the administratively regulated activity, the officer’s mistake of fact cannot be used as a basis for obviating the requirement of probable cause. In short, the defendant, by driving a vehicle that did not weigh over 10,000 pounds, did not knowingly engage in activity that was pervasively regulated.

United States v. Knight, 306 F.3d 534 (8th Cir. 2002)

A DOT regulation permits inspections of truck cabs. This regulation does not permit the police to conduct a warrantless search of the driver’s briefcase.

United States v. Bulacan, 156 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant went to a Social Security Office to obtain a replacement card. Security personnel were searching all people coming to the Federal Building manually. The security guard acknowledged that he was looking for weapons, but also for drugs and alcohol. The Ninth Circuit held that the search was unlawful. Though a search for weapons is permissible, the regulations that permitted the search in this case, 41 C.F.R. 101-20.301, were implemented at this Federal Building with the directive to personnel that they should be looking both for weapons and for drugs. Because the officer had a dual motive in undertaking the search – one of which was not reasonable – reliance on the regulations, to the extent that they were reasonable, did not support the search.

Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355 (9th Cir. 1994)

City officials obtained an inspection warrant, based on the fact that sewage was leaking from the defendant’s house and other evidence which supported a finding that he was creating a nuisance. When the city officials went to execute the warrant, however, the door was nailed shut and the defendant yelled out that he would use a gun to prevent entry. The police then used a battering ram to enter the premises in order to arrest the defendant. During the ensuing encounter, the defendant was shot and killed. The administrative warrant did not justify the police in breaking into the house for the purpose of arresting the defendant.

United States v. $124,570, 873 F.2d 1240 (9th Cir. 1989)

Airport security searches are designed to interdict weapons. This case involves the use of private airport security officers to detect large amounts of currency and drugs. The Ninth Circuit holds that such searches by private personnel, who act with the encouragement of law enforcement officials, cannot be justified under the administrative search exception to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement.
United States v. Limatoc, 807 F.2d 792 (9th Cir. 1987)

The ATF could not conduct an administrative inspection of the defendant’s firearm inventory and business records following the execution of a valid search warrant at his business. Despite the fact that the firearms business is heavily regulated, this authorizes a search of the premises under certain conditions, it does not authorize the warrantless inspection of the inventory and business records.

Winters v. Board of County Commissioners of Osage, 4 F.3d 848 (10th Cir. 1993)

The police had reason to believe that a stolen ring was at a particular pawn shop. A state regulation permitted warrantless “examinations” of the place of business of pawn shops, but not the seizure of items. The police went to the pawn shop and asked a clerk to give the ring to the officer to be examined. The officer then seized it because it fit the description. This was not a valid seizure under the regulation, because seizures are not permitted by the regulation. It was not a valid plain view seizure, because the officer did not have the right to be in possession of the ring, or even to have warrantless access to it, so the officer could not claim that the discovery of the item occurred at a time when he was lawfully where he was supposed to be. The pawn shop had a viable §1983 action because of this seizure.

United States v. Johnson, 994 F.2d 740 (10th Cir. 1993)

Based on a tip, federal and state agents went to a taxidermy shop to determine if violations of federal law were occurring. The agents gained entry by showing an employee a state statute which permitted state inspection of taxidermy shops. This regulatory search was conducted as a pretext to investigate federal offenses. The fact that federal agents participated clearly shows that the state regulatory purposes were not the motivation for the inspection. The evidence should have been suppressed.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Airport, Bus Station and Train Station Searches)

Police officers boarded an outgoing bus before departure and asked the passengers for consent to search their luggage. The officer did not inform the passengers that they could decline to give consent. The defendants consented to a search of their luggage and persons. The Eleventh Circuit had held that the consents were not voluntary because of the coercive nature of the interdiction activity, as well as the officers’ failure to advise the passengers that they could refuse to consent to a search. The Supreme Court reversed. According to Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991), every encounter between the police and a defendant on a bus is not necessarily a “seizure.” In this case, the Court held that the failure to advise the passengers of their right to refuse consent did not taint consent that was otherwise voluntarily given.

The Court upholds the detention of a passenger and the subsequent search of his suitcase. The defendant made a quick roundtrip from Hawaii to Miami, used small bills, and an apparently false call-back number. This was sufficient to authorize a Terry stop.

United States v. Aquino, 674 F.3d 918 (8th Cir. 2012)

The police approached a bus passenger and interviewed him, ultimately asking him to leave the bus, retrieve his baggage and then hold his clothes close to his body so they could determine if there were any “bulges” that would indicate the presence of contraband. The defendant complied. The district court held that there was no articulable suspicion justifying the officer’s encounter with the defendant and further found that the encounter was not consensual, especially when the police lifted the defendant’s pants above his ankle to examine a “bulge.” Even after a “bulge” is observed, moreover, this information, alone, does not provide probable cause to arrest someone.

United States v. McCarty, 648 F.3d 820 (9th Cir. 2011)

TSA screening agents saw a dark object around a computer when the defendant passed through the security line. When the bags were opened, an envelope with newspaper and pictures emptied out and the agent saw child pornography in the pictures and then read the newspaper articles and found further evidence of child pornography related activity. A TSA agent’s search must be limited to its intended scope: aircraft security and ensuring that nobody is carrying weapons or other dangerous items on a plane. The Ninth Circuit decision thoroughly reviews the law governing the permissible scope of TSA searches and ultimately concludes that reading the newspaper articles went too far, but that the photographs seen by the TSA Agent may have provided a sufficient basis to support an arrest of the defendant. A remand for further fact-finding was necessary.

United States v. Alvarez-Manzo, 570 F.3d 1070 (8th Cir. 2009)

The police seized a suitcase from underneath an interstate bus during a layover at a bus depot. They brought the suitcase into the bus and asked the passengers to whom it belonged. The defendant eventually said that it was his. He agreed to exit the bus and went with an officer into the bus station. Ultimately, he was arrested based on what was seen in his wallet and a search warrant was obtained to search the bag. The police did not act with the consent or at the direction of any employee of the bus company when they initially took the bag out cabbage compartment and brought it into the bus. This amounted to a seizure and because there was no warrant or probable cause, evidence discovered as a result of the seizure – which was both the contents of the wallet and the suitcase – was properly suppressed.

United States v. Goodwin, 449 F.3d 766 (7th Cir. 2006)

Judge Posner explains at some length the rules governing when the police may detain a passenger on a train and the length of time that this detention may last. He concludes that there is a sliding scale that reflects when the police learn the information that justifies the stop, the seriousness of the offense and the reasonable length of time it takes to investigate the suspicious circumstances. In this case, the court upholds the detention and use of a dog sniff, based on the defendant’s statements that he had lost the key to his luggage and thus, could not open it for the police. The defendant also met certain characteristics of the drug courier profile.

United States v. Escobar, 389 F.3d 781 (8th Cir. 2004)

The police were suspicious of the defendants’ bags that were in the baggage compartment of a bus. The bags were removed from the compartment and brought to a room where the defendants were being questioned. The officers told the defendants that a drug dog had alerted to the bags and that there was probable cause to search them (there had been no drug dog and there was not probable cause). The defendants then consented to a search. This was not a valid consent search. The environment was overly coercive and the misrepresentation that there was already probable cause to search tainted the voluntariness of the consent.

United States v. Hernandez, 279 F.3d 302 (5th Cir. 2002)

Suspicious of a bus traveler, a police officer took her luggage out of the baggage compartment of the bus and handled it, feeling (from the outside) the contents. This violated Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334 (2000), which held that such manipulation of luggage amounts to a search. The agent at that point entered the bus and secured the defendant’s consent to open the suitcase. This was valid consent. But, the consent was not sufficiently attenuated from the initial illegality to remove the taint. Thus, even though the search was conducted pursuant to the defendant’s consent, it was still the fruit of the illegal search that preceded it. “The officer decided to approach the defendant only after he had felt something suspicious in her suitcase.” This invalidates the consent search.

United States v. Pena-Saiz, 161 F.3d 1175 (8th Cir. 1998)

The police approached the defendant at the baggage claim area and brought her to the drug interdiction office where her luggage and a wrapped gift were searched. She was never told that she could refuse consent. Nothing was found in her belongings and the agents then said they wanted to frisk her. She initially refused, but relented when the agents said that she would be arrested. The ensuing search was unlawful. She was being detained at the time she was brought to the interdiction office; moreover her refusal to consent was not honored.

United States v. Ward, 144 F.3d 1024 (7th Cir. 1998)
The defendant checked his suitcase, which contained a kilogram of cocaine, on a bus from L.A. to Indianapolis, but did not board the bus. He flew to Indianapolis and awaited the arrival of the bus. When the bus stopped in St. Louis, the police became suspicious of the bag and took it out of the luggage compartment and asked the passengers if anybody claimed it. Nobody did, and the police confirmed that none of the passengers were heading for Indianapolis. The bus was taken out of the bus and the bus departed. Later, a drug dog alerted to the bag and a warrant was obtained. The Seventh Circuit concludes in this case that the luggage was “seized” when it was taken off the bus; however, there was a reasonable suspicion justifying the seizure. Relying on United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696 (1983), the court held that detaining luggage is the same as detaining a traveler and must be supported by an articulable suspicion. See also United States v. Puglisi, 723 F.2d 779 (11th Cir. 1984). This rule applies even if, as in this case, the traveler was not accompanying his luggage, because the detention would have deprived the traveler of his luggage at the ultimate destination. See United States v. Van Leeuwen, 397 U.S. 249 (1970) (detaining mail is not unlawful if it is delivered the next day). Because there was an articulable suspicion, however, the dog alert and the execution of a search warrant was permissible.

United States v. Guapi, 144 F.3d 1393 (11th Cir. 1998)

The Eleventh Circuit holds that an encounter between drug interdiction agents and the defendant, a passenger on a bus, was not consensual. The bus arrived at the Mobile, Alabama bus terminal, and before the passengers could exit, two agents entered the bus and asked each passenger for consent to search the on-board luggage; they did not tell the passengers that they could refuse consent to search the bags. The court held that this encounter was not consensual. Note that this decision pre-dates the United States Supreme Court decision in United States v. Drayton, supra which arguably overruled Guapi, though the Supreme Court did not expressly do so.

United States v. Washington, 151 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1998)

Following the reasoning of United States v. Guapi, 144 F.3d 1393 (11th Cir. 1998), the Eleventh Circuit concludes that officers who conducted a search of bus passengers did not have their voluntary and knowing consent, given the fact that the passengers were never told that they were free to decline to be searched and the manner in which the agents conducted the search. The search was conducted in the cramped quarters of an interstate bus and was consciously designed to take full advantage of a coercive environment. Under these circumstances, the typical bus passenger would not feel free to refuse the requests, but would consider these “requests” to be orders backed by the full force of the United States government. Note that this decision, as well as Guapi, were decided prior to the decision in United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 122 S. Ct. 2105 (2002), which denounced the per se rule that all bus searches were non-consensual unless preceded with advice that the passengers were free to decline consent.

United States v. Acosta-Colon, 157 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1998)

A drug dog alerted to suitcases that were destined from Puerto Rico to New York. Agents determined that the bags were checked by people related to the defendant’s reservation. When the defendant attempted to board the plane, he and three other passengers were handcuffed and brought to a customs area. Once in an interview room, the defendant was seen attempting to eat some paper (the claim tickets for the suitcases). This occurred about fifteen minutes after he was placed in the room. The bags had 15 kilograms of cocaine. The First Circuit concluded: (1) There was no probable cause for the arrest; (2) There was an articulable suspicion supporting a brief detention; (3) the detention in this case rose to the level of an arrest. The following factors are indicative of an arrest: the defendant was in handcuffs; transported to a different location; detained for more than a momentary period; was never informed of how long he would be detained. Though no factor is outcome determinative, in combination the circumstances in this case amounted to a de facto arrest. Because there was no probable cause, the evidence should have been suppressed.

United States v. Allen, 159 F.3d 832 (4th Cir. 1998)

The police entered a bus and questioned the occupants about their luggage. The defendant was asked if he had any bags and he pointed to a knapsack. The police pulled down the knapsack and asked for permission to search it. The defendant consented and the police found marijuana in the bag. The defendant was arrested. After he was removed from the bus, the police found another duffel bag which none of the other passengers claimed. The police searched that bag and found cocaine. The lower court upheld the search of the duffel bag on the theory that it inevitably would have been discovered. The trial court reasoned that if nobody claimed the bag, the police would have brought a drug-detecting dog to sniff the bag and if he alerted, the police would then obtain a search warrant and locate the cocaine. The Fourth Circuit reversed. There was insufficient evidence that a drug dog would have been summoned. In fact, testimony at the hearing demonstrated that there was a dog present, but that the dog had never been used inside the bus before (it had previously been used to sniff the undercarriage of the bus). Moreover, the inevitable discovery doctrine does not apply where the police were not already in the process of obtaining a search warrant when the illegal search occurred. Under the government’s theory, whenever there is probable cause, the inevitable discovery doctrine would apply. That is not the purpose of the inevitable discovery doctrine.

United States v. Acosta-Colon, 157 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1998)

Though the agents had an articulable suspicion justifying the detention of the defendants at the airport after a drug dog alerted to what the agents believed was the luggage of the suspects’ companions, the thirty-minute detention, during which time the defendants were handcuffed and missed their flight went too far and amounted to an arrest which required probable cause.

United States v. Doe, 61 F.3d 107 (1st Cir. 1995)

An airport security officer noticed a dense object in the defendant’s carry-on luggage. He pulled it out of the bag (which was a proper airport security search) and handed it to a DEA agent. The agent then punctured the bag to field test the contents. This was an illegal search which required a warrant. Exigent circumstances and probable cause justify the seizure of a bag such as this, but do not justify opening the bag or removing the contents.

United States v. Wilson, 953 F.2d 116 (4th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was encountered by task force agents at the airport. They asked if they could search him. He allowed them to search his carry-on bag and his person, but when they asked to search his coat which he had over his arm, he refused. They persisted. He refused. He walked away and the officers walked with him. At this point, the defendant was “detained” in so far as he would have been aware that he was not free to leave in the sense of being free to “break off the encounter.” The information known to the police did not give them an articulable suspicion. Apart from looking suspicious, coming from a source city, providing only a check-cashing card for identification, and misrepresenting his itinerary, the only information known to the police was that there was a visible bulge in the coat pocket. A bulge in a coat pocket – not hidden from view – is not suspicious at all. The only suspicious factor was the lie about where the defendant was coming from. However, it is not clear why this would provide suspicion that the defendant was a courier. That is, why would someone coming from New York carrying drugs lie and state that he was actually coming form Boston? This does not support the inference that he was carrying drugs. The motion to suppress should have been granted.

United States v. Gonzales, 842 F.2d 748 (5th Cir. 1988)

A federal agent approached an air traveler and advised her that he was working narcotics and requested to look in her carry-on luggage. The Fifth Circuit concludes that this constitutes a “seizure” requiring reasonable suspicion. The Fifth Circuit later held that the Gonzales decision set forth the incorrect burden of proof to establish consent, but did not alter the holding regarding what constitutes a seizure. United States v. Hurtado, 905 F.2d 74 (5th Cir. 1990).

United States v. Caicedo, 85 F.3d 1184 (6th Cir. 1996)

The defendant arrived at the bus station in Cincinnati and a narcotics officer testified that he looked nervous. The officer followed the defendant until he got into the car of another person. The officer approached the car and asked the two if he could talk to them. The defendant (the passenger) got out of the car and – though the evidence was unclear, the appellate court concluded – the officer then frisked him and then asked for consent to search his backpack. The appellate court held that the evidence should have been suppressed. If the frisk occurred before the request for consent, then the defendant was at that time “seized” and there was no basis for this seizure. The ensuing consent, therefore, was invalid and the search of the backpack violated his Fourth Amendment rights.

The Sixth Circuit holds that the indicia of the drug courier profile manifested by the defendant in this case did not authorize a Terry stop or a subsequent search. The defendant arrived in Atlanta on a flight from Florida and appeared nervous. She went to the luggage carousel and cursorily examined pieces of baggage and then went and claimed unclaimed luggage which had arrived on an earlier flight. When she went out to a taxicab stand, DEA agents approached her and began to question her. The agents also signaled the man who called the cabs to the door and instructed him not to call a cab for the defendant. Following a lengthy interrogation, the defendant consented to a search of her baggage. Cocaine was found. The Court initially concludes that the totality of the circumstances existing at the time the defendant was approached at the taxicab stand indicates that she in fact had been seized. The Court further concludes that there were not sufficient facts to give rise to an articulable suspicion that the defendant was transporting drugs. Consequently, the resulting consent was invalid and the evidence was suppressed.

United States v. Clardy, 819 F.2d 670 (6th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was on a flight from Miami to Atlanta. As he entered a taxicab in Atlanta, police officers conducted an investigatory stop. The police stated that he met one characteristic of the drug courier profile, travelling from Miami. However, he was accompanied by a person who met several additional characteristics of the profile. The Court holds that this was not sufficient grounds to conduct the investigatory stop of the defendant.

United States v. Novak, 870 F.2d 1345 (7th Cir. 1989)

The defendants were approached in an airport walkway by six to nine law enforcement officers, one of whom was brandishing a gun. The defendant’s colleague was handcuffed. The defendant was then escorted to the sheriff’s office. This constitutes an arrest which was not predicated on probable cause.

United States v. Fletcher, 91 F.3d 48 (8th Cir. 1996)

The factors upon which the government relied in support of the detention of the defendant’s luggage were not sufficient. The defendant arrived in Des Moines from a source city; he was the first off the plane and went directly to a bathroom; he was “connected” with a white pickup that had supplemental gas tanks and out of state tags; he told the officers that he had a round trip ticket, when they knew, in fact, he had purchased the return ticket in cash; he was associated with a woman who lived at an address where a narcotics complaint had been made. These factors did not justify detaining his bags. However, having detained the bags, the officers then obtained a search warrant and the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule applied. Note, in this regard, that the court held that if facts are learned during an illegal detention that are then used to acquire a search warrant, the Leon good faith rule may still apply.

United States v. Green, 52 F.3d 194 (8th Cir. 1995)

The police approached the defendant because she was single, travelling alone, carrying a duffel bag, but no purse, and was taking “counter-surveillance” measures. She agreed to talk with the police, but appeared nervous. She had difficulty producing identification or her plane ticket. The police then asked for permission to search the duffel bag which she declined to give. The police would not let her leave, stating that a drug dog was being summoned. At this point, the defendant was in custody. Moreover, the information known to the police was not sufficient at that point to justify the stop. The inability to locate a plane ticket, after the trip has ended, is not suspicious; “counter-surveillance” may simply be a traveler’s efforts to get their bearings in a new surrounding; and the fact that the defendant arrived from a source city, without more, simply does not establish an articulable suspicion, or probable cause to justify the detention, awaiting the arrival of a drug dog.

United States v. O’Neil, 17 F.3d 239 (8th Cir. 1994)

The defendant and his brother arrived at a bus station in Minnesota from a source city, Chicago. The defendant and his brother walked immediately and briskly to the exit and were carrying athletic type bags. The brother had both of the bus tickets; the defendant, when confronted by drug agents, began sweating profusely. This information did not justify the officer’s seizure of the athletic bag. Becoming nervous when confronted by the police is not an unusual reaction. Though there was insufficient information to seize the bag, the defendant immediately revealed that there was cocaine in the bag, therefore, there was probable cause to obtain a search warrant.

United States v. $7,850, 7 F.3d 1355 (8th Cir. 1993)

The defendant purchased a ticket with cash to fly from Minneapolis to Nebraska; he carried no identification or baggage; he was seen by the ticket agent to have a large wad of cash; he lied to an officer about whether he had been at the airport the day before (he had been seen there by another officer); a NADDIS report indicated that he had a heroin supplier in Nebraska. These facts did not amount to probable cause to seize the currency. (Because the district court did not consider whether there was an articulable suspicion justifying the seizure, that was not addressed by the appellate court).

United States v. Millan, 912 F.2d 1014 (8th Cir. 1990)

The police stopped a traveler based on the fact that he arrived from San Francisco, was among the first to leave the airplane, he had only carry-on luggage, dressed casually, wore a gold necklace, and had long hair. He had purchased his ticket with cash the day before but was traveling under his own name. The Eighth Circuit holds that this information was not sufficient to justify a seizure. Furthermore, the fact that agents noticed “bulges” in his jacket pockets did not justify the seizure.

United States v. White, 890 F.2d 1413 (8th Cir. 1989)

The defendant arrived at the St. Louis airport and attracted the attention of DEA agents who were suspicious of his carry-on bag, the flight from Los Angeles, his nervousness, and his use of a one-way cash ticket. On the basis of these factors, the agents seized the defendant’s luggage but permitted him to depart. The agents subjected the luggage to a drug-detection dog which alerted. The Court holds that probable cause did not exist to seize the bag; however, after the dog alerted, the police obtained a search warrant and the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule operated to permit introduction of the evidence.

United States v. Ross, 32 F.3d 1411 (9th Cir. 1994)

The government’s involvement in promulgating the FAA guidelines to combat hijacking is so pervasive “as to bring any search conducted pursuant to that program within the reach of the Fourth Amendment.” Thus, when an airline employee searches a passenger’s baggage at the ticket counter because of certain characteristics of the traveler (paid in cash, produced no identification) this is a search which must be scrutinized under Fourth Amendment standards. In this case, the search of the luggage by the employee violated the standards of Terry and United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696 (1983). The information was not sufficient to justify opening up the luggage, or the containers found inside. The X-ray found no evidence of an incendiary device, or any other dangerous device.

United States v. Garzon, 119 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1997)

Police boarded a bus in Denver and asked all the passengers to disembark, holding their carry-on luggage in their right hand so a drug dog could sniff the luggage. The defendant exited the bus, but left two bags on the bus. The police took the bags off the bus, put them on a cart and a drug dog alerted to the bags. The bags were opened and found to contain cocaine. The Tenth Circuit held that the bags were not abandoned by the defendant. The government conceded that the officer had no lawful authority to order all the passengers off the bus. The lower court’s only basis for finding abandonment was the court’s holding that the defendant failed to heed the officer’s unlawful order that all luggage be removed from the bus. This did not support a conclusion that the defendant abandoned his luggage.

United States v. Little, 60 F.3d 708 (10th Cir. 1995)

A train passenger was seized for Terry purposes when an agent questioned her in her roomette and asked incriminating questions in a manner which indicated that she was not free to leave. The agent also failed to advise the defendant that she was free to decline answering the questions.

United States v. Lambert, 46 F.3d 1064 (10th Cir. 1995)

The defendant purchased a plane ticket from Los Angeles to Wichita, Kansas with cash. When he arrived in Kansas, DEA agents approached him and asked if they could speak with him. He provided his driver’s license which they retained during further questioning. His license, plane ticket and other identifying information were all in order and consistent. Finally, the agents asked him if they could search his suitcase, which he declined. They then seized his suitcase and allowed him to leave. This was an unlawful detention without adequate foundation and the evidence obtained from a subsequent search of the suitcase (done under the authority of a search warrant) should have been suppressed. The defendant was detained at the point in time that the officer retained his driver’s license.

United States v. Washington, 151 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1998)

Two federal agents boarded a bus in Jacksonville and, holding their badges above their heads, announced that they would like to see the identification of the passengers. The agents did not tell anyone that they were free to refuse to cooperate, or to refuse to consent to a search. When they approached the defendant, they asked if they could look inside his luggage and then, when the agents saw an unusual bulge in the defendant’s pants, asked if they could search him. Again, he consented. The Eleventh Circuit held that this was not a lawful search, because the consent was not freely and voluntarily given. There is no doubt in this case that the encounter began with a “show of authority,” because the agent held his badge above his head and identified himself as a federal agent. He announced what he wanted the passengers to do, and what he was going to do. Absent some positive indication that they were free not to cooperate, it is doubtful a passenger would think he or she had the choice to ignore the police presence. Most citizens, the court observed, believe that it is their duty to cooperate with the police. Though the court declined to hold that police must advise suspects of their right to refuse to consent to a search, in this context, this is exactly what was needed. As the court held, “It seems obvious to us that if police officers genuinely want to ensure that their encounters with bus passengers remain absolutely voluntary, they can simply say so. Without such notice in this case, we do not feel a reasonable person would have felt able to decline the agents’ requests.”

United States v. Guapi, 144 F.3d 1393 (11th Cir. 1998)

At the bus station in Mobile, Alabama, two officers boarded the bus and announced that “with the passengers’ consent” they were going to quickly search all of the luggage on the bus for contraband. Nobody was told that they could exit the bus with their luggage, or that they were permitted to refuse the request. Though the court stopped short of holding that voluntary consent requires proof that the target was aware of his or her right to refuse consent, in this situation, there was no voluntary consent. The actions of the police, in the language of Florida v. Bostick “would have communicated to a reasonable person that the person was not free to decline the officers’ requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.” Note that this decision predates the United States Supreme Court decision in United States v. Drayton, supra which arguably overruled Guapi, though the Supreme Court did not expressly do so.

