This volume contains recent decisions from the United States Supreme Court and the federal appellate courts that are favorable to the defense or that are otherwise noteworthy. I have not included in this book any cases that relate exclusively to sentencing issues.

I add cases to this volume on a regular basis. Occasionally, of course, cases are overruled, or are vacated pending rehearing. I have done my best to track the subsequent development of cases, but you should confirm the validity of any holding.

In the back of the book, I have included an index of all cases contained in this volume.

I have also posted this book on a web site. On a regular basis, the web site is updated so you may check for more recent cases within a topic. The website is:

http://www.gsllaw.com (click on Publications and then on Favorable and Noteworthy Federal Decisions)

Please let me know if you think any corrections are needed, or if the format for this material could be improved.

ACCESSORY AFTER THE FACT

United States v. Centeno, 793 F.3d 378 (3rd Cir. 2015)

A constructive amendment of an indictment may occur as a result of a prosecutor’s closing argument. In this case, the defendant was charged with aiding and abetting an assault (in a federal park). In closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the defendant could be found guilty of aiding an abetting the assault if he drove the person who actually committed the assault away from the scene. But this would not be aiding and abetting an assault, because the crime was already completed; instead, this would be accessory after the fact. This argument had the effect of amending the indictment and required setting aside the verdict.

United States v. Calderon, 785 F.3d 847 (2d Cir. 2015)

In order to be guilty of accessory after the fact to the crime of murder (such as 18 USC § 1959), the defendant must know that the victim is dead or dying at the time that she assists the perpetrator. While she knew that the perpetrator had committed a crime and that she was assisting him in getting away, there was insufficient proof that the victim was dead or dying at the time. Even if she was aware that the victim had been shot (she may have heard the shots), that is not sufficient to prove that she was aware that he was dead or dying.

United States v. Head, 707 F.3d 1026 (8th Cir. 2013)

In order to prosecute a person for accessory after the fact, the government must prove that some other person actually committed the underlying offense. Proving only that the other person was convicted of the underlying offense is not sufficient. The defendant in the accessory prosecution must also be permitted to offer evidence that she was not aware that the principal committed the offense, or that the principal was acting in self-defense.

United States v. Graves, 143 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998)

In order to be convicted of accessory after the fact (18 U.S.C. § 3) to the crime of possession of a weapon by a convicted felon, the defendant must be shown not only to have known about the principal’s possession of the weapon, but also that the principal had a felony offense. This is true, even though the government is not required to prove that the principal (in order to be guilty of being a felon in possession of a weapon) was aware that he had a felony conviction. It is true, moreover, even though someone may be found guilty of aiding and abetting another person’s possession of a weapon by a convicted felon, even though the aider is unaware of the principal’s status.
ADVICE OF COUNSEL OR OTHER EXPERT

United States v. Tobin, 676 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2012)

United States v. Kottwitz, 627 F.3d 1383 (11th Cir. 2010)

The trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction on good faith reliance on advice of an accountant in this tax fraud prosecution. The defendant bears an extremely low threshold to justify the good faith reliance instruction and does not need to prove good faith. Whether the defendant fully disclosed the relevant facts, failed to disclose all relevant facts, or concealed information from his advisor, and relied in good faith on his advisor are matters for the jury – and not the court – to determine, under proper instruction. See also United States v. Morris, 20 F.3d 1111 (11th Cir. 1994); United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540 (11th Cir. 1984).

United States v. Moran, 493 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2007)

Excluding evidence about what the defendant was told by her attorney and CPA about the legitimacy of the tax shelters was reversible error. Such testimony is not hearsay and cannot be excluded pursuant to Rule 403.

United States v. McIntosh, 124 F.3d 1330 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud and money laundering on the basis of his failure to disclose during his bankruptcy proceeding that he had received certain money and deposited some of those funds in a bank account he controlled through an unincorporated business he managed. The defendant’s bankruptcy attorney testified that he was aware of the existence of the unincorporated business and was remiss in failing to inquire further and determine if its existence should have been disclosed to the bankruptcy court. This evidence was sufficient to prompt an "advice-of-counsel" instruction and the failure to instruct the jury on this defense was error.

United States v. Walters, 913 F.2d 388 (7th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was prosecuted for his actions in connection with recruiting college players to play pro football. The players would lie about their amateur status in playing one more year in college despite the existence of a contract to play with a certain pro team. The defendant contended that he had sought the advice of counsel and had been informed that although this violated NCAA rules, it would not be a criminal offense. The trial court erred in refusing to give an “advice of counsel” instruction to the jury. The trial judge’s decision that the defendant did not provide sufficient information to his attorneys was not a matter which should have been resolved by the judge – that is a matter for the jury.
United States v. DeFries, 129 F.3d 1293 (D.C. Cir. 1997)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the defense of reliance on advice of counsel. Though the defendant did not tell the lawyer virtually every fact that was needed to render sound advice, the primary facts which a lawyer would think pertinent were disclosed. Moreover, the fact that the defendant disregarded some of the lawyer’s advice did not negate the defense.
AIDING AND ABETTING

In order to be found guilty on an aiding and abetting theory, the defendant must intend that the crime be committed and this “intention” must encompass the whole crime, not just one element. In Rosemond, the defendant was charged with aiding and abetting the offense of carrying a gun in connection with a drug offense in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 942(c). While his conduct need only aid a part of this crime (such as the drug offense), his intention must encompass the entire crime: both the drug offense and the firearm carrying offense. Moreover, his “intention” must precede his conduct. He must know, in advance, that one of his cohorts would be armed. It is not sufficient that he learned during the commission of the drug offense that one of his cohorts was armed.

United States v. Fernandez-Jorge, 894 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2018)

A required element of the offense of possessing a firearm in a school zone, is that the defendant knew he was in a school zone. Though the convictions of several defendants in this case were affirmed, with respect to one defendant, who did not live in the community, there insufficient evidence that he was aware of the proximity to the school. The First Circuit reversed all defendants’ convictions who were prosecuted on an aiding and abetting theory, because the jury instruction did not comply with Rosemond: The instruction did not require that the aider and abettor knew the crime was to occur within a school zone.

United States v. Ford, 821 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 2016)

If a defendant is charged with aiding and abetting another person’s illegal possession of a firearm based on the other person’s felony record, the government must prove that the defendant knew the other person had a felony record, not just that she had “reason to know.” In this case, the defendant was the wife of the felon, but the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the government was required to prove that she knew that his prior record involved a felony conviction.

United States v. Prado, 815 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2016)

The trial court’s instruction on the law of aiding and abetting in this prosecution for a 924(c) violation was plainly erroneous in light of Rosemond v. United States. The instruction focused on the defendant’s aiding and abetting the underlying crime, without addressing the necessary intent to aid and abet the use of a firearm.

United States v. Henry, 797 F.3d 371 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was convicted of a 924(c) violation in connection with an armed robbery based on his aiding and abetting the principal perpetrator. The jury instruction, however, did not comply with Rosemond. The instruction failed to require that the government prove that the defendant intended to aid and abet the armed robbery with knowledge that the principal would use a firearm in connection with the armed robbery.
United States v. Centeno, 793 F.3d 378 (3rd Cir. 2015)

A constructive amendment of an indictment may occur as a result of a prosecutor’s closing argument. In this case, the defendant was charged with aiding and abetting an assault (in a federal park). In closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the defendant could be found guilty of aiding and abetting the assault if he drove the person who actually committed the assault away from the scene. But this would not be aiding and abetting an assault, because the crime was already completed; instead, this would be accessory after the fact. This argument had the effect of amending the indictment and required setting aside the verdict.

United States v. Encarnacion-Ruiz, 787 F.3d 581 (1st Cir. 2015)

In a child pornography production case, if a defendant is charged with aiding and abetting the production of child porn, a mistake of fact (the child’s age) is a defense. Unlike the principal perpetrator, who cannot raise this defense, pursuant to Rosemond v. United States, an aider and abettor must have the intent to commit the offense including all elements of the crime.

United States v. Rodriguez-Martinez, 778 F.3d 367 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant was a passenger in a car. When the car was pulled over, the defendant got out, walked to the corner and made a phone call. Drugs were found in the possession of the driver. The defendant was visibly nervous. A gun was found in the possession of the defendant. The First Circuit held that this evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the drugs. His nervousness did not prove that he knew the driver was in possession of drugs and may just as well have reflected his concern about his own possession of the firearm. In addition, the court reversed the driver’s conviction of possessing a firearm in furtherance of a drug offense (the gun was possessed by the passenger). Because there was insufficient evidence that the driver, who possessed the drugs, knew that the passenger possessed a gun, he could not be convicted of the § 924(c) offense.

United States v. Goldtooth, 754 F.3d 763 (9th Cir. 2014)

The government failed to prove that the defendant was aware that his colleague would rob the victim of tobacco that he had on his lap. Citing Rosemond v. United States, the Ninth Circuit held that to be guilty on an aiding and abetting theory, the government must prove that the defendant was aware of his colleagues’ intention to commit the crime prior to the actual commission of the crime.

United States v. Rufai, 732 F.3d 1175 (10th Cir. 2013)

While the defendant’s conduct aided the principal’s health care fraud offense, the evidence was insufficient to show that the defendant was aware of the crime and thus he could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the health care fraud crime. Innocent explanations for his conduct were too reasonable to allow the government to convict based on alternative theories that supported the argument that he “must have known” about the principal’s crime.

United States v. Ferguson, 676 F.3d 260 (2d Cir. 2011)

In this securities fraud trial, one theory of culpability was aiding and abetting, i.e., “willfully caused an act to be done which, if directly performed by him or another would be an offense against the United States.” The trial court properly defined “willfully” but failed to explain that the defendant’s willful conduct must cause the act to be done by the other person. This was plain error requiring a reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Turner, 674 F.3d 420 (5th Cir. 2012)
It was error – but harmless – to instruct the jury on an aiding and abetting theory of culpability. The evidence as presented at trial established that the defendant was either the sole participant in the crime, or was an unwitting participant. Either way, he was not an aider and abettor.

United States v. Silwo, 620 F.3d 630 (6th Cir. 2010)
The defendant was instrumental in procuring a van that was later used to transport marijuana and was also observed engaging in activity that appeared to be counter-surveillance. This evidence, alone, did not suffice to support a conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. The defendant was not present when the van was loaded. The defendant was clearly in a scheme, but the evidence did not show that he knew the scheme involved the distribution of marijuana. For the same reason, the defendant could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the marijuana.

United States v. Perez-Melendez, 599 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 2010)
While the evidence supported the conclusion that the defendant was aware that he was aiding and abetting the commission of criminal activity, the evidence did not establish beyond a reasonable doubt that he knew the criminal activity he was aiding was a cocaine transaction. The defendants gave inconsistent answers to agents when questioned about their activities, but this did not establish that they were aware of the specific crime that they were aiding.

United States v. Tran, 568 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was in a car that exited a warehouse that had been used as a drug distribution site. The defendant was a passenger and the marijuana was in the trunk. There was insufficient evidence establishing that the defendant possessed the marijuana with intent to distribute it, or that he conspired to do so. The Rule 404(b) evidence may have established that he had knowledge of the marijuana (the limited purpose for which the evidence was admitted), but it did not establish that he constructively or actually possessed the marijuana – or aided and abetted the possession of the marijuana – or that he conspired to do so. See also United States v. Sanchez-Mata, 925 F.2d 1166 (9th Cir. 1991) and United States v. Estrada-Macias, 218 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2000).

United States v. McDowell, 498 F.3d 308 (5th Cir. 2007)
The defendant was charged with aiding and abetting a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1461, mailing obscene material using the U.S. Postal Service. Though the obscene material was, in fact, mailed, there was insufficient evidence that the defendant was aware that the mails were being used or that he aided and abetted the offense with the knowledge that the mails were being used to distribute the obscene videos.

United States v. Gardner, 488 F.3d 700 (6th Cir. 2007)
Though intuition might lead one to conclude that to be prosecuted as an aider and abettor, the defendant is not required to have as much of a culpable state of mind as the principal, in certain situations, just the opposite is true. Consider the offense of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. If one is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm, the defendant may not defend on the basis that he did not know that he was a felon. An aider and abettor, however, must be proven to have actually known that the person who he aided in the possession was a felon.

United States v. Penaloza-Duarte, 473 F.3d 575 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was a passenger in a car loaded with methamphetamine. When a trooper in Louisiana stopped the car and discovered the drugs, the defendant claimed to be a confidential informant for a California detective, which was, in fact, verified by the California police. Though there was sufficient evidence of the defendant’s knowing possession of the drugs (he acknowledged knowing the drugs were in the car), the evidence was not sufficient to prove that he associated himself with, and engaged in, some affirmative conduct designed to aid the criminal venture, which is an indispensable component of an aiding and abetting conviction. There was no evidence that he loaded, or assisted in loading the car, or that he did any of the driving, or that he even knew the location to which the load was heading. A conviction must be reversed if the evidence construed in favor of the verdict gives equal or nearly equal circumstantial support to a theory of guilt and a theory of innocence of the crime charged. A subsequent Fifth Circuit decision abrogated the standard of review in this case. United States v. Vargas-Ocampo, 747 F.3d 299 (5th Cir. 2014).

Laird v. Horn, 414 F.3d 419 (3rd Cir. 2005)

Two defendants were tried for first degree murder in a Pennsylvania state court. The accomplice liability jury instruction did not clearly inform the jury that in order to be found guilty of aiding and abetting murder in the first degree (as opposed to being the actual killer), the defendant must have the intent to kill, not just the intent to engage in criminal activity that resulted in an accomplice killing the victim.

Juan H. v. Allen, 408 F.3d 1262 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s juvenile conviction for aiding and abetting first degree murder was not supported by sufficient evidence. Though the juvenile/defendant was present at the scene, there was insufficient proof that he was aware that the principal would commit the murders of the victims. The defendant may have had a motive, and may have fled after the murders, but neither motive, nor flight is sufficient to prove that the defendant aided and abetted the murders.

United States v. Hornaday, 392 F.3d 1306 (11th Cir. 2004)

The defendant engaged in e-mail communications with an undercover agent and enticed the agent (who was posing as the father of a young girl) to facilitate a rendezvous between the defendant and the girl. The defendant could be prosecuted for violating 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b), but it was inappropriate (though harmless) to instruct the jury on an aiding and abetting theory, because there was no perpetrator, other than the defendant. While aiding and abetting liability under §2(b) does not require another actual perpetrator, there must at least be someone else who is participating in the offense, even if innocently. Thus, a defendant can aid and abet an innocent pawn in the commission of an offense, but if, as in this case, the only person engaged in any unlawful conduct (knowingly, or not) is the defendant, he is not aiding and abetting anybody else. The court also noted that a defendant can be prosecuted for aiding and abetting a drug offense where the only other participant is an undercover law enforcement officer. Again, however, in that situation the undercover agent is actually engaged in the drug transaction (i.e., moving the drugs), albeit in a non-criminal manner.

United States v. Frampton, 382 F.3d 213 (2d Cir. 2004)

The government failed to prove that the person who committed the offense in this case did so with the requisite intent to convict him under the aiding and abetting statute. The offense was committing violence in support of a racketeering enterprise. 18 U.S.C. § 1959. One defendant hired another defendant to shoot a rival. The shooter was not shown to have known the reason that the shooting was requested. Therefore, he could not have known that his violent act was conducted “in aid of racketeering.” Thus, though he actually committed the offense, he could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the crime of committing an act of violence in aid of racketeering.

United States v. Cartwright, 359 F.3d 281 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was a knowing “lookout” for a drug transaction (as opposed to some other offense) and therefore his convictions for being a member of a drug conspiracy and for aiding and abetting the drug offense were reversed on sufficiency grounds. The government failed to prove that the defendant knew specifically that the illegal activity in which he was participating involved drugs rather than some other form of contraband. The court notes several other Third Circuit cases that have overturned drug conspiracy and aiding and abetting convictions because of the absence of evidence that the defendant agreed to participate in the specific crime alleged in the indictment. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Lombardi, 138 F.3d 559 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was a knowing participant in a drug transaction and he knowingly aided and abetted the drug offense, but the evidence did not establish that he knew that a juvenile was involved in the venture. The conviction for knowingly and intentionally employing, hiring, using, persuading, inducing, enticing, or coercing a juvenile to commit a drug offense was not supported by this evidence. To be guilty of aiding and abetting an offense (i.e., using a juvenile), the defendant must not only knowingly participate in the drug offense, but also must knowingly participate in the offense of using a juvenile.

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant aided and abetted, or conspired with others to murder the victim. Though the defendant advised the two principals of the victim’s whereabouts, there was insufficient evidence that he knew that the other two intended to kill the victim. Even though he knew the two were looking for the victim, there was no proof that he knew why.
Evidence established that the defendant planned a bank robbery and participated in the surveillance before the robbery. The actual robber brandished a weapon when he entered the bank. Given this evidence, a jury could find the defendant guilty of aiding and abetting an armed bank robbery. However, this evidence alone was not sufficient to prove that the defendant aided and abetted a §924(c) offense. To be guilty of aiding and abetting an armed bank robbery, the government must prove that the defendant had at least constructive knowledge that a gun would be used – that is, that it is likely that a gun would be used. For §924(c) aiding and abetting liability, however, the government must establish that the defendant knew “to a practical certainty that the principal would be using a gun.” In this case, the government made a satisfactory showing with regard to the armed robbery count, but not with regard to the §924(c) count.

The evidence failed to support defendant’s conviction for aiding and abetting his employer’s mail fraud scam. The defendant helped his employer “cut up” a vehicle which was fraudulently reported to an insurance company as being stolen. There was no evidence, however, that the defendant had any knowledge of the scheme to defraud the insurance company. Even circumstantial evidence failed to establish that the defendant was aware of the purpose of cutting up the car. Cars can be cut up for numerous purposes other than to accomplish a mail fraud scheme, such as recovering parts from a stolen car or destroying evidence used in an armed robbery or kidnapping.

One cannot be convicted of CCE on the basis of aiding and abetting a person who manages or supervises five other individuals.

The defendant asked his colleague to threaten a federal employee who had been attempting to serve him with a subpoena. The colleague threatened not only the federal employee, but also his family. This was not envisioned or reasonably foreseeable by the defendant, and he could not be convicted of threatening the family member on an aiding and abetting theory.

The defendant clearly was acting as a lookout for a narcotics transaction. While the evidence showed that he knowingly acted as a lookout, however, there was no evidence that he knew the transaction involved the distribution of cocaine. A conviction for aiding and abetting the cocaine transaction, or for conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, could not be sustained on this evidence alone. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

Defendant gave a false social security number to a bank in order to procure a loan for himself. This does not constitute the crime of making a false entry into the books or reports of a federally insured bank. That statute, 18 U.S.C. §1005, is not, on its face, limited to bank employees or insiders, but, nevertheless, that was the clear legislative intent, and the statute will be so construed. Furthermore, the defendant could not be convicted of violating the statute as an aider and abettor. The defendant did not have the specific intent to violate §1005, a requirement for aiding and abetting culpability, nor did he intend for the bank employees to violate the law (as in the case of CTR structuring offenses).

United States v. Murray, 988 F.2d 518 (5th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was an employee of a pawnshop that also sold firearms. The owner arranged to sell an illegal weapon to a convicted felon. The defendant participated in the sale and could be convicted of the counts of the indictment charging him with aiding and abetting the sale of the illegal weapon. However, there was insufficient evidence to show that he was aware that the recipient was a convicted felon. The fact that the defendant’s employer was aware is not sufficient to sustain the defendant’s conviction: an aider and abettor must share the criminal intent of the principal. This would be impossible if the aider and abettor is unaware that the purchaser was a convicted felon.

United States v. Martiarena, 955 F.2d 363 (5th Cir. 1992)

The defendant helped her father in his money exchange business. Though she asked her boyfriend to assist her father in violating the CMIR law (international monetary transactions), there was no evidence that she was aware that, once the money was in this country, her father would not comply with the CTR laws. The defendant was not shown to have actively participated in, or been rewarded by, the failure to file the CTR.

United States v. Ledezma, 26 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 1994)

The defendant entered into a drug conspiracy after the drugs were distributed by the principals. Though he could be found guilty of being in the conspiracy, the evidence did not support his conviction for aiding and abetting the offense.

The trial court properly dismissed an indictment which charged the defendant supply company with supplying materials so that others could grow marijuana. The indictment charged the defendant with conspiring to aid and abet the growing of marijuana. The problem here is combining the conspiracy and aiding and abetting offenses. In order to conspire to aid and abet, there must be a crime in progress that the defendant agreed to aid. Here, there was no allegation in the indictment that there was a crime being aided or a crime that the defendant agreed to aid. The court considered United States v. Falcone, 311 U.S. 205 (1940), and Direct Sales Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 703 (1943), in reaching this result: a supplier of innocent material can only be convicted of conspiring to produce an illegal product if the supplier knows of the end result and intends to further the illegal ends of the manufacturers.

United States v. Doig, 950 F.2d 411 (7th Cir. 1991)

OSHA provides for criminal penalties for corporations and employers who willingly violate provisions of OSHA. The defendant, an employee of the company, was charged as an aider and abettor of the corporate defendant. This was not permissible. The Act only outlaws conduct by employers; an employee may not be convicted of aiding and abetting.

United States v. Pino-Perez, 870 F.2d 1230 (7th Cir. 1989)
A person who is not supervised by a CCE “kingpin,” but who aids and abets the kingpin, is subject to prosecution as an aider and abettor under §2 and thus can be prosecuted under 21 U.S.C. §848. This holding does not apply to a person who is supervised by the kingpin.
APPEAL

(Cumulative Error Doctrine)

United States v. Certified Environmental Services, Inc., 753 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2014)
Various improper comments by the prosecution during opening statement and in the rebuttal closing argument, as well as the improper exclusion of evidence offered by the defense cumulatively required reversal of the conviction, even if any one or two of these errors was not reversible error.

United States v. Adams, 722 F.3d 788 (6th Cir. 2013)
The trial court abused its discretion in admitting certain Rule 404(b) evidence; abused its discretion in admitting certain witness intimidation evidence; abused its discretion in admitting certain evidence that should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403; and abused its discretion in altering transcripts of undercover tapes. While none of these errors may have been reversible error, cumulatively, the errors required that the conviction be reversed.

United States v. Delgado, 631 F.3d 685 (5th Cir. 2011)
Several errors in this case – when considered cumulatively – required that the conviction be set aside: (1) there was insufficient evidence offered to support a deliberate ignorance instruction, because there was no evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the high probability of the criminal activity; (2) the prosecutor improperly stated during closing argument that the defendant, who did not testify, had a “lied to agents when they interviewed her” when she denied guilt. This amounted to an improper statement of the prosecutor’s personal opinion; (3) a government agent testified (non-responsive to a question) that defendant’s trucking company had been involved in other drug trafficking; (4) the absence of a full transcript of the proceeding. In a separate holding, the Fifth Circuit also reversed the defendant’s conspiracy conviction on sufficiency grounds. All these errors, when considered cumulatively, denied the defendant a fair trial.

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008)
The Second Circuit concluded that the effect of various errors in this terrorism trial rendered the trial fundamentally unfair and reversed the conviction. The errors included improperly admitting a prior statement of a witness pursuant to Rule 801(d)(1)(b), and admitting testimony from a victim of a terrorist bombing that was not shown to have had any connection to the defendant, in violation of Rule 403. (This case is discussed in greater detail in EVIDENCE (Rule 403)).

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005)
The cumulative error doctrine provides that the aggregation of non-reversible errors, i.e., plain errors that do not individually necessitate a reversal and harmless errors, can yield denial of the constitutional right to a fair trial, thereby necessitating a reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997)

The trial court erred in permitting a government lay witness to offer expert testimony, excluding a defense expert, admitting improper Rule 404(b) evidence, and admitting evidence that should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403. While not deciding that any one of these errors, viewed in isolation, would have been reversible, when considered cumulatively, the net effect was the denial of the defendant’s right to a fair trial.

United States v. Frederick, 78 F.3d 1370 (9th Cir. 1996)

Although no single trial error examined in isolation was sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal, the cumulative effect of multiple errors was sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal. The government introduced improper bolstering testimony, improperly vouched for its witnesses and improperly maligned the defense attorney during closing argument. In isolation, none of the errors was enough to spoil the conviction; together, however, the defendant was unfairly prejudiced. This is the logical corollary of the harmless error doctrine which requires the appellate court to affirm a conviction if there is overwhelming evidence of guilt.
APPEAL
(Government Appeal)

United States v. Chaudhry, 630 F.3d 875 (9th Cir. 2011)
The government may not appeal a decision by the trial court to commit a defendant to a psychiatric facility pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 4241.

United States v. Weyhrauch, 544 F.3d 969 (9th Cir. 2008)
The government failed to provide an adequate certification under 18 U.S.C. § 3731, because it was not signed by the U.S. Attorney himself, nor was there proof that a proper Department of Justice official approved the pretrial appeal.

United States v. Giffen, 473 F.3d 30 (2d Cir. 2006)
The government is authorized to appeal an adverse decision by the district court relating to the Classified Information Procedure Act (CIPA) insofar as the district court’s ruling relates to the admissibility or non-admissibility of classified evidence. In this case, no specific ruling was made by the district court relating to any item of evidence; rather, the court simply held that the defendant’s “public authority defense” would be considered in evaluating the CIPA issues.

United States v. Arce-Jasso, 389 F.3d 124 (5th Cir. 2004)
The district court granted a motion to suppress after the trial was concluded. The government’s appeal of this order more than thirty days after the decision was reached was untimely. The government’s argument—that the time to appeal did not start until the trial court granted the post-verdict judgment of acquittal—was meritless, in light of the clear requirement of § 3731.

United States v. Watson, 386 F.3d 304 (1st Cir. 2004)
The government may not appeal a trial court’s denial of a government motion to appeal. See 18 U.S.C. § 3731. In this case, the prosecutor requested a continuance in order to secure the attendance of a witness who was out of the country and would not return voluntarily. The prosecutor wanted additional time to take the witness’s deposition.

United States v. Pharis, 298 F.3d 228 (3rd Cir. 2002)
During the course of trial, the trial court redacted certain portions of the indictment and limited certain evidence that the government could introduce. The government appealed, arguing that the trial court’s ruling was tantamount to dismissing the indictment. The Third Circuit disagreed. 18 U.S.C. § 3731 only authorizes the government to appeal when the indictment, or some count in the indictment is actually dismissed, not when an evidentiary ruling makes it difficult to prove the case. Another sub-section of § 3731 authorizes the government to appeal when evidence is excluded or suppressed, but that only applies if the appeal is filed prior to trial.

United States v. Hundley, 858 F.2d 58 (2d Cir. 1988)
The trial court wanted to permit the government to appeal his sentencing decision which did not include a government-sought fifteen year enhancement under the Armed Career Criminal Act. In order to facilitate the government’s appeal, the Court sentenced the defendant as the government proposed and then granted an immediate §2255 motion and set aside the sentence. Since the government can appeal a §2255 decision, an appeal was taken to the Second Circuit. The Second Circuit held that this “contrivance of a staged plea and sentence” could not confer jurisdiction on the appellate court.

United States v. Carrillo-Bernal, 58 F.3d 1490 (10th Cir. 1995)

When the government appeals pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §3731, the government must certify that the appeal is not taken for purpose of delay and that the evidence suppressed represents a substantial proof of a material fact in the proceeding. The government may not comply with this requirement with a mere rubber stamp determination that the issue is important. Every district court order which suppresses evidence is not appropriately appealed under §3731.
APPEAL

(Harmless Error / Plain Error)

If the defendant fails to object to a Rule 11 violation during the guilty plea colloquy, any error will be reviewed under a plain error standard of review.

The district court erred in its jury instruction by removing the issue of materiality from the jury’s consideration. The Court reviewed this error under the plain error standard and concluded that the error, though plain, did not affect the fairness, integrity or public reputation of the judicial proceedings. The court noted that an error is considered “plain” if it is obvious at the time of appellate review, not just at the time of trial.

United States v. Lewis, 492 F.3d 1219 (11th Cir. 2007)

A defendant who failed to raise a double jeopardy claim in the district court is not forever foreclosed from raising a double jeopardy claim in the appellate court. He must establish, however, that it was plain error to allow the second trial to proceed. The court noted that there is a difference between forfeiting a claim (such as in this case, where the defendant simply fails to raise it, and thus must overcome the plain error standard of review) and affirmative waiver of an issue, which forecloses appellate review. See United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725 (1993).

United States v. Virgil, 444 F.3d 447 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant has a right to counsel at the sentencing phase of his trial. In this case, the defendant fired his trial counsel and opted to proceed pro se, but the trial court conducted an inadequate Faretta inquiry. Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975). A Faretta violation at trial is not subject to harmless error analysis; nor is a Faretta violation at the sentencing phase subject to harmless error review.

United States v. McKinney, 120 F.3d 132 (8th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was convicted of using a firearm in connection with a drug offense, but the evidence did not satisfy the standard of Bailey v. United States, 116 S.Ct. 501 (1995). Reconsidering an earlier opinion, the Eighth Circuit concluded that this conviction could not survive plain error review.

United States v. Perez, 116 F.3d 840 (9th Cir. 1997)

Even if the defendant proposed the erroneous jury instruction, the appellate court may review the erroneous instruction under a plain error standard. If the error is affirmatively invited (that is, there was a knowing relinquishment of a right), the error may not be reviewed. But where the defendant was not aware of the error in the proposed instruction (here, the prosecution and the trial court were also unaware of the fault in the proposed instruction), the appellate court may review the error for plain error.
United States v. Ross, 77 F.3d 1525 (7th Cir. 1996)

The Seventh Circuit reviewed the “plain error” doctrine that was analyzed in United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725 (1993). In order to establish plain error, the defendant must show: (1) an error was committed; (2) the error was “plain” which means that it was clear or obvious. Whether an error is plain or obvious is considered as of the time of review – not at the time of trial (i.e., not at the time the error was committed); (3) the error must affect the defendant’s “substantial rights.” This is essentially the same test as the “harmless error” analysis, except in this context, the defendant shoulders the burden of establishing the prejudice. In making this showing, the defendant is not required to show that the result would have been different, but for the error; rather, he must demonstrate that the jury verdict in this case was actually affected by the district court’s faulty instruction. Finally, (4) the court must decide, in the exercise of discretion, if the district court’s error seriously affected the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings.

United States v. Frederick, 78 F.3d 1370 (9th Cir. 1996)

Although no single trial error examined in isolation was sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal, the cumulative effect of multiple errors was sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal. The government introduced improper bolstering testimony, improperly vouched for its witnesses and improperly maligned the defense attorney during closing argument. In isolation, none of the errors was enough to spoil the conviction; together, however, the defendant was unfairly prejudiced. This is the logical corollary of the harmless error doctrine which requires the appellate court to affirm a conviction if there is overwhelming evidence of guilt.

United States v. Eason, 920 F.2d 731 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was convicted of five counts relating to a scheme to defraud the Farmers Home Administration. In a separate trial, his father had been convicted of conspiracy to commit the same offense. At the defendant’s trial, a witness was asked by the prosecution whether the defendant’s father had been convicted of committing the same crime which the defendant was charged with. Because the father never testified, this was not the proper subject of impeachment and evidence relating to the conviction of a co-conspirator was inadmissible. The government claimed that the error was harmless, in part because the defendant was convicted of some counts unrelated to his father’s conspiracy. The court disagrees: “Where a defendant is tried on several counts in one trial, highly prejudicial evidence is wrongfully introduced regarding some of those counts, and the jury convicts on those counts, we cannot know whether the jury was able to compartmentalize the evidence and the counts. That is, we cannot know whether the jury applied the improper evidence only to certain counts.” The court also notes that the government should not pride itself on having committed an error which might have been harmless. “One might think he is a better lawyer because he has transgressed a rule and ‘gotten away with it.’ He is not. That we find an error not to be reversible does not transmute that error into a virtue. The error is still an error. Urging the error upon the trial court still violates the United States Attorney’s obligation to the court and to the public.”
APPEAL
(Law of the Case)

United States v. Romero, 136 F.3d 1268 (10th Cir. 1998)

As a matter of Circuit law, the Tenth Circuit adheres to the Law of Case doctrine which provides that if the government agrees to a particular jury instruction regarding an essential element of an offense, the government may not later change its position on appeal. Here, the government agreed at trial that the non-Indian status of the victim was an element of the offense. Given this position, the government could not protest on appeal that this was not an essential element of the offense.
APPEAL
(Magistrate Decision Appeal)

Johnson v. Finn, 665 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 2011)
The Federal Magistrate concluded that the state prosecutor had violated Batson. The district court judge rejected the Magistrate’s finding without conducting a new hearing. This was error. The Magistrate conducted a comparative analysis of the struck juror with other jurors who were not struck and determined that the state prosecutor had struck the juror on the basis of race and not the reasons offered at the habeas hearing.

United States v. Powell, 628 F.3d 1254 (11th Cir. 2010)
If the Magistrate Judge makes a decision that is based in part on a credibility assessment of a witness, the district court judge may not reverse the decision of the Magistrate without undertaking a de novo hearing.
APPEAL
(Moot)

United States v. Koblan, 478 F.3d 1324 (11\textsuperscript{th} Cir. 2007)

If a defendant dies pending the appeal of his conviction, the appeal will be dismissed with instructions to the lower court to vacate the conviction. This also operates to vacate any order of restitution. The Eleventh Circuit rejected the argument that this creates an unfair windfall for the defendant’s heirs.

United States v. Hamdi, 432 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant had completed the service of his sentence and had been deported. On appeal, he challenged the length of his sentence under the Guidelines. The Second Circuit held that the appeal was not moot, because the defendant might try to re-enter the country in the future and the length of his sentence could impact the Attorney General’s decision whether to allow him to re-enter, despite a prior conviction. This case contains a lengthy discussion of the issue of mootness for appellants who have completed their sentences but insist on litigating appellate issues.

Even after a guilty plea and sentencing, a defendant may appeal, challenging the constitutionality of the statute that led to his indictment and conviction.

United States v. St. Hubert, 909 F.3d 335 (11th Cir. 2018)

Same holding as Class: a guilty plea does not waive a challenge to the constitutionality of a statute.

United States v. Carpenter, 494 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2007)

Rule 103(a), F.R.E., provides that once a court rules definitively on a matter pretrial (such as in a motion in limine), there is no need for a party to object to the introduction of that evidence at trial. In this case, the defense continually objected to the prosecution’s introduction of evidence that the defendant’s investment trading practices were very risky and amounted to gambling. The defendant was charged with wire fraud in connection with his investment of client’s money. The trial court told counsel that his continuing objection was noted. During closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly referred to the defendant as a gambler. The objection at trial was sufficient to preserve an objection to the closing argument.

United States v. Lewis, 492 F.3d 1219 (11th Cir. 2007)

A defendant who failed to raise a double jeopardy claim in the district court is not forever foreclosed from raising a double jeopardy claim in the appellate court. He must establish, however, that it was plain error to allow the second trial to proceed. The court noted that there is a difference between forfeiting a claim (such as in this case, where the defendant simply fails to raise it, and thus must overcome the plain error standard of review) and affirmative waiver of an issue, which forecloses appellate review. See United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725 (1993).

Gov’t. of Virgin Islands v. Rosa, 399 F.3d 283 (3rd Cir. 2005)

This case contains a discussion of the difference between a waiver of an issue and the forfeiture of the right. A waiver amounts to a knowing relinquishment of an issue, for example, by way of stipulation, or express waiver of a right. A forfeiture of an issue involves a non-knowing failure to object to certain testimony or the non-knowing failure to object to a jury instruction. In the situation of a waiver, there is no right to appeal. With a forfeited right, however, the plain error standard applies.

United States v. Valez, 354 F.3d 190 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant entered into a proffer agreement that provided that the government could use the defendant’s statements if there was any evidence at trial (including the testimony of the defendant or any other witness) that contradicted his admissions. After plea negotiations broke down, the defendant sought to bar the government’s use of his statements, arguing that only his statements could be impeached with his statements. The court disagreed, holding that if any witness’s testimony was inconsistent with the defendant’s proffer, the government could then use the defendant’s statement. In light of this ruling, the defendant did not call any defense witnesses. On appeal, the government argued that pursuant to Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984), the defendant could not raise this issue on appeal, because the issue did not come to fruition. The Second Circuit disagreed and held that the issue was preserved for appellate consideration. Unlike the situation in Luce, the defendant in this case was not complaining about the lower court’s balancing judgment; instead, he questioned whether the proffer agreement was constitutional. The Second Circuit ultimately ruled against the defendant.
APPEAL
(Spillover Effect)

Wolfe v. Clarke, 691 F.3d 410 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was convicted of murder and given the death penalty. A principal witness at trial was a man named Barber, who was hired by Wolfe to kill the victim. When Barber was first arrested and before he implicated Wolfe in the murder, he was told by a police officer that if he implicated Wolfe, he (Barber) could avoid the death penalty. This conversation was memorialized in a police report that was never produced to the defense. This was a Brady violation that required granting the writ as to the conviction and sentence. The Fourth Circuit also held that the conviction for being involved in a drug conspiracy would also be vacated, because had the Brady information been disclosed, the defendant would likely not have testified at the trial and would not have been in the position of having to deny guilt of the murder, while admitting his role in the drug conspiracy.

United States v. Wright, 665 F.3d 560 (3rd Cir. 2012)

The jury was instructed on different theories under which the defendant could be convicted of honest services mail fraud, including bribery and conflict of interest. The latter, post-Skilling was invalid. Not only were the honest services mail fraud counts reversed, but the traditional mail fraud counts were also reversed because of the prejudicial spillover effect caused by the admission of evidence relating to the honest services counts that would not have been admitted in a traditional mail fraud trial. The Third Circuit explains at some length the procedure for analyzing prejudicial spillover where certain counts of conviction are defective and others are not.

United States v. Bruno, 383 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2004)

Reversal of the defendants’ convictions on charges of Violence in Aid of Racketeering, RICO, and obstruction of justice required vacating a false statement conviction, as well, though there was no legal impediment to the conviction on that count.

United States v. Keating, 147 F.3d 895 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was tried in federal court for bank fraud, securities fraud and related charges. He was previously convicted in state court for the same conduct. Following his conviction in federal court, it was determined that at least one juror, and perhaps more, knew about his state conviction (learning about it during the federal trial), and discussed it with other jurors during deliberations. The trial court properly set aside the verdict and granted a new trial. Moreover, this evidence supported vacating the co-defendant’s conviction, as well. “When a finding of guilt is dependent upon a connection between defendants, collateral information clearly prejudicial to one defendant is not harmless to the other defendant.”

United States v. Wilkins, 139 F.3d 603 (8th Cir. 1998)

After the government rested its case-in-chief, the trial court granted a judgment of acquittal on several counts. Thereafter, the jury acquitted the defendant on some counts and convicted him on one count. The trial court granted defendant’s Motion for New Trial, on the grounds that the spillover effect of the evidence heard on the counts that the judge threw out prejudiced the defendant on the remaining count. The Court of Appeals concluded that this was not an abuse of discretion.

United States v. Richardson, 161 F.3d 728 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

The improper joinder of DC local threat charges with a federal firearms charge was improper. The improper joinder tainted the firearms charge, as well.

United States v. Adkinson, 135 F.3d 1363 (11th Cir. 1998)

The indictment included charges that, at the time, did not amount to an offense. Nevertheless, the trial court allowed the government to proceed through trial with those counts in place, and permitted the government to introduce considerable evidence on those counts. When the case was submitted to the jury after several months of trial, the indictment was redacted and those counts were excised. The Eleventh Circuit reversed the entire conviction. The inclusion of those counts in the indictment rendered the trial fundamentally unfair.

United States v. Tellier, 83 F.3d 578 (2d Cir. 1996)

The defendant’s RICO conspiracy and substantive RICO conviction was reversed because the government introduced improper hearsay evidence (a co-conspirator statement that did not qualify under Rule 801(d)(2)(E)). Because of the insufficiency of evidence of the defendant’s participation in this massive RICO conspiracy, the conviction on the other substantive count, a Hobbs Act count, would also be reversed. Once the RICO count fell, the prejudice on the remaining count was undeniable.

United States v. Rooney, 37 F.3d 847 (2d Cir. 1994)

The defendant’s conviction on an 18 U.S.C. §666 count was reversed based on insufficient evidence. Unrelated counts under 18 U.S.C. §1001 were supported by sufficient evidence, but were tainted by the erroneous conviction of the §666 count. The evidence on the §666 count would not have been admissible if the §1001 counts had been tried alone and the evidence and argument relating to the §666 count was “pejorative.”

United States v. Eason, 920 F.2d 731 (11th Cir. 1990)

The government committed reversible error in introducing evidence of a co-conspirator’s conviction. The co-conspirator did not testify, and thus, there was no need to impeach him. The court reviews the government’s various arguments why the evidence should have been admissible, and also that it was harmless error and rejects each of these arguments. The error was harmful and tainted not only the conviction with regard to counts where the co-conspirator was involved, but also all other counts of the indictment. The court characterized the government’s efforts to introduce this evidence as governmental misconduct.
APPEAL

(Sufficiency of Evidence)

This topic contains cases that explore the standards that appellate courts use in reviewing the sufficiency of the evidence. Cases which evaluate the sufficiency of the evidence that a particular offense was committed can be found under the heading for that crime.

Tanner v. Yukins, 867 F.3d 661 (6th Cir. 2017)

The Sixth Circuit granted a § 2254 writ on the basis that only speculation supported the trial jury’s verdict of guilty of murder. The state court failed to properly apply Jackson v. Virginia.

United States v. Fries, 725 F.3d 1286 (11th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. §922(a)(5), which makes it a crime to sell a firearm to a person in another state unless either the seller or purchaser is a licensed firearms dealer. The purchaser in this case was an undercover ATF agent. There was no evidence at trial that the agent was not a licensed firearms dealer. Because this is an essential element of the offense, the conviction was set aside, even though the defendant did not move for a directed verdict.

United States v. Head, 707 F.3d 1026 (8th Cir. 2013)

In order to prosecute a person for accessory after the fact, the government must prove that some other person actually committed the underlying offense. Proving only that the other person was convicted of the underlying offense is not sufficient. Introducing the principal’s conviction in this case was reversible error and the failure to prove that the principal actually committed the offense resulted in an appellate determination that the government offered insufficient evidence to support the accessory’s conviction, thus barring a retrial. The defendant in the accessory prosecution must also be permitted to offer evidence that she was not aware that the principal committed the offense, or that the principal was acting in self-defense.

O’Laughlin v. O’Brien, 568 F.3d 287 (1st Cir. 2009)

The First Circuit holds that the state court conviction of the defendant for assault and attempted murder was not supported by the evidence. The case contains a discussion of the lack of probativeness of the “consciousness of guilt” evidence upon which the state relied in seeking to support the verdict.

United States v. Miller, 527 F.3d 54 (3rd Cir. 2008)

A timely motion for acquittal under Rule 29(c) (a post-trial motion for judgment of acquittal) will preserve a sufficiency-of-the-evidence claim for review, irrespective of whether the defendant raised the claim at trial.

United States v. Urciuoli, 513 F.3d 290 (1st Cir. 2008)

In this honest services fraud prosecution, the defendants were two hospital administrators who hired a legislator to provide “consulting” services. The evidence relating to what the legislator did in connection with the hospitals was to urge local municipalities to comply with the law regarding where ambulances should take patients; and urging health insurance companies to settle disputed claims with the hospitals. Because urging the municipalities to comply with the law was not improper and did not involve work on pending legislation, this could not be the basis of an honest services fraud prosecution. Pressuring insurance companies was an activity that could be prosecuted as honest services fraud. However, because the jury’s verdict could have relied on the improper theory, the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Moore, 504 F.3d 1345 (11th Cir. 2007)

Pursuant to the 1994 Amendment to Rule 29, if a defendant moves for a judgment of acquittal at the close of the government’s case and the trial court reserves decision on the issue, the ultimate decision must be made based on the record as it stands at that point. Not only the trial court, but the appellate court is restricted in its consideration of the evidence to the record as it existed at that point during the trial. Thus, the defendant’s testimony (which, if not believed by the jury can actually increase the quantum of evidence supporting a conviction) may not be considered in evaluating the sufficiency of the evidence.

United States v. Kenyon, 481 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with several counts of child sex abuse. Two counts focused on allegations that he placed his penis in the victim’s mouth. When the victim was asked about whether it happened on two occasions, she responded, “Twice, maybe.” When asked again whether she knew whether he did it once or twice, she responded that she did not know. This was not sufficient evidence to support convictions on the two counts. “Maybe” does not constitute proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Penaloza-Duarte, 473 F.3d 575 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was a passenger in a car loaded with methamphetamine. When a trooper in Louisiana stopped the car and discovered the drugs, the defendant claimed to be a confidential informant for a California detective, which was, in fact, verified by the California police. Though there was sufficient evidence of the defendant’s knowing possession of the drugs (he acknowledged knowing the drugs were in the car), the evidence was not sufficient to prove that he associated himself with, and engaged in, some affirmative conduct designed to aid the criminal venture, which is an indispensable component of an aiding and abetting conviction. There was no evidence that he loaded, or assisted in loading the car, or that he did any of the driving, or that he even know the location to which the load was heading. A conviction must be reversed if the evidence construed in favor of the verdict gives equal or nearly equal circumstantial support to a theory of guilt and a theory of innocence of the crime charged. A subsequent Fifth Circuit decision abrogated the standard of review in this case. United States v. Vargas-Ocampo, 747 F.3d 299 (5th Cir. 2014).

Patterson v. Haskins, 470 F.3d 645 (6th Cir. 2006)

An appellate court must decide the question of sufficiency of the evidence, even if another error requires that a case be retried.

United States v. Lawrence, 471 F.3d 135 (D.C. Cir. 2006)
When evaluating the sufficiency of evidence on appeal, the appellate court is permitted to consider testimony offered by the defendant in his case. However, the court may not consider against a defendant the testimony offered by a co-defendant in deciding whether the government sustained its burden of proof in cases where the defendant does not introduce evidence.

United States v. Richardson, 421 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 2005)

When there are alternate grounds on which a jury can convict a defendant on one count, an issue often arises on appeal whether a deficiency with regard to one alternative requires that the appellate court set aside the verdict. This may occur where there is a conspiracy to commit more than one offense (for example, the defendant is charged with conspiring to sell drugs and launder the proceeds), or a perjury prosecution with numerous false statements alleged in the same count. This case explains how an appellate court considers these types of challenges: if the appellant contends that the evidence was insufficient with regard to one alternative, then the conviction will not be reversed, because the court will assume that the jury relied on the alternative that was supported by sufficient evidence. But if the appellant contends that the deficiency with regard to one of the alternatives was in the jury instruction, then the appellate court will reverse, because the jury will not be presumed to have known that the jury instruction was erroneous and may have relied on the improper definition to convict the defendant of that alternative means of committing the offense. See generally Griffin v. United States, 502 U.S. 46 (1991); Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957).

United States v. Brown, 459 F.3d 509 (5th Cir. 2006)

When a jury is not asked to indicate the basis for its verdict where there are several objects of a conspiracy, the government “must prove all three theories in order for the court to affirm the convictions.” In this case, the government’s theory on the mail fraud (honest services) theory was flawed and, therefore, the conspiracy count was reversed.

United States v. Lopez, 443 F.3d 1026 (8th Cir. 2006)

In gauging the sufficiency of evidence of a defendant’s participation in a conspiracy, courts have sometimes said that if there is proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of a conspiracy, only “slight evidence” is needed to show the defendant’s participation in the conspiracy. The Eighth Circuit – like many other Circuits – held in this case that the slight evidence rule did not relax the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Rather, the slight evidence rule simply means that the defendant’s role in the conspiracy may be slight, or minor. The evidence, however, must still establish the defendant’s participation beyond a reasonable doubt.

Brown v. Palmer, 441 F.3d 347 (6th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was the driver of a car from which two occupants suddenly jumped out and carjacked another car. He jumped out of his car and ran away. The evidence did not establish that the driver was a participant in the crime.

The defendant was charged with a variety of crimes, including sex tourism. The government relied, on certain counts, on journals that were seized from the defendant and which purported to chronicle his illegal acts with minors in a foreign country. The Second Circuit held that the journals did suffice to prove his guilt on those counts when coupled with other evidence developed in the case. In the initial panel decision, 432 F.3d 401 (2005), the Second Circuit held that the journal was not sufficient, based on the principle that a defendant’s confession is sufficient, even without corroboration to prove his guilt of the crime if the corpus delecti is established in the confession and is reliable. See Opper v. United States, 348 U.S. 84 (1954). The Second Circuit has applied Opper to permit a conviction based on a confession if there is substantial independent evidence which would tend to establish the trustworthiness of the statement. In the rehearing decision, however, the Second Circuit held that there was sufficient corroboration of the journals.

Chein v. Shumsky, 373 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was a doctor who testified as an expert witness in a personal injury case. He was charged with perjury because of his inflated testimony about his credentials. The Ninth Circuit held that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to establish that this testimony was “material” as defined by California law (the substantive law of the state in which the defendant was convicted). The Jackson v. Virginia standard of sufficiency must be applied with explicit reference to the substantive elements of the criminal offense as defined by state law.

United States v. Allen, 127 F.3d 260 (2nd Cir. 1997)

Even if Congress declares that certain facts may create a permissive inference or presumption that a particular crime has been committed, this does not necessarily mean that proof of those facts automatically constitutes sufficient evidence to support a conviction. 18 U.S.C. § 892 outlaws, in part, an extortionate extension of credit which is defined as any extension of credit with respect to which it is the understanding of the creditor and the debtor at the time it is made that delay in making repayment or failure to make repayment could result in the use of violence or other criminal means to cause harm to the person, reputation, or property of any person. In this case, the defendant made a loan to an undercover agent. The defendant accepted collateral and the agent repaid the loan. The agent then borrowed money again, and discussed with the defendant the difficulties the defendant must have in collecting sometimes. The two laughed about this and the defendant explained that that was why he required collateral and further explained that sometimes he took a loss, but his gains exceeded his losses. Then, when prompted by the agent, and not in connection with the pending transaction, the defendant stated that he once beat up someone. This evidence was not sufficient to support a conviction. The agent could not reasonably have had an understanding that if he did not repay the loan, he was subject to being beaten up based on this contrived conversation that he instigated. Regardless of the usurious interest rate and the unenforceability of the loan in court (factors that triggered a permissive presumption of extortion, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 892(b)), this evidence was not sufficient.

United States v. McIntosh, 124 F.3d 1330 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud and money laundering on the basis of his failure to disclose during his bankruptcy proceeding that he had received certain money and deposited some of those funds in a bank account he controlled through an unincorporated business he managed. The indictment also alleged that he failed to disclose his interest in real estate that was actually owned by his father, but at which he lived and paid the mortgage payments. Count One of the indictment charged him with failure to disclose his interest in the unincorporated business and in his house. Because he did not own his house, however, the evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction and though the evidence was sufficient regarding the business, because the jury may have convicted the defendant on the basis of the failure to report the house (the judge instructed the jury that they could convict the defendant if they believed he concealed his interest in either asset), the conviction on this count had to be reversed.

United States v. Winfield, 997 F.2d 1076 (4th Cir. 1993)

Convictions based on theories not submitted to the jury cannot stand.

United States v. Willoughby, 27 F.3d 263 (7th Cir. 1994)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to various drug charges, but requested a bench trial on related firearms charges. In finding the defendant guilty of the firearms offense, the trial judge observed that the proximity of the weapon to the drugs was sufficient evidence to support a §924(c) conviction. The judge went on to complain that but for those appellate decisions, he might find otherwise. The trial judge misconceived his role. While an appellate court might affirm a conviction based on certain facts, that does not mean that the fact-finder (including a judge at a bench trial) must find the defendant guilty given the same facts.

Martineau v. Angelone, 25 F.3d 734 (9th Cir. 1994)

In order to convict a person of child abuse on a theory that the person delayed in seeking medical attention when the child was injured, the state in this case used the following evidence: (1) the two parents (lesbians) gave somewhat different stories to a doctor about the injuries; (2) an expert testified that if there are different stories which are told, the parents are probably abusers; (3) the expert further testified that abusers will often delay in seeking medical attention. This was the only evidence – i.e., theory – that suggested that the parents delayed. This was insufficient as a matter of law to find that the couple did, in fact, delay in reporting the injury to the child.

United States v. Mills, 29 F.3d 545 (10th Cir. 1994)

The defendant, who lived in a house with another woman, was charged with being a felon in possession of weapons which were found in the house. In cases of joint occupancy, where the government seeks to prove constructive possession by circumstantial evidence, it must present evidence to show some connection or nexus between the defendant and the firearm or other contraband. Here, the defendant’s housemate testified that the guns belonged to her and she had put them in the house and in the bag in which they were found. Even if the jury disbelieved everything she said, that disbelief cannot constitute evidence of the crimes charged and somehow substitute for knowing constructive possession in this joint occupancy situation.

The state argued that the jury could have inferred petitioner’s guilty knowledge from its disbelief of his testimony. In fact, several circuits have held that the jury’s disbelief of a defendant’s testimony can, in some limited instances, give rise to a positive inference of guilt. These circuits do not agree, however, on the circumstances that will support such an inference. The Fifth and Eleventh Circuits, for example, hold that if a defendant’s testimony is sufficiently intrinsically incredible or implausible, then the jury can draw an inference of guilt from its disbelief of that testimony. The Second and Ninth Circuits, on the other hand, do not consider the quality of the defendant’s testimony; rather, they require other corroborating evidence of guilt. These circuits would never allow a finding of guilt to be predicated on the jury’s disbelief of the defendant’s testimony, but they would allow the jury’s disbelief of the defendant’s testimony to bolster other, affirmative evidence of guilt. The D.C. Circuit, on the other hand, distinguishes between inferences to be drawn from the witness’s demeanor, and those to be drawn from a defendant’s facially inconsistent or implausible testimony. In this case, the defendant’s testimony was not inherently implausible and in light of the absence of other incriminating evidence, the conviction had to be set aside.