United States v. Gibson, 19 F.3d 1449 (D.C.Cir. 1994)

Defendant purchased a one-way ticket on an Amtrak train, with cash, several minutes prior to departure time. When he arrived at Union Station, he was approached by the police. He claimed to have been at a funeral, but his clothing did not seem appropriate. He had no identification. When the police called the telephone number listed on the reservation, there was no answer. The Court of Appeals holds that this does not amount to probable cause to arrest and the arrest and ensuing search were illegal. Even after having his suspicions aroused, the fact that the police officer frisked the defendant and felt a hard flat object in his pants did not increase the knowledge of the officer to the level of probable cause. “The Fourth Amendment stands in the way of the police arresting people simply because they appear suspicious and may be hiding something.”
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Anticipatory Warrant)

Reversing the decision of the Ninth Circuit, the Supreme Court holds that an anticipatory search warrant is permissible under the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, the triggering event is not required to be explicitly set forth in the warrant itself, or expressly incorporated by reference to the attached search warrant affidavit. The Ninth Circuit had previously held that under Groh v. Ramirez, the triggering event had to be in the warrant itself, or incorporated by reference to an attached search warrant application.

United States v. Perkins, --- F.3d --- (6th Cir. 2018)

The anticipatory search warrant stated that when the drugs were delivered to the defendant at his house, the warrant would be executed (the drugs were seized at the post office, a warrant was then obtained and the drugs were then destined to be delivered). But when the drugs were delivered, the package was given to the defendant’s wife. Though there was still probable cause to search, the delivery of the drugs to the wife was not the triggering event described in the anticipatory warrant and executing the warrant was improper.

United States v. Hotal, 143 F.3d 1223 (9th Cir. 1998)

An anticipatory search warrant must either on its face or on the face of the accompanying affidavit clearly, expressly, and narrowly specify the triggering event. In this case, the warrant signed by the magistrate made no reference to the fact that it was an anticipatory warrant and no “triggering” event was described. Even though the search warrant application explained that videotapes would be delivered to the defendant’s house, and thereafter, the warrant would be executed, the affidavit was not incorporated in the warrant.

United States v. Rowland, 145 F.3d 1194 (10th Cir. 1998)

The government obtained an anticipatory warrant that authorized the police to enter the defendant’s home after he received two child pornographic video tapes that he ordered as part of a sting operation. The agents surveilled the defendant as he retrieved the package from a post office box, but he went back to his place of employment, not home, with the package. The agents then determined that an alarm which they placed in the package was activated (indicating that the package was opened at the defendant’s site of employment). They later observed him leave his job with a briefcase, but they did not see the package. The Tenth Circuit held that the anticipatory warrant was invalid because it failed to establish probable cause that the contraband would be located at the defendant’s home after a specified triggering event (i.e., the delivery of the tape to the post office box). There was no evidence in the search warrant application that the agents had any basis to believe that the defendant would pick up the tapes from the post office box and then go home – in fact, he had previously been observed picking up items from the post office box and then going back to work. The court held, however, that the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule applied and the evidence was admissible.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Appeal by Government)

The Court holds that the 30-day period in which the government is required to file its appeal from an order granting a suppression motion begins to run on the date the district court denied the government’s motion for reconsideration rather than on the date of the district court’s original suppression order.

United States v. Hanks, 24 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 1994)

In order for the government to take an interlocutory appeal of a suppression motion granted to the defendant under 18 U.S.C. §3731, the government must certify to the district court that the appeal is not taken for purposes of delay and that the evidence is a substantial proof of a fact material in the proceeding. Though this is not jurisdictional, and virtually any certification will suffice, in this case, the government failed to file any certificate. Even when the defendant moved to dismiss the appeal, the government only filed the certificate in the district court, but failed to include it in the record on appeal. The appeal was dismissed.

United States v. Salisbury, 158 F.3d 1204 (11th Cir. 1998)

When the government appeals pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3731, the government must file a certificate that the appeal is not taken for purposes of delay and concerns evidence of a material fact in the proceeding. If the government fails to file this certificate in a timely manner, the Court of Appeals may dismiss, as it did in this case. Here the certificate was filed one month after the appeal was filed and the Court held that this was too late.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Appellate Issues)

United States v. McIntire, 516 F.3d 576 (7th Cir. 2008)

When considering whether there was probable cause to issue a search warrant, the appellate court reviews the district court’s decision on the Motion to Suppress de novo – that is, the appellate court reviews the search warrant application without affording any deference to the district court’s decision. However, the appellate court reviews the Magistrate’s decision to issue the search warrant with great deference to the determination of probable cause. See also Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690 (1996).

United States v. Gray, 491 F.3d 138 (4th Cir. 2007)

Evidence developed at a sentencing hearing may be considered by the appellate court in resolving an issue relating to a Motion to Suppress. In this case, the evidence at the sentencing hearing confirmed the lower court’s previous ruling that the defendant did not have standing to contest a search at the location where drugs were found.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Arrest Warrants – Arrests in Homes)

The Supreme Court summarily reversed a Louisiana Supreme Court decision that held that a warrantless entry into a house in order to arrest the occupant was permissible. Pursuant to Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), either a search warrant, or an arrest warrant is required to enter a home to make an arrest, assuming there are no exigent circumstances.

The police violated Payton v. New York, by entering the defendant’s apartment and arresting him without a search warrant, or an arrest warrant. While in the apartment, the defendant made an incriminating statement. He was then removed from the apartment and made additional incriminating statements. The Supreme Court holds that the statements made outside the apartment need not be suppressed.

United States v. Young, 835 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2016)
The police had an arrest warrant for Young based on an indictment that had been returned against him. But the police did not know for sure where he was and went from one house that they suspected he might be visiting to another, finally going to an “on-again-off-again” girlfriend’s house. The officers went to the door, knocked and then entered and walked through the house, eventually finding the defendant, as well as drugs that were introduced at trial. The First Circuit held that the police did not have sufficient information to support the entry into the girlfriend’s house and because the defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in that location, the evidence found during the unlawful entry should have been suppressed.

United States v. Vasquez-Argarin, 821 F.3d 467 (3rd Cir. 2016)
If the police have an arrest warrant for a person who resides at a certain location, all that is required to enter the premises is the arrest warrant. If the person for whom the arrest warrant was issued is simply present at a location, the police must obtain a search warrant in addition to the arrest warrant to enter the premises. The level of information known to the police that the person resides at the location must rise to the level of probable cause in order to obviate the need for a search warrant. The information known to the police in this case was insufficient to meet this threshold. The court noted that there is a wide divergence in the circuits regarding the level of knowledge that the police must have. Some courts require less than probable cause (reason to believe), others require probable cause. The Third Circuit also held that the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply in this case, because the police were not relying on binding precedent, or a search warrant when they entered the house.

United States v. Allen, 813 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 2016)
If the police are outside the door and the defendant is inside the door, this counts as an arrest “inside” the home and requires a warrant. What matters is where the defendant is, not the police. If the police do not have a warrant and arrest the defendant across the threshold, any evidence derived from the warrantless arrest must be suppressed.
United States v. Nora, 765 F.3d 1049 (9th Cir. 2014)

The police observed the defendant with a gun in his hand on the street and later on his porch. He retreated into his house. The police ordered him to come out of the house. This was improper: the police need a search warrant or an arrest warrant to enter a house or to order someone to exit the house. Possession of a loaded gun is, at most, a misdemeanor in California. The police officer had no basis for believing that the defendant posed a danger, or was committing a felony by possessing the gun.

United States v. Stokes, 733 F.3d 438 (2d Cir. 2013)

The police had reason to believe that the defendant was responsible for a homicide, but did not seek an arrest warrant for strategic reasons (having to do with state law that would prohibit any questioning after the issuance of an arrest warrant). The police went to the defendant’s hotel room and entered the open door. While handing him his pants to get dressed, the police saw a gun in a duffle bag. The Second Circuit held the entry was unlawful. If the police had an arrest warrant, entry into the hotel room may have been permissible, but absent an arrest warrant, entering the room was not permissible and only an arrest in a public place would have been permissible (absent consent to enter). The government also failed in its effort to invoke the inevitable discovery doctrine, because the guns in the duffle bag would not inevitably have been discovered: if the police had waited for the defendant to exit the room, it is certainly possible that he would have left without the guns, been arrested and taken away, in which case the guns would not have been discovered. It is also possible the defendant’s companion might have left the hotel room first, with the guns, and there was no basis to arrest or search her. These contingencies were possible and rendered the inevitable discovery doctrine inapplicable.

United States v. Shaw, 707 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2013)

The police had an arrest warrant for Ms. Brown, located at 3171 Hendricks Ave. They went to the general area and found two houses across the street from each other, both of which had the number 3170. Rather than further investigating the situation, the police chose the house that appeared to be occupied, knocked on the door and announced that they had a warrant, went in, conducted a sweep search and found cocaine. The occupant, Mr. Shaw, was arrested and prosecuted for the cocaine. The house was not 3171 Hendricks and Ms. Brown did not live in Shaw’s house. The Sixth Circuit held that the evidence should be suppressed. There was no basis to enter that house; there was no basis to search that house; the officers were not acting in good faith when they said that they had a warrant for that house, or when they remained in the house after determining that it was the wrong house.

United States v. Hill, 649 F.3d 258 (4th Cir. 2011)

The information known to the police was not sufficient to support a reasonable belief that the target of an arrest warrant was present in the residence that they entered. There were no exigent circumstances to justify the entry into the residence, despite apparent damage to the door frame that the police observed when they arrived.

United States v. Werra, 638 F.3d 326 (1st Cir. 2011)

The police had a warrant to arrest an individual and had information that the person was seen at a particular residence. The police went there, asked permission to enter (which was denied) and then entered without permission. The target of the warrant was not there, but the defendant was. He was frisked and a gun was found. The First Circuit held that the entry was unlawful, because the information known to the police did not amount to a reasonable belief that the target of the warrant was within. Because the officers entered unlawfully, there was no lawful basis to frisk the defendant and the gun found in his possession should have been suppressed.

United States v. Hardin, 539 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2008)

The Sixth Circuit considers— but decides not to decide— what the proper standard is for assessing whether the police had sufficient information that the defendant was in the home which they entered with an arrest warrant. Pursuant to Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), the police may enter a home with an arrest warrant if they have reason to believe that the suspect is in the home. What does “reason to believe” mean? The Sixth Circuit suggested that the standard probably is “probable cause” as opposed to “reasonable belief,” but ultimately decided in this case that there was insufficient information to support the entry under either standard. There was simply no reliable recent information that suggested that the defendant was then in the apartment that was entered.

United States v. Reeves, 524 F.3d 1161 (10th Cir. 2008)

The police repeatedly knocked on the defendant’s motel room door, after calling him on the phone numerous times. They pounded on the door at least twenty minutes. This amounted to a de facto arrest and because it occurred at the defendant’s motel room, was unconstitutional in the absence of a search warrant. The fact that the officers remained outside is not critical. The defendant had been inside and was clearly under the belief that he was required to come out of the house.

McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231 (11th Cir. 2007)

Payton requires a search warrant, or an arrest warrant before the police may enter a house to arrest an occupant. United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976), however, holds that if a defendant is standing in the open doorway, he may be arrested. What if the defendant opens the door in response to police knocking? May he be arrested without a warrant? The Eleventh Circuit holds that an arrest in this situation violates Payton.

United States v. Quaempts, 411 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 2005)

If the police want to arrest a person in his home, an arrest warrant or search warrant is needed to enter the home. However, if the defendant opens the door and is standing in the threshold, the police may arrest him. In this case, the defendant lived in a small trailer and opened the door while still on his bed. He was immediately told that he was under arrest. The defendant’s act of opening the door, while still on his bed did not qualify as standing in the threshold and an arrest sans warrant was not valid and any fruit must be suppressed. The fruit of the warrantless arrest in this case was a statement by the defendant.

United States v. Flowers, 336 F.3d 1222 (10th Cir. 2003)

Generally, in order to arrest someone in his home, the police need a warrant to gain entry. However, in United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976), the Supreme Court held that if the suspect is in the doorway of an open door, the police may arrest him. In this case, the police knocked on the door and the suspect handed a bottle of wine through a whole next to the door. This conduct was not sufficient to invoke Santana and the police could not order him to exit the house without a warrant, or to enter the house without a warrant. The evidence they observed in the house (guns and more liquor) should have been suppressed.

United States v. Albrektsen, 151 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 1998)

Armed with an arrest warrant, the police knocked on the defendant’s motel door and when the defendant answered the door, the police barged in. This was an unlawful entry, because the arrest warrant could have been executed in the doorway without the necessity of entering the premises. Note that the government waived the argument that the entry might have been justified as a permissible protective sweep.

United States v. Berkowitz, 927 F.2d 1376 (7th Cir. 1991)

Under Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), the police may not enter a home to make a warrantless arrest; a warrant to arrest is necessary. If, however, the defendant is in the doorway when the police approach and he flees into the house, then the police may follow. United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976). In this case, the defendant claimed that the police entered the house without consent and once inside announced that he was under arrest. He acknowledged that he was in the doorway when the police first arrived, though. The lower court refused to conduct a hearing, holding that this did not violate the Fourth Amendment. If, however, the defendant’s version were correct, this would violate the Fourth Amendment and a remand to develop the record was required.

United States v. Alvarez, 810 F.2d 879 (9th Cir. 1987)

The agents learned approximately two hours in advance that the defendant was waiting to receive a shipment of cocaine in the hotel room. They made no effort to obtain a telephone arrest warrant. Consequently, their warrantless arrest of the defendant was improper and evidence seized in the hotel room should have been suppressed. An arrest in a non-public place requires a warrant unless exigent circumstances require immediate action, and the situation in this case was not sufficiently exigent to excuse the need for a warrant.

United States v. McIntosh, 857 F.2d 466 (8th Cir. 1988)

Relying on the decision in Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204 (1981), the Eighth Circuit holds that utilizing an arrest warrant to arrest a third party in a defendant’s home was not proper; a search warrant should have been required. Any evidence found during a warrantless search in the defendant’s home while searching for the arrestee must be suppressed. In this case, the defendant was an overnight guest in the house which was being searched for a suspect.

United States v. Maez, 872 F.2d 1444 (10th Cir. 1989)

The defendant’s trailer was surrounded by law enforcement agents and he was ordered to exit. After his exit, he was arrested without a warrant. Though his arrest was technically executed in a “public place” (that is, outside his home) a warrant was nevertheless required since he was, in effect, arrested in his home in light of the show of force exhibited by the police officers.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Arrests – Good Faith)

Because of a clerical error, a computer showed that there was an outstanding arrest warrant for the defendant. He was arrested and a bag of marijuana was found. The Court holds that the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule applies in this context. Thus, if the police are acting in objectively reasonable good faith in arresting the defendant, a search incident to that arrest will be upheld, even if the arrest was later determined to be invalid because of a clerical error.

_Herring v. United States_, 129 S. Ct. 695 (2009)

Sheriff’s Deputies in one county were told by a clerk in a neighboring county that there was a warrant for the defendant’s arrest. This was inaccurate. The neighboring county Sheriff personnel had negligently failed to erase the warrant from the computer system when it had been withdrawn. The question in this case is whether _Arizona v. Evans_, which applies to negligent errors by court personnel also applies in this situation, where the negligence is committed by law enforcement personnel. The Supreme Court held that the exclusionary rule would not be applied in this situation. Excluding the evidence derived from the improper arrest would not deter police misconduct since negligence is not deterred by “punishing” the police. There was no evidence of systematic errors by the neighboring county’s sheriff’s department.

_United States v. Nicholson_, 721 F.3d 1236 (10th Cir. 2013)

The police stopped the defendant’s vehicle for a motor vehicle offense that did not actually occur. In short, the police thought the defendant had made an illegal left turn, when, in fact, there was nothing illegal about the method by which he made the turn. (The law related to which lane a car must enter when making a left turn). This mistake of law on the part of the officer rendered the stop improper and any evidence discovered thereafter should have been suppressed. The Tenth Circuit distinguished mistakes of fact on the part of law enforcement officers which, if reasonable, will not lead to suppression of the evidence.

_United States v. Clarkson_, 551 F.3d 1196 (10th Cir. 2009)

In this Tenth Circuit decision, decided one week prior to the decision in _Herring_, the Tenth Circuit held that the use of an improperly trained drug-sniffing dog cannot serve to invoke the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule. Thus, if a dog is not properly trained, but a police officer relies in good faith on the dog’s alert – not knowing that the dog was not properly trained – the evidence will be subject to the exclusionary rule.

_United States v. Cole_, 444 F.3d 688 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant stopped at a stop sign just shy of the cross walk, but over the solid white line. He claimed that this did not violate Texas law. The government argued that the traffic stop was valid regardless of the actual Texas law, because the officer, in good faith, thought that the law required the defendant to stop before the solid white line. The Fifth Circuit held that a good faith mistake as to the law was not a cure for an invalid stop.
United States v. Chanthaxouxat, 342 F.3d 1271 (11th Cir. 2003)

The police pulled over the defendant’s car because the officer believed that the defendant was in violation of a municipal law that required an inside rear view mirror. Actually, there was no such law. This rendered the stop illegal and the officer’s good faith did not rescue the government. An officer’s good faith mistake of fact may support a stop, but a mistake regarding the law cannot support an illegal stop and the evidence derived from the stop must be suppressed.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Arrest – Material Witness Warrant)

United States v. Awadallah, 349 F.3d 42 (2d Cir. 2003)

The Second Circuit extensively reviews the law relating to material witness warrants (18 U.S.C. § 3144), concluding that a material witness warrant may be used to detain a person whose testimony at the grand jury is required by the government.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Arrest – Pretext Arrests)

SEE ALSO: SEARCH AND SEIZURE (HIGHWAY STOPS)

United States v. Orozco, 858 F.3d 1204 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant’s truck was pulled over because the police received a tip that he was hauling drugs. There was insufficient basis under Terry to stop the truck, so the government relied on the administrative warrant exception to support the legality of the stop (which led to a consent search). The Ninth Circuit held that the evidence was clear that the police did not pull the truck over on the basis of the administrative search provisions, but solely based on the tip. This was a classic “pretextual” stop and therefore the stop was not legitimate and the resulting consent to search was invalid. The Court emphasized that in the context of administrative searches (and roadblocks), the actual motive of the police does matter.

The police officer testified that he stopped the defendant's vehicle, because he did not see a VIN on his temporary tag. At the suppression hearing, the defendant offered evidence that he did have a temporary tag and it was issued with an appropriate VIN. When offered into evidence, moreover, the temporary tag did have a VIN. The trial court concluded that the police "believed" that the car did not have a lawful tag, and, relying on Whren v. United States, concluded that the stop was lawful. This was incorrect. The officer's naked belief is not sufficient, standing alone, to justify a stop, if the belief is not reasonable. The trial court failed to make any finding whether the officer's "belief" was objectively reasonable. A pure subjective test is not appropriate.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Arrest – Probable Cause)

SEE ALSO: SEARCH AND SEIZURE (COLLECTIVE KNOWLEDGE DOCTRINE)

If the police have probable cause to arrest a defendant based on certain facts known to the officer, the arrest is valid, even if the police tell the defendant that he is being charged with some other (unrelated) offense. In this case, the police arrested the defendant and told him he was being charged with violating the state Privacy Act (the defendant was recording his conversation with the police officer). Actually, the law dictated that the defendant had not committed a violation of the Privacy Act. Nevertheless, at the time of the arrest, the police were also aware that there was probable cause to arrest the defendant for impersonating a police officer and obstruction of a law enforcement officer. The Supreme Court holds that the existence of probable cause to arrest the defendant for an offense – even an offense that was not the offense that actually prompted the arrest – supports the arrest. The Court reached this conclusion, stressing that the Court has repeatedly held that the motivation of a police officer is not a relevant inquiry in assessing probable cause: rather the objective facts known to the police officer is the focus of the probable cause determination. The Court’s decision was unanimous.

The police stopped a vehicle for speeding. The driver consented to a search of the car. Cash and drugs were found. Two other occupants of the car were arrested. The Supreme Court held that the evidence found during the consensual search was sufficient to justify the arrest of the two passengers. Therefore, the passenger’s subsequent confession was admissible.

United States v. Evans, 851 F.3d 830 (8th Cir. 2017)

A woman called the police and said that she was raped the night before and the man was at bus stop near the apartment. She generally described the perpetrator’s weight and height and explained that she was wearing red tennis shoes. She was not able to describe his face and vaguely described a scar on his abdomen. The defendant was arrested. The District Court held that the information provided by the “victim” including issues about her credibility (not revealing how she came to meet the man and agree to meet him in an apartment stairway), did not rise to the level of probable cause. The Eighth Circuit affirmed.

United States v. Navedo, 694 F.3d 463 (3rd Cir. 2012)

The police saw the defendant on the porch of his apartment building. Another man came up to the defendant, retrieved a gun from a backpack and showed it to the defendant. The police then approached and both men fled. The police arrested the defendant. The Third Circuit held that there was no probable cause to support the arrest based on the defendant’s flight. Even considering Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119 (2000), the defendant’s conduct was not sufficiently suspicious to support an arrest. Even if the police were permitted to briefly detain the suspect and investigate legitimate suspicions – some of which may arise by virtue of the defendant’s flight, coupled with other circumstances – flight is not a sufficient basis to make an arrest.

United States v. Struckman, 603 F.3d 731 (9th Cir. 2010)

A neighbor called the police and reported that a white man wearing a black leather jacket had just climbed over a fence in her neighbor’s yard and she could not see who it was, but the neighbors were not home. The police went to the location, looked over the fence and promptly detained (with guns drawn) the defendant, who fit the description and was walking around in the backyard. He was searched and a gun was found. They then determined that he lived at that house; and also learned that he was a convicted felon who could not possess a firearm. The Ninth Circuit held (1) there was no probable cause to arrest the defendant – despite the report from the neighbor, the police should have asked the defendant his name and obtained information about where he lived before arresting him; (2) there were no exigent circumstances to support the arrest and search; (3) the backyard was part of the cartilage of the house.

United States v. Valentine, 539 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2008)

The police made a control delivery of boxes (which they knew contained drugs, hidden in some furniture), to an apartment in which the defendant was apparently residing. The boxes were not addressed to the defendant, however. It was apparent that he knew the addressee, but there was no information linking him to the drugs. Based on the information known to the agents, there was no probable cause to arrest the defendant.

United States v. Collins, 427 F.3d 688 (9th Cir. 2005)

A target of a stolen check ring agreed to meet undercover agents and provide more stolen checks to them. The target arrived in his car and parked in a parking lot. Two other cars simultaneously pulled up and parked on either side of the target’s car. Shortly thereafter, the defendant was seen talking to the driver of one of the other cars. It was not clear from where he came, though he may have come from the other car. This information was not sufficient to support an arrest of the defendant.

United States v. Myers, 308 F.3d 251 (3rd Cir. 2002)

The police were called to an apartment regarding a disturbance. When the police arrived, a young girl was on the front step and she told the officer that her mother and her boyfriend were inside fighting and the boyfriend had a gun. The officer entered the apartment and after finding the defendant behind a door arrested him. The officer observed the defendant throw a bag on the ground. The defendant was handcuffed and the woman was brought downstairs. The officer then went back upstairs and opened the bag, finding a gun. The Third Circuit held that there was no probable cause to arrest the defendant, and even if there had been probable cause, the search of the bag was not incident to the arrest and was therefore unlawful. Regarding probable cause, at most there was some indication that there had been a simple assault, but that had not occurred in the officer’s presence and thus he could not arrest the defendant for that offense. Regarding the search, with the defendant handcuffed and immobilized, there was no need to search the bag.

United States v. Kithcart, 134 F.3d 529 (3rd Cir. 1998)
The police received a report of several armed robberies. One of the robberies involved two black males in a Z-28, or a Camaro. About ten minutes later, an officer observed a black Nissan with one black male driving. She pulled behind the car and when the car ran a red light, she stopped the vehicle and then realized that there were two occupants. The occupants were ordered to exit the car and were searched. A gun was found in the defendant's possession and he was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. Searching the occupants could not be supported on the basis of a search incident to arrest, because there was no probable cause to support an arrest. In short, the fact that two black men were driving a sports car in the general vicinity of a robbery did not support the arrest of every black sports car with two black occupants. Upon remand, the trial court again denied the motion to suppress and in an unreported decision, that decision was affirmed. 34 Fed. Appx. 872 (3rd Cir. 2002).

United States v. Ho, 94 F.3d 932 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was approached at an airport because of his suspicious appearance and itinerary. He initially gave consent to a search of his portfolio. As the officer was looking through the portfolio, he discovered a blank white plastic card. At that point, the defendant abruptly withdrew his consent by grabbing the portfolio back. The officer grabbed the white card and saw a magnetic strip on the back, which indicated that it was a fraudulent card. However, the discovery of the magnetic strip on the back only occurred after the defendant had revoked his consent and thus could not be considered. Prior to noticing the magnetic strip, moreover, probable cause did not exist to arrest the defendant and continue the search on a search incident to arrest theory. The district court erred in denying the motion to suppress.

United States v. Jackson, 818 F.2d 345 (5th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was arrested pursuant to an arrest warrant. However, the warrant failed to establish the reliability, veracity and basis of knowledge of the informant who provided the incriminating information.