United States v. Thomas, 987 F.2d 697 (11th Cir. 1993)

When a defendant presents evidence following a denial of his Rule 29 motion at the close of the government’s case, the Rule 29 motion is thereby waived. The appellate court may then consider the evidence in both the government’s case and the defense case (and any government rebuttal) in assessing the sufficiency of the evidence. In this case, however, after the Rule 29 motion was denied, the defendant presented evidence on one count, but not another. In situation, the Rule 29 motion is not waived with regard to the count for which the defendant offered no evidence. Therefore, the appellate court may only consider the evidence presented in the government’s case in chief in gauging the sufficiency of the evidence – and not the testimony of co-defendants. There was insufficient evidence presented in the government’s case relating to the count for which the defendant offered no evidence.

United States v. Zeigler, 994 F.2d 845 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

The appellate court concluded that the evidence offered by the government, in addition to the defendant’s testimony and evidence, was insufficient to sustain the conviction. The government argued that the defendant’s demeanor on the stand was the critical factor which led the jury to convict. The appellate court, however, held that this was not “evidence” which could be considered by the appellate court in considering the sufficiency of the evidence.

United States v. Salamanca, 990 F.2d 629 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

Though the appellate court must affirm a conviction where “any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt,” this does not mean that appellate review is “toothless.” Here, the defendant was charged with aiding and abetting his brother’s ruthless attack of a police officer. “The sufficiency of the evidence warrants particular scrutiny when the evidence strongly indicates that a defendant is guilty of a crime other than that for which he was convicted, but for which he was not charged. Under such circumstances, a trier of fact, particularly a jury, may convict a defendant of a crime for which there is insufficient evidence to vindicate its judgment that the defendant is blameworthy. Compelling evidence that a defendant is guilty of some crime is not, however, a cognizable reason for finding a defendant guilty of another crime.” Here, the evidence was insufficient to support a conviction of aiding and abetting the assault. At most, the defendant was an accessory after the fact, or committed misprision.

United States v. Delgado, 631 F.3d 685 (5th Cir. 2011)

Several errors in this case – when considered cumulatively – required that the conviction be set aside: (1) there was insufficient evidence offered to support a deliberate ignorance instruction, because there was no evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the high probability of the criminal activity; (2) the prosecutor improperly stated during closing argument that the defendant, who did not testify, had a “lied to agents when they interviewed her” when she denied guilt. This amounted to an improper statement of the prosecutor’s personal opinion; (3) a government agent testified (non-responsive to a question) that defendant’s trucking company had been involved in other drug trafficking; (4) the absence of a full transcript of the proceeding. In a separate holding, the Fifth Circuit also reversed the defendant’s conspiracy conviction on sufficiency grounds. All these errors, when considered cumulatively, denied the defendant a fair trial.

Greene v. Brigano, 123 F.3d 917 (6th Cir. 1997)

As a matter of due process and equal protection, the state must afford an indigent defendant a trial transcript. See Britt v. North Carolina, 404 U.S. 226 (1971); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956). The fact that the defendant chose to represent himself on appeal did not operate to deprive him of the right to a transcript.
APPEAL
(Waiver of Right to Appeal Sentence)

Burgess v. United States, --- F.3d --- (11th Cir. 2017)
In a § 2255 petition, if the government fails to raise an appeal waiver as a basis to reject a claim, then the court may not sua sponte rely on an appeal waiver (or a collateral attack waiver) to dismiss a claim.

United States v. Sanchez-Colberg, 856 F.3d 180 (1st Cir. 2017)
The waiver in this case provided that if the court accepted the recommendation, then the defendant would waive his right to appeal. The court accepted the recommendation, but imposed a sentence higher than the recommendation on one of the counts, though the total sentence was within the recommended range. The defendant was not barred from appealing given the ambiguity in the waiver.

United States v. Vanderwerff, 788 F.3d 1266 (10th Cir. 2015)
The trial court’s rejection of the plea agreement on the basis that it included an appeal waiver was error.

United States v. Santiago-Burgos, 750 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2014)
The plea agreement appeal-waiver provision stated that the parties agreed on a base offense level, but not the criminal history category. The agreement then provided that the defendant was entitled to ask for a low-end sentence. The trial court determined that eht criminal history placed the defendant in Category II. This was erroneous. The appeal waiver provision did not bar an appeal, even though the actual sentence fell with the range that would have applied even if the court had found the defendant to be in Category I, because the low end of the Category I range was lower than the low end of the Category II range.

United States v. Rollings, 445 F.3d 202 (10th Cir. 2014)
If a defendant challenges the voluntariness of his plea, the entire proceeding should be considered as a whole; that is, the court cannot simply consider the voluntariness of an appeal waiver as a component of the plea and then decide (if the waiver was voluntary) that any further review of the plea is unnecessary.

Hurlow v. United States, 726 F.3d 958 (7th Cir. 2013)
Even with a valid appeal waiver, a defendant may assert an ineffective assistance of counsel claim in a § 2255 proceeding if the claim is that that the defendant would not have entered the plea but for the attorney’s ineffective assistance (for example, the failure to file a Fourth Amendment motion to suppress that would have gutted the prosecution’s case).

United States v. Cong Van Pham, 722 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2013)
The trial court erred in concluding that the defendant did not adequately advise his attorney that he wished to appeal the sentence that was imposed. Counsel was ineffective in failing to file a notice of appeal.
United States v. Murphy-Cordero, 715 F.3d 398 (1st Cir. 2013)

The plea agreement spelled out the recommendations that the government would make regarding the application of the guidelines. There was no mention of a gun enhancement. The appeal waiver provided that the waiver would apply if the trial court accepts this plea agreement and sentences the defendant according to its terms, conditions and recommendations. The trial court concluded that a gun enhancement applied and sentenced above the recommended guideline range envisioned in the plea agreement. The First Circuit held that this negated the appeal waiver entirely and the defendant could appeal any aspect of the sentence, not just the gun enhancement.

United States v. Castro, 704 F.3d 125 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The defendant was convicted of making a false statement when he said that he had not received money from the bribe payor. He later entered a guilty plea to related charges and signed an appeal waiver. With regard to the false statement conviction, what he said was actually true (unbeknownst to him), because the money was paid by a government agent posing as a confederate of the bribe payer. The Third Circuit held that the conviction for making a false statement could not be sustained, because what the defendant said was true and, moreover, it would be a manifest injustice to enforce the appeal waiver on this count of the conviction.

United States v. Davis, 689 F.3d 349 (4th Cir. 2012)

An appeal waiver may not be enforced where the district court provided inaccurate information at the plea colloquy about the maximum sentence that could be imposed.

United States v. Gonzalez-Melchor 648 F.3d 959 (9th Cir. 2011)

A judge who actively negotiated an appeal waiver in exchange for a shorter sentence violated Rule 11 and rendered the appeal waiver unenforceable.

Dowell v. United States, 694 F.3d 898 (7th Cir. 2012)

Failure to file a notice of appeal when asked to do so by the defendant is ineffective assistance of counsel which can be raised even if the defendant’s plea agreement provided for a waiver of the right to bring a collateral attack.

United States v. Boneshirt, 662 F.3d 509 (8th Cir. 2011)

Because the trial court failed to advise the defendant about the appeal waiver during the plea colloquy, the waiver was not enforceable.

United States v. Ortiz-Garcia, 665 F.3d 279 (1st Cir. 2011)

The trial court failed to properly advise the defendant of the possible maximum sentence that he faced. This rendered the plea and the appeal waiver void.

United States v. Divens, 650 F.3d 343 (4th Cir. 2011)

The defendant fully accepted responsibility for his crimes and did so in a timely manner. However, he declined to sign a “waiver of the right to appeal” provision in the plea agreement. Because of that refusal, the government refused to move for the additional one-level acceptance of responsibility reduction. The Fourth Circuit held that the government could not refuse to file for the one-level reduction based on the defendant’s failure to waive the right to appeal. The discretion that the government enjoys in deciding whether to move for a reduction pursuant to § 5K1.1, is not mirrored in the discretion it has under § 3E1.1(b). The Fourth Circuit noted contrary authority in the Ninth, First and Fifth Circuits.

United States v. Bowman, 634 F.3d 357 (6th Cir. 2011)

The appellate waiver permitted the defendant to appeal a sentence that was above the Guideline range. The court sentenced the defendant within the range, but ordered that the sentence run consecutive to a state sentence. The Sixth Circuit held that the appeal waiver did not bar challenging the trial court’s failure to even consider a concurrent sentence. See also United States v. Stearns, 479 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2007).

United States v. Woltmann, 610 F.3d 37 (2d Cir. 2010)

The defendant signed a plea agreement that provided that the guideline range would result in a sentence with a low end of 18 months. The defendant then cooperated in another investigation and the government filed a § 5K1.1 motion urging a below-guideline sentence. The trial judge refused, stating that this constituted an abrogation of the plea agreement. The defendant appealed his sentence and the Second Circuit held that the trial court clearly erred. Moreover, an appeal waiver was unenforceable where the plea agreement was frustrated by the lower court.

United States v. Almany, 598 F.3d 238 (6th Cir. 2010)

Because the appeal waiver was not discussed during the plea colloquy, it was not enforceable. Judgment Vacated on Other Grounds by Supreme Court in light of Abbott and Gould; though the appeal waiver was, unenforceable, the merits of the appeal did not survive Supreme Court scrutiny.

United States v. Madigan, 592 F.3d 621 (4th Cir. 2010)

The trial court failed to discuss the appellate waiver with the defendant during the plea colloquy. Though the appellate waiver was plainly set forth in the plea agreement, this is not sufficient to make it enforceable absent a discussion of the waiver during the plea colloquy.

United States v. Padilla-Colon, 578 F.3d 23 (1st Cir. 2009)

Though the written waiver in the plea agreement was sufficient to waive the defendant’s right to appeal, the plea colloquy (an essential component of a valid waiver) included this comment by the judge: “Depending on the facts the court finds and the sentence it eventually imposes, both you and the government may appeal the sentence in this case subject that waiver.” This ambiguous language did not sufficiently apprise the defendant of the rights he was waiving and the defendant’s statement that he understood did not establish that he did, in fact, understand the true scope of the waiver.

United States v. Vazquez, 558 F.3d 1224 (11th Cir. 2009)

The defendant’s plea agreement contained the typical appeal waiver language which provided that the waiver was inapplicable if the government appealed the sentence. In this case, the defendant was initially sentenced and the government appealed. The case was remanded and the defendant was sentenced again, but the government did not appeal. Could the defendant appeal? The Eleventh Circuit concluded that any ambiguity in the plea agreement would be resolved in favor of the defendant and permitted the defendant to appeal the second sentence, even though the government did not appeal that sentence.

United States v. Lovelace, 565 F.3d 1080 (8th Cir. 2009)

If a defendant appeals the government’s breach of a plea agreement after failing to challenge the breach in the lower court and after signing an appeal waiver, the appellate court will consider the allegation of breach under the plain error standard of review.

United States v. Sura, 511 F.3d 654 (7th Cir. 2007)

The district court’s failure to inquire about, and advise the defendant of the consequences of the appeal waiver as required by Rule 11(b)(1)(N) was plain error that negated the voluntariness of the guilty plea.

United States v. Jacobo Castillo, 496 F.3d 947 (9th Cir. 2007)

A waiver of appeal does not divest the appellate court of jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

United States v. Gordon, 480 F.3d 1205 (10th Cir. 2007)

A plea agreement that effectively waived the defendant’s right to appeal the sentence did not preclude his appeal of the order of restitution.

United States v. Palmer, 456 F.3d 484 (5th Cir. 2006)

An appeal waiver that provides that there will be no appeal of the sentence does not preclude an appeal that targets the legitimacy of the guilty plea. In this case, the factual basis for the offense of possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime was insufficient.

United States v. Adams, 448 F.3d 492 (2d Cir. 2006)

The factual basis of the plea focused entirely on the defendant’s role in a marijuana conspiracy. The plea did not support a sentence that focused on his participation in a cocaine conspiracy. The court also held that the “appeal waiver” did not bar a challenge to the underlying plea.

United States v. Story, 439 F.3d 226 (5th Cir. 2006)

An appeal waiver does not deprive the appellate court of jurisdiction. Thus, if the government does not assert the waiver, the waiver is waived.

United States v. Harris, 434 F.3d 767 (5th Cir. 2005)

The appeal waiver barred an appeal unless the sentence was in excess of the Guidelines did not operate to bar an appeal that challenged the application of the wrong Guideline in imposing sentence.

Gomez-Diaz v. United States, 433 F.3d 788 (11th Cir. 2005)

Even though there was a limited waiver of appeal in the plea agreement, counsel was ineffective in failing to file an appeal at the request of the defendant. The trial court erred in holding that the defendant (i.e., habeas petitioner) was required to show a non-frivolous appeal issue in order to prevail on his ineffective claim.

United States v. Hamdi, 432 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant agreed that his sentence was governed by the Guidelines and also waived his right to appeal if the sentence was lower than 21 months. He was sentenced to 24 months. Though he agreed that he would be sentenced under the Guidelines, the Second Circuit held that this agreement did not bar an appeal predicated on Booker.

Washington v. Lampert, 422 F.3d 864 (9th Cir. 2005)

An appeal waiver and collateral attack waiver may not be enforced to the extent that a defendant attempts to collaterally attack his counsel’s effective assistance in allowing him to enter into such an agreement.

United States v. Murdock, 398 F.3d 491 (6th Cir. 2005)

In evaluating whether there was plain error in failing to advise the defendant of an appeal waiver, the standard of United States v. Vonn, 535 U.S. 55 (2002), applies. Thus, the defendant is not required to prove that he would not have entered a guilty plea, but for the appeal waiver (i.e., the United States v. Domínguez Benitez, 542 U.S. 74 (2004), standard). In this case, the error was plain, because the district court violated Rule 11. The defendant’s substantial rights were affected, because there was no showing on the record that he was aware of the waiver. The violation affected the fairness and integrity of the process, because the right to appeal is of critical importance in the judicial system. The government’s failure to refer to the appeal waiver when summarizing the plea agreement was a fact of some importance to the Sixth Circuit.

United States v. Arellano-Gallegos, 387 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2004)

The trial court failed to advise the defendant about the nature of his appeal waiver and it would, therefore, not be enforced.

United States v. Hahn, 359 F.3d 1315 (10th Cir. 2004 (en banc))

The Tenth Circuit concludes that a waiver of appeal by a defendant does not deprive the appellate court of jurisdiction. The court did not hold that such waivers would be void – it simply held that there was no prohibition on the court exercising jurisdiction over the case. The court held that in determining whether to enforce a waiver, the court would assess whether the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived his appellate rights, whether the appeal falls within the scope of the waiver of appellate rights, and whether enforcing the waiver would result in a miscarriage of justice. The court also outlined the proper procedure the government should follow in seeking to enforce the waiver.

Chesney v. United States, 367 F.3d 1055 (8th Cir. 2004)

A waiver of the right to appeal a sentence does not foreclose the right to challenge the attorney’s ineffectiveness. The court noted, however, that the defendant could waive his Sixth Amendment right, as well; but he did not do so in this case.

United States v. Johnson, 347 F.3d 412 (2d Cir. 2003)
Though an appeal waiver is generally enforceable, if the defendant claims a constitutional infirmity in the sentencing, the waiver will be strictly construed in order to permit a review of the constitutional claim.

United States v. Andis, 333 F.3d 886 (8th Cir. 2003)

An appeal waiver does not bar an appeal of an illegal sentence. In this case, the court defined an illegal sentence as a sentence that is outside the statutory limits. Other courts have excepted cases in which there would be a miscarriage of justice if the appeal waiver were to be enforced. The court did not find that the sentence in this case was illegal.

United States v. Stubbs, 279 F.3d 402 (6th Cir. 2002)

Defendant was charged with conspiring to possess firearms in connection with a drug offense (18 U.S.C. §924(o)) but entered a guilty plea to possessing a firearm in connection with a drug offense (§ 924(c)). This tainted the guilty plea and as a matter of law it could not have been a knowing and voluntary plea. Not only do these statutes have different elements (one is a conspiracy, the other is a substantive offense), but they also have different sentence provisions. Finally, the court held that an appeal waiver did not apply. Here, the plea agreement itself was invalid; not just the sentence.
ARMED ROBBERY / BANK ROBBERY

SEE ALSO: HOBBS ACT

In order to trigger the 10-year mandatory minimum sentence under 18 U.S.C. § 2113(e), substantial movement of the robbery victim is not necessary. Even requiring a victim to move within the bank is sufficient to invoke the mandatory minimum.

United States v Ornelas, 906 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 2018)
In a case involving a charge of attempted robbery, the government must prove that the defendant had the specific intent to rob and that the force he used was designed to accomplish the robbery. The trial court’s failure to charge on the specific intent element of the offense was plain error.

United States v. Carr, 761 F.3d 1068 (9th Cir. 2014)
The defendant participated in a meeting with other conspirators during which they discussed robbing a credit union. There was no discussion of using guns and no guns were displayed or visible at the meeting. This defendant did not go into the credit union and was not the getaway driver, though he was parked nearby. The district court found that there was sufficient evidence that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy to rob the credit union, but the evidence was insufficient to prove that he knew that guns would be used, even under the Pinkerton doctrine. The Ninth Circuit affirmed.

United States v. Franco-Samtiago, 681 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2012)
The defendant was charged with being a member of a conspiracy that participated in five armed robberies. Only the last robbery occurred within five years of the return of the indictment. The government agreed that the defendant had no involvement in the first three robberies. The evidence was sufficient to demonstrate his participation in the fourth. After he was convicted of the conspiracy count, the government conceded at sentencing that he was not involved in the fifth robbery. The First Circuit concluded that the defendant only agreed to participate in one conspiracy and that he could not be held responsible for participating in the overarching conspiracy that involved several other defendants and the other four robberies. Though he agreed to join the conspiracy, the conspiracy that he agreed to join only involved the one robbery that occurred outside the statute of limitations. NOTE: The United States Supreme Court, in Musacchio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1737 (2016), held that raising a statute of limitations defense for the first time on appeal was too late and not subject to plain error review.

United States v. Thornton, 539 F.3d 741 (7th Cir. 2008)
In order to be convicted of attempted bank robbery under the first paragraph of 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a), the government must show actual force and violence or intimidation. This is true even in an attempt case.

Brown v. Palmer, 441 F.3d 347 (6th Cir. 2006)
The defendant was the driver of a car from which two occupants suddenly jumped out and carjacked another car. He jumped out of his car and ran away. The evidence did not establish that the driver was a participant in the crime.

United States v. Sandles, 469 F.3d 508 (6th Cir. 2006)

In this bank robbery trial, the government failed to adequately prove that the bank was FDIC insured, an essential element of a bank robbery, or bank fraud offense.

United States v. Burton, 425 F.3d 1008 (5th Cir. 2005)

The defendant forced the victim to withdraw money from an ATM and took the money from her. This does not amount to bank robbery under 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a). The money was taken from the victim, not the bank.

United States v. Santos, 449 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendants tried to rob an undercover drug agent by flashing fake DEA badges. The use of the fake badge did not amount to “force” in support of a Hobbs Act robbery charge. With regard to one alleged co-conspirator, moreover, the evidence was insufficient to prove that that the defendant was a knowing participant in the conspiracy to rob the victim. Mere presence and association with the other conspirators was all that was established.

United States v. Ballew, 369 F.3d 450 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged under 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a) with “by force, violence an intimidation, intentionally attempt to take from the person and presence of another, money [of a bank].” The evidence established that he did enter the bank with the intention of robbing it (and arguably did attempt to rob the bank), but he never used any force or intimidation. He simply was waiting on a couch in anticipation of meeting with a manager, then left and later was stopped by the police when he returned the bank. He never actually used any force or intimidation. This does not qualify as “using force or intimidation in an attempt to rob a bank.” Attempted intimidation does not suffice.
ARREST

SEE: SEARCH AND SEIZURE (ARREST)
SEARCH AND SEIZURE (TERRY STOPS)
ARSON AND EXPLOSIVES

The United States Supreme Court held that the federal offense that outlaws possessing explosives during the commission of a felony offense does not require that the explosives be “in relation to” the felony. All that is required is that the explosives are possessed at the same time that the felony is being committed. The Ninth Circuit’s contrary conclusion was reversed.

Arson of a private residence does not affect interstate commerce for purposes of the federal arson statute’s jurisdictional element, even though the residence was insured and mortgaged through out-of-state entities and heated with out-of-state natural gas.

United States v. McBride, 724 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 2013)

The crime of arson is not proven simply with evidence that the defendant used an accelerant to burn down a building. It is not arson unless the conduct is committed maliciously. It is not a crime, for example, to burn down an old shed in your backyard, even with the use of an accelerant. There must be some proof of malice, such as the fact that the building is no owned by the defendant, or that the building, if owned by the defendant, was burned down for the purpose of defrauding an insurance company, or to harm or injure occupants. The evidence in this case was not sufficient to support a conviction.

United States v. Severns, 559 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was convicted of mail fraud (§ 1341), arson to commit mail fraud (§ 844(h)), arson to commit wire fraud (§ 844(h)), and arson (§ 844(i)). The Fifth Circuit held that consecutive sentences for arson and use of fire to commit mail fraud and mail fraud are permissible. However, consecutive sentences for use of fire to commit mail fraud and use of fire to commit wire fraud are not permissible if there is only one fire.

United States v. Craft, 484 F.3d 922 (7th Cir. 2007)

While affirming several counts of conviction, the Seventh Circuit held that the arson of the Hells Angels “clubhouse” was not a federal offense, because the clubhouse was not sufficiently connected to interstate commerce. While some of the members’ dues were used to pay for members’ interstate trips, this was not a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce.

United States v. Davies, 394 F.3d 182 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The defendant burned a church which bought supplies from out-of-state and graduated students who moved out-of-state. This was insufficient evidence to establish an impact on interstate commerce. Note that this was an arson prosecution, not a prosecution under the church burning statute, as in Ballinger, infra.

United States v. Lamont, 330 F.3d 1249 (9th Cir. 2003)

Arson of a church will not necessarily amount to a federal offense, because of the absence of a sufficient nexus to interstate commerce, even if members of the church come from other states, the church has membership in an interstate organization, and there are interstate transfers of church funds.

United States v. Ballinger, 312 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2002)

The Eleventh Circuit panel initially held that there was insufficient interstate commerce evidence to convict the defendant of burning down several churches in rural Georgia in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 247(a)(1). The statute expressly requires proof that the arson be “in or affect interstate commerce.” When purely intrastate activity is involved and the government argues that this activity affected interstate commerce, the proof must demonstrate a “substantial effect” on interstate commerce. REVERSED by the en banc court January 10, 2005. 395 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc). The en banc court upheld the conviction on the theory that the defendant was traveling from state-to-state and burning churches wherever he went, thus satisfying the interstate commerce requirement.

United States v. Spruill, 118 F.3d 221 (4th Cir. 1997)

Though the statute is worded awkwardly, 18 U.S.C. § 844(e) outlaws making threatening mailings or phone calls, which threaten physical injury by means of fire or explosives. The government argued, unsuccessfully, that the statute outlawed any threatening communication, one example being through the use of fire or explosive. The court concluded that only threats involving fire or explosives are covered by the statute.

United States v. Yoakam, 116 F.3d 1346 (10th Cir. 1997)

The evidence was insufficient to support defendant’s arson conviction. Though the evidence was sufficient to prove that the fire was caused by arson, the evidence was insufficient to show that the defendant was the perpetrator. Even if there is evidence of financial motive, this is not sufficient to convict the defendant.

United States v. Denalli, 73 F.3d 328 (11th Cir. 1996), modified at 90 F.3d 444

The defendant burned down the house of his next door neighbor. Because the neighbors’ house was not used for, and did not affect, interstate commerce, a conviction under 18 U.S.C. §844(i) could not be sustained. The court concluded that, to sustain a conviction under the “affecting interstate commerce” theory, the government would have to prove that the residence had a substantial effect on interstate commerce.
ASSAULT

Cates v. United States, 882 F.3d 731 (7th Cir. 2018)

The offense of aggravated sexual abuse, 18 U.S.C. § 2241(a), requires as an element the use of force. This element requires more than coercion, psychological coercion, or even force inferred from a disparity in size between the defendant and the victim. Instructing the jury on aggravated sexual abuse in this case was error and trial counsel’s failure to object was prejudicial error.

United States v. Wolfname, 835 F.3d 1214 (8th Cir. 2016)

Assault is an element of the offense of resisting or interfering with an officer under 18 U.S.C. § 111(a)(1). Omitting this element of the offense from the jury instruction was plain error which required setting aside the verdict, even absent an objection from trial counsel.

United States v. Zabawa, 719 F.3d 555 (6th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with assaulting a federal corrections officer in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 111. That offense requires proof that the defendant “inflicted” an injury to the officer. In this case, the defendant assaulted the officer and the officer then “head-butted” the defendant which caused the officer’s injury over his eye. While the defendant’s conduct may have caused the injury to the officer, he did not inflict the injury. Conviction reversed.

United States v. Acosta-Sierra, 690 F.3d 1111 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant threw a rock at a Border Patrol agent. The agent did not see the rock as it was thrown and was not aware of the defendant having thrown the rock until after it hit a gate near where the agent was walking. When the agent turned around and saw the defendant, he was not holding anything in his hand and the agent was not then fearful of an assault from the defendant. When the defendant was arrested, he hit one of the agents on the side of the head. The rock throwing incident could not be prosecuted under the “reasonable apprehension of harm” prong of assault, because the agent was not aware of the rock throwing until it was over. The offense could have been prosecuted under the attempted battery prong of the assault statute, however.

United States v. Davis, 690 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2012)

Canvassing the law relating to the definition of assault, 18 U.S.C. § 111, the Second Circuit held that the defendant must have engaged in conduct, not involving touching, “committed by either a willful attempt to inflict injury upon the person of another, or by a threat to inflict injury upon the person of another which, when coupled with an apparent present ability causes a reasonable apprehension of immediate bodily harm.” The evidence was not sufficient in this case. The defendant basically resisted arrest by making it difficult to handcuff him.

United States v. Hertular, 562 F.3d 433 (2d Cir. 2009)

The evidence was insufficient to support an assault/threat conviction of the defendant. Though the defendant did make a threat to the agents, the requirement that the threat represent an “imminent” threat of harm was not established.
United States v. Chapman, 528 F.3d 1215 (9th Cir. 2008)

18 U.S.C. § 111(a) makes it a crime to forcibly resist, oppose, impede and interfere with a federal officer engaged in official duties. The Ninth Circuit holds that the conduct must at least amount to an assault, in order to sustain a defendant’s conviction. Merely “tensing up” when an officer attempts to escort the defendant to a location is not enough to sustain a conviction.

United States v. Temple, 447 F.3d 130 (2d Cir. 2006)

Assaulting a federal officer is outlawed by 18 U.S.C. § 111. Though an actual touching is not required, if the offense is limited to a threat of physical injury, the threat must be such as to represent an imminent threat of violence. Leaving a voice message on someone’s phone does not amount to an assault under § 111.
ASSIMILATIVE CRIMES ACT

The ACA applies when a person is guilty of an act or omission on a federal enclave which is not made a crime by any enactment of Congress, but is made a crime by the state in which the enclave is located. The purpose of the ACA is to “fill in any gaps” where there is no federal criminal law governing conduct on a federal enclave. To determine whether a particular state statute is assimilated, a court must first ask the question, “Is the defendant’s act or omission made punishable by any enactment of Congress?” If the answer is “no,” then the state law is assimilated. If the answer is “yes,” the court must ask the further question of whether the federal statutes that apply to the act or omission reveal a legislative intent to preclude application of the state law in question because the federal statutes reveal an intent to “occupy so much of a field” as would exclude use of the particular state statute. Thus, where, as here, a soldier kills a child on an army base, 18 U.S.C. §1111, which outlaws second-degree murder on a federal enclave, controls, rather than the state’s first-degree murder provision.

United States v. Davenport, 131 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 1997)

Wisconsin's DUI statute, for first offenders, does not constitute a "crime" under Wisconsin law; for a first offense, only civil penalties are available. The Assimilative Crimes Act only assimilates a state's criminal law. Therefore, a defendant's first DUI offense on federal property cannot be prosecuted under the state law. Also, drunk driving on a military base is punishable under federal regulations, 32 C.F.R. § 634.25(f), where the offense occurs in a state, like Wisconsin, where the first DUI is considered a civil matter.

United States v. Sylve, 135 F.3d 680 (9th Cir. 1998)

The State of Washington provides for "deferred prosecution" in the case of first time DUI offenders. The Ninth Circuit concluded that this is a form of punishment that is incorporated into federal law through the Assimilative Crimes Act.

United States v. Harris, 27 F.3d 111 (4th Cir. 1994)

The North Carolina statute which provides for a maximum sentence of 24 hours for a DUI under certain conditions must be followed by a federal court exercising jurisdiction under the Assimilative Crimes Act, notwithstanding the Sentencing Guidelines.

United States v. King, 824 F.2d 313 (4th Cir. 1987)

The defendants were convicted under the Assimilative Crimes Act for a crime committed on federal land. A special assessment for a victim’s assistance fund was imposed. The Fourth Circuit holds that no such assessment may be imposed unless a similar penalty was available under the state law being applied.

United States v. Palmer, 956 F.2d 189 (9th Cir. 1991)

36 C.F.R. §4.23 outlaws DUI in a national park. The government may not proceed on a more strict state law under the Assimilative Crimes Act.

United States v. Garcia, 893 F.2d 250 (10th Cir. 1989)

The Sentencing Guidelines apply to violations of the Assimilative Crimes Act, but the sentence imposed must be within the penalty range authorized by the applicable state law.
ATTEMPTED CRIMES

United States v. Jett, 908 F.3d 252 (7th Cir. 2018)

The police reasonably believed that the defendants had committed two armed robberies and began to follow them. The police observed two of the defendants enter a stolen car and start driving towards a credit union. The police arrested them. In the car were masks and an air pistol. This evidence was not sufficient to convict the defendants of attempted armed robbery.

United States v Ornelas, 906 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 2018)

In a case involving a charge of attempted robbery, the government must prove that the defendant had the specific intent to rob and that the force he used was designed to accomplish the robbery. The trial court’s failure to charge on the specific intent element of the offense was plain error.

United States v. Howard, 766 F.3d 414 (5th Cir. 2014)

The Fifth Circuit upheld the defendant’s conviction for attempted enticement of a minor to engage in sexual activity in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b). The defendant communicated with an undercover agent about having sex with the agent’s daughter. There were several communications and the defendant instructed the agent to have sexual contact with the daughter to get her ready (groomed) and also sent a nude photo of himself. However, when the agent suggested that the defendant travel to meet “her” and the daughter, he refused. The Fifth Circuit held that the evidence was sufficient to support an attempt conviction, but just barely and that this case represented the outer limit of what could be prosecuted as an attempt. Id. at 427.

United States v. Goldtooth, 754 F.3d 763 (9th Cir. 2014)

Though the crime of armed robbery is a general intent offense, the crime of attempted armed robbery requires proof of the specific intent to commit the offense. A robbery offense only requires proof of an intentional taking, without additional proof of the intent to steal. Attempted robbery, however, requires proof of the specific intent to take the property by force, violence or intimidation.

United States v. Thomas, 690 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2012)

Venue for the attempt crime was not proper in Texas. Though the conspiracy offense could be prosecuted in Texas based on the conduct of defendant’s co-conspirators, the attempt offense could only be prosecuted where the defendant took substantial steps toward the commission of the crime.

United States v. Chi Tong Kuok, 671 F.3d 931 (9th Cir. 2012)

It is not a violation of the Arms Expert Control Act to attempt to cause another person to violate the AECA. It is a crime to export or attempt to export a defense article, but it is not a crime to attempt to cause another person to do so.

United States v. Foy, 641 F.3d 455 (10th Cir. 2011)
Venue for an attempt crime is not proper in the district where other people involved in the attempted offense engage in the preparatory conduct if the defendant himself does not engage in such conduct in that district. Venue by imputation is appropriate in a conspiracy case, but not in an attempt case.

United States v. Gladish, 536 F.3d 646 (7th Cir. 2008)

The defendant communicated with a person he believed was a young girl (actually an undercover agent) in an Internet chatroom. He suggested that at some point in the future, they should engage in sex. The Seventh Circuit held that this “hot air” did not qualify as enticement to engage in prohibited sexual activity in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b). Equating the enticement statute to an attempted crime, the court held that such talk did not involve a “substantial step” toward the commission of the crime. Judge Posner quoted T.S. Elliot: “Between the Conception; And the Creation; Between the Emotion; And the Response; Falls the Shadow.”

United States v. Kenyon, 481 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2007)

Attempt crimes require proof of specific intent to commit the crime. Consequently, a defendant may defend on the basis that he did not intend to commit the crime, even if the crime itself is not a specific intent crime. In this case, the defendant was charged with attempt to commit child sex abuse. He claimed that he was too intoxicated to have that intent. Even though intoxication is not a defense to the crime of sex abuse, it is a defense to the crime of attempt to commit sex abuse. There was sufficient evidence of the defendant’s intoxication in this case to warrant the giving of an intoxication instruction and the failure to do so was reversible error as to those counts.

United States v. Cooper, 121 F.3d 130 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The defendant sold a bag of what was claimed to be cocaine to an informant on one occasion. The substance turned out to be procaine, which is not a controlled substance. The defendant and the informant then planned another transaction, but the defendant detected the surveillance and aborted the transaction. He then threatened the informant and was charged with tampering with a witness. To be guilty of that offense, the underlying crime must be a federal offense. No such federal offense existed in this case. The defendant was not guilty of attempted sale of cocaine, because he knew the substance he was selling was not a controlled substance and therefore he did not "attempt" to commit that crime.

United States v. Ballew, 369 F.3d 450 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged under 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a) with “by force, violence an intimidation, intentionally attempt to take from the person and presence of another, money [of a bank].” The evidence established that he did enter the bank with the intention of robbing it (and arguably did attempt to rob the bank), but he never used any force or intimidation. He simply was waiting on a couch in anticipation of meeting with a manager, then left and later was stopped by the police when he returned the bank. He never actually used any force or intimidation. This does not qualify as “using force or intimidation in an attempt to rob a bank.” Attempted intimidation does not suffice.
The defendant boarded a domestic flight to another city in the U.S. and was then going to connect to a foreign flight. He did not report the currency in his possession. The government could not proceed to forfeit the money on the theory that the defendant was “attempting” to violate the CTR laws because the law could not be violated until the defendant attempted to board the international flight and the offense was not “attempted” prior to that time.

The defendants agreed on the terms of a heroin purchase, but stayed home at the appointed hour of the sale. The Court holds that they did not attempt to possess heroin because they did not take the required substantial step toward completion of the crime. The verbal agreement alone does not suffice to constitute the substantial step needed to prosecute for the attempt to commit the substantive offense.

The defendant was charged with attempted possession with intent to distribute cocaine. He made numerous attempts to obtain money from a bank, and his supplier was arrested in possession of a kilogram of cocaine. The evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of attempting to possess that cocaine. He might have been attempting to obtain money to pay a back bill for cocaine; he might have been attempting to obtain money to flee the area (he was being sought by the sheriff and his wife). Even more importantly, it was far from clear that he intended to purchase the cocaine in order to distribute it, as opposed to consuming it.

The defendant left money in an automated teller machine, which generally will cause a bank employee to come to the bank to fix the problem. The defendant’s intent was to rob the bank when the serviceman arrived. The defendant was arrested in his car, apparently waiting for the serviceman to arrive. The defendant’s conduct did not amount to a substantial step toward the commission of the crime. Thus, he could not be convicted of attempted bank robbery. The defendant had done little more than simply “make an appointment” with a person he intended to rob.

The defendant testified that he put a “stick-up” note in an empty bag in front of a bank teller because he wanted to be arrested and given psychiatric care, which he could not obtain through more conventional means. The trial court refused to instruct the jury that, in order to be convicted of attempted bank robbery, the defendant must intend to take the property or money. This was reversible error.

The defendant was observed wearing a blond wig and sitting in a van, with the engine running, approximately 200 feet from a bank. The defendant admitted after his arrest that he had planned to rob the bank, but his conduct was not a “substantial step” toward the commission of the bank robbery, and his conviction of attempted bank robbery was reversed.

The defendants were assembling disguises and weapons and were “casing” a bank. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit holds that this is not sufficient, standing alone, to convict one of attempted robbery of the bank. The conduct of the defendants neither demonstrated intent to commit bank robbery nor constituted a substantial step toward the commission of the crime. Both are prerequisites for an attempt conviction.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES

(Conflicts)

Absent a showing of actual prejudice, a defendant is not entitled to relief even if he can show that his attorney suffered from a conflict of interest. In this case, the judge knew (but the defendant did not), that the appointed counsel who was representing the defendant in this murder case had previously represented the murder victim in a juvenile case. The defendant claimed in his habeas corpus petition that he was entitled to a presumption of prejudice, as in Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475 (1978). The Supreme Court held that there would be no presumption of prejudice. In addition, the Court held that proving an actual adverse impact might not be enough. Though that was the standard set forth in Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335 (1980), the Court suggested that the standard set forth in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984) might be the appropriate standard: a reasonable probability that, but for counsel’s unprofessional errors, the result of the proceedings would have been different.

In this 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court holds that the trial court acted within its discretion in denying a defendant the right to choose as his attorney the attorney for a co-conspirator who had entered a plea of guilty. The Court held, “The District Court must be allowed substantial latitude in refusing waivers of conflicts of interest not only in those rare cases where an actual conflict may be demonstrated before the trial, but in the more common cases where a potential conflict exists which may or may not burgeon into an actual conflict as the trial progresses.” The Court recognized that there is a presumption in favor of the petitioner’s counsel of choice, but the presumption may be overcome by a showing of a serious potential for conflict. The Court concludes, finally, that the District Court was not required to make this finding, but that it was within the Court’s discretion to do so. Dissenting, Justices Marshall, Brennan, Stevens and Blackmun sharply criticized the majority’s opinion.

The trial court erred in failing to permit defense counsel to withdraw because of an internal conflict with the client. The client had filed a bar complaint against the attorney and the evidence was clear that there had been a total breakdown in communication. The attorney had also missed a critical deadline that prompted the defendant to lose faith in the attorney.

Taylor v. Grounds, 721 F.3d 809 (7th Cir. 2013)

The defense attorney represented two brothers in a murder trial. Certain witnesses would have been favorable to one defendant, but not the other. The attorney did not call these witnesses. This was a clear conflict.

United States v. McKeighan, 685 F.3d 956 (10th Cir. 2012)

Defense counsel was subpoenaed to produce fee information to the grand jury. Later, at a hearing, the attorney agreed to pay the fee into the registry of the court. Ultimately, the lawyer withdrew from the case. The Tenth Circuit held that this did not violate the defendant’s right to counsel.

Salts v. Epps, 676 F.3d 468 (5th Cir. 2012)

A conflict of interest was apparent in one attorney’s representation of a husband and wife in this embezzlement case. The attorney brought the conflict to the attention of the trial judge on the eve of trial. The judge’s decision to proceed to trial was error and the conviction was vacated in this habeas decision. In Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475 (1978), the Supreme Court held that automatic reversal was required where a potential conflict of interest is brought to the trial court’s attention, but is not investigated, in the situation where one attorney is representing two defendants.

Morris v. Beard, 633 F.3d 185 (3rd Cir. 2011)

The defendant, who was charged with murder, was represented at his state murder trial by a lawyer who was also representing the defendant’s brother in a civil contingency-fee case. At trial, there was considerable evidence that the brother, not the defendant, was the person who shot the victim. At no time was there an on-the-record conflict waiver, or even any indication that the trial judge was aware of the conflict. At the habeas hearing, the lawyer said that the defendant was aware that the lawyer was also representing the brother. The Third Circuit holds that a more detailed evidentiary hearing was necessary to determine whether the conflict actually impacted the lawyer’s performance, and whether the defendant would have allowed the attorney to place the blame on his brother.

United States v. Turner, 594 F.3d 946 (7th Cir. 2010)

The attorney who was prepared to represent the defendant at trial also was representing a co-conspirator who had already been tried and convicted, but who was awaiting sentencing. Both clients waived any potential conflict and neither defendant was cooperating. Nevertheless, the district court disqualified the attorney from defendant’s trial on the basis that one or the other defendant might decide to cooperate in the future. Disqualifying counsel was erroneous prejudicial, because the improper disqualification of counsel amounts to structural error. This case contains a thorough discussion of the relationship between Wheat and Gonzalez-Lopez: the relationship between the court’s obligation to assure that there is no conflict and the defendant’s right to counsel of choice.

Boykin v. Webb, 541 F.3d 638 (6th Cir. 2008)

Counsel suffered from an actual conflict of interest in this murder case. One defendant had a viable alibi, the other did not. The other was identified by an eye-witness. An unconflicted attorney for the defendant with the alibi would have pointed the finger at the other defendant. A co-defendant’s subsequent habeas petition was also successful on the grounds that the attorney suffered from an actual conflict of interest in McElrath v. Simpson, 595 F.3d 624 (6th Cir. 2010).

Ventry v. United States, 539 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2008)

Prior to being arrested, the defendant learned that his former girlfriend made a statement to the FBI implicating the defendant. The defendant went to see a lawyer and later wrote a letter to the girlfriend, telling her that his lawyer told him that the girlfriend should claim that she made the statement under duress, and that she should plead the Fifth. The defendant also threatened the girlfriend that he would reveal embarrassing things about her if she did not recant. The defendant was immediately arrested for the initial crime and for obstruction of justice. The defendant hired another lawyer who may (the record was unclear) have been a partner of the lawyer who supposedly gave the “advice” that the defendant passed on to the girlfriend. The government moved to disqualify the attorney because of the conflict. The motion was denied in part, because of potentially false statements made by the attorney with regard to his relationship to the lawyer who provided the advice. The Second Circuit remanded the case to district court for further findings of fact. Interesting discussion of conflicts between law partners and conflicts by providing advice that the defendant may need to rely upon at trial in defense of his behavior.

Houston v. Schomig, 533 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2008)

A remand was required to determine if a conflict existed in light of the representation of the victim and a witness in this case by another member of the same public defender’s office that employed the defendant’s attorney.

United States v. Culverhouse, 507 F.3d 888 (5th Cir. 2007)

Because of defense counsel’s representation of the defendant and a co-conspirator, he may have suffered from a conflict of interest that tainted the defendant’s guilty plea. A remand was necessary to make further findings about when defense counsel became aware of his actual conflict.

United States v. Nicholson, 475 F.3d 241 (4th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. He told his lawyer that he carried the gun because a very dangerous man (Butts) had taken a contract out on his life; had shot his brother, and shot and killed his step-father. The attorney then became Butts’ lawyer in his drug and conspiracy case (the sentencing for which included allegations that he shot and killed Nicholson’s step-father). Nicholson did not know that the attorney also represented Butts. This posed a clear actual conflict of interest. At Nicholson’s sentencing, the attorney failed to argue that a downward departure was appropriate based on defendant’s need to defend himself (a self-defense departure). Given the lawyer’s conflict, he could not raise this defense. A remand was necessary for a hearing on the actual prejudice that the defendant suffered by virtue of the conflict. Following remand and appeal, the Fourth Circuit held that an actual conflict of interest that prejudiced the defendant was shown to exist. This opinion contains a lengthy analysis of the law governing actual conflicts, including a discussion of the standards for establishing prejudice. United States v. Nicholson, 611 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2010).

United States v. Segarra-Rivera, 473 F.3d 381 (1st Cir. 2007)

Based on the defendant’s pro se statements regarding the inappropriate pressure that counsel placed on him before he relented and signed his guilty plea, there was at least a colorable basis for inquiring into a possible conflict of interest before actually conducting a hearing on the issue of the defendant’s Motion to Withdraw his Guilty Plea.

Hammon v. Ward, 466 F.3d 919 (10th Cir. 2006)
Two brothers were arrested in a car with crack cocaine and guns. One lawyer represented them. Their theory was going to be that brother #1 possessed the gun, and neither possessed the drugs (they had borrowed the car). Brother #1, however, entered a guilty plea to probation with the understanding that he would testify against brother #2. The lawyer continued to represent brother #2 (and did not tell #2 that #1 had entered a guilty plea). Everything about this situation represented a conflict. Not only does this pose an actual conflict of interest, but appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise this issue in the state appeal. Because of some uncertainty in the record, however, a remand to the federal habeas court was necessary to more fully develop the record.

United States v. Stitt, 441 F.3d 297 (4th Cir. 2006)

The attorney was laboring under an actual conflict of interest during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial. The federal court granted a writ, setting aside the penalty phase judgment. The defense attorney was paid considerable money to represent the defendant in this federal death penalty trial, though exactly how much was not clear, because the attorney claimed to have kept no records and had no recall. The trial court concluded that the attorney lacked credibility at the habeas hearing. Prior to trial, the attorney did not ask for funds to assist him in the penalty phase, because, according to the court, he did not want to expose his fee to court review. Instead, he hired less qualified experts. This amounted to a conflict of interest. The court invoked Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335 (1980), as the controlling standard (as opposed to the Strickland standard that requires proof of actual prejudice), because the attorney suffered an actual conflict of interest, even though he was not representing two separate conflicting clients. The Sullivan standard requires that the defendant show that the attorney suffered from an actual (as opposed to a potential) conflict of interest and that the conflict significantly affected counsel’s performance. If these two prongs are met, actual prejudice need not be shown. The FOURTH CIRCUIT SUBSEQUENTLY VACATED THIS OPINION ON JURISDICTIONAL GROUNDS. 459 F.3d 483.

Daniels v. Woodford, 428 F.3d 1181 (9th Cir. 2005)

The public defender’s office suffered from a conflict of interest that should have led the trial court to appoint replacement counsel in this death penalty case. The defendant, who had been convicted of a previous crime, had filed a habeas corpus petition against the public defender’s office in connection with the earlier case. Finally, shortly before trial, the court appointed two lawyers to replace the public defenders. For both the new attorneys, this was their first capital case. There was almost complete distrust between the defendant and his newly appointed attorneys (one of whom had recently left the DA’s office). By the time of trial, the attorneys and the defendant were not on speaking terms. Virtually no investigation into possible mitigating evidence was undertaken by the attorneys. The Ninth Circuit concluded that there was a presumption of prejudice caused by the conflict and the writ was granted.

United States v. Infante, 404 F.3d 376 (5th Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s attorney previously represented two witnesses who testified for the government. An entirely insufficient Garcia hearing was held, at which the defendant was never asked if he understood the nature of a conflict. The witnesses’ testimony did not implicate the defendant. Nevertheless, the record was not sufficient to demonstrate that the conflict did not adversely prejudice the defendant. A remand for further hearings was required to determine if the attorney could have developed additional testimony from the witnesses that would have exculpated his current client.

United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, 399 F.3d 924 (8th Cir. 2005)

This case does not involve a pretrial determination that a conflict existed, but its holding presumably would apply in such situations. In this case, the trial court improperly denied the defense counsel’s application to appear pro hac vice. As a result, the defendant was denied his right to counsel of his choice. The Eighth Circuit holds that this is grounds for reversal without a showing of prejudice. The court specifically rejected the availability of harmless error review: “Attorneys are not fungible.” The United States Supreme Court affirmed: See annotation at ATTORNEYS (Right To Counsel).

United States v. Osborne, 402 F.3d 626 (6th Cir. 2005)

The trial court’s evaluation, pretrial, of the potential conflict posed by the attorney’s representation of both the defendant and her husband was inadequate. The court failed to comply with various components of Rule 44(c), including posing certain illustrative types of conflicts that might arise and the risks that these conflicts might entail.

Locascio v. United States, 395 F.3d 51 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant, Locascio, made a sufficient showing to mandate a full evidentiary hearing on his claim that his attorney suffered from a conflict of interest at trial. The defendant offered evidence that the defendant’s attorney had been threatened by the lead defendant (John Gotti) that he should not pursue a defense that had any potential for “individualizing Locascio at Gotti’s expense.”

Lewis v. Mayle, 391 F.3d 989 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant’s attorney at trial represented the only other possible perpetrator of the murder in a matter (DUI charges) immediately prior to undertaking the defendant’s defense. The prior client was a witness for the prosecution. This represented an actual conflict of interest and the Ninth Circuit held that a habeas writ would be granted. The fact that there were “on-the-record” waivers by both the defendant and the witness was not sufficient to waive the conflict, because the defendant did not seek the advice of outside counsel to fully explore the nature of the conflict and had only a cursory conversation with the judge about the possible conflict ramifications.

Rodriguez v. Chandler, 382 F.3d 670 (7th Cir. 2004)

One of the murder defendant’s trial lawyers also represented a lead detective in a real estate deal. The prosecutor moved to disqualify the attorney on the basis of this supposed conflict. The trial court agreed. The attorney was removed. The detective never testified at trial. The Seventh Circuit held that removing the lawyer was error. One alternative would have been to have co-counsel cross-examine the witness (if he had testified). However, the court also held that there was no prejudice. In short, the removal of a trial lawyer is not grounds for reversal per se. The defense must prove prejudice.
United States v. Williams, 372 F.3d 96 (2d Cir. 2004)

Prior to entering his guilty plea, the defendant was represented by an attorney who participated in criminal conduct with the defendant. At sentencing (with new conflict-free counsel), the defendant was prejudiced, because his failure to cooperate earlier resulted in a sentence not as favorable as otherwise might have been imposed. The Second Circuit holds that a new sentencing should be held that endeavors to put the defendant in the position he would have been had there been no conflict.

Hall v. United States, 371 F.3d 969 (7th Cir. 2004)

The defendant, who eventually entered a guilty plea, was represented by an attorney who previously represented another defendant who was a potential witness against the defendant. The Seventh Circuit holds that the petitioner was entitled to a hearing on this actual conflict of interest. Distinguishing Mickens v. Taylor, the Seventh Circuit held that the successive representation in this case was quite dramatic (the witness was represented ten days prior to the attorney’s representation of the defendant — both defendants were inmates in a prison at the time of the closely interrelated offenses). Also Mickens does not prevent a petitioner from having an evidentiary hearing to probe the impact of the conflict.

Trial counsel represented two defendants at trial. Just prior to the beginning of trial, the attorney told the trial judge that things had become a bit “sticky” and that perhaps some inquiry would be appropriate. The trial judge declined. However, the judge did grant a severance and the defendants proceeded to trial with one lawyer, but in separate trials. The trials were conducted as bench trials, back-to-back, over the course of three days. In fact, the trials actually overlapped. Pursuant to Holloway, the trial court erred in failing to fully inquire into the conflict that was presented to the court prior to trial. See also Harris v. Carter, 337 F.3d 758 (6th Cir. 2003). Though Holloway requires automatic reversal where a complaint is raised pre-trial to joint representation at the same trial, the same rule applies here, where the problem was raised prior to the scheduled joint trial and the only remedy was severance.

United States v. Salado, 339 F.3d 285 (5th Cir. 2003)

Two defendants were represented by one attorney for the entry of a guilty plea. One defendant adequately demonstrated a conflict of interest to the extent that a remand to conduct a post-trial Rule 44(c) hearing was necessary. Even though the magistrate advised the defendants of some of the dangers of proceeding with one attorney, the district court judge did not renew the inquiry prior to the entry of the guilty plea.

Harris v. Carter, 337 F.3d 758 (6th Cir. 2003)

Defense counsel represented two men charged with a drive-by shooting. Shortly before trial, the trial court severed the cases. The first defendant was tried and convicted. As the second trial began, the first defendant was immunized and ordered to testify against the second defendant. The trial attorney expressed concern about his ability to proceed in light of the conflict. The trial court’s failure to further inquire into the conflict and appoint separate counsel was error requiring granting a writ of habeas corpus. See Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475 (1978)
United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002)

Though the court engaged in a pretrial Garcia hearing pursuant to Rule 44(c), the development of a conflict during trial was not thereby waived. Antagonistic defenses at trial should have prompted a further inquiry to ensure that the defendants both understood their right to separate un-conflicted counsel. The court reversed one defendant’s conviction.

Rubin v. Gee, 292 F.3d 396 (4th Cir. 2002)

After the defendant killed her husband, she called two lawyers who had her brought to a hospital and then took possession of certain evidence. Part of their motive was to delay her arrest until she could pay them a substantial retainer. The lawyers then employed another lawyer to try her case, but remained in the case as “shadow” lawyers. Their involvement in the delay in turning her in was never revealed to the jury, though some of her conduct (as directed by the lawyers) was relied upon by the prosecution to show her consciousness of guilt. The fact that the lawyers could not testify at trial to explain the defendant’s conduct after the shooting, and because they had an interest in protecting their fee, as well as shielding themselves from possible criminal prosecution, the defendant suffered a denial of the effective assistance of counsel.

Smith v. Hofbauer, 312 F.3d 809 (6th Cir. 2002)

In Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), the Supreme Court held if a defendant asserts that he was denied effective assistance of counsel, he must show that his counsel’s performance was deficient, and that this deficient performance was prejudicial, i.e., that there is “a reasonable probability that, but for counsel’s unprofessional errors, the result of the proceedings would have been different.” In the context of conflicts of interest, however, the Court in Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475 (1978), held that where the defense counsel simultaneously represents multiple defendants with divergent interests, prejudice is presumed. Later, in Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335 (1980), the Court held that absent an objection by the defendant, the Holloway presumption does not apply. However, even when there is no objection, the Cuyler v. Sullivan Court held that the defendant is only required to show that the conflict adversely affected counsel’s representation – a showing less demanding than Strickland. In Mickens v. Taylor, 535 U.S. 162 (2002), this line of cases was extended to a case in which the trial judge knew of the defense attorney’s conflict (he previously represented the victim in a juvenile case, and then represented the defendant charged with the murder). The Court held that the Holloway presumption of prejudice standard did not apply, even in that situation. The Court held that where there is no objection, the defendant must still demonstrate that the conflict adversely affected counsel’s representation. In this case, the Sixth Circuit considered whether the reduced Cuyler standard of “adverse effect” applied in conflict situations other than simultaneous representation cases. This case involved an attorney being prosecuted for a drug offense by the same prosecutor’s office that was prosecuting the defendant. In the state habeas court, the defendant claimed that there should be a presumption of prejudice. The state habeas court disagreed. Without deciding what the test should be, the Sixth Circuit held that the rule was not “clearly established” and thus the state habeas court’s decision would not be upset.