United States v. Levy, 990 F.2d 971 (7th Cir. 1993)

A local ordinance outlawed face-to-face solicitations. In this case, a telemarketer called a billiards parlor operator and asked for a twenty-five dollar donation for the Police Federation. The billiards operator agreed. The telemarketer sent a runner to pick up the donation and the police met him there, arrested him and found a gun in his possession. He was charged with a 922(g) violation (possession of a firearm by a convicted felon). Because the defendant had not violated the ordinance, however, there was no probable cause to arrest him and the search incident was improper. The evidence should have been suppressed.

United States v. Ingrao, 897 F.2d 860 (7th Cir. 1990)

The Seventh Circuit concludes that there was not probable cause to arrest the defendant. Most of the evidence upon which the trial court relied related to another individual. The police had maintained surveillance on the other individual’s house. The defendant was seen exiting the house with a gym bag. Never, however, were the defendant and the other individual seen together. In order to find probable cause based on association with persons engaging in criminal activity, some additional circumstances from which it is reasonable to infer participation in the criminal enterprise must be shown. The mere fact that the defendant was carrying a bag does not add significantly to any already existing suspicion by the police. Furthermore, the defendant’s “furtive gestures” were not sufficient additional information to justify the arrest of the defendant.
McIntosh v. Arkansas Republican Party, 825 F.2d 184 (8th Cir. 1987)
The defendant stated his intention to disrupt a meeting of the Arkansas Republican Party. The party contacted the police who arrested the defendant outside the meeting room. This constitutes unlawful arrest, and the Arkansas Republican Party was held liable for a violation of the defendant’s civil rights. The Court holds that an individual may not be arrested for a future crime.

United States v. Delgadillo-Velasquez, 856 F.2d 1292 (9th Cir. 1988)
An uncorroborated tip from an untested informant does not give agents probable cause to believe that a fugitive lived at the defendant’s apartment or that the defendant was the fugitive. Further, evidence obtained after the arrest could not be considered in assessing probable cause at the time of the seizure.

United States v. Dimick, 990 F.2d 1164 (10th Cir. 1993)
The defendant was travelling from Los Angeles to St. Louis. He paid for his one-way ticket in cash, remained in his compartment the entire trip; tipped the train conductors with $20 bills; ordered his meals delivered to his compartment; lied about his name when questioned and claimed to have no luggage. Based on this information, the DEA entered his compartment and found a suitcase, which was then subjected to a dog sniff. The dog alerted and narcotics were found in the suitcase. The entry into the train compartment required probable cause which was lacking at that time. Absent probable cause, even with reasonable suspicion, which did exist, the officers could not enter the compartment. This opinion may not have survived a later decision in the Tenth Circuit, United States v. Little, 18 F.3d 1499 (10th Cir. 1994).

United States v. Anderson, 981 F.2d 1560 (10th Cir. 1992)
While the defendant’s actions and associations with others gave rise to an articulable suspicion, there was not probable cause justifying his arrest. His suspicious activities included being present at a location where marijuana was located, parking his pickup truck near a U-Haul which the police suspected contained marijuana. Later, he drove off in his pickup, driving cautiously.

Ortega v. Christian, 85 F.3d 1521 (11th Cir. 1996)
In this civil rights case, the court held that the police lacked probable cause to arrest the plaintiff. The arrest was based on an informant’s tip which was not corroborated, there was no showing of the informant’s basis of knowledge, and no showing of the informant’s prior history in providing information to the police in order to support his credibility.

United States v. Gonzalez, 969 F.2d 999 (11th Cir. 1992)
The court remanded this case back to the district court to determine if the police officer’s misidentification of a person was objectively reasonable and thus, whether there was probable cause to arrest. The fact that the detective made an “honest mistake” is not determinative; the question is whether this honest mistake was reasonable. The court declined to rule whether the arrest, which was based on an anonymous tip, coupled with the corroboration of innocent activity, was based on probable cause, but found that, at best, it presented a close question, depending on the objective reasonableness of the officer’s mistaken identity of one of the participants in the innocent activity.
United States v. Gibson, 19 F.3d 1449 (D.C.Cir. 1994)

Defendant purchased a one-way ticket on an Amtrak train, with cash, several minutes prior to departure time. When he arrived at Union Station, he was approached by the police. He claimed to have been at a funeral, but his clothing did not seem appropriate. He had no identification. When the police called the telephone number listed on the reservation, there was no answer. The Court of Appeals holds that this does not amount to probable cause to arrest and the arrest and ensuing search were illegal. Even after having his suspicions aroused, the fact that the police frisked the defendant and felt a hard flat object in his pants did not increase the knowledge of the police to the level of probable cause. “The Fourth Amendment stands in the way of the police arresting people simply because they appear suspicious and may be hiding something.”
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Arrest – What Constitutes an Arrest?)

Police officers were patrolling a high-crime area. Several youths fled immediately upon seeing the officers. The officers pursued the youths and after observing one youth throw down a plastic bag, an officer tackled him. The initial pursuit of the youths did not amount to a seizure. The mere show of authority is not tantamount to a seizure, absent some actual physical force being applied.

Law enforcement officers erected a roadblock which was designed to stop a speeding car driven by the defendant. The defendant’s car crashed into the tractor trailer which had been placed in such a way that the crash could have been envisioned by the police officers. The Supreme Court holds that this roadblock was a “seizure” for Fourth Amendment purposes and could give rise to a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. §1983.

United States v. Wrensford, 866 F.3d 76 (3rd Cir. 2017)
The police were investigating a shooting and located the defendant, who generally fit the description of the shooter. The defendant was handcuffed, his belongings were removed from his pocket, he was taken to the police station and put in a cell. The Third Circuit held that this constituted a de facto arrest. The case was remanded to the district court to determine what fruits of this illegal arrest were required to be suppressed: items found in his pockets, items found near where he was arrested, a DNA sample, an identification of the defendant by a witness at the police station.

United States v. Reeves, 524 F.3d 1161 (10th Cir. 2008)
The police repeatedly knocked on the defendant’s motel room door, after calling him on the phone numerous times. They pounded on the door at least twenty minutes. This amounted to a de facto arrest and because it occurred at the defendant’s motel room, was unconstitutional in the absence of a search warrant. The fact that the officers remained outside is not critical. The defendant had been inside and was clearly under the belief that he was required to come out of the house.

United States v. Virden, 488 F.3d 1317 (11th Cir. 2007)
The police stopped the defendant’s car after watching it leave the location where a search was about to occur. Because a drug dog was not available at that location, the police put the defendant in a police car in handcuffs and brought the car to a location two miles away where the dog was located. The Eleventh Circuit held that this exceeded the bounds of a Terry stop and amounted to a seizure requiring probable cause. Because there was no probable cause, the search of the car was unlawful.

United States v. Lopez-Arias, 344 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2003)
To determine whether an investigative detention has crossed the line and become an arrest, the court considers factors such as the transportation of the detainee to another location, significant restraints on the detainee’s freedom of movement involving physical confinement or other coercion preventing the detainee from leaving police custody, and use of weapons or bodily force. In this case, the police crossed the line. The suspects were stopped by four DEA agents brandishing firearms; they were handcuffed; placed into the backseats of separate DEA vehicles; transported from the scene of the stop; read their Miranda rights and questioned. Though there was a reasonable suspicion that the defendants possessed drugs, the government conceded that there was not probable cause. The consent given by the defendant was tainted by the illegal arrest. See also United States v. Heath, 259 F.3d 522 (6th Cir. 2001); United States v. Richardson, 949 F.2d 851 (6th Cir. 1991); United States v. Butler, 223 F.3d 368 (6th Cir. 2000).

United States v. Acosta-Colon, 157 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1998)
A drug dog alerted to suitcases that were destined from Puerto Rico to New York. Agents determined that the bags were checked by people related to the defendant’s reservation. When the defendant attempted to board the plane, he and three other passengers were handcuffed and brought to a customs area. Once in an interview room, the defendant was seen attempting to eat some paper (the claim tickets for the suitcases). This occurred about fifteen minutes after he was placed in the room. The bags had 15 kilograms of cocaine. The First Circuit concluded: (1) There was no probable cause for the arrest; (2) There was an articulable suspicion supporting a brief detention; (3) the detention in this case rose to the level of an arrest. The following factors are indicative of an arrest: the defendant was in handcuffs; transported to a different location; detained for more than a momentary period; was never informed of how long he would be detained. Though no factor is outcome determinative, in combination, the circumstances in this case amounted to a de facto arrest. Because there was no probable cause, the evidence should have been suppressed.

United States v. Babwah, 972 F.2d 30 (2d Cir. 1992)
The police had an articulable suspicion justifying the stop of defendant’s vehicle. However, after the stop and a consent search, there was no basis for continuing the detention. Nevertheless, the police ordered the defendant to return to a house where a large amount of cash was found. This latter aspect of the “stop” amounted to an arrest which was not supported by probable cause.

United States v. Ceballos, 812 F.2d 42 (2d Cir. 1987)
A counterfeiting suspect left work to accompany secret service agents to their office after being made aware of the urgency of their errand. He was also refused permission to drive to the agents’ office alone. This constitutes arrest. It is irrelevant that the agents told him that he was not under arrest. Under the circumstances, a reasonable person would not have felt free to leave.

United States v. Cagle, 849 F.2d 924 (5th Cir. 1988)
Border patrol agents seized a passenger’s suitcase and prevented it from being loaded on the passenger’s airline flight. This constitutes a full-scale arrest and not just a detention because the passenger’s itinerary was clearly frustrated. The officers failed to use the most diligent, least intrusive investigatory techniques.

United States v. Johnson, 846 F.2d 279 (5th Cir. 1988)
Although postal inspectors advised the suspect that he was not under arrest, their inquiries took the form of demands and their hostile reactions to the suspect’s explanations altered the nature of the contact into an arrest.
United States v. Richardson, 949 F.2d 851 (6th Cir. 1991)

The police approached the defendant who was standing outside a storage unit which the police believed contained contraband. They asked for his consent to search the unit; the defendant refused. He was placed in the back of the patrol car and told to wait there while the officers questioned defendant’s colleague. This amounted to an arrest of the defendant and his subsequent consent to search the storage unit was tainted by this unlawful arrest. In light of the statements of the officers and the circumstances, this was more than a mere Terry stop.

United States v. Grant, 920 F.2d 376 (6th Cir. 1991)

Border Patrol Agents entered an airplane which was making a one-hour stop in Detroit and, without any articulable suspicion, approached the defendant in the back of the plane. They asked him identifying questions and asked him to produce his green card. Next, they directed him to deplane for further questioning. This conduct of the agents made it apparent to Grant that he was not free to ignore the officers and proceed on his way.

United States v. Hatfield, 815 F.2d 1068 (6th Cir. 1987)

Defendant was under arrest at the time he was standing with police officers away from his vehicle, was informed that scanners in his vehicle were unlawful and witnessed radioing of another officer to aid and search the vehicle.

United States v. Novak, 870 F.2d 1345 (7th Cir. 1989)

The defendants were surrounded by law enforcement agents in an enclosed area of an airport. One of the officers drew a gun. The defendant was separated from his travel-mate, who had been handcuffed. The defendant’s carry-on luggage, as well as his identification, was taken from him. The defendant was under arrest and his subsequent consent to a search was not voluntary.

United States v. Longbehn, 850 F.2d 450 (8th Cir. 1988)

A police officer confessed to a crime without having been given adequate Miranda warnings. At the time of the confession, his detention was police-dominated, inherently coercive, and tantamount to a formal arrest. The confession must be suppressed.

United States v. $191,910.00 in U.S. Currency, 16 F.3d 1051 (9th Cir. 1994)

When the claimant arrived at the airport, the police relieved him of his carry-on bags that they knew to contain a large amount of currency. The defendant was permitted to leave. Not until two hours later did a drug-sniffing dog alert to the luggage. This was an unreasonably long seizure. In United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696 (1983), the Supreme Court held that a 90-minute delay was unreasonable. Moreover, the agents did not act diligently in this case. They knew the defendant would be arriving at the airport an hour before the plane arrived; yet arrangements to have the dog on hand were not started until after the defendant arrived.

United States v. Ricardo, D., 912 F.2d 337 (9th Cir. 1990)

The Ninth Circuit concludes that the detention of the juvenile during field questioning amounted to a de facto arrest. The juvenile was patted down, gripped by the arm, told he was not to run, and directed to the back of one of two patrol cars present at the scene. This conduct transformed the investigatory stop into an arrest.

United States v. Baron, 860 F.2d 911 (9th Cir. 1988)

Three police officers escorted a drug suspect from the parking lot to the bedroom of an accomplice to determine whether her hands had any fluorescent powder on them which had been placed on the drugs during a controlled delivery. The Court holds that this represents an arrest, necessarily requiring probable cause. The Court went on to hold that probable cause existed.

United States v. Robertson, 833 F.2d 777 (9th Cir. 1987)
An officer’s detention of a defendant at gunpoint was an arrest, not a Terry stop. The defendant was confronted by seven to ten police officers at the time of this “encounter.” At no time did the officers check the defendant for weapons, indicating that they knew or suspected that she was not armed, and thus this was not a stop and frisk.

United States v. Beraun-Panez, 812 F.2d 578 (9th Cir. 1987)
While adhering to the objective test, the Ninth Circuit says that an important consideration is the “arrestee’s” alien status. In determining whether a reasonable man would consider himself to have been under arrest, it is proper for the Court to consider whether a reasonable “alien” would believe, after being told that responding to questioning would avoid his deportation, that he was under arrest. In this case, the Court holds that the defendant was under arrest and consequently his interrogation should have been preceded by Miranda warnings.

United States v. Phillips, 812 F.2d 1355 (11th Cir. 1987)
The Eleventh Circuit repudiates a long line of cases dealing with the definition of arrest and conforms to recent Supreme Court decisions in defining what constitutes an arrest. Rather than the subjective test previously used which focuses on the state of mind of the defendant and whether he felt free to leave, the Court now adopts an objective, reasonable man standard which focuses on the types of restraints imposed and communications between the police and the defendant. Subjective factors are no longer relevant.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Attenuation)

If a defendant is pulled over for an investigatory stop illegally (there was no articulable suspicion or probable cause to support the stop) and the police determine that there is an outstanding arrest warrant for the defendant, a search incident to arrest is proper and the exclusionary rule does not bar the use of evidence discovered during the search incident to arrest. The illegal stop is too attenuated from the discovery of the evidence that was the product of the legal search incident to arrest.

_United States v. Terry_, 909 F.3d 716 (4th Cir. 2018)

The police unlawfully placed a GPS device on the defendant’s car without first obtaining a warrant. They subsequently used the data from the device to determine that the defendant was speeding, and on that basis the car was pulled over and ultimately drugs were found in the car. The initial illegal “search” (placing the GPS device on the car without a warrant) was not too attenuated from the subsequent discovery of drugs and was, instead, the fruit of the poisonous tree and the evidence should have been suppressed. On the question of standing, the court held that the defendant had standing, as the driver of the car, when the GPS device was placed on the vehicle and though he was a passenger during the subsequent stop (and thus did not have standing to challenge the drugs found in the car), the search was the fruit of the poisonous tree and the lack of standing does not change that determination.

_United States v. Shrum_, 908 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir. 2018)

The defendant’s 30-year old wife died at home and he called 911. The police and medical personnel arrived shortly thereafter and the wife was taken to the hospital and pronounced dead. The defendant went to the police station and was questioned. The police “secured” the house and for several hours, the defendant’s access to the house was limited. During the time the house was “secured” the police entered and took several photographs, some of which revealed the presence of ammunition. The defendant was charged with possession of ammunition by a convicted felon. The Tenth Circuit held that the house was, in fact, seized; there was no probable cause, or even an articulable suspicion, to interfere with the defendant’s access to the house and the seizure was therefore unlawful; the unlawful seizure resulted in the discovery of evidence; the discovery of evidence was not attenuated from the illegal seizure. There is no such thing as a “crime scene” investigation exception to the Fourth Amendment. The district court should have suppressed the evidence (discovery of the ammunition).

_United States v. Cordero-Rosario_, 786 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2015)

The initial search warrant stated that the crime under investigation was “lewd actions” and that “in accordance with the interview of the child, there is currently pornography on the defendant’s computer. There was no information in the search warrant application about what the child said, how the alleged pornography was related to any offense, how the child knew about the presence of pornography on the computer, or why the affiant believed that pornography was evidence of a crime. The evidence should have been suppressed, because even the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply to this warrant. Based on the discovery of child pornography during the search of the computer, the police went back to the apartment and secured the wife’s consent to search additional computers. The First Circuit held that this was arguably the fruit of the poisonous tree (exploiting the first illegal search), but further fact-finding was necessary to develop the record relating to the subsequent consent searches.

United States v. Brodie, 742 F.3d 1058 (D.C. Cir. 2014)

The police were waiting outside a house that they planned to search pursuant to a search warrant. While awaiting their colleagues, the defendant was observed leaving the house (the police were not targeting that individual; the target was already in custody). The police approached the defendant and directed him to place his hands on the car (which he did). Shortly thereafter, he fled, discarding drugs and guns while on the run. The D.C. Circuit held (1) the defendant was detained; (2) there was no basis for the detention because, pursuant to Bailey v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 1031 (2013), the police may not detain an individual in connection with the execution of a search warrant unless the detention is at the time when, and at the place where, the search is being executed; (3) the detention was not attenuated from the defendant’s flight; and (4) the evidence that the police obtained was the fruit of the unlawful detention.

United States v. Hernandez, 670 F.3d 616 (5th Cir. 2012)

The police received a tip that the defendant was harboring illegal aliens. They went to her trailer and started banging on the door and windows and demanding entry. The defendant came to the door and acknowledged that there was an illegal alien inside. The Fifth Circuit concluded that the banging on the doors and windows and demanding entry amounted to a Fourth Amendment violation (an illegal seizure) and the defendant’s subsequent statement was not attenuated from that illegal conduct. Therefore, her statement should have been suppressed. The court also held that the statements obtained by witnesses inside (as well as additional evidence) were the fruit of the Fourth Amendment violation, as well and those statements, too, would be suppressed.

United States v. Shetler, 665 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2011)

Based on a tip, the police conducted a warrantless search of the defendant’s garage (which the district court held was justified by exigent circumstances and was a valid security sweep) and then the police entered the house without a warrant and continued to conduct a search. This latter search was not lawful. The defendant, confronted with evidence that was uncovered during the search, made numerous incriminating statements. The Ninth Circuit held that all statements were the fruit of the poisonous tree and should have been suppressed. The Court further held that the confession was not sufficiently “attenuated” from the illegal search so as to break the causal chain. The fact that he was Mirandized prior to making the statements also did not break the causal chain.

United States v. Gross, 662 F.3d 393 (6th Cir. 2011)

The police stopped an automobile in which the defendant was a passenger. The stop was found to be improper, because there was no articulable suspicion supporting the stop. During the course of the stop, the police learned that there was an arrest warrant for the defendant. The question in the Sixth Circuit was whether the existence of an arrest warrant and the evidence found during a search incident to the arrest was the fruit of the illegal stop, and did the exclusionary rule bar the introduction of the evidence. The Sixth Circuit held that the exclusionary rule did apply and the evidence would be suppressed. Contrary authority in the Seventh Circuit in United States v. Green, 111 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 1997), was rejected by the Sixth Circuit.

United States v. Williams, 615 F.3d 657 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was standing in a housing project with others when a police officer approached and said he was “again trespassing on [housing authority] property.” During the following interaction, the defendant acknowledged in response to questions that there might be a warrant out for his arrest and he also acknowledged carrying a gun. The Sixth Circuit held that the encounter was a seizure for Fourth Amendment purposes. There were two officers, they approached the defendant an immediately accused him of a crime, and there was no basis that would lead the defendant to believe that he could simply walk away from the officers. There was insufficient information known to the police to support the seizure; the defendant’s statement was the fruit of that detention; the evidence would be suppressed, even though there was an outstanding arrest warrant.

United States v. Holmes, 505 F.3d 1288 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

The defendant was seen in an alley by the police at 3:40 in the morning and when the officers approached him, he fled, scaling several fences in the process. The officers followed him and when they caught him, he was frisked and a set of car keys were discovered and taken from him. The officers then used the car keys’ remote door opener to find the car. The defendant then gave consent to search the car and a gun was found in the car. The D.C. Circuit held that taking the keys from the defendant after the frisk violated his Fourth Amendment rights. There was no probable cause to seize the keys and the fruit of that unlawful seizure was the discovery, and ultimately the search, of the vehicle in which the gun was found. The government’s argument that the taint of the illegal seizure was purged by the subsequent consent to search was rejected. The attenuation doctrine did not save the search in this case.

United States v. Hernandez, 279 F.3d 302 (5th Cir. 2002)

Suspicious of a bus traveler, a police officer took her luggage out of the baggage compartment of the bus and handled it, feeling (from the outside) the contents. This violated Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334 (2000), which held that such manipulation of luggage amounts to a search. The agent at that point entered the bus and secured the defendant’s consent to open the suitcase. This was valid consent. But the consent was not sufficiently attenuated from the initial illegality to remove the taint. Thus, even though the search was conducted pursuant to the defendant’s consent, it was still the fruit of the illegal search that preceded it. The officer decided to approach the defendant only after he had felt something suspicious in her suitcase. This invalidates the consent search.

United States v. Drosten, 819 F.2d 1067 (11th Cir. 1987)

The unlawful entry into a defendant’s apartment by police officers which resulted in the discovery of a third person in the apartment made that third person’s testimony inadmissible.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Automobiles)

SEE ALSO: SEARCH AND SEIZURE (HIGHWAY STOPS)

Even if the police have probable cause to search an automobile (or, as in this case, a motorcycle), the police may not enter the curtilage of a house to search the vehicle without a warrant. The automobile exception does not authorize the search of an automobile at all times and at all places, without a warrant. In this case, the police walked up the defendant’s driveway, invading the curtilage of the property, to search the motorcycle.

When the police stop a vehicle that has a driver and passenger, the passenger is also “detained” for fourth amendment purposes. Therefore, if there was no basis for the stop, the passenger may contest the admissibility of any fruits of that stop (for which he has standing), such as a statement he made, or evidence seized from his person or personal belongings.

In New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981), the Court held that the police may conduct a search incident to arrest of the interior of a car whenever an occupant is arrested. In this case, the Court concluded that the same rationale allows the police to search a vehicle, even if the occupant is arrested by the police after exiting the car and is not within reach of the interior of the vehicle.

Five years after Thornton was decided, the Supreme Court followed up on the promise of the five Justices in Thornton who expressed displeasure with the scope of Belton, in the case of Arizona v. Gant, 129 S. Ct. 1710 (2009). Though stating that Belton was not expressly overruled, the Court determined that Belton required significant reigning in and held that a search incident to arrest, following an automobile stop, is only permissible “if it is reasonable to believe that the arrestee might access the vehicle at the time of the search or that the vehicle contains evidence of the offense of arrest.” Thus, if the arrestee is in the back of the patrol car and restrained, the police may not automatically search the passenger compartment of the vehicle, simply because the defendant was arrested in, or immediately after exiting, the vehicle. What matters is the accessibility of the vehicle at the time of the search, not at the time of the arrest. A search may occur, however, even if the arrestee is not within reach of the car if there is “reason to believe” (i.e., not necessarily probable cause) that evidence of the crime for which the defendant is arrested is in the vehicle. In Gant, the defendant was arrested after he exited his vehicle in his driveway. He was arrested based on a warrant for a previous offense. There was no reason to believe that there was any evidence in the vehicle relating to the offense listed in the warrant. He was arrested and handcuffed in the back of the patrol car when the search of his vehicle occurred. The Court held that Belton – as heretofore construed – did not authorize this search and the evidence should have been suppressed.

1402

The police stopped a vehicle for speeding. The driver consented to a search of the car. Cash and drugs were found. Two other occupants of the car were arrested. The Supreme Court held that the evidence found during the consensual search was sufficient to justify the arrest of the two passengers. Therefore, one of the passenger’s subsequent confessions was admissible.

When the police have probable cause to search a car, they may search all containers in the car, including containers known to belong to passengers, and for which there is no specific probable cause. The Court did not disturb its earlier holding in United States v. DiRe, 332 U.S. 581 (1948), which held that probable cause to search a car does not authorize the search of the person of a passenger.

If the police stop a vehicle lawfully and there is a passenger in the vehicle, if the police have a reason to believe the passenger is armed and dangerous, he may be frisked. This is true, even if the passenger is not believed to have committed any crime.

Under Florida state law the police are authorized to seize an automobile for forfeiture purposes. (The same law exists with regard to federal forfeitures). In this case, the police observed the defendant, in his vehicle, involved in a drug transaction, but waited several months before seizing the car from a parking lot at defendant's place of employment. They then performed an inventory search. The Court upheld the warrantless seizure and inventory search even though there were no exigent circumstances and the probable cause to seize the vehicle arose several months earlier.

Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408 (1997)

The police may direct a passenger to exit a vehicle when the car has been stopped for a legitimate reason.

Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996)

If a lawful traffic stop has been made and the basis for the traffic stop has been accomplished, the police may then request consent to search the vehicle without announcing to the driver that he is free to leave.

If there is probable cause to search a car, there is no need to show the existence of particular exigent circumstances. That is, the fact that a car is involved is itself justification for dispensing with the search warrant requirement.

Overruling United States v. Chadwick and Arkansas v. Sanders, the Supreme Court held that if the police have probable cause to search a container in a vehicle, but do not have probable cause to search the rest of the car, the “automobile exception” applies and the police may conduct a warrantless search of the container. In this opinion, the Court reviews the automobile exception and its theoretical underpinnings at length.
If a person consents to a search of his automobile, an officer may search all closed containers found within the automobile. The officer is not required to make a second request before opening a closed container.

When the police make a traffic stop and issue a citation and do not make a custodial arrest, the police may not thereafter conduct a search of the vehicle on the theory that it is a search incident to arrest.

United States v. Hussain, 835 F.3d 307 (2d Cir. 2016)
If the police do not arrest the occupants of a car, but are engaged in traffic stop, they may not search inside the car unless they meet the standard of Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983): the officers must have a reasonable belief based on specific and articulale facts that the suspect was dangerous and the suspect might gain immediate control of weapons thus entitling them to conduct a search inside the car. The information known to the police when they searched the defendant’s car in this case did not meet the standard. There was insufficient information to believe that the occupants were armed (one defendant had given the police a knife that had been in his pocket and was standing behind the car).

United States v. Beene, --- F.3d --- (5th Cir. 2016)
If a car is parked in the driveway of a a home (even if outside the curtilage), despite the existence of probable cause to search the vehicle (such as a dog alert), the police must obtain a warrant unless there are particularized exigent circumstances.

United States v. Patiutka, 804 F.3d 684 (4th Cir. 2015)
The defendant was pulled over on the Interstate for a traffic offense. The trooper asked him for his driver’s license and asked the defendant some identifying information, including the defendant’s age. The trooper thought that the defendant gave an answer about his age that was inconsistent with the driver’s license. The trooper asked for consent to search the car. Initially, the defendant apparently consented (his foreign accent made it difficult to understand him), but shortly thereafter revoked his consent. At that point, the trooper detained the defendant and began to search again. The district court granted the motion to suppress: (1) there was no probable cause to arrest the defendant (the judge found that there was insufficient evidence that the defendant lied about his birthdate), and therefore no basis for a search incident to arrest; (2) the automobile exception did not apply, because the evidence known to the officers (even the evidence found during the aborted consent search) did not amount to probable cause. All that was found was a credit card reader and three IPads. This does not amount to probable cause to search a car.

United States v. Noble, 762 F.3d 509 (6th Cir. 2014)
The police were watching the Interstate for a vehicle that was suspected to be involved in a methamphetamine distribution operation. When the vehicle was spotted, an officer pulled behind it. The vehicle crossed a lane line without a proper signal. The officer activated his lights. The officer determined that the tint on the window was too dark. The driver and the passenger (the defendant) were excessively nervous. The driver consented to a search of the vehicle, at which point the passenger/defendant was asked to exit the vehicle and he was frisked. Because there was no basis to believe that he was armed or dangerous, there was no legitimate basis to frisk the defendant and the evidence derived from this frisk should have been suppressed. The facts that the driver and passenger were nervous and that the vehicle was suspected of being involved in a drug trafficking operation are not sufficient to support a reasonable belief that the passenger was armed or dangerous, even coupled with the officer’s experience that drug dealers are often armed. The court ridicules the notion that any passenger in a car can be frisked if the driver or the vehicle is suspected of being involved in drugs: this would presumably include “a fourth grader, a ninety-five-year-old gentleman with Parkinson’s disease, or a judge this court.” The law requires individualized suspicion of the person who is to be frisked, not a general belief that someone in the vehicle might possibly be armed.

United States v. Cervantes, 703 F.3d 1135 (9th Cir. 2012)

A man was seen leaving what was described by the police as a stash house with a white box. That man was later observed giving the box to the defendant. The defendant’s car was followed briefly and the police believed that he engaged in counter-surveillance maneuvers. Later the defendant, with the box was pulled over for a minor technical motor vehicle infraction and the officer could not confirm that he had a valid driver’s license. The car was searched and the box was found to contain cocaine. The government contended that there was probable cause to search the car. The Ninth Circuit disagreed: the officer’s testimony that the house was a “stash house” was worth little, because no facts were offered to support that conclusory statement. The claim that the defendant engaged in counter-surveillance was equally unhelpful. The government next argued that the car was subject to impoundment and inventory, but the Ninth Circuit rejected this theory, too, because there was insufficient information that the car was obstructing traffic, or otherwise in need of being impoundment. Moreover, the government did not show that the impoundment was appropriate under California law.

United States v. McCraney, 674 F.3d 614 (6th Cir. 2012)

The limitations on a search incident to arrest announced in Gant are not limited to situations where the defendant is handcuffed in the rear of a patrol car. Here, the defendants were outside the car, surrounded by several law enforcement officers. A search of the car was not a valid search incident to arrest.

United States v. Gaines, 668 F.3d 170 (4th Cir. 2012)

Three police officers testified that as the car in which the defendant was a passenger drove past them, they observed a small crack in the windshield. The car was stopped and the defendant was ordered out of the car and frisked and the officer felt a gun. The defendant assaulted the police officer and fled, after which he was stopped and a gun was found in his possession. The district court found that the officers were untruthful when they said that they observed a crack in the windshield and that the stop, therefore, was illegal. The government conceded the illegality of the stop, but claimed that the assault of the officer was an intervening event that authorized the search (incident to arrest). The Fourth Circuit rejected this argument: the gun was found during the course of the illegal stop (and the frisk) which was before the defendant engaged in the intervening assault.
United States v. Powell, 666 F.3d 180 (4th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was a passenger in a car. The driver was stopped and he had a suspended license. The police asked the defendant/passenger for his license to see if he would be allowed to drive the car. A record check was performed on the defendant’s license and it revealed a prior armed robbery conviction and also a suspended license. The police then frisked the defendant, discovering evidence used in a drug/firearm prosecution. The Fourth Circuit held that the frisk was not lawful, because there was no reasonable basis for believing that the defendant was armed, or dangerous, and therefore no reason to frisk him.

United States v. Rodgers, 656 F.3d 1023 (9th Cir. 2011)

The police stopped the defendant’s car because a quick records check did not show that the registration of the vehicle matched the vehicle color. In the car was the defendant and a young girl. The officer suspected that the young girl was a prostitute. He asked both the defendant and the girl questions and his suspicions increased. Ultimately, he decided that the girl lied about her age and he decided to search the car. The Ninth Circuit held that the stop for the vehicle was permissible, as was the prolonged questioning. The search, however, was not lawful. Perhaps there was probable cause to arrest the girl, but there was not probable cause to search the car. There was no basis for believing that there was evidence of a crime in the car.

United States v. Edwards, 632 F.3d 633 (10th Cir. 2001)

The defendant was arrested on the sidewalk near a parking lot. The court concluded that there was probable cause to support the arrest (a belief that the defendant had participated in a bank robbery). The police then searched a rental car, which had been rented by his girlfriend which was in the parking lot. The Tenth Circuit held that the defendant did not have standing to contest the search of the car in general, because he was not on the rental agreement, but he did have standing to challenge the search of the closed suitcases which he owned that were in the trunk of the vehicle. The court also held that the search was not a valid probable cause search of the vehicle, because there was no probable cause to believe that the car contained any evidence. The search was not a valid search incident to arrest, because the defendant was over 100 feet away from the car when he was arrested and he was handcuffed in the back of the patrol car (note, this case was decided pre-Gant). This was not an inventory search, because the police conceded that they were searching for evidence and had not decided to impound the car until the evidence was found.

United States v. Gross, 662 F.3d 393 (6th Cir. 2011)

The police stopped an automobile in which the defendant was a passenger. The stop was found to be improper, because there was no articulable suspicion supporting the stop. During the course of the stop, the police learned that there was an arrest warrant for the defendant. The question in the Sixth Circuit was whether the existence of an arrest warrant and the evidence found during a search incident to the arrest was the fruit of the illegal stop, and did the exclusionary rule bar the introduction of the evidence. The Sixth Circuit held that the exclusionary rule did apply and the evidence would be suppressed. Contrary authority in the Seventh Circuit in United States v. Green, 111 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 1997), was rejected by the Sixth Circuit.
United States v. Davis, 598 F.3d 1259 (11th Cir. 2010)

When the defendant’s car was searched, Gant had not yet been decided, and the search was valid under then-prevailing law in the Circuit (interpreting Belton to authorize a search anytime there was an arrest of the driver). The question in this case, is whether a pre-Gant search is subject to suppression if the case is brought to court post-Gant. In other words, if the search was lawful when it was conducted, but subsequent changes in the law rendered it unlawful, should the exclusionary rule be applied. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that the exclusionary rule does not apply in this situation, relying on Illinois v Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987) and Herring v. United States, 129 S. Ct. 695 (2009). The Supreme Court affirmed. 131 S. Ct. 2419 (2011).

United States v. Pena-Montes, 589 F.3d 1048 (10th Cir. 2009)

The police pulled over the car in which the defendant was a passenger because the officer could not see a license plate on the car. Upon approaching the car, the officer saw a dealer plate displayed in the rear window. The officer thought the car might be stolen, because the driver had no paperwork establishing his ownership, but after calling in the VIN number, the officer found no report that the car was reported stolen. Nevertheless, the officer questioned the defendant – the passenger – and decided that his answers to various questions were suspicious and eventually, he was arrested. The police later determined that he was an illegal alien. The Tenth Circuit held that the continued detention of the occupants of the car was not legal. Once the officer saw the dealer tag, there was no basis for detaining them. The officer’s testimony that dealer tags are limited circumstances in which a driver test-drives a car was legally incorrect. The officer’s mistake of law (as opposed to mistake of fact) could not justify the continued detention of the vehicle’s occupants. The court remanded the case to the lower court to assess the extent to which the exclusionary rule would apply in this case (i.e., excluding evidence of the defendant’s identity and status as an illegal alien).

United States v. Gonzalez, 578 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2009)

The police searched the defendant’s vehicle pursuant to the “search incident to arrest” doctrine after the defendant was handcuffed and removed from the immediate vicinity of the vehicle. At the time the search occurred in this case, the controlling precedent was New York v. Belton which authorized a search in this situation. However, after the search occurred and while the case was pending on appeal, the Supreme Court issued its decision in Arizona v. Gant, which held that the search incident to arrest doctrine did not apply in this situation. The question is whether reliance on prevailing Supreme Court precedent amounts to good faith and therefore obviates the need for the exclusionary rule. The Ninth Circuit held that the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule does not apply in this situation and the evidence was suppressed pursuant to the Gant decision. The “pipeline” rule of retroactivity provides that any change in the law applies to any case then in the pipeline, i.e., still in the process of direct appeal. This case did not survive the decision in Davis v. United States, 131 S. Ct. 2419 (2011).

United States v. Lopez, 567 F.3d 755 (6th Cir. 2009)

The search incident to arrest in this case violated the rule in Arizona v. Gant. (No discussion of a whether a pre-Gant search, which would have been valid under Belton would be upheld on a good faith theory).
United States v. Caseres, 533 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was driving his car and was seen by the police, who thought the car had improper window tinting and that the defendant had not properly signaled a turn. The police followed the defendant, but did not activate their emergency lights. The defendant parked his car and started walking towards his house. The police parked behind the defendant’s car and then walked to catch up with the defendant who was finally approached on the front lawn of a neighbor. The police told the defendant to stop; he fled. After catching him, the police went back to the car and searched it. This was not proper. This was not a proper inventory search or a proper search incident to arrest.

United States v. Grigg, 498 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2007)

The police may not stop a car based on information that the driver has committed a misdemeanor in the past that poses no continuing threat to public safety. While the police may stop a car where the driver is believed to have committed a DUI offense, or a breach of the peace that may be ongoing, in this case, the defendant allegedly committed a “noise violation” in the past. This did not support a vehicle stop.

United States v. Spinner, 475 F.3d 356 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

The police approached the defendant who had parked his car illegally and immediately became suspicious of him, because of his movements inside the car. He stepped out and agreed to be frisked. The police then asked to look in his car, but he denied consent. The police looked in the car, nevertheless, and discovered a gun. The government argued that this “car frisk” was justified under the doctrine of Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983). The D.C. Circuit disagreed, concluding that there was insufficient information to support a “frisk” of the car under the standard of Terry. The defendant was outside his car and had already been frisked himself and therefore no risk was posed to the police that necessitated any further searching of the car.

United States v. Henderson, 463 F.3d 27 (1st Cir. 2006)

In a lengthy opinion carefully reviewing the record of the suppression hearing, the First Circuit held that the trial court erred in making a credibility determination that the officer who made the traffic stop in this case was truthful about the passenger (the defendant) not wearing a seatbelt. Based on the officer’s testimony, which was riddled with inconsistencies and contradictions, the district court should have granted the suppression motion.

United States v. Mosley, 454 F.3d 249 (3rd Cir. 2006)

If the police stop a car without an articulable suspicion, the discovery of contraband in the car must be suppressed, even in a prosecution of a passenger. Though Rakas v. Illinois indicates that the passenger has no expectation of privacy in the car, the passenger’s motion to suppress is predicated on his unlawful detention and the fruit of that unlawful detention, rather than on the expectation of privacy in the automobile. The court’s opinion runs twenty pages and comprehensively reviews the law of “fruit”.

United States v. Washington, 455 F.3d 824 (8th Cir. 2006)
The police pulled the defendant over because his windshield was cracked. A gun was found and the defendant was prosecuted for being a felon in possession of a firearm. Driving with a cracked windshield, however, is not a violation of Nebraska State law. Therefore, the stop of the defendant was unlawful and the discovery of the gun was a fruit of the illegal stop. The government’s argument that the officer acted in good faith was rejected: The mistake of law was not objectively reasonable. The question is not whether the officer subjectively believed that the law was being violated, but whether, from an objective point of view, a belief that the law was being violated was reasonable.

United States v. McDonald, 453 F.3d 958 (7th Cir. 2006)

The police pulled the defendant over for having his turn signal on when he rounded a curve. This was not a valid basis for pulling the car over and any evidence found as a result of that stop should have been suppressed. There is no “mistake of law” defense to an improper stop.

United States v. Cole, 444 F.3d 688 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant stopped at a stop sign just shy of the cross walk, but over the solid white line. He claimed that this did not violate Texas law. The government argued that the traffic stop was valid regardless of the actual Texas law, because the officer, in good faith, thought that the law required the defendant to stop before the solid white line. The Fifth Circuit held that a good faith mistake as to the law was not a cure for an invalid stop.

United States v. Kennedy, 427 F.3d 1136 (8th Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s girlfriend said that the defendant “deals” drugs and “keeps” drugs in his car. This did not establish probable cause that the defendant then had drugs in his car. A search of the car was not permissible under the probable cause prong of the automobile exception.

United States v. Jaquez, 421 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2005)

The police received a report of gun shots at a location and that a red car was involved. Fifteen minutes later, an officer pulled over the defendant who was driving a red car in the general vicinity of the reported gun shots. The Fifth Circuit held that there was insufficient information to support the stop of the defendant’s car and the subsequent consent search was invalid.

The police may search the inside of a car incident to an arrest. The trunk, however, may only be searched if there is probable cause to believe that there is contraband or evidence in the trunk. In this case, the defendant was arrested for driving a car with stolen license plates and without a valid driver’s license. The police claimed that the trunk might contain evidence that the car was stolen, but the court concluded that stolen license plates on the car does not suggest further evidence in the trunk. (Judge [now Chief Justice] Roberts dissented).

United States v. Green, 324 F.3d 375 (5th Cir. 2003)
The police had a warrant for the defendant’s arrest. They followed him home and after he exited his car and was approaching his front door, they approached him and started talking. He then fled. A search of his car was not supported as a search incident to arrest.

The defendant was arrested in his car for speeding and driving with a suspended license. The officer decided not to impound the car and pulled it into a parking lot. He noticed a mobile phone on the floor and opened a console between the bucket seats for the purpose of hiding the phone in there. This amounted to a search and was unlawful.

United States v. Cooper, 133 F.3d 1394 (11th Cir. 1998)

The driver of a rental car has standing to contest a search of the car, even if the car is overdue to the rental company.

United States v. Baker, 221 F.3d 438 (3rd Cir. 2000)

The defendant drove to his parole officer in a borrowed car. The defendant admitted to the officer that he did not have a license. This did not authorize the officer to search the trunk of the car. The search of the trunk was not supported by an articulable suspicion.

United States v. Kimball, 25 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1994)

When a police officer effects a stop of a vehicle, all of the occupants have had their freedom of movement restrained, and thus all of the occupants have been seized. The passengers, as well as the driver, may feel that they are not free to leave once they have been stopped by the police. Therefore, if the stop is illegal, fruits of that stop, including evidence found in the car, must be suppressed in a trial involving the passengers of the car. In this case, the stop was lawful.

United States v. Infante-Ruiz, 13 F.3d 498 (1st Cir. 1994)

The defendant was a passenger in a car which was stopped by local police, who knew that the defendant was wanted in another jurisdiction. In the trunk was the defendant’s briefcase. There was no probable cause to search the briefcase based on these facts alone. There was nothing but “conventional wisdom” supporting the officer’s belief that incriminating evidence would be found in the defendant’s briefcase.

United States v. Miller, 146 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 1998)

The police believed that the defendant was transporting drugs, but had no basis for stopping the vehicle other than the fact that the defendant activated his direction signal, but then entered an intersection and did not make a turn. Flashing a turn signal, but not turning, however, is not a criminal offense under Texas law, so stopping the vehicle was not authorized. The defendant’s subsequent consent to a search of his vehicle was tainted by this unlawful stop and was not valid.

United States v. Adams, 26 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was arrested in the front yard of the house by officers who were prepared to search the house. He was cuffed. Later, the officers searched the defendant’s car when they determined which car was his. This is not a proper Belton search. Clearly, the search was not incident to arrest and the officers did not even know the car belonged to the defendant until after he was arrested and handcuffed.

United States v. Hogan, 25 F.3d 690 (8th Cir. 1994)

The police had probable cause to believe that the defendant had drugs or paraphernalia in his house and would have drugs in a pickup truck when he drove to work. A search warrant for the house and the pickup was obtained. The police set up surveillance at the defendant’s house; when he left in a car, he was stopped and his car was seized. There was no probable cause to believe that there were any drugs in the car, however, and the search warrant only covered the house and the pickup. Also, Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692 (1981), did not support the seizure of the car. There, the Court held that the occupant of a house could be detained during the execution of a search warrant at the house. Here, however, the defendant was nowhere near his home when he was stopped. The seizure of the car in this case was followed by a dog sniff, which was positive, followed by the execution of another search warrant for the car. Because the dog sniff would not have been possible without the unlawful seizure, the search warrant for the car represented the fruit of the poisonous stop. Finally, even though the car was searched pursuant to a warrant, the officers were not acting in good faith when they unlawfully seized the car and submitted it to a dog sniff. The good faith exception, therefore, did not apply.

United States v. Ramos-Osegueda, 120 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 1997)

San Francisco’s inventory policy required officers to identify all visible property in an impounded vehicle. The policy did not authorize the opening of closed containers to inventory the contents of containers. Here, the police searched the pants pockets of a pair of jeans found in the back seat and found heroin. This was not a lawful inventory search because there was no authorization in the city policy to search the pockets of clothes found in an impounded vehicle.
This was also not a valid search incident to arrest, because the search occurred long after the occupants were arrested and were safely in the police station and the car had been towed. A valid search of an automobile incident to arrest must occur roughly contemporaneously with the arrest.

United States v. Parr, 843 F.2d 1228 (9th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was stopped by a police officer who suspected that he was driving with a suspended license. The suspect was placed in the patrol car. Subsequently, the police officer searched the defendant’s car and found various items of contraband. The government contended that this was a lawful arrest and the search of the car was permissible under the search incident to arrest doctrine. The Ninth Circuit disagreed, holding that this was a lawful Terry stop, which does not authorize a search incident to arrest. The search of the automobile was improper and the Motion to Suppress should have been granted.

United States v. Vasey, 834 F.2d 782 (9th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was arrested, handcuffed and placed in a patrol car. Thirty to forty-five minutes later, the officers executed a search on the car contending that it was “incident to the arrest.” The Ninth Circuit holds that the evidence should have been suppressed. The Court initially concluded that it was not an inventory search because the subjective intent of the officers was to conduct a search for evidence rather than to conduct a search to inventory the contents. The Court further concluded that it was an improper search incident to arrest because of the amount of time which had expired between the arrest and the search, the inaccessibility of the car to the defendant at the time of the search, and because the defendant was handcuffed and removed from the car at the time of the search.
United States v. Nielsen, 9 F.3d 1487 (10th Cir. 1993)

When the defendant’s car was pulled over, the officer smelled burnt marijuana. He searched the passenger compartment with the occupant’s consent and found nothing. A search of the trunk was not justified.

United States v. Lugo, 978 F.2d 631 (10th Cir. 1992)

Defendant was arrested for driving with a suspended license. The car was parked in a gas station and the defendant was taken away. The police then inventoried the contents; the officer removed the cover of a speaker in the door panel and located cocaine. This was not a proper search incident to arrest, nor a proper inventory search. It could not be a search incident to arrest, because the defendant had already been taken away in a patrol car. United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1 (1977). This was not a valid inventory search, because searching inside speakers in door panels is not standard police procedure.

United States v. Alexander, 835 F.2d 1406 (11th Cir. 1988)

An automobile search requires both probable cause and exigent circumstances. In most cases, however, the fact that an automobile is mobile is sufficient to satisfy the exigency requirement. Nevertheless, in cases in which an automobile is parked in a parking lot and is inaccessible, exigent circumstances may possibly not be found. In this case, however, because the automobile belonged to someone other than the defendant and keys were available to the defendant’s brother, exigent circumstances were found to exist.

The defendant was arrested several blocks from the location of his parked car. A police officer had previously locked the doors to the defendant’s vehicle prior to pursuing the defendant. The subsequent warrantless search of the vehicle was not justified by any exception to the warrant requirement.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Border Searches)

A search at the border may extend to the interior of a fuel tank. The police may remove, disassemble and re-assemble the gas tank without any specific justification during a border search. There is no need for the searching agents to have any particularized suspicion in order to justify this type of intrusion.

United States v. Vergara, 884 F.3d 1309 (11th Cir. 2018)

The defendant entered the country from a cruise ship and had three cell phones. The customs officer decided to search the phones forensically. The Eleventh Circuit held that probable cause is not required to forensically search a cell phone, even post-Riley at the border. The defendant did not challenge the fact that there was reasonable suspicion to support the search.

United States v. Cotterman, 637 F.3d 1068 (9th Cir. 2011)

The Ninth Circuit holds that a computer that is seized at the border during a routine border search may be transported 170 miles away to a forensic lab for two days for analysis is a proper border search. The court holds, however, that these types of searches will be evaluated on a case-by-case basis and that prolonged seizures may not be appropriate. EN BANC REVIEW GRANTED 3/20/12. The En Banc Court held that this search required a showing of a reasonable suspicion that the computer contained contraband, a showing that the government satisfactorily made in this case, United States v. Cotterman, 709 F.3d 952 (9th Cir. 2013).

United States v. Rangel-Portillo, 586 F.3d 376 (5th Cir. 2009)

There was no basis for the Border Patrol to stop the defendant’s vehicle, even though it occurred not far from the border. The stop was prompted, according the officer, based on the fact that the occupants of the car did not make eye contact with the police, were sitting in the back seat of the car with the windows rolled up, and were sitting “stiffly.” The driver, according to the officer, looked at the officer “too much.” These factors, even considered in sum, did not create an articulable suspicion that there was any offense being committed by the occupants of the vehicle.

United States v. Seljan, 547 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2008)

In this en banc decision, the Ninth Circuit holds that Customs Agents may open Federal Express packages that are destined for overseas and review the contents of written documents. The case contains a detailed discussion of the border search exception.

United States v. Whitted, 541 F.3d 480 (3rd Cir. 2008)

Before agents may search the passenger cabin of a person arriving on a cruise ship from out of the country, the agents must have reasonable suspicion.

United States v. Arnold, 533 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2008)
Reasonable suspicion is not required before customs officials may search a laptop or any other electronic storage device of a person entering the country. Customs officers may direct a person to turn on the computer and may then click on various icons and photos without any basis for doing so, other than the border search exception to the search warrant requirement. There is, of course, the possibility that a search will become so destructive, that additional information will be required before customs officers may undertake such a search.

United States v. Romero-Bustamente, 337 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 2003)

8 U.S.C. § 1357(a)(3) permits Border Patrol Agents to enter any land – but not a dwelling – within twenty-five miles of any external border. In this case, the Ninth Circuit held that the curtilage of a home is included within the exclusion of “dwelling.” Therefore, the Border Patrol may not rely on this statutory authority to make a warrantless entry into the curtilage of a suspect’s property.

United States v. Portillo-Aguirre, 311 F.3d 647 (5th Cir. 2002)

After the Border Patrol Agent completed his work of ascertaining bus passengers’ immigration status, he would routinely ask about drugs. The court held that a Border Patrol Agent is free to engage in questions about drugs, as long as the questions do not extend the time it takes to conduct the legitimate immigration status check. Once the immigration inquiry is finished, however, any further questioning amounts to a detention without articulable suspicion. See also United States v. Dortch, 199 F.3d 193 (5th Cir. 1999). HOWEVER, note that Dortch’s holding has come into question. See United States v. Pack, 622 F.3d 383 (5th Cir. 2010).