United States v. Moore, 159 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998)
A complete breakdown in communication between the defendant and his attorney represented a conflict that amounted to a denial of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The attorney failed to alert the defendant to a plea deadline; the defendant had threatened to sue the attorney; the attorney felt physically threatened by the defendant; the attorney did not interview witnesses or file motions that the defendant requested. The trial court, aware of some of these problems prior to trial, simply told the defendant that the trial would not be delayed and he could change counsel if new counsel was ready by the scheduled trial date. The defendant could not find replacement counsel in time. Forcing the defendant to proceed with the attorney with whom there was a conflict was erroneous and required reversing the conviction.

United States v. Jiang, 140 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 1998)

Trial counsel's partner represented an alleged co-conspirator in a related forfeiture proceeding. Though there was no demonstrated actual conflict of interest, the trial court erred in failing to fully inquire into this matter more fully and determine whether there was an actual conflict and what effect this conflict had on the representation of the defendant.

United States v. Taylor, 139 F.3d 924 (D.C.Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with criminal contempt for violating a freeze order. The defendant sought new counsel after he entered a guilty plea, claiming that his counsel was suffering from a conflict of interest in that his attorney had given him certain advice regarding the freeze orders that he complied with – and which were later the subject of the alleged contempt. The alleged conflict was sufficient to warrant an evidentiary hearing on the defendant's motion to withdraw the guilty plea.

United States v. Kliti, 156 F.3d 150 (2d Cir. 1998)

The defendant’s attorney was a witness to statements made by a key government witness (who the attorney previously represented) that exculpated the defendant. The trial court erred in failing to conduct a hearing to determine whether this “conflict” (i.e., the fact that the attorney was needed as a witness for the defendant) necessitated his removal from the case. When the witness denied making the exculpatory statement, the attorney was barred from offering impeachment evidence, thus depriving the defendant of important evidence in his defense. A remand was required to determine whether the defendant waived his right to conflict-free counsel.

United States v. Luciano, 158 F.3d 655 (2d Cir. 1998)

A letter that the defense attorney wrote to the judge prior to sentencing that berated the defendant and sought to be relieved of further representation demonstrated a clear conflict. This was more than a simple fee dispute.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Doe), 859 F.2d 1021 (1st Cir. 1988)

The Supreme Court’s holding in Wheat v. United States does not apply where it is only a “tenuous inferential relationship” between the attorney’s clients. In order to conflict the attorney out of the case, there must be a direct link between the clients of the attorney or at least some concrete evidence that one client has information about another which would require the removal of the attorney.

United States v. Diozzi, 807 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1986)

The trial court disqualified two defendants’ attorneys on the grounds that pre-indictment memoranda submitted to the government by the attorneys was admitted into evidence. Prior to their indictment, the defendants, with the aid of their attorneys, had submitted memoranda to the Justice Department and the I.R.S. explaining their basis for submitting their tax returns. After indictment, the government intended to introduce these attorney-authored documents into evidence. The trial court disqualified the attorneys because they would be witnesses in the case. Because the defendants were willing to stipulate to the statements in those documents, the First Circuit reversed.

United States v. Malpiedi, 62 F.3d 465 (2d Cir. 1995)

Defendant was charged with obstruction of justice, among other offenses, because he altered documents before having them produced to the grand jury in response to a subpoena. The documents were brought to the grand jury by a records custodian who was represented by the same lawyer who represented the defendant at trial. At the grand jury, the records custodian lied about the alteration of the documents and the method of collecting the records. Prior to trial, however, the witness was granted immunity and testified at trial. The attorney suffered from an actual conflict of interest, because his prior representation of the witness limited the degree to which he could cross-examine this very important and damaging witness for the government.

Ciak v. United States, 59 F.3d 296 (2d Cir. 1995)

Defendant’s attorney in this firearm case had previously represented one of the government’s witnesses in a related forfeiture proceeding. The relationship with the witness (former client) had deteriorated and during cross-examination, the attorney became an “unsworn witness” in his effort to impeach the witness with his prior statements. This resulted in the credibility of the attorney becoming an issue in the case. The conflict was aggravated by the fact that his cross-examination of the witness was at least in theory hampered by the inability to use statements, which were within the attorney-client privilege. Furthermore, the attorney was conflicted because his theory of the defense was that it was the former client who put the gun in the car which the defendant was now charged with possessing. Finally, because the attorney’s fee was to be obtained from the forfeited property, he had a financial stake in ensuring that the former client secured the return of the car (therefore it was at least arguably in his interest to have the defendant’s guilt established, so that the former client could prevail as an innocent owner). Because the trial court failed to make any inquiry into these possible conflicts, the habeas writ would be granted. Note that Mickens v. Taylor holds that automatic reversal is not required simply by virtue of a failure to inquire into the conflict.

Lopez v. Scully, 58 F.3d 38 (2d Cir. 1995)

After entering a guilty plea, but before sentencing, the defendant accused his attorney of coercing him to enter the plea and failing to properly prepare the case. The attorney announced on the record that he denied every allegation. The trial judge then proceeded to sentence the defendant. There was an actual conflict of interest which should have resulted in the appointment of new counsel. The attorney could not support the defendant’s position at his own peril, or contest the defendant’s position at the defendant’s peril.
United States v. Levy, 25 F.3d 146 (2d Cir. 1994)

There were numerous circumstances which suggested that a conflict of interest impaired the attorney’s representation of the defendant: (1) the attorney had represented a relative of the defendant previously, who was allegedly a member of the conspiracy involving the defendant (the relative was now a fugitive); (2) the attorney was awaiting sentencing on his own case; (3) the attorney was under investigation for helping the relative of the defendant escape the country and remain a fugitive; (4) the attorney was a witness to statements made by the relative during plea negotiations which inculpated the defendant. At no time did the trial court adequately confront these issues by addressing the defendant and ascertaining whether he was aware of, and waived, these possible conflicts. In some cases, the failure to make inquiry requires automatic reversal of the conviction. See, e.g., Hamilton v. Ford, 969 F.2d 1006 (11th Cir. 1992). Here, however, there was at least some inquiry by the district court into the possible conflict issues. Nevertheless, the record reveals that the attorney labored under an actual conflict of interest and therefore reversal of the conviction was necessary. First, the defendant’s most plausible defense would have been to point the finger at his relative, who was the attorney’s other client; second, the desire to avoid having the attorney testify against the defendant required shifting certain defense strategies; third, the attorney’s possible desire to curry favor with the government in light of his own pending case created an actual conflict (even though the attorney was sentenced prior to the beginning of trial); finally, the attorney’s possible role in assisting the relative to escape created a strong interest in the attorney to avoid investigating the relative’s conduct.

United States v. Fulton, 5 F.3d 605 (2d Cir. 1993)

During the course of trial, during a sidebar conference, a witness claimed that the defendant’s attorney was involved in a heroin smuggling operation. The attorney should have been disqualified at this time. If the accusation were true, the attorney labored under an obvious actual conflict; if the accusation were false, the attorney was crippled by his inability to effectively impeach the witness. In either case, the defendant was deprived of effective assistance of counsel. In the former instance, prejudice is \textit{per se}; in the latter instance, the \textit{Cuyler} standard applies, but there is no means, during the course of trial, to ascertain the truthfulness of the allegation. Therefore, disqualification is necessary in all such cases.

United States v. Camisa, 969 F.2d 1428 (2d Cir. 1992)

A trial court’s decision refusing to disqualify an attorney because of a possible conflict of interest is not immediately appealable by the government. This is true even if allowing the attorney to appear may necessitate excluding certain evidence.

Strouse v. Leonardo, 928 F.2d 548 (2d Cir. 1991)

An attorney represented a defendant who had murdered his mother. The defendant had been listed as the executor of his mother’s estate. The attorney was listed as a contingent executor. The Second Circuit remanded this \textit{habeas} case to the district court to determine if this amounted to a conflict of interest.

United States v. Voigt, 89 F.3d 1050 (3rd Cir. 1996)

In a lengthy opinion that thoroughly reviews the law governing claims by defendants that his chosen counsel was improperly disqualified, the court ultimately holds that disqualification in this case was proper. Though the government’s argument that the attorney was a potential witness was weak, the argument that the attorney had previously represented co-defendants, as well as the corporate employer of the individual defendants, supported the lower court’s decision disqualifying the attorney (who, incidentally, was the defendant’s third retained counsel).

United States v. Moscony, 927 F.2d 742 (3rd Cir. 1991)

The attorney represented several of the defendant’s employees when they appeared at the grand jury. Those witnesses were now witnesses against the defendant. The attorney labored under a conflict and was properly removed, despite the defendant’s willingness to waive the conflict.

United States v. Gilliam, 975 F.2d 1050 (4th Cir. 1992)

The trial court’s failure to conduct a Rule 44(c) hearing in light of the actual conflict of interest which arose by virtue of counsel’s representation of both defendants (father and son) required a remand to inquire into the nature of the conflict. The conflict arose during the course of trial when the prosecutor offered a “package deal” plea bargain.

United States v. Swartz, 975 F.2d 1042 (4th Cir. 1992)

Counsel represented both the defendant and her co-defendant. They both entered guilty pleas, having waived any potential conflict. At sentencing, however, an actual conflict arose when the trial court indicated that the guideline sentence of the two defendants was inappropriately disparate. Counsel’s advocacy on behalf of the defendant suffered because of his effort to advocate on behalf of the co-defendant. The earlier waiver did not vitiate defendant’s right to conflict-free counsel at sentencing.

United States v. Tatum, 943 F.2d 370 (4th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud for having failed to list certain automobiles on his assets schedule. He was represented initially by an attorney who worked for the firm which advised him not to list the cars (another of whose lawyers owned one of the cars). That attorney was eventually disqualified, but he remained in the case and sat at counsel table and advised the new defense attorney. That attorney’s participation, even as second chair, represented ineffective assistance of counsel because of the severe conflict.

Hoffman v. Leeke, 903 F.2d 280 (4th Cir. 1990)

An attorney represented a murder defendant as well as a former co-defendant who had entered a plea agreement, given a statement to the police and then testified against the defendant. This constitutes a conflict of interest which resulted in vacating the conviction. The fact that the defendant consented to the multiple representation was inconsequential because he did not realize when he made this waiver that his former co-defendant would be testifying against him.

Perillo v. Johnson, 79 F.3d 441 (5th Cir. 1996)

Defense counsel represented both the defendant and a key state’s witness who had been given transactional immunity in exchange for her testimony at defendant’s trial. An adverse effect was demonstrated by the obvious conflict that the attorney faced: it was in the witness’s interest to testify (and receive immunity) and not to be shown to be lying. It was in the defendant’s interest not to have the witness testify and to show that the witness was lying.

One defendant’s attorney suffered an actual conflict of interest and the trial court’s failure to make an inquiry into the situation necessitated reversing the conviction. On two occasions, the attorney had contacted a co-defendant who was contemplating pleading guilty and encouraged him not to do so. This contact was made without the knowledge of the co-defendant’s counsel.
Just prior to trial, the court was made aware of these improper contacts and advised the attorney that at the end of trial, a disciplinary hearing would be held. The court should have conducted a hearing with the defendant at that point and advised the defendant of the impending disciplinary hearing. During the course of trial, the attorney was in the position of having to defend himself, as well as the defendant. In fact, during the trial, the attorney questioned the co-conspirator in a way which minimized his contact with the co-conspirator, indicating that it was the defendant, not the attorney, who initiated the meetings. This posed an actual conflict of interest which required a Rule 44(c) hearing.

Attorneys who share office space are not part of the same “firm” for purposes of determining whether there is a conflict by virtue of the fact that one attorney represents a government witness and another “space sharer” represents the defendant.

An attorney represented the defendant’s co-defendant previously. The co-defendant was the president and sole owner of the defendant’s employer. Throughout the trial, it was apparent that the attorney allowed the interest of the co-defendant to override the interest of the attorney’s own client.

Thomas v. Foltz, 818 F.2d 476 (6th Cir. 1987)

Three defendants were represented by one attorney. The prosecutor offered a “package deal” which had to be accepted by all or none. The Court of Appeals held that the attorney rendered ineffective assistance of counsel to the less culpable member of the trio. But the court does not hold that it is per se ineffective assistance of counsel to represent three defendants when a package deal is offered. In this case, the least culpable defendant had constantly maintained his innocence.

Griffin v. McVicar, 84 F.3d 880 (7th Cir. 1996)

Though the two defendants’ lawyer did not reveal any conflict prior to trial in representing both defendants in this murder trial, the existence of an actual conflict of interest arose and the petitioner’s conviction, therefore, was tainted by ineffective assistance of counsel. The defense of one defendant was hopeless and the attorney pursued a substantially flawed alibi defense. The petitioner, on the other hand, had a possible “bystander” defense, but, because of the attorney’s strategy, went with the alibi for him, as well.

United States v. Shorter, 54 F.3d 1248 (7th Cir. 1995)

At defendant’s sentencing, it became apparent that the defendant was contending that the attorney had forced him to plead guilty against his wishes. The attorney denied this and accused the defendant of interfering with the integrity of the court. This reflected a conflict of interest and a new attorney should have been appointed.

Castillo v. United States, 34 F.3d 443 (7th Cir. 1994)

The defendant and his alleged accomplice were represented by one attorney. A cursory Rule 44(c) hearing was held. It was debatable whether the defendant understood English well enough to answer the Rule 44(c) questions. Though he answered “yes” to each of the waiver questions, this is not sufficient to establish a knowing and voluntary waiver of conflict-free counsel. The defendant’s allegations of an actual conflict were satisfied by his affidavit that the attorney told him not to testify, because it could hurt the co-defendant.
Stoia v. United States, 22 F.3d 766 (7th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was represented at trial by certain attorneys, but claimed in this §2255 petition that another attorney, who did not file an appearance, was actually directing trial strategy. An ineffective assistance of counsel claim may be valid, even with respect to an attorney who has not filed an appearance. In this case, the non-appearing attorney was burdened with a conflict of interest. The non-appearing attorney made numerous tactical decisions which the defendant followed, including requesting a continuance, not interviewing certain witnesses and recommending that the defendant not testify in his own behalf. He also failed to file any pretrial motions, which was his delegated responsibility in the case. The non-appearing attorney’s conflict resulted from an agreement he had with the government, as part of his own plea agreement, that provided that he would not represent any person charged with crimes. The attorney was also involved in undercover work with law enforcement.

United States ex rel Duncan v. O’Leary, 806 F.2d 1307 (7th Cir. 1986)

The defendant’s attorney was the prosecutor’s campaign manager for the office of district attorney. There was explicit evidence of collusion between the defense attorney and the prosecuting attorney. The state conviction was thrown out by the Seventh Circuit in this habeas proceeding.

Dawan v. Lockhart, 31 F.3d 718 (8th Cir. 1994)

The public defender represented two individuals charged with burglary. The first defendant agreed to plead guilty and gave a statement implicating the second defendant. Prior to trial, however, the defense attorney and the prosecutor agreed that there was no conflict because neither side planned to call the first defendant. At trial, however, the defendant ended up calling the guilty-pleading co-defendant and elicited testimony that completely exculpated the defendant. He asked no questions, however, about the prior inconsistent statement. The prosecutor cross-examined the witness about his prior inconsistent statement. Because the attorney should have been the first to raise the issue regarding the prior statement (in order to soften the blow), but failed to do so, arguably in order to protect his former client from a perjury charge, this actual conflict rendered him ineffective. In order to establish that the conflict prejudiced him, it is not necessary to meet the Strickland standard of prejudice. When there is an actual conflict, the defendant need only establish that the conflict of interest actually affected the adequacy of the representation.

United States v. Del Muro, 87 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 1996)

A defendant has a constitutional right to counsel in pursuit of a new trial motion. Here, the defendant, pro se, claimed that trial counsel was ineffective. The district court required trial counsel to represent the defendant in connection with this motion during the new trial motion. This was an improper procedure. Trial counsel had a clear conflict in pursuing the claim that he was ineffective. The trial court should have appointed substitute counsel to prosecute the new trial motion.

Quintero v. United States, 33 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant’s fee was paid by a third person. The attorney urged the defendant to reject a proposed plea agreement. Whenever a defendant’s fee is paid by a third person, a potential conflict of interest exists. Wood v. Georgia, 450 U.S. 261 (1981). One risk is that the lawyer will prevent his client from obtaining leniency by preventing the client from offering testimony. against his former employer or from taking other actions contrary to the employer’s interests. A full evidentiary hearing was necessary to fully explore the petitioner’s allegations.

_Fitzpatrick v. McCormick_, 869 F.2d 1247 (9th Cir. 1989)

The attorney who represented the defendant at his murder trial had previously represented his co-defendant at a previous trial. At this trial, the defense was that the former client was the guilty party. This actual conflict of interest required reversal of the defendant’s conviction.

_United States v. Allen_, 831 F.2d 1487 (9th Cir. 1987)

One law firm, Oteri & Weinberg, sought to represent seventeen defendants in this drug conspiracy prosecution. The attorneys offered to rate the culpability of the defendants during the initial joint plea negotiations. Nevertheless, certain defendants ultimately obtained separate counsel and their convictions were affirmed despite the court’s disapproval of the law firm’s initial joint representation.

_United States v. Gallegos_, 108 F.3d 1272 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was entitled to a new trial because of her counsel’s conflict of interest. The attorney also represented a witness called by a co-defendant and this posed a conflict, because his advice to the witness was that he should plead the Fifth, whereas his duty to his client was to urge the witness to provide exculpatory evidence in support of the defendant.

_Edens v. Hannigan_, 87 F.3d 1109 (10th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel represented two defendants in this armed robbery / murder trial. One of the defendants was not at the scene, but allegedly participated in the planning and otherwise aided and abetted the offense. The other was a participant. An actual conflict of interest existed. The participant defended on the basis of compulsion (from a third participant) and the petitioner claimed that he had no role in the offenses.

_Selsor v. Kaiser_, 81 F.3d 1492 (10th Cir. 1996)

Two public defenders from the same firm were appointed to represent two defendants charged with robbery and murder. Pursuant to _Holloway v. Arkansas_, 435 U.S. 475 (1978), the state trial court should have appointed lawyers from separate firms after counsel indicated that there was a conflict.

_Burden v. Zant_, 24 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 1994)

The public defender represented two defendants who had been arrested for murder. He informally obtained immunity for one of the defendants, in exchange for his cooperation against the other. This was an actual conflict of interest requiring the reversal of the conviction of the other defendant. See _Ruffin v. Kemp_, 767 F.2d 748 (11th Cir. 1985).

_Hamilton v. Ford_, 969 F.2d 1006 (11th Cir. 1992)

State trial counsel’s objection to representing both defendants in a murder trial should have been sustained by the trial court. The trial court failed to explore the basis of the asserted conflict. Where there is no objection pre-trial, in order to prevail on appeal or on _habeas_, the defendant must show an actual conflict prejudiced him. _Cuyler v. Sullivan_, 446 U.S. 335 (1980). But where, as here, an objection is raised prior to trial, the defendants need not show an actual conflict of interest when a trial court fails to inquire adequately into the basis of the objection. Reversal is automatic if the trial court fails to make a reasonable inquiry into the asserted conflict.
A defendant’s attorney also represented the defendant in connection with movie and book rights relating to the offense. This posed a possible conflict of interest and a full evidentiary hearing should have been conducted by the federal habeas court. The defendant had poisoned two of her husbands to collect life insurance proceeds and had tried to poison a third husband.

McConico v. Alabama, 919 F.2d 1543 (11th Cir. 1990)

The murder defendant’s lawyer also represented the victim’s life insurance beneficiaries, one of whom was a witness for the state at trial. If the defendant won at trial, there was a possibility that the beneficiaries would lose their benefits (the policy excluded benefits if the decedent was engaged in an assault or a felony – the defendant’s defense was self-defense). This is an actual conflict of interest necessitating a new trial. This is a situation of inherently divided loyalty because the success of one client depends on discrediting another. A showing of “adverse effect” is necessary and the defendant made an adequate showing in this case.

United States v. Stuckey, 917 F.2d 1537 (11th Cir. 1990)

When the trial court learned that the defendant’s attorney had been paid from another source, and that the lead counsel for that defendant had also received money from another source, the trial judge questioned both lawyers about the source of their fees and questioned the defendant, outside the presence of the attorney, about the willingness to proceed in light of the potential conflict of interest. After conducting this inquiry, the trial judge removed the lead counsel despite the defendant’s willingness to waive that potential conflict. The Eleventh Circuit affirms, concluding that there was an inescapable inference that a drug syndicate for which the defendant worked had paid for her attorney in order to assure her silence.

United States v. Sims, 845 F.2d 1564 (11th Cir. 1988)

It was proper for the trial judge to require all attorneys to divulge the source of their fees in this multi-defendant drug prosecution. The record indicated that attorneys representing certain defendants had represented co-defendants in previous cases and that some defendants were paying for other defendants’ lawyers.

United States v. McLain, 823 F.2d 1457 (11th Cir. 1987)

Defendant’s attorney was under investigation for a Hobbs Act violation but did not inform the defendant of his conflict. The Court holds that this creates an actual conflict of interest which requires a reversal of the defendant’s conviction.

Porter v. Wainwright, 805 F.2d 930 (11th Cir. 1986)

In this habeas case, the court held that the petitioner was entitled to a hearing to inquire into his attorney’s conflict of interest in light of the attorney’s prior representation of a key prosecution witness. The state court refused to give the defendant an evidentiary hearing on his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on his attorney’s failure to cross-examine this witness.

In re Paradyne Corp., 803 F.2d 604 (11th Cir. 1986)

The district court attempted to hold ex parte, in camera hearings to inquire into potential conflicts of interest among the lawyers. The court intended to question counsel about their possession or use of information disclosed by other attorneys who represented co-defendants. In addition, the court intended to question the defendants outside the presence of their attorneys.
The Eleventh Circuit holds that this inquisitorial proceeding was unnecessary and a violation of the defendant’s Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT
(Contacting a Represented Party)

Prosecutors violated state ethics rules when they directed FBI agents to contact and interview a target of a fraud investigation who was known to be represented at the time. Suppression of evidence was an appropriate remedy.

United States v. Carona, 660 F.3d 360 (9th Cir. 2011)
The Ninth Circuit holds that the use of an informant to communicate with (and to show a fake subpoena to) an unindicted subject (although represented by counsel) does not violate the California State Bar Rules.

United States v. Brown, 595 F.3d 498 (3rd Cir. 2010)
The Third Circuit joins the majority of Circuits in concluding that a prosecutor, pre-indictment, may use an undercover agent or an informant to contact a suspect, even if the prosecutor is aware that the suspect has retained counsel with respect to the matter under investigation. The opinion contains an analysis of this issue that concludes that state laws that exempt contacts that are “otherwise authorized by law” in connection with the prohibition on contacting a represented party applies to prosecutors.

United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, 403 F.3d 558 (8th Cir. 2005)
Before the Supreme Court granted certiorari in the decision in Gonzalez-Lopez, annotated below, the Eighth Circuit considered a separate question raised by the controversy dealing with the defendant’s right to counsel in his criminal case. Shortly after being arrested, the defendant was represented by a lawyer named Fahle. Within a matter of weeks, however, the defendant sought out the services of Attorney Lowe. Lowe went to the jail and talked with the defendant, knowing that he was already represented by Fahle. The district court judge held that this violated the ethics rule that bars contacting a represented party. The Eighth Circuit disagreed. The prohibition on contacting a represented party applies to lawyers already in a case. It does not apply to lawyers who are not attorneys currently in the litigation.

Grievance Committee for the Southern District of N.Y. v. Simels, 48 F.3d 640 (2d Cir. 1995)
The defendant’s attorney interviewed a potential witness against his client, who was also a potential co-defendant in a murder case. In the murder case, the witness had been appointed an attorney. This was not a violation of DR 7-104(A)(1) (communicating with a represented party). The witness was not a “party” in the drug case and with respect to the murder case, the witness, though involved in the crime, was clearly a witness for the prosecution. Thus, the attorney did not interview a “party” represented by an attorney for that “matter.” The attorney’s obligations to represent his client under the Sixth Amendment prompted the court to give the Directory Rule this narrow interpretation.

United States v. Hammad, 846 F.2d 854 (2d Cir. 1988)
The Assistant United States Attorney encouraged an informant to question a suspect who the prosecutor knew was represented by an attorney. No prosecution had yet been commenced, so there was no Massiah problem. Nevertheless, the Second Circuit holds that this conduct violates DR7- 104(A)(1) which prohibits a lawyer from communicating with a “party” he or she knows to be represented by counsel regarding the subject matter of that representation. The Second Circuit holds that in many circumstances, the exclusion of evidence would be a permissible sanction, but that in this case, because the law was previously unsettled, suppression would be an inappropriate remedy. In a revised opinion, 858 F.2d 834, the court added this caveat: In those rare cases where a career criminal has retained “house counsel” the prosecutor is “authorized by law” to employ certain investigative techniques despite the defendant’s having retained an attorney.

United States v. Balter, 91 F.3d 427 (3rd Cir. 1996)

A federal prosecutor may, through the use of informants, or undercover agents, obtain information from a suspect, even if the suspect is represented, prior to indictment.

United States v. Chavez, 902 F.2d 259 (4th Cir. 1990)

It was improper for an FBI agent to communicate with an already-represented defendant. In this case, the defendant telephoned the FBI agent from the jail and complained about his attorney’s refusal to let him cooperate with the government. The FBI agent told him that he ought to seek different counsel. There was no prejudice from this conversation, but it was still a violation of the ethical rules and was improper. No information was obtained from the defendant nor was this conversation used against him.

Post-indictment meetings between an assistant United States Attorney and a represented defendant are such “egregious and flagrant” violations of the ethical rules that dismissal of the indictment is the only viable remedy. The “Thornburgh Memorandum” represents a “frontal assault” on the power of the court to promulgate ethical rules. The court also noted that this practice is apparently widespread and needs to be curbed. On appeal to the Ninth Circuit, 4 F.3d 1455, the appellate court agreed that the communication with the represented defendant was inappropriate and unethical, but the dismissal of the indictment was not necessary, as there was no prejudice to the defendant.

A prosecutor contacted a represented party. A state bar proceeding was instituted against the A.U.S.A. The government moved to enjoin the state bar proceeding, relying on the Thornburgh Memo, arguing that the Memo “ preempted” the state bar rules and the Supremacy Clause operated to supersede the state bar ethics rule. The D.C. District disagreed. A unilateral decision of the Attorney General does not trigger the Supremacy Clause. This proceeding involves the same prosecutor and events described in In re Doe, 801 F.Supp. 478 (D.N.M. 1992). The D.C. Circuit affirmed: 54 F.3d 825 (D.C.Cir. 1995).

In re Doe, 801 F.Supp. 478 (D.N.M. 1992)

The district court, in an impassioned opinion (evoking Sir Thomas More, among others) castigates the Justice Department’s “Thornburgh Memorandum” and holds that AUSA’s, too, must observe the ethical rules governing the conduct of attorneys.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Ineffective – Generally and Procedural Issues)

To prevail on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, the defendant bears the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that his attorney’s performance was deficient and that he was prejudiced by the inadequate performance.

The Court carved out an exception to the two-part Strickland test. There are circumstances that are so likely to prejudice the accused that the cost of litigating their effect in a particular case is unjustified, the Court held. Prejudice will be presumed if: (1) counsel is completely denied; (2) counsel is denied at a critical stage of trial; or (3) counsel fails to subject the prosecution’s case to meaningful adversarial testing.

United States v. Ortiz-Vega, 860 F.3d 20 (1st Cir. 2017)
Though the circumstances are rare, there are occasions in which a defendant can raise an ineffective assistance of counsel claim in the trial court prior to sentencing. Here, the defendant was initially represented by appointed counsel but later retained new counsel. He claimed that deficient performance by the appointed counsel prejudiced the case prior to sentencing. The First Circuit held that the trial court should have heard that claim prior to sentencing, rather than insisting the claim was premature and had to await the filing of a § 2255. See also United States v. Simpson, 864 F.3d 830 (7th Cir. 2017).

Juniper v. Davis, 737 F.3d 288 (4th Cir. 2013)
Where the defendant’s federal habeas challenges his state habeas counsel’s representation as ineffective, and the state habeas was the first opportunity that the defendant had to raise the issue of ineffective assistance of trial counsel, the court must appoint counsel in the federal habeas to represent the defendant. See Gray v. Pearson, Fed.Appx. 331 (4th Cir. 2013) and Martinez v. Ryan, 132 S. Ct. 1309 (2012).

Lambright v. Ryan, 698 F.3d 808 (9th Cir. 2012)
The implied waiver of the attorney-client privilege when an ineffective assistance of counsel claim is filed is limited and must be carefully evaluated. The waiver is limited to allow the state to fairly litigate the claim, and is not a total waiver of all confidential communications.

United States v. Brown, 623 F.3d 104 (2d Cir. 2010)
The Second Circuit holds that an ineffective claim should be resolved by the district court while the case is still pending in that court, rather than forcing the defendant to await collateral review if the issue can and should be resolved in the lower court on a New Trial Motion.

United States v. Bergman, 599 F.3d 1142 (10th Cir. 2010)
If defense counsel was never a lawyer (as opposed to a lawyer who has been suspended, or disbarred), the defendant has automatically been denied the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.
Murphy v. Puckett, 893 F.2d 94 (5th Cir. 1990)

After the District Court makes appropriate findings under Strickland v. Washington, that is, whether the lawyer was ineffective, and whether such ineffectiveness prejudiced the defendant, it is not necessary to thereafter engage in a “harmless error” analysis. The second prong of the Strickland analysis subsumes the harmless error issue.

Frazer v. United States, 18 F.3d 778 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant filed a pro se §2255 petition, claiming that his appointed trial counsel had called him a “stupid nigger” and insisted that he agree to a stipulated facts / bench trial, or he would provide ineffective assistance. The defendant further claimed that the attorney failed to obtain and present mitigating evidence at sentencing. The Ninth Circuit holds that the trial court erred in failing to conduct a hearing on these allegations and, if they were proven, the verbal abuse would alone represent ineffective assistance per se. This type of verbal abuse is inconsistent with (1) the duty of loyalty owed a client by his attorney, (2) the responsibility of providing meaningful assistance, (3) the role of “guiding hand” described in Powell v. Alabama by Justice Sutherland. As Justice Black wrote in Von Moltke v. Gillies: “The right to counsel guaranteed by the Constitution contemplates the services of an attorney devoted solely to the interests of his client . . . Undivided allegiance and faithful, devoted service to a client are prized traditions of the American lawyer. It is this kind of service for which the Sixth Amendment makes provision. And nowhere is this service deemed more honorable than in case of appointment to represent an accused too poor to hire a lawyer, even though the accused may be a member of an unpopular or hated group, or may be charged with an offense which is peculiarly abhorrent.”

United States v. Theodore, 354 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003)

The trial court erred in declining to hold an evidentiary hearing on defendant’s new trial motion that asserted an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. The attorney offered an affidavit that he suffered from an alcohol problem; a defense witness was improperly served with a subpoena and successfully quashed the subpoena (and counsel failed to appear at the hearing to quash the subpoena) and counsel’s opening statement and closing argument were riddled with sustained objections. A hearing should have been held on the ineffective claim.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Ineffective Assistance of Counsel -- Appeal)

Counsel has a constitutionally imposed duty to consult with the defendant about an appeal when there is reason to think either that a rational defendant would want to appeal (for example, because there are nonfrivolous grounds for appeal), or that this particular defendant reasonably demonstrated to counsel that he was interested in appealing.

United States v. Allmendinger, 894 F.3d 121 (4th Cir. 2018)

Appellate counsel failed to raise an issue on appeal that would have led to a reversal of certain money laundering counts in the indictment. The issue related to the merger of the money laundering counts into the underlying criminal violations. The fact that a new sentencing would not have resulted in a shorter sentence is not a relevant consideration in assessing the deficient appellate counsel’s performance. Prejudice is measured only by the fact that a reversal of the conviction was likely.

Overstreet v. Warden, 811 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2016)

Overstreet was convicted of numerous counts of armed robbery and kidnapping. The kidnapping counts involved conduct that was related to the robberies (moving the restaurant manager from one room to another to open the safe). Under Georgia law, acts of “asportation” that are part and parcel of another offense are not sufficient to support an independent kidnapping conviction. Overstreet’s counsel on direct appeal did not appeal the kidnapping counts on this basis. This was deficient performance that prejudiced the defendant and required granting a writ pursuant to § 2254.

Long v. Butler, 809 F.3d 299 (7th Cir. 2015)

A witness gave a statement to the police that she saw the defendant shoot the victim. At defendant’s first murder trial, the witness testified that she did not see the defendant shoot the victim and that she had recanted and told the police that her initial statement was not accurate. At the defendant’s second trial, the witness testified that she did see the defendant shoot the victim. When cross-examined and asked about her prior recantation, the witness denied having recanted her identification. The prosecution failed to correct this perjurious testimony. The Seventh Circuit granted a writ. The prosecutor had a duty pursuant to Napue to correct this false testimony. The appellate court also held that the appellate counsel’s failure to raise this issue on appeal was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel.

Etherton v. Rivard, 800 F.3d 737 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was convicted in state court of possessing cocaine in his vehicle. The prosecution introduced testimony from his co-defendant who was in the car with him, but that witness was significantly impeached. The other evidence (other than finding the cocaine in the vehicle) was a tip received by the police that the car was on the interstate and it had cocaine in it. This existence of the tip was introduced twice and the prosecutor referred to the tip in his closing argument. There was no objection to this evidence at trial and the issue was not raised on appeal. The tip was inadmissible evidence and violated the defendant’s rights under the Confrontation Clause. The Sixth Circuit granted habeas relief. The Supreme Court reversed: The federal court did not afford sufficient AEDPA deference to the conclusion of the state courts. The “tip” was not necessarily introduced for the truth of the matter asserted and trial counsel may have had a strategic reason not to object. 578 U.S. --- (2016).

_Gordon v. Braxton_, 780 F3d 196 (4th Cir. 2015)

Trial counsel was ineffective for failing to appeal and for failing to consult with the client about the client’s right to file an appeal following his state court conviction.

_Lynch v. Dolce_, 789 F.3d 303 (2d Cir. 2015)

Appellate counsel’s failure to raise an issue on appeal that was certainly meritorious (an instructional error regarding an essential element of the offense that was disputed at trial) was deficient performance that prejudiced the defendant and necessitated granting the writ.

_Franco v. United States_, 762 F.3d 761 (8th Cir. 2014)

In this §2255 proceeding, the district court erred in denying the defendant’s request for an evidentiary hearing on the issue of whether he requested that his attorney to file a notice of appeal.

_Payne v. Stansberry_, 760 F.3d 10 (D. C. Cir. 2014)

The trial judge instructed the jury (according to the transcript), “If you find that the government has failed to prove any element of the offense, beyond a reasonable doubt, you must find that defendant guilty.” Though this may have been a transcription error, the government failed to prove that it was. And if it were simply a slip of the tongue, that does not alter the fact that it was obvious and plain error affecting the defendant’s substantial rights. Appellate counsel’s failure to raise this issue on appeal amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

_Milton v. Miller_, 744 F.3d 660 (10th Cir. 2014)

The state court applied the incorrect standard in evaluating petitioner’s claim that his appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel. The key ingredient of this claim focuses on the appellate issue that was omitted, but which had merit. The state court in this case erroneously held that this fact, alone, is not sufficient to merit relief.

_Dowell v. United States_, 694 F.3d 898 (7th Cir. 2012)

Failure to file a notice of appeal when asked to do so by the defendant is ineffective assistance of counsel which can be raised even if the defendant’s plea agreement provided for a waiver of the right to bring a collateral attack.

_Glover v. Birkett_, 679 F.3d 936 (6th Cir. 2012)

Trial counsel’s failure to file a notice of appeal was ineffective assistance of counsel.
The fact that the state appellate court subsequently decided adversely to the defendant his application for leave to file an appeal was not a sufficient substitute that obviated the prejudice.

_Ramchair v. Conway_, 601 F.3d 66 (2d Cir. 2010)
At the defendant’s state court trial, the prosecutor introduced evidence that the defendant was picked out of a line-up. The officer not only testified that the defendant was chosen by the witness, but that the line-up was properly composed – indeed, the defendant’s trial counsel was present (according to the officer) and did not object to the composition of the line-up. The defense counsel objected and asked for a mistrial, explaining that he felt compelled to testify and explain why he did not object. The trial court denied the mistrial motion. Appellate counsel failed to raise this meritorious issue on appeal. Failing to raise this issue on appeal was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel.

King v. United States, 595 F.3d 844 (8th Cir. 2010)

Appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel by failing to challenge the efficacy of an appeal waiver that was inapplicable, because the trial court declined to apply the sentencing recommendation in the plea agreement, which was a prerequisite to enforcing the appeal waiver.

Bostick v. Stevenson, 589 F.3d 160 (4th Cir. 2009)

Trial counsel’s failure to file an appeal of defendant’s state murder conviction was ineffective assistance of counsel. The defendant announced his intention to appeal in court and this triggered, at a minimum, counsel’s duty to consult with the client about filing an appeal.

Hodge v. United States, 554 F.3d 372 (3rd Cir. 2009)

Counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel by failing to file a timely notice of appeal. The remedy (imposed in this § 2255 case) was to remand the case to the district court to re-impose the sentence so that a timely notice of appeal could be filed.

Scruggs v. United States, 513 F.3d 675 (7th Cir. 2008)

Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge a two-point gun enhancement to the Guideline Calculation.

Corral v. United States, 498 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel’s unavailability during the ten day period after entry of the guilty plea, which prevented the defendant from requesting that an appeal be filed, amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Poindexter, 492 F.3d 263 (4th Cir. 2007)

If a client unequivocally instructs his attorney to file a notice of appeal – even if there was an appeal waiver in the plea agreement – it is ineffective assistance of counsel to fail to file an appeal.

Watson v. United States, 493 F.3d 960 (8th Cir. 2007)

Same as Poindexter / Shedrick, and other cases – attorney must file notice of appeal, even if there is an appeal waiver, if defendant expresses a desire to appeal.

United States v. Shedrick, 493 F.3d 292 (3rd Cir. 2007)
Failure to file an appeal, even in a case with an appeal waiver, is ineffective assistance of counsel if the defendant requests that an appeal be filed.

Thompson v. United States, 504 F.3d 1203 (11th Cir. 2007)

Counsel failed to properly consult with the defendant about his right to appeal his sentence. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hammon v. Ward, 466 F.3d 919 (10th Cir. 2006)

Two brothers were arrested in a car with crack cocaine and guns. One lawyer represented them. Their theory was going to be that brother #1 possessed the gun, and neither possessed the drugs (they had borrowed the car). Brother #1, however, entered a guilty plea to probation with the understanding that he would testify against brother #2. The lawyer continued to represent brother #2 (and did not tell the #2 that #1 had entered a guilty plea). Everything about this situation represented a conflict. Not only does this pose an actual conflict of interest, but appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise this issue in the state appeal. Because of some uncertainty in the record, however, a remand to the federal habeas court was necessary to more fully develop the record.

Harrington v. Gillis, 456 F.3d 118 (3rd Cir. 2006)

The court rejected the state court’s conclusion that in the absence of a specific request by the defendant to his attorney to file an appeal, there can be no ineffective finding regarding appellate counsel for failure to file an appeal. Roe v. Flores-Ortega requires a more detailed inquiry and rejected this per se rule. The court concluded that considering all the circumstances, the defendant did express an interest in pursuing an appeal of his conviction.

Frazer v. South Carolina, 430 F.3d 696 (4th Cir. 2005)

Applying Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470 (2000), the court held that the state court trial counsel was ineffective in failing to consult with the defendant about his right to appeal his state court conviction.

Franklin v. Anderson, 434 F.3d 412 (6th Cir. 2006)

Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise the trial court’s error in failing to excuse a prospective juror for cause. The juror demonstrated during voir dire that the juror could not comprehend the legal standard she was supposed to apply.

Campusano v. United States, 442 F.3d 770 (2d Cir. 2006)

Even if there is an appeal waiver, if the defendant requests that the attorney file an appeal, it is ineffective assistance of counsel to fail to do so.

Gomez-Diaz v. United States, 433 F.3d 788 (11th Cir. 2005)

Even though there was a limited waiver of appeal in the plea agreement, counsel was ineffective in failing to file an appeal at the request of the defendant. The trial court erred in holding that the defendant (i.e., habeas petitioner) was required to show a non-frivolous appeal issue in order to prevail on his ineffective claim.
Fountain v. Kyler, 420 F.3d 267 (3rd Cir. 2005)

Appellate counsel was ineffective in advising the defendant not to appeal the state court’s decision on the belief – erroneous, as it turns out – that a new state statute would be applied retroactively. Counsel believed that if the appeal were successful, the defendant would be facing a new death penalty trial under the new law. However, it was later decided that the new law could not be applied to old cases; thus, the defendant did not face the risk of the death penalty if he appealed.

United States v. Sandoval-Lopez, 409 F.3d 1193 (9th Cir. 2005)

Though there was an explicit appeal waiver in the plea agreement, the attorney’s failure to file an appeal, pursuant to the defendant’s request, was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Garrett, 402 F.3d 1262 (10th Cir. 2005)

Defendant was entitled to a hearing to determine whether he authorized his counsel not to file an appeal. Even though he signed an appeal waiver prior to entering a guilty plea, the defendant was entitled to file a notice of appeal and challenge the efficacy of the waiver.

Ballard v. United States, 400 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2005)

Following defendant’s conviction, the Supreme Court decided Apprendi. Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise an Apprendi challenge to the sentence. The defendant was convicted of a drug conspiracy, but the evidence at trial was unclear whether the defendant was responsible for marijuana, or cocaine. The failure to challenge the sentence on appeal was ineffective, especially since appellate counsel was aware of the successful challenge raised by a co-defendant.

Sanders v. Cotton, 398 F.3d 572 (7th Cir. 2005)

The state trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury, in accordance with state law, that if the issue of heat of passion is raised, the state was obligated to prove the absence of heat of passion beyond a reasonable doubt before it could convict the defendant of murder. The trial counsel requested the instruction. Appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to raise this meritorious issue in the state appeal.

Richey v. Mitchell, 395 F.3d 660 (6th Cir. 2005)

Appellate counsel’s failure to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence (and to attack trial counsel’s failure to do so, as well) was ineffective assistance of counsel. The state had prosecuted the defendant for felony murder on a theory of transferred intent. But at the time, the state law did not provide for a conviction for felony murder on the basis of transferred intent. Failing to raise this was deficient on the part of both the trial and the appellate counsel. See also 498 F.3d 344 (6th Cir. 2007), where the writ was again issued (following remand from the Supreme Court, though the writ was issued on different grounds.

United States v. Hilliard, 392 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2004)

Trial counsel’s failure to file a timely motion for new trial following the defendant’s conviction was ineffective assistance of counsel which necessitated setting aside the conviction, because the district court found that had such a motion been filed, it would have been granted.
Mapes v. Tate, 388 F.3d 187 (6th Cir. 2004)

Appellate counsel’s failure to raise an Eddings claim on appeal in this death penalty case was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. The appropriate relief was to grant the writ, conditioned on the defendant being given the right to present the issue on direct appeal to the state appellate court.

Lewis v. Johnson, 359 F.3d 646 (3rd Cir. 2004)

Pursuant to Fores-Ortega, defense counsel was ineffective in this case in failing to advise the defendant of his right to appeal.

United States v. Reinhart, 357 F.3d 521 (5th Cir. 2004)

Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to properly raise a meritorious challenge to the guideline application in this case.

Trial counsel represented two defendants at trial. Just prior to the beginning of trial, the attorney told the trial judge that things had become a bit “sticky” and that perhaps some inquiry would be appropriate. The trial judge declined. However, the judge did grant a severance and the defendants proceeded to trial with one lawyer, but in separate trials. The trials were conducted as bench trials, back-to-back, over the course of three days. In fact, the trials actually overlapped. Pursuant to Holloway, the trial court erred in failing to fully inquire into the conflict that was presented to the court prior to trial. See also Harris v. Carter, 337 F.3d 758 (6th Cir. 2003). Though Holloway requires automatic reversal where a complaint is raised pre-trial to joint representation at the same trial, the same rule applies here, where the problem was raised prior to the scheduled joint trial and the only remedy was severance. Appellate counsel’s failure to raise the conflict issue amounted to ineffective assistance of appellate counsel.

Caver v. Straub, 349 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2003)

Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to be present when the jury sent a note back during deliberations and when the trial court re-charged the jury.

United States v. Conley, 349 F.3d 837 (5th Cir. 2003)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the defendant’s sentence on the § 371 conspiracy count. In the trial court, the parties and the court erroneously believed the conviction was for a money laundering conspiracy (§ 1956(h)). Section 371 limits exposure to five years, while § 1956(h) permits a twenty year sentence. It was ineffective to fail to object to a sentence that exceeded the statutory maximum. Moreover, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to appeal this error.

The defendant was stopped for speeding and the trooper determined that he, along with his passenger were acting nervous and suspicious. The trooper called his dispatcher and was told that the defendant was listed as a suspicious person who was believed to be a drug courier in a “Read & Sign” book maintained by the police department. Based on this information, the trooper detained the defendant while waiting for a canine to arrive. The dog arrived forty-two minutes later. Drugs were found on the passenger, who implicated the defendant. State trial counsel failed to challenge the legitimacy of the Read and Sign book that prompted the detention. Instead, he simply challenged the length of the detention. Based on United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221 (1985), a detention based on a “flyer” or something else akin to a “Read and Sign” book requires proof that the author of the flyer had reasonable suspicion to list the suspect as a criminal. In this case, however, the state offered no proof that the Read and Sign book was based on reliable information. Moreover, the state’s contention that the defendant’s nervousness justified a detention was meritless. Nervousness may be a basis for an articulable suspicion, but only when it is coupled with evasive behavior. The state trial lawyer’s failure to challenge the stop and search on this basis was ineffective assistance of counsel. The Sixth Circuit also noted that Hensley is not limited to initial stops, but also covers situations in which a stop is prolonged based on this type of information. The Sixth Circuit concludes that not only was trial counsel ineffective, but appellate counsel was, as well.

Garcia v. United States, 278 F.3d 134 (2d Cir. 2002)
Counsel’s advice to the defendant that he could not file a notice of appeal because of an appeal waiver was incorrect, and violated the defendant’s right to effective assistance of counsel. When a habeas petitioner successfully shows that he was denied the right to direct appeal, the proper remedy is to vacate the sentence and remand for re-sentencing.

Blankenship v. Johnson, 118 F.3d 312 (5th Cir. 1997)
If the state seeks discretionary review of the decision of the first appellate court, the defendant has the right to the assistance of counsel at this discretionary review proceeding. In this case, the appointed counsel did nothing. This amounts to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hughes v. Booker, 220 F.3d 346 (5th Cir. 2000)
Mississippi law enabled an appointed appellate counsel to withdraw after filing a certificate that stated that no reversible errors were found in a review of the record. This certificate did not satisfy the requirements of Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967).

Jackson v. Leonardo, 162 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 1998)
Petitioner’s appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise a double jeopardy argument on appeal, challenging his conviction on two counts that could not be prosecuted separately without violating the double jeopardy clause.

Ludwig v. United States, 162 F.3d 456 (6th Cir. 1998)
An attorney’s failure to file a notice of appeal, despite the wishes of the defendant, amounts to ineffective assistance of counsel, regardless of the merits of the appeal.

Roe v. Delo, 160 F.3d 416 (8th Cir. 1998)
Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to assert that it was plain error to give an incorrect definition of first degree murder instruction to the jury. The state court instruction erroneously informed the jury that an intent to cause serious physical injury to the victim was a sufficiently culpable state of mind to support a first degree murder conviction. Actually, in Missouri, an intent to kill is required for a first degree murder conviction. The Eighth Circuit grants the writ: the remedy was to release the petitioner unless he was allowed to file a new appeal including this ground, in the state appellate court.

Claudio v. Scully, 982 F.2d 798 (2d Cir. 1992)

Defendant’s first attorney allowed the defendant to make a confession. Under state law, the right to counsel had attached at this point. The trial court held that the confession should be suppressed because the first attorney rendered ineffective assistance of counsel. A new attorney was retained; the state appealed to the first-level appellate court and the trial court’s decision was reversed, on the theory that although there was a right to counsel at the time of the confession under the state constitution, there was no right to effective assistance. The second attorney did not raise the state right to counsel in his appeal of this decision to the second-level appellate court, relying instead on the federal Sixth Amendment (which had not attached, because there was no indictment at the time of the confession). The second attorney’s failure to raise the state constitutional claim in the higher court was ineffective assistance of counsel under the Sixth Amendment.

United States v. Peak, 992 F.2d 39 (4th Cir. 1993)

An attorney’s failure to file a notice of appeal is per se ineffective and there is no requirement that the defendant establish prejudice — that is, the defendant need not establish that the appeal would raise meritorious grounds.

Griffin v. United States, 109 F.3d 1217 (7th Cir. 1997)

The failure to file any brief in support of defendant’s appeal is ineffective assistance.

Mason v. Hanks, 97 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 1996)

Appellate counsel failed to raise on appeal the trial court’s error in permitting the state to introduce hearsay evidence: an informant’s statements that the defendant was dealing drugs. This was ineffective and necessitated granting the writ unless the petitioner was allowed an opportunity to file a new appeal including this issue. Alternatively, the petitioner was entitled to a new trial.

United States v. Nagib, 56 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 1995)

If the defendant told his lawyer to appeal, and the lawyer dropped the ball, then the defendant has been deprived not of effective assistance of counsel, but of any assistance of counsel on appeal. Abandonment is a per se violation of the Sixth Amendment.

Castellanos v. United States, 26 F.3d 717 (7th Cir. 1994)

Where an attorney fails to file an appeal as requested by the client, this amounts to ineffective assistance of counsel per se. There is no requirement of a showing of prejudice.

Thomas v. O’Leary, 856 F.2d 1011 (7th Cir. 1988)

The defendant won a suppression motion at the trial court, but failed to file any brief in support of this favorable ruling when appealed by the state. The failure to file a brief constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel per se without a showing of prejudice.

United States v. Del Muro, 87 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 1996)

A defendant has a constitutional right to counsel in pursuit of a new trial motion. Here, the defendant, pro se, claimed that trial counsel was ineffective. The district court required trial counsel to represent the defendant in connection with this motion during the new trial motion. This was an improper procedure. Trial counsel had a clear conflict in pursuing the claim that he was ineffective. The trial court should have appointed substitute counsel to prosecute the new trial motion.

Baker v. Kaiser, 929 F.2d 1495 (10th Cir. 1991)

Following his state court conviction, the defendant expressed a desire to appeal, but no appointed counsel filed the proper notice. The defendant was denied effective assistance of appellate counsel. Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387 (1985); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963).

Abels v. Kaiser, 913 F.2d 821 (10th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was denied the effective assistance of counsel on appeal, because his attorney withdrew and the State refused to provide him with appointed counsel after concluding that the defendant was not indigent. In assessing the prejudice suffered by the defendant by virtue of not being able to appeal his conviction, it is not necessary to assess the merits of any appeal which could have been perfected.

Martin v. United States, 81 F.3d 1083 (11th Cir. 1996)

Where a defendant requests that his attorney file a notice of appeal, even after a guilty plea, if the attorney fails to do so, the defendant is prejudiced and he should thereafter be entitled to file an out-of-time appeal.

Montemoino v. United States, 68 F.3d 416 (11th Cir. 1995)

If an attorney fails to file a notice of appeal following a guilty plea and there is an issue relating to the sentencing guidelines, the defendant may obtain relief based on the ineffectiveness of his attorney. This is an exception to the rule that the failure to file an appeal following the entry of a guilty plea is not grounds for asserting ineffective assistance of counsel. The appropriate remedy is to permit an out-of-time appeal of any sentencing guideline issue.

Orazio v. Dugger, 876 F.2d 1508 (11th Cir. 1989)

Appellate counsel was ineffective because of his failure to appeal the lower court’s denial of the defendant’s motion to proceed pro se. Because of the failure to raise this in the initial appeal, collateral relief was unavailable because of the procedural default.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Ineffective Assistance of Counsel -- Death Penalty Cases)

Rompilla v. Beard, 125 S.Ct. 2456 (2005):
Death penalty counsel’s failure to investigate the circumstances of the defendant’s prior conviction, (such as the file in the clerk’s office) which was used as an aggravating factor in the penalty phase (and which had loads of mitigating evidence present in the clerk’s file) was ineffective and prejudicial. The file of the prior case contained information about the defendant’s childhood and mental health problems.

The Supreme Court held that an attorney may concede the defendant’s guilt during the guilt-innocence portion of a death penalty trial even without the express approval of the defendant. This concession of guilt (prompted by a strategy of prevailing during the sentencing phase) is not the functional equivalent of a guilty plea, which would require a full waiver by the defendant.

The standard of Strickland v. Washington, applies in death penalty cases, even where the defense counsel does virtually nothing during the penalty phase. The Sixth Circuit’s decision applying United States v. Cronic – failure to subject the prosecution’s case to meaningful adversarial testing – was erroneous.

Counsel was ineffective in the death penalty phase. Inadequate pretrial investigation of the defendant’s horrendous upbringing led to a presentation of mitigating evidence at the penalty phase that was inadequate to satisfy Sixth Amendment requirements. Relying on Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362 (2000), the Court held that the state habeas courts used the correct legal standard but that the ruling was “an unreasonable application of clearly established Federal law.”

Over the course of several weeks in the fall of 2009, the Supreme Court issued three per curiam opinions in death penalty cases involving ineffective assistance of counsel claims. In this case, the Court reversed the Eleventh Circuit and held that counsel’s failure to introduce evidence of defendant’s experiences in the Korean War – he was in two battles that resulted in the death of countless soldiers around him and left him with extreme emotional scars – was ineffective assistance of counsel that would have changed the outcome of the trial. The unanimous Court held that his heroic service during these horrific battles surely would have had an impact on any jury.