United States v. Rodriguez-Rivas, 151 F.3d 377 (5th Cir. 1998)

If a car is traveling more than 50 miles from the border, the court will be more reluctant to apply the more lenient Brignoni-Ponce standard. Here, the defendant’s car was more than 50 miles from the border and there was no basis for stopping the vehicle.

United States v. De La Cruz-Tapia, 162 F.3d 1275 (10th Cir. 1998)

The Border Patrol Agent justified his stop of the defendant’s vehicle based on the type of vehicle; the defendant’s failure to look at the agent when he drove by; his abrupt exit from the interstate; his suspicious behavior at a gas station; and the fact that the vehicle had crossed the border three times in the past three days. Considering each of these factors, the lower court concluded that there was no basis for stopping the defendant. The Tenth Circuit affirmed.

United States v. Moreno-Chaparro, 180 F.3d 629 (5th Cir. 1998)

The Border Patrol Agent did not have reasonable grounds to believe that the defendant had crossed the border. The car in which the defendant was driving was seen 60 miles north of the border and had Texas license plates. The various factors upon which the agent relied in stopping the vehicle (it was registered to a female, but driven by a male; it drove through a checkpoint during shift change; the driver acted suspiciously by not looking at the agent as he passed through the checkpoint) were unremarkable facts that did not support stopping the vehicle.

United States v. Rivas, 157 F.3d 364 (5th Cir. 1998)
When the defendant crossed into the United States in Texas, agents drilled into the frame of his auto-transport truck and discovered cocaine. Under the border-search doctrine, government agents may conduct a “routine search” at the international border or its functional equivalent without probable cause, a warrant, or any suspicion to justify the search. A stop that is not routine requires a reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing. The Fifth Circuit concluded that drilling into the truck was not a routine search. See United States v. Robles, 45 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1995). The court also held that a dog’s “casting” did not create a reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing. A “casting” is not a full alert, but a “sign of interest” on the part of the dog.

United States v. Benevento, 836 F.2d 60 (2d Cir. 1987)

A customs agent searched a defendant’s luggage for currency without reasonable suspicion. This constitutes a violation of the statutory limitation on currency searches at a border. The search was based solely on hearsay statements of airline personnel to the effect that on prior occasions, one of the defendants had checked luggage with the airline and that luggage had been subjected to a currency search. The agent who searched the luggage in this case was not even aware of the results of the previous search. However, the Second Circuit concludes that there is no exclusionary remedy for a violation of the statute. Note, too, that the statutory limitation was later eliminated. 31 U.S.C. §5317.

United States v. Jackson, 825 F.2d 853 (5th Cir. 1987)

In this en banc decision, the Fifth Circuit substantially revises its former position on the legality of permanent vehicle check points near the United States-Mexican border. The Court holds that a check point fourteen miles from the border cannot be deemed the “functional equivalent of the border” for Fourth Amendment purposes. The searching of cars at such a checkpoint is not permitted without a search warrant or probable cause.

Gonzalez-Rivera v. Immigration & Naturalization Service, 22 F.3d 1441 (9th Cir. 1994)

The INS officer stopped the defendant’s vehicle based solely on his Hispanic appearance. This does not amount to a reasonable suspicion justifying an investigative stop. United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975). The fact that the defendant, while driving, did not look at the INS officer was entitled to no weight. Also, the officer’s claim that he could observe, while driving next to the defendant, that the defendant had a dry mouth and was nervous was not believable.

United States v. Venzor-Castillo, 991 F.2d 634 (10th Cir. 1993)

The further away from the border that a stop occurs, the less likely that the border search exception will justify a search of a vehicle, pursuant to 8 U.S.C. §1357(a)(3). Though the vehicle in this case was suspicious, the fact that the stop occurred 235 miles from the border, with several towns in between, diminished the basis for believing that the vehicle had come across an international border with illegal aliens.

United States v. Guillen-Cazares, 989 F.2d 380 (10th Cir. 1993)

The fact that two cars were travelling north on Highway 181, in an apparent effort to circumvent the checkpoint at Truth or Consequences, New Mexico, was not a sufficient basis to stop the vehicle. The fact that the vehicles turned south on I-25 was contrary to what smugglers generally did; the fact that the lead car contained more passengers than the follow-up car was also inconsistent with the smuggler “profile.”
United States v. Miranda-Enriquez, 941 F.2d 1081 (10th Cir. 1991)

The border patrol agent’s basis for stopping the defendant’s car 100 miles from the border did not amount to a reasonable suspicion.

United States v. Monsisvais, 907 F.2d 987 (10th Cir. 1990)

Border patrol agents lacked a reasonable suspicion to justify the stop of a heavily loaded pickup truck bearing a camper shell and out-of-state license plates. The government failed to show that the stretch of highway upon which the pickup truck had been stopped was a frequently used route to by-pass border patrol agents.

United States v. Mayer, 818 F.2d 725 (10th Cir. 1987)

An airplane which was first detected 58 miles north of the United States-Mexican border was not shown to have actually crossed a border at any time and consequently the search of the plane was not justified under the border exception to the Fourth Amendment.

SEARCH AND SEIZURE

( Cell Phones )

Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014)

The Supreme Court decided that a cell phone may not be searched incident to arrest. Neither officer safety, nor the need to preserve evidence justifies the need to dispense with the warrant requirement.

United States v. Vergara, 884 F.3d 1309 (11th Cir. 2018)

The defendant entered the country from a cruise ship and had three cell phones. The customs officer decided to search the phones forensically. The Eleventh Circuit held that probable cause is not required to forensically search a cell phone, even post-Riley at the border. The defendant did not challenge the fact that there was reasonable suspicion to support the search.

United States v. Griffith, 867 F.3d 1265 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

The police had reason to believe that the defendant had participated (perhaps as the getaway driver) in a homicide that occurred a year earlier. The search warrant affidavit reviewed all the facts amounting to probable cause and then sought permission to search the defendant’s current apartment (where he had moved after the homicide and a brief stint in jail). The warrant only sought authority to seize cell phones, because criminals communicate by phone. During the execution of the search warrant, the defendant threw a gun out the window. The D.C. Circuit held that (1) the warrant was deficient, because there was no probable cause that the defendant even had a cell phone or that it had any incriminating information contained in it; (2) there was no probable cause that a phone would be found in the apartment (as opposed to on his person if he were not present at the apartment when the warrant was executed); (3) the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply because the warrant was so lacking in probable cause to search or seize a cell phone; (4) the “abandonment” of the gun was the fruit of the execution of the defective search warrant and therefore the gun that was thrown out of the window was subject to the exclusionary rule.

United States v. Russian, 848 F.3d 1239 (10th Cir. 2017)

The search warrant application in this case requested permission to search two cell phones of the defendant that had already been seized when he was arrested, as well as permission to search his residence. The warrant, however, authorized the police to search the residence and seize cell phones found in the residence, but did not authorize the search of the phones already seized. This warrant did not authorize the search of the phones. The officers acted in good faith, however, so no suppression.

United States v. Lustig, 830 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2016)

The police seized the defendants cell phone from his car when he was arrested. The police did not obtain a search warrant for 16 months. This was an unreasonable delay and the motion to suppress should have been granted.

United States v. Camou, 773 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2014)
The defendant was stopped in his vehicle and charged with smuggling undocumented aliens. He was brought to the police station where he and one of his passengers were questioned. The passenger admitted that they regularly were engaged in smuggling activity. The police seized the defendant’s cell phone and listed it on a property report as seized evidence. Approximately 90 minutes later, the police searched the contents of the phone. The Ninth Circuit held that this was a not proper search incident to arrest search, not a proper exigent circumstances search and not a proper “automobile exception” search. In addition, the court rejected the inevitable discovery doctrine and the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule as reasons not to apply the exclusionary rule.

United States v. Lopez-Cruz, 730 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was asked by a federal agent if he could “search” and “look in” his cell phone. The defendant consented. The phone rang and the agent answered the call. The Ninth Circuit held that answering the call exceeded the scope of consent.

United States v. Wurie, 728 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2013)

The defendant was arrested shortly after making a drug sale. He was brought to the police station and a cell phone was seized from him. The First Circuit held that a search of the cell phone’s data was not justified by the search incident to arrest exception to the warrant requirement. Though United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1971), permits a “full search” of the person when he or she is arrested, this does not extend to cell phones. The court noted that recent decisions in state courts have also limited cell phone searches: State v. Smith, 920 N.E.2d 949 (Ohio 2009); Smallwood v. State, 2013 WL 1830961 (Florida 2013). The court in Wurie, noted that the current capacity of the cell phone allows it to store up to 64 gigabytes of information. And if the officer searching the phone connects to storage in the Cloud, there is unlimited access to personal information. In addition, cell phones can connect to a webcam in a home, thus converting a search of the phone into a search of the privacy of the house. The United States Supreme Court affirmed Wurie in the Riley decision noted above.

United States v. Skinner, 690 F.3d 772 (6th Cir. 2012)

A magistrate issued an order directing the phone company to provide “ping” information to law enforcement. The agents were then able to “ping” the target’s phone and determine his location while he was en route delivering drugs. The Sixth Circuit held that the defendant had no expectation of privacy in the data emanating from his phone that showed its location. The Sixth Circuit distinguished Jones with the observation that the plurality in Jones relied on the trespass that occurred when the GPS device in that case was planted on the defendant’s car. No such intrusion occurred in this case. The court also distinguished Justice Alito’s concurring opinion in Jones (which did not rely on the trespass), because the tracking in this case only lasted three days, which does not reach the threshold for “intensive monitoring” that Justice Alito described as sufficient to invoke the Fourth Amendment.

United States v. Flores-Lopez, 670 F.3d 803 (7th Cir. 2012)

Rejecting limitations placed on cell phone searches that have been advocated by several state appellate courts, the Seventh Circuit held that the police may search a cell phone as part of a search incident to arrest. In this case, the search was limited to determining the cell phone number, though JudgePosner explains that a somewhat more extensive search would also be authorized. The Court did acknowledge, however, that a permissible search is not limitless (comparing the extent to which the police must limit a search to the “minimization” requirement under Title III wiretaps). The Court noted the decisions from several state courts that hold that such searches must be limited in scope due to the amount of personal information that people have on their cell phones.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(COLLECTIVE KNOWLEDGE DOCTRINE)

United States v. Massenburg, 654 F.3d 480 (4th Cir. 2011)

The police had no basis for frisking the defendant and the evidence obtained from the frisk should have been suppressed. The police drove to the scene where there was a reported shooting. Four men were seen a few blocks away. No evidence linked them to the shooting. They were responsive when the police approached them. They answered the officers’ questions and said that they, too, had heard gunshots. When the police asked for consent to frisk them, two consented, but the defendant declined. This did not provide a basis to conduct a non-consensual frisk. The court also rejected the government’s invitation to rely on the “collective knowledge” doctrine based on testimony at the suppression hearing that another officer, who did not actually conduct the frisk, had seen a bulge in the defendant’s pocket. The collective knowledge doctrine essentially provides that when one officer knows sufficient information to justify an arrest of a target, if he requests that another officer make the arrest, the knowledge of the first officer is attributed to the second officer for purposes of determining whether there was probable cause to support the arrest. The Fourth Circuit held that the collective knowledge doctrine did not apply in this case, because the searching officer had no reason to believe that any other officer had sufficient information to support the search.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Community Caretaking Function)

United States v. Cervantes, 703 F.3d 1135 (9th Cir. 2012)

Though this decision focuses more on the issue of the propriety of the impounding and inventoring of a car, the Ninth Circuit holds that a lawful impound must satisfy the requirements of the “community caretaking” doctrine. In this case, the police believed that the defendant was involved in a drug deal, but did not have sufficient information to arrest him. The police followed him until he committed a traffic violation, after which he was stopped and the police believed (incorrectly, as it turns out) that he was driving without a license. The car was pulled over next to the curb and in a residential area. The prosecution offered no evidence that it was necessary to impound the vehicle, or to inventory its contents. The two kilos of cocaine found in the back should have been suppressed.

Ray v. Township of Warren, 626 F.3d 170 (3rd Cir. 2010)

In this civil rights case, the Third Circuit holds that the community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement never authorizes the warrantless entry into a house.

United States v. McGough, 412 F.3d 1232 (11th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was arrested at the door to his house for leaving the child at home unattended. The defendant and the child were placed in the police car and the police then entered the house to get some shoes for the child. While in the house, the police spotted marijuana and a gun. The Eleventh Circuit held that the evidence should have been suppressed. The community caretaking function exception to the search warrant requirement was first articulated in Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433 (1973), a case in which the Court described certain functions of the police that have nothing to do with the detection or investigation of crimes. The Eleventh Circuit held, however, that this case did not present the type of emergency situation that would allow the police to enter a person’s house without consent.

United States v. Erickson, 991 F.2d 529 (9th Cir. 1993)

In Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433 (1973), the Court authorized a warrantless search of a vehicle on the basis that the officers were not attempting to investigate a crime, but were engaged in a community caretaking function, “totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence relating to the violation of a criminal statute.” Here, the police were investigating a possible burglary; once at the house where the burglary allegedly occurred, the police pulled back a black plastic cover over a window and discovered marijuana plants growing in the house. The “community caretaking function” doctrine did not authorize this warrantless search. At a minimum, there must be exigent circumstances to authorize such a search and in this case, the trial court expressly found no exigent circumstances.

United States v. Bute, 43 F.3d 531 (10th Cir. 1994)

The police entered a garage because they were suspicious that it may have been vandalized. The officer discovered a methamphetamine lab. This search was not permissible under the supposed “security check” exception to the search warrant requirement and was also not permissible under the “community caretaking” exception, which is only applicable to automobiles.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Computers)

United States v. Horton, 863 F.3d 1041 (8th Cir. 2017)
The government utilized a Network Investigative Technique (NIT) to obtain information from the defendant’s laptop computer. Even though some of the information obtained was not within the defendant’s legitimate expectation of privacy, the information was contained on his laptop, for which he did have a legitimate expectation of privacy. The agents obtained a search warrant from a Magistrate in another district, who had no authority to issue a search warrant for a computer in another district. Nevertheless, the agents acted in good faith, so the evidence was not suppressed. See also United States v. Henderson, 906 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir. 2018) (same holding).

United States v. Griffith, 867 F.3d 1265 (D.C. Cir. 2017)
The police had reason to believe that the defendant had participated (perhaps as the getaway driver) in a homicide that occurred a year earlier. The search warrant affidavit reviewed all the facts amounting to probable cause and then sought permission to search the defendant’s current apartment (where he had moved after the homicide and a brief stint in jail). The warrant only sought authority to seize cell phones, because criminals communicate by phone. During the execution of the search warrant, the defendant threw a gun out the window. The D.C. Circuit held that (1) the warrant was deficient, because there was no probable cause that the defendant even had a cell phone or that it had any incriminating information contained in it; (2) there was no probable cause that a phone would be found in the apartment (as opposed to on his person if he were not present at the apartment when the warrant was executed); (3) the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply because the warrant was so lacking in probable cause to search or seize a cell phone; (4) the “abandonment” of the gun was the fruit of the execution of the defective search warrant and therefore the gun that was thrown out of the window was subject to the exclusionary rule.

United States v. Edwards, 813 F.3d 953 (10th Cir. 2016)
The search warrant in this child pornography case alleged that the defendant had scores of images of a prepubescent minor posted on a publicly-available site that showed the girl in various suggestive poses. The government conceded that the images were classified as “erotica,” but were not obscene and did not show the girl in sexually explicit poses or positions. Nevertheless, the magistrate issued a search warrant to seize the defendant’s computer. The Tenth Circuit held that the search warrant application did not demonstrate probable cause. But the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule applied.

United States v. Cordero-Rosario, 786 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2015)
The initial search warrant stated that the crime under investigation was “lewd actions” and that “in accordance with the interview of the child, there is currently pornography on the defendant’s computer. There was no information in the search warrant application about what the child said, how the alleged pornography was related to any offense, how the child knew about the presence of pornography on the computer, or why the affiant believed that pornography was evidence of a crime. The evidence should have been suppressed.
United States v. Raymonda, 780 F.3d 105 (2d Cir. 2015)

The government was aware that the defendant had viewed thumbnails of child pornography for a few seconds. This did not provide a probable cause basis to obtain a search warrant to search his computer nine months later. The testimony at the suppression hearing established that the user may have accessed a website without looking at individual images and that the images would have remained in the temporary Internet cache, but been overwritten within a few days or a month. Thus the information that the site was accessed months earlier was stale. Leon applied, however, so the evidence was not subject to the exclusionary rule.

United States v. Ganias, 755 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2014)

With a sufficient probable cause basis, government agents obtained a search warrant to seize defendant’s computers and search for files related to two particular corporate entities. The agents made mirror images of the hard drives of the computers and brought them back to the forensic laboratory. At no time did the agents delete anything from the hard drives that were unrelated to the entities listed in the warrant. Over the next two and one-half years, however, the agents determined that the defendant was engaged in other crimes. Aware that they were not permitted to review files other than those listed in the warrant, the agents obtained a second search warrant to examine other files in the mirrored hard drives. The Second Circuit held that the extended retention of the files violated the Fourth Amendment. While an initial seizure of the entire computer may be permissible in some cases; and the government is permitted to conduct the search of the computer off-site (Rule 41(e)(2)(B)), the retention of the files for 2 ½ years knowing that the files were not covered by the warrant violated the principle that searches must be limited by the “to be seized” clause of the warrant in order to avoid the “general searches” that were condemned by the Framers. Permitting the government to seize everything in a computer and retain everything for years despite the absence of any probable cause or authority in the warrant results in suppressing any evidence discovered in the files (even if later authorized by a subsequent warrant) that were not subject to the initial warrant’s “to be seized” clause. The Second Circuit also held that the fact that these files no longer existed on the defendant’s original computers 2 ½ years later is irrelevant. THE SECOND CIRCUIT EN BANC OVERRIDE THIS DECISION IN MAY 2016, 824 F.3d 199 (2016), holding that the officers relied on the second search warrant in good faith. The court did not expressly decide whether the second warrant was invalid, holding that even if it were, the officers were acting in good faith. The court did, however, address a number of issues – practical and philosophical – involved in computer searches. The majority opinion spans 27 pages and the concurring and dissenting opinions go for another 15 pages.

United States v. Galpin, 720 F.3d 436 (2d Cir. 2013)

The search warrant affidavit provided inadequate probable cause to support the search and seizure of defendant’s computer. The application sought a warrant to look for evidence of the violation of a particular New York statute, “and or federal statutes”. That statute related to the registration of internet service provider and communications accounts (the officer simply cited the wrong code section). The Second Circuit held that this warrant violated the particularity requirement in that it did not properly limit the scope of the search, or, for that matter, the type of evidence that the police were authorized to search for. The Second Circuit emphasized the importance of having proper limits when a computer is the subject of the search. The court also addressed the proper method of “severing” the improper portions of a search warrant from the legitimate clauses. If only limited parts of the warrant are valid (in a warrant that is otherwise sweeping and invalid), suppression of the evidence is appropriate. However, where isolated portions are invalid, the court may uphold the search that is authorized by the legitimate portions of the warrant.

United States v. Sedaghaty, 728 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 2013)

The search warrant authorized the seizure and searching of the defendant’s computer for tax violations. The agents were aware that the tax violations related to the defendant’s terrorist-financing efforts. Nevertheless, the search warrant only authorized the seizure of financial documents and tax-related information. Once the agents seized the computers, they searched for any terrorism-related information, including the search history for terrorist sites. The fact that the search warrant incorporated the affidavit did not change the “To Be Seized” clause of the search warrant. While an affidavit can be used to cure a search warrant that appears to be overbroad, in this case, the warrant was quite precise and the government sought to use the affidavit to broaden the scope of the seizure. The overbroad seizure in this case required that evidence be suppressed that was obtained in violation of the limitations imposed by the warrant.

United States v. Needham, 718 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 2013)

Though the suppression of evidence was not required, because of the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule, the Ninth Circuit holds that evidence that the defendant has engaged in acts of child molestation does not suffice to establish probable cause to issue a search warrant to seize the defendant’s computers to search for evidence of child molestation. The officer’s expression of his opinion that “individuals who have sexual interest in children often possess child pornography” does not amount to probable cause.

In this district court opinion, the judge held that the government waited too long (15 months) to conduct a review of seized and retained electronic evidence in order to determine whether any of the evidence fell outside the scope of the warrant. As a result of this delay all evidence would be suppressed. The fact that the defendant was allowed to get the original computer back (the government had a mirror image) is not determinative, because it is the government’s continued invasion of privacy, not the defendant’s loss of the computer, that is the fourth amendment concern. “The parties have not provided the Court with any authority, nor has the Court found any, indicating that the government may seize and image electronic data and then retain that data with no plans whatsoever to begin review of that data to determine whether any irrelevant, personal information was improperly seized. The government's blatant disregard for its responsibility in this case is unacceptable and unreasonable.”

United States v. Flores-Lopez, 670 F.3d 803 (7th Cir. 2012)

Rejecting limitations placed on cell phone searches that have been advocated by several state appellate courts, the Seventh Circuit held that the police may search a cell phone as part of a search incident to arrest. In this case, the search was limited to determining the cell phone number, though Judge Posner explains that a somewhat more extensive search would also be authorized. The Court did acknowledge, however, that a permissible search is not limitless (comparing the extent to which the police must limit a search to the “minimization” requirement under Title III wiretaps). The Court noted the decisions from several state courts that hold that such searches must be limited in scope due to the amount of personal information that people have on their cell phones.

United States v. Richards, 659 F.3d 527 (6th Cir. 2011)

Judge Moore issued a concurring opinion in this case that explores the complexity of searches of servers that may be shared by more than one user. The search warrant in this case authorized the search of the server, but nobody realized at the time that the server was used by different users. Even Judge Moore recognized that in this situation, the Leon good faith exception applied.

Chism v. Washington, 661 F.3d 380 (9th Cir. 2011)

The plaintiff’s credit card was used to pay the “hosting fee” for a website the contained child pornography. This information, alone, was not sufficient to support the issuance of a search warrant. This was a civil rights case in which the plaintiffs sued the police for the illegal search.

United States v. Krupa, 658 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2011)

Though the majority opinion held that the search warrant in this case was sufficient to support the search of the defendant’s computers for child pornography (based on evidence that the defendant had possession of several computers and one image of a child who was nude was found on one of the computers), a lengthy dissent by Judge Berzon thoroughly reviews the law on this topic and concludes that probable cause did not exist.

United State v. Doyle, 650 F.3d 460 (4th Cir. 2011)

The search warrant in this case failed to allege that pictures possessed by the resident of a house were pornographic and failed to allege when – or where – the pictures were possessed. This warrant lacked probable cause and did not even survive a good faith Leon review. The probable cause basis of the warrant provided the following: “Three minor children have come forward and stated that [Doyle] has sexually assaulted them at the Doyle residence. One victims [sic] disclosed to an Uncle that Doyle had shown the victim pictures of nude children.” This description failed to state that the “nude pictures” were pornographic (i.e., lewd depictions) and because there was no statement of when these events occurred, the information was stale (the court noted that the notion of staleness when it comes to computer evidence is rarely a basis to deny a search warrant, but in this case, there was no indication of when the pictures existed). In addition, the statement does not indicate where the pictures were shown to the child, so there was scant basis for believing that the evidence sought by the search warrant would be located at the residence, though the appellate court did not base its ultimate conclusion on this flaw in the warrant. With regard to the absence of probable cause, the court also noted that evidence of child molestation does not automatically authorize the search for child pornography.

Virgin Islands v. John, 654 F.3d 412 (3rd Cir. 2011)
The defendant was known to have committed child molestation. There was no information to support the claim that there would be child pornography on the defendant’s computer. Issuing a search warrant for the defendant’s computer was not proper and the exclusionary rule applied. The affiant did not allege in the affidavit that there was a known correlation between child molesters and child pornography collectors. The failure to set forth this critical fact in the affidavit rendered the affidavit so lacking in probable cause that no reasonable officer could have relied on the warrant. The court explained that a magistrate may not infer a correlation between child abuse and the presence of evidence on a computer. That is a fact that must be averred in the affidavit. And when it is omitted, the court may not invoke the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule and assume that the officer was aware of this “fact.”

United States v. D’Andrea, 648 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2011)

If the defendant’s computer was “hacked,” this does not qualify as a prior “private search” that deprives the defendant of a reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of the computer. In this case, a tipster called law enforcement officers to inform them that a person had uploaded child pornography to a cell phone. It was not clear how the tipster was able to view the images, however. Though the defendant had apparently uploaded the images and had attempted to share the images with her “partner,” she had inadvertently sent the images to the tipster. The tipster somehow got a hold of the password that enabled her to view the images. The defendant and her partner, however, did not knowingly share the password with the tipster. The agents then investigated by accessing the cell phone website and also viewed the images. The First Circuit remanded the case to the trial court to determine how the tipster initially viewed the images. If the defendant did not “share” the information with the tipster, or “assume the risk” that the tipster would share the information that the defendant shared with her, this did not qualify as a private search that would authorize a subsequent law enforcement search under Jacobsen.

United States v. Cotterman, 637 F.3d 1068 (9th Cir. 2011)

The Ninth Circuit holds that a computer that is seized at the border during a routine border search may be transported 170 miles away to a forensic lab for two days for analysis is a proper border search. The court holds, however, that these types of searches will be evaluated on a case-by-case basis and that prolonged seizures may not be appropriate. The En Banc Court held that this search required a showing of a reasonable suspicion that the computer contained contraband, a showing that the government satisfactorily made in this case, United States v. Cotterman, 709 F.3d 952 (9th Cir. 2013).

United States v. Stabile, 633 F.3d 219 (3rd Cir. 2011)

Rejecting the analysis advocated by Judge Kozinski in Comprehensive Drug Testing, the Third Circuit holds that traditional “plain view” rules permit government agents to search a computer while lawfully executing a search warrant. In this financial crimes investigation, the police uncovered child pornography videos on the defendant’s computer. This case also contains a thorough discussion of various other computer search issues, including consent to search another person’s computer and the length of time that the computer can be kept by forensic law enforcement. enforcement agents before conducting the search when the computer is seized pursuant to consent versus when it is seized pursuant to probable cause.

United States v. Warshak, 631 F.3d 266 (6th Cir. 2010)

The Sixth Circuit concludes that the government is required to obtain a search warrant before it may obtain stored emails from a service provider’s computer. The Court also held that to the extent that the Stored Communications Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2703(a) allows the government to obtain such information with only a subpoena, it violates the Fourth Amendment. The court held that a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy in emails that are stored with, or sent or received through, a commercial Internal Service Provider. “The government may not compel a commercial ISP to turn over the contents of a subscriber’s emails without first obtaining a warrant based on probable cause.”

United States v. Comprehensive Drug Testing, Inc., 579 F.3d 989 (9th Cir. 2009), amended on September 13, 2010, 621 F.3d 1162 (en banc)

In this en banc decision, the Ninth Circuit set originally set forth specific rules that govern the search of a computer where a warrant specifically authorizes the search of the computer for certain documents. In the amended opinion issued in September, 2010, however, Judge Kozinski’s opinion was relegated to a concurring opinion. In this case, the warrant authorized the search of the computer to obtain certain patient records. The law enforcement agents, however, searched the entire computer records, claiming that they could not ensure that the target records were not located in other patients’ files. Thus, various non-target records were viewed and then seized under the plain view doctrine. The Ninth Circuit held that this type of search beyond the scope of the warrant is unlawful. Among other rules, Judge Kozinski’s concurring opinion stated that Magistrates should avoid allowing the government to rely on the plain view doctrine; segregation of records should be handled by a neutral third party; the search protocol should explain the steps that will be taken to avoid reviewing the contents of the computer that are not spelled out in the warrant. Two Circuits have rejected the Ninth Circuit’s decision to limit the plain view doctrine in computer search cases: United States v. Mann, 592 F.3d 779 (7th Cir. 2010), and United States v. Williams, 592 F.3d 511 (4th Cir. 2010).

United States v. Mutschelknaus, 592 F.3d 826 (8th Cir. 2010)

The search warrant in this case authorized the police to search the defendant’s home within ten days, and to search any computer seized from the home within 60 days. This was a permissible application of Rule 41 and it was a reasonable component of the search warrant authorization.

United States v. Frechette, 583 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 2009)

In this child pornography case, the government succeeded in persuading the Sixth Circuit that there was sufficient probable cause to search the defendant’s house and seize his computers. Well worth reading, however, is Judge Moore’s spirited dissent in which she decries the “radical view of probable cause” expressed in the majority opinion. She concludes her dissent with the following: “I cannot think of any other circumstance where we have endorsed an invasion of a person’s privacy with so few facts from which to draw an inference that the intrusion would likely uncover evidence of a crime . . . As reprehensible as our society finds those who peddle, purchase, and view child pornography, we, as judges, must not let our personal feelings of scorn and disgust overwhelm our duty to ensure the protection of individual constitutional rights.  . . . There is no such thing as a fair weather Constitution – one which offers the harbor of its protections against unreasonable search and seizure only in palatable contexts and only to worthy defendants.”

United States v. Payton, 573 F.3d 859 (9th Cir. 2009)

The police had a warrant that authorized the seizure of documents and records in connection with a drug investigation. The Ninth Circuit held that this did not justify searching a computer that was found in the location that was searched.

United States v. Otero, 563 F.3d 1127 (10th Cir. 2009)

The search warrant in this case authorized the seizure of all of the defendant’s computers, hard drives, disks, and virtually any other electronic media. The Tenth Circuit held that the warrant failed the particularity requirement. A valid warrant must limit what can be searched for in a computer to evidence of violations of specific laws, or for specific evidence. The evidence would not be suppressed, however, as the government satisfied the Leon good faith standard.

United States v. Mitchell, 565 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 2009)

If the police seize an item such as a computer from a house, based on probable cause (without consent to search it and without a search warrant authorizing the search or seizure), they must seek a warrant promptly. In this case, the police went to the defendant’s house and asked if he had any child pornography on his computer. He initially responded, “yes, probably.” He did not give the officers consent to seize the computer. Nevertheless, based on probable cause the officer seized the hard drive. He kept the hard drive in his office for several weeks (during which time he was on training and was otherwise occupied). Thereafter, twenty-one days after the computer was seized, he obtained a search warrant. The Eleventh Circuit held that this delay was impermissible and suppressed the evidence obtained from the computer. The court noted that personal computers contain a substantial amount of private information and depriving the defendant of the computer that length of time without a warrant violated his Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Among other arguments rejected by the Eleventh Circuit, the notion that the search would have taken more than three weeks even if the warrant had been obtained on the day of the seizure, did not support the delay. The court observed that a hard drive of a personal computer is the “digital equivalent of its owner’s home, capable of holding a universe of private information.” For that reason, a three-week delay in starting the search process was not reasonable.

United States v. Falso, 544 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2008)

The FBI determined that the defendant had a prior conviction from eighteen years ago for misdemeanor child sex abuse and may have accessed a child pornography web site. On the basis of this information, the agent obtained a search warrant to search the defendant’s computer for child pornography. The Second Circuit held that this information was not sufficient to authorize a search warrant. However, the court concluded that the evidence was would not be suppressed in light of the officer’s good faith in executing a warrant signed by the judge.
United States v. Hodson, 543 F.3d 286 (6th Cir. 2008)

The fact that the defendant was indisputably a child molester did not provide probable cause to believe that there was child pornography on his computer. The officer, moreover, could not have executed the warrant in good faith, because the application contained virtually no information that would have supported the search for pornography.

United States v. Arnold, 533 F.3d 1003 (9th Cir. 2008)

Reasonable suspicion is not required before customs officials may search a laptop or any other electronic storage device of a person entering the country. Customs officers may direct a person to turn on the computer and may then click on various icons and photos without any basis for doing so, other than the border search exception to the search warrant requirement. There is, of course, the possibility that a search will become so destructive, that additional information will be required before customs officers may undertake such a search.

United States v. Forrester, 512 F.3d 500 (9th Cir. 2008)

The police employed a device that enabled them to record the “to and from” location of every email that the defendant sent and received and also recorded the IP address of every website visited by the defendant’s computer and the amount of data sent and received from that computer. The Ninth Circuit held that this was not a “search” that required a warrant, analogizing this investigative technique to a pen register, which is not a search. Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979). The court noted, however, that if the police actually record the URL of the search (the actual content of a website that was visited), this might constitute a search. Thus, as the court noted, discovering that the suspect visited The New York Times, does not amount to a search. Discovering that that the suspect read a particular article while at that site might constitute a search. Id. at 1049, n. 6.

Warshak v. United States, 490 F.3d 455 (6th Cir. 2007)

A comprehensive guide to the Stored Communications Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2701, et seq. RE-HEARING EN BANC GRANTED, 10/9/07. The en banc court vacated the district court’s decision on standing grounds. 532 F.3d 521 (6th Cir. 2008). The “guide” provided by the panel opinion, however, is still useful in understanding the structure of the statute. Subsequent decision was issued in December, 2010: see above.

United States v. Heckenkamp, 482 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant had an expectation of privacy in his personal computer, even after he connected it to the University network, because there was no announced monitoring policy on the network, the defendant’s expectation of privacy was objectively reasonable.

United States v. Buckner, 473 F.3d 551 (4th Cir. 2007)

The police went to the defendant’s house and secured his wife’s consent to “mirror image” the computer that was seen on the table in the living room. The wife said that she used the computer occasionally to play solitaire. The agents then used forensic tools to examine the contents of the computer and determined that the defendant had used the computer to engage in various fraudulent acts. The Fourth Circuit held that the consent of the wife was not valid to enable the police to view the password-protected files on the computer, see Trulock v. Freeh, 275
F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001), but that she had apparent authority to grant consent. Thus, the evidence would not be suppressed.

United States v. Adjani, 452 F.3d 1140 (9th Cir. 2006)

The court upholds the seizure and subsequent search of a computer that was owned by a person who was present at the defendant’s house, but who was not the target of the search warrant. The court holds that the computer was at the target location and the seizure of that computer was not unauthorized by the search warrant. The owner was identified in the search warrant application as a person who associated with the target.

United States v. Coreas, 419 F.3d 151 (2d Cir. 2005)

The Second Circuit reviews a “Candyman” search that involved searches of dozens of individuals around the country based on their “membership” in an Internet group that purportedly advertised the availability of child pornography. The FBI search warrant affidavit contained numerous erroneous statements about the method by which subscribers became members and whether they automatically received illicit images. The panel indicated that it would have reversed the trial court’s denial of the Motion to Suppress, but for a prior decision of another panel that found no Franks violation (or sufficient residual information to support probable cause) and that the prior decision was binding on this panel. The other “Candyman” decisions in which a Franks violation was found to taint the warrant, include United States v. Strauser, 247 F.Supp.2d 1135 (E.D. Mo. 2003); United States v. Perez, 247 F.Supp.2d 459 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); United States v. Kunen, 323 F.Supp.2d 390 (E.D.N.Y. 2004). See also United States v. Bailey, 272 F.Supp.2d 822 (D.Neb. 2003); United States v. Martin, 426 F.3d 68 (2d Cir. 2005).

United States v. Carey, 172 F.3d 1268 (10th Cir. 1999)

If a search warrant authorizes the search of a computer for drug sales, the police may not search through the hard drive for evidence of child pornography.

United States v. Gourde, 382 F.3d 1003 (9th Cir. 2004) – REVERSED BY EN BANC COURT IN MARCH, 2006. INCLUDED HERE JUST FOR PURPOSE OF ANALYSIS THAT MAY BE APPROPRIATE IN ANOTHER CASE.

The FBI learned about a website that permitted members to download child pornography. Defendant Gourde was determined to have been a member of the web site for two months. The FBI obtained a search warrant, claiming that any member would have had access to the child pornography. The affiant offered various expert opinions about the M.O. for child pornographers on the internet. The Ninth Circuit held that there was no probable cause to search the defendant’s house and seize his computers based on this information. Moreover, Leon did not apply, because no officer could have relied in good faith on this warrant. There was no information that Gourde had actually downloaded any files from the website, though the FBI acknowledged that it had the capability of determining whether he did prior to the time the search was executed. See also United States v. Weber, 923 F.2d 1338 (9th Cir. 1990). NOTE: REVERSED BY EN BANC NINTH CIRCUIT DECISION (3/9/06) – 440 F.3d 1065 (9th Cir. 2006) (en banc).
United States v. Zimmerman, 277 F.3d 426 (3rd Cir. 2002)

The police obtained a search warrant to search the defendant’s home to look for child and adult pornography. There was no information in the warrant application that indicated that any pornography would be found in his home, though there was information that one clip of adult pornography was seen in the home months earlier by one (or perhaps more than one) high school student. That information, however, was stale. The police relied for the most part on evidence that the defendant was believed to have molested numerous high school students (he was a high school teacher). The police also offered expert opinion in the warrant application that child molesters often keep child pornography in their houses. The Third Circuit held that the warrant was lacking in probable cause and, in fact, could not even have been executed in good faith, given the absence of any evidence that pornography was then located in the house. The use of a seven page, single spaced, affidavit which never even mentioned child pornography could not reasonably have been relied upon to obtain a search warrant. Addressing the boilerplate “expert” opinion, the court wrote, “Rambling boilerplate recitations designed to meet all law enforcement needs do not produce probable cause . . . Experience and expertise, without more, is insufficient to establish probable cause.”

United States v. Runyan, 275 F.3d 449 (5th Cir. 2001)

The defendant’s estranged wife went to the defendant’s house to locate some of her personal items. While there, she found disks that contained pornography, as well as pornographic pictures and a vibrator. The wife took the computer and various disks and gave them to the police. The police then reviewed the disks in great detail. The Tenth Circuit analyzed the Supreme Court decisions in Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649 (1980) and United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109 (1984) and concluded that the appropriate inquiry is whether the government learned something from the police search that it could not have learned from the private searcher’s testimony. Courts have distinguished cases in which the police examine containers (or the contents of containers) that the private searcher never examined and cases in which the police examine the evidence in greater detail or with greater thoroughness than the previous examination by the private party. Here, the Fifth Circuit holds (1) the police may not examine a closed container that was not opened by the private searchers unless the police are already substantially certain of what is inside that container based on the statements of the private searchers, their replication of the private search, and their expertise. Examining all of the contents of the disks and zip disks in this case amounted to an unlawful search, because the private searchers did not know the contents of those disks. (2) the police may search a container – even more thoroughly than a private searcher previously did – assuming the private searcher previously opened and examined the contents of the container. Compare United States v. Rouse, 148 F.3d 1040 (8th Cir. 1998) (holding that police violated fourth amendment when they discovered more items in traveler’s bag than previously seen by airline employee who initially opened the bag). The court finally remanded the case to the district court to make findings relevant to the government’s claim that the evidence should have been admitted under the independent source / inevitable discovery doctrine. See also United States v. Crist, 627 F.Supp.2d 575 (M.D. Pa. 2008) (prior examination of computer by person who took possession of defendant’s computer did not authorize police to utilize forensic tools to conduct more thorough search of same computer).
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Consent – Generally)

Police officers boarded an outgoing bus before departure and asked the passengers for consent to search their luggage. The officer did not inform the passengers that they could decline to give consent. The defendants consented to a search of their luggage and persons. The Eleventh Circuit had held that the consents were not voluntary because of the coercive nature of the interdiction activity, as well as the officers’ failure to advise the passengers that they could refuse to consent to a search. The Supreme Court reversed. According to Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991), every encounter between the police and a defendant on a bus is not necessarily a “seizure.” In this case, the Court held that the failure to advise the passengers of their right to refuse consent did not taint consent that was otherwise voluntarily given.

Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996)

If a lawful traffic stop has been made and the basis for the traffic stop has been accomplished, the police may then request consent to search the vehicle without announcing to the driver that he is free to leave.

Police may board a bus and ask passengers consent to search their carry-on luggage. The fact that the encounter occurs on a bus does not necessarily mean that the passengers are in any way restrained, or unable to say, “No.” In this case, the officers specifically advised the passengers that they were free to reject the request. In short, the encounter did not amount to a “seizure” and the ensuing consent was therefore valid.

If a person consents to a search of his automobile, an officer may search all closed containers found within the automobile. The officer is not required to make a second request before opening a closed container.

United States v. Escamilla, --- F.3d ---, 16-40333 (5th Cir. 2017)

The defendant consented to a search of his cell phone when he was initially arrested. The phone was returned to him and he was then arrested. After he was arrested and his cell phone was seized and he was placed in jail, the police searched the phone again. The Fifth Circuit held that the initial consent did not carry over to the second search.

United States v. Spivey, 861 F.3d 1207 (11th Cir. 2017)

The Eleventh Circuit holds that consent obtained through deception is valid consent in this case. The officers came to the defendants’ house, claiming to be investigating a burglary at the house, when, in fact, they were investigating the defendants for credit card fraud. The defendants allowed the police into the house. The Eleventh Circuit holds that in this situation, the voluntary consent to allow the police into the house, who were misrepresenting their motive for wanting to come into the house, did not vitiated the consent. A spirited dissent by Judge Martin challenged whether consent that is acquired through deception qualifies a “voluntary” consent to waive one’s Fourth Amendment rights.

During the course of a search that occurred with the defendant’s consent, the agents began the process of taking various computers from the defendant’s room. The defendant then revoked his consent. The appellate court held that the revocation of consent required that the agents leave the computers in the room. Because the agents had not yet seized the computers, the defendant had the right and power to revoke his consent.

United States v. Rahman, 805 F.3d 822 (7th Cir. 2015)

A restaurant owner has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the business area of the restaurant and has standing to contest a warrantless search of the area. In this case, the defendant, the owner of a restaurant that burned down, consented to a search of the basement of the building “for the cause and origin” of the fire that consumed the restaurant and apartments above the restaurant. At the time the search was conducted, however, the investigators already knew that the fire’s origin was upstairs, thus the “cause and origin” was not the object of the search in the basement. Cause and origin refers to the location and the “spark” for the fire, not a search for a motive, or a likely perpetrator. In this case, the investigators were looking for circumstantial evidence of the defendant’s guilt, such as records, business receipts and a laptop. This search exceeded the scope of the consent that the defendant provided and the evidence should have been suppressed.

United States v. Cordero-Rosario, 786 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2015)

The initial search warrant stated that the crime under investigation was “lewd actions” and that “in accordance with the interview of the child, there is currently pornography on the defendant’s computer. There was no information in the search warrant application about what the child said, how the alleged pornography was related to any offense, how the child knew about the presence of pornography on the computer, or why the affiant believed that pornography was evidence of a crime. The evidence should have been suppressed, because even the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply to this warrant. Based on the discovery of child pornography during the search of the computer, the police went back to the apartment and secured the wife’s consent to search additional computers. The First Circuit held that this was arguably the fruit of the poisonous tree (exploiting the first illegal search), but further fact-finding was necessary to develop the record relating to the subsequent consent searches.

United States v. Robertson, 736 F.3d 677 (4th Cir. 2013)

An officer asked the defendant for permission to search his person. The defendant begrudgingly submitted to what the Fourth Circuit concluded was a “command.” The Fourth Circuit held that this did not qualify as consent and the evidence should have been suppressed.

United States v. Lopez-Cruz, 730 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was asked by a federal agent if he could “search” and “look in” his cell phone. The defendant consented. The phone rang and the agent answered the call. The Ninth Circuit held that answering the call exceeded the scope of consent.
United States v. Vazquez, 724 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2013)

The police told the defendant that with or without her consent, the police were going to search her house. They claimed to have the authority based on the fact that her boyfriend (who the police erroneously believed lived in the house, too) was on parole and subject to a warrantless search. She consented. This was not valid consent, because it amounted to nothing more than acquiescence to a show of authority (the police did not, in fact, have the authority to conduct a warrantless search), rather than free and voluntary consent. The court noted that the officers’ subjective good faith that they had the authority to conduct a warrantless search did not exempt this case from the application of the exclusionary rule. Their good faith was not, according to the First Circuit, reasonable.

United States v. Cotton, 722 F.3d 271 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant, when stopped in his car, was asked by the officer if he could search the car. The defendant clearly limited his consent to searching the luggage in the car. The officer pried back the door panel and discovered drugs. This was an unlawful search. The government argued that the police had probable cause to pry open the panel once the officer saw loose screws. However, the discovery of the loose screws did not occur during a lawful consensual examination of the luggage.

United States v. Shaw, 707 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2013)

Officers had an arrest warrant for the occupant of 3171 Hendricks Street. Two houses on the block, however, were identified as 3170 Hendricks Street. The officers knocked on one of the doors and eventually, the occupant allowed the officers in. The officers falsely stated that they had an arrest warrant for an occupant of that house. The officers then searched the house and found cocaine. The consent, which was based in part on the false representation that the officers had a warrant for the occupant of that house, was not consent that authorized the police to search the house. See Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543 (1968).

O’Neill v. Louisville-Jefferson County Metro Govt, --- F.3d --- (6th Cir. 11/8/11)

The “consent-once-removed” doctrine provides that if a suspect consents to the entry of an undercover agent into his house, this consent also allows the police to enter, while the undercover agent is still in the house, in order to make an arrest. However, once the undercover agent leaves, the consent-once-removed doctrine no longer applies and officers may not then enter the house. That is what occurred in this civil rights case.

United States v. Harrison, 639 F.3d 1273 (10th Cir. 2011)

The police went to the defendant’s house and explained that they were worried about a bomb being in the house (based on a tip) and the safety of the community. Eventually, the defendant consented to a search of his house. In fact, there was no tip that the defendant’s safety was in jeopardy – rather, there was tip that the defendant was a drug dealer and had firearms. The consent was tainted by this deception and trickery.

United States v. Swanson, 635 F.3d 995 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was arrested on a warrant charging him with possession of a weapon in violation of state law. The judge who issued the warrant wrote on the warrant that there would be no bond, unless the defendant turned in his gun. When he was arrested, the defendant was told about the bond condition by the arresting officer before he was Mirandized. This statement by the police amounted to interrogation. The defendant responded by telling the police where his guns were in the house. The statement should have been suppressed. Later the defendant was taken to the police station where he received Miranda warnings and he gave a statement. This latter statement was inadmissible pursuant to Seibert. The court also held that the defendant’s supposed consent to search his vehicle to find an additional shotgun was involuntary, because the officers serving the arrest warrant stated that he was “ordered” to turn over all guns, thus implying that he had no choice in the matter.

United States v. McMullin, 576 F.3d 810 (8th Cir. 2009)

The police had consent to enter the defendant’s house. The police entered, then went out the back door and arrested the fugitive they were seeking and also the defendant who had followed the police out. Thereafter, without securing consent again, the police re-entered the house. The Eighth Circuit held that the initial consent did not cover the re-entry and the evidence gathered during the second entry was suppressed.

United States v. Neely, 564 F.3d 346 (4th Cir. 2009)

After the police completed a traffic stop of the defendant, the officer asked if he could “check” the defendant’s trunk. The defendant tried to open the trunk from in the car, but had trouble finding the switch. He was ordered out of the car and frisked and the officer then searched the inside of the car and found a weapon. This search exceeded the scope of the consent that was given and the evidence should have been suppressed.

United States v. Zavala, 541 F.3d 562 (5th Cir. 2008)

The police may not flip open and examine a motorist’s cell phone during a Terry stop. A
Terry stop permits a brief frisk to ensure officer safety and not an investigation into the contents of a cell phone, including looking for the subscriber number. The government also argued that the search of the cell phone was permissible as a consent search. After removing the defendant’s cell phone from his pocket and putting it on the roof of the car, the agents asked the defendant for consent to search the car. The defendant gave consent. The Fifth Circuit held that this did not give the agents authority to search the cell phone.

United States v. Hardin, 539 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2008)

The police wanted to determine if a suspect was located in a particular apartment. They asked a maintenance man to go to the apartment and inform the occupants that he needed to enter to fix a plumbing problem. He did not obtain the occupants’ consent – he simply entered. He then left and told the police that the suspect was there. The Sixth Circuit held that this was not valid consent. First, there was, as a matter of fact, no consent given. Second, the use of a ruse, such as this, is not appropriate, because there was no need to use a ruse to avoid violence or danger. This is not a case in which the police already had probable cause to enter the house and used the ruse for safety purposes. Moreover, the apartment manager was acting as an agent of the police, so it triggered the exclusionary rule.

United States v. Hicks, 539 F.3d 566 (7th Cir. 2008)
The police may not make baseless threats that they will get a search warrant if the occupant of a house does not consent to a search. If, in fact, there is no probable cause to get a warrant (or, more specifically, if the police do not reasonably believe that there is probable cause), this type of threat may vitiate any consent that is obtained in response. A remand to further develop the facts on this point was necessary.

United States v. Castellanos, 518 F.3d 965 (8th Cir. 2008)

The defendant, who was clearly highly intoxicated, arguably permitted the police to enter his residence and sit in the living room. This consent, however, did not authorize the police to then search the entire house, including the defendant’s bedroom.

United States v. Holmes, 505 F.3d 1288 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

The defendant was seen in an alley by the police at 3:40 in the morning and when the officers approached him, he fled, scaling several fences in the process. The officers followed him and when they caught him, he was frisked and a set of car keys were discovered and taken from him. The officers then used the car keys’ remote door opener to find the car. The defendant then gave consent to search the car and a gun was found in the car. The D.C. Circuit held that taking the keys from the defendant after the frisk violated his Fourth Amendment rights. There was no probable cause to seize the keys and the fruit of that unlawful seizure was the discovery, and ultimately the search, of the vehicle in which the gun was found. The government’s argument that the taint of the illegal seizure was purged by the subsequent consent to search was rejected. The attenuation doctrine did not save the search in this case.

United States v. Buckner, 473 F.3d 551 (4th Cir. 2007)

The police went to the defendant’s house and secured his wife’s consent to “mirror image” the computer that was seen on the table in the living room. The wife said that she used the computer occasionally to play solitaire. The agents then used forensic tools to examine the contents of the computer and determined that the defendant had used the computer to engage in various fraudulent acts. The Fourth Circuit held that the consent of the wife was not valid to enable the police to view the password-protected files on the computer, see Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001), but that she had apparent authority to grant consent. Thus, the evidence would not be suppressed.