Sears v. Upton, 130 S. Ct. 3259 (2010)
The state death penalty trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate available mitigation evidence. The state court applied an incorrect standard in determining whether there was prejudice and the Supreme Court remanded for a new determination of prejudice that considered all the evidence presented in the post-conviction pleadings.
Phillips v. White, 851 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 2017)

Trial counsel conducted no investigation and presented no evidence in mitigation at the defendant’s death penalty trial. Nor did he explain to the jury the options that were available and why a lesser sentence than life without parole was appropriate. The jury returned a verdict of life without parole (which the judge followed and imposed). The Sixth Circuit held that the Cronic standard applied and prejudice was presumed, but even under the Strickland standard, the petitioner showed that prejudice resulted from the trial counsel’s failure to investigate, or present mitigating evidence.

Hardwick v. Secretary, Fla. Dept. of Corrections, 803 F.3d 541 (11th Cir. 2015)

Several months before the Supreme Court decided Wiggins v. Smith in 2003, the Eleventh Circuit announced its decision in Hardwick v. Crosby, 320 F.3d 1127 (11th Cir. 2003). Quoting from Strickland, the court wrote:

Counsel’s duty of inquiry in the death penalty sentencing phase is somewhat unique. First, the preparation and investigation for the penalty phase are different from the guilt phase. The penalty phase focuses not on absolving the defendant from guilt, but rather on the production of evidence to make a case for life. The purpose of investigation is to find witnesses to help humanize the defendant, given that a jury has found him guilty of a capital offense. Counsel has a duty to make reasonable investigations or to make a reasonable decision that makes particular investigations unnecessary. 320 F.3d at 1163, quoting Strickland, 466 U.S. at 691, 104 S. Ct. at 2066.

The Hardwick court went on to hold that the failure to do any investigation because of the mistaken notion that mitigating evidence is inappropriate is indisputably below reasonable professional norms. Moreover, when mental health mitigating evidence is available, and absolutely none was presented by counsel to the sentencing body, and no strategic reason was put forward for this failure, this omission is objectively unreasonable. 320 F.3d at 1164. The same reasoning applies to evidence relating to defendant’s family background, and alcohol and drug abuse. In Hardwick, trial counsel presented no evidence during either the guilt-innocence, or penalty phase of the trial. Available evidence documented that the defendant was drugged and drunk at the time of the crime. This evidence could have led the jury, or the sentencing judge, to find that the defendant lacked the judgment to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law. Additional evidence established that he was reared in a dysfunctional family and suffered mental and physical abuse as a child and teen. The Eleventh Circuit concluded that a full evidentiary hearing was required in the district court to determine whether the writ should be granted. When that hearing was held, the district court concluded that the defendant was deprived of the effective assistance of counsel and the Eleventh Circuit affirmed, setting aside the death penalty. Hardwick v. Secretary, Fla. Dept. of Corrections, 803 F.3d 541 (11th Cir. 2015).

Saranchak v. Secretary, Pa. Dept. of Corrections, 802 F.3d 579 (3rd Cir. 2015)
There were sufficient red flags of mental illness that defense counsel was aware of through his investigation that further inquiry and investigation was required and the failure to do so amounted to deficient penalty phase performance.

_Bemore v. Chappell_, 788 F.3d 1151 (9th Cir. 2015)

Trial counsel’s penalty phase preparation was deficient and necessitated setting aside the death sentence in this case. The evidence of organic brain damage was readily available and should have been developed and presented during the penalty phase.

_Pruitt v. Neal_, 788 F.3d 248 (7th Cir. 2015)

Trial counsel’s performance during the penalty phase investigation was objectively deficient because of the failure to locate the develop evidence that the defendant suffered from paranoid schizophrenia.

_Doe v. Ayers_, 782 F.3d 425 (9th Cir. 2015)

The available evidence that could have been presented during the mitigation phase of this death penalty case included abuse as a child, significant brutality and rapes that defendant suffered when imprisoned at a young age and other evidence of a deprived childhood. This lengthy opinion by Judge Reinhart is encyclopedic in its review of the duty of trial counsel to investigate and present mitigating evidence, even when not assisted by the defendant himself, and to pursue all leads that might exist based on the information that is furnished by family members.

_Wharton v. Chappell_, 765 F.3d 953 (9th Cir 2014)

Trial counsel’s failure to present evidence about the defendant suffering sexual abuse as a child constituted ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase.

_DeBruce v. Commissioner, Ala. Dept. of Corrections_, 758 F.3d 1263 (11th Cir. 2014)

Trial counsel performed inadequately in preparing for the mitigation phase of this death penalty trial. He had no investigator working on the mitigating evidence and failed to locate and present available mental health evidence.

_Stankewitz v. Wong_, 698 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir. 2012)

State trial counsel’s failure to investigate present substantial available mitigation evidence about the defendant’s upbringing, mental illness, and drug use was ineffective assistance of counsel that required that the death penalty be set aside in this case.

_Cauthern v. Colson_, 736 F.3d 465 (6th Cir. 2013)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly develop and present available mitigating evidence.

_Hooks v. Workman_, 689 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2012)

Counsel’s death penalty presentation was sub-par in numerous respects, including a failure to develop and present family and social history, failure to present available and significant mental-health evidence and failure to rebut the prosecution’s case in aggravation.
State trial counsel were ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and prepare a mental retardation defense in this death penalty prosecution.

Trial counsel’s inadequate investigation into the defendant’s mental health problems, as well as his drug abuse and other childhood problems amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel necessitating that the death penalty be vacated. Affirmed on remand from the Supreme Court, 733 F.3d 911 (9th Cir. 2013)

Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in this death penalty trial because of his failure to locate and present mitigating evidence.

Ineffective mitigation phase preparation.

Trial counsel’s failure to obtain records from the Children’s Services Office that documented the incredibly abusive and horror of the defendant’s childhood and to interview family members, as well counsel’s failure to retain a mitigation expert, or to interview the defense-retained psychologist, was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to locate and present available mitigating evidence in this death penalty case. There was considerable evidence of the abuse defendant suffered as a child and psychological evidence was also available, but never developed by the defense.

The trial attorney failed to perform adequate investigation into defendant’s abusive childhood. His mother and brother both committed suicide – a fact that the attorney never learned – and his father regularly abused him. The defendant witnessed prior suicide attempts by his mother. “No reasonable attorney who has every expectation that his client will be convicted and will be facing a death sentence would wait until the guilt stage ended before beginning to investigate the existence of non-statutory mitigating circumstances. No reasonable attorney, after being told by his client that he had an abusive upbringing, would fail to interview members of his client’s family who were readily available and could corroborate or refute the allegations of abuse. No reasonable attorney told by his client that he had an alcoholic and abusive father would fail to pursue those non-statutory mitigating circumstances simply because the father denied it.”

Trial counsel’s mitigation evidence investigation was inadequate in failing to locate and present evidence of the horrific childhood the defendant endured.
Ferrell v. Hall, 640 F.3d 1199 (11th Cir. 2011)
Trial counsel was ineffective in investigating and presenting mitigating evidence in this death penalty trial. Trial counsel never discovered the extent of defendant’s extensive disabling mental health problems. Nor did they learn about his suicide attempt at age eleven, as well as his organic brain damage. Nor did they learn about the father’s abusive behavior.

Griffin v. Pierce, 622 F.3d 831 (7th Cir. 2010)
Trial counsel’s failure to engage in any mitigation investigation was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Stanley v. Schriro, 598 F.3d 612 (9th Cir. 2010)
Commenting, that “We simply cannot in good conscience continue to send men to their deaths without ensuring that their cases were not prejudiced by inadequate legal representation at any phase of [death penalty] proceedings” the Ninth Circuit sent this case back to the habeas court to consider the allegations that a sufficient pursuit of mitigating evidence was not undertaken by defense counsel.

Robinson v. Schriro, 595 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2010)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate possible mitigating evidence and presented no evidence or witnesses during the penalty phase. The failure to present evidence about his abused childhood and psychological impairments was prejudicial and a new sentencing hearing was necessary to afford the defendant the effective assistance of counsel.

Johnson v. Mitchell, 585 F.3d 923 (6th Cir. 2009)
Trial counsel’s sole preparation for the penalty phase was to ask the defendant for anybody who could say something nice about him. The defendant could not think of anybody, so no mitigating evidence was presented at the sentencing phase. The Sixth Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus as to the sentencing phase.

Hamilton v. Ayers, 583 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 2009)
Trial counsel’s failure to properly investigate and present mitigating evidence amounted to a denial of the sixth amendment right to effective assistance of counsel. There was abundant evidence available (indeed, some of it in the trial counsel’s file, but he had never reviewed it) dealing with the defendant’s upbringing in various foster homes.

Sechrest v. Ignacio, 549 F.3d 789 (9th Cir. 2008)
Counsel was ineffective in providing to the prosecution a confidential psychiatric report that provided considerable ammunition to the prosecutor during the penalty phase. The defense had decided not to use the expert and there was no other evidence that supported the psychiatric diagnosis that was so damning to the defense. The defense attorney also should not have stipulated to the admissibility of his own expert as a witness for the prosecution.

Johnson v. Bagley, 544 F.3d 592 (6th Cir. 2008)
Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance in investigating potential mitigation evidence. The fact that the defendant was not cooperative is not a basis to foreclose reasonable investigation. The Sixth Circuit cited the ABA Guidelines on death-penalty representation as a good guide in determining what is necessary to fulfill counsel’s duty.

_Mason v. Mitchell_, 543 F.3d 766 (6th Cir. 2008)

Counsel failed to adequately investigate defendant’s childhood. He interviewed none of the members of defendant’s family and relied exclusively on the records produced by the state. This was ineffective assistance of counsel and required granting a writ on the death sentence.

_Williams v. Allen_, 542 F.3d 1326 (11th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel’s preparation of the mitigating phase of this death penalty trial was inadequate and was ineffective assistance of counsel. Testimony offered during the habeas hearing about the abuse that the defendant suffered as a child was available and portrayed a level of abuse that was astounding, including the use of deadly weapons by the defendant’s father against the defendant, his siblings and his mother.

_KINDLER v. HORN_, 542 F.3d 70 (3rd Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel’s failure to investigate available mitigating evidence relating to the defendant’s background and mental health problems amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. See 642 F.3d 398, opinion on remand from the Supreme Court.

_Bond v. Beard_, 539 F.3d 256 (3rd Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately present mitigating evidence relating to defendant’s mental health and dysfunctional family.

_Jells v. Mitchell_, 538 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to prepare for the mitigation phase of this death penalty trial and in failing to use a mitigation specialist.

_Gray v. Branker_, 529 F.3d 220 (4th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to investigate develop the available evidence of the defendant’s severe mental illness.

_Duncan v. Ornoski_, 528 F.3d 1222 (9th Cir. 2008)

Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to properly investigate certain blood evidence that was found at the scene of the murder that might have implicated another person as the trigger man. Lawyers have considerable discretion to make strategic decisions about what to investigate, but only after those lawyers have gathered sufficient evidence upon which to base their tactical choices. When defense counsel merely believes certain testimony might not be helpful, no reasonable basis exists for deciding not to investigate. It is especially important for counsel to seek the advice of an expert when he has no knowledge or expertise about the field. While the evidence would not have altered the defendant’s conviction for felony murder, a reasonable probability existed that this would have altered the jury’s decision to impose the death penalty.
Lawhorn v. Allen, 519 F.3d 1272 (11th Cir. 2008)

Counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel by waiving closing argument in the penalty phase of a death penalty trial. The attorney made this decision erroneously believing that this would bar the prosecutor from giving a closing argument. The attorney was legally wrong: the prosecutor was permitted to give a closing argument despite the defendant’s waiver.

Morales v. Mitchell, 507 F.3d 916 (6th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel was ineffective during the penalty phase of the death penalty trial. He failed to adequately investigate defendant’s background and failed to interview key witnesses. Nor did he hire a mitigation expert or investigator or contact any of the defendant’s family members, except for his father.

Haliym v. Mitchell, 492 F.3d 680 (6th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel inadequately investigated defendant’s background and presented a constitutionally ineffective mitigation phase case. Evidence of the defendant’s abusive upbringing and the loss of his family (his father died of a drug overdose) should have been discovered and presented at trial.

Lambright v. Schriro, 490 F.3d 1103 (9th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel did virtually nothing to prepare for the penalty phase of this death penalty trial. The Ninth Circuit granted a writ. The fact that the mitigating evidence (Vietnam-induced trauma and other psychological issues) did not relate specifically to the offense did not lessen the impact the evidence may have had on the jury when considering what sentence to impose.

Stevens v. McBride, 489 F.3d 883 (7th Cir. 2007)

Defense counsel’s investigation into mitigating evidence was insufficient and, coupled with disastrous penalty phase decisions, necessitated granting a writ of habeas corpus. The defense hired a psychiatrist who turned out to be somewhat of a quack (he did not believe that mental illness existed) and when he wrote a report that was extremely unfavorable, he told the defense lawyers that he wrote the report in order to sandbag the prosecution and that when called to the stand he would be like Christine Helm Vole in Witness for the Prosecution. The defense did not call the psychiatrist at trial, but did call him as a witness in the penalty phase. During his testimony, things went from bad to worse (including a disclosure by the psychiatrist that the defendant masturbated on the victim, a young boy, after killing him). The Seventh Circuit concluded that the sentencing phase presentation amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Anderson v. Sirmons, 476 F.3d 1131 (10th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel focused almost exclusively on the guilt-innocence phase of the trial and failed to investigate, locate, or present mitigating evidence that was available. Evidence was available about the defendant’s upbringing in circumstances of neglect and abuse. Failing to perform proper investigation was ineffective and prejudicial. A writ of habeas corpus was granted as to the penalty phase.

Joseph v. Coyle, 469 F.3d 441 (6th Cir. 2006)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the indictment and jury instructions in this case, which failed to properly allege and explain the aggravating specification that supported the death sentence.

Correll v. Ryan, 539 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel was ineffective in his investigation and presentation of mitigating evidence in this death penalty trial. No effort was made to gather psychiatric records and he made insufficient efforts to obtain “he’s a good person” evidence.

Frierson v. Woodford, 463 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2006)

Counsel was ineffective in his preparation of the penalty phase of this death penalty trial and was also ineffective in failing to challenge the propriety of a witness’s invocation of the Fifth Amendment. The defendant attempted during the penalty phase to show that another person had committed a prior murder that the state was using as an aggravating circumstance. That person invoked his Fifth Amendment, but he had already been acquitted of the charge in juvenile court, so the invocation was invalid. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the facts of this case were materially indistinguishable from the facts in Rompilla v. Beard, 125 S.Ct. 2456 (2005).

Williams v. Anderson, 460 F.3d 789 (6th Cir. 2006)

The defense attorney delivered an incomprehensible closing argument that seemed to suggest that the only reason to return a life sentence was residual doubt. The only evidence he offered during the penalty phase was the defendant’s testimony, during which he made a two or three sentence plea for mercy. The defense attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hovey v. Ayers, 458 F.3d 892 (9th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly prepare his mitigation psychiatric expert, including failing to provide him with all the background psychiatric information from the defendant’s background that was available.

Poindexter v. Mitchell, 454 F.3d 564 (6th Cir. 2006)

State trial counsel was ineffective in investigating possible mitigation evidence. The defendant’s father beat him; his mother attempted to kill him; and he was constantly malnourished and sent to school in filthy clothes.

Dickerson v. Bagley, 453 F.3d 690 (6th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel conducted inadequate mitigating evidence investigation. The defendant’s childhood was marked by violence, pimps and prostitutes. He had an IQ of 77. The attorney waived his right to a jury on the belief that a conversation he had with a judge assured him that the death penalty would not be imposed and that no mitigating evidence needed to be presented.

Draughon v. Dretke, 427 F.3d 286 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was sentenced to death based on a conviction for killing a bystander after attempting to rob a store. The defendant admitted trying to rob the store and that when he fled, he was scared of the people who were chasing him and that he fired into the air to get them to stop chasing him. Defense counsel did not hire a firearm’s expert to analyze the path of the bullet. The state argued that the shooting was point-blank from a short distance. At the habeas hearing, the defendant offered evidence that the bullet clearly ricocheted off the pavement into the victim’s body. The Fifth Circuit held that defense counsel’s failure to retain a ballistics expert prior to trial was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Marshall v. Cathel, 428 F.3d 452 (3rd Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel failed to engage in any investigation in preparation for the penalty phase of this death penalty trial. The Third Circuit set aside the death sentence.

Daniels v. Woodford, 428 F.3d 1181 (9th Cir. 2005)

The public defender’s office suffered from a conflict of interest that should have led the trial court to appoint replacement counsel in this death penalty case. The defendant, who had been convicted of a previous crime, had filed a habeas corpus petition against the public defender’s office in connection with the earlier case. Finally, shortly before trial, the court appointed two lawyers to replace the public defenders. For both the new attorneys, this was their first capital case. There was almost complete distrust between the defendant and his newly appointed attorneys (one of whom had recently left the DA’s office). By the time of trial, the attorneys and the defendant were not on speaking terms. Virtually no investigation into possible mitigating evidence was undertaken by the attorneys. The Ninth Circuit concluded that there was a presumption of prejudice caused by the conflict and the writ was granted.

Summerlin v. Schriro, 427 F.3d 623 (9th Cir. 2005)

Despite the defendant’s request that the attorney present no mitigation evidence, the attorney is professionally obligated to investigate all available mitigation evidence that was available.

Earp v. Stokes, 423 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was entitled to an evidentiary hearing on his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel relating to inadequate penalty phase investigation. Amended and superseded at 431 F.3d 1158 (9th Cir. 2005).

Smith v. Dretke, 422 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 2005)

The petitioner submitted sufficient evidence to support the necessity of a hearing on his claim that his trial counsel inadequately investigated the availability of mitigating evidence in his state death penalty trial.

Harries v. Bell, 417 F.3d 631 (6th Cir. 2005)

Counsel’s penalty phase investigation was deficient. Counsel failed to adequately investigate the defendant’s mental health background and or to seek the assistance of a mental health expert. Counsel also failed to fully explore issues relating to the defendant’s family upbringing.

Boyde v. Brown, 404 F.3d 1159 (9th Cir. 2005)

Counsel’s failure to present evidence of the defendant’s childhood abuse during the penalty phase was ineffective assistance of counsel. The decision was amended to order a remand to the district court for a hearing on the question of prejudice. The court also ordered that the case be re-assigned to a different district court judge. 421 F.3d 1154

_Canaan v. McBride_, 395 F.3d 376 (7th Cir. 2005)
Failing to advise a defendant in a death penalty case that he may testify during the penalty phase – even if he did not testify in the guilt-innocence phase – is ineffective assistance of counsel.

_Smith v. Mullin_, 379 F.3d 919 (10th Cir. 2004)
Trial counsel failed to adequately develop evidence of defendant’s mental illness. At the habeas hearing, in fact, counsel conceded that he did not even know that this would be admissible evidence in the penalty phase. The death sentence was set aside.

_Allen v. Woodford_, 366 F.3d 823 (9th Cir. 2004)
Trial counsel performed deficiently in waiting until one week prior to trial to prepare for the sentencing phase of this death penalty case – however, there was no showing of prejudice, because the evidence was overwhelming that the defendant was guilty of a triple murder as well as having conspired to murder several other people. Opinion amended at 395 F.3d 979 (9th Cir. 2004).

_Stanekowitz v. Woodford_, 365 F.3d 706 (9th Cir. 2004)
Based on the Supreme Court decisions in _Wiggins v. Smith_, 123 S.Ct. 2527 (2003) and _Williams v. Taylor_, 529 U.S. 362 (2000), a remand was required in this case to determine if more effective development of the defendant’s background should have been undertaken by trial counsel.

_Roberts v. Dretke_, 356 F.3d 632 (5th Cir. 2004)
Trial counsel complied with the defendant’s demands not to pursue certain lines of defense. Complying with these demands, however, arguably amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel, because of the defendant’s mental illness. A Certificate of Appealability should have been granted to evaluate this claim. Specifically, counsel should have consulted more with the court-appointed psychiatrist and should have properly developed the mental health evidence.

_Lewis v. Dretke_, 355 F.3d 364 (5th Cir. 2004)
Trial counsel’s failure to investigate information relating to defendant’s childhood abuse was ineffective assistance of counsel.

_Hamblin v. Mitchell_, 354 F.3d 482 (6th Cir. 2003)
Counsel’s deficient performance during the preparation of the penalty phase of this death penalty trial required that the sentence be set aside. He made no effort to find the defendant’s family history or mental health background.

_Frazier v. Huffman_, 343 F.3d 780 (6th Cir. 2003)
The entire penalty phase on the part of the defendant was his unsworn statement declaring his innocence and requesting mercy. The trial attorney failed to introduce evidence of the defendant’s brain injury. He failed to introduce any evidence of his background, history, or character.

Brownlee v. Haley, 306 F.3d 1043 (11th Cir. 2002)

The two defense attorneys spent a total of one and one-half hours with the defendant prior to trial. They interviewed no witnesses, did not investigate. Spoke to none of his family members and made no effort to compile a psychological profile. They presented no evidence during the penalty phase and their combined closing arguments were contained in five pages of the transcript. Ironically, during the closing argument, one of the lawyers lamented to the jury that the jurors did not know the defendant as a person, like the lawyers did. There was, in fact, considerable mitigating evidence that was available. The writ was granted with regard to the penalty phase.

Caro v. Woodford, 280 F.3d 1247 (9th Cir. 2002)

The habeas court found that the defendant suffered brain damage as a result of his personal background (exposure to crop dusters and poisoned drinking water) and exposure to neurotoxicants (pesticides). Trial counsel’s failure to investigate this mitigation evidence and to present it to the jury during the penalty phase of the trial was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Silva v. Woodford, 279 F.3d 825 (9th Cir. 2002)

Trial counsel’s failure to investigate and present mitigation evidence was ineffective. Trial counsel claimed that the defendant absolutely barred him from conducting any investigation into his background. The Ninth Circuit held that a client’s wishes have some weight when it comes to which witnesses to call, but the client’s wishes should not control the attorney’s independent investigation of the defendant’s background.

Sallahdin v. Gibson, 275 F.3d 1211 (10th Cir. 2002)

Trial counsel was arguably ineffective in failing to present evidence of defendant’s steroid use in mitigation during the sentencing phase of his death penalty trial. At the time of defendant’s trial, there was substantial and consistent scientific literature showing that anabolic steroids could cause severe psychiatric effects in some individuals. Introducing this evidence might have altered the jury’s decision regarding the aggravating circumstance of future dangerousness. Moreover, it would have explained how the defendant, who was known to be mild-mannered, suddenly participated in the brutal murder involved in this case. Nevertheless, the case was remanded for the trial court to better assess whether counsel had evaluated each of these factors and whether he was, therefore, ineffective, or simply exercising strategic judgment.

The attorney appointed to represent the defendant during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial did nothing to prepare for the penalty phase, relying instead on the guilt-innocence attorney’s potential competency presentation. Significant neuropsychological evidence would have been available had the attorney properly investigated the available mitigating evidence. The court also held, “The family portrait painted at the federal habeas hearing was far different from the unfocused snapshot handed the superior court jury. The jury which committed [petitioner] to death had no knowledge of the indisputably sadistic treatment [he] received as a child, including repeated beatings which left a permanent indentation in his head.”

Rickman v. Bell, 131 F.3d 1150 (6th Cir. 1997)

Trial counsel's defense in this death penalty case fell far below the standard required by the Sixth Amendment. The crime, to be sure, was atrocious. Nevertheless, the defense attorney, for all purposes, joined forces with the prosecution in presenting the case. Repeatedly, the attorney elicited testimony about the defendant's violent, aggressive, criminal behavior, and his proclivity to commit violent acts without provocation. He expressly revealed his contempt for the defendant. The trial counsel's conduct, according to the Sixth Circuit opinion, was "appalling."

Caro v. Calderon, 165 F.3d 1223 (9th Cir. 1999)

Counsel’s failure to develop evidence regarding the defendant’s brain damage and poisoning required an evidentiary hearing in the lower court to further evaluate the ineffective assistance of counsel claim.

Smith v. Stewart, 140 F.3d 1263 (9th Cir. 1998)

Trial counsel was ineffective during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial. He presented no mitigating evidence and essentially presumed no argument on defendant's behalf. There was no tactical reason offered for the failure to present mitigating evidence and such evidence did exist, such as his drug addiction, and his family relationships.

Bloom v. Calderon, 132 F.3d 1267 (9th Cir. 1997)

The petitioner was convicted in state court of killing his father, stepmother and stepsister. He was sentenced to death. Trial counsel, however, failed to adequately prepare a psychiatric defense, including waiting until just before trial to hire an expert, and then providing too little information to the expert to aid him in preparing psychiatric report. In the habeas proceeding, it was revealed that the defendant suffered from a long history of severe childhood abuse. He was born into a family plagued by generations of mental illness and domestic abuse. A psychologist testified that the defendant's testing revealed striking, consistent and clear evidence of cognitive sensori-motor deficits, brain dysfunction and brain damage. None of this evidence was uncovered by the trial counsel. Trial counsel's performance was constitutionally deficient and necessitated granting the writ.

Dobbs v. Turpin, 142 F.3d 1383 (11th Cir. 1998)

This was the fourth time this case had been considered by the Eleventh Circuit. In this appeal, the court concluded that the defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel because his attorney made no effort to investigate the defendant’s background; did not make a strategic decision to present no mitigating evidence; and made an ineffective closing argument (including making a prediction that the Supreme Court would once again invalidate the death penalty and that no executions would occur; and failed to make any particularized plea for mercy for the defendant).
Austin v. Bell, 126 F.3d 843 (6th Cir. 1997)

Defense counsel’s failure to conduct any investigation or to present any mitigation during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Glenn v. Tate, 71 F.3d 1204 (6th Cir. 1995)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate and prepare the mitigation portion of this death penalty trial. The defendant had organic brain damage, yet, no effort was made to develop psychiatric evidence, or evidence of his troubled childhood and mental retardation. Counsel also failed to request expert assistance, relying, instead, on court-appointed doctors whose reports were not favorable to the defense.

Hall v. Washington, 106 F.3d 742 (7th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to develop and present mitigating evidence. Among the witnesses who were available was a prison guard who would have testified that the defendant was a good prisoner. He had also saved someone’s life during a robbery in the past.

Emerson v. Gramley, 91 F.3d 898 (7th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in preparing and presenting the penalty phase evidence at this death penalty trial. He offered no evidence.

Brewer v. Aiken, 935 F.2d 850 (7th Cir. 1991)

Counsel’s performance during the penalty phase was ineffective in light of his failure to introduce any evidence of the defendant’s mental and family history, as well as his inadequate presentation and argument of mitigating evidence.

Antwine v. Delo, 54 F.3d 1357 (8th Cir. 1995)

Defense counsel’s failure to investigate the defendant’s psychological background was ineffective. A proper investigation would have revealed that the defendant suffered from bipolar disorder. This likely would have affected the sentencing proceeding and spared the defendant a death sentence.

Hill v. Lockhart, 28 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 1994)

The defense attorneys provided ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase, because of their failure to adequately discover and present evidence of the defendant’s psychiatric problems.

Starr v. Lockhart, 23 F.3d 1280 (8th Cir. 1994)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to jury instructions during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial relating to “pecuniary gain” and “heinous, atrocious, or cruel” aggravating circumstances. Both of these aggravating circumstances had been found unconstitutional at the time of the defendant’s trial. Though the “pecuniary gain” circumstance was later found to be constitutional (and thus there was no prejudice from failing to object to this instruction), the “heinous, atrocious, or cruel” circumstance was unconstitutionally vague and did not adequately limit the death-eligible defendants. See Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980); and Maynard v. Cartwright, 486 U.S. 356 (1988). Though one aggravating circumstance was still valid, in a “weighing” state, such as Arkansas (the jury weighs the aggravating circumstances against the mitigating circumstances), if there is one invalid aggravating circumstance, the death sentence must be set aside.
Kenley v. Armontrout, 937 F.2d 1298 (8th Cir. 1991)
Counsel’s failure to present available mitigating evidence, including both lay and expert testimony relating to his troubled childhood and abusive father, his prior psychological history and his alcohol problem, amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hendricks v. Calderon, 70 F.3d 1032 (9th Cir. 1995)
The defense attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel at the sentencing phase of this death penalty trial. In short, the attorney developed no mitigating evidence. This was not a matter of strategy, but a matter of neglect. The defendant’s “strategy” was, “Let’s put on whatever we have and beg for mercy.” The attorney was on notice that the defendant suffered from some mental impairment.

Clabourne v. Lewis, 64 F.3d 1373 (9th Cir. 1995)
The defense attorney rendered ineffective assistance during the sentencing phase of this death penalty trial. He called no witnesses, introduced no evidence of the defendant’s mental illness and did not argue any mitigating circumstances, other than the defendant’s mental condition at the time of the offense. The attorney did not introduce sufficient evidence at trial to make up for this deficiency.

Wade v. Calderon, 29 F.3d 1312 (9th Cir. 1994)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately present mitigating evidence during the penalty phase of this death penalty prosecution. Among other things, the attorney called the defendant, who had multiple personality disorder, to the stand and elicited testimony from the defendant’s “other personality” who was profane and insulting and requested the death penalty for the defendant. No evidence of the defendant’s abused childhood was introduced. Finally, the defense attorney in closing argument suggested the death penalty might be the appropriate thing to do to spare the defendant the misery he had endured his whole life.

Counsel’s failure to contact any of the death penalty defendant’s family members. Counsel presented the testimony of a psychologist to testify about the effects of the defendant’s traumatic childhood. However, there was no proof that the defendant suffered a traumatic childhood. The prosecutor’s cross-examination of the psychologist, therefore, was most effective and the defense counsel’s failure to prove the facts upon which the expert rendered her opinion might have been ineffective. A remand was necessary to more fully develop this claim.

Evans v. Lewis, 855 F.2d 631 (9th Cir. 1988)
During the sentencing phase of a death penalty trial, the defense attorney failed to offer any evidence regarding his client’s mental instability. The failure to investigate was not a trial tactic in light of the attorney’s failure to produce any evidence in mitigation. This constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel requiring a new penalty phase trial.

Osborn v. Shillinger, 861 F.2d 612 (10th Cir. 1988)
At the defendant’s death penalty trial, his attorney failed to adequately prepare the defense he chose and failed to investigate other plausible lines of defense. He also failed to uncover or investigate any mitigating evidence including the medical history of the defendant. The defense attorney failed to fulfill his duty of loyalty to his client and failed to object to the prosecutor’s engaging in ex parte communications with the trial judge. This all constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel.

_Baxter v. Thomas_, 45 F.3d 1501 (11th Cir. 1995)

Defendant’s trial counsel in this death penalty case failed to adequately investigate the defendant’s long history of mental illness. This was ineffective assistance of counsel at the sentencing phase and required that the sentence be set aside. Among other things, the attorneys failed to discover that the defendant had been committed to Central State Hospital because of his mental illness.

_Jackson v. Herring_, 42 F.3d 1350 (11th Cir. 1995)

Trial counsel’s failure to introduce any evidence in mitigation, or to prepare for the sentencing phase of this death penalty trial rendered him ineffective and required setting aside the death sentence. There was substantial evidence that the defendant was abused as a child, was an alcoholic and that a prior killing (she killed her former boyfriend) was the result of being abused. The decision not to introduce any mitigating evidence was not the result of any strategic planning. There simply was no planning.

_Cave v. Singeltary_, 971 F.2d 1513 (11th Cir. 1992)

Counsel’s failure to prepare for the sentencing portion of defendant’s death penalty trial prejudiced him and necessitated a new sentencing trial. No mitigation witnesses were presented despite the availability of the defendant’s mother and other relatives.

_Blanco v. Singletary_, 943 F.2d 1477 (11th Cir. 1991)

Counsel’s failure to undertake a reasonable search for mitigating evidence for presentation during the sentencing phase of this death penalty trial was ineffective assistance of counsel. This ineffectiveness was compounded by the attorney’s statement to the trial judge (who, in Florida ultimately sentences the defendant) that no mitigating evidence existed.

_Horton v. Zant_, 941 F.2d 1449 (11th Cir. 1991)

Defendant’s trial counsel was ineffective in the sentencing phase of this death penalty trial. The attorney offered no evidence and made no opening. His closing argument focused on the history of the death penalty in Georgia. During the closing, the attorney distanced himself from his client, acknowledging that perhaps it was best for the defendant to die – that perhaps the defendant was a worthless person. This was ineffective and prejudicial.

_Cunningham v. Zant_, 928 F.2d 1006 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase of this death penalty prosecution. Despite the availability of such evidence, the defense failed to introduce evidence of the defendant’s mental retardation, head injury, the death of his father when the defendant was a child, his socioeconomic background, the lack of any schooling beyond elementary school, and his reputation as a good father.

_Harris v. Dugger_, 874 F.2d 756 (11th Cir. 1989)

Two attorneys representing the defendant in this death penalty trial believed that the other was investigating mitigating evidence in preparation for the sentencing phase. This does not constitute a strategic decision but mere neglect and requires the granting of habeas corpus relief.

_Middleton v. Dugger_, 849 F.2d 491 (11th Cir. 1988)

Trial counsel’s failure to conduct a reasonable background investigation and thus unearth overwhelming amounts of documentary and mitigating evidence was ineffective assistance of counsel. The psychiatric evidence in the existing documents had the potential to totally change the picture of the defendant and his homicidal behavior.

Stephens v. Kemp, 846 F.2d 642 (11th Cir. 1988)

Despite having learned from the defendant’s sister that the defendant had spent time in a mental hospital prior to the shooting, counsel failed to investigate, present any evidence or argue to the jury the issue of the defendant’s mental history. The Eleventh Circuit holds that this is ineffective assistance of counsel.

Armstrong v. Dugger, 833 F.2d 1430 (11th Cir. 1987)

The defense counsel failed to investigate and present available mitigating evidence at the defendant’s death penalty trial. The writ was granted.

Agan v. Dugger, 828 F.2d 1496 (11th Cir. 1987)

The defense counsel spent fifteen hours in preparation for this death penalty case. The Eleventh Circuit holds that an evidentiary hearing on the ineffective assistance of counsel claim was necessary.

Magill v. Dugger, 824 F.2d 879 (11th Cir. 1987)

Both the guilt phase and the penalty phase of the defendant’s conviction are reversed on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel. The attorney replaced the public defender during the first day of jury selection to the surprise of both the public defender and the defendant. He met with the defendant only 15 minutes prior to the defendant’s testimony in his case-in-chief.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(INEFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL – GUILTY PLEA)

The failure to advise a defendant about the deportation consequences of entering a plea in a felony drug case amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Court held that in certain situations, the failure to provide any advice constitutes ineffective assistance – especially where the consequence of a plea is easy to determine and is “automatic” – while in other cases, it is required at a minimum that counsel advise the defendant that there may be immigration consequences and that the defendant should seek advice from an immigration law attorney. In other words, to be effective, an attorney may be required to actually provide accurate advice if the immigration consequences are clear; and at a minimum, should warn the defendant of possible consequences if the result of entering a plea is not so clear. The Court held that the right to effective assistance of counsel is not violated only when counsel provides erroneous advice.

When a defendant challenges a guilty plea after sentencing on the ground that his lawyer provided him ineffective assistance, he must demonstrate that (1) his counsel’s advice was not within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases, and (2) there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel’s errors, he would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial.

Failure to communicate to the defendant a plea offer is ineffective assistance of counsel. To show prejudice where a plea offer has lapsed or been rejected because of counsel’s deficient performance, the defendant must demonstrate a reasonable probability both that he would have accepted the more favorable plea offer had he been afforded effective assistance of counsel and that the plea would have been entered without the prosecution’s canceling it or the trial court’s refusing to accept it, if they had the authority to exercise that discretion under state law.

Where counsel’s ineffective advice led to an offer’s rejection, and where the prejudice alleged is having to stand trial, a defendant must show that but for the ineffective advice, there is a reasonable probability that the plea offer would have been presented to the court, that the court would have accepted its terms, and that the conviction or sentence, or both, under the offer’s terms would have been less severe than under the actual judgment and sentence imposed.

The defendant was facing a 30-year sentence if he pled guilty, but if he rejected the plea, he was facing a superseding indictment with a potential for considerably more, including 35-years mandatory for successive § 924(c) violations. He contended in his § 2255 that his counsel did not advise him about the potential exposure if he rejected the 30-year deal. The D.C. Circuit held that a remand to determine if it was reasonable that the defendant would have accepted the offer if he had known of the potential consequences of rejecting the offer.
United States v. Swaby, 855 F.3d 233 (4th Cir. 2017)

Prior to entering a guilty plea to trafficking in counterfeit goods, the defendant was not warned by his trial counsel that this offense would make him categorically deportable because the offense was an aggravated felony. Even though the trial judge advised the defendant during the plea colloquy in general terms about the possibility of immigration consequences, the defense counsel’s failure to advise the defendant amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel and the plea was not voluntary. As for prejudice, the defendant established that he would have gone to trial if he had known the consequences of entering the guilty plea.

United States v. Castro-Taveras, 841 F.3d 34 (1st Cir. 2016)

The court explores at length the availability of coram nobis relief for a defendant who entered a guilty plea prior to the decision in Padilla based on affirmative misinformation provided by his attorney. The court distinguished cases in which the attorney failed to provide advice from cases in which the defendant was affirmatively provided inaccurate advice about the immigration consequences of pleading guilty. The court held that in false advice cases, the issue is not retroactivity of Padilla, because false advice was always a basis for collateral relief.

Sullivan v. Secretary, Fla. Dept. of Corrections, 837 F.3d 1195 (11th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with fleeing and eluding and drug charges. The state offered ten years for a plea. The defense attorney advised the defendant that he would pursue a “voluntary intoxication” defense (a non-existent defense under state law) and rejected the offer. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to thirty years in prison as a habitual offender. Appellate counsel failed to raise trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in the post-conviction proceedings. Thereafter, Mr. Sullivan retained habeas counsel who claimed that both Sullivan’s trial counsel and his appellate counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel. The Eleventh Circuit held that the defendant received ineffective assistance of trial and appellate counsel and granted the writ.

Torres-Chavez v. United States, 828 F.3d 582 (7th Cir. 2016)

While there is a wide range of conduct that constitutes reasonable performance, an attorney’s performance is deficient if the attorney grossly mischaracterizes the evidence or advises a client to reject a plea offer and go to trial in the face of overwhelming evidence and no viable defenses. This case was remanded in order to conduct an evidentiary hearing on defendant’s claim that his attorney’s advice was objectively unreasonable in telling the him that he would be acquitted and should proceed to trial, despite a favorable plea offer.

Padilla requires attorneys to provide advice to defendants about to plead guilty about immigration consequences. But in Chaidez v United States, 133 S. Ct. 1103 (2013), the Court held that Padilla was not retroactive so if a defendant’s claim was simply that he was not advised before entering a plea about immigration consequences, this was not a basis for § 2255 or coram nobis relief for a case that pre-dated Padilla. In this case, however the defendant did not claim simply that he was not provided advice prior to entering a guilty plea. Instead, he claimed that his attorney expressly provided erroneous advice. This deficient type of attorney advice was a basis for collateral relief even before Padilla. The slight twist in this case was that the erroneous advice was provided after the plea was entered, but prior to sentence being imposed. The district court held that this precluded coram nobis relief. The D.C. Circuit reversed and remanded, holding that the court should have conducted a hearing to determine if the plea might have been withdrawn had the attorney not provided erroneous advice, and if the lower court would have permitted the defendant to withdraw his plea, whether the defendant would have insisted on going to trial.

United States v. Rodriguez-Vega, 797 F.3d 781 (9th Cir. 2015)

Defense counsel failed to advise the defendant of the virtual certainty of her removal if she entered a guilty plea to the charged offense. The Ninth Circuit concludes that the defendant likely would have either gone to trial, or entered a guilty plea to a different offense had she known of the certainty of removal.

Pidgeon v. Smith, 785 F.3d 1165 (7th Cir. 2015)

Petitioner’s trial counsel advised him to accept a plea in order to avoid a mandatory life without parole sentence. This advice was based on the erroneous belief that a prior conviction was a predicate offense for recidivist punishment that would necessitate a life without parole conviction. The writ was properly granted by the district court, because there was a reasonable likelihood that petitioner would have insisted on a trial if he had known that he was not facing a mandatory life sentence. It was not necessary, in order to rule in petitioner’s favor, that he call the trial attorney to testify at either the state or the federal habeas proceedings.

Hernandez v. United States, 778 F.3d 1230 (11th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was entitled to raise a Padilla claim based on his attorney’s statement, “The government almost never issues a detainer for a Cuban, because they won’t deport to Cuba.” The fact that the plea was entered one year prior to the decision in Padilla does not mean that the attorney was not ineffective in providing this inaccurate advice.

United States v. Bui, 795 F.3d 363 (3rd Cir. 2014)

Trial counsel erroneously advised the defendant that if he entered a guilty plea to possessing drugs within 1000 feet of a school, he could receive safety-valve relief and receive a shorter sentence. However, the safety valve is not available for this drug offense. The attorney provided ineffective assistance in connection with the guilty plea and the plea was therefore set aside.

Roundtree v. United States, 751 F.3d 923 (8th Cir. 2014)

An evidentiary hearing should have been held to determine whether trial counsel failed to warn the defendant that he was facing a mandatory life sentence if convicted at trial.

Kovacs v. United States, 744 F.3d 44 (2d Cir. 2014)

Counsel’s erroneous advice about the deportation consequences of a plea to misprision of a felony was grounds to award coram nobis relief.

Heard v. Addison, 728 F.3d 1170 (10th Cir. 2013)
The defendant entered a guilty plea in state court to child molestation and received a twenty-five year sentence. The Tenth Circuit granted a writ, because a state court unpublished decision (issued prior to the time the defendant entered his guilty plea) indicated that the precise conduct that was involved in defendant’s case was not a crime under Oklahoma law (looking under the dress of a girl who is wearing underwear). If the defendant had known about this ruling, he would not have entered a guilty plea. Interestingly, a decision issued by the Oklahoma courts after the defendant entered his plea suggested that his conduct would be criminal.

United States v. Reed, 719 F.3d 369 (5th Cir. 2013)

The Fifth Circuit remanded this § 2255 case back to the district court to conduct an evidentiary hearing on whether trial counsel was ineffective in failing to properly advise the defendant about what sentence he would have received had he entered a guilty plea. Trial counsel (according to the defendant), advised him that he would be sentenced to 36 months if he accepted the plea offered by the government. The defendant claimed in his § 2255 petition that he was actually facing between 8 – 14 months had he accepted the plea. A hearing on the merits of the claim was required.

Johnson v. Uribe, 682 F.3d 1238 (9th Cir. 2012)

Counsel provided ineffective assistance in advising the defendant about the plea offer that had been made by the state. The proper remedy, post-Lafler was to allow the defendant to re-plead, and not just have a re-sentencing. The decision was amended, and rehearing en banc was denied, at 700 F.3d 413.

United States v. Juarez, 672 F.3d 381 (5th Cir. 2012)

The defendant entered guilty pleas to illegal reentry, and filing a false firearm transaction report (regarding his citizenship). Counsel failed to investigate and research the possibility that defendant was actually a citizen under the principle of “derivative citizenship” since his mother was naturalized. This was ineffective assistance of counsel that tainted the guilty plea.

United States v. Smith, 640 F.3d 580 (4th Cir. 2011)

If a defendant claims that his lawyer was so deficient that it amounted to no counsel at all, this can taint a guilty plea. Though a guilty plea generally waives all non-jurisdictional defects, this doctrine does not bar a challenge to the right to counsel, because this affects the voluntariness of the plea.

United States v. Weeks, 653 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2011)

In the context of reviewing an ineffective assistance of counsel claim for a defendant who entered a guilty plea to a conspiracy offense, the Tenth Circuit emphasized that a conspiracy conviction requires proof that the defendant knew that his agreement involved a violation of the law, not simply an agreement to engage in certain conduct: “An agreement with others that certain activities be done, without knowing at the time of the agreement that the activities violate the law, is therefore insufficient to establish conspiracy.” The defendant’s § 2255 petition in this case was sufficient to allege facts that necessitated a hearing on the question of whether he fully understood the nature of the charges. The plea colloquy was insufficient to show that the defendant understood the nature of the proof that was required to prove his guilt, given his reluctance to acknowledge that he knew, at the time the events occurred, that his conduct was illegal.

_Tovar Mendoza v. Hatch_, 620 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2010)

The trial attorney’s grossly inaccurate statement to the defendant about the amount of time he would be required to serve if he pled guilty amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel and rendered the guilty plea involuntary. Defense counsel told the defendant his sentence would be three years. The sentence imposed was 25 years.

_Bauder v. Department of Corrections_, 619 F.3d 1272 (11th Cir. 2010)

The Eleventh Circuit held that the defendant’s attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel because of his failure to advise the defendant of the possibility that his guilty plea to stalking under Florida law could lead to civil commitment as a sexually violent person under state law. The Eleventh Circuit relied on _Padilla_ in holding that even though the law was not absolutely clear that civil commitment was a collateral consequence, the attorney had the obligation to at least warn the defendant of the possibility.

_Williams v. Jones_, 571 F.3d 1086 (10th Cir. 2009)

If an attorney gives bad advice to a client that prompts the client to go to trial and reject a plea agreement, this may constitute ineffective assistance of trial, even if the trial was conducted in fair manner. In this case, the defendant was offered a ten-year deal. His attorney told him that if he accepted the deal he “would be committing perjury” and the attorney would withdraw. The defendant went to trial and was convicted and sentenced to life without parole. The lower court found that the defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel and this was not appealed. The question facing the Tenth Circuit was the appropriate remedy. The Court refused to decide what the appropriate remedy should be and remanded to the lower court to fully explore the available options that would put the defendant in the situation he would be without having been deprived of his right to effective assistance of counsel.

_Dasher v. Attorney General, Florida_, 574 F.3d 1310 (11th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was offered a plea agreement that would require him to serve 13 months. He drew the line at 12 months (so he could serve the sentence in the county jail) and the attorney advised him to simply enter a plea “straight up” without a plea agreement and see if another month could be shaved off the sentence. The defendant took the advice and the judge sentenced the defendant to ten years. The attorney was unaware of prior convictions that changed the judge’s mind. The attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel. Even without the recidivist issue, advising the defendant to reject a 13 months certain sentence and plead without an agreement to see if he could get 12 months was not sound advice.

_United States v. Mooney_, 497 F.3d 397 (4th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel was ineffective in advising the defendant that he should plead guilty in this felon-in-possession case, because there was no justification defense available. The defendant seized the gun from his wife, who was threatening him, and promptly went to the police who were at his place of employment and gave them the weapon.
Julian v. Bartley, 495 F.3d 487 (7th Cir. 2007)

Counsel advised the defendant that pursuant to the (then) new decision in Apprendi, the state could not impose consecutive sentences based on the defendant’s recidivist status, because the prior offense was not set forth in the indictment. Because Apprendi exempted prior offenses from the scope of its decision (prior offenses need not be set forth in the indictment, or proved to a jury in order to affect the sentence), the attorney’s advice was ineffective assistance of counsel. The defendant rejected a plea offer and went to trial. The Seventh Circuit granted the writ. Oddly, the court held that the state is not required to offer the original deal. It may offer that deal, but it is not required to do so. The state may also simply re-try the defendant.

United States v. Morris, 470 F.3d 596 (6th Cir. 2006)

In a crowded state court holding cell, the defendant met his appointed attorney for the first time. He was offered a plea of four years or face federal charges. The attorney had virtually no time to review discovery or have a private conversation with the defendant. She also provided inaccurate advice about the possible federal sentence if he did not take the state plea. This was ineffective assistance of counsel. The defendant rejected the state plea offer and was then prosecuted in federal court. The district court judge concluded that the federal indictment should be dismissed so that the defendant could be given a reasonable opportunity to consider entering a plea to the state charge.

Dando v. Yukins, 461 F.3d 791 (6th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request expert funds in order to investigate the defendant’s possible duress (battered spouse) defense to charges that she assisted her boyfriend in a string of robberies. The attorney declined to hire the expert because he thought that funds were not available to investigate this type of defense. The defendant’s guilty plea was tainted by this ineffective assistance of counsel.

Satterlee v. Wolfenbarger, 453 F.3d 362 (6th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel’s failure to communicate to the defendant a plea offer that was made by the prosecutor on the first day of trial was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Booth, 432 F.3d 542 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The Third Circuit held that the defendant was entitled to an evidentiary hearing on the question of whether the defense attorney was ineffective in failing to inform the defendant that he could enter a non-negotiated (“open”) plea to the indictment and thereby earn an acceptance of responsibility reduction in sentence. The defendant claimed that he was forced to either accept the plea agreement offered by the government or proceed to trial.

Davis v. Greiner, 428 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 2005)

The defendant gave a proffer to the state court prosecutors pursuant to an agreement that provided that if he were to proceed to trial, what he said could be used to impeach him. His attorney did not explain this to him. After giving the proffer and incriminating himself, he backed out of the deal and proceeded to trial, not realizing that if he testified, his statements could be used against him. The attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel. The court ultimately concluded, however, that the ineffective assistance of counsel was not prejudicial.
United States v. Herrera, 412 F.3d 577 (5th Cir. 2005)

Had the attorney correctly advised the defendant of his exposure if he went to trial, the defendant claimed that he would have entered a guilty plea. The Fifth Circuit held that this claim merited an evidentiary hearing. The attorney supposedly told the defendant he faced a maximum 51-month guideline sentence, when, in fact, he faced a guideline range of 78 – 97 months after conviction at trial.

United States v. Kwan, 407 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2005)

An attorney’s inaccurate advice about the immigration consequences of a guilty plea was ineffective assistance of counsel. Actually, the attorney’s initial advice was correct, but a change in the law rendered it incorrect and this change occurred between the time that the plea was entered and sentencing. The attorney had a duty to correct the advice when the law changed and the failure to do so tainted the defendant’s guilty plea. The Ninth Circuit held that coram nobis relief was appropriate in this situation.

United States v. Howard, 381 F.3d 873 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant offered proof in his § 2255 petition that he was under the influence of a powerful narcotic drug (painkiller) at the time he entered his guilty plea and that his attorney was aware of this. The district court erred in not conducting an evidentiary hearing to inquire into the factual support for this claim.

United States v. Grammas, 376 F.3d 433 (5th Cir. 2004)

Defense counsel erroneously advised the defendant that the base offense level for his crime was level 8, whereas the actual base offense level was 20. Counsel apparently was relying on the incorrect Guideline Manual, or did not realize that his client would be treated as an Armed Career Criminal. By underestimating the defendant’s sentencing exposure, counsel breaches his duty as a defense lawyer in a criminal case to advise his client fully on whether a particular plea to a charge appears desirable. A remand for a hearing on the issue of prejudice was necessary.

United States v. White, 366 F.3d 291 (4th Cir. 2004)

The defendant entered into a guilty plea, but claimed in a § 2255 petition that he was orally assured by his attorney and the AUSA that he could appeal the denial of the suppression motion. Both parties in the § 2255 proceeding agreed that defense counsel made this assurance. Both parties also agreed that this rendered the plea involuntary, because the defendant did not understand the consequences of his plea. The Fourth Circuit held that the trial court should have conducted a full evidentiary hearing to determine if the government did, in fact, orally assure the defendant that he could enter a conditional plea.

Moore v. Bryant, 348 F.3d 238 (7th Cir. 2003)

Trial counsel’s erroneous advice about good time credits was ineffective assistance of counsel and necessitated setting aside the conviction. The attorney advised petitioner that a change in the law would reduce good time credits, so if he were convicted at trial, he would be required to serve 85% of the time imposed, but if he entered a guilty plea, he would serve only 50%. However, the change in the law was not going to be retroactive, so this advice was erroneous.

_Nunes v. Mueller, 350 F.3d 1045 (9th Cir. 2003)_

Prior to trial, the state prosecutor offered a negotiated deal to the defendant that would have capped his sentence at eleven years. The defense attorney did not convey this offer correctly to the defendant (he portrayed the deal as a twenty-two year offer). The right to effective assistance of counsel includes the right to counsel during the plea negotiation process. The right that the defendant lost in this case was not the right to a fair trial or the right to a plea bargain, but the right to participate in the decision as to, and to decide, his own fate. The circumstances demonstrated the defendant would have accepted the offer had it been communicated to him properly.

_Maples v. Stegall, 340 F.3d 433 (6th Cir. 2003)_

The defendant entered a guilty plea, having been advised by his attorney that he could still preserve for appeal his state speedy trial act claim. His advice was erroneous. This amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The Sixth Circuit remanded the case to the district court to evaluate the merits of the defendant’s speedy trial act claim, in order to determine whether he was prejudiced by the attorney’s ineffectiveness.

_United States v. Couto, 311 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2002)_

Trial counsel affirmatively misled the defendant into believing there were things that could be done to avoid deportation (when, in fact, there were none). This affirmative misrepresentation is different than a failure to advise the defendant of collateral consequences of a plea.

_Smith v. United States, 348 F.3d 545 (6th Cir. 2004)_

Trial counsel, according to the petitioner in this § 2255 petition, failed to advise him properly about a pending plea offer. At a minimum the court should have held a hearing on this matter. Specifically, petitioner claimed that he should have been fully informed about the various Sentencing Guideline scenarios that would exist following a trial, versus following the entry of a guilty plea. The possible sentence following trial was ten times harsher than the sentence that was offered in the negotiated plea and this information was not (according to the petitioner) conveyed to him.

_Griffin v. United States, 330 F.3d 733 (6th Cir. 2003)_

Trial counsel’s failure to advise the defendant of a plea offer was ineffective assistance of counsel. Though the defendant protested that he was innocent throughout the pretrial stage of the case, he still may have accepted a guilty plea. A hearing should have been conducted so the trial court could determine whether the defendant would, in fact, have been willing to accept the offer, had it been communicated to him by counsel.

_Paters v. United States, 159 F.3d 1043 (7th Cir. 1998)_

failed to explain the concept of relevant conduct, or acceptance of responsibility. Following a conviction at trial, the defendant was sentenced to 121 months. The government and the defendant agreed that the trial attorney’s performance was deficient. The Seventh Circuit held that the deficient performance was prejudicial, if the defendant could establish, on remand, that but for the incorrect advice, he would have accepted the plea agreement.