United States v. Lakoskey, 462 F.3d 965 (8th Cir. 2006)

The postal employee brought police officers with him to deliver a package because of his suspicion that the recipient was involved in drug dealing. The package was handed to the defendant at the door. An officer then asked for consent to look in the package, which the defendant adamantly refused. The defendant slammed the security door shut, but the officer continued to ask him to open the package in front of him. The defendant walked away from the door toward the kitchen and the officer came in and followed the defendant. This did not amount to consent and the search was illegal, as were all fruits derived from the search.

United States v. Buckingham, 433 F.3d 508 (6th Cir. 2006)
The trial court did not adequately resolve the factual question whether the defendant withdrew his consent to search his car. A defendant has the right to withdraw consent, even after initially giving voluntary consent.

United States v. Gandia, 424 F.3d 255 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant consented to the police entering his kitchen to interview him. Prior to commencing the interview, the police conducted a security sweep of the house. This was improper. The consent did not authorize the police to enter other rooms of the house. A security sweep is not permissible on the basis of a limited consent search.

United States v. Sanders, 424 F.3d 768 (8th Cir. 2005)

The defendant consented to the police entering his hotel room. However, when the officers started to frisk him, he resisted, clearly signaling his lack of consent to being personally searched. He was then handcuffed and drugs were found in his pocket. Because he withdrew his consent, the frisk was unlawful.

United States v. Escobar, 389 F.3d 781 (8th Cir. 2004)

The police were suspicious of the defendants' bags that were in the baggage compartment of a bus. The bags were removed from the compartment and brought to a room where the defendants were being questioned. The officers told the defendants that a drug dog had alerted to the bags and that there was probable cause to search them (there had been no drug dog and there was not probable cause). The defendants then consented to a search. This was not a valid consent search. The environment was overly coercive and the misrepresentation that there was already probable cause to search tainted the voluntariness of the consent.

United States v. Cellitti, 387 F.3d 618 (7th Cir. 2004)

The police entered a house in which the defendant and his girlfriend lived based on exigent circumstances. Once inside, the police were given consent by the girlfriend to look for a gun. While looking for the gun, the police found a set of keys which they ultimately determined fit a car. The girlfriend later consented to a search of the car in which they found an assault rifle. The Seventh Circuit held that the defendant had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the car. Moreover, if the girlfriend did not validly consent to a search of the car, then the defendant had standing to contest the search. The girlfriend's consent was not valid, because the girlfriend was improperly in custody when her consent to search the car was obtained.

United States v. Richardson, 385 F.3d 625 (6th Cir. 2004)

After issuing the driver a warning ticket, the police asked him to “stay where he was” and then approached one of the passengers (the owner of the car) for consent to search. This direction to the driver amounted to a detention – a detention that had no basis in an articulable suspicion – and amounted to an unlawful stop that tainted any subsequent search, even a consensual search. The detention of the driver amounted to a detention of all the car’s occupants.

United States v. Isiofia, 370 F.3d 226 (2d Cir. 2004)
The defendant was arrested shortly after accepting a controlled delivery of drugs. The police promptly made a protective sweep of the defendant’s home and handcuffed him to a chair. Approximately thirty minutes later, while still handcuffed to the chair, the defendant was asked for consent to search the house, which he granted. The Second Circuit affirmed the lower court’s decision holding that the consent was involuntary due to the prolonged detention in the house. Among the factors considered by the lower court was the agents’ failure to explain what they were looking for; and they were verbally abusive during the course of the detention.

United States v. Guerrero, 374 F.3d 584 (8th Cir. 2004)

The videotape of the defendant’s detention on the side of the road demonstrated that he did not speak English (e.g., Q: “Do you know how fast you were going?” A: “Chicago.”). Evidence of a signed Spanish consent form did not establish the defendant’s consent to search his vehicle. Because the trooper was not able to communicate with the defendant in Spanish (or ensure that the defendant could read Spanish on the form), the form, by itself, was not enough to prove a voluntary consent.

United States v. Bautista, 362 F.3d 584 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant checked into a hotel room with what the hotel later learned was a stolen credit card. The management called the police and asked them to investigate, though the hotel had not yet made the decision to evict the defendant. The police went to the door, announced who they were and demanded, “Open the door” and then used a pass key to open it. Inside was the defendant’s wife, who backed up from the door (which she was opening at the same time the pass key was used to unlock it) and she said, “Come in.” They then obtained her consent to search the room and discovered counterfeit paraphernalia. The Ninth Circuit held that the evidence had to be suppressed: First, the defendant had standing, because the hotel had not yet made the determination to evict him and had not terminated his right of occupancy and the police had not yet made the decision to evict him. Both the police and the hotel were still investigating the information relating to the alleged stolen credit card. With regard to the issue of consent, the police officers’ command, “Police, open the door!” negated any suggestion of consent. “The government may not show consent to enter from the defendant’s failure to object to the entry.”

United States v. Hernandez, 279 F.3d 302 (5th Cir. 2002)

Suspicious of a bus traveler, a police officer took her luggage out of the baggage compartment of the bus and handled it, feeling (from the outside) the contents. This violated Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334 (2000), which held that such manipulation of luggage amounts to a search. The agent at that point entered the bus and secured the defendant’s consent to open the suitcase. This was voluntary consent. But, the consent was not sufficiently attenuated from the initial illegality to remove the taint. Thus, even though the search was conducted pursuant to the defendant’s consent, it was still the fruit of the illegal search that preceded it. “The officer decided to approach the defendant only after he had felt something suspicious in her suitcase.” This invalidates the consent search.

United States v. Winningham, 140 F.3d 1328 (10th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was stopped by border patrol agents and told that he was suspected of smuggling aliens. He consented to a search of the van and other than one passenger, nobody was found. The defendant then was told that the agent had information that the defendant was smuggling drugs. The defendant again consented to a search of his van, but it took about five minutes for a drug dog to arrive. The dog jumped into the open door of the van and alerted to the presence of drugs near the rear vent. The defendant did not consent to having the dog enter the vehicle. The trial court suppressed the evidence, concluding that the defendant's consent did not encompass allowing the dog to enter the vehicle. The Court of Appeals affirmed. There was no reasonable suspicion justifying the detention of the driver and the van after the initial search yielded nothing; therefore, the only basis for holding the van for five or six minutes was the driver's consent. The consent that was given, the appellate court concluded, was not voluntary: the driver had been asked to exit the vehicle and stand next to three armed officers. After the initial search ended, the driver was not told that he was free to leave. When the driver started walking away, a law enforcement officer followed him. These factors, taken together, show that any consent given by the driver was not free and voluntary.

United States v. Thame, 846 F.2d 200 (3rd Cir. 1988)

It was improper for the prosecutor to argue that evidence of guilt could be inferred from the defendant’s refusal to consent to the search of his bag.

United States v. Ho, 94 F.3d 932 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was approached at an airport because of his suspicious appearance and itinerary. He initially gave consent to a search of his portfolio. As the officer was looking through the portfolio, he discovered a blank white plastic card. At that point, the defendant abruptly withdrew his consent by grabbing the portfolio back. The officer grabbed the white card and saw a magnetic strip on the back, which indicated that it was a fraudulent card. However, the discovery of the magnetic strip on the back only occurred after the defendant had revoked his consent and thus could not be considered. Prior to noticing the magnetic strip, moreover, there was not probable cause to arrest the defendant and continue the search on a search incident to arrest theory. The district court erred in denying the motion to suppress.

United States v. Hurtado, 905 F.2d 74 (5th Cir. 1990)

Overruling prior precedents, the Fifth Circuit holds that the government needs to prove the defendant’s consent to search by a preponderance of the evidence. Previously, the Fifth Circuit had required the government to prove the voluntary nature of the consent by clear and convincing evidence.

United States v. Jones, 846 F.2d 358 (6th Cir. 1988)

Based on a tip, police approached the defendant on a public street and blocked his car with three police cars. He was asked if he had a gun; he responded that he did not have one with him, but that it was at his house. The court holds that this consent search was invalid: “The overall context and psychological impact of the entire sequence of events, which began with a dramatic stop by three police cars which blocked [the defendant’s] means of egress and then escorted him to the search after he was questioned without the benefit of Miranda warnings” rendered the defendant’s consent to search involuntary.

United States v. Shaibu, 920 F.2d 1423 (9th Cir. 1990)

The police knocked on the defendant’s door; the defendant came to the door, stepped into the hallway and listened while the officers identified themselves. Without a word, the defendant then re-entered the apartment with the police following. This does not constitute consent. At no time did the police ask permission to enter nor did they receive an explicit consensual invitation. Free and voluntary consent cannot be found by a showing of mere acquiescence to a claim of lawful authority. A court will not infer consent to enter a person’s home from conduct. Had the defendants sought permission, and the defendant stepped back into the apartment with the door open, the result might have been different. But here, the police never asked and the defendant never offered his consent. The consent search was not valid.

United States v. Bosse, 898 F.2d 113 (9th Cir. 1990)

An entry gained by use of a ruse that obscures the true reason for entry cannot be upheld despite the defendant’s consent to the entry. In this case, a federal agent hid his true reason for entering the defendant’s house with a California state agent who was reportedly making a state licensing inspection. The state agent told the defendant that he was a licensing inspector and that the federal agent was “with me.” In fact, the federal agent desired entry in the house for purposes totally apart from the licensing inspection.

United States v. $25,000, 853 F.2d 1501 (9th Cir. 1988)

The defendant contended that he did not speak English well enough to consent; there was insufficient evidence to determine if the defendant had freely and voluntarily consented to a search of his bag. A remand was necessary to develop the record.

United States v. Elliott, 107 F.3d 810 (10th Cir. 1997)

After giving the defendant a traffic ticket, the police officer asked the defendant if he could look in the trunk of the vehicle, but stated, “I don’t want to look through each item.” The defendant popped the trunk open and the officer then opened up one bag and looked in. This search exceeded the scope of the defendant’s consent.

United States v. Washington, 151 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1998)

Two federal agents boarded a bus in Jacksonville and, holding their badges above their heads, announced that they would like to see the identification of the passengers. The agents did not tell anyone that they were free to refuse to cooperate, or to refuse to consent to a search. When they approached the defendant, they asked if they could look inside his luggage and then, when the agents saw an unusual bulge in the defendant’s pants, asked if they could search him. Again, he consented. The Eleventh Circuit held that this was not a lawful search, because the consent was not freely and voluntarily given. There is no doubt in this case that the encounter began with a “show of authority,” because the agent held his badge above his head and identified himself as a federal agent. He announced what he wanted the passengers to do, and what he was going to do. Absent some positive indication that they were free not to cooperate, it is doubtful a passenger would think he or she had the choice to ignore the police presence. Most citizens, the court observed, believe that it is their duty to cooperate with the police. Though the court declined to hold that police must advise suspects of their right to refuse to consent to a search, in this context, this is exactly what was needed. As the court held, “It seems obvious to us that if police officers genuinely want to ensure that their encounters with bus passengers remain absolutely voluntary, they can simply say so. Without such notice in this case, we do not feel a reasonable person would have felt able to decline the agents’ requests.”

United States v. Guapi, 144 F.3d 1393 (11th Cir. 1998)

At the bus station in Mobile, Alabama, two officers boarded the bus and announced that “with the passengers’ consent” they were going to quickly search all of the luggage on the bus.
for contraband. Nobody was told that they could exit the bus with their luggage, or that they were permitted to refuse the request. Though the court stopped short of holding that voluntary consent requires proof that the target was aware of his or her right to refuse consent, in this situation, there was no voluntary consent. The actions of the police, in the language of Florida v. Bostick “would have communicated to a reasonable person that the person was not free to decline the officers’ requests or otherwise terminate the encounter.” Note that this decision pre-dates the United States Supreme Court decision in United States v. Drayton, supra which arguably overruled Guapi, though the Supreme Court did not expressly do so.

United States v. Tovar-Rico, 61 F.3d 1529 (11th Cir. 1995)

Several police officers entered defendant’s apartment with guns drawn and immediately engaged in a protective sweep search. The officers then approached the defendant, who was seated at the dining room table and asked for consent to search the house, advising her that if she refused, a search warrant would be obtained. The defendant’s subsequent consent to search was not voluntary.

United States v. Strickland, 902 F.2d 937 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant consented to a search of his vehicle, including consent to search the trunk and luggage. This did not, however, include permission to slash his spare tire to investigate its contents. Nevertheless, what the police learned from their lawful search was sufficient to give them probable cause to continue the search and thereby discover the contraband. The Court holds that when a person gives a general statement of consent to search without express limitations, the scope of the search is, nevertheless, not limitless. Rather, it is constrained by the bounds of reasonableness: What police officers can reasonably interpret the defendant’s consent to have encompassed.

United States v. Blake, 888 F.2d 795 (11th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was approached at an airport by three deputy sheriffs. He was asked if he would consent to a search of his baggage and his person for drugs. The defendant consented. Immediately, without any further consent, one of the officers reached into the defendant’s groin region where he did a “frontal touching” “in the area between the legs where the penis would normally be positioned.” The officer felt an object and heard a crinkling sound. The defendant was arrested, advised of his Miranda rights and cocaine was found in the crotch area. The Eleventh Circuit reverses the conviction: The government failed to show that the search which was conducted was within the purview of the consent received. The consent given by the Defendant allowing the officers to search his “person” could not, under the circumstances, be construed as authorization for the officers to touch his genitals in the middle of a public area in the Fort Lauderdale airport. Judge Shoob, concurring, noted that he would have hit the officer if the officer were smaller than him. The court also reviews a number of cases in both the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits which found that consent was not voluntary under certain circumstances.

The defendant was approached by police officers shortly after he departed the bus station. The defendant was with two companions. When the officers began talking to the three suspects, one of the suspects was found to be carrying a firearm; he was thrown up against a tree and ordered to drop the gun. The other suspect was frisked. Meanwhile, the other defendant was asked for permission to search his bags. According to the officer, he consented. The trial court prohibited the defense from questioning the officers about what was going on with the other two suspects during the supposed consent search. This evidence represented the “surrounding circumstances” which must be considered in gauging whether the consent to search was free and voluntary. This limitation was reversible error, even though the defendant himself described the situation during his testimony. The trial court decided that he believed the officers, not the defendant; therefore, the defendant had a right to elicit testimony about the “environment” of the consent search from the officers on cross-examination.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Consent -- Product of Unlawful Detention, Entry, Prior Search, or Arrest)

Police may board a bus and ask passengers for consent to search their carry-on luggage. The fact that the encounter occurs on a bus does not necessarily mean that the passengers are in any way restrained, or unable to say, “No.” In this case, the officers specifically advised the passengers that they were free to reject the request. In short, the encounter did not amount to a “seizure” and the ensuing consent was therefore valid.

United States v. Delgado-Perez, 867 F.3d 244 (1st Cir. 2017)

Law Enforcement executed an arrest warrant in Puerto Rico for a suspect wanted in New York. There was no reason to believe that any other person, or danger, existed elsewhere in the house where the arrest occurred. A protective security sweep was therefore unnecessary and not consistent with the Fourth Amendment. The fact that the defendant was arrested for a drug offense did not constitute a sufficient basis to conduct a sweep search throughout the house after he was arrested in the front yard. The subsequent consent search was the fruit of this unlawful security sweep and the results of that search were also required to be suppressed.

United States v. Beauchamp, 659 F.3d 560 (6th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was walking on the sidewalk in a “high crime area” when the police approached. The defendant was ordered to approach the officer, which he did. The defendant appeared to be nervous. The officer then frisked the defendant to look for weapons. The officer then asked for consent to conduct a search of the defendant’s person and the defendant agreed. The officer found drugs inside the defendant’s boxers. The Sixth Circuit held that this was a seizure, it was not based on an articulable suspicion and the consent was tainted by the illegal detention.

United States v. Macias, 658 F.3d 509 (5th Cir. 2011)

The duration of the traffic stop in this case lasted too long to be justified as a legitimate motor vehicle stop. The state trooper pulled the defendant over because he was not wearing a seat belt. He determined that the defendant did not have proof of insurance. The trooper then questioned the defendant at length about his work history, his itinerary, his purpose for traveling and his health. The defendant’s consent to search the vehicle was the product of the illegal detention.

United States v. Fox, 600 F.3d 1253 (10th Cir. 2010)

The defendant’s wife pulled up to her house and was approached by a police officer who was conducting surveillance of the house (in particular, the defendant). The officer entered the wife’s car and directed her to drive across the street to a parking lot. She was questioned and then asked for consent to search her car. Ultimately, she consented to a search of the house. The Tenth Circuit held that the wife was detained; there was no basis for the detention and the consent to search was the product of this detention. In analyzing the Wong Sun and Brown v. Illinois factors (i.e., whether the illegal detention had dissipated) the court stressed that the officer’s conduct was flagrant and the misconduct was investigatory in design and purpose and was executed “in the hope that something might turn up.” The gun found in the house, therefore, should have been suppressed at the defendant’s trial.

United States v. Alvarez-Manzo, 570 F.3d 1070 (8th Cir. 2009)

The police seized a suitcase from underneath an interstate bus during a layover at a bus depot. They brought the suitcase into the bus and asked the passengers to whom it belonged. The defendant eventually said that it was his. He agreed to exit the bus and went with an officer into the bus station. Ultimately, he was arrested based on what was seen in his wallet and a search warrant was obtained to search the bag. The police did not act with the consent or at the direction of any employee of the bus company when they initially took the bag out of the luggage compartment and brought it into the bus. This amounted to a seizure and because there was no warrant or probable cause, evidence discovered as a result of the seizure – which was both the contents of the wallet (viewed with the defendant’s consent) and the suitcase – was properly suppressed.

United States v. Urrieta, 520 F.3d 569 (6th Cir. 2008)

After pulling the defendant over for improper registration and weaving, the trooper determined that the defendant had a Mexican driver’s license which the trooper incorrectly believed did not authorize the defendant to drive in Tennessee. The trooper wrote a ticket for the registration violation but prolonged the traffic stop based on his erroneous belief that the license was insufficient (and because of his suspicion that the defendant was smuggling drugs). Eventually (twenty-four minutes after the stop commenced), the trooper asked for consent to search the car, which the defendant provided. The Sixth Circuit held that the stop lasted too long, based on the trooper’s erroneous understanding of the law and the consent was tainted by the prolonged detention. The court also rejected the government’s suggestion that the trooper had a reasonable basis for believing that the defendant was smuggling drugs. The “characteristics” upon which the government relied were not sufficient to amount to a reasonable articulable suspicion. Finally, the court held that even if there was reasonable suspicion to believe that the defendant was in the country without proper documents, the trooper lacked the authority to investigate this matter.

United States v. Gomez-Moreno, 479 F.3d 350 (5th Cir. 2007)

After the police made an unlawful “exigent circumstances” search of the defendant’s house (see annotation for this case infra Search and Seizure (Exigent Circumstances)), the defendant consented to a search of the house. The Fifth Circuit held that the consent was the product of the prior illegal search.

United States v. Johnson, 427 F.3d 1053 (7th Cir. 2005)

The police received an anonymous tip that the defendant was a cocaine dealer and that he lived at a particular location. The police went to the defendant’s house and when the defendant’s girlfriend came out, she was asked by the police to knock on the door. She did so and the defendant came to the door. The police talked to him briefly, after which he turned around and started walking away, back down the hall. The police pulled out a gun, pointed it at the ground, and cautioned that “this was a matter of officer safety.” The defendant stopped in his tracks and returned to the door. He then consented to a search. The Seventh Circuit held, (1) this did amount to a detention; (2) there was no articulable suspicion supporting the detention; (3) the consent to search was a fruit of the unlawful detention.

United States v. Washington, 387 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2004)

The police went to the defendant’s residential hotel room and knocked, with the expectation of gaining the defendant’s consent to search the premises. But the defendant stepped outside the door when the police knocked and closed the door behind him. The police (six of them) repeatedly asked for permission to go in the apartment and reminded the defendant that he could be arrested on an unrelated matter. Eventually, the officers made their way inside and ultimately convinced the defendant to consent to a search. The Ninth Circuit found these Fourth Amendment violations: First the officers exceeded a Terry stop in the hallway; then they violated the defendant’s rights by not allowing the door to remain closed; then they violated his rights by entering the apartment without his consent; and finally, they violated his rights by moving his jacket to find a small amount of methamphetamine. His subsequent consent to search was tainted by all of these previous violations.

United States v. Cellitti, 387 F.3d 618 (7th Cir. 2004)

The police entered a house in which the defendant and his girlfriend lived based on exigent circumstances. Once inside, the police were given consent by the girlfriend to look for a gun. While looking for the gun, the police found a set of keys which they ultimately determined fit a car. The girlfriend later consented to a search of the car in which they found an assault rifle. The Seventh Circuit held that the defendant had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the car. Moreover, if the girlfriend did not validly consent to a search of the car, then the defendant had standing to contest the search. The girlfriend’s consent was not valid, because the girlfriend was improperly in custody when her consent to search the car was obtained.

United States v. Fields, 371 F.3d 910 (7th Cir. 2004)

Consent to search a house that occurs after the police unlawfully enter the house may be tainted by the illegal entry if that illegality has not been sufficiently attenuated. The lower court’s findings in this case were insufficient to determine if, in fact, the court found that the initial entry was legal or not.

United States v. Robeles-Ortega, 348 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2003)

The police sent an informant into a house to buy cocaine. The informant came out and advised the DEA that the cocaine was in the house. The agents did not attempt to get a search warrant, but, instead, broke down the door with guns drawn. A security sweep of the apartment was conducted and then one of the tenants was asked to consent to a search, which she did. The Seventh Circuit holds that the consent was tainted by the unlawful entry.

United States v. Chanthaxouxat, 342 F.3d 1271 (11th Cir. 2003)

The police pulled over the defendant’s car because the officer believed that the defendant was in violation of a municipal law that required an inside rear view mirror. Actually, there was no such law. This rendered the stop illegal and the officer’s good faith did not rescue the government. An officer’s good faith mistake of fact may support a stop, but a mistake regarding the law cannot support an illegal stop and the evidence derived from the stop must be suppressed.

United States v. Patzer, 277 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2002)

The police lacked probable cause to arrest the defendant for DUI. The officer may have believed that the defendant had ingested marijuana, but there was no information suggesting that this impaired his ability to drive which is an element of the DUI offense. Absent probable cause to arrest the defendant, the ensuing search of his automobile could not be justified as a search incident to arrest. Similarly, the defendant’s consent was tainted by the unlawful arrest. Finally, the court suppressed the statements made by the defendant that were the product of the illegal arrest.

United States v. Chan-Jimenez, 125 F.3d 1324 (9th Cir. 1997)

An officer observed the defendant's pickup truck and was suspicious, though there was no motor vehicle offense observed, or anything particular about the pickup that the officer could identify as being suspicious. The pickup pulled over to the side of the road and the driver raised its hood. The officer pulled in behind and asked the driver for his license and registration. Then, without returning the papers (and without having ever asked if the defendant was having trouble with the vehicle), the officer, hand on his weapon, asked if he could look in the vehicle. The driver consented. This was an unlawful detention. Withholding the papers in this situation prevented the defendant from freely refusing consent and the consent that was given, therefore, was ineffective.

United States v. Ivy, 165 F.3d 397 (6th Cir. 1998)

The police knocked on the defendant’s door looking for a fugitive. The defendant consented to the officers’ entry into the house. The court found that the subsequent search, however, was the product of police coercion and that the defendant did not consent to the search. Among other things, the defendant was detained for over an hour prior to the time that he supposedly consented to a search of his house. The officers also threatened to arrest everybody in the house and put the children in protective custody, and the defendant’s girlfriend was handcuffed to a kitchen table.

United States v. Vega, 221 F.3d 789 (5th Cir. 2000)

The police knocked on the door of a house that they suspected was being used for drug dealing. One person fled out the back door and was then detained. There was no probable cause for his arrest, however. Though he was not the owner or lessee of the house, he consented to a search of the house. The police, arguably, could have believed that he had authority to consent. However, because he was unlawfully detained, the consent was invalid and the defendant who did have standing to contest the search of the house could assert that fourth amendment violation to contest the supposed consent search of the house.

United States v. McCraw, 920 F.2d 224 (4th Cir. 1990)

The police went to the defendant’s hotel room after arresting a person who had just exited the room with cocaine. The officers knocked on the door; the defendant opened the door, but upon seeing the police, he immediately tried to close the door. The police forced their way in.
The defendant was arrested and asked if the officers could search the room. Defendant consented. The entry into the room was unlawful and the ensuing purported consent was invalid. The entry was not in hot pursuit and was not justified by exigent circumstances. This case is distinguishable from United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976), because there, when the police arrived, the defendant was in the doorway and quickly retreated upon seeing the police.

United States v. Miller, 146 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 1998)

The police believed that the defendant was transporting drugs, but had no basis for stopping the vehicle other than the fact that the defendant activated his direction signal, but then entered an intersection and did not make a turn. Flashing a turn signal, but not turning, however, is not a criminal offense under Texas law, so stopping the vehicle was not authorized. The defendant’s subsequent consent to a search of his vehicle was tainted by this unlawful stop and was not valid.

United States v. Caicedo, 85 F.3d 1184 (6th Cir. 1996)

The police approached the defendant who was standing outside a storage unit which the police believed contained contraband. They asked for his consent to search the unit; the defendant refused. He was placed in the back of the patrol car and told to wait there while the officers questioned defendant’s colleague. This amounted to an arrest of the defendant and his subsequent consent to search the storage unit was tainted by this unlawful arrest. In light of the statements of the officers and the circumstances, this was more than a mere Terry stop.