Two defendants were arrested for smuggling marijuana. Alvarez entered a guilty plea, but the court had not yet accepted the plea. Thereafter, the co-defendant won his motion to suppress – a motion that would have succeeded for Alvarez, as well. The government had already indicated that it would not appeal the co-defendant’s successful motion. Nevertheless, Alvarez’s counsel did not move to withdraw the guilty plea and re-assert a Motion to Suppress. This was ineffective assistance of counsel. Because the court had not accepted the guilty plea yet, the defendant was entitled to withdraw the plea. The case would then have been dismissed.

Meyers v. Gillis, 142 F.3d 664 (3rd Cir. 1998)

Trial counsel gave the petitioner incorrect advice as to his parole eligibility and the defendant relied on that advice to his prejudice. The petitioner believed that he would be eligible for parole at some point after entering his plea, when, in fact, the conviction resulted in a sentence of life without parole. Petitioner established that he would not have entered a guilty plea had he known about the life without parole sentence.

United States v. Gordon, 156 F.3d 376 (2d Cir. 1998)

Defense counsel’s erroneous prediction of the Guideline sentence that the defendant faced amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Boria v. Keane, 99 F.3d 492 (2d Cir. 1996)

The trial counsel was ineffective in failing to advise the defendant that it was in his best interest to enter a guilty plea. The plea that was offered would have resulted in a sentence of one to three years. Following his rejection of this offer, the state re-indicted under the “Rockefeller Law” and the resulting conviction resulted in a sentence of twenty years to life. Trial counsel admitted that he never advised the defendant that it was advisable to accept the plea, before the state re-indicted him.

United States v. Hansel, 70 F.3d 6 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendant pled guilty to two counts of the indictment which were barred by the statute of limitations. Though the guilty plea amounts to a waiver of the issue on appeal, he received ineffective assistance of counsel and the guilty plea was therefore not knowing and voluntary and the convictions on those counts would be set aside.

Teague v. Scott, 60 F.3d 1167 (5th Cir. 1995)

If counsel misinforms the defendant of the maximum possible sentence (as in this case, where the defendant was advised that the maximum sentence was twenty years, but the actual maximum was 99 years), this amounts to ineffective assistance of counsel. Prejudice can be shown by the defendant’s refusal to accept a plea offer which was far below the sentence which was ultimately imposed following a trial.
United States v. Acklen, 47 F.3d 739 (5th Cir. 1995)
In this §2255 proceeding, the petitioner contended that his counsel failed to investigate, prior to entering the guilty plea, whether the methamphetamine with which the defendant was charged was L-methamphetamine, or D-methamphetamine. There is a substantial difference in sentencing liability between these two types of the drug. Without deciding whether the petitioner in fact proved that he was only responsible for the less serious type of drug, the court held that he was entitled to limited discovery on this issue. If the drug actually was L-methamphetamine, then the trial counsel would have been ineffective in failing to prove this at sentencing.

United States v. Castro, 26 F.3d 557 (5th Cir. 1994)
The writ of error coram nobis is an extraordinary remedy available to a petitioner no longer in custody who seeks to vacate his conviction in circumstances where the petitioner can demonstrate that he is suffering civil disabilities as a consequence of the criminal conviction and that the challenged error is of sufficient magnitude to justify the extraordinary relief. Coram nobis relief is available if the petitioner can establish that he suffered from ineffective assistance of counsel. Here, the defendant entered a guilty plea, but his attorneys were unaware that they could seek a judicial recommendation against deportation and, therefore, they did not make this request. This was ineffective assistance of counsel and coram nobis relief should have been granted if the petitioner, on remand, could satisfy the Strickland standards.

Bouchillon v. Collins, 907 F.2d 589 (5th Cir. 1990)
The habeas court concluded that the petitioner was mentally incompetent at the time he entered his guilty plea and that his trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate his client’s competency to stand trial and a possible insanity defense. The Fifth Circuit affirms. In order to satisfy the prejudice prong of Strickland, the petitioner need only demonstrate a “reasonable probability” that he was incompetent, “sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome.” This represents a lower burden of proof than the preponderance of evidence standard.

Lewandowski v. Makel, 949 F.2d 884 (6th Cir. 1991)
Trial counsel failed to advise the defendant accurately about the possible ramifications of successfully withdrawing a guilty plea – that is, that he could be tried and sentenced to life without parole. The Sixth Circuit agreed with the District Court that this was ineffective assistance and was prejudicial.

Hart v. Marion Correctional Institution, 927 F.2d 256 (6th Cir. 1991)
The defendant was incorrectly advised by his attorney about the actual amount of time he might face if he entered a guilty plea. This ineffective assistance of counsel was compounded by inaccurate advice at the guilty plea colloquy from the trial judge. The writ would be granted.

Sparks v. Sowders, 852 F.2d 882 (6th Cir. 1988)
Under state law, there is no such penalty as “life without parole.” This, however, was what trial counsel advised the defendant he would receive if he did not plead guilty. This constitutes gross misadvice rendering a guilty plea defective on the grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel.

Garmon v. Lockhart, 938 F.2d 120 (8th Cir. 1991)
Counsel advised the defendant that he would only have to serve 1/6 of his sentence. This was inaccurate advice. Actually, he would have to serve 15 years – not five years – before he was eligible for parole. This was ineffective assistance of counsel and necessitated granting a writ and vacating the guilty plea.

Hill v. Lockhart, 894 F.2d 1009 (8th Cir. 1990)

The defendant pled guilty, relying in part on the advice of his attorney concerning his parole eligibility date. His attorney’s advice was erroneous. This constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel and also renders the guilty plea invalid. This is not simply a case of the attorney making a bad prediction. Here the misadvice was of a “solid nature” directly affecting the defendant’s decision to plead guilty.

United States v. Blaylock, 20 F.3d 1458 (9th Cir. 1994)

It is ineffective assistance of counsel to fail to communicate to a client a plea offer. The appropriate remedy is to reinstate the plea offer and allow the defendant to accept it if he so desires.

Montemoino v. United States, 68 F.3d 416 (11th Cir. 1995)

If an attorney fails to file a notice of appeal following a guilty plea and there is an issue relating to the sentencing guidelines, the defendant may obtain relief based on the ineffectiveness of his attorney. This is an exception to the rule that the failure to file an appeal following the entry of a guilty plea is not grounds for asserting ineffective assistance of counsel. The appropriate remedy is to permit an out-of-time appeal of any sentencing guideline issue.

Finch v. Vaughn, 67 F.3d 909 (11th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was on parole from a federal sentence when he was arrested by state agents on a drug charge. At the beginning of his state trial, he entered into a plea agreement which provided that he would plead guilty in exchange for receiving a ten-year sentence to run concurrent with his federal parole violation sentence. After the plea was entered, the federal government declined to revoke his parole, returning him to state custody. The government indicated that his federal parole would be revoked after he served his state sentence. Because it was clearly the defendant’s view that the sentences would run concurrent, this amounted to an involuntary plea of guilty. A voluntary plea requires an awareness of the consequences of the plea. Moreover, his counsel rendered ineffective assistance of counsel.

Yordan v. Dugger, 909 F.2d 474 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant’s attorney advised him that if he were to plead guilty to the charges, he would become eligible for parole after serving between five and seven years in prison. Actually, having pled guilty to the offense, he was not eligible for parole until having served twenty-five years. The Eleventh Circuit holds that further hearings must be conducted to determine whether the defendant was denied the effective assistance of counsel.

Betancourt v. Willis, 814 F.2d 1546 (11th Cir. 1987)

The judge told the defense attorney that he would reduce the sentences at some time in the future if the defendant would plead guilty. This agreement was never put in writing, and the attorney failed to make any mention of this statement by the judge during the plea agreement at the initial sentencing or taking of the plea. This represents ineffective assistance of counsel and the guilty plea was ordered withdrawn by the Eleventh Circuit.

United States v. Streater, 70 F.3d 1314 (D.C.Cir. 1995)

Counsel was ineffective in advising the defendant that he should enter a guilty plea. Counsel advised the defendant, after losing a suppression hearing, that having asserted standing to contest a search of the car (albeit without having testified), he could not then testify at trial that he did not know there were drugs in the car. This erroneous advice rendered the guilty plea involuntary.

United States v. Loughery, 908 F.2d 1014 (D.C.Cir. 1990)

The defendant agreed to enter a plea that would result in the dismissal of all the pending mail fraud counts in exchange for her plea on one other count. Just before the plea was entered, McNally v. United States was decided that rendered the mail fraud counts invalid. The attorney’s failure to appreciate the significance of this development — it meant that the government was giving up nothing in exchange for the plea — rendered his representation ineffective in advising the defendant in connection with the guilty plea.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Ineffective Assistance of Counsel – Pre-trial Motions and Investigation)

An attorney who did not realize that he could seek additional funds to secure an expert witness to assist in analyzing forensic ballistics evidence, provided ineffective assistance of counsel.

_Rivera v. Thompson_, 879 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2018)
The police responded to a report of a stabbing. When an officer arrived at the scene, a man was seen jogging away. The officer ordered the man to lie down, pulled his weapon and asked him what he was doing. The defendant’s responses should have been suppressed. The defendant was in custody and was being interrogated. Trial counsel’s failure to move to suppress the statements was ineffective assistance of counsel.

_United States v. Simpson_, 864 F.3d 830 (7th Cir. 2017)
Defendant urged the trial court to conduct an evidentiary hearing on his Rule 33 motion for new trial based on ineffective assistance of counsel, because his trial counsel failed to interview witnesses who would have supported his defense. The trial court declined to conduct an evidentiary hearing. The Seventh Circuit reversed holding, among other things, that the trial court erroneously viewed the proposed testimony piecemeal, rather than cumulatively.

_United States v. Mohammed_, 863 F.3d 885 (D.C. Cir. 2017)
The central witness at defendant’s narco-terrorism trial was a man from the same Afghanastan village as the defendant who had previous run-ins with the defendant and had a motive to falsely accuse him of being associated with the Taliban. The witness had previously been accused (in Afghanistan) of stealing jewelry and the defendant had sat in judgment of him in that case. The witness was known to be upset by that decision. The D.C. Circuit held that the trial attorney performed deficiently in failing to locate, prepare and present this testimony at trial. Certain counts of the indictment were vacated by this ineffective assistance of counsel.

_Weeden v. Johnson_, 854 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 2017)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate a possible psychological defense in this murder trial involving a 14-year old defendant.

_Hardy v. Chappell_, 849 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2017)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present evidence that the state’s key witness in this murder trial was the actual perpetrator of the murder.

_United States v. Arny_, 831 F.3d 725 (6th Cir. 2016)
The defendant was a doctor, convicted of unlawfully prescriptions of pain medication. Trial counsel failed to interview a key witness (and was untruthful with the defendant about the availability of certain witnesses), as well as certain patients who would have provided testimony that refuted the government’s theory. The trial court granted a post-trial Rule 33 motion and the Sixth Circuit affirmed.
Blackmon v. Williams, 823 F.3d 1088 (7th Cir. 2016)

A federal evidentiary hearing was necessary to fully develop the habeas petitioner’s claim that his state trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to investigate and present alibi witnesses who were available to testify.

United States v. Freeman, 818 F.3d 175 (5th Cir. 2016)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to dismiss a count of the indictment that was barred, on its face, by the statute of limitations.

Yun Hseng Liao v. Junious, 817 F.3d 678 (9th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with assaulting his girlfriend’s son with a hammer in the middle of the night when the son was asleep in bed. He claimed that he was sleepwalking. The defense hired a renowned expert in the field of sleepwalking and he agreed to testify, but explained to the lawyers that he needed the defense to have a sleep study performed in order to allow him to make an informed diagnosis. The lawyer asked the magistrate for funds to have the sleep study performed. The lawyer was told by a clerk of the magistrate that the request for funds was denied. Actually, though, the magistrate had approved the request and filed the approval. The lawyer went to trial without the sleep study, but with the expert, whose testimony was significantly impaired because of the lack of a sleep study. When the lawyer’s deficient performance finally made its way to the Ninth Circuit, the court held that this amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel and the conviction was vacated.

Grueninger v. Dir., Virginia Dept. of Corrections, 813 F.3d 517 (4th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was questioned by the police after he was arrested and he promptly said, “These are felonies, I need an attorney.” The police immediately stopped the questioning, but came back a few days later, initiated further discussions when additional warrants were served during which the defendant confessed to having had sexual contact with his minor daughter. The Fourth Circuit held that this was a violation of Edwards v. Arizona, and trial counsel’s failure to file a motion to suppress the confession was deficient performance that required setting aside the conviction.

Thomas v. Clements, 789 F.3d 760 (7th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with killing his ex-wife. He claimed that they were having sex and he mistakenly strangled her. The defense counsel failed to consult with an expert to determine if there was any way to challenge the expert opinion of the state’s medical examiner who testified that the death could not occur accidentally. Counsel did not make a strategic decision: he simply failed to seek expert advice. The defense expert presented at the habeas hearing offered an alternative explanation and pointed out flaws in the state’s expert’s testimony. Thus, trial counsel’s deficient performance was prejudicial.

United States v. Mercedes-De La Cruz, 787 F.3d 61 (1st Cir. 2015)

This is the rare case in which a Sixth Amendment ineffective assistance of counsel claim was successfully raised on direct appeal. Trial counsel failed to file a motion to suppress the defendant’s incriminatory statements. The evidence developed at trial demonstrated the circumstances of the defendant’s statements and, had the motion been filed, the statements would have been suppressed (the only basis for detaining the defendant, during which time he made the incriminating statements, was that he was in the same general area where a drug-smuggling venture was occurring). There was no strategic reason not to file a meritorious motion to suppress.

Campbell v. Reardon, 780 F.3d 752 (7th Cir. 2015)
Trial counsel’s failure to interview three eyewitnesses, whose names and statements were contained in police reports, and whose testimony contradicted the testimony of the state’s witnesses was deficient performance that required setting aside the state court conviction.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Vanterpool, 767 F.3d 157 (3rd Cir. 2014)
Trial counsel was arguably ineffective in failing to challenge the constitutionality of the Virgin Islands harassing phone calls statute prior to trial. A remand to develop the record on this issue was necessary.

Detrich v. Ryan, 740 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 2013)
The en banc Ninth Circuit concluded that petitioner was entitled to a remand to the district court for an evidentiary hearing on his § 2254 ineffective assistance of counsel claim. Trial counsel failed to interview several witnesses who could have contradicted the state’s witnesses and established the motive of another person to be the perpetrator of the murder. Additionally, a remand was appropriate to determine why trial counsel failed to impeach a witness with a prior inconsistent statement and failed to conduct independent forensic testing of certain physical evidence.

Vega v. Ryan, 757 F.3d 960 (9th Cir. 2014)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to locate and present at trial a priest to whom the child victim in this child molestation case had recanted his allegations.

Newman v. Harrington, 726 F.3d 921 (7th Cir. 2013)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek a competency hearing for the defendant.

Stitts v. Wilson, 713 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2013)
Though a remand for further fact finding was required, he Seventh Circuit held that if the defendant’s trial attorney failed to properly investigate a possible alibi defense (beyond interviewing one witness), this would have amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel in this case.

McClellan v Rapelje, 703 F.3d 344 (6th Cir. 2013)
Trial counsel was grossly ineffective in failing to interview numerous available witnesses in this murder case who were prepared to testify that the defendant acted in self defense.

Wooley v. Rednour, 702 F.3d 411 (7th Cir. 2012)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to secure an expert witness to counter the expert crime scene reconstruction expert employed by the state. However, the state court’s decision that the defendant suffered no prejudice as a result of this insufficient investigation survived AEDPA scrutiny.

Harris v. Thompson, 698 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2012)

The trial court’s decision to exclude a defense witness who was 6-years old based on the child’s competence as a witness violated the defendant’s Compulsory Process rights to present evidence in his defense. The child had critical exculpatory evidence and the jury should have been allowed to evaluate the credibility issue. The fact that the child believed in the tooth fairy, Santa Claus and Spiderman did not render him unfit to testify. (Part of the child’s apparent confusion about who was “real” and who was not “real” was the way that questions were posed, which drew a distinction between characters in movies that were cartoons, or animated, and characters who were played by live actors). The state trial court violated the state statute that placed the burden of proving incompetency of a witness on the state, rather than proving competence of witness on the party calling the witness, as the court did in this case. In addition, the court held that the trial attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to properly litigate the competency issue and to interview and prepare the child to testify. This case contains an encyclopedic review of Compulsory Process cases.

Mosley v. Atchison, 689 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2012)

State trial counsel’s failure to interview and then present testimony from two alibi witnesses was ineffective assistance of counsel necessitating that the federal court grant a writ of habeas corpus. A subsequent review of this case netted the same result. 762 F.3d 579.

Foster v. Wolfenbarger, 687 F.3d 702 (6th Cir. 2012)

Trial counsel’s failure to further investigate a possible alibi defense and to present this defense at trial was ineffective assistance of counsel. The attorney interviewed the witness briefly. If the attorney concluded that the witness’s testimony was not sufficiently definite, he had a duty to further investigate and not simply abandon the alibi defense.

Matthews v. United States, 682 F.3d 180 (2d Cir. 2012)

Trial counsel retained an ex-cop as an investigator who had prior run-ins with the defendant. There was clearly a basis for believing that the investigator had a conflict in working for the defendant. This led the Second Circuit to conclude that an evidentiary hearing was necessary to determine whether the attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel in investigating the facts of this case.

Gardner v. United States, 680 F.3d 1006 (7th Cir. 2012)

The defendant contended that he was unlawfully frisked. He also claimed that the gun that was found was actually planted on him by the police. The trial court indicated that unless the defendant acknowledged that the gun was his, he could not assert the Fourth Amendment claim. The defense attorney failed to file a motion to suppress. This was ineffective assistance of counsel. There is no reason that a defendant cannot claim both that the gun was planted on him and that the search was unlawful.

Thomas v. Chappell, 678 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2012)
Trial counsel conducted inadequate investigation into possible witnesses who would have corroborated defendant’s claim of innocence and the role of another perpetrator.

The government’s motion to permit the introduction of Rule 404(b) evidence did not stop the Speedy Trial clock. Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to dismiss the indictment given the violation of the Speedy Trial Act.

Elmore v. Ozmint, 661 F.3d 783 (4th Cir. 2011)

In this nearly 100-page opinion, the Fourth Circuit ultimately concludes that trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to test and investigate the validity of the state’s forensic evidence.

Tice v. Johnson, 647 F.3d 87 (4th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was a suspect in a rape / murder. During the course of his interrogation, he agreed to have a polygraph administered. After the polygraph was administered by another police officer, the defendant was asked if he wanted to continue making a statement and he said that he did not want to answer any more questions. Thereafter, the initial interrogation officer returned to the room and continued the interrogation. No further Miranda warnings were given. The Fourth Circuit held that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress the ensuing confession.

Sussman v. Jenkins, 636 F.3d 329 (7th Cir. 2011)

Trial counsel failed to provide pretrial notice of the intent to introduce evidence that the child molestation victim had made prior false allegations of sexual abuse against another man (his father). Trial counsel’s failure was ineffective assistance of counsel, because such evidence – prior false allegation evidence – was admissible and significant evidence relating to the child’s credibility and motive for fabricating allegations (i.e., to get attention, or for punishing people for not paying attention to him). This evidence was clearly admissible under the Confrontation Clause.

Showers v. Beard, 635 F.3d 625 (3rd Cir. 2011)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to consult with an expert to determine if a person who ingested liquid morphine would taste the substance. The defendant was charged with killing her spouse with liquid morphine. The government contended that the drug could be put in the victim’s food and he would not know it. The defense attorney had been told by a psychiatric expert that he should consult with an expert on this subject. The defense attorney did not consult with an expert. An expert would have testified that a substantial amount of a “masking agent” would have been necessary for the victim not to realize he was being poisoned and, therefore, the autopsy should have revealed the masking agent. (Absent a masking agent, the defendant’s theory – that the victim intentionally ingested the drug was far more likely, given given the strong taste of the substance without a masking agent).

Couch v. Booker, 632 F.3d 241 (6th Cir. 2011)
In this murder case, the victim died after being beaten by the defendant. However, there was considerable evidence that the victim had ingested a considerable quantity of marijuana and cocaine, as well as alcohol and may have had a pre-existing heart condition. The victim fought with medics prior to dying and was observed by others acting strangely prior to being beaten by the defendant. The defense attorney failed to adequately investigate a causation defense, including reading available reports from medics. Though a defense attorney is certainly entitled (and obligated) to make strategic decisions, those decisions must be informed and cannot be “strategic” if they are made without considering available alternatives.

Wilson v. Gaetz, 608 F.3d 347 (7th Cir. 2010)

Trial counsel ineffectively developed the insanity defense evidence that was available in defense of the defendant who was charged with murder. The defendant was apparently operating under a delusional compulsion that required him to commit the crime. His delusion led him to believe that what he was doing was morally proper, even if it might have been a crime.

Howard v. Clark, 608 F.3d 563 (9th Cir. 2010)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to interview the second victim of a shooting that the defendant was charged with perpetrating. The other victim died. The surviving victim, however, later made a statement that the defendant was not the perpetrator. The fact that the witness may not have been credible does not excuse the attorney’s failure to interview him and make a determination whether to call him as a witness.

Johnson v. United States, 604 F.3d 1016 (7th Cir. 2010)

Trial counsel did not file a motion to suppress evidence seized from the car that the defendant was driving, because he believed that the defendant did not have an expectation of privacy, due to the fact that he did not own the car and had borrowed it. This was legally incorrect: the driver of a car that he has borrowed from another has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the vehicle. The attorney’s second justification for not filing the motion – he wanted to argue at trial that the drugs did not belong to his client, because the car was borrowed – was not a basis to fail to file the motion to suppress, because if he won the motion to suppress, there would be no trial, and if he lost the motion to suppress, he could still disavow ownership or knowledge of the drugs. Finally, the attorney’s fear that the defendant’s testimony at a suppression hearing could be used against him at trial would be foreclosed by Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968).

English v. Romanowski, 602 F.3d 714 (6th Cir. 2010)

State trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate the availability of a witness to provide exculpatory information. Because of the failure to adequately investigate the witness’s testimony, the attorney believed that the witness had favorable testimony to offer. During trial, he realized that the witness was not that helpful, but he had already promised to call the witness during his opening statement. The decision not to call the witness was a sound decision; the failure to determine this before trial, and then promising to call the witness during opening statement, was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Gentry v. Sevier, 597 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2010)
The defendant was walking with a wheelbarrow through a neighborhood late at night. The police were called. When the police arrived, they summoned the defendant over to their car and told him to “keep his hands up.” This amounted to a seizure, which was not supported by an articulable suspicion. The officer then patted down the defendant, locating a garage opener. There was no basis for this frisk: there was no reason to believe the defendant was armed or dangerous and he was not subject to a legitimate arrest or detention. Moreover, there was no basis to keep the garage door opener (and thereafter walk down the street seeing if it opened any garage in the neighborhood), because it was not a weapon, or apparent to be contraband. Finally, the search of the wheelbarrow was illegal. Though some items on the top of the pile in the wheelbarrow were subject to plain view, other items below the surface could only be seen when the officer probed beneath the surface. The defendant’s trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress the fruits of the search.

_Green v. Nelson_, 595 F.3d 1245 (11th Cir. 2010)

A search warrant application falsely stated that semen was collected from a rape victim and that obtaining a DNA sample from the defendant was therefore necessary to perform a comparison. Actually, no DNA had been obtained from that victim, but the DNA collected from the defendant was used to match his DNA with another rape victim, from whom semen was obtained. The failure to file a Motion to Suppress based on this _Franks v. Delaware_ violation was ineffective assistance of counsel. The state habeas court’s observation that the decision whether to file a Motion to Suppress is always a strategic decision was clearly erroneous where the decision not to file the Motion was an erroneous understanding of the facts, not a conscious weighing of the potential positive and negative consequences of filing the motion. However, there was sufficient additional information in the affidavit to support the issuance of the warrant, so, though counsel was ineffective in failing to raise the issue, there was no prejudice.

_Bigelow v. Haviland_, 576 F.3d 284 (6th Cir. 2009)

Trial counsel’s failure to investigate further defendant’s alibi defense and locate an additional witness who was available and able to provide corroboration of the alibi, was ineffective assistance.

_Hummel v. Rosemeyer_, 564 F.3d 290 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The defendant was tried for murder in state court and found guilty. The record established that he suffered from the effects of a gunshot to the head (self-inflicted) and psychological trauma. He slept through much of the trial and suddenly screamed during the prosecutor’s closing argument and was removed from the courtroom. Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a competency hearing.

_Siehl v. Grace_, 561 F.3d 189 (3rd Cir. 2009)

Counsel was ineffective in failing to retain an expert to counter the state’s expert who testified that the defendant’s fingerprint was on the showerhead of the tub where the victim was found stabbed to death, and that the angle of the fingerprint, as well as other forensic evidence established that the fingerprint belonged to the killer. An evidentiary hearing was needed to develop the record further to determine if another expert could have countered this forensic testimony of the state, as the defendant proffered at the state habeas hearing.
Brown v. Smith, 551 F.3d 424 (6th Cir. 2008)

The defendant’s trial counsel was ineffective in the state sexual abuse prosecution because of counsel’s failure to subpoena the therapy records of the victim (his daughter) that would have revealed the victim’s inclination to fabricate charges against the defendant in light of her father’s imminent marriage to another woman. Under the relevant state law, the records, though presumptively confidential, could be reviewed by the trial court in camera to determine if they contained any information that was necessary to the defense.

Avery v. Prelesnik, 548 F.3d 434 (6th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel failed to adequately investigate defendant’s possible alibi defense, or to interview the alibi witnesses. The Sixth Circuit affirms granting a writ of habeas corpus.

Osagiede v. United States, 543 F.3d 399 (9th Cir. 2008)

Though the failure of the government to afford a defendant his right to notification of the consulate under the Vienna Convention may not result in the suppression of evidence, if a defense attorney fails to take advantage of the Vienna Convention and advise the defendant of his right to notify his country’s consulate, this may amount to ineffective assistance of counsel. The prejudice, if it can be shown, would be that the defendant was deprived of the right to have the consulate help him find favorable witnesses, or otherwise assist in the defense in a way that could have altered the result.

Harrison v. Quarterman, 496 F.3d 419 (5th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel was arguably ineffective in failing to interview an eyewitness to a prior event involving the sexual assault victim that was denied by her at trial. The prior event (involving a consensual sexual encounter between the defendant and the victim) would have been admissible and would have cast considerable doubt on the victim’s trial testimony. The absence of the witness, moreover, was pointed out by the prosecutor during closing argument as a reason to disbelieve that the prior event occurred. A remand was necessary to determine exactly what the witness would have said, if called as a witness.

United States v. Weathers, 493 F.3d 229 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to file a multiplicity objection to charges that the defendant threatened a federal official and a separate count of threatening the same official in violation of D.C. law.

Ramonez v. Berghuis, 490 F.3d 482 (6th Cir. 2007)

Trial counsel’s failure to interview three eyewitnesses to the assault with which the defendant was charged was ineffective assistance of counsel necessitating granting the writ.

Raygoza v. Hulick, 474 F.3d 958 (7th Cir. 2007)

Defense counsel’s failure to investigate the defendant’s alibi claim was deficient and prejudicial. Ten witnesses, as well as telephone records, supported the alibi. The court observed that defense counsel may have believed that his client was guilty and that pursuing an alibi defense would be futile, “This, however, would hardly distinguish him from legions of defense counsel who undoubtedly do the same every day, yet who conscientiously investigate their clients’ cases before coming to a final decision about trial strategy.”  Id at 964.

Stewart v. Wolfenbarger, 468 F.3d 338 (6th Cir. 2006) Trial counsel’s failure to comply with the law requiring pretrial notice of reliance on an alibi defense constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The fact that there were other alibi witnesses – and therefore the witness who was barred from testifying would have provided cumulative testimony – did not lessen the impact of the prejudice. Failure to interview certain witnesses and conduct sufficient pretrial investigation was also deficient.

Stanley v. Bartley, 465 F.3d 810 (7th Cir. 2006)
Trial counsel failed to interview any witnesses or engage in any meaningful pretrial preparation. His cross-examination of witnesses reflected his lack of preparation. Judge Posner held that a new trial was necessary.

Dando v. Yukins, 461 F.3d 791 (6th Cir. 2006)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request expert funds in order to investigate the defendant’s possible duress (battered spouse) defense to charges that she assisted her boyfriend in a string of robberies. The attorney declined to hire the expert because he thought that funds were not available to investigate this type of defense. The defendant’s guilty plea was tainted by this ineffective assistance of counsel.

Adams v. Bertrand, 453 F.3d 428 (7th Cir. 2006) Trial counsel’s failure to interview a key witness to the events that occurred prior to and after the alleged sexual assault on the victim was ineffective assistance of counsel requiring that the verdict be set aside. The victim was a woman in a college dormitory. The witness observed the victim and the defendant enter a room together and had been with them prior to the time they went into the room. After the alleged assault that occurred in the room, the witness was aware that they all sat around together smoking cigarettes. Failing to interview this witness (whose statement was in a police report and who testified at a co-defendant’s trial) and establishing the contradictions with the victim’s testimony was not a strategic decision; it was a violation of the

Rolan v. Vaughn, 445 F.3d 671 (3rd Cir. 2006)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate available witnesses who would have testified that the defendant acted in self-defense.

Draughon v. Dretke, 427 F.3d 286 (5th Cir. 2006)
The defendant was sentenced to death based on a conviction for killing a bystander after attempting to rob a store. The defendant admitted trying to rob the store and that when he fled, he was scared of the people who were chasing him and that he fired into the air to get them to stop chasing him. Defense counsel did not hire a firearm’s expert to analyze the path of the bullet. The state argued that the shooting was point-blank from a short distance. At the habeas hearing, the defendant offered evidence that the bullet clearly ricocheted off the pavement into the victim’s body. The Fifth Circuit held that defense counsel’s failure to retain a ballistics expert prior to trial was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Jones, 403 F.3d 604 (8th Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the indictment as multiplicitous. The defendant was charged in one count of the indictment with being a felon in possession of a firearm in August and another count of being a felon in possession of the same firearm in October. The crime, however, outlaws the continued possession of the weapon and this cannot multiplied by however many days, or hours, the gun is possessed as a separate crime.

Dugas v. Coplan, 428 F.3d 317 (1st Cir. 2005)

The defendant was charged in state court with arson. The defense chose the “some other guy did it” defense, which was reasonable. However, there was considerable question whether it was an arson at all and the attorney did not consult with an expert to develop this alternative defense, and thus was unprepared to deal with the state’s expert who testified that it was arson. The First Circuit concluded that the attorney was ineffective: “A tactical decision to pursue one defense does not excuse failure to present another defense that would bolster rather than detract from the primary defense.”

Gersten v. Senkowski, 426 F.3d 588 (2d Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate available expert testimony that would have contradicted the state’s expert testimony on the child abuse accommodation syndrome and other psychological evidence that was offered by the state in this child sex abuse case. The attorney also failed to research available evidence that would have contradicted the state’s expert’s testimony about proof of penetration. The Second Circuit opinion is a thorough primer on the child abuse accommodation syndrome and its questionable basis, as well as the proper steps that counsel should (must) take in a child sex abuse case, in order to be prepared.

Towns v. Smith, 395 F.3d 251 (6th Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel’s failure to interview and investigate a witness who claimed to have knowledge of the murder and who claimed that the defendant was not involved, amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Trial counsel’s failure to fully investigate the scientific evidence in this arson case was ineffective assistance of counsel. Hiring one expert, but limiting his work to ten hours was insufficient. After receiving an unfavorable report from this witness, the defense lawyer included his name on a witness list. When he did not call the witness, the state did call the witness and elicited testimony from that expert favorable to the state. After remand from the United States Supreme Court, the court re-affirmed this earlier decision, 498 F.3d 344 (6th Cir. 2007).

United States v. Hamilton, 391 F.3d 1066 (9th Cir. 2004)

After counsel was done completing his examination of a witness in a suppression hearing, he excused himself from further participation in the matter because of a scheduling conflict. The government elicited testimony from a subsequent witness that related to that attorney’s client. The attorney was provided a transcript and stated that he did not wish to further cross-examine that witness. This was improper. Counsel’s absence from the proceeding that related to his client operated as a denial of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

Owens v. United States, 387 F.3d 607 (7th Cir. 2004)

Stone v. Powell does not prohibit a habeas petition predicated on an attorney’s ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to file a motion to suppress or to raise properly a Fourth Amendment violation.

Clinkscale v. Carter, 375 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2004)

Trial counsel’s failure to file a state-required alibi notice prior to trial was ineffective assistance of counsel. Even if the attorneys envisioned some strategic benefit to be gained by failing to file a timely alibi notice, this strategy was symptomatic of the ineffective assistance of counsel.

Harris v. Cotton, 365 F.3d 552 (7th Cir. 2004)

The defendant killed a man who he claimed was assaulting him. A toxicology report was in existence that revealed that the victim was under the influence of alcohol and cocaine. Defense counsel’s failure to obtain this report and use it at trial was ineffective assistance of counsel. The outcome of the trial may well have been different if the jury were aware of the victim’s level of intoxication.

Young v. Dretke, 356 F.3d 616 (5th Cir. 2004)

Trial counsel failed to file a motion to dismiss the state indictment on timeliness grounds – a motion that would have been granted if filed. This failure amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Riley v. Payne, 352 F.3d 1313 (9th Cir. 2003)

Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to interview a key witness who would have testified that the victim was the aggressor in this assault case. The fact that the witness acknowledged that he ran away before the actual shooting did not render his testimony inconsequential, because his version of the events portrayed the victim as the initial aggressor and his version contradicted the victim’s version.

U.S. ex rel. Hampton v. Leibach, 347 F.3d 219 (7th Cir. 2003)

Trial counsel’s failure to investigate the facts of this case necessitated the granting of habeas relief. Counsel failed to interview witnesses who were present at the scene of the alleged sexual assault (a brutal gang assault during a rock concert). The court noted that the eyewitness testimony that was presented in this case was subject to the shortcomings that infect eyewitness testimony generally, making it “frequently less reliable than other types of evidence.” See Wright v. Gramley 125 F.3d at 1043 n. 4. The court further held that defense counsel’s unfulfilled promises during opening statement also amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel: he promised that his client would testify and state that he did not participate in the assault and he promised that there would be no proof that the defendant was a member of a gang.
Both promises were broken. “A broken promise of this magnitude taints both the lawyer who vouchsafed it and the client on whose behalf it as made.”

Joshua v. Dewitt, 341 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was stopped for speeding and the trooper determined that he, along with his passenger were acting nervous and suspicious. The trooper called his dispatcher and was told that the defendant was listed as a suspicious person who was believed to be a drug courier in a “Read & Sign” book maintained by the police department. Based on this information, the trooper detained the defendant while waiting for a canine to arrive. The dog arrived forty-two minutes later. Drugs were found on the passenger, who implicated the defendant. State trial counsel failed to challenge the legitimacy of the Read and Sign book that prompted the detention. Instead, he simply challenged the length of the detention. Based on United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221 (1985), a detention based on a “flyer” or something else akin to a “Read and Sign” book requires proof that the author of the flyer had reasonable suspicion to list the suspect as a criminal. In this case, however, the state offered no proof that the Read and Sign book was based on reliable information. Moreover, the state’s contention that the defendant’s nervousness justified a detention was meritless. Nervousness may be a basis for an articulable suspicion, but only when it is coupled with evasive behavior. The state trial lawyer’s failure to challenge the stop and search on this basis was ineffective assistance of counsel. The Sixth Circuit also noted that Hensley is not limited to initial stops, but also covers situations in which a stop is prolonged based on this type of information. The Sixth Circuit concludes that not only was trial counsel ineffective, but appellate counsel was, as well.

Anderson v. Johnson, 338 F.3d 382 (5th Cir. 2003)

Failure to interview eyewitnesses is ineffective assistance of counsel, which in this case was prejudicial. Merely cross-examining witnesses at trial is not a cure for failing to interview them.

Brown v. Myers, 137 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998)

Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate the availability of alibi witnesses. Witnesses were available (they testified at the habeas hearing) to testify that the defendant was not at the scene of the assault, but was at his girlfriend's house.

Holsomback v. White, 133 F.3d 1382 (11th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with repeatedly sodomizing his son over several years. The son was examined by a doctor, who found no evidence to support this charge. Defense counsel, however, never interviewed the doctor or called him as a witness. Counsel also failed to interview the child's treating physician, who was aware of no signs (physical or psychological) of abuse. The attorney's justification for not calling these witnesses might have been reasonable, but given the fact that the attorney never even interviewed the witnesses, there was no support for the state's argument that this reflected a tactical decision on the part of the defense counsel.

United States v. Gaviria, 116 F.3d 1498 (D.C. Cir. 1997)

Trial counsel advised the defendant incorrectly about the mandatory sentence he was facing if he were to plead guilty. An evidentiary hearing was required to determine whether the defendant would have accepted the offer (and whether it really was formally extended by the government) had he been properly advised of the consequences.

Seidel v. Merkle, 146 F.3d 750 (9th Cir. 1998)

There were abundant signs in the record that the defendant suffered from mental illness.
Nevertheless, trial counsel failed to conduct any investigation at all into his client’s psychiatric history and therefore neglected to pursue a potentially successful defense. Counsel failed to obtain defendant’s military, prison, or medical records. He failed to interview any witnesses regarding defendant’s mental state. He never requested a mental health evaluation of the defendant. Mental health evidence may have convinced the jury to conclude that the defendant acted without malice, thus reducing the degree of the offense from second-degree murder to manslaughter.

Turner v. Duncan, 158 F.3d 449 (9th Cir. 1998)

Counsel’s performance was characterized as follows: “failure to consult with petitioner before trial, investigate witnesses, follow up on the psychiatric report, undertake discovery, research any legal issues, or call any witnesses other than petitioner.” The defendant claimed that he had been sexually abused, sodomized, and beaten by the man he eventually killed. An investigation of available witnesses and psychiatric evidence would have supported defendant’s heat of passion defense.

United States v. Tarricone, 996 F.2d 1414 (2d Cir. 1993)

The defendant made a plausible showing that his trial counsel was ineffective in failing to retain a handwriting expert to show that certain handwriting on a key document was not penned by the defendant. A remand to fully develop this claim was necessary.

United States v. Kauffman, 109 F.3d 186 (3rd Cir. 1997)

Counsel knew that at the time of the defendant’s arrest, he had been described as manic and psychotic. Nevertheless, he failed to investigate a possible insanity defense. This was ineffective. While the evidence of the defendant’s guilt was considerable, this did not excuse the failure to conduct any investigation at all of the possible insanity defense.

United States v. Gray, 878 F.2d 702 (3rd Cir. 1989)

Though the attorney was aware of a witness who could provide exculpatory testimony, he did not interview her. At the post-conviction hearing, that witness’s testimony was offered and the defendant was thereby able to establish prejudice. The attorney’s failure to interview the witness rendered him ineffective.

United States v. Dawson, 857 F.2d 923 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The defendant was entitled to an evidentiary hearing on his habeas claim which asserted non-frivolous issues involving his trial counsel’s failure to call or interview numerous favorable witnesses.

Bryant v. Scott, 28 F.3d 1411 (5th Cir. 1994)

The defendant’s attorney in state court was ineffective in failing to investigate possible alibi witnesses after he was made aware of their existence by the defendant; failing to interview the eyewitnesses; and failing to interview the co-defendant who confessed to the crime and who exonerated the defendant.

Montgomery v. Petersen, 846 F.2d 407 (7th Cir. 1988)

The defense counsel’s failure to investigate the only available disinterested alibi witness was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hadley v. Groose, 97 F.3d 1131 (8th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to pursue an alibi witness revealed to them by the defendant, who would have provided an alibi for an alleged similar transaction.

Driscoll v. Delo, 71 F.3d 701 (8th Cir. 1995)

Although the blood on the knife of the defendant did not match the blood of the victim, the state’s expert explained that this was due to the “masking” of the victim’s blood type during the testing process. The defense attorney was not prepared to confront this testimony and failed to show that certain tests were not tainted by this “masking.” The defense attorney provided ineffective assistance.

Chambers v. Armontrout, 907 F.2d 825 (8th Cir. 1990)

The defense attorney’s failure to interview or call witnesses deprived the capital murder defendant of the effective assistance of counsel.

Tosh v. Lockhart, 879 F.2d 412 (8th Cir. 1989)

Despite the availability of three witnesses who offered to provide alibi evidence, the defense attorney interviewed none of them. The defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel.

Jones v. Wood, 114 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 1997)

Petitioner should have been granted a hearing to test the validity of his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. First, the defendant’s suggestion that his daughter’s boyfriend might have been the murderer was not adequately investigated. Second, trial counsel made no attempt to test the available physical evidence.

Johnson v. Baldwin, 114 F.3d 835 (9th Cir. 1997)

Petitioner’s trial counsel inadequately investigated the defendant’s alibi defense in preparation for this rape trial. Had the attorney investigated this defense, he would have learned that it was not true and that the defendant, in fact, was at the scene of the crime, but that no rape had occurred at all. (The petitioner’s co-defendant was tried separately and testified that they were both present and no sexual conduct occurred at all with the victim; he was acquitted).

Baylor v. Estelle, 94 F.3d 1321 (9th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to pursue a lead that the semen sample from one rape victim did not match the defendant’s blood traits. Even though the defendant had confessed to the crime on videotape, this evidence, if properly pursued and developed, ultimately would have established (as it was during the habeas proceedings) that the defendant could not have been the perpetrator.

Harris v. Wood, 64 F.3d 1432 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defense attorney’s deficiencies in this case are almost too numerous to set forth. He failed to interview known witnesses for the prosecution; failed to make proper objections at trial; failed to investigate witnesses who could provide exculpatory information; failed to secure an independent evaluation of the ballistic evidence; and failed to raise meritorious issues on appeal. He was also ineffective in calling the defendant to testify; advising the defendant to make a statement to prosecutors; and giving a closing argument which was critical of the defendant.

United States v. Palomba, 31 F.3d 1456 (9th Cir. 1994)

In the criminal complaint, the defendant was charged with mail fraud. The original indictment, however, did not allege mail fraud. A superceding indictment three months later, added the mail fraud counts. This violated the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. §3161(b). Trial counsel’s failure to move to dismiss these charges amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Williamson v. Ward, 110 F.3d 1508 (10th Cir. 1997)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present to the jury the fact that prior to defendant’s trial, another individual had confessed to the murder and also in failing to investigate the defendant’s mental illness which might have explained his “confession” – his confession was that he “dreamed” that he had committed the murder. There was considerable evidence in support of the defendant’s mental illness. There was a reasonable probability that the defendant was tried while incompetent, and that his “dream confession” was a product of his mental illness. Counsel (who was blind) had his son sit near him during the trial and had instructed him to wrestle the defendant to the ground if he made any sudden movements toward him during the trial.

Huynh v. King, 95 F.3d 1052 (11th Cir. 1996)

Counsel was ineffective in failing to file a timely suppression motion.

United States v. Yizar, 956 F.2d 230 (11th Cir. 1992)

An evidentiary hearing was necessary to evaluate defendant’s claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. Among counsel’s alleged errors was the failure to interview witnesses which would have revealed that the co-defendant had told the prosecutor that the defendant was innocent. Had counsel learned of this, he may have been entitled to a severance in order to use the co-defendant’s testimony pursuant to Byrd v. Wainwright, 428 F.2d 1017 (5th Cir. 1970).
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Ineffective – trial and sentencing)

Workman v. Superintendent Albion SCI, 915 F.3d 928 (3rd Cir. 2019)
Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to address in any meaningful way the proof offered by the prosecution at trial.

Lobbins v. United States, 900 F.3d 799 (6th Cir. 2018)
Two sections of § 1512 apply to witness tampering: § 1512(a)(1)(C) applies to killing or attempting to kill a witness and § 1512 (a)(2)(C) applies to the use of physical force to prevent a witness from communicating with federal law enforcement. In Fowler, discussed above, the Court held that the government must prove in a § 1512(a)(1)(C) case a “reasonable likelihood” that the witness was communicated with federal law enforcement. In this case, the Sixth Circuit holds that the same proof is required in a § 1512 (a)(2)(C) case: the government must prove a reasonable likelihood that the witness against whom the defendant used physical force would have communicated with federal law enforcement about a federal offense. Trial counsel’s failure to object to a jury instruction that incorrectly explained this element of the offense was ineffective assistance of counsel requiring that this conviction be set aside.

Cates v. United States, 882 F.3d 731 (7th Cir. 2018)
The offense of aggravated sexual abuse, 18 U.S.C. § 2241(a), requires as an element the use of force. This element requires more than coercion, psychological coercion, or even force inferred from a disparity in size between the defendant and the victim. Instructing the jury on aggravated sexual abuse in this case was error and trial counsel’s failure to object was prejudicial error.

Stephenson v. Neal, 865 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2017)
Requiring the defendant to wear a stun belt during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial was reversible error. Trial counsel’s failure to object was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Laureys, 866 F.3d 432 (D.C. Cir. 2017)
Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel by failing to secure expert testimony in this Internet child enticement case. An expert could have countered the testimony of the detective that anybody who drives to the location for a proposed rendezvous with a child intends to actually have sex with the minor. The expert would have testified that this is not necessarily true and than many men would to the location intending to have sex with an adult, while continuing to fantasize about having sex with a child.

Jones v. Calloway, 842 F.3d 454 (7th Cir. 2016)
The defendant and two others were charged with murder. The trials were severed. At the first trial, defendant Stone testified that he shot the victim in defense of his brother. The defendant was convicted. At Jones’s trial, the prosecution claimed that he shot the victim. The defense attorney did not call Stone as a witness. The state habeas court held that because Stone presumably would have invoked his fifth amendment right, there was no showing of prejudice.
However, if Stone had invoked his fifth amendment right to remain silent, his prior trial testimony would have been admissible. The Seventh Circuit held that trial counsel was ineffective and the writ was granted.

Jordan v. Hepp, 831 F.3d 837 (7th Cir. 2016)

Three times during closing argument the prosecutor vouched for the detective’s credibility, stating that the detective would lose her job if she gave false testimony. This type of improper vouching is improper, because it introduced information to the jury that was not in evidence (the consequences when a detective provides false testimony). Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object. The attorney’s deficient performance was prejudicial, though a remand was necessary to determine if the attorney had a strategic reason for failing to object.

Gaylord v. United States, 829 F.3d 500 (7th Cir. 2016)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the enhancement in this drug case that the offense “caused death” in light of the absence of proof that the drugs distributed by the defendant was the but-for cause of the decedent’s death. A remand for a hearing on this section 2255 claim was necessary.

United States v. Nwoye, 824 F.3d 1129 (D.C. Cir. 2016)

Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel by his failure to introduce expert testimony on the subject of battered spouse syndrome. The defendant claimed that she participated in an extortion scheme because her husband beat her and coerced her to engage in the criminal conduct. The failure to present such evidence resulted in the trial court refusing to instruct the jury on the law of duress, because of the absence of any proof of the “no reasonable alternative” prong of the duress defense’s prerequisites. With such evidence, the instruction would have been required. Thus, the defendant was prejudiced by counsel’s failure to present expert testimony on the phenomenon of battered spouse syndrome.

United States v. Ragin, 820 F.3d 609 (4th Cir. 2016)

A lawyer who sleeps throughout substantial portions of the trial denies his client effective assistance of counsel and reversal is required, even if the evidence at trial was overwhelming. The error is structural when the lawyer is absent through sleep during substantial portions of the trial, which means the defendant is not required to show prejudice as a result of his sleeping attorney.

United States v. Abney, 812 F.3d 1079 (D. C. Cir. 2016)

The defendant’s crack cocaine offense occurred prior to the passage of the Fair Sentencing Act in 2010, which dramatically altered the mandatory minimum calculations. His sentencing was scheduled for the day after Congress passed the bill, but prior to the President signing it into law (which was scheduled to occur in the next few days). The defense attorney failed to request a continuance which would have enabled the defendant to take advantage of the new provisions (and permit a substantially lower sentence). Though it was not certain that the law would be applied retroactively to defendants in Abney’s situation (crime committed prior to the passage of the law, but sentencing after passage of the law), it was deficient performance to fail to request a continuance in order to provide Abney the benefit of the new law if it were held to be retroactive (which it was, in Dorsey v. United States, 132 S.Ct. 2321 (2012)).

Etherton v. Rivard, 800 F.3d 737 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was convicted in state court of possessing cocaine in his vehicle. The prosecution introduced testimony from his co-defendant who was in the car with him, but that witness was significantly impeached. The other evidence (other than finding the cocaine in the vehicle) was a tip received by the police that the car was on the interstate and it had cocaine in it. This existence of the tip was introduced twice and the prosecutor referred to the tip in his closing argument. There was no objection to this evidence at trial and the issue was not raised on appeal. The tip was inadmissible evidence and violated the defendant’s rights under the Confrontation Clause. The Sixth Circuit granted habeas relief. The Supreme Court reversed: The federal court did not afford sufficient AEDPA deference to the conclusion of the state courts. The “tip” was not necessarily introduced for the truth of the matter asserted and trial counsel may have had a strategic reason not to object. 578 U.S. --- (2016).

Ramirez v. United States, 799 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2015)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the designation of the defendant as a career offender. One of his predicate offenses involving a crime that categorized included reckless conduct and was therefore not properly classified as a violent felony.

Crace v. Herzog, 798 F.3d 840 (9th Cir. 2015)

Failing to request an instruction on a lesser included offense (which would have eliminated the application of the three-strikes sentencing provision), was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Gabaree v. Steele, 792 F.3d 991 (8th Cir. 2015)

Trial counsel’s failure to object when a doctor, in a child sex abuse prosecution, testified that he “believed the girls,” was deficient performance. Trial counsel also failed to object to another doctor’s testimony that based on his testing of the defendant, the defendant exhibited signs of (or had the propensity to) commit child sexual abuse. At the habeas hearing, the lawyer did not testify that she followed any particular strategy in the failure to object to this testimony, or could not remember if she followed a strategy. On several counts of the conviction, this deficient performance was prejudicial and required setting aside the convictions.

Zapata v. Vasquez, 788 F.3d 1106 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with murdering a Mexican man on a street. There was at least one witness who saw the shooting, but he could not hear what was said prior to the two shots being fired, though he could see the shooter gesticulating at the victim. In the prosecutor’s closing argument, he repeatedly asked the jury to imagine the last words heard by the victim, “You fuckin’ wetback.” There was no support for this argument, which was repeated several times during the rebuttal argument. There was no reason for the defense attorney to fail to object to this improper argument. The state habeas court’s conclusion that a defense attorney could have thought that this argument would backfire was objectively unreasonable.
Lee v. Clarke, 781 F.3d 114 (4th Cir. 2015)

The trial attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel in the defendant’s murder trial by failing to request an instruction that defined heat of passion which was an essential element of the lesser-included offense manslaughter.

Rivas v. Fischer, 780 F.3d 529 (2d Cir. 2015)

The defense attorney’s failure to cross-examine the medical examiner about why he changed the possible time of death was deficient performance that required setting aside the conviction. The time of death determination was critical to the defendant’s alibi defense. Initially, the medical examiner posited a time of death for which the defendant had an alibi. The medical examiner then changed the possible range of time to defeat the alibi. Cross-examining the medical examiner on this change was essential.

Peoples v. Lafler, 734 F.3d 503 (6th Cir. 2013)

Trial counsel failed to impeach the credibility of key witnesses with known false testimony. The impeachment would have demonstrated that two of the state’s witnesses not only lied, but that they told the same lie, showing that they cooked up their story while sharing a jail cell.

Griffin v. Harrington, 727 F.3d 940 (9th Cir. 2013)

Trial counsel’s failure to object when the key prosecution witness testified without taking an oath was ineffective assistance of counsel. The notion that this was “strategic” was rejected by the Ninth Circuit. The witness was a reluctant witness and initially refused to take the oath. The jury was excused and the judge admonished the witness that he was required to take the oath. The jury then returned, but no oath was administered. After the witness testified in a manner that did not inculpate the defendant, his prior recorded statement was introduced and that established the defendant’s guilt. The Ninth Circuit concluded that failing to object to the witness’s unsworn testimony enabled the prosecution to bring in the prior statement; moreover, failing to object led to the state appellate court holding that the issue was waived for appellate purposes.

Grant v. Lockett, 709 F.3d 224 (3rd Cir. 2013)

Trial counsel’s failure to investigate the state’s key witness’s criminal background and parole status, and the failure to present that impeaching information at trial was ineffective assistance of counsel. The fact that the defendant, in the habeas petition, was not able to present evidence that the witness was actually promised anything in return for his testimony was not fatal to a showing of prejudice. The impeaching evidence would still have been admissible under Davis v. Alaska and the failure to impeach the witness undermined confidence in the verdict.

Cannedy v. Adams, 706 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2013)

State trial counsel’s failure to locate and present evidence from a witness who could have testified that the alleged child molestation victim had made recanting statements, and the failure to present the victim’s recantation statements that she posted on the internet, was ineffective assistance of counsel and a writ was properly granted by the district court.
McPhearson v. United States, 675 F.3d 553 (6th Cir. 2012)
Defense counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel at sentencing because of his failure to contend that the cocaine on the defendant’s person was for personal use and should not have been considered as relevant conduct in his drug amount calculation.

United States v. Rodriguez, 676 F.3d 183 (D. C. Cir. 2012)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to seek safety-valve relief. This was a matter that could be considered on direct appeal.

Cornell v. Kirkpatrick, 665 F.3d 369 (2d Cir. 2011)
Trial counsel’s failure to challenge venue in this rape prosecution was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Walker v. McQuiggan, 656 F.3d 311 (6th Cir. 2011)
Trial counsel’s failure to recognize the viability of an insanity defense, given the records of defendant’s history of mental illness and the absurdity of the defendant’s defense to the murder charges was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Breakiron v. Horn, 642 F.3d 126 (3rd Cir. 2011)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request an instruction on the lesser included offense of theft in this murder / robbery prosecution.

Hodgson v. Warren, 622 F.3d 591 (6th Cir. 2010)
A witness who had critical exculpatory testimony to offer did not appear at trial and defense counsel took no steps to assure her appearance, including a request for an adjournment or a bench warrant. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Withers, 618 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2010)
Trial counsel was arguably ineffective in failing to object when the trial court ordered the spectators to leave the courtroom prior to the beginning of jury selection. This was a structural error that violated the defendant’s right to a public trial.

United States v. Washington, 619 F.3d 1252 (10th Cir. 2010)
The defendant’s attorney failed to advise the defendant about the consequences of admitting to “relevant conduct” during a presentence interview with a probation officer. As a result, the defendant volunteered that he had engaged in numerous prior drug deals, which resulted in an increased sentence. The Tenth Circuit held that this amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Luck, 611 F.3d 183 (4th Cir. 2010)
Trial counsel was ineffective and the conviction was required to be set aside, because he failed to request a jury instruction that cautioned the jury that an informant’s testimony needed to be examined and weighed with greater care than the testimony of an ordinary witness. Even a general credibility instruction does not substitute for an instruction that specifically points out the potential for perjury born out of self-interest.

White v. Thaler, 610 F.3d 890 (5th Cir. 2010)
Trial counsel was ineffective during trial in numerous respects: (1) Failure to object to the defendant’s post-arrest, pre-Miranda silence. Though this did not violate federal constitutional law, the use of post-arrest, pre-Miranda silence is not allowed under Texas law and, therefore, the failure to object was ineffective assistance of counsel; (2) failure to object to evidence that the victim was pregnant. The defendant was charged with driving out of a parking lot of a bar and running over the victim, with whom he had no prior contact. He was charged with murder. The fact that the victim was pregnant was entirely irrelevant to the issues in the trial and the failure to object was prejudicial.

State trial counsel was ineffective in failing to adequately investigate the availability of a witness to provide exculpatory information. Because of the failure to adequately investigate the witness’s testimony, the attorney believed that the witness had favorable testimony to offer. During trial, he realized that the witness was not that helpful, but he had already promised to call the witness during his opening statement. The decision not to call the witness was a sound decision; the failure to determine this before trial, and then promising to call the witness during opening statement, was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Wilson v. Mazzuca, 570 F.3d 490 (2d Cir. 2009)
In this armed robbery case, the trial defense attorney made numerous inexplicable trial decisions that prejudiced the defendant, including opening the door to the admissibility of the defendant’s prior criminal conduct (because he offered character evidence), allowing a mug shot of the defendant to be introduced, and asking questions that enabled the state to offer evidence of a witness’s prior identification of the defendant as the perpetrator, which would not otherwise have been admissible. This was ineffective assistance of counsel that necessitated granting the writ. (During the trial, the trial judge expressed concern about the attorney’s conduct and asked him whether he had some strategy to explain these tactics and the attorney responded affirmatively; the Second Circuit rejected this self-serving statement as a basis for rejecting the claim of ineffective assistance of counsel).

Richards v. Quartermann, 566 F.3d 553 (5th Cir. 2009)
For a host of reasons, trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel to the defendant. Exculpatory evidence was not presented (in fact, trial counsel prevented the prosecutor from introducing some evidence that was exculpatory); a lesser included offense instruction was not requested; key witnesses were not interviewed prior to trial.

Toliver v. McCaughtry, 539 F.3d 766 (7th Cir. 2008)
Trial counsel’s failure to introduce the testimony of two witnesses whose testimony would have contradicted the theory of the state’s case was ineffective assistance of counsel. The attorney did not even interview one of the exculpatory witnesses and had no valid reason for failing to call the other. In a subsequent appeal, the Seventh Circuit granted the writ after further fact-finding by the trial court. Toliver v. Pollard, 688 F.3d 853 (7th Cir. 2012).

Tilcock v. Budge, 538 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel’s failure to challenge the use of certain prior convictions as qualifying predicate convictions for recidivist sentencing may have been ineffective assistance of counsel. Remand needed to determine if such a challenge would have been successful.

Malone v. Walls, 538 F.3d 744 (7th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel’s failure to call to the stand an eyewitness who exculpated his client was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Armstrong v. Kemna, 534 F.3d 857 (8th Cir. 2008)

Trial counsel’s failure to research and invoke the Uniform Act to secure the attendance of out-of-state witnesses was ineffective assistance of counsel. A remand to determine whether this was prejudicial was ordered by the Eighth Circuit.

Girts v. Yanai, 501 F.3d 743 (6th Cir. 2007)

During closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly made reference to the “only person” who could answer certain questions. This amounted to an improper comment on the defendant’s failure to testify. Trial counsel’s failure to object and preserve the error for appellate review was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Bell v. Miller, 500 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2007)

The victim was robbed in the street and shot. When the police asked him who shot him, he said “a black male wearing a lemon-colored shirt.” He lost copious amounts of blood and then slipped into a coma. Eleven days later he began to recover and was asked to identify the assailant again. This time he identified an acquaintance. Trial counsel did not hire an expert to explain the effects of the coma and the drugs the victim had taken and how this could have altered his identification. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Miller v. Martin, 481 F.3d 468 (7th Cir. 2007)

Standing mute at sentencing is not a valid “strategic” decision that a defense attorney can make. The defendant was absent for his trial, but appeared for sentencing. The attorney decided that saying nothing at sentencing was a good strategy. The Seventh Circuit disagreed, concluding that this amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

Higgins v. Renico, 470 F.3d 624 (6th Cir. 2006)

On the last day of trial, the prosecutor announced that he had found a key witness and called him to testify. The defense attorney had not obtained this witness’s pretrial testimony and asked for an adjournment so he could prepare to cross-examine the witness. The judge denied the request for a several hour break and allowed the attorney a brief time to prepare. When trial re-commenced, the attorney refused to cross-examine the witness in protest. The Sixth Circuit held that this amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.
Lankford v. Arave, 468 F.3d 578 (9th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel in this death penalty case offered a jury instruction on the law of accomplice testimony that was incorrect under state law (it omitted the requirement of corroboration) that lessened the state’s burden of proof. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Goodman v. Bertrand, 467 F.3d 1022 (7th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to subpoena favorable witnesses, failing to file motions in limine regarding supposed threat evidence, opening the door (during direct examination of the defendant) to prior offenses of the defendant, and failing to show a prosecution witness’s motive to testify for the prosecution. The Seventh Circuit noted that while viewed in isolation, the attorney’s mistakes may not have been prejudicial, but taken in their totality, the errors constituted prejudicial ineffective assistance of counsel.

Stanley v. Bartley, 465 F.3d 810 (7th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel failed to interview any witnesses or engage in any meaningful pretrial preparation. His cross-examination of witnesses reflected his lack of preparation. Judge Posner held that a new trial was necessary.

Reynoso v. Giurbino, 462 F.3d 1099 (9th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel’s failure to question the two eyewitnesses about their expectation of receiving a reward for their participation in the prosecution of the defendant was ineffective assistance of counsel that necessitated setting aside the conviction.

Medina v. Diguglielmo, 461 F.3d 417 (3rd Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the competency of a child witness to testify. Nevertheless, counsel’s error did not prejudice the defendant and was not a basis for granting the writ.

Virgil v. Dretke, 446 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2006)

Trial counsel’s failure to conduct further voir dire, or to move to remove certain prospective jurors for cause or peremptorily was ineffective assistance of counsel. The jurors expressed an inability to be fair. One juror said that because his mother had been mugged, he could not be fair. Another juror said that his relationship to law enforcement officers would preclude him from being an impartial juror. Failing to move to strike the jurors for cause – and failing to exercise a peremptory strike against these jurors – was not a matter of strategy. In addition to the decision’s analysis of the ineffective claim, the court extensively reviews the case law relating to the requirement of ensuring that jurors are impartial.

Davis v. Grigas, 443 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2006)

The trial attorney was ineffective in incorrectly advising the court about the sentence to which the defendant had stipulated as part of his plea. The stipulated sentence was a sentence of 6 to 15 year caps. But the attorney told the sentencing judge that the defendant stipulated to a sentence of 15 years. This was grounds for federal habeas relief.
United States v. Alferahin, 433 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with a violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1425(a), knowingly procuring naturalization contrary to law. The trial court did not instruct the jury on the concept of materiality in connection with the false statement that the defendant allegedly made on his naturalization application. The trial defense attorney acquiesced to the failure to instruct the jury on the concept of materiality. The Ninth Circuit held that materiality is an element of the offense, the failure to instruct the jury on this essential element was plain error and the attorney was ineffective in failing to object.

Thomas v. Varner, 428 F.3d 491 (3rd Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the admissibility of the out-of-court and the in-court identification of his client by one of the victims. The victim was initially unable to identify the perpetrator. He was shown numerous photos and still could not identify the perpetrator. Finally, the officer took out two photos and showed them to the victim, who agreed that one of the photos showed the perpetrator. This was an impermissibly suggestive identification procedure. Counsel initially objected pretrial to any identification evidence, but the victim failed to identify the defendant in court during that hearing, so the motion was withdrawn. At trial, however, the victim spontaneously identified the defendant. Trial counsel failed to object, or seek any remedial measure. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hodge v. Hurly, 426 F.3d 368 (6th Cir. 2005)

The Sixth wrote, “During his egregiously improper closing argument, the prosecutor commented on the credibility of witnesses, misrepresented the facts of the case, made derogatory remarks about the defendant, and generally tried to convince the jury to convict on the basis of bad character, all while defense trial counsel sat idly by. We conclude that defendant’s trial counsel was constitutionally ineffective in failing to object to this misconduct . . .”

Martin v. Grosshans, 424 F.3d 588 (7th Cir. 2005)

At defendant’s state child molestation trial, the state introduced evidence that years after the alleged act of molestation, the defendant, a priest, disagreed with a proposal for how to handle allegations of abuse at the church. The state argued that this reflected his consciousness of guilt. The Seventh Circuit held that failing to object to this testimony, which was irrelevant and prejudicial, was ineffective assistance of counsel. In addition, the failure to object to the defendant’s failure to answer questions posed by an investigator, because his lawyer advised him not to answer questions was also ineffective assistance.

Ward v. Dretke, 420 F.3d 479 (5th Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to closing argument statements by the prosecutor that the jury would be ridiculed if they sentenced the defendant too leniently; and that they should use Biblical standards in imposing punishment.

Miller v. Dretke, 420 F.3d 356 (5th Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel performed deficiently by failing to introduce various medical records and testimony regarding the defendant that demonstrated severe mental health issues that would have had an impact on her sentencing.
Smith v. Dretke, 417 F.3d 438 (5th Cir. 2005)
Trial counsel’s failure to present evidence in this murder / self-defense case about the victim’s long history of violence was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Tenny v. Dretke, 416 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2005)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to fully investigate and present evidence at trial relating to the defendant’s viable self-defense claim.

United States v. Holder, 410 F.3d 651 (10th Cir. 2005)
The trial court erred in failing to conduct an evidentiary hearing regarding trial counsel’s failure to call to the stand an eyewitness to the shooting that the defendant was charged with. The eyewitness would have supported the defendant’s self-defense claim and there was no evidence in the record to explain any strategic basis for failing to call this witness to the stand.

United States v. McCoy, 410 F.3d 124 (3rd Cir. 2005)
The defendant was charged with a drug offense. The government threatened to introduce a prior firearm conviction as Rule 404(b) evidence unless the defendant stipulated to the defendant’s “state of mind” with regard to the drug offense. The defendant agreed to the stipulation which informed the jury that the defendant denied possessing the duffel bag, but if the jury found that the defendant did possess the duffel bag, it could also find, based on the stipulation, that the defendant knew its contents and intended to possess the drugs. While this might be a reasonable stipulation in some circumstances – and was, in fact a reasonable stipulation for the co-defendant to enter – for the defendant in this case, the stipulation was a poor choice for two reasons: first, he unquestionably did possess the duffel bag at some point; and second, the prior firearm conviction, though damaging, did not really prove his state of mind in possessing the duffel bag (the co-defendant had a prior drug conviction, thus explaining his rationale for entering into the stipulation). A remand was necessary to fully develop the prejudice prong of this ineffective claim.

Henry v. Poole, 409 F.3d 48 (2d Cir. 2005)
The defense attorney’s inadequate performance in presenting a flawed alibi defense was ineffective assistance of counsel. The alibi was for the wrong night.

Cox v. Donnelly, 387 F.3d 193 (2d Cir. 2004)
Trial counsel’s failure to object to an improper jury instruction in this murder case (an instruction that minimized the state’s burden of proving the defendant’s intent – a Sandstrom violation), was ineffective assistance of counsel, though a remand was necessary to inquire into the reason (if any) that prompted the attorney’s failure to object. Following remand, the Second Circuit agreed with the District Court that the defense attorney’s failure to object was objectively unreasonable and warranted granting habeas relief.

Miller v. Webb, 385 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2004)
Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request that a juror be excused for cause – and then failing to utilize a peremptory strike on the juror. During voir dire, the juror expressed her bias in favor of the government’s key witness in this murder case. She knew the witness from Bible study courses. The juror should have been removed for cause.

United States v. Colon-Torres, 382 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 2004)

There was considerable evidence to find that the defense attorney rendered ineffective assistance of counsel during the sentencing proceedings. The court – reviewing the case on direct appeal – decided that a collateral attack was not necessary, though further evidence was required in the lower court. The attorney failed to investigate his client’s criminal history before entering into a plea agreement. (The attorney did not realize that his client was a career offender). Counsel was also arguably ineffective in failing to move to withdraw the plea once it was learned that the envisioned sentence was an impossibility due to the defendant’s criminal history.

Earls v. McCaughtry, 379 F.3d 489 (7th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with molesting a six-year old child. There were no witnesses to the events and no physical evidence corroborating the child’s statements. A social worker who interviewed the child and testified as an expert said that she believed the child. This was inadmissible evidence and the attorney’s failure to object amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. In addition, during the videotape of the child prepared by the social worker, the social worker told the child that she believed her and the defendant should not have done that to her. The attorney’s failure to redact the tape was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Soffar v. Dretke, 368 F.3d 441 (5th Cir. 2004)

Trial counsel’s failure to investigate and present the inconsistent statements that were made by the only survivor of a robbery (three others were killed) – inconsistencies about identification that dramatically contradicted the defendant’s own alleged confession – amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel which required setting aside the conviction. For example, the witness stated that there was only one perpetrator who wore no mask and that the victims were quiet before they were killed. The defendant’s confession, on the other hand, indicated that there were two perpetrators, that they wore masks and that the victims were screaming before they were killed. Trial counsel also failed to employ a ballistic expert. Such testimony also would have contradicted the defendant’s alleged confession (and the state’s theory of the events).

Defendant was charged with murdering his girlfriend’s young child. The girlfriend was also charged with the homicide and ultimately entered a guilty plea to a lesser charge. The defendant claimed that if he was the cause of death, it was accidental. In the jury instruction, the trial court erroneously failed to tell the jury that in order to be found guilty, the defendant had to knowingly cause the death of the victim. Instead, the instruction simply stated that the defendant had to be shown to have caused the death. Trial counsel’s failure to object to this omission in the instruction was ineffective assistance of counsel necessitating a new trial.

Alaniz v. United States, 351 F.3d 365 (8th Cir. 2003)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the use of an uncharged drug offense to increase the mandatory minimum sentence.
Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise trial counsel’s ineffectiveness in failing to be present when the jury sent a note back during deliberations and when the trial court re-charged the jury.

United States v. Conley, 349 F.3d 837 (5th Cir. 2003)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the defendant’s sentence on the § 371 conspiracy count. In the trial court, the parties and the court erroneously believed the conviction was for a money laundering conspiracy (§ 1956(h)). Section 371 limits exposure to five years, while § 1956(h) permits a twenty year sentence. It was ineffective to fail to object to a sentence that exceeded the statutory maximum. Moreover, appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to appeal this error.

U.S. ex rel. Hampton v. Leibach, 347 F.3d 219 (7th Cir. 2003)

Trial counsel’s failure to investigate the facts of this case necessitated the granting of habeas relief. Counsel failed to interview witnesses who were present at the scene of the alleged sexual assault (a brutal gang assault during a rock concert). The court noted that the eyewitness testimony that was presented in this case was subject to the shortcomings that infect eyewitness testimony generally, making it “frequently less reliable than other types of evidence.” See Wright v. Gramley 125 F.3d at 1043 n. 4. The court further held that defense counsel’s unfulfilled promises during opening statement also amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel: he promised that his client would testify and state that he did not participate in the assault and he promised that there would be no proof that the defendant was a member of a gang. Both promises were broken. “A broken promise of this magnitude taints both the lawyer who vouched for it and the client on whose behalf it was made.”

United States v. Smack, 347 F.3d 533 (3rd Cir. 2003)

Trial counsel was arguably ineffective in failing to raise at sentencing the sentencing guideline application note that reduces the drug quantity attributable to the defendant in a case involving a reverse sting, if he either did not intend to transact the quantity involved in the deal, or lacked the funds necessary to complete the deal. Remand was necessary to further develop the facts.

Davis v. Secretary for Dept. of Corrections, 341 F.3d 1310 (11th Cir. 2003)

When state trial counsel fails to preserve a Batson challenge for appellate review, the federal habeas court assesses the ineffectiveness in same manner that an attorney’s ineffectiveness on appeal would be assessed: that is, whether the issue would have resulted in reversal of the conviction had it been properly preserved. Thus, the question of prejudice focuses on the merits of the Batson challenge, not the prejudice to the determination of guilt / innocence.

Paine v. Massie, 339 F.3d 1194 (10th Cir. 2003)
Trial counsel’s failure to introduce expert evidence about battered spouse syndrome was ineffective assistance of counsel that required a remand for the purpose of conducting a hearing on the issue of prejudice.

United States v. Mullins, 315 F.3d 449 (5th Cir. 2002)

Defense counsel prevented the defendant from testifying in his firearms trial. Counsel’s decision was based on the desire to keep out impeaching information, such as the defendant’s prior drug dealing and bad check charges. The Fifth Circuit concludes that barring the defendant from testifying is deficient performance under Strickland v. Washington, though there was no prejudice in this case. Counsel is obligated to advise the defendant of the strategy decisions being made, but with regard to whether the defendant should testify, the defendant makes the ultimate decision and that decision may not be vetoed by counsel.

United States v. Leonti, 326 F.3d 1111 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was entitled to effective assistance of counsel in the post-plea, presentencing phase of his case. Though a defendant does not have the right to the effective assistance of counsel during an interview with a probation officer preparing a presentence report, the attorney in this case was needed to facilitate discussions between the defendant and the prosecutor that were essential to the defendant’s cooperation agreement. The petitioner also claimed that his attorney should have helped modify a release order that required him to wear an ankle bracelet, which limited his ability to make deals for the investigators. The Ninth Circuit agreed, in principle, and remanded for a hearing on the question of whether the attorney was, in fact, ineffective in these endeavors.

Eagle v. Linahan, 279 F.3d 926 (11th Cir. 2001)

At trial, defense counsel raised a Batson claim. The prosecutor responded that the ratio of blacks on the jury mirrored the ratio in the venire, thus there could be no Batson claim. The judge agreed with this argument, but commented at the conclusion of the Batson hearing, "I think both of you were doing what you could to get the different races off." Appellate counsel was ineffective in failing to raise what was a blatant error of law committed by the trial court in denying the Batson claim on an improper basis (comparing the venire with the jury), especially in light of the judge's comment that demonstrated that the Batson claim was meritorious.

Ouber v. Guarino, 293 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2002)

After promising to the jury emphatically during opening statement that the defendant would testify, the defense attorney decided not to call the defendant to the stand. This was ineffective assistance of counsel requiring that a writ of habeas corpus be granted.

United States v. Holman, 314 F.3d 837 (7th Cir. 2002)

Though it may be sound trial strategy, an attorney may not concede guilt on one count of an indictment without the client’s permission.

McGurk v. Stenberg, 163 F.3d 470 (8th Cir. 1998)

Trial counsel’s failure to determine that he had a right to a jury trial for his third-offense DWI amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.
Bloomer v. United States, 162 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 1998)

The district court’s numerous “embellishments” on the definition of proof beyond a reasonable doubt were erroneous. The trial court instructed the jury that if they did not find the elements proven beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury “could” return a not guilty verdict. Actually, absent such proof, the jury would be required to return a not guilty verdict. In addition, the trial court misleadingly explained, “To support a verdict of guilty, you need not find every fact beyond a reasonable doubt.” The court also incorrectly stated, “So a reasonable doubt means only a substantial doubt.” The Second Circuit also concluded that the failure to object to these improper instructions was probably ineffective assistance of counsel, but additional testimony was required in the lower court before this decision could be made with finality.

Tejeda v. Dubois, 142 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 1998)

The state trial disintegrated into a battle between defense counsel and the judge. Counsel yelled at the judge, threw his papers around the court, and made facial expressions. Counsel was ultimately held in contempt. Counsel changed his tactic from attempting to defend the defendant to attempting to antagonize the judge. As a result, counsel neglected to exploit some of the inconsistencies in the prosecution witnesses’ testimony. Whether the unfair trial which resulted was caused by the intolerance of the judge, or the tactics of the defendant was hard to determine, but one way or the other, the defendant was denied the effective assistance of counsel.

Groseclose v. Bell, 130 F.3d 1161 (6th Cir. 1997)

Defendant's counsel was ineffective during the guilt phase of this death penalty trial. Counsel had no independent theory of the defense, relying instead, on the defenses of the co-defendants. He waived closing argument, urged the defendant not to testify (though the defendant had no record and always maintained his innocence), and cross-examined fewer than half of the state's witnesses. He introduced no evidence in defense of the defendant.

United States v. Soto, 132 F.3d 56 (D.C. Cir. 1997)

Trial counsel's failure to request a downward adjustment for minor role under the Sentencing Guidelines amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. The defendant was a courier who was carrying drugs for the first time from New York to North Carolina. She was not even aware of the quantity of drugs she was transporting. Though counsel requested a downward departure, he never requested a downward role adjustment.

United States v. Russell, 221 F.3d 615 (4th Cir. 2000)

The government moved in limine to introduce three convictions of the defendant if he testified. The defendant told his attorney that two of the convictions had been overturned. The attorney did not investigate, in fact, he advised the defendant to admit the prior convictions during direct examination. In fact, two of the convictions had been vacated and were invalid. The attorney’s failure to determine the status of the two convictions was unreasonable and ineffective assistance and necessitated vacating the conviction.

Washington v. Smith, 219 F.3d 620 (7th Cir. 2000)
Counsel’s failure to read the police report in this case, and his failure to assure the presence of several alibi witnesses was deficient and prejudiced the defendant. Writ granted. The failure to track down the witnesses and to get them under subpoena in enough time to assure their appearance cannot be excused on the basis of crowded court dockets and the uncertainty about when a trial will actually begin. Additionally, telling his incarcerated client that he should arrange for the appearance of favorable witnesses is not satisfactory.

_Paters v. United States_, 159 F.3d 1043 (7th Cir. 1998)

Prior to trial, the government offered the defendant a five-year deal. Defense counsel incorrectly advised the defendant that he did not face more than that if he went to trial. Counsel failed to explain the concept of relevant conduct, or acceptance of responsibility. Following a conviction at trial, the defendant was sentenced to 121 months. The government and the defendant agreed that the trial attorney’s performance was deficient. The Seventh Circuit held that the deficient performance was prejudicial, if the defendant could establish, on remand, that but for the incorrect advice, he would have accepted the plea agreement.

_Genius v. Pepe_, 50 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 1995)

The defendant’s state trial counsel was ineffective in failing to pursue an insanity defense. Experts had already determined that the defendant was mentally deficient.

_Anderson v. Butler_, 858 F.2d 16 (1st Cir. 1988)

During his opening statement, the defense attorney promised that he would call an expert witness on the issue of defendant’s psychiatric problems. At trial, however, the defense attorney changed his mind and did not introduce this testimony. The First Circuit holds that this is ineffective assistance of counsel.

_Henry v. Scully_, 78 F.3d 51 (2d Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to make a hearsay and confrontation clause objection to the admissibility of a co-defendant’s confession which implicated the defendant.

_Tippins v. Walker_, 77 F.3d 682 (2d Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel slept through substantial portions of the petitioner’s trial. This is not consistent with the Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel. The petitioner’s conviction was set aside, even though he could point to no particular objection that should have been raised, or other specific inadequacy of his trial counsel — other than the fact that he was virtually unconscious during the testimony of several witnesses who testified against the defendant.

_Deluca v. Lord_, 77 F.3d 578 (2d Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to develop and present a defense based on extreme emotional disturbance.

_Berryman v. Morton_, 100 F.3d 1089 (3rd Cir. 1996)

Three men were charged with raping a woman. One defendant was tried first and that case involved two trials because of a hung jury. At the third trial, the petitioner’s trial, his attorney failed to use transcripts from the first two trials to expose inconsistencies in the victim’s identification of the defendant. Counsel also inexplicably opened the door to evidence that the co-defendant, and at least implicitly the petitioner himself, was the subject of an armed robbery/homicide investigation. Finally, counsel was ineffective in failing to call as a witness two individuals who could provide exculpatory evidence.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Weatherwax, 20 F.3d 572 (3rd Cir. 1994)

On the third day of defendant’s murder trial, a local newspaper purported to recount the defendant’s testimony, but did so in a distorted and prosecution-oriented manner. Jurors were seen carrying the newspaper into the jury room. This was brought to the attention of the defense attorney, but he made no effort to seek a voir dire of the jury. This sets forth a non-frivolous case of ineffective assistance of counsel, requiring further factual development in the trial court.

United States v. Headley, 923 F.2d 1079 (3rd Cir. 1991)

The defendant was deprived of effective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to urge that the trial court award a downward adjustment for the defendant’s role in the offense. This could be addressed on direct review and did not require a habeas petition.

Government of the Virgin Islands v. Forte, 865 F.2d 59 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The attorney’s failure to make a Batson challenge rendered him ineffective. Curiously, Batson had not been decided at the time this trial occurred. Nevertheless, the defendant, as well as a consulting attorney, had instructed the trial attorney to make the Batson objection. The attorney later explained that because she had frequently excluded whites from juries when she was representing black defendants, she was “too embarrassed” to make this type of challenge.

United States v. Breckenridge, 93 F.3d 132 (4th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to argue that defendant’s prior convictions were related, and therefore did not subject him to career offender status. The case was remanded to determine whether, in fact, the prior offenses were related, and thus whether the ineffective assistance prejudiced the defendant.

Luchenburg v. Smith, 79 F.3d 388 (4th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was convicted of the “compound crime” of using a handgun during the commission of a crime of violence. The trial attorney failed to request an instruction cautioning the jury that they must first convict the defendant of the crime of violence, before they could convict the defendant of using a handgun during the crime of violence, and also cautioning the jury that common law assault is not a crime of violence. Instead, the court’s instruction could have conveyed to the jury that the use of a weapon might be considered in deciding whether the defendant committed a crime of violence (which is not the law in Maryland). Trial counsel’s failure to request this instruction and his failure to object to the instruction that was given was prejudicial.

United States v. Tatum, 943 F.2d 370 (4th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud for having failed to list certain automobiles on his assets schedule. He was represented initially by an attorney who worked for the firm which advised him not to list the cars (another of whose lawyers owned one of the cars). That attorney was eventually disqualified, but he remained in the case and sat at counsel table and advised the new defense attorney. That attorney’s participation, even as second chair, represented ineffective assistance of counsel because of the severe conflict.
Tucker v. Day, 969 F.2d 155 (5th Cir. 1992)

At defendant’s re-sentencing, the appointed counsel did not consult with him, had no knowledge of the facts, and acted as a mere spectator. The defendant was denied the assistance of counsel.

Gravley v. Mills, 87 F.3d 779 (6th Cir. 1996)

The prosecutor improperly introduced evidence and argued to the jury the significance of this evidence, relating to the defendant’s post-Miranda silence. The defense counsel did not object and did not raise this issue in the new trial motion, or on direct appeal. This was ineffective assistance of counsel. The court found that this constituted the “cause” necessary to excuse the procedural default and granted the writ.

Ward v. United States, 995 F.2d 1317 (6th Cir. 1993)

Defendant’s trial counsel was ineffective in several ways: he opened up the character door by his inept cross-examination of one witness; was inappropriately hostile to the prosecutor and acted in such a way that the jury was snickering at him.

Crowe v. Sowders, 864 F.2d 430 (6th Cir. 1989)

During the course of the defendant’s trial, the judge explained to the jury the parole consequences of a verdict. The defense attorney did not object, did not move for a mistrial and failed to move for a new trial after the verdict was returned. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Green v. Arn, 809 F.2d 1257 (6th Cir. 1987)

Defense counsel absented himself from trial during portions of the proceedings. This constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel per se. After remand from the Supreme Court to consider whether the issue was moot, because of defendant’s release from parole, the Sixth Circuit reinstated its original opinion. 839 F.3d 300 (6th Cir. 1988).

Patrasso v. Nelson, 121 F.3d 297 (7th Cir. 1997)

Trial counsel was ineffective in the penalty phase of this murder (non-death penalty) trial. There was considerable mitigating evidence which was not presented by the defense counsel and, for all relevant purposes, counsel was a mere spectator at the sentencing hearing.

Nichols v. United States, 75 F.3d 1137 (7th Cir. 1996)

The petitioner was entitled to an evidentiary hearing to determine whether his trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge the relevant conduct that the probation officer recommended should be considered in imposing a sentence under the Sentencing Guidelines.

Williams v. Washington, 59 F.3d 673 (7th Cir. 1995)

Defense counsel failed to review discovery materials provided by the state; failed to object to the admissibility of certain evidence which was introduced in violation of the rules against hearsay; and apparently conducted no investigation of the case prior to trial.

Stoia v. United States, 22 F.3d 766 (7th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was represented at trial by certain attorneys, but claimed in this §2255 petition that another attorney, who did not file an appearance, was actually directing trial strategy. An ineffective assistance of counsel claim may be valid, even with respect to an attorney who has not filed an appearance. In this case, the non-appearing attorney was burdened with a conflict of interest. The non-appearing attorney made numerous tactical decisions which the defendant followed, including requesting a continuance, not interviewing certain witnesses.
and recommending that the defendant not testify in his own behalf. He also failed to file any pretrial motions, which was his delegated responsibility in the case. The non-appearing attorney’s conflict resulted from an agreement he had with the government, as part of his own plea agreement, that provided that he would not represent any person charged with crimes. The attorney was also involved in undercover work with law enforcement.

_Moffett v. Kolb_, 930 F.2d 1156 (7th Cir. 1991)

At defendant’s state attempted murder trial, trial counsel failed to impeach a witness (who testified that the defendant shot the gun) with prior statements that another person shot the gun. This was ineffective assistance of counsel. Though counsel asked the witness whether he had made inconsistent statements, he failed to produce the statements when the witness denied the prior inconsistent statement.

_Harris v. Reed_, 894 F.2d 871 (7th Cir. 1990)

During opening statements, the defense attorney promised the jury that an alternative theory of the killing would be presented; the defense presented no evidence, however, relying instead on the perceived weakness of the State’s case. Furthermore, there were two witnesses available to the defense to suggest that a person other than the defendant had committed the crime. This constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel.

_United States v. Myers_, 892 F.2d 642 (7th Cir. 1990)

Trial counsel failed to review _Brady_ material turned over by the government and failed to submit an instruction designed to limit the impact of certain evidence. A full evidentiary hearing was necessary to determine whether the defendant was, in fact, denied effective assistance of counsel.

_Freeman v. Class_, 95 F.3d 639 (8th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel’s failure to request a cautionary instruction amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel. Specifically, the state relied on the testimony of an accomplice and under state law the defendant was entitled to an instruction that cautioned the jury about the reliability of accomplice testimony. Trial counsel was also ineffective in offering hearsay evidence that implicated the defendant. Finally, counsel was ineffective in failing to object when the state offered evidence of the defendant’s silence after being advised of his _Miranda_ rights.

_Starr v. Lockhart_, 23 F.3d 1280 (8th Cir. 1994)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to jury instructions during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial relating to “pecuniary gain” and “heinous, atrocious, or cruel” aggravating circumstances. Both of these aggravating circumstances had been found unconstitutional at the time of the defendant’s trial. Though the “pecuniary gain” circumstance was later found to be constitutional (and thus there was no prejudice from failing to object to this instruction), the “heinous, atrocious, or cruel” circumstance was unconstitutionally vague and did not adequately limit the death-eligible defendants. See _Godfrey v. Georgia_, 446 U.S. 420 (1980); and _Maynard v. Cartwright_, 486 U.S. 356 (1988). Though one aggravating circumstance was still valid, in a “weighing” state, such as Arkansas (the jury weighs the aggravating circumstances against the mitigating circumstances), if there is one invalid aggravating circumstance, the death sentence must be set aside.
Prichard v. Lockhart, 990 F.2d 352 (8th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was sentenced as a recidivist because of a prior out-of-state drug conviction. The plain language of the statute under which he was sentenced, however, precluded the use of out-of-state convictions. His trial attorney’s failure to object to the use of this prior conviction was plainly ineffective and prejudicial. The fact that the state statute had not been construed by the state court to preclude the use of out-of-state convictions until after the sentence was imposed in this case is not relevant, because the statute plainly barred consideration of such convictions.

Houston v. Lockhart, 982 F.2d 1246 (8th Cir. 1993)

Though an evidentiary hearing was necessary to develop the record, the petitioner set forth a valid ineffective assistance of counsel claim. There was an oral agreement between the defense attorney and the prosecutor to stipulate to the admissibility of polygraph results. The defendant passed the polygraph. An oral stipulation, however, was not sufficient under state law. The attorney was ineffective in not requesting that the agreement be in writing prior to the polygraph; or in at least asking that it be reduced to writing after the polygraph results were obtained.

United States v. Span, 75 F.3d 1383 (9th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to request a jury instruction on an applicable affirmative defense in this assault case; failing to object to the trial court’s substitute instruction; and failing to present available evidence as a foundation for the affirmative defense. In summary, trial counsel failed to present the excessive force defense to a charge of assaulting a federal officer, relying instead on a simple self-defense defense.

Crotts v. Smith, 73 F.3d 861 (9th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was tried in state court on a charge of assaulting a police officer. He had previously been convicted of a sexual offense. A witness to the assault on the police officer was asked by the prosecutor whether the defendant had told her that he had “just done ten years for killing a cop?” The prosecutor also asked the defendant, on cross-examination, whether he had told the witness that he was “wanted” for killing a cop. The prosecutor knew, in fact, that the defendant had never been convicted for such an offense. The defense attorney did not object. This was ineffective assistance of counsel. Even if the defendant had made these boastful (but untruthful) statements to the witness, they were not admissible, because not probative of whether he assaulted the police officer in this case.

Tomlin v. Myers, 30 F.3d 1235 (9th Cir. 1994)

The petitioner’s trial counsel failed to challenge an out-of-court identification (because it was conducted without the benefit of counsel), as well as the in-court identification which may have been the product of the unlawful out-of-court identification. This was ineffective assistance of counsel, necessitating the granting of habeas relief.

Sanders v. Ratelle, 21 F.3d 1446 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant’s attorney was aware that the defendant’s brother had confessed to his mother that he was the person who killed the victim. Nevertheless, the attorney did not pursue this defense and did not call the brother to the stand, or seek to admit his out-of-court confession under the applicable state rule of evidence which would permit the introduction of a statement against interest.
United States v. Swanson, 943 F.2d 1070 (9th Cir. 1991)

Conceding during the closing argument that there was no reasonable doubt that the defendant robbed the bank was grossly ineffective – a total breakdown in the adversary system which required granting a new trial even without any inquiry into actual prejudice.

Williamson v. Ward, 110 F.3d 1508 (10th Cir. 1997)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to investigate and present to the jury the fact that prior to defendant’s trial, another individual had confessed to the murder and also in failing to investigate the defendant’s mental illness which might have explained his “confession” – his confession was that he “dreamed” that he had committed the murder. There was considerable evidence in support of the defendant’s mental illness. There was a reasonable probability that the defendant was tried while incompetent, and that his “dream confession” was a product of his mental illness. Counsel (who was blind) had his son sit near him during the trial and had instructed him to wrestle the defendant to the ground if he made any sudden movements toward him during the trial.

United States v. Glover, 97 F.3d 1345 (10th Cir. 1996)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to challenge whether the methamphetamine that was the subject of the defendant’s sentencing was “d” or “l” meth.

Capps v. Sullivan, 921 F.2d 260 (10th Cir. 1990)

The defendant testified, admitting every element of the offense of trafficking in heroin. There was evidence to support a defense of entrapment, but the attorney opted instead to go for jury nullification. The failure to request an entrapment instruction was ineffective assistance.

United States v. Cronic, 839 F.2d 1401 (10th Cir. 1988)

On remand from the United States Supreme Court which revamped the rules for gauging ineffective assistance of counsel, this case was again reversed by the Tenth Circuit on grounds that the attorney was ineffective. The attorney failed to assert a good faith defense in this mail fraud prosecution and also failed to investigate the bank’s acceptance of security for the overdraft upon which this prosecution was based.

Nichols v. Butler, 953 F.2d 1550 (11th Cir. 1992)

Counsel threatened to withdraw from representing the defendant mid-trial if the defendant insisted on testifying. This amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel under the United States v. Teague standard.

United States v. Teague, 953 F.2d 1525 (11th Cir. 1992)

A defendant has the fundamental right to testify in his own defense. This may only be waived personally, not solely through counsel. Thus, if the attorney vetoes the defendant’s decision to testify, the defendant may challenge his conviction. After rehearing the case en banc, the Eleventh Circuit re-affirmed the principle that the defendant has a fundamental right to testify and that the right may not be unilaterally waived by his attorney. However, the facts in this case did not show that the defendant’s will was overborne. Rather, the attorney urged the defendant not to testify and the defendant agreed. Consequently, there was no ineffective assistance of counsel.

Smelcher v. Alabama, 947 F.2d 1472 (11th Cir. 1991)

Defendant’s trial attorney failed to object to the trial judge’s prohibition of any evidence that the rape victim had had prior sexual liaisons with the defendant. A hearing on the attorney’s ineffectiveness was required.

Oyola v. Bowers, 947 F.2d 928 (11th Cir. 1991)

Defendant’s trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to a jury instruction which incorrectly set forth the elements of the offense of conviction.

Thomas v. Harrelson, 942 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir. 1991)

The proof at trial amounted to a constructive amendment of the indictment. The trial attorney failed to object to this variance and did not preserve the issue for appellate review. This was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Hollis v. Davis, 941 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1991)

In 1959, the defendant was convicted of burglary. His sentence, which he was still serving in 1990, was 99 years. He was denied effective assistance of counsel based on his attorney’s failure to challenge the pervasive discrimination in both the grand and petit juries in the Alabama jurisdiction in 1959.

Atkins v. Attorney General of Alabama, 932 F.2d 1430 (11th Cir. 1991)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to the introduction of defendant’s fingerprint card which contained a notation of the defendant’s prior arrest.

Nixon v. Newsome, 888 F.2d 112 (11th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel in light of his lawyer’s failure to cross-examine the only eyewitness to the murder with regard to her prior sworn testimony that it was not the defendant, but another person who shot the victim. The lawyer had the transcript of this prior testimony at counsel table but failed to introduce the prior inconsistent statements which would have been admissible as substantive evidence under Georgia law.

Harrison v. Jones, 880 F.2d 1279 (11th Cir. 1989)

Under Alabama law, a former plea of nolo contendere is not admissible to enhance the defendant’s sentence. The lawyer’s failure to object to such evidence at the sentencing of his client operated to deprive the defendant of effective assistance of counsel.

Harding v. Davis, 878 F.2d 1341 (11th Cir. 1989)

The trial judge directed a verdict of guilty against the defendant. The failure to object represents ineffective assistance even without a showing of prejudice.

Chatom v. White, 858 F.2d 1479 (11th Cir. 1988)

The Eleventh Circuit holds that the failure to object to the introduction of an “atomic absorption test” which reportedly demonstrated that an accomplice had not fired the murder weapon constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. Because the case against the defendant was entirely circumstantial, the test had the potential of conclusively establishing for the jury that the defendant, and not the accomplice, had fired the gun.

Julius v. Johnson, 840 F.2d 1533 (11th Cir. 1988)

Defense counsel was ineffective for failing to request a cautionary instruction regarding the admissibility of the defendant’s prior murder conviction during the guilt phase of his murder prosecution. This was harmless error in this case.

Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object to a whole range of hearsay evidence which the prosecutor introduced. Police officers were permitted to testify about what the defendant’s parents had opined about the truthfulness of their son and their belief that the defendant’s denials were false. The attorney also failed to object to the prosecutor’s closing argument which relied on this testimony. The Second Circuit affirmed: 849 F.2d 1467.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Attorney-Client Privilege)

Justice Sotomayor, in her first opinion, holds (for the unanimous Court) that a district court order that compels disclosure of what is claimed to be attorney-client privileged material is not immediately appealable under the collateral order doctrine. Though the “cat is out of the bag” argument has some merit, the normal rules that prohibit piecemeal appeals controls. The aggrieved party may appeal after trial and, if successful, can win a new trial at which the information may not be used. Also, the party may simply refuse to comply, suffer an order of contempt, and appeal that order. Third, the party may seek to invoke 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) which authorizes the district court to certify an interlocutory appeal.

In determining whether the crime fraud exception to the attorney/client privilege applies, the district court may conduct an in camera review of the communications themselves if the party opposing the privilege satisfies the court that there is a reasonable belief that such examination will yield evidence establishing the applicability of the crime fraud exception. Any evidence may be used to make this showing.

The attorney-client privilege survives the death of the client.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 909 F.3d 26 (1st Cir. 2018)

At least in some circumstances, the attorney-client privilege applies to government employees and government attorneys. In this case, the apparent target of the grand jury subpoena was not a government employee, so the privilege applied to communications between an employee and the government lawyer.

United States v. Krug, 868 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2017)

When two clients who are in a joint defense agreement have a discussion, it is possible that the discussion is privileged, even if a lawyer is not present, if the discussion reflects the advice of one of the lawyers, or was a discussion intended to be repeated to one of the participants’ lawyers. In this case, however, the conversation between two member of the joint defense agreement was not privileged. Notwithstanding that the lawyers for the defendants were nearby and had recently been in communication with their clients, the excluded statements were not made for the purpose of obtaining legal advice from a lawyer, nor did the excluded statements share among defendants advice given by a lawyer, nor did the excluded statements seek to facilitate a communication with a lawyer. Here, the hallway discussion consisted of one member of the JDA conveying his independent, non-legal research to another member of the JDA while noting he had sent the same research to his attorney. No legal advice was mentioned, much less shared or otherwise conveyed, among the co-defendants.
In re Grand Jury Matter #3, 847 F.3d 157 (3rd Cir. 2017)

In order for work product or attorney client privileged communications to be stripped of the privilege on the basis of the crime-fraud exception, the defendant must engage in some overt act of fraud or criminality and not simply muse about using the information to commit a crime. In this case, the document was submitted to the grand jury which returned an indictment and later a second grand jury returned a superseding indictment. Nevertheless, because the government conceded that the grand jury was still investigating the defendant, the district court had jurisdiction to consider the privilege issue.

In re Grand Jury Investigation, 810 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir. 2016)

The initial decision that the crime fraud exception applies to attorney-client communications may be made by the court without reviewing the actual documents. However, once the prima facie case is made, the court must then review the documents individually that the government seeks, to determine whether the specific documents were sufficiently related to and were made in furtherance of the intended fraud. The trial court failed to conduct this second step and simply held that all documents must be produced. This was error, requiring a remand for further fact-finding on a document-by-document basis.

Schaeffler v. United States, 806 F.3d 34 (2d Cir. 2015)

In this IRS summons enforcement action, the Second Circuit held that the joint defense / common interest privilege applied to documents that were shared among clients, including a consortium of banks, that shared a common interest in the tax treatment of a refinancing and corporate restructuring. Additionally, the court held that the work-product doctrine applied to documents analyzing the tax treatment of the refinancing and restructuring that were prepared in anticipation of litigation with the IRS. See United States v. Adlman, 134 F.3d 1194 (2d Cir. 1998). In this case, the documents were prepared by a federally authorized tax practitioner (whose communications are treated the same as the attorney-client privilege, 26 U.S.C. § 7525(a)(1)).

United States v. Nelson, 732 F.3d 504 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant entered into a plea – later withdrawn – that contained an express waiver of his rights under Rule 410 to exclude evidence of his statements in the event he withdrew. At his trial, the government sought to introduce not only his statements, but also his then-attorney’s testimony about the circumstances surrounding the preparation of the factual basis. This violated the attorney-client privilege. The defendant’s waiver regarding the use of his statements did not also waive the attorney-client privilege.

Gennusa v. Canova, 748 F.3d 1103 (11th Cir. 2014)

A suspect and her attorney went to a police station to be interviewed. Prior to the interview, the attorney and the suspect were placed in an interview room (the suspect was not in custody) and were not warned that their conversation would be taped. The Eleventh Circuit held that monitoring the conversation violated the Fourth Amendment rights of the two individuals and that a § 1983 action could be brought, because the deputies were not entitled to qualified immunity for this obvious violation of the Fourth Amendment and the attorney-client privilege.
In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 745 F.3d 681 (3rd Cir. 2014)

This case contains a thorough primer on the procedures that are appropriate when the government seeks to pierce the attorney-client privilege by invoking the crime-fraud exception. The procedure — proceeding in camera before a trial judge ex parte — is appropriate. An immediate appeal under the Perlman doctrine is appropriate when, as here, the information is in the possession of the attorney, who would otherwise have no reason to risk being held in contempt in order to protect his client’s privilege; thus the client may appeal, rather than having to wait for the attorney to be held in contempt and relying on the attorney’s decision to appeal. On the merits, the Third Circuit held that crime fraud exception applies only if the client was in the process of committing a crime, or contemplating committing a crime when the attorney was consulted. It does not apply if the attorney is consulted and later the client decides to commit a crime or fraud.

In re Grand Jury, 705 F.3d 133 (3rd Cir. 2012)

When a grand jury subpoena is issued to a corporation for certain documents, or to an attorney for the corporation who is in possession of certain of the corporate documents the attorney must suffer the consequences of contempt in order to perfect an appeal of an Order by the district court that the attorney-client privilege does not apply. The Order requiring the attorney to produce the records is not directly appealable. The exception recognized in Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7 (1918), only applies to a third party custodian who has no interest in being held in contempt. In that situation, the client has the right to appeal the Order, because the custodian has no interest in perfecting an appeal and the client is not subject to contempt, so the client must be afforded the opportunity to appeal without the custodian, or the client first being held in contempt. In the situation with an attorney custodian, however, the client can simply insist that the documents be returned to the client and the client can then refuse to produce the documents, be held in contempt and appeal. With respect to Orders directed at former employees (including former in-house counsel), the corporation may appeal, because the corporation may not require former employees to return documents to the corporation. Finally, the Third Circuit held that Mohawk did not eliminate the Perlman rule, at least in the context of grand jury subpoenas. The Third Circuit, having disposed of the jurisdictional issue, then reached the merits of the crime fraud exception issue, as it related to the former employees and concluded that a sufficient showing was made by the government to invoke the crime fraud exception.

United States v. Gonzalez, 669 F.3d 974 (9th Cir. 2012)

The Ninth Circuit holds that the defendant established the existence of a joint defense agreement and was therefore entitled to prevent the attorney from offering testimony during this § 2255 proceeding. The court also held that the privilege survives the client’s filing of a § 2255 proceeding alleging ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Krane, 625 F.3d 568 (9th Cir. 2010)

Even post-Mohawk, if a subpoena for arguably privileged documents is issued to a disinterested third party, the “client” may intervene and pursue an interlocutory appeal of the production of the documents. The Ninth Circuit, relying on Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7...
(1918), held that the third party custodian presumably has no interest in resisting disclosure, or being held in contempt, and therefore, without permitting the client to intervene and appeal, there is no avenue for the client to advocate for the privilege. The Ninth Circuit noted, however, that this rule only applies if the disinterested third party (i.e., the law firm which is subpoenaed to produce documents) is no longer the defendant’s counsel. That is, the Perlman rule only applies if the third party is the former attorney for the defendant.

_United States v. Graf_, 610 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was an independent contractor who provided consulting services to an insurance corporation. In actuality, he was probably the principal operator of the corporation, whose official title was not as an officer or employee because he was barred from employment with any insurance company. Attorneys for the corporation discussed various matters with him about the operations of the company. He was ultimately indicted. The corporation officially waived the privilege and the attorneys testified against the defendant. The Ninth Circuit affirms. For purposes of the attorney client privilege, the attorneys were attorneys for the corporation, not the individual; and he was an employee of the corporation because of the manner in which he conducted his consulting business.

_United States v. Thompson_, 562 F.3d 387 (D.C. Cir. 2009)

The government was investigating WPC, Corp. The corporation conducted an internal investigation and turned over the results of the investigation to the government. Accompanying the disclosure was a letter that sought to preserve both the attorney client and work product privileges. The corporation settled with the government. Thompson, however, was indicted. He filed a Rule 16 request for the documents and interviews submitted by the corporation, as well as a _Brady_ request. The corporation sought to bar disclosure to the defendant. The D.C. Circuit held that the defendant was entitled to both _Brady_ and Rule 16 material. The court cautioned, however, that a wholesale disclosure of all the materials presented to the government by the corporation were not required to be furnished, because if the material did not qualify as _Brady_ and would not be “material to the defendant’s ability to prepare a defense,” there was no basis for requiring its disclosure.

_United States v. Novak_, 531 F.3d 99 (1st Cir. 2008)

An individual who was incarcerated and facing a federal sentencing contacted an attorney – the defendant in this case – from the jail telephone and the two discussed illegal ways in which the attorney could eliminate the defendant’s criminal history. The jail telephone warned all callers that the call would be taped, though state law provided that the police would not listen to calls with attorneys. The police listened to these calls, however, in violation of that state regulation. The attorney was prosecuted for his participation in the obstruction of justice scheme. The First Circuit concluded that the inmate’s consent to the taping of the call was sufficient to render the Fourth Amendment claim meritless. With regard to the attorney-client privilege, the attorney-defendant did not claim that the taping violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights and the First Circuit did not address these potential claims.

_In re Grand Jury Proceedings_, 492 F.3d 976 (8th Cir. 2007)
Even if the government succeeds in persuading the court that certain documents were covered by the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege, the work product privilege survives, assuming the attorney was an unwitting participant in the client’s fraud.

Jenkins v. Bartlett, 487 F.3d 482 (7th Cir. 2007)

Generally, if a third party is sitting in during a conversation between a client and a lawyer, the conversation will not be privileged. In limited situations, however, the presence of a person who is assisting the lawyer will not vitiate the privilege. In this case a union representative for the police brought the officer who was accused of wrongdoing to the lawyer and assisted in preparing materials for the representation. The presence of the union rep did not render the communications unprivileged.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas 04-124-03, 454 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2006)

When a grand jury issues a subpoena to a person or entity that holds documents that arguably are privileged, the holder of the privilege (i.e., the target of the grand jury investigation) has the right to review the documents and assert the privilege. The government in this case argued that the government, through the use of a taint team, should do the initial privilege review. The Sixth Circuit held that the privilege takes precedence over the grand jury’s power to investigate and subpoena records.

United States v. Bergeson, 425 F.3d 1221 (9th Cir. 2005)

A defendant jumped bail. His attorney, Ms. Bergeson, was subpoenaed to testify at the grand jury about whether she had told her attorney about the trial date. The trial court held that the information was not privileged, but the subpoena would be quashed as unreasonable and oppressive, because compliance with the subpoena would destroy the attorney-client relationship. The government had other evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the trial date (from the defendant’s mother and an earlier pleading filed by counsel indicating that the defendant agreed to a continuance). The Ninth Circuit affirmed, holding that the trial court did not abuse his discretionary authority under Rule 17(c)(2).

United States v. DeFonte, 441 F.3d 92 (2d Cir. 2006)

A witness for the government was an inmate at a federal pretrial detention center. The inmate kept a journal that recorded her conversations with her attorney and that also noted various observations that she intended to later relate to her attorney. The Second Circuit held that the first category of information fell within the attorney-client privilege. The second category – notes or outlines of what the client intended to discuss with the attorney – would be considered privileged if, in fact, the conversations did occur at some point after the document was prepared. In other words, an outline for future discussion is not privileged until after the discussion occurs.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 445 F.3d 266 (3d Cir. 2006)

The attorney communicated with the corporate client representative, advising her about a subpoena duces tecum. The crime fraud exception applied to this communication, because the government claimed that the client made decisions about shredding documents and deleting emails (or at least not preventing the deletion of documents) based on this communication. This case contains a lengthy analysis of the crime fraud exception to the attorney client privilege.

United States v. Doe, 429 F.3d 450 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The crime fraud exception applied in this case where the client, a law enforcement officer, consulted an attorney and sought information that would have enabled the client to conceal his criminal activity.

In re Lott, 424 F.3d 446 (6th Cir. 2005)

Even when a defendant in a successive habeas petition relies on the “actual innocence” doctrine, his communications with trial counsel which indicate guilt are not subject to disclosure to the prosecution.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 419 F.3d 329 (5th Cir. 2005)

When a client uses his attorney’s advice to further a crime or fraud, this does not vitiate the privilege with regard to all communications between the attorney and client. The privilege is only lost with regard to those communications and papers that are used in furtherance of the fraud or crime. The district court’s order in this case correctly found that the crime fraud exception applied, but the order was too broad in ordering the disclosure of all documents relating to the attorney-client relationship.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Under Seal), 415 F.3d 333 (4th Cir. 2005)

This case explores the rules established in Upjohn v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981), dealing with the attorney-client privilege in situations where corporate counsel talks to employees. An employee who communicates with his employer’s internal investigation counsel and is specifically apprised that the lawyer represented only the company could not personally invoke the attorney-client privilege.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 417 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2005)

First, the standard for applying the crime-fraud exception: It is enough to overcome the privilege that there is a reasonable basis to believe that the lawyer’s services were used by the client to foster a crime or fraud. Second, the First Circuit considered the impact of such a finding on a joint defense agreement that was not infected with the fraud: the joint defense agreement protects the privileged communications.

United States v. Under Seal, 401 F.3d 247 (4th Cir. 2005)

In order to rule on the crime fraud exception, the district court must actually consider the contents of the documents and may not simply accept the prosecutor’s proffer. The court did not expressly hold that the trial court must examine the documents personally, but the contents must be the focus of the inquiry.