United States v. Bradley, 922 F.2d 1290 (6th Cir. 1991)

The grand jury returned an indictment against the defendant. The police went to the defendant’s house before a warrant was signed or a summons issued. The police knocked on the door; the defendant answered and was told he was under arrest. He consented to a search of his house. This violated Payton and the consent was tainted by the unlawful arrest. (The decision does not indicate that the officers entered the house prior to informing the defendant that he was under arrest).
lawfully arrested) was tainted by this unlawful entry and the police could not rely on a consent search. Finally, the government cannot rely on the “inevitable discovery” exception because the police were not pursuing an alternate line of investigation at the time that the search was conducted. Police who believe they have probable cause to search may not enter the premises and excuse their failure to get a warrant on the basis that they would have gotten one anyway.

United States v. Jerez, 108 F.3d 684 (7th Cir. 1997)

The police decided to investigate the occupants of a hotel room in Milwaukee on the basis that the car being driven by them had out-of-state plates (Florida plates) and the car was a two-door vehicle. They also learned that the driver had previously been arrested on narcotics charges. At about 11:00 p.m., the officers knocked on the door of the room for several minutes and hearing no reply, then went outside and started knocking on the window. After several minutes, the defendant opened the door and eventually consented to a search of the room. The Seventh Circuit concluded that the knocking on the door and window late at night amounted to a seizure that had no valid basis. The consent was tainted by this unlawful detention.

United States v. Chan-Jimenez, 125 F.3d 1324 (9th Cir. 1997)

The police pulled behind the defendant’s vehicle which was disabled on the side of the road. The officer obtained the defendant’s license and registration and found everything in order. Without returning the identification documents back to the defendant, however (and while keeping his hand on his holstered weapon), the officer then asked for consent to search the vehicle. Retaining the documents amounted to a seizure, which was not supported by an articulable suspicion. A subsequent consent to search was not valid: the defendant was not told that he could refuse consent, he was not Mirandized and he was being unlawfully detained.

United States v. Gregory, 79 F.3d 973 (10th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was driving on I-70 in Utah when he was observed by a trooper weaving over the shoulder line. The defendant was stopped and following a brief encounter, consented to a search of his vehicle. The trooper’s stop of the vehicle was not lawful. Weaving over the shoulder line one time is not an offense under Utah law and there was insufficient evidence that the defendant was DUI or was a danger to the public. In this case, moreover, the ensuing consent was not untainted by the illegal stop. The court concluded that it was evident that, from the moment the vehicle was stopped, the trooper’s sole interest was in viewing the contents of the vehicle.

United States v. Sandoval, 29 F.3d 537 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was stopped for speeding. He produced his license and registration, which was checked and came back normal. After returning the paperwork to the defendant, the defendant asked if “that is it?” to which the officer responded, “No, wait a minute.” The officer decided to ask the defendant some additional questions about his criminal background (he learned during the license check about an arrest for a narcotics violation several years earlier). This questioning amounted to an additional detention, which was not supported by an articulable suspicion. The fact that the defendant had an earlier arrest — and no conviction — for a drug offense, does not justify a Terry stop of any duration. Even though the defendant then gave consent to search the car, this consent occurred after the detention had become unlawful and it was, therefore, not a free and voluntary consent. The evidence should have been suppressed.
United States v. Fernandez, 18 F.3d 874 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was stopped on the interstate, because the trooper considered the tinted windows to be in violation of state law and for improper lane travel. The trooper examined the driver’s license and issued a citation. However, rather than allowing the defendant to proceed, the trooper held the identification and questioned the driver and then asked for consent to search the car. The search yielded 121 kilograms of cocaine. The Tenth Circuit concluded that there were insufficient facts to support the detention of the defendant beyond the time necessary to examine the license and issue the citation (i.e., nervousness and “unusual behavior”). The subsequent consent to search the vehicle was tainted by the unlawful detention. Among other factors considered in determining whether the consent was free and voluntary was the trooper’s failure to advise the defendant that he had the right to refuse. This case might not be decided the same after the Supreme Court decided Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996).

United States v. Walker, 941 F.2d 1086, on rehearing from 933 F.2d 812 (10th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was stopped for speeding. The officer then began questioning the defendant about contraband. While holding the defendant’s license and registration in his hand, the officer then asked for permission to search the car. Though the defendant consented, the search was invalid. The continued detention of the defendant beyond the time necessary to issue the speeding ticket was not based on any articulable suspicion and the only issue for remand was whether the consent was invalid in light of the illegal detention.

United States v. Maez, 872 F.2d 1444 (10th Cir. 1989)

The defendant’s house was surrounded by SWAT team members all with drawn guns. With the use of loud speakers, the officers ordered the defendant to exit his home. Because the officers had neither an arrest warrant nor a search warrant, the arrest was illegal pursuant to Payton v. New York. The resulting searches which were undertaken with the consent of the defendants were tainted by the illegal arrest. Statements given by the defendants were also subject to suppression.

United States v. Tovar-Rico, 61 F.3d 1529 (11th Cir. 1995)

Several police officers entered defendant’s apartment with guns drawn and immediately engaged in a protective sweep search. The officers then approached the defendant, who was seated at the dining room table and asked for consent to search the house, advising her that if she refused, a search warrant would be obtained. The defendant’s subsequent consent to search was not voluntary.
SEARCH AND SEIZURE
(Consent – Third Party Consent)

Distinguishing United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164 (1974) and Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177 (1990), the Supreme Court holds that when co-tenants of a house are at the front door and one consents to a search and the other objects, the police may not enter. The Court noted, however, that if there were exigent circumstance (evidence of abuse, for example), the police could enter.

Officers gained entry to the defendant’s apartment with the assistance of an individual who told the police that she was one of the occupants of the apartment. She gave consent to the officers to search the apartment. In fact, that individual did not have common authority because she had moved out of the apartment already. The Supreme Court upheld the search: If police officers act in good faith reliance on the apparent authority of an individual to consent to a search of certain premises, the evidence will not be suppressed.

United States v. Terry, 915 F.3d 1141 (7th Cir. 2019)

The police went to the defendant’s house (knowing that he was not home, because they had recently arrested him) and a woman in a bathrobe answered the door. The police asked her for consent to search the house. She consented. In fact, she did not have authority to consent, and despite the fact that the police reasonable believed that she had spent the night there (because she answered the door in her bathrobe), that was not sufficient to demonstrate that the police reasonable believed that she had authority.

Bonivert v. Clarkston, 883 F.3d 865 (9th Cir. 2018)

In this civil rights case, the police went to the home where there had been a report of a domestic argument. The police called the wife, who was not at home and she consented to the officer’s entrance into the house. The husband, who was at home, objected. Entering the house violated the rule announced in Georgia v. Randolph.

United States v. Rush, 808 F.3d 1007 (4th Cir. 2015)

A woman called the police and asked that they remove the defendant from her apartment where he had been staying and, according to her, dealing drugs. The woman met the police at a location away from the apartment and gave them consent to enter the apartment and gave them a key. The police went to the apartment and went in. The defendant was asleep in the master bedroom. They woke him up and told him that they had a search warrant to search the apartment. This was not true. But the police said that in order to protect the woman – hiding the fact that she had called the police and gave them permission to enter the apartment. The Fourth Circuit held that (1) searching the apartment was not a proper consent search because the defendant, as an occupant, had the right to object to a consensual search pursuant to Randolph; and (2) the police could not rely on the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule, because the police did not rely on some other authority in good faith in conducting the search (such as in Leon or Davis). Deterring the police from lying about the existence of a warrant is the type of case for which the exclusionary rule is particularly appropriate.

United States v. Cordero-Rosario, 786 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2015)

The initial search warrant stated that the crime under investigation was “lewd actions” and that “in accordance with the interview of the child, there is currently pornography on the defendant’s computer. There was no information in the search warrant application about what the child said, how the alleged pornography was related to any offense, how the child knew about the presence of pornography on the computer, or why the affiant believed that pornography was evidence of a crime. The evidence should have been suppressed, because even the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply to this warrant. Based on the discovery of child pornography during the search of the computer, the police went back to the apartment and secured the wife’s consent to search additional computers. The First Circuit held that this was arguably the fruit of the poisonous tree (exploiting the first illegal search), but further fact-finding was necessary to develop the record relating to the subsequent consent searches.

United States v. Iraheta, 764 F.3d 455 (5th Cir. 2014)

If a driver consents to the search of his automobile, including all closed containers, and there are suitcases belonging to passengers in the vehicle, if the passengers hear the consent given by the driver and don’t object, the consent is valid. However, where, as here, the consent is given outside the earshot of the passengers, the consent is not a valid consent insofar as it purports to consent to the search of passengers’ belongings.

United States v. Peyton, 745 F.3d 546 (D.C. Cir. 2014)

The defendant and his grandmother shared a one-room apartment. The police went to the apartment and asked the grandmother for consent to search a shoebox next to the defendant’s bed. The police had been told by the grandmother that the defendant kept his personal property around his bed in the living room. Relying on the grandmother’s consent was not reasonable and the search violated the defendant’s rights under the Fourth Amendment.

United States v. Arreguin, 735 F.3d 1168 (9th Cir. 2013)

The police could not have reasonably relied on the consent of a houseguest to search an entire house. The officers made no effort to inquire whether the person who answered the door had any authority to consent to a search, or had unlimited access to the premises.

United States v. Johnson, 656 F.3d 375 (6th Cir. 2011)

The decision in Georgia v. Randolph applies even if the objecting resident has a “lesser” possessory interest than the consenting resident. In this case, the owner of the house, along with her daughter consented to a search. The daughter’s ex-husband, who was living in one of the spare bedrooms, refused to consent. The Sixth Circuit held that Randolph applied and the police could not rely on the others’ consent to enter the house.

United States v. Hassock, 631 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2011)
The police went to an apartment and after knocking on the door, a woman finally answered the door. The police announced that they were looking for Hassock and she mumbled something and eventually said that the police could “look around.” The police did not determine who she was, or what authority she had to permit entry into the apartment. The Second Circuit held that this was invalid consent to enter. The Court also spent considerable time discussing whether the police could engage in a Buie protective sweep and reviewed the law concerning the scope and premise for a protective sweep, noting that a protective sweep in some Circuits is limited to instances when either a search warrant is being executed or an arrest is occurring, whereas other Circuits permit a protective search in situations where a consent to search is the predicate for the entry. But that issue was not resolved in this case, because the Court concluded that the entry was unlawful.

United States v. Taylor, 600 F.3d 678 (6th Cir. 2010)

The police could not have reasonably believed that a female resident of an apartment had authority to consent to the search of a shoebox that was in a closet full of men’s clothes and which belonged to a male houseguest who had just been arrested. If the police are unsure about the consenter’s authority to give consent, they must ask about that person’s authority, or access to the item being searched, and not simply conduct the search based on the person’s general consent.

United States v. Monghur, 588 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was in jail and his outbound calls were being taped. The police, listening to the tape, learned that he had a gun hidden in the house where he stayed. They went to the house and secured the consent of the owner to search the house. The police went to a bedroom that belonged to an adult mail and was the room in which the defendant stayed when he slept at the house. The police searched a closed container in that room and located the gun. The lower court held that the owner of the premises did not have authority to consent to a search of that container. The government did not appeal that holding. Rather, the government argued that the defendant lacked an expectation of privacy in the container because in a phone call that he knew was being taped, he revealed the existence of the gun. The Ninth Circuit held that when a defendant unequivocally reveals the contents of a closed container to the police, the defendant does relinquish his expectation of privacy in the container, but in this case, the defendant’s statements on the telephone clearly showed that he was trying to disguise what he was talking about and used code. This demonstrated that he maintained an expectation of privacy in the container.

United States v. Purcell, 526 F.3d 953 (6th Cir. 2008)

The police went to a hotel after receiving a tip that an escapee was there with his girlfriend. The police thought it was possible that methamphetamine was being made in the hotel room. The defendant was arrested outside the room. The girlfriend denied that there was any methamphetamine being manufactured in the room, but when the police quickly looked around, there were drug related items in the room. There was no reason to believe, however, that there was actual manufacturing in progress. Because of the lack of any such information, there was no basis to immediately start searching luggage that was in the room on the basis of exigent circumstances. Moreover, the girlfriend did not have the apparent authority to consent to a search of the luggage, which did not belong to her. “Apparent authority cannot exist if there is ambiguity as to the asserted authority and the searching officers do not take steps to resolve the ambiguity.”

Callahan v. Millard County, 494 F.3d 891 (10th Cir. 2007)

Some circuits have held that if a defendant invites a person into his house to sell drugs, and the invitee is an undercover police officer, the defendant cannot complain that pursuant to a pre-arranged signal, the undercover officer “invites” his colleagues into the house to make an arrest. However, where the invitee is a civil informant, rather than an undercover police officer, this rule is not as universal. The Tenth Circuit, in this § 1983 lawsuit held that the police did not have qualified immunity with respect to the claim that they had no lawful basis for entering the house upon the invitation of an informant. THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT REVERSED, HOLDING THAT THE OFFICERS WERE ENTITLED TO QUALIFIED IMMUNITY. 129 S. Ct. 808 (2009). Whether the “consent-once-removed” doctrine will ultimately be rejected, or affirmed by other Circuits, or by the U.S. Supreme Court is not known.

United States v. Cos, 498 F.3d 1115 (10th Cir. 2007)

The police had an arrest warrant for the defendant. They went to his house and learned that he was not home. A nineteen year old girl answered the door and said that she was a friend of the defendant and was visiting the home with her nephew and his friends so they could use the pool. She had no clothes at the home, did not contribute to the rent, and had spent the night there on only a couple occasions. When the police arrived, they simply asked whether Mr. Cos was home, and when told that he was not, they asked, “Can we take a look?” to which she answered, “yes.” The Tenth Circuit held that the girl did not have authority. She also did not have apparent authority. The police did not, in fact, rely on the arrest warrant when they made entry, so the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule did not apply.

United States v. Buckner, 473 F.3d 551 (4th Cir. 2007)

The police went to the defendant’s house and secured his wife’s consent to “mirror image” the computer that was seen on the table in the living room. The wife said that she used the computer occasionally to play solitaire. The agents then used forensic tools to examine the contents of the computer and determined that the defendant had used the computer to engage in various fraudulent acts. The Fourth Circuit held that the consent of the wife was not valid to enable the police to view the password-protected files on the computer, see Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001), but that she had apparent authority to grant consent. Thus, the evidence would not be suppressed.

United States v. Groves, 470 F.3d 311 (7th Cir. 2006)

The Seventh Circuit remands this case to the trial court for further findings of fact relating to the “apparent authority” of the person who supposedly gave consent to search the apartment. The police intentionally waited until the defendant, the target of the firearms investigation, left the apartment and then asked the remaining occupant, his girlfriend, if she would consent to a search (a federal magistrate had recently denied the officers’ request for a search warrant). The girlfriend said that she would have to ask her boyfriend, who was not at home. The police persisted, saying that this was between them and her. The trial court held that the girlfriend had apparent authority to consent to a search. The Seventh Circuit remanded for further development of the record.

United States v. Hudspeth, 518 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2008)

The police found child pornography on the defendant’s office computer and asked for his consent to go to his house to examine his home computer. He refused. The police then called his wife and asked if they could come to the house and take the computer. She consented. The initial panel opinion, 459 F.3d 922 (2006), held that this violated the rule announced in Georgia v. Randolph. Though the husband was not a “present” and objecting occupant, this did not sufficiently distinguish Randolph. EN BANC GRANTED 1/04/07 and REVERSED, by en banc court on March 11, 2008, 518 F.3d 954. The en banc court held that because Hudspeth was not a present non-consenting co-tenant, his refusal to consent did not override the wife’s consent.

United States v. Waller, 426 F.3d 838 (6th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was evicted from one apartment where he was living with friends and asked another friend if he could store some of his belongings in his apartment. The friend agreed. Shortly thereafter, the police obtained an arrest warrant for the defendant and arrested him outside the friend’s apartment. He acknowledged coming out of that apartment. The police obtained the friend’s consent to search the apartment. The police searched throughout the apartment and found guns in what turned out to be the defendant’s suitcase. He was prosecuted for possession of the guns. The Sixth Circuit held that the evidence should have been suppressed. The defendant had standing to challenge the search of his suitcases and the apartment owner did not have actual or apparent authority to search the suitcases. The officers did not reasonably believe that the apartment owner had authority to grant consent to search the defendant’s personal belongings that were stored there.

United States v. Jimenez, 419 F.3d 34 (1st Cir. 2005)

The lessee of the premises where the defendant had a room did not have authority to consent to a search of the defendant’s room. She explained to the officers that she did not go into that room, and she had no key – the lessee used a butter knife to enter that room.

United States v. Davis, 332 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir. 2003)

The occupant of an apartment does not have authority to consent to the search of a gym bag owned by another occupant of the apartment. There was no indication that the person giving consent had common authority of the gym bag.

United States v. Jones, 335 F.3d 527 (6th Cir. 2003)

The police arrested the defendant and asked for consent to search his house. He refused. Later, the police went to the house and asked a handyman who was mopping the floor for consent and he agreed. Where a primary occupant has denied consent, an employee does not have actual authority to consent to a search. The handyman lacked apparent authority, because the police knew that the primary occupant had already refused to consent to a search. While a person with an equal interest in the residence, such as a spouse or cotenant might give consent after the defendant has refused to do so (but see Georgia v. Randolph), a handyman does not have that authority.
The defendant was in jail. He asked a friend to destroy the contents of an envelope that the defendant had given to the friend (it contained computer disks). The police acquired the envelope and the friend gave the police permission to open it and review the contents. The friend did not have authority to consent to a search of the envelope and the evidence should have been suppressed. The friend was the “custodian” of the envelope, the equivalent of a bailee, and the police were aware that the friend had not been given permission to open the envelope or access the contents of the disks. One does not cede dominion over an item to another just by putting him in possession. United States v. Kelly, 529 F.2d 1365 (8th Cir. 1976); United States v. Welch, 4 F.3d 761 (9th Cir. 1993); United States v. Basinski, 226 F.3d 829 (7th Cir. 2000). See also Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001) (password-protected files on a shared computer are not subject to warrantless search, even by person who shares the computer, but does not have password).

The court reviews the law governing when a parent may consent to the search of a son’s bedroom in the parents’ home. The court concludes that a third party has authority to consent to a search of property if that third party has either (1) mutual use of the property by virtue of joint access, or (2) control for most purposes over the property. The first option is a fact-intensive inquiry which focuses on the actual relationship between the consenter and the property: does the parent, for example, clean the room, visit with the son in the room, or otherwise go into the room without an invitation. The second option is determined from the relationship between the occupant and the consenter. A landlord, for example, does not have control. The nature of the relationship may create a presumption of control, though this presumption may be rebutted. In this case, the presumption was triggered and it was not rebutted.

The police believed that the defendant was involved in a burglary. They learned that the defendant was living with someone named Kassedyne. The police went to Kassedyne’s home and asked for permission to search the house. Kassedyne explained that the defendant’s belongings were located in a certain part of the garage, and none of her belongings were intermingled with his. She did not specifically consent to a search of the defendant’s belongings. The officers found an illegal firearm in defendant’s belongings. The Ninth Circuit concludes: (1) the defendant had an expectation of privacy in the containers that were stored in Kassedyne’s garage; (2) there was no evidence in the record to demonstrate that Kassedyne had a right of access to, or had authority or apparent authority to consent to a search of defendant’s belongings; (3) the police had no basis for believing that Kassedyne had authority to consent to a search of the defendant’s belongings – in fact, they were told by Kassedyne that the items in that part of the garage were the defendant’s, and not hers. The officers’ mistaken belief of law, as distinguished from a mistaken belief as to the facts, did not support the application of the apparent authority doctrine.

United States v. Vega, 221 F.3d 789 (5th Cir. 2000)
The police knocked of the door or a house that they suspected was being used for drugs. One person fled out the back door and was then detained. There was no probable cause for his arrest, however. Though he was not the owner or lessee of the house, he consented to a search of the house. The police, arguably, could have believed that he had authority to consent. However, because he was unlawfully detained, the consent was invalid and the defendant who did have standing to contest the search of the house could assert that fourth amendment violation to contest the supposed consent search of the house.

United States v. Infante-Ruiz, 13 F.3d 498 (1st Cir. 1994)

The defendant was a passenger in a car which was being followed by the police. When the car stopped, the defendant was arrested on an outstanding arrest warrant. The driver was asked for permission to search the car, which he provided. When the trunk was opened, the driver identified one of the briefcases as belonging to the defendant. Though the driver had consented to a search of the car, he did not have the authority to consent to a search of the defendant’s briefcase and the officer’s search of that briefcase was, therefore, not lawful.

United States v. Jaras, 86 F.3d 383 (5th Cir. 1996)

The police stopped a car in which there was a driver and the defendant was a passenger. The driver consented to a search of the car. When the officer opened the trunk, he saw a garment bag and a suitcase. He asked who owned what. The driver said the garment bag was his and the suitcase was the defendant’s. The driver watched this exchange, and when asked by the officer what was in the suitcase, he responded, “I don’t know.” The officer then searched the suitcase. This was an unlawful search. The driver clearly did not have the authority to consent to a search of the suitcase and the defendant never gave his consent. The defendant’s silence and failure to object does not amount to consent.

United States v. Ibarra, 965 F.2d 1354 (5th Cir. 1992)(en banc, equally divided)

An overnight guest may consent to the search of a house, but not, as in this case, to the removal of a structural barrier to the attic. The guest simply said “that would be alright” when the police asked if they could search the house. This did not authorize the removal of large wooden boards which blocked access to the attic.

United States v. Roark, 36 F.3d 14 (6th Cir. 1994)

The defendant lived in a house behind his sister’s house. The sister owned both houses. The police went to the sister’s house and asked permission to search her residence. She consented. This did not authorize the police to search the house in which the defendant resided. This search exceeded the scope of consent given by the sister.

United States v. Johnson, 22 F.3d 674 (6th Cir. 1994)

The police went to an apartment where a 14-year-old girl had been kidnapped and held for several days. When the police arrived, the girl answered the door, but she was unable to let the officers in (or escape) because of a locked iron gate. The police broke open the iron gate. The girl then “consented” to a search of the apartment – the defendant was not at home. This was not a valid consent search. The girl did not have the authority to consent to a search of the apartment. The fact that she was locked in established that she was not free to come and go (and hence invite others to do the same). Moreover, there was no evidence that she had any authority to enter the closet where the guns were located. There were also no exigent circumstances.
justifying the warrantless search. Because the defendant was not present, the apartment could have been secured and a search warrant obtained.

White Fabricating Company v. United States, 903 F.2d 404 (6th Cir. 1990)

The government has the burden to prove the voluntary consent to a search or seizure and must do so by a preponderance of the evidence. The party giving consent must have “sufficient authority” over the property or premises to consent to the search, or at least the government officers making the search must have a reasonable belief that the person giving consent has that authority. The record in this case failed to show that the agents of the owners of the property had the authority or that the police reasonably believed they had the authority and an additional hearing was necessary.

United States v. Rodriguez, 888 F.2d 519 (7th Cir. 1989)

The defendant’s wife consented to the search of a room, but the record did not demonstrate that she had authority to consent to the opening of a briefcase and a file cabinet inside the room. A remand was appropriate to determine the extent of the wife’s authority.

United States v. Fultz, 146 F.3d 1102 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was evicted from his apartment and packed his belonging in garbage bags and cardboard boxes. He brought his belongings to a woman’s house who allowed him to move in. The woman who owned the house purportedly gave consent to the police to look inside the cardboard boxes. However, she did not have authority herself to look in the boxes and the fact that she had full use and access to the garage in which the boxes were stored did not mean that she had the right to go into the boxes, or authorize the officers’ entry into the boxes. Finally, the officers had no reason to believe that the friend had the authority to enter the boxes, so they could not rely on the apparent authority doctrine.

United States v. Dearing, 9 F.3d 1428 (9th Cir. 1993)

The police should have realized that the baby sitter did not have authority to consent to a search of the defendant’s bedroom, in which the police found a machine gun. Even though the sitter had access to the bedroom on prior occasions, there was insufficient evidence that the sitter was authorized to enter that room.

United States v. Welch, 4 F.3d 761 (9th Cir. 1993)

The defendant and her boyfriend were detained at a casino in Las Vegas. The boyfriend gave consent to the officers to search their car. In a woman’s purse in the trunk, the officers located counterfeit bills. This was not a valid consent search. Though the boyfriend had the authority to consent to a search of the car, the officers could not have reasonably believed that he had consent to search the woman’s purse, which obviously belonged to the defendant. Under Illinois v. Rodriguez, the boyfriend had neither actual, nor apparent authority to consent to the search of the purse.

United States v. Salinas-Cano, 959 F.2d 861 (10th Cir. 1992)

The defendant frequently stayed at his girlfriend’s house. When he arrived there, he brought his suitcase and left it in his room. After his arrest, the police went to the apartment. The girlfriend gave her consent to a search of the apartment. The police knew, however, that the closed suitcase was not hers. She lacked the authority to consent to the search of the suitcase and the officer knew it. The search was invalid. “When a guest in a private home has a private container to which the homeowner has no right of access . . . the homeowner . . . lacks the power