In re Grand Jury Investigation (United States v. Doe), 399 F.3d 527 (2d Cir. 2005)

A state official’s communication with a state attorney may qualify as a privileged communication. In this case, the governor’s counsel engaged in privileged communications with the governor (who was the target of the investigation) as well as staff personnel in the governor’s office.

United States v. Almeida, 341 F.3d 1318 (11th Cir. 2003)

The Eleventh Circuit considered various aspects of the joint defense privilege in this case. The critical holding is that when one participant joins a defense privilege agreement and later testifies as a government witness, the admissions he made pursuant to the “privilege” to other attorneys may be used by his erstwhile co-defendants to impeach him.

In re Keeper of Records (Grand Jury Subpoena Addressed to XYZ Corp.), 348 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2003)

The First Circuit considers issues of attorney-client communication waiver in circumstances where the purported waiver occurs not in a judicial proceeding. The corporation retained outside counsel who conversed with another corporation’s representatives about the subject matter of the grand jury’s investigation. The attorney’s conversation with the other corporate representative, including statements about what he told his client, did not operate to waive the attorney-client privilege with regard to all communications related to that subject matter. Similarly, meetings between corporate counsel and the government, meetings that were preceded with an explicit statement that the attorney-client privilege would not be waived, did not waive the privilege with regard to all related communications. With regard to implied waivers (extending beyond the actual conversations that were revealed, to other communications on the same subject matter), the court held that there would be no implied waivers of privileged subject matters in an extra-judicial setting, unless the client sought to gain some tactical advantage from the disclosure.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 341 F.3d 331 (4th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was questioned about an answer he provided on an INS application regarding his prior record. When confronted with the falsity of the answer, he stated that he had consulted with an attorney before answering the question. The attorney was then brought to the grand jury and asked about the advice provided to the defendant about the answer to that question on the application. Though the question to the attorney was a matter that would generally be privileged (and the fact that the application itself was not confidential did not vitiate the privilege), the privilege was waived by the defendant’s reliance on that advice when responding to the agents’ questions.

United States v. Rakes, 136 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with perjury. He was the victim of extortion and had been called to the grand jury to testify about the crime, but denied that he had been victimized. He confided in his wife, and his attorney about the extortion. The government then sought to compel the testimony of his wife and attorney. The district court upheld the marital communication and attorney-client privilege claims. The First Circuit affirmed. There is no exception to the privileges in cases in which the client is the victim of a crime.

When the grand jury issues a subpoena to a law firm for records relating to a client, if the trial court denies a motion to quash on attorney/client privilege grounds, the company may immediately appeal and need not wait until the law firm is held in contempt. Turning to the merits of this appeal, the First Circuit concluded that billing records may, in some circumstances, contain attorney/client privileged information where, for example, the bill reveals the nature of the work performed by the attorney. The record was too sparse in this case, however, to make this determination and a remand for further development of the facts was necessary.

United States v. Bauer, 132 F.3d 504 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud, including allegations of concealing assets. As the government’s last witness, the defendant’s bankruptcy attorney was called to the stand and asked to testify whether he told the defendant of his duty to disclose all assets and whether he was told the bankruptcy forms were filled out under the penalty of perjury. Despite the fact that the attorney was told not to discuss the exact words that were used, or to reveal any specifics of their conversations, this still violated the attorney-client privilege and necessitated reversing the conviction. The Ninth Circuit noted that the attorney-client privilege is a two-way street: it covers statements made by the client, as well as the advice rendered by the attorney. The court also held that the crime-fraud exception did not apply, because the attorney’s advice was not used to further a crime or fraud.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 219 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2000)

A corporation was being investigated for illegal firearms sales. The corporation explicitly sought to enforce the attorney-client privilege. An officer of the corporation, however, testified at the grand jury about certain dealings of the corporation and procedures that the corporation adopted in light of counsel’s advice; and the corporation’s in-house counsel also testified, but refused to disclose certain notes that were taken by his assistant during a meeting about which he testified (claiming that this was work product). The government claimed that the corporation waived both the attorney-client and the work product privileges. The Second Circuit held that waiver may be found where the privilege holder asserts a claim that in fairness requires examination of protected communications. Fairness comes into play when a party attempts to use the privilege both as a sword and as a shield. In other words, a party cannot partially disclose privileged communications or affirmatively rely on privileged communications to support its claim or defense and then shield the underlying communications from scrutiny by the opposing party. A quintessential example of waiver is the advice of counsel defense. Circumstances may also dictate that there has been a partial waiver. The issue is more complicated in the context of corporate entities, because, as here, the corporation may assert the privilege, but an officer – acting in an individual capacity – may inadvertently (or, for that matter, intentionally) waive the privilege. This case contains a thorough review of the jurisprudence of waiver and corporate attorney-client privilege and work product privilege issues.
Whitehouse v. United States District Court for District of Rhode Island, 53 F.3d 1349 (1st Cir. 1995)

The District Court did not exceed its authority in issuing a local rule which adopted the ABA ethics rule requiring judicial approval before a subpoena is issued to an attorney seeking information about a client.

United States v. Klubock, 832 F.2d 664 (1st Cir. 1987)

The First Circuit divides three to three thereby affirming the district court decision which upheld a rule which requires federal prosecutors to seek permission from the court prior to issuing a subpoena to a lawyer. The rule was adopted by the district court for the District of Massachusetts as a local rule.

In re Richard Roe, Inc., 68 F.3d 38 (2d Cir. 1995)

In analyzing a claim that a lawyer-client communication is subject to the crime-fraud exception, the court must determine whether there was probable cause to believe that a crime or fraud has been attempted or committed and that the specific communication was in furtherance of that fraud. It is not enough that the documents or communications are relevant evidence of the fraud. Rather, the communications must be in furtherance of the fraud. Thus, the communication must either facilitate or cover-up the fraud. The lower court’s findings in this case were not sufficient to make this determination.

Vingelli v. United States, 992 F.2d 449 (2d Cir. 1993)

An attorney who paid the fee for another lawyer to represent a defendant may not refuse to identify his client – the person who gave him the money to give to the attorney representing the defendant. Client-identity and fee-payment information is not privileged. Though the Second Circuit recognizes that in some circumstances such disclosures can be resisted, such as where the substance of a confidential communication has already been revealed, but not its source, this exception does not apply here. The fee-payor’s fear of possibly being tarnished with guilt by association is insufficient.

United States v. Schwimmer, 892 F.2d 237 (2d Cir. 1989)

A joint defense privilege may exist even prior to the initiation of litigation and the privilege exists even if one party talks to another party’s lawyer outside the presence of the first party’s lawyer. The privilege also covers conversations between one party and the accountant of another, if the accountant was retained by the lawyer of the other party and the communication was intended to be confidential. The protection afforded by the privilege applies even indirectly; such as by bringing out facts brought to knowledge solely by reason of a confidential communication. Here, the accountant who was hired by one defendant’s attorney provided various documents to the prosecutor after that defendant entered a guilty plea. Some of the information, however, had been acquired from the other defendant, who had relied on the joint defense privilege. Though those documents were not themselves introduced, the prosecutor used information derived from these sources. A full evidentiary hearing was necessary to determine whether the government had this information independently.

United States v. Dennis, 843 F.2d 652 (2d Cir. 1988)

A person charged with the defendant was appointed counsel by the court. That co-defendant sought the advice of defendant’s attorney prior to trial. Subsequently, the co-defendant became a government witness. The Second Circuit holds that the defense attorney should be permitted to cross-examine the co-defendant as to the substance of their pre-trial conversation.

In re Von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987)
Alan Dershowitz was given permission by his client, Von Bulow, to publish a book which contained communications between the defendant and his counsel. At a subsequent trial, the plaintiffs who sued Von Bulow in a civil proceeding sought to obtain other communications on the basis that they were waived by these disclosures. The court holds that although the published conversations are no longer privileged, unpublished communications remain privileged even if they were part of the published conversations or if they relate to the subject matter of the conversations.

In re Impounded Case (Law Firm), 879 F.2d 1211 (3rd Cir. 1989)
The government sought to invoke the crime fraud exception to obtain documents which embodied attorney/client communications. The fraud was alleged to have been committed by the attorney, not the client. The Third Circuit holds that the crime fraud exception applies in such circumstances. However, the specific documents which are pertinent to the accusation of criminal activity by the attorney are the only documents which may be disclosed.

In re Grand Jury Subpoenas 89-3 and 89-4, 902 F.2d 244 (4th Cir. 1990)
The joint defense privilege applies regardless of whether there is a pending action; it applies regardless of whether the allied parties are plaintiffs or defendants; and it applies regardless of whether the litigation is civil or criminal.

In re Antitrust Grand Jury (Advance Publications, Inc.), 805 F.2d 155 (6th Cir. 1986)
In order to apply the crime or fraud exception to the attorney/client privilege, a trial court must conduct an in camera ex parte hearing. The trial court must then distill what documents were subject to the crime fraud exception and may not simply authorize the disclosure of all documents and communications between the attorney and the client. The Sixth Circuit also held that the government must make a prima facie showing of the crime or fraud and must also demonstrate the relationship between the fraud and the particular communication which the government seeks to compel disclosed. The court emphasizes that the crime fraud exception only applies to those particular communications intended to further the crime or fraud, and the trial court must make an in camera review of each and every document.

United States v. Evans, 113 F.3d 1457 (7th Cir. 1997)
While evidentiary rulings are not generally immediately appealable, clients make take an immediate appeal when their attorneys are required to testify or produce documents in the face of an assertion of attorney-client privilege and no substantial breach of the privilege has yet occurred. Here, the government moved in limine to introduce the testimony of the defendant’s former lawyer. The privilege did not apply, however, because the defendant chose to have another person present during the conversation – the other person was also an attorney, but was there as a friend, not as a lawyer – after being cautioned that the presence of the other person rendered the privilege inapplicable.

In the Matter of Grand Jury Proceeding (Cherney), 898 F.2d 565 (7th Cir. 1990)
A member of a drug conspiracy consulted with a lawyer and asked the attorney to represent a co-defendant. This client, who paid the fee for the co-defendant, was never himself indicted. The government asked the attorney who the client was who acted as the benefactor of the other defendant. The attorney moved to quash the subpoena, the District Court granted the motion and the Seventh Circuit affirmed.
United States v. Sindel, 53 F.3d 874 (8th Cir. 1995)

The defense attorney was successful in claiming that with regard to one client’s fee, he should not be required to furnish fee-payor information on an 8300 form.

United States v. Chen, 99 F.3d 1495 (9th Cir. 1996)

The attorney-client privilege applies to communications between corporate employees and counsel, made at the direction of corporate superiors in order to secure legal advice. Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981). Only the corporation may waive the attorney-client privilege where the corporation is the client. This same rationale applies to ex-employees. The power to waive the corporate attorney-client privilege rests with the corporation’s management and is normally exercised by its officers and directors. In addition to issues of waiver, this case contains a lengthy analysis of the attorney-client privilege as it applies in the context of lawyers providing “business-legal” advice to a corporation. In conclusion, however, the court held that the crime fraud exception applied and the communications were not privileged.

United States v. Rowe, 96 F.3d 1294 (9th Cir. 1996)

The senior partner in a law firm discussed with two associates the fact that another lawyer in the firm might be engaged in misconduct and asked them to do some investigation. The government subpoenaed the associates to reveal what the senior partner told them. The appellate court concluded that the attorney client privilege applied. The associates were acting in their capacities as lawyers in their discussions with the senior partner – in effect, as in-house counsel.

Ralls v. United States, 52 F.3d 223 (9th Cir. 1995)

The attorney was paid by an individual to represent the defendant at a bond hearing and at an initial appearance. The government subpoenaed the attorney to the grand jury to disclose the identity of the fee-payor. The Ninth Circuit holds that the information was privileged in this case: “An examination of [the attorney’s] sealed affidavit leaves no doubt that the fee arrangements and the fee-payor’s identity are inextricably intertwined with confidential communications and fall within the attorney-client privilege.” The fee-payor sought the attorney’s advice regarding his involvement in the crime for which the client was arrested.

Despite the fact the subpoena disclaimed any attempt to require the production of privileged information, because of the breadth of the request, it was unenforceable. The subpoena sought all financial information relating to sixteen of the attorney’s clients, without narrowing the specific financial information requested. “All financial information” would include retainer agreements which would set forth the nature of the work performed, as well as the strategy of the attorney.

In re Grand Jury Investigation (U.S. v. Corporation), 974 F.2d 1068 (9th Cir. 1992)

The corporation properly refused to produce certain documents, relying on the attorney-client privilege. The government failed, in its showing pursuant to United States v. Zolin, to establish the need for an in camera review by the district court of the documents to determine whether the crime-fraud exception applied. The Zolin court held that an in camera review is appropriate if the government can show a factual basis adequate to support a good faith belief by a reasonable person that in camera review of the materials may reveal evidence to establish the claim that the crime fraud exception applies. The court also held that the Zolin rule also applied with regard to other issues regarding the attorney client privilege, such as whether the privilege applied to the documents in the first place.

United States v. de la Jara, 973 F.2d 746 (9th Cir. 1992)

In order to determine whether a letter from an attorney to a client falls within the crime-fraud exception, the government may seek an in camera review of the letter, but must first establish, using non-privileged evidence “sufficient to support a reasonable belief that in camera review may yield evidence that establishes the exception’s applicability.” Even though the government already had seized the document, this requirement of United States v. Zolin applies. Here, the government relied only on the document itself. This was an inadequate showing. The court concluded, however, that the defendant waived the privilege by failing to protest its seizure and request the return of the document for the six months between the seizure and the trial.

Tornay v. United States, 840 F.2d 1424 (9th Cir. 1988)

The Ninth Circuit continued its conservative trend with respect to subpoenas to attorneys holding that an IRS subpoena directed to a lawyer for information regarding fees paid by his clients who are under investigation for tax violations would not violate the attorney-client privilege. Here, the court rejects dictum in the oft-cited case of United States v. Hodge & Zweig, 548 F.2d 1347, which had held that fee information would be privileged if disclosure was likely to “implicate the client in the very criminal activity for which legal advice was sought.”

The Ninth Circuit holds that a client’s identity and fee arrangement are not privileged unless the identity of the defendant is, in substance, a confidential communication in the professional relationship between the attorney and client. This case represents a departure by the Ninth Circuit from its earlier decisions which had held that the identity and fee arrangement may be privileged in more circumstances than those listed here.

In re Grand Jury Matter No. 91-01386, 969 F.2d 995 (11th Cir. 1992)

The last link exception to the rule that client identification is not generally within the attorney-client privilege is inapplicable in a case where the attorney has received a counterfeit bill and the grand jury is asking who paid the attorney that money.

United States v. Leventhal, 961 F.2d 936 (11th Cir. 1992)

Attorneys must file an 8300 Form upon receipt of more than $10,000 in currency from a client.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings 90-2 (Garland), 946 F.2d 746 (11th Cir. 1991)

The last link exception survives in the Eleventh Circuit. The attorney was subpoenaed to the grand jury to reveal the identity of the client who asked the attorney to find another lawyer for his “friend” who had just been arrested. The attorney refused to identify the client. The attorney was held in contempt. The Eleventh Circuit reversed. This is a case in which the disclosure of the name would be the last link of incriminating evidence against the client. What he told the attorney was already known to the prosecutor – only his identity remained confidential. And so it should remain, the Eleventh Circuit decided.

In re Federal Grand Jury Proceedings, 89-10 (MIA), 938 F.2d 1578 (11th Cir. 1991)

An attorney was subpoenaed to produce memoranda to the grand jury which was investigating one of his clients. The memoranda memorialized prior conversations between the attorney and the client which arguably came within the crime-fraud exception to the privilege.
However, the memoranda themselves were not prepared during the course of the client’s crime. That is, though the initial communication between the attorney and the client were not privileged, the attorney’s subsequent communication with the client, which referred to those prior conversations was privileged. “The attorney-client privilege protects communications rather than information. . . Thus, although communications otherwise covered by the attorney-client privilege lose their privileged status when used to further a crime or fraud, post-crime repetition or discussion of such earlier communications, made in confidence to an attorney, may still be privileged even though those earlier communications were not privileged because of the crime-fraud exception.”

_In re Grand Jury Proceedings 88-9 (Newton), 899 F.2d 1039 (11th Cir. 1990)_

An attorney was subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury and to bring financial documents relating to an unidentified client. The government, unaware of the identity of the client, sought information relating to a particular cashier's check received by the attorney. The attorney claimed that the subpoena violated the Sixth Amendment right of his client as well as the attorney/client privilege. The Eleventh Circuit rejects both arguments. This information would not provide the “last link in the discovery of the client’s identity, nor would it violate the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel because there is nothing in the record to indicate that the disclosure of this information would result in the severance of the attorney/client relationship between the client and the subpoenaed attorney.”

_In re Sealed Case, 107 F.3d 46 (D.C.Cir. 1997)_

Counsel provided advice to a company about election finance laws. A vice president then violated the law. This did not make the attorney’s advice subject to the crime fraud exception, because the attorney was giving advice to the company, not the vice president and the company could insist on maintaining the privilege. Also, the government failed to prove that the vice president intended to violate the law when the legal advice was provided. The crime fraud exception only applies if the client’s fraudulent or criminal intent existed at the time the privileged communication was provided.

_In re Sealed Case, 29 F.3d 715 (D.C.Cir. 1994)_

In addition to the joint defense privilege, there is also a “common interest privilege.” This privilege protects communications between a lawyer and two or more clients regarding a matter of common interest. See _In re Auclair, 961 F.2d 65 (5th Cir. 1992)_ (privilege applies if persons consult an attorney together as a group with common interests seeking common representation). In such cases, one client cannot unilaterally waive the privilege.

_United States v. White, 887 F.2d 267 (D.C.Cir. 1989)_

The defendant explained to government investigators that prior to hiring his co-defendant, an official convicted of bribery, he had gone to his attorney and thoroughly reviewed the matter. Having gone to his attorney in good faith, the defendant did not waive his right to the attorney/client privilege since he was seeking an opinion as to the legality of conduct which was not clear to a lay person.

_In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C.Cir. 1989)_

A defense contractor received a grand jury subpoena and turned to its attorney for advice. The document containing this advice was privileged even though it contained financial data which had been or would soon be reported to the IRS. This is not a case in which “details” which underlie information given to counsel with the expectation that it will be revealed to others is being sought by the grand jury. Here, in contrast, the government sought to demonstrate that the target altered the books on counsel’s advice after the investigation began.

The IRS could not enforce a summons to obtain the identity of a client in this IRS 8300-form proceeding. The attorney established that there was a pending case involving the fee-payor. In this circumstance, the identity of the fee payor would incriminate the client. The First Circuit affirmed on the grounds that the IRS failed to comply with the required John Doe summons procedure. 65 F.3d 963 (1st Cir. 1995).

After remand from the Fifth Circuit, the District Court again allowed the attorney to claim the privilege and refuse to disclose the identity of the fee-payor because the fee-payor was the attorney’s client and the fee arrangements were part of their confidential communications. The Fifth Circuit affirmed: 926 F.2d 1423 (5th Cir. 1991).
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Right To Counsel)

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches at a defendant’s “first appearance” at which he is apprised of the formal charges and his bond situation may be addressed. The right to counsel attaches even if there is no prosecutor in court.

In an opinion by Justice Scalia, the Court held that the improper denial of defendant’s choice of counsel is a denial of the Sixth Amendment and it is not subject to harmless error review or a requirement that the defendant establish prejudice. In this case (as summarized below in the Eighth Circuit opinion), the trial court improperly denied the defendant’s chosen counsel’s motion to appear pro hac. All parties agreed that the trial judge’s decision was incorrect. On appeal, however, the government argued that the attorney who did represent the defendant performed adequately and therefore the defendant was unable to establish that he was denied the effective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant: the denial of his right to counsel of choice was not subject to harmless error review. The Sixth Amendment right to counsel is not simply a subsidiary right of the right to a fair trial. Thus, if the defendant had a fair trial, this does not, _ipso facto_, mean that the denial of his right to counsel of choice was inconsequential. The right to counsel of choice is a fundamental right in itself which, when denied, requires relief. In short, the denial of the right to counsel of choice is a structural error.

A defendant has the right to counsel, even if he is not sentenced to a term of imprisonment, if he receives a suspended sentence that can later be converted into a term of imprisonment.

The Supreme Court reverses the decision of the Court of Appeals regarding the propriety of preventing counsel from speaking with the defendant during a brief recess which occurred while the defendant was on the stand. The Court held that a criminal defendant has no right under the Sixth Amendment’s guarantee of effective assistance of counsel to consult with his attorney during such a brief recess when it is clear that the consultation would relate entirely to the defendant’s ongoing testimony.

_United States v. Roy_, 855 F.3d 1133 (11th Cir. 2017)

Trial counsel returned from lunch 7 minutes after the afternoon’s proceedings commenced. The trial, which lasted six days, involved charges of a sex-related offense. When the defense attorney missed the 7 minutes, the government was introducing the testimony of a law enforcement officer who was discussing the images found on the defendant’s computer. There were a total of 18 questions asked during the attorney’s absence. The lawyer was absent for a total of 7 minutes. It will take a lot longer than that to read this 122-page opinion in the federal reporter, including several dissents. The fundamental question that necessitated so much ink is whether the complete absence of counsel amounts to structural error that leads to automatic reversal (as the panel opinion originally held) or if there is a harmless error escape hatch for this type of flaw in the trial. The majority opinion holds that the harmless beyond a reasonable doubt standard applies in this situation.

United States v. Velazquez, 855 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2017)

Defendant’s first appointed counsel moved to withdraw and the motion was granted. The defendant moved to replace the second appointed counsel, claiming that there were no communications between her and her attorney and that her attorney had engaged in no pretrial investigation. When that motion was ultimately denied, she entered a guilty plea. The Ninth Circuit holds that the trial court erred in failing to grant the motion to replace counsel. In addition, the Ninth Circuit held that the guilty plea had to be vacated.

United States v. Yepiz, 844 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2016)

The defendant initially had an appointed counsel. He later retained counsel, but several months prior to trial wrote a letter to the court expressing dissatisfaction with retained counsel (who wanted additional fees that exceeded the defendant’s ability to pay) and the defendant requested a new panel attorney. The judge essentially ignored the letter, as well as the defendant’s subsequent in-court request to consider his request. The defendant proceeded to trial with the retained counsel. The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction and held that it was error to ignore the defendant’s request for new appointed counsel, because the defendant has a right to fire retained counsel without having to offer a valid reason to do so (assuming no delay in trial would be caused).

United States v. Jimenez-Antunez, 820 F.3d 1267 (11th Cir. 2016)

The defendant attempted to fire his retained counsel and requested court-appointed counsel. The trial court concluded that there was an insufficient basis to fire his retained counsel. The Eleventh Circuit reversed: the defendant has an unqualified right to fire retained counsel without explanation and if the defendant qualifies for court-appointed counsel, that has no bearing on his right to fire retained counsel.

United States v. Cavallo, 790 F.3d 1202 (11th Cir. 2015)

The trial court violated the defendant’s right to counsel by forbidding the defendant to talk to his lawyer during two overnight recesses during his testimony. The trial court’s caveat – explaining that the defendant could discuss his “constitutional rights” with his lawyer – did not cure the problem. The defendant has a right to discuss all aspects of his case with his lawyer during an overnight recess. Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976).

United States v. Yamashiro, 788 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2015)

The trial court committed structural error when, during sentencing, a victim was permitted to testify prior to defense counsel’s arrival in court.

United States v. Brown, 785 F.3d 1337 (9th Cir. 2015)

A defendant has an absolute right to discharge retained counsel at any time. If the defendant is then financially unable to retain counsel and qualifies under CJA, the court must appoint counsel unless there is sufficient reason to refuse to appoint counsel (such as the timing of the motion to discharge his retained counsel). In this case, the trial court did not express any concern with the timing of the request; the court simply denied the request to discharge the retained lawyer because the defendant did not offer a sufficient explanation why he wanted to discharge the lawyer. No reason was necessary, however. The right to discharge retained counsel is not conditioned on reasonable cause, or the existence of a conflict.

Koenig v. North Dakota, 755 F.3d 636 (8th Cir. 2014)

The state court decision that the defendant was not entitled to appointed counsel on direct appeal was clearly contrary to established Supreme Court jurisprudence. The fact that the defendant engaged in manipulative conduct did not disentitle him to counsel.

United States v. Ross, No. 09-1852 (6th Cir. 2012)

Even though the defendant had previously waived his right to counsel and was permitted to proceed pro se, when the government moved for a competency hearing and the judge agreed, an attorney should have been appointed to represent the defendant.

United States v. McKeighan, 685 F.3d 956 (10th Cir. 2012)

Defense counsel was subpoenaed to produce fee information to the grand jury. Later, at a hearing, the attorney agreed to pay the fee into the registry of the court. Ultimately, the lawyer withdrew from the case. The Tenth Circuit held that this did not violate the defendant’s right counsel.

Rodgers v. Marshall, 678 F.3d 1149 (9th Cir. 2012)

A defendant has the right to counsel at post-conviction pre-appeal proceedings, such as a motion for new trial. Even if the defendant waived his right to counsel at trial, he has the right to re-assert the right to assistance of counsel post-trial. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that this issue was sufficiently unclear that under the AEDPA standard, the Ninth Circuit erred in granting habeas relief. Marshall v. Rodgers, 569 U.S. ---, 133 S.Ct. 1446 (2013).

United States v. Simels, 654 F.3d 161 (2d Cir. 2011)

Noting that there are inconsistent decisions in the appellate courts, the Second Circuit assumes, for the sake of argument, that an attorney has “third-party standing” to assert a violation of a defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel. In this case, the government initiated an investigation of the attorney in connection with his representation of a client during the course of that representation. The Second Circuit held that there was no Sixth Amendment violation.

United States v. Sellers, 645 F.3d 830 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant hired one attorney to represent him at trial. Another attorney, at the request of the retained attorney, made the first appearance and attended various preliminary hearings and ultimately filed motions. As the trial date neared, however, the retained attorney had still not filed his appearance and the defendant complained that he wanted the retained attorney to represent him. Ultimately, the retained attorney had a conflict and could not appear on the scheduled trial date and the defendant insisted that a newly-retained attorney be substituted as his attorney, but that this would require a continuance, since this new attorney was not prepared. The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s request for a continuance to enable his newly-retained attorney to prepare. The attorney who had been representing the defendant up until that point had never been retained by the defendant and was only filling in for the initially retained attorney. That attorney as required to proceed to trial. Though the continuance would cause inconvenience to the court and other litigants, the defendant’s right to counsel was not adequately considered by the trial court. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Smith, 618 F.3d 657 (7th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was represented by retained counsel. Another attorney filed a motion to be substituted as counsel of record. At a hearing, the trial court indicated that his substitution would be permitted, but that trial was scheduled to begin approximately eight weeks later. Actually, prior to that hearing, there had been no notice to the government or the defendant that trial had been scheduled. The new attorney stated that he had a conflict with another trial during that period of time. The trial court thereafter denied the attorney’s motion to enter the case, appointed another attorney and the defendant thereafter entered a guilty plea (with an appeal waiver). The Seventh Circuit held that the appeal waiver did not bar an appeal of the claim that the defendant was denied the right to counsel of his choice. Denying counsel of choice is a structural error that affected the voluntariness of the plea. The colloquy, at the time the plea was entered, was insufficient to advise the defendant that a possible Sixth Amendment was subject to the appeal waiver. The Seventh Circuit also held that denying the defendant’s request to have new counsel violated his Sixth Amendment right. The court made no effort to accommodate the defendant’s right to change counsel by modifying the trial schedule.

United States v. Rivera-Corona, 618 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 2010)

After entering a guilty plea, the defendant requested that the court remove his retained counsel and replace him with appointed counsel. The trial court’s failure to engage in any fact-finding violated the defendant’s right to counsel. The court should have inquired whether the defendant was eligible for court-appointed counsel under the Criminal Justice Act. Because this was a post-plea request (and there was no suggestion that changing counsel would delay the proceedings), there was no need for the court to evaluate whether a change in counsel was necessary (such as by inquiring into the nature of the conflict between the attorney and the defendant).

United States v. Aguirre, 605 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was arrested in possession of several thousand dollars in cash. Charged with a drug offense, his attorney suggested that the defendant simply did not have a bank account, so it was natural that he would keep cash. The prosecutor then introduced the financial affidavit that the defendant signed in order to get appointed counsel; the document showed that he was unemployed. The Sixth Circuit held introducing this document violated the defendant’s right to counsel. The defendant should not be put in the position of either waiving he right to counsel, or producing evidence that would be used against him at trial.

United States v. Turner, 594 F.3d 946 (7th Cir. 2010)
The attorney who was prepared to represent the defendant at trial also was representing a co-conspirator who had already been tried and convicted, but who was awaiting sentencing. Both clients waived any potential conflict and neither defendant was cooperating. Nevertheless, the district court disqualified the attorney from defendant’s trial on the basis that one or the other defendant might decide to cooperate in the future. Disqualifying counsel was erroneous and prejudicial, because the improper disqualification of counsel amounts to structural error. This case contains a thorough discussion of the relationship between Wheat and Gonzalez-Lopez: the relationship between the court’s obligation to assure that there is no conflict and the defendant’s right to counsel of choice.

Smith v. Grams, 565 F.3d 1037 (7th Cir. 2009)

The state trial court erred in failing to appoint counsel to the defendant and requiring him to proceed pro se. The defendant repeatedly stated that he wanted counsel appointed, though he complained about the two attorneys who had been appointed. The trial court gave the defendant a choice of either withdrawing his motion for a speedy trial or going to trial pro se was not a valid choice to present to the defendant.

United States v. Stein, 541 F.3d 130 (2d Cir. 2008)

Affirming the district court’s decision, the Second Circuit dismisses the indictments against numerous employees of KPMG based on the government’s “use” of the Thompson memorandum to discourage KPMG from paying fees for the employees. The Thompson memorandum, which was later replaced with the McNulty memorandum, and still later replaced by a new provision in the U.S. Attorney’s Manual, provided that the Department of Justice would (or at least could) consider a corporation’s decision to pay an employee’s attorney’s fees as a sign that the corporation was not sufficiently accepting responsibility for wrongdoing and thus as one factor that the government would consider in deciding whether to indict the corporation. In this case, the lower court found that KPMG would have paid fees, through indictment and trial, of the employees but for the pressure put on the corporation by the U.S. Attorney’s office which explicitly condemned the decision to pay fees. The Second Circuit held that the pressure put on KPMG by the government transformed the decision by KPMG to refuse to pay fees into “state action” and violated the employee/defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The court also noted that any infringement of the right to counsel is a structural error not subject to harmless error analysis. The court also held that the pre-indictment conduct had a post-indictment affect, thus implicating the Sixth Amendment.

The Eleventh Circuit concluded that a defendant who demands to have his court-appointed counsel replaced faces the possibility of being compelled to proceed pro se if the trial court presents the defendant with a simple choice: proceed with court-appointed counsel, or proceed on your own. As long as the trial court explains the Faretta rights and warnings, the trial court is entitled to present that binary choice to the defendant. Thus, the defendant may not insist on a third option: a new attorney. If the defendant, cognizant of the choice that has been presented to him, and warned of the dangers of proceeding pro se, responds by demanding new counsel, the trial court may (but certainly is not required to) direct the defendant to proceed without counsel. In a companion case, Jones v. Walker, 540 F.3d 1277 (11th Cir. 2008) (*en banc), decided the same day, the court held that the trial court failed to adequately advise the defendant of the consequences of his decision (i.e., the hazards of proceeding pro se), but because Jones was a habeas petition, the burden was on the defendant to prove prejudice and to prove that he did not know the dangers. He failed to carry that burden. Garey, whose case was on direct appeal, was advised of the dangers of proceeding without counsel, so the government sustained its burden of proving a knowing and voluntary waiver of counsel.

Carlson v. Jess, 526 F.3d 1018 (7th Cir. 2008)

Shortly before trial, the defendant requested a continuance in order to switch from one retained counsel to another, revealing that there was a breakdown in communication with his current lawyer and a failure to prepare the case as needed. Both attorneys appeared and urged the court to grant the continuance in order to facilitate the change of counsel. The trial court refused, noting that the administration of justice required that the case proceed to trial. The Seventh Circuit concludes that the state court acted arbitrarily in denying the request for a continuance in this situation. “In sum, the trial judge ignored the presumption in favor of Carlson’s counsel of choice and insisted upon expeditiousness for its own sake.” The court finally concluded that the denial of his right to retain his chosen counsel had an adverse effect on the presentation of his case.

Benitez v. United States, 521 F.3d 625 (6th Cir. 2008)

If a defendant seeks the substitution of counsel, the court should make adequate inquiry, regardless of whether the defendant has retained, or appointed counsel. In this case, at the beginning of the guilty plea colloquy, the defendant stated that he no longer wanted to be represented by his retained counsel. The judge’s failure to conduct an inquiry required that the case be remanded to conduct a new sentencing hearing.

United States v. Ryals, 512 F.3d 416 (7th Cir. 2008)

The trial court’s failure to inquire into the dispute between the defendant and his counsel was erroneous and the defendant’s insistence that a new attorney be appointed to represent him during sentencing should have been evaluated in more depth than the judge did in this case. The attorney’s “scant participation” in the sentencing proceedings demonstrated that the defendant was prejudiced by the failure to appoint new counsel.

United States v. Forrester, 512 F.3d 500 (9th Cir. 2008)

The trial court conducted a Faretta hearing, but failed to state the charges and erroneously stated the range of possible punishment (the court told the defendant he was facing 10 years to life, when in fact he was facing zero to twenty). The court notes that when a judge misstates the possible sentence during a Faretta hearing, it does not matter if the error overstates or understates the possible sentence. The court also rejects the notion that there is any harmless error analysis when a Faretta colloquy is faulty.

United States v. Barnwell, 477 F.3d 844 (6th Cir. 2007)

During deliberations in this trial, an FBI agent in an unrelated case who was monitoring a wiretap determined that one of the deliberating jurors was possibly contacting people about her deliberations. Two prosecutors (not the trial prosecutors in this case), asked to speak to the judge and explained the situation. The trial prosecutors were aware of this ex parte communication. Over the next day or two, five ex parte meetings were held. The defendant and his attorneys had no idea this was occurring. There were also some meetings with the foreman (these were in the presence of the defense attorney, but he did not know exactly what prompted the meetings). Eventually, a mistrial was declared when the jury was unable to reach a verdict. The ex parte communications remained a secret. A new trial was held and the defendant was found guilty. After that trial, the events that occurred during the first trial were unsealed and furnished to defense counsel. The Sixth Circuit held that the ex parte communications violated the defendant’s right to counsel and his right to be present at all stages of the proceedings, as well as his right to be tried with an impartial judge. The court set aside the verdict in the second trial, even though it was not directly affected by the ex parte communication. The decision ends with a series of observations about the impropriety of conducting ex parte communications and the necessity of judicial impartiality.

The defendant was charged with murder. A hearing was scheduled to determine whether his case would be consolidated with other charges against other defendants. The defendant’s appointed attorney did not appear at the hearing and the hearing was conducted without counsel for the defendant voicing any objection to the consolidation of the cases. The question posed to the habeas court was whether this constituted a “critical stage” of the proceedings which necessitated the presence of counsel. In a lengthy opinion (24 pages in F.3d), the Sixth Circuit reviews at great length the definition of “critical stage” and ultimately concludes that in this case, the hearing was not a critical stage. Consequently, the attorney’s absence from the hearing did not necessitate setting aside the conviction on Cronic grounds (complete absence of counsel at critical stage).

The district court condemned the provision in the Thompson Memo that states that a corporation’s payment of attorney fees for targeted employees is a factor that the prosecutor should consider in deciding whether to indict the corporation for the conduct of employees. The Court held that the employees’ due process rights to have their attorneys’ fees paid by their employer – as had been customary with this employer (KPMG) – was violated. The court also relied on the Sixth Amendment right to counsel which, the court held, was infringed by the prosecutor’s efforts to dissuade the corporation from paying the employees’ fees. The result was the suppression of statements made by the defendants that were “coerced” by their employer, KPMG, which felt compelled to require the employees to speak to the government because of the Thompson Memo requirement that corporations cooperate. The Second Circuit opinion, which is noted above, affirmed the district court’s other decision (435 F.Supp.2d 330) dismissing the indictment against numerous individual defendants.

The defendant was represented by an attorney who was appearing pro hac vice. During the course of the representation, the attorney made an unfounded allegation of dishonesty on the part of the magistrate. This amounts to an ethical violation. The attorney’s pro hac status was revoked. The Fifth Circuit held that while it is permissible to revoke an attorney’s pro hac status, the trial court must consider the impact of this decision on the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Having failed to conduct this type of balancing inquiry, the case was remanded to the lower court to conduct a post-trial inquiry.

United States v. Sandoval-Mendoza, 472 F.3d 645 (9th Cir. 2006)

After the defendant testified on direct, an overnight recess occurred. The trial court directed the attorney that he could speak with the defendant, but not about his testimony. The Ninth Circuit held that this violated the defendant’s right to counsel. See Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976); Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272 (1989).

James v. Brigano, 470 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 2006)

The defendant did not voluntarily and knowingly waive his right to counsel. The state court’s determination that the defendant’s decision to dismiss his appointed counsel was simply a delaying tactic did not explain why no Faretta inquiry was conducted.

Taveras v. Smith, 463 F.3d 141 (2d Cir. 2006)

New York State law has a discretionary fugitive disentitlement rule that permits, but does not require an appellate court to dismiss an appeal if the defendant is a fugitive, including if the defendant is returned to custody prior to the disposition of his appeal. In this case, the defendant was returned to custody prior to the disposition of his appeal, but the appellate court thereafter dismissed the appeal without appointing an attorney to litigate the fugitive disentitlement issue. This violate the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to appellate counsel under Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963); Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387 (1985).

United States v. Jones, 452 F.3d 223 (3rd Cir. 2006)

Though the defendant requested permission to proceed pro se, his request was couched in terms, “If you won’t appoint me another attorney, I would rather represent myself.” The court conducted an insufficient Faretta inquiry and the defendant was therefore denied his right to counsel. In fact, the court failed to inquire into many of the Faretta considerations, including the defendant’s understanding of the nature of the charges, the possible defenses and other issues might arise at trial.

United States v. Parker, 439 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 2006)

The Second Circuit reviews the law governing when a defendant with retained counsel can ask for CJA funds mid-trial. The court concludes that mid-trial appointment is permissible, but was properly denied in this case. The court also approved the trial court’s practice of ensuring that retained counsel is “fully retained” when she makes an appearance in the case at the outset. The Second Circuit held that such an inquiry, though appropriate, did not foreclose in appropriate circumstances the appointment of counsel mid-trial when necessary in the interest of justice.

United States v. Jones, 421 F.3d 359 (5th Cir. 2005)

The trial court failed to undertake the proper Faretta dialogue with the defendant. Allowing him to proceed pro se was error.
Before the Supreme Court granted certiorari in the decision in Gonzalez-Lopez, annotated above, the Eighth Circuit considered a separate question raised by the controversy dealing with the defendant’s right to counsel in his criminal case. Shortly after being arrested, the defendant was represented by a lawyer named Fahle. Within a matter of weeks, however, the defendant sought out the services of Attorney Lowe. Lowe went to the jail and talked with the defendant, knowing that he was already represented by Fahle. The district court judge held that this violated the ethics rule that bars contacting a represented party. The Eighth Circuit disagreed. The prohibition on contacting a represented party applies to lawyers already in a case. It does not apply to lawyers who are not attorneys currently in the litigation.

Because of acrimony between the defendant and his counsel, counsel moved to withdraw. On the day his motion was filed, the court conducted a competency hearing. Counsel declined to participate in light of his pending motion to withdraw. After a brief discussion, the court determined that the defendant was competent. This procedure was improper. The defendant was denied the right to counsel at his competency hearing.

If a defendant asks to represent himself at sentencing, but the trial court does not comply with the Faretta inquiry, the defendant is entitled to a re-sentencing. This is the same result if the defendant’s pro se representation at trial is found to have occurred without sufficient Faretta compliance.

The defendant’s waiver of counsel was not freely and voluntarily given. His counsel, who was newly appointed declared that she was unprepared to defend the case in light of the number of witnesses and the complexity of the issues. The court gave the defendant the defendant the choice of proceeding pro se or going forward with unprepared counsel. This is not a constitutionally acceptable choice.

After counsel was done completing his examination of a witness in a suppression hearing, he excused himself from further participation in the matter because of a scheduling conflict. The government elicited testimony from a subsequent witness that related to that attorney’s client. The attorney was provided a transcript and stated that he did not wish to further cross-examine that witness. This was improper. Counsel’s absence from the proceeding that related to his client operated as a denial of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

The trial court permitted the defendant to represent himself at trial and requested that the appointed counsel remain as standby counsel. At the conclusion of the trial, the attorney was excused from any further duty. At sentencing, the defendant appeared pro se. This violated the defendant’s right to counsel. At sentencing, counsel could have advanced legal arguments that would have resulted in guideline findings favorable to the defendant and he did not expressly waive his right to counsel at sentencing.

Robinson v. Ignacio, 360 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2004)

A Nevada state law provided that if the defendant waived his right to counsel at trial, this waiver applied at sentencing, as well. The Ninth Circuit holds that the state practice was unconstitutional. The defendant waived his right to counsel at trial, but asked for the assistance of counsel at sentencing and the denial of this request was a Sixth Amendment violation.

United States v. Midgett, 342 F.3d 321 (4th Cir. 2003)

The defendant told his attorney that he was asleep in the backseat of the car when two other people committed the crime. There was no other evidence to support this version of events. The attorney asked to withdraw from the case, claiming an ethical issue and when the court denied the motion to withdraw, refused to call the defendant to the stand. The judge gave the defendant the choice to either proceed pro se or acquiesce to the attorney’s decision that the defendant would not testify. This was improper. There was insufficient evidence to establish the defendant’s intent to commit perjury.

Moore v. Purkett, 275 F.3d 685 (8th Cir. 2001)

The state court committed reversible error by denying the defendant the right to confer with his counsel in the courtroom during trial. Except when the defendant is testifying, or during brief recesses in that testimony, the defendant enjoys an absolute right to unrestricted access to his lawyer for advice on a variety of trial-related matters.

United States v. Elder, 309 F.3d 519 (9th Cir. 2002)

The defendant was not denied due process simply because the lead defense attorney was removed from the courtroom in handcuffs after arguing with the judge.

Blankenship v. Johnson, 118 F.3d 312 (5th Cir. 1997)

If the state seeks discretionary review of the decision of the first appellate court, the defendant has the right to the assistance of counsel at this discretionary review proceeding.

Crandell v. Bunnell, 144 F.3d 1213 (9th Cir. 1998)

Where an indigent defendant is appointed a particular public defender with whom he was dissatisfied, with whom he would not cooperate, and with whom he would not in any manner whatsoever, communicate, the defendant’s constitutional rights are violated. In this case, the defendant had no communication with appointed counsel and ended up representing himself in a death penalty trial. If the appointed counsel was incompetent at an early stage of the proceeding and the defendant sought new counsel, the failure to appoint new counsel is constitutional error. The Ninth Circuit later questioned the standard of review that was used by the court in this case. Schell v. Witek, 218 F.3d 1017 (9th Cir. 2000).

United States v. Pollani, 146 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant represented himself at various pretrial proceedings, but retained counsel shortly before trial was set to begin. Newly retained counsel then moved for a continuance. The trial court denied the motion (which was permissible), and then prevented newly retained counsel from participating at trial, other than in a stand-by capacity. This was error. Though the defendant waived his right to counsel, he had the right to withdraw that waiver and retain counsel.

United States v. Musa, 220 F.3d 1096 (9th Cir. 2000)

The defendant requested a substitution of counsel at his supervised release revocation hearing. The trial court summarily denied the request. This was error. A district court may not deny a substitution of counsel request simply because the court thinks current counsel’s representation is adequate. The absence of any inquiry in this case deprived the appellate court of the ability to determine whether the defendant’s complaint about his attorney was meritorious.

The right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment is not triggered at a roadside stop where the police suspect the driver of driving under the influence of alcohol, nor when the driver is brought to the station to have his blood or breath tested. However, in this case, the police advised the defendant about the consequences of refusing to take the test and neglected to inform the defendant that his refusal to take a test would result in a mandatory two day jail sentence if he were convicted of driving under the influence. After receiving this inaccurate advice about the consequences of refusing to take the test, the defendant requested an opportunity to speak with his attorney. In this situation, the failure to allow the defendant to speak with his attorney violated the defendant’s right to due process. This holding only applies in situations where the police have misinformed the defendant about the consequences of a choice he is facing.

Detectives were sued by a defendant after they attempted to coerce him into abandoning his lawyer. The detectives were not entitled to any immunity in this lawsuit for violating the defendant’s constitutional rights to the assistance of counsel.

Jones v. Vacco, 126 F.3d 408 (2d Cir. 1997)

The trial court’s ban on communication between counsel and the defendant during an overnight recess violated the defendant’s constitutional right to counsel. See Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976).

United States v. Ming He, 94 F.3d 782 (2d Cir. 1996)

When a cooperating witness is debriefed by government agents after tendering a guilty plea, he has the right to the assistance of counsel. Counsel’s presence can relieve the defendant’s anxiety and facilitate the debriefing by ensuring that the defendant understands what is being asked and encouraging the defendant to fully respond to the questions. While not squarely deciding the Sixth Amendment issue, the court held that the practice of interviewing witnesses without their attorney being present would no longer be tolerated under the supervisory powers of the court.

Grievance Committee for the Southern District of N.Y. v. Simels, 48 F.3d 640 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendant’s attorney interviewed a potential witness against his client, who was also a potential co-defendant in a murder case. In the murder case, the witness had been appointed an attorney. This was not a violation of DR 7-104(A)(1) (communicating with a represented party).
The witness was not a “party” in the drug case and with respect to the murder case, the witness, though involved in the crime, was clearly a witness for the prosecution. Thus, the attorney did not interview a “party” represented by an attorney for that “matter.” The attorney’s obligations to represent his client under the Sixth Amendment prompted the court to give the Directory Rule this narrow interpretation.

United States v. Novak, 903 F.2d 883 (2d Cir. 1990)

Defendant’s attorney was admitted to the bar by making fraudulent representations about the course of his studies and service in the armed forces. Because the attorney was not properly admitted to the bar, the defendant was denied the effective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Cocivera, 104 F.3d 566 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The trial court erred in allowing a non-attorney represent the corporation in this criminal trial. The corporation may not proceed pro se by having a stockholder who is not an attorney represent it.

United States v. Pavelko, 992 F.2d 32 (3rd Cir. 1993)

Defendant was charged with bank robbery. The government introduced evidence that after the robbery, defendant made numerous cash expenditures. In order to prove that this money must have been the fruit of the robbery, the government then offered into evidence the defendant’s financial affidavit which he was required to file in order to obtain a CJA attorney. The form indicated that the defendant had no money and was not employed. This was error. The Fifth Amendment right to remain silent may not be conditioned on the sacrifice of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. If the form is required to be filled out in order to secure counsel, the information provided may not be used against the defendant at trial.

Fuller v. Diesslin, 868 F.2d 604 (3rd Cir. 1989)

In the defendant’s New Jersey state court trial, he sought to employ counsel from Illinois and D.C. The trial court denied the request based on a fear of delays. This is reversible constitutional error. A defendant has a right to counsel of choice including the right to be represented by out-of-state counsel.

United States v. Gravatt, 868 F.2d 585 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The trial court denied the defendant’s request for a court-appointed attorney. The defendant refused to complete a financial affidavit form on the grounds that it did not correctly describe the offense with which he was charged and that to provide the information violated his Fifth Amendment rights. The trial court’s refusal to appoint counsel for the defendant was improper since the financial information that was provided was sufficient to establish his eligibility for an appointed attorney.

United States v. Romano, 849 F.2d 812 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The defendant indicated that she wanted to proceed in her trial pro se. The trial court instructed her that if during the course of the trial, she decided to use the services of an attorney, she would have to accept an attorney appointed by the court. This was error. If the defendant decides to hire an attorney during the course of the trial she is permitted to do so and select her own attorney.
United States v. Accetturo, 842 F.2d 1408 (3rd Cir. 1988)

It was improper for the District Court in New Jersey to require a Florida attorney to undertake the representation of a defendant mid-trial following the terminal illness of the original counsel. However, the District Court properly required nominal local counsel to proceed.

United States v. Mullen, 32 F.3d 891 (4th Cir. 1994)

The defendant’s parents retained a lawyer for her. She was unhappy with the choice and filed a motion for court-appointed counsel. The trial court abused its discretion in refusing this request. In evaluating whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying a defendant’s motion for substitution, the appellate court considers three factors: the timeliness of the motion; the adequacy of the court’s inquiry into the defendant’s complaint; and whether the attorney/client conflict was so great that it had resulted in total lack of communication preventing an adequate defense. In this case, there was a total breakdown in communications.

United States v. Taylor, 933 F.2d 307 (5th Cir. 1991)

Defendant insisted on proceeding at trial pro se. After conviction, however, he sought the assistance of counsel at sentencing. Denying this request deprived him of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Granting this request would not have interfered with the schedule, or otherwise interfered with the administration of justice. There is no requirement that the defendant make a showing of prejudice. Moreover, the presence of “standby counsel” from the Federal Defender’s office was an inadequate substitute. Standby counsel is not responsible for the defense and that is what is required by the Sixth Amendment.

United States v. Dodson, 25 F.3d 385 (6th Cir. 1994)

At defendant’s probation revocation hearing, the trial court directed the defendant to make a statement, but would not allow his attorney to elicit testimony in a question-answer format. This procedure denied the defendant due process. Though there is no absolute right to counsel at all revocation hearings, where, as here, there is some complexity to the issues being raised, the trial court must afford the defendant the right to counsel who must be permitted to advocate on the defendant’s behalf, call witnesses in support of his client’s position, or in mitigation of punishment and elicit testimony in the traditional format.

Robinson v. Norris, 60 F.3d 457 (8th Cir. 1995)

Following his conviction on robbery charges, the defendant was advised by the trial court that if he desired to challenge the effectiveness of his trial counsel, he would have to do so pro se within thirty days. The defendant did not file such a motion and remained with his initial counsel. The trial judge’s statement violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The right to counsel applies at all critical stages of the prosecution, including the filing of a new trial motion and, in that proceeding, asserting an ineffective assistance of trial counsel claim.

Young v. Lockhart, 892 F.2d 1348 (8th Cir. 1989)

The state trial court should have allowed the defendant to substitute counsel prior to trial. The first appointed counsel had not visited the defendant in six months, until just before trial. There was no indication that the defendant’s desire to have substitute appointed counsel was designed to obstruct justice. Forcing the defendant to go to trial either pro se or with the initial attorney violated his Sixth Amendment rights.
After disagreements with his appointed counsel arose, the state court defendant requested that another lawyer be appointed to represent him. He specifically told the trial court that he was not qualified to represent himself. Because the trial judge did not seek to ascertain the basis for the disagreement between the appointed counsel and the defendant, he improperly compelled the defendant to proceed without the assistance of counsel.

During pretrial discussions, the prosecutor repeatedly disparaged defense counsel in front of the defendant and the counsel. The defendant replaced that counsel, went to trial, and was convicted. No evidentiary hearing was held on the allegation of a Sixth Amendment violation, but the Ninth Circuit held that on remand, if the facts were as alleged by the defendant, then the court should set aside the conviction. The defendant was not required to show that the replacement counsel was ineffective, or even less qualified than the original counsel. The government’s interference with the defendant’s original counsel was, if proven, sufficient to violate the defendant’s constitutional right to counsel of choice.

A defendant has a constitutional right to counsel in pursuit of a new trial motion. Here, the defendant, pro se, claimed that trial counsel was ineffective. The district court required trial counsel to represent the defendant in connection with this motion during the new trial motion. This was an improper procedure. Trial counsel had a clear conflict in pursuing the claim that he was ineffective. The trial court should have appointed substitute counsel to prosecute the new trial motion.

The district court must appoint counsel in any §2255 proceeding in which an evidentiary hearing is required. Rule 8(c), Rules Governing §2255 Proceedings.

The defendant, who was facing revocation of his supervised release, complained that he was not happy with his appointed counsel, and had retained a private attorney and wanted a continuance. The district court made little or perhaps no inquiry into the reason for the delay in retaining private counsel; there was evidence of a considerable conflict between the defendant and his appointed counsel and a complete breakdown in communication; and while the official motion to continue was filed the day before the hearing, the defendant had made efforts to bring the matter to the court’s attention much earlier. The Ninth Circuit later questioned the standard applied in this case (the court in this case held that the trial court must find a “compelling reason” to deny a continuance). United States v. Garrett, 179 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 1999).

It is essential that a corporation have counsel at trial, for a corporation cannot appear pro se. Here, there was no counsel for the corporation and the government virtually assured this by forfeiting all of the corporation’s assets prior to trial. The district court did not appoint an attorney for the corporation; indeed there is no Sixth Amendment right to appointed counsel (because there is no risk of jail time); and the Criminal Justice Act does not apply to corporations. In this situation, Caplin & Drysdale and Monsanto do not apply. The seizure of all the corporate assets deprived the corporation of the ability to retain counsel and there was no other means to defend itself at trial.

United States v. Lillie, 989 F.2d 1054 (9th Cir. 1993)

A defendant has a right to switch retained counsel, even if this switch occurs at the last moment before trial. While a delay in the trial may inconvenience the court, the prosecutor and witnesses, denying the request infringes on the defendant’s right to counsel of his choice. While a change of counsel should not be permitted if the sole basis is to obtain a delay, the court should make inquiry into the circumstances and permit a change, especially if newly retained counsel is prepared to proceed on schedule. The Ninth Circuit later questioned the standard applied in this case (the court in this case held that the trial court must find a “compelling reason” to deny a continuance). United States v. Garrett, 179 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 1999).

United States v. Torres-Rodriguez, 930 F.2d 1375 (9th Cir. 1991)

On the morning of trial, the defendant expressed a desire for a substitute counsel. The trial court’s denial of this request was reversible error. There was no indication that the substitution of trial counsel would delay the proceedings.

United States v. Herrera-Figueroa, 918 F.2d 1430 (9th Cir. 1991)

The Ninth Circuit concludes that a defendant has a right to counsel during the pre-sentence interview conducted by the probation officer in connection with a sentencing guidelines report. The court does not rely on Sixth Amendment grounds, relying instead on its supervisory powers.

United States v. Walker, 915 F.2d 480 (9th Cir. 1990)

The defendant sought to dismiss his appointed counsel and requested substitute counsel. The evidence revealed that the appointed counsel and the defendant were not communicating at all during the course of the trial because of irreconcilable differences. The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s request for substitute counsel. Furthermore, the defendant desired to testify in his own defense and because of his attorney’s decision not to call him as a witness, the defendant was denied this right. The defendant was entitled to a new trial.

United States v. Robinson, 913 F.2d 712 (9th Cir. 1990)

The defendant voluntarily waived his right to counsel at trial. Nevertheless, the defendant sought the assistance of counsel at sentencing. The trial court’s denial of this request amounted to a violation of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel at a critical stage of the proceedings.

United States v. Bohn, 890 F.2d 1079 (9th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was charged with tax evasion and claimed that the Fifth Amendment provided a valid defense. In order to establish this defense, the defense requested an ex parte in camera hearing with the Court. The trial judge agreed to hold such a hearing, but only if both attorneys or no attorneys were present. The hearing was held with just the defendant and the judge. The Ninth Circuit reverses: The Sixth Amendment is violated whenever the accused is denied counsel at a critical stage of his trial. An in camera hearing to assess the validity of a taxpayer’s Fifth Amendment claim is a critical stage of the proceeding.

Menefield v. Borg, 881 F.2d 696 (9th Cir. 1989)

The defendant voluntarily represented himself at trial, but after that failed he sought to have an attorney appointed to represent him in preparing and arguing a motion for new trial. The Ninth Circuit holds that such a proceeding is a “critical stage” of a criminal prosecution and the Sixth Amendment guarantees the assistance of counsel.

United States v. Hardwell, 80 F.3d 1471 (10th Cir. 1996)

A defendant’s financial affidavit that is completed in an effort to secure appointed counsel after being indicted may not be used by the government at trial to prove that the defendant has no legitimate income. Using this affidavit penalizes the defendant’s right to secure appointed counsel and, pursuant to Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968), the defendant’s right to counsel cannot be conditioned on providing incriminating information to the government. The court reaffirmed on rehearing, 88 F.3d 897 (10th Cir. 1996).

Shillinger v. Haworth, 70 F.3d 1132 (10th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was held in custody prior to trial. He and his attorney wished to prepare for trial in the courtroom and the attorney hired a deputy sheriff so the defendant could be in the courtroom. It was agreed by the deputy that he would be paid by the defense attorney for this overtime work. The deputy, however, was contacted by the DA and told him what had happened during these rehearsals. This amounted to a violation of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights. The fact that the DA learned the defendant’s trial strategy was harmful, even though the trial court did not permit the DA to introduce actual statements made by the attorney, or the defendant during these sessions. When the state becomes privy to confidential communications because of its purposeful intrusion into the attorney-client relationship and lacks a legitimate justification for doing so, a prejudicial effect on the reliability of the trial process must be presumed. No other standard can adequately deter this sort of misconduct. A remand was necessary to determine the appropriate remedy.

United States v. Rantz, 862 F.2d 808 (10th Cir. 1988)

The trial court compelled the defendant to testify prior to any other defense testimony being offered. This violates the defendant’s right to the “guiding hand of counsel.” The trial court imposed this requirement to avoid any problem arising from the joint trial of the defendant with his three co-defendants. The Tenth Circuit holds that the error was harmless in light of the overwhelming evidence that the defendant would not have testified even without this requirement.

Sanchez v. Mondragon, 858 F.2d 1462 (10th Cir. 1988)

The trial court gave general advice to the defendant against self-representation but failed to inquire into the specifics of the petitioner’s conduct in seeking substitute counsel. More thorough investigation into the defendant’s wishes in seeking to discharge a public defender is required.

Jackson v. James, 839 F.2d 1513 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant’s appointed counsel sought to withdraw on the morning of trial. The trial court permitted the attorney to withdraw and required the defendant to appear pro se despite the defendant’s request for a one or two day continuance to hire an attorney. The Eleventh Circuit grants the writ of habeas corpus holding that this deprived the defendant of the right to effective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Walker, 839 F.2d 1483 (11th Cir. 1988)

During the course of Walker’s trial, not only was he a defendant, he was also an informant for the government. His trial counsel was unaware of his client’s dual status. A new trial was granted by the District Court after this prosecutorial misconduct was learned, but the defendant’s motion to dismiss the indictment was denied. The defendant failed to show that a new trial with new counsel would not remove all taint from the prior governmental misconduct.

United States v. Eniola, 893 F.2d 383 (D.C.Cir. 1990)
During the course of the defendant’s drug trial, it was learned that an informant had set up the sale from the defendant to the undercover officer. During the course of two bench conferences, the trial judge instructed the defense attorney not to reveal the identity of the informant to the defendant. This constituted a denial of the defendant’s right to effective assistance of counsel. The trial court’s order impaired counsel’s ability to prepare an entrapment defense.

Mudd v. United States, 798 F.2d 1509 (D.C.Cir. 1986)
A trial judge’s order to a defense attorney not to speak with his client over a weekend recess concerning the client’s testimony deprived the defendant of his Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel. An order such as that requires automatic reversal without a showing of any prejudice.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Criminal Justice Act “CJA”)

United States v. Rivera Corona, 618 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 2010)

After entering a guilty plea, the defendant requested that the court remove his retained counsel and replace him with appointed counsel. The trial court’s failure to engage in any fact-finding violated the defendant’s right to counsel. The court should have inquired whether the defendant was eligible for court-appointed counsel under the Criminal Justice Act. Because this was a post-plea request (and there was no suggestion that changing counsel would delay the proceedings), there was no need for the court to evaluate whether a change in counsel was necessary (such as by inquiring into the nature of the conflict between the attorney and the defendant).

United States v. Aguirre, 605 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was arrested in possession of several thousand dollars in cash. Charged with a drug offense, his attorney suggested that the defendant simply did not have a bank account, so it was natural that he would keep cash. The prosecutor then introduced the financial affidavit that the defendant signed in order to get appointed counsel; the document showed that he was unemployed. The Sixth Circuit held introducing this document violated the defendant’s right to counsel. The defendant should not be put in the position of either waiving his right to counsel, or producing evidence that would be used against him at trial.

United States v. Chase, 499 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2007)

The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s request for expert assistance to help in preparing for sentencing. The expert was necessary to evaluate how much methamphetamine could have been produced at a laboratory.

United States v. Parker, 439 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 2006)

The Second Circuit reviews the law governing when a defendant with retained counsel can ask for CJA funds mid-trial. The court concludes that mid-trial appointment is permissible, but was properly denied in this case. The court also approved the trial court’s practice of ensuring that retained counsel is “fully retained” when she makes an appearance in the case at the outset. The Second Circuit held that such an inquiry, though appropriate, did not foreclose in appropriate circumstances the appointment of counsel mid-trial when necessary in the interest of justice.

United States v. Hardin, 437 F.3d 463 (5th Cir. 2006)

CJA counsel moved for the appointment of an expert who could test, and then testify about, the methamphetamine by-product that the government sought to include in the drug weight. The expert was prepared to testify that much of the substance was part of the production process and not consumable as methamphetamine. An ex parte hearing should have been held pursuant to the defendant’s motion and the court should have appointed the expert to assist in the defense.

United States v. Rodriguez-Lara, 421 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2005)

The trial court erred in refusing to authorize money for the payment of an expert to assist the defendant in his grand and petite jury composition challenge.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
Right To Counsel (Waiver of Right – Faretta Issues)

SEE ALSO: DEFENDANT'S RIGHT TO SELF-REPRESENTATION FOR CASES IN WHICH THE COURT IMPROPERLY DENIED THE DEFENDANT THE RIGHT TO SELF-REPRESENTATION

A defendant who is mentally competent to go to trial is not, ipso facto, entitled to represent himself. A trial court may find that the defendant is competent to go to trial, but not mentally equipped to represent himself.

When a defendant pleads guilty without counsel, the court should ensure that the defendant understands that he has the right to counsel. The court is not required to specifically advise the defendant that he may be overlooking a possible defense, or that he is giving up the right to an independent assessment of the case, by waiving the right to counsel.

Despite language in precedents to the contrary, the standard for assessing the competence of a defendant to enter a guilty plea is the same as for assessing the defendant’s competence to stand trial: whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him. Moreover, the defendant’s capacity to waive the assistance of counsel is measured by the same standard – the ability to understand the nature of the proceeding and to waive the right to counsel with an understanding of what is being waived.

_Ayers v. Hall_, 900 F.3d 829 (6th Cir. 2018)

The defendant in this state tax evasion prosecution was an experienced criminal defense lawyer. From the initiation of the case, he represented himself. No inquiry was made of any kind about his knowledge or or waiver of the right to counsel. Shortly before trial began, he requested a continuance to obtain retained counsel. The continuance motion was denied and he appeared pro se at trial and was convicted. The Sixth Circuit held that the defendant’s constitutional right to counsel were violated. Even a criminal defense attorney is entitled to a full Faretta hearing and warning. Though some modification of the warning may be appropriate, in this case, there was absolutely no warning and no inquiry into the defendant’s voluntary relinquishment of the right to counsel.

The defendant requested that he be permitted to represent himself at trial. The state court judge decided that the defendant failed to show that he was capable of representing himself and stated on the record that the defendant’s decision was “immature.” The Wisconsin Supreme Court held that the defendant failed to show that he was competent to represent himself. The Seventh Circuit granted the writ. The defendant is only required to make the request to represent himself and it is then the duty of the trial court to determine if the defendant is incompetent, or otherwise incapable of representing himself. The burden is not initially on the defendant to prove his competence. “Before allowing a defendant to proceed without counsel, a trial court … has the duty to warn a defendant about what he is getting himself into, but the court cannot just deny the defendant the right he has invoked. The imperative of a knowing and voluntary choice is a requirement for valid waiver of the right to counsel; it is not a condition that must be fulfilled before an accused may be “allowed” to exercise his Sixth Amendment right to represent himself.” The lower court also erred in holding that the defendant must proffer a reason why he wants to represent himself. No such burden exists on the defendant.

Burton v. Davis, 816 F.3d 1132 (9th Cir. 2016)

The state trial court erred in denying the defendant’s repeated efforts to represent himself. Simply because the defendant requested more time to prepare was not a sufficient basis to deny the request.

United States v. Kowalczyk, 805 F.3d 847 (9th Cir. 2015)

A defendant facing a competence hearing is not entitled to waive the right to counsel.

United States v. Ductan, 800 F.3d 642 (4th Cir. 2015)

The defendant gave a variety of nonsense answers to the magistrate when the magistrate asked about appointing counsel for the defendant. The defendant also refused to cooperate with stand-by counsel. The district court’s conclusion that the defendant had forfeited his right to counsel and would be required to represent himself was not supported by the evidence. The defendant did not affirmatively insist on representing himself and was never provided adequate Faretta warnings.

United States v. Lee, 760 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2014)

Denying the defendant the right to self-representation is a structural error that is not subject to harmless error analysis. McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984). In this case, the Seventh Circuit held that the right to self-representation applies at a suppression hearing.

United States v. Diaz-Rodriguez, 745 F.3d 586 (1st Cir. 2014)

The trial court erred in failing to inquire further into defendant’s conflict with his attorney and his request for substitute counsel. The fact that the defendant’s attorney was retained at the time he expressed a need for new appointed counsel did not affect the judge’s attorney to inquire into the nature of the conflict that prompted the defendant to request that new counsel be appointed.

United States v. Booker, 684 F.3d 421 (3rd Cir. 2012)

The trial court’s failure to properly alert the defendant to the possible range of sentences for a § 924(c) conviction rendered the Faretta colloquy defective and the waiver of counsel was therefore invalid.

Batchelor v. Cain, 682 F.3d 400 (5th Cir. 2012)
The defendant’s clear and unequivocal request to represent himself and have counsel available as stand-by counsel was improperly denied and violated Faretta.

United States v. Loya-Rodriguez, 672 F.3d 849 (10th Cir. 2012)

The defendant unequivocally announced his intention and desire to represent himself at sentencing, even though he was represented by counsel at trial. Denying the defendant the right to represent himself at sentencing was a Faretta violation.

Jones v. Norman, 633 F.3d 661 (8th Cir. 2011)

The trial court denied the defendant the right to represent himself. This was error. The fact that the defendant did not know the technical rules of Missouri evidence did not foreclose his right to represent himself. The fact that the defendant did not know the exact range of penalties he was facing was also not a basis to deny him the right of self-representation. The proper procedure would have been to appoint standby counsel and allow the defendant to represent himself. McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984).

United States v. Farias, 618 F.3d 1049 (9th Cir. 2010)

On the day before trial, the defendant expressed an unequivocal request to represent himself. The trial court advised him that he had the right to do so, but then explained that this would not result in a delay of the trial, which would begin the next day even if the defendant proceeded pro se. This was error. Though a defendant may not decide to represent himself in an effort solely to delay the trial, there was no finding in this case that the defendant’s request was made to delay the trial, so the trial court should have completed the Faretta hearing and also made findings and conclusions about a continuance request. Summarily advising the defendant that the trial would proceed as scheduled and thus deterring the defendant from representing himself is not appropriate.

Smith v. Grams, 565 F.3d 1037 (7th Cir. 2009)

The state trial court erred in failing to appoint counsel to the defendant and requiring him to proceed pro se. The defendant repeatedly stated that he wanted counsel appointed, though he complained about the two attorneys who had been appointed. The trial court gave the defendant a choice of either withdrawing his motion for a speedy trial or going to trial pro se was not a valid choice to present to the defendant.

Frantz v. Hazey, 533 F.3d 724 (9th Cir. 2008)

In this en banc opinion, the Ninth Circuit provides a survey of the law relating to a defendant’s right to represent himself without interference from stand-by counsel. The basic principle was articulated in McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984). Because the record was not entirely clear about the defendant’s acquiescence to participation by standby counsel, a remand was necessary.

The Eleventh Circuit concluded that a defendant who demands to have his court-appointed counsel replaced faces the possibility of being compelled to proceed pro se if the trial court presents the defendant with a simple choice: proceed with court-appointed counsel, or proceed on your own. As long as the trial court explains the Faretta rights and warnings, the trial court is entitled to present that binary choice to the defendant. Thus, the defendant may not insist on a third option: a new attorney. If the defendant, cognizant of the choice that has been presented to him, and warned of the dangers of proceeding pro se, responds by demanding new counsel, the trial court may (but certainly is not required to) direct the defendant to proceed without counsel. In a companion case, Jones v. Walker, 540 F.2d 1277 (11th Cir., 2008) (en banc), decided the same day, the court held that the trial court failed to adequately advise the defendant of the consequences of his decision (i.e., the hazards of proceeding pro se), but because Jones was a habeas petition, the burden was on the defendant to prove prejudice and to prove that he did not know the dangers. He failed to carry that burden. Garey, whose case was on direct appeal, was advised of the dangers of proceeding without counsel, so the government sustained its burden of proving a knowing and voluntary waiver of counsel.

United States v. Cano, 519 F.3d 512 (5th Cir. 2008)

A defendant has a constitutional right to represent himself at sentencing, even if he appeared with counsel at trial. Failing to conduct a hearing pursuant to Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975), to determine if the defendant should be permitted to represent himself on appeal was error, requiring a remand for re-sentencing after an adequate Faretta inquiry is conducted.

United States v. Forrester, 512 F.3d 500 (9th Cir. 2008)

The trial court conducted a Faretta hearing, but failed to state the charges and erroneously stated the range of possible punishment (the court told the defendant he was facing 10 years to life, when in fact he was facing zero to twenty). The court notes that when a judge misstates the possible sentence during a Faretta hearing, it does not matter if the error overstates or understates the possible sentence. The court also rejects the notion that there is any harmless error analysis when a Faretta colloquy is faulty.

James v. Brigano, 470 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 2006)

The defendant did not voluntarily and knowingly waive his right to counsel. The state court’s determination that the defendant’s decision to dismiss his appointed counsel was simply a delaying tactic did not explain why no Faretta inquiry was conducted.

United States v. Jones, 452 F.3d 223 (3rd Cir. 2006)

Though the defendant requested permission to proceed pro se, his request was couched in terms, “If you won’t appoint me another attorney, I would rather represent myself.” The court conducted an insufficient Faretta inquiry and the defendant was therefore denied his right to counsel. In fact, the court failed to inquire into many of the Faretta considerations, including the defendant’s understanding of the nature of the charges, the possible defenses and other issues might arise at trial.

United States v. Virgil, 444 F.3d 447 (5th Cir. 2006)

If a defendant asks to represent himself at sentencing, but the trial court does not comply with the Faretta inquiry, the defendant is entitled to a re-sentencing. This is the same result if the defendant’s pro se representation at trial is found to have occurred without sufficient Faretta compliance.
Pazden v. Maurer, 424 F.3d 303 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s waiver of counsel was not freely and voluntarily given. His counsel, who was newly appointed declared that she was unprepared to defend the case in light of the number of witnesses and the complexity of the issues. The court gave the defendant the choice of proceeding pro se or going forward with unprepared counsel. This is not a constitutionally acceptable choice.

United States v. Jones, 421 F.3d 359 (5th Cir. 2005)

The trial court failed to undertake the proper Faretta dialogue with the defendant. Allowing him to proceed pro se was error.

Robinson v. Ignacio, 360 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2004)

A Nevada state law provided that if the defendant waived his right to counsel at trial, this waiver applied at sentencing, as well. The Ninth Circuit holds that the state practice was not constitutional. The defendant asked for the assistance of counsel at sentencing and the denial of this request was a Sixth Amendment violation.

United States v. Erskine, 355 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant’s waiver of counsel was not knowing and waiver. The colloquy between the trial judge and the defendant indicated that the defendant did not know the sentence that he was facing, yet the judge did not correct him and then allowed him to represent himself. The defendant told the judge that he thought the possible sentence was one year in prison, when in fact the possible sentence was five years on each count.

Cordova v. Baca, 346 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2003)

A defective Faretta waiver is structural error that requires granting a writ of habeas corpus.

United States v. Pollani, 146 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant represented himself at various pretrial proceedings, but retained counsel shortly before trial was set to begin. Newly retained counsel then moved for a continuance. The trial court denied the motion (which was permissible), and then prevented newly retained counsel from participating at trial, other than in a stand-by capacity. This was error. Though the defendant waived his right to counsel, he had the right to withdraw that waiver and retain counsel.

Henderson v. Frank, 155 F.3d 159 (3rd Cir. 1998)

A generic waiver of counsel form which simply stated, “I wish to proceed on my own behalf” – was insufficient to satisfy the state’s weighty obligation to prove an intentional relinquishment or abandonment of the right to counsel.

United States v. Moskovits, 86 F.3d 1303 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The trial court did not adequately advise the defendant of the potential sentence he was facing when the hearing was held to determine whether the defendant should be permitted to proceed without counsel. The trial court must fully advise the defendant of the risks of proceeding pro se and this includes advice about the possible sentence. The appropriate remedy was to limit the exposure, rather than to set aside the conviction, however.

United States v. Goldberg, 67 F.3d 1092 (3rd Cir. 1995)

A defendant may lose the right to counsel in one of three circumstances: first, there is a knowing and voluntary waiver of the right; second, the defendant may forfeit the right to counsel because of extremely dilatory conduct; third, waiver may occur by defendant’s conduct. This third category involves conduct which is less egregious than conduct warranting a forfeiture, but may still result in the loss of the right to counsel. In this third category of cases, however, the court must warn the defendant of the consequences of his action and the risk of proceeding pro se. In this case, the defendant demanded that his appointed counsel file a motion to withdraw and threatened to kill him. The appointed counsel then asked to withdraw, which the trial court granted and the defendant was required to proceed pro se. This was a violation of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights. The conduct in this case did not fall within the forfeiture category of cases, and, assuming it fit within the third category of cases, because the defendant had received no warnings from the trial court about the consequences of his actions or the dangers of proceeding pro se, the conviction was set aside. Significantly, at the hearing where the attorney was allowed to withdraw, the defendant was not present.

United States v. Salemo, 61 F.3d 214 (3rd Cir. 1995)

When a defendant seeks to waive the assistance of counsel at sentencing, the court must make a careful inquiry into the voluntariness of the defendant’s decision. The inquiry made in this case was inadequate.

United States v. Romano, 849 F.2d 812 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The defendant indicated that she wanted to proceed in her trial pro se. The trial court instructed her that if during the course of the trial she decided to use the services of an attorney, she would have to accept an attorney appointed by the court. This was error. If the defendant decides to hire an attorney during the course of the trial she is permitted to do so and select her own attorney.

United States v. Taylor, 933 F.2d 307 (5th Cir. 1991)

Defendant insisted on proceeding at trial pro se. After conviction, however, he sought the assistance of counsel at sentencing. Denying this request deprived him of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Granting this request would not have interfered with the schedule, or otherwise interfered with the administration of justice. There is no requirement that the defendant make a showing of prejudice. Moreover, the presence of “standby counsel” from the Federal Defender’s office was an inadequate substitute. Standby counsel is not responsible for the defense and that is what is required by the Sixth Amendment.

United States v. Sandles, 23 F.3d 1121 (7th Cir. 1994)

The indigent defendant sought new counsel because he and his appointed attorney had developed serious personal problems. The defendant made numerous allegations of misconduct and inadequate preparation directed at the attorney. The attorney also requested an opportunity to withdraw because of a breakdown in communication, though he denied the allegations of any impropriety. The trial court told the defendant he could either proceed pro se, or stick with the initial attorney. This was improper. The district court did not adequately warn the defendant of the dangers of proceeding without counsel and it was not clear that the defendant was attempting to manipulate the system.

Berry v. Lockhart, 873 F.2d 1168 (8th Cir. 1989)

After disagreements with his appointed counsel arose, the state court defendant requested that another lawyer be appointed to represent him. He specifically told the trial court that he was not qualified to represent himself. Because the trial judge did not seek to ascertain the basis for the disagreement between the appointed counsel and the defendant, he improperly compelled the defendant to proceed without the assistance of counsel.

United States v. Keen, 104 F.3d 1111 (9th Cir. 1997)

In order to waive the right to counsel, the waiver must be intelligent, voluntary and unequivocal. Though the Ninth Circuit does not require a rigid litany of warnings before a defendant can waive the right to counsel and proceed pro se the defendant must be made aware by the court of the nature of the charges, the possible penalties, and the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation. The government bears the burden of proving a knowing and intelligent waiver on the part of the defendant. The waiver in this case was inadequate.

Snook v. Wood, 89 F.3d 605 (9th Cir. 1996)

The state trial court inadequately cautioned the defendant about the dangers of proceeding on appeal pro se and, therefore, he would be entitled to file a new appeal in the state court, or the conviction would be set aside.

Crandell v. Bunnell, 25 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 1994)

This was a capital murder prosecution in California. At his initial municipal court proceeding, the defendant elected to proceed pro se, complaining that his appointed counsel had done nothing during the first two months of his representation. The trial court allowed the defendant to represent himself. Though a defendant is free to represent himself, this waiver is not valid if he was, in fact, confronted with the choice of representing himself, or proceeding with ineffective counsel. The trial court should have determined if the appointed counsel was ineffective before accepting the waiver. If he was ineffective, the defendant should have been afforded the choice between competent counsel and representing himself. A remand was necessary to determine if appointed counsel was ineffective for doing nothing during the initial stages of his representation, prior to the preliminary hearing in municipal court.

United States v. Mohawk, 20 F.3d 1480 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant had difficulty relating to either of his first two appointed counsel. He proceeded pro se. The record failed to establish that the waiver of counsel was knowingly and intelligently made and that the defendant was sufficiently warned of the dangers of proceeding without counsel. See Godinez v. Moran, 113 S.Ct. 2680 (1993).

Hendricks v. Zenon, 993 F.2d 664 (9th Cir. 1993)

The defendant and the appointed public defender had several disagreements about the appeal of defendant’s state conviction. The defendant urged the state appellate court to substitute a new appointed counsel, but the court refused, requiring him to proceed through the first appeal pro se. This was a denial of defendant’s right to counsel on appeal. Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963); Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387 (1985). Though the defendant was appointed an attorney at the outset and his actions caused this attorney to withdraw, he never requested an opportunity to proceed pro se, so he did not waive his right to counsel.
United States v. Taylor, 113 F.3d 1136 (10th Cir. 1997)

Other than warning the defendant that criminal procedure was very technical and not a simple matter, the trial judge did nothing to caution the defendant about the dangers of self-representation. The denial of the right to counsel is never subject to harmless error analysis.

United States v. Allen, 895 F.2d 1577 (10th Cir. 1990)

The trial court failed to adequately determine whether the defendant intended to proceed without the assistance of counsel. The inquiry on the record failed to reveal that the trial judge advised the defendant of the problems of proceeding pro se. Though the defendant may have been engaging in conduct which amounted to a waiver of the right to counsel – refusing to talk to an appointed attorney, refusing to hire his own attorney – the trial court must still advise the defendant of the hazards of proceeding without an attorney before this waiver can be determined to be knowing and voluntary.

United States v. Silkwood, 893 F.2d 245 (10th Cir. 1989)

The trial court conducted an inadequate hearing in deciding whether the defendant desired to proceed through sentencing without counsel. The defendant was dissatisfied with his trial counsel and refused to continue with his representation, but was not properly advised of the hazards of proceeding pro se.

United States v. Cash, 47 F.3d 1083 (11th Cir. 1995)

Defendant was charged with attempted murder and obstruction of justice. He was first declared incompetent to stand trial, and later, when he was declared competent, he requested that he be allowed to represent himself. This request was granted on the morning of trial. The Eleventh Circuit reversed. Though a pretrial hearing on the Faretta issue is not mandatory, it is preferable. To ensure that a waiver of counsel is voluntary, the court must ensure that the defendant fully understands the hazards of self-representation including the importance of evidentiary rules. The closer to trial an accused’s waiver of the right to counsel is, the more rigorous, searching and formal the questioning by the trial judge should be. Here, the waiver was made on the day of trial; the trial court did not question the defendant about his understanding of the possible sentence, or the nature of the charges. The factors which the appellate court must consider when evaluating the voluntariness of a waiver of counsel are (1) the defendant’s age, educational background, and physical and mental health; (2) the extent of the defendant’s contact with lawyers prior to trial; (3) the defendant’s knowledge of the nature of the charges, possible defenses, and penalties; (4) the defendant’s understanding of the rules of procedure, evidence and courtroom decorum; (5) the defendant’s experience in criminal trials; (6) whether standby counsel was appointed and the extent to which that counsel aided the defendant; (7) any mistreatment or coercion of the defendant; and (8) whether the defendant was trying to manipulate the events of the trial. Considering all of these factors, the court held that the defendant’s waiver was not shown to be voluntary.

Marshall v. Dugger, 925 F.2d 374 (11th Cir. 1991)

The trial court inadequately assured that the defendant desired to proceed pro se and therefore his conviction was reversed. The defendant sought to have his appointed attorney replaced – the judge responded, in essence, by requiring the defendant to proceed pro se. There was virtually no effort made to effectively warn the defendant of the dangers of self-representation. Waiver of the right to counsel at trial requires a showing that (1) the defendant clearly and unequivocally asserts his desire to represent himself and to waive his right to counsel; and (2) this waiver was made knowingly and intelligently. This case may not have survived Jones v. Walker, 540 F.3d 1277 (11th Cir. 2008).

Strozier v. Newsome, 871 F.2d 995 (11th Cir. 1989)

The record did not clearly demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to counsel during his state court trial. When the defendant sought to fire his third attorney, the trial judge instructed the attorney to remain present with the defendant but never addressed the defendant personally to ascertain whether his decision to proceed pro se was knowing and voluntary.

Jackson v. James, 839 F.2d 1513 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant’s appointed counsel sought to withdraw on the morning of trial. The trial court permitted the attorney to withdraw and required the defendant to appear pro se despite the defendant’s request for a one or two day continuance to hire an attorney. The Eleventh Circuit grants the writ of habeas corpus holding that this deprived the defendant of the right to effective assistance of counsel.
ATTORNEY-CLIENT ISSUES
(Attorney Work Product)

In re Doe, --- F.3d --- (3rd Cir. 2017)
In order for work product or attorney client privileged communications to be stripped of the privilege on the basis of the crime-fraud exception, the defendant must engage in some overt act of fraud or criminality and not simply muse about using the information to commit a crime.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 870 F.3d 312 (4th Cir. 2017)
After a criminal trial concluded, the prosecution realized that a defense exhibit was a forgery. A grand jury subpoena was issued to the defense attorneys asking (1) where did the document come from; (2) who gave it to the defense team; (3) what did [a particular person] tell you? The Fourth Circuit considered whether the attorney work product privilege applied. The court noted that the privilege is held by both the attorney and the client. The court also distinguished opinion work product from fact work product. The latter is easier to breach. Moreover, the crime fraud exception applies. In this case, the court concluded that the third question amounts to opinion work product, because it requires the attorneys to opine what was said and would disclose the attorneys’ impressions and interpretations as reflected in a witness interview memorandum. See Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947).

Schaeffler v. United States, 806 F.3d 34 (2d Cir. 2015)
In this IRS summons enforcement action, the Second Circuit held that the joint defense / common interest privilege applied to documents that were shared among clients, including a consortium of banks, that shared a common interest in the tax treatment of a refinancing and corporate restructuring. Additionally, the court held that the work-product doctrine applied to documents analyzing the tax treatment of the refinancing and restructuring that were prepared in anticipation of litigation with the IRS. See United States v. Adlman, 134 F.3d 1194 (2d Cir. 1998). In this case, the documents were prepared by a federally authorized tax practitioner (whose communications are treated the same as the attorney-client privilege, 26 U.S.C. § 7525(a)(1)).

United States v. Deloitte LLP, 610 F.3d 129 (D.C.Cir. 2010)
Deloitte a public accounting firm that prepared an audit of certain corporate tax structures. The D.C. Circuit discusses the work product doctrine in this context, ultimately holding that the work product doctrine applied.

United States v. Thompson (The Williams Companies Inc.), 562 F.3d 387 (D.C. Cir. 2009)
The corporation was under investigation by DOJ for price manipulation in the natural gas market and wire fraud. The corporation retained an outside law firm to conduct an internal investigation. Eventually, the results of the investigation were furnished to the government with a cover letter that provided that it was confidential and should not be disclosed to any other party or entity. The corporation was given a deferred prosecution agreement. An individual in the corporation was indicted. He sought the results of the internal investigation under Rule 16 and Brady. The D.C. Circuit held that the trial court was required to review the material and furnish any information to the defendant that would qualify as discoverable under Rule 16 or Brady. The corporation’s desire to maintain the confidentiality of the internal investigation did not trump the defendant’s due process and Rule 16 rights.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated July 6, 2005, 510 F.3d 180 (2nd Cir. 2007)

A defense attorney instructed his client to surreptitiously record another person in order to create evidence of the client’s innocence. The AUSA learned about this tape and subpoenaed it to the grand jury. The Second Circuit held that the work product doctrine did not preclude enforcement of the subpoena. The tape constituted “fact” work product, as opposed to “mental impressions, conclusions, opinions, or legal theories” work product. The former is entitled to less production.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 492 F.3d 976 (8th Cir. 2007)

Even if the government succeeds in persuading the court that certain documents were covered by the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege, the work product privilege survives, assuming the attorney was an unwitting participant in the client’s fraud.

United States v. Roxworthy, 457 F.3d 590 (6th Cir. 2006)

The work product privilege has both an objective and a subjective component. The memorandum in this case satisfied both prongs. The memo was written by KPMG, the audit and consulting firm after their client filed a tax return that reported a transaction that generated a $112 million loss for tax purposes only. KPMG prepared the memorandum, believing that this would ultimately trigger litigation from the IRS and the memorandum was written in anticipation of that litigation.

In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Mark Torf/Torf Environmental Management), 357 F.3d 900 (9th Cir. 2004)

An attorney who was retained by a company under DOJ investigation, hired an environmental consultant. The consultant interviewed witnesses and helped prepare the defense to the charges. In an effort to avoid prosecution, the company submitted numerous documents to the EPA, some of which were prepared by the consultant. The grand jury then subpoenaed all the consultant’s work papers, records and documents. The Ninth Circuit held that the consultant properly withheld from production the documents that were prepared in anticipation of litigation and at the request of the attorney. Other documents, which were prepared in connection with the EPA consent order, qualified under the “dual purpose” doctrine for protection, as well. That is, these documents, though prepared for more than one purpose, were still prepared “because of” the prospect of litigation. See also United States v. Adlman, 134 F.3d 1194 (2d Cir. 1998).

In re Grand Jury Proceedings (John Doe Co.) v. United States, 350 F.3d 299 (2d Cir. 2003)

Counsel for the defendant corporation wrote a letter to the government, explaining that the conduct of the corporation being investigated had been the subject of a prior conversation with ATF agents who told the corporation’s lawyers that the corporate conduct was lawful. This did not amount to a waiver of the work product privilege and the corporation could not be compelled to produce the attorneys’ notes from those prior meetings. There was nothing “unfair” about allowing the corporation to retain the privilege, because the disclosure by counsel was not submitted to the fact finder (i.e., the grand jury), but only to the AUSA who was handling the prosecution.

_In re: Sealed Case_, 146 F.3d 881 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

The work product privilege turns not on whether a specific claim existed, but instead, on whether, under all the circumstances, the lawyer prepared the materials “in anticipation of litigation.” For a document to meet this standard, the lawyer must at least have had a subjective belief that litigation was a real possibility, and that belief must have been objectively reasonable.

_In re Grand Jury Proceedings_, 219 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2000)

A corporation was being investigated for illegal firearms sales. The corporation explicitly sought to enforce the attorney-client privilege. An officer of the corporation, however, testified at the grand jury about certain dealings of the corporation and procedures that the corporation adopted in light of counsel’s advice; and the corporation’s in-house counsel also testified, but refused to disclose certain notes that were taken by his assistant during a meeting about which he testified (claiming that this was work product). The government claimed that the corporation waived both the attorney-client and the work product privileges. The Second Circuit held that waiver may be found where the privilege holder asserts a claim that in fairness requires examination of protected communications. Fairness comes into play when a party attempts to use the privilege both as a sword and as a shield. In other words, a party cannot partially disclose privileged communications or affirmatively rely on privileged communications to support its claim or defense and then shield the underlying communications from scrutiny by the opposing party. A quintessential example of waiver is the advice of counsel defense. Circumstances may also dictate that there has been a partial waiver. The issue is more complicated in the context of corporate entities, because, as here, the corporation may assert the privilege, but an officer – acting in an individual capacity – may inadvertently (or, for that matter, intentionally) waive the privilege. This case contains a thorough review of the jurisprudence of waiver and corporate attorney-client privilege and work product privilege issues.

_United States v. Horn_, 29 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1994)

Discovery in this massive bank fraud prosecution was being maintained at an independent document management firm. The defense was allowed to review documents at that location and to make copies. Unbeknownst to the defense, however, whenever the employees made a copy of a document for the defense, an extra copy was made for the government. The defense learned about this and a moved to seal the government’s copies. Prior to a hearing on this motion, the government made an extra copy of their set of the defendant’s documents. The lower court held that this amounted to serious governmental misconduct, violating the defendant’s right to due process, to the effective assistance of counsel and also violated the work product doctrine. 811 F.Supp. 739 (D.N.H. 1992). The appellate court agreed with this assessment, but reversed the lower court’s award of attorney’s fees and costs.

_In re Grand Jury Proceedings (U.S. v. Under Seal)_), 33 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 1994)

Though the government offered sufficient evidence to pierce the attorney client privilege based on the crime-fraud exception, the information offered by the government was not sufficient to pierce the work product privilege which the attorney asserted. In order to pierce the work product privilege (unlike the attorney client privilege), the government must show that the attorney was aware that his advice was being used by the client to further a crime.

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 43 F.3d 966 (5th Cir. 1994)

The attorney work product privilege may be asserted by the defendant, or the attorney, and includes, among other things, the attorney’s notes of interviews of third parties. Moreover, the privilege extends to proceedings which are closely related to the pending proceeding, such as a forfeiture action and a criminal proceeding. The test for whether a third party communication is privileged by the work product doctrine is whether the information recorded by the attorney is “obtained or prepared by an adversary’s counsel with an eye toward litigation.” Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947).

In re Sealed Case, 146 F.3d 881 (D.C.Cir. 1998)

In order to raise the work product privilege, it is not necessary that the attorney establish that there was litigation then pending, or that there was a specific claim being considered by the attorney. All that is required is that the material was prepared “in anticipation of litigation,” as opposed to documents that were prepared in the ordinary course of business (e.g., to deal with issues such as interest rates, payment schedules, or collateral).

In re Sealed Case, 29 F.3d 715 (D.C.Cir. 1994)

An individual who had been engaged in illegal transactions with Libya sought counsel from an attorney. No grand jury had been empanelled to investigate the individual’s transactions at that time. Nevertheless, the work product doctrine covered these conversations, because the doctrine applies to work performed, “with an eye toward litigation.” In determining, whether the materials in the lawyer’s files are protected by the work product privilege, the testing question is whether, in light of the nature of the document and the factual situation in the particular case, the document can fairly be said to have been prepared or obtained because of the prospect of litigation. The privilege may be asserted not only by a lawyer, but also by his client.

United States v. Paxson, 861 F.2d 730 (D.C.Cir. 1988)

A defendant and his attorney attended an interview with government antitrust lawyers during which the attorney took notes. At the trial of another defendant, the defendant on trial subpoenaed the attorney’s notes of this interview. The Court holds that the work product doctrine prevents disclosure of these notes. Absent a showing of necessity and unavailability by other means, such notes constitute work product and cannot be the subject of compelled disclosure.
BAIL REFORM ACT

(Bail Pending Appeal)

United States v. Zimny, 857 F.3d 97 (1st Cir. 2017)

The defendant, post-trial, learned that one (or perhaps more than one) juror reviewed blog posts about the case (and about how evil the defendant was) during trial. The First Circuit remanded the case to the district court for further development of the record. (See 848 F.3d 458 for the initial appeal). The defendant moved for bond pending appeal. 18 USC § 3143(b)(1). The district court denied the request and the defendant immediately appealed and the First Circuit reversed, holding that the issues presented were sufficient to necessitate bond pending appeal. The defendant was neither a danger to society or a flight risk (which was evidenced by the district court’s willingness to allow him to self-surrender after sentencing). The First Circuit held that the facts relating to the jury misconduct were sufficient to satisfy the “substantial question of fact” prong and the “likelihood of reversal if facts were proven” prong of the bond pending appeal statute.

United States v. Goforth, 546 F.3d 712 (4th Cir. 2008)

18 U.S.C. § 3145(c) severely limits bail pending appeal in cases of drug cases and violent crimes. The code provides that in “exceptional circumstances” the judicial officer may permit bond. Some courts have held that only an appellate judge can make the “exceptional circumstances” finding. The Fourth Circuit rejects that argument in this case, holding that the district court is empowered to grant bond in exceptional circumstances pursuant to § 3145(c).

United States v. Johnson, 399 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2005)

The crime of being a felon in possession of a firearm (18 U.S.C. § 922(g)) is not a crime of violence that triggers § 3143(a)’s requirement of detention immediately following a conviction.

United States v. Abuhamra, 389 F.3d 309 (2d Cir. 2004)

A district court’s order of detention pending sentencing is a final order that may be appealed to the court of appeals. 18 U.S.C. § 3145(c). In this case, the Second Circuit held that an appeal bond may not be denied based on an ex parte showing to the district court relating to the defendant’s alleged risk of flight and dangerousness.

United States v. Garcia, 340 F.3d 1013 (9th Cir. 2003)

People found guilty of violent offenses or serious drug offenses are not permitted to be released on appeal, or pending sentencing, except in exceptional circumstances. 18 U.S.C. § 3145(c). In this case, the Ninth Circuit sets forth some of the factors that should be considered in assessing exceptional circumstances. Among those factors are: whether the defendant’s conduct was aberrational; whether the defendant previously led an exemplary life; whether there were exceptionally strong grounds for the appeal; the length of the prison sentence; whether there was an unusual health situation that would make the hardship of prison especially harsh; an exceptional unlikelihood of flight. See also United States v. Brown, 368 F.3d 992 (8th Cir. 2004).
United States v. Swanquist, 125 F.3d 573 (6th Cir. 1997)

When the trial court denies a defendant's application for an appeal bond, it must set forth the reasons for this denial. Merely reciting the statutory requirements and stating conclusions that the criteria for release are not met is not sufficient. The court must set forth the actual reasons.

United States v. Blasini-Lluberas, 144 F.3d 881 (1st Cir. 1998)

Because the trial court did not enter a written order denying bail to the defendant pending appeal, the case had to be remanded.
BAIL REFORM ACT
(Bail Pending Sentencing)

United States v. Meister, 744 F.3d 1236 (11th Cir. 2013)
The district court judge has the authority to release a defendant for exceptional circumstances pending sentencing and appeal. This authority is not limited to appellate judges. The court was construing the provision in § 3145(c).

United States v. Ingle, 454 F.3d 1082 (10th Cir. 2006)

United States v. Garcia, 340 F.3d 1013 (9th Cir. 2003)
People found guilty of violent offenses or serious drug offenses are not permitted to be released on appeal, or pending sentencing, except in exceptional circumstances. 18 U.S.C. § 3145(c). In this case, the Ninth Circuit sets forth some of the factors that should be considered in assessing exceptional circumstances. Among those factors are: whether the defendant’s conduct was aberrational; whether the defendant previously led an exemplary life; whether there were exceptionally strong grounds for the appeal; the length of the prison sentence; whether there was an unusual health situation that would make the hardship of prison especially harsh; an exceptional unlikelihood of flight.
BAIL REFORM ACT
(Crime of Violence)

The United States Supreme Court upheld the pre-trial detention aspects of the Bail Reform Act which permit detention on the basis of dangerousness.

United States v. Bowers, 432 F.3d 518 (3rd Cir. 2005)

Possession of a firearm by a convicted felon is not a crime of violence for purposes of determining whether to grant the defendant pretrial release.

United States v. Twine, 344 F.3d 987 (9th Cir. 2003)

The Bail Reform Act does not permit pretrial detention without bail based solely on a finding of dangerousness. This interpretation would render meaningless 18 U.S.C. § 314(f)(1) and (2). In addition, the court holds that the offense of felon in possession of a firearm is not a crime of violence for purposes of the Bail Reform Act. Thus, the presumptions are not triggered by this offense.
BAIL REFORM ACT
(Miscellaneous)

United States v. King, 849 F.2d 485 (11th Cir. 1988)

In reviewing a Magistrate’s release or detention order, a District Judge must make written findings of fact in affirming, modifying, or reversing the Magistrate’s decision. The Court of Appeals stated that in reviewing the Magistrate’s decision, the District Court must review the case de novo, although it need not conduct a de novo hearing. It must, however, review all the facts presented to the Magistrate.

United States v. Gaviria, 828 F.2d 667 (11th Cir. 1987)

The government may proceed by proffer of evidence at a pre-trial detention hearing subject to the discretion of the judicial officer presiding. The defendant only has a conditional right to call adverse witnesses during his presentation at the detention hearing. Again, the presiding officer is vested with discretion whether to allow defense counsel to call adverse witnesses with or without an initial proffer of the expected benefit of the witness’ testimony.

In re Smith, 823 F.2d 401 (11th Cir. 1987)

The district court could not deny defendant release pending appeal without specifying its reason in writing.
BAIL REFORM ACT
(Risk of Flight)

United States v. Nwokoro, 651 F.3d 108 (D.C. Cir. 2011)

The trial court failed to document the reasons that bail was denied in this case. Though there was evidence at the hearing that the defendant had assets in Nigeria and the judge stated that there was a risk of flight, the judge failed to make specific findings (or document those findings) in an order that reflected a weighing of the factors that suggested that the defendant was not a flight risk, including the fact that the defendant was previously on bond and did not flee.

United States v. Sabhnani, 493 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 2007)

In light of the government’s concession that there were certain conditions that would minimize the risk of flight, the Second Circuit held that the defendant should have been released on those conditions.
BANK FRAUD

Loughrin v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2384 (2014)
A charge under § 1344(2) does not require proof of an intent to defraud the bank. The victim of the defendant’s fraud may be a customer of the bank, as long as money is obtained from the bank through false or fraudulent pretences, representations, or promises.

Shaw v. United States, 137 S.Ct. 462 (2016)
Even if a defendant intends to defraud solely a bank customer and not the bank, the defendant may be convicted of bank fraud under 18 U.S.C. § 1344(1) if the method of defrauding the customer was by taking money from the customer’s account at the bank.

Though there is no explicit materiality element set forth in the mail fraud, wire fraud and bank fraud statutes, this element is implicit in the concept of fraud. Thus, the government must prove that any misrepresentation involved in a mail, wire or bank fraud prosecution relates to a material fact. This issue, pursuant to United States v. Gaudin, must be submitted to the jury.

United States v. Wells, 519 U.S. 482 (1997)
Materiality is not an element of a bank fraud offense under 18 U.S.C. §1014 (false statement to a bank).

United States v. Bouchard, 828 F.3d 116 (2d Cir. 2016)
There was no evidence that the mortgage lender in certain counts of this bank fraud case was federally insured and insufficient evidence that the defendant knew that that lender’s loans were transferred to a federally insured entity. (The conduct in this case occurred prior to 2009, when the definition of a financial institution was amended to include mortgage lenders, 18 U.S.C. § 20). Pursuant to Loughrin v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 2384 (2014), the government must prove that the defendant intended to defraud a financial institution, and a financial institution had to be federally insured. The same rationale required the reversal of the § 1014 false statement counts, because they required proof that the defendant knew the false statement was supplied to a bank.

United States v. Ajayi, 808 F.3d 1113 (7th Cir. 2015)
The defendant deposited an altered check into his bank account. Thereafter, he withdrew funds from the account that were only in the account as a result of the altered check. Each withdrawal was indicted as a separate count. The Seventh Circuit held that the bank fraud offense was the deposit of the altered check and the withdrawals were not separate indictable executions of the scheme, therefore the counts were multiplicitous.

United States v. Phillips, 731 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2013)
In this en banc decision, the Seventh Circuit held that the defendants should have been permitted to introduce evidence that the defendants (who were charged with making a false statement to a bank in violation of §1014) were told by their broker that lying in response to certain questions on a loan application form was permissible. The evidence was relevant to whether the defendants actually knew that their answers were false and whether they believed that answering the questions in that way would “influence” the bank’s decision.

United States v. Davis, 735 F.3d 194 (5th Cir. 2013)

The government failed to prove with sufficient evidence that the victim (American Express) was FDIC insured. The proof offered at trial was confusing between the American Express holding company and the credit card company.

United States v. Kurlemann, 736 F.3d 439 (6th Cir. 2013)

A material omission on a bank loan application is not a “false statement” under 18 U.S.C. §1014. A material omission may amount to fraud, but §1014 only prohibits false statements, not fraud.

United States v. Nkansah, 699 F.3d 743 (2d Cir. 2012)

The defendant was involved in a scheme to obtain fraudulent refund checks from the IRS. To further the scheme, he opened bank accounts in fake names that matched the fraudulent identifications that he created to obtain the refunds. The defendant cashed the fraudulent checks at the bank. This evidence did not support a §1344 bank fraud offense, because there was no evidence that the bank was at risk of losing money or was the victim envisioned by the defendant in executing the scheme.

United States v. Steffen, 687 F.3d 1104 (8th Cir. 2012)

The Eighth Circuit concludes that in certain situations, a bank fraud prosecution under §1344 can be based on a failure to disclose material information. However, the court then concludes that the failure to disclose in this case was not adequately set forth in the indictment. The court notes that the failure to disclose that the defendant had sold the collateral could not constitute bank fraud if the collateral was sold after the loan was approved, despite the fact that the defendant obtained draws on the loan after having sold the collateral. This amounts to a breach of contract, not a fraud. Other theories of fraudulent omission were also rejected by the Eighth Circuit, which held that the trial court properly dismissed the indictment.

Judge Easterbrook and Judge Posner face off on the question of whether a defendant is guilty of making a false statement to a bank if the defendant is not aware that the false statement would influence the bank (because the defendant is lured into believing that the bank does not care about this particular statement). Judge Easterbrook in the panel opinion, concluded (for the majority) that the defendant need only be shown to have known that the statement was false and it was submitted to the bank with the understanding that the bank would consider the loan application when deciding whether to authorize the loan. Judge Posner writes, in dissent, that the trial court erred in prohibiting the defendant from introducing evidence that the defendant, though knowing that the statement was false, was led to believe that it was not something the bank cared about. This case involved the typical “stated income” mortgage fraud case in which the mortgage broker told the customer/defendant that it made no difference what was written on the loan application, because “no doc” loans were known as “liar’s loans” and the bank was not interested in the customer’s recitation of income, because all that mattered was the customer’s credit score. REHEARING EN BANC GRANTED, and the conviction was reversed: In the en banc decision, Judge Posner wrote the majority opinion, and held that the evidence about what the defendants were told was admissible and could have disproved that they had the required state of mind to commit the offense. 731 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2013).

United States v. Alexander, 679 F.3d 721 (8th Cir. 2012)

In order to succeed in a § 1014 false statement prosecution, the government must establish that the victim financial institution was FDIC insured. In this case, the government proved that Bank of America was FDIC insured, but not that Bank of America, N.A. or Bank of America Mortgage was FDIC insured or that the latter two institutions were subsidiaries of Bank of America so that they qualified under § 1014.

United States v. Parkes, 668 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 2012)

The defendant, a customer of a small Tennessee bank, was charged with participating in bank fraud. His company had large debts to the bank, in fact, the debts exceeded the lending limits permitted by the bank and the FDIC. The president of the bank altered the books to make it look like the loans were actually to several different unrelated companies (some of which were non-existent), so that it did not appear on the books as an outsized loan to the defendant. The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was aware of the falsification undertaken by the president. The bank president did not testify. Other evidence pointed to the fact that the defendant was not, in fact, aware of the president’s conduct.

United States v. Bennett, 621 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 2010)

A bank fraud prosecution cannot be predicated on fraud involving a bank’s wholly owned subsidiary that is not itself a “financial institution” insured by the FDIC.

United States v. Rigas, 490 F.3d 208 (2d Cir. 2007)

Though affirming the defendants’ convictions on numerous counts, the Second Circuit holds that there was insufficient proof of materiality with regard to one group of counts.

United States v. Sandles, 469 F.3d 508 (6th Cir. 2006)

In this bank robbery trial, the government failed to adequately prove that the bank was FDIC insured, an essential element of a bank robbery, or bank fraud offense.

United States v. Staples, 435 F.3d 860 (8th Cir. 2006)

This opinion contains an interesting discussion of the different Circuits’ decisions about what the government is required to prove in a bank fraud prosecution. Some Circuits require that the bank be victimized; others required that the bank be defrauded; others require only that the defendant commits a fraud against someone, and the bank is used in the fraudulent endeavor. The distinction sometimes reflects whether the government is proceeding under subsection (1) or (2) of 18 U.S.C. § 1344. The decision in this case was complicated by the fact that the government acquiesced to a jury instruction which obligated it to prove the elements of both subsections (1) and (2). The end result is that the government failed to prove that two defendants were guilty of bank fraud – again, a result of the jury instructions that increased the elements required to be proved. The problem is that the entire loss caused by the defendants’ conduct was suffered by Title Companies, not the bank.

United States v. Omer, 395 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant’s bank fraud indictment failed to allege that the falsehood was material. He moved to dismiss the indictment prior to trial, but this motion was denied. The conviction could not be sustained in light of his timely challenge to the sufficiency of the indictment.

United States v. Anderson, 391 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 2004)

When the government initiates a money laundering sting involving money supposedly derived from bank fraud, the agent must convey information to the target that the bank was insured by the FDIC – otherwise, the proceeds would not be from specified unlawful activity (i.e., federal bank fraud). Because no such representation was made to the target in this case, the conviction was not supported by sufficient evidence. The government’s argument that it would be too difficult to represent, in an undercover capacity, that the bank was federally insured, was met with the court’s response, “Simply put, with time, resources, and opportunity to design the scenario, it is not too much to ask the government to get it right.”

United States v. Ponec, 163 F.3d 486 (8th Cir. 1998)

The government is not required to prove a financial loss to a bank in order to successfully prosecute a bank fraud case. In this case, the defendant diverted checks made payable to his employer and deposited the checks into his own account. This constitutes bank fraud. However, when the defendant withdrew money from his own account – an account that had his own money in it, as well as his employer’s money – he did not commit bank fraud. The government failed to prove that there was any fraud in withdrawing the money, which may have been his own money.

United States v. Rodriguez, 140 F.3d 163 (2d Cir. 1998)

A co-conspirator of the defendant, an employee of a publishing company, issued checks to the defendant as if she, the defendant, were a vendor of the company. The defendant then took these checks and deposited them into her own account. Obviously, this scheme defrauded the company. The Second Circuit held, however, that this did not amount to bank fraud, because she made no false statements to the bank and the bank was never even a potential victim of the scheme.

United States v. Adkinson, 135 F.3d 1363 (11th Cir. 1998)

The indictment in this case alleged that the defendants had a scheme to defraud a bank. The indictment did not allege, however, an execution of the scheme. Both elements are essential to a bank fraud prosecution. The indictment was defective and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Schnitzer, 145 F.3d 721 (5th Cir. 1998)

In this complicated savings and loan fraud case, the Fifth Circuit upheld the lower court’s decision to grant a judgment of acquittal on certain counts. With regard to certain false entry counts, however, the appellate court found sufficient evidence to support the verdict, but upheld the lower court’s decision granting a new trial on those counts. Among the issues decided by the court was the impropriety of permitting the government to introduce evidence about a violation of a banking regulation to prove that the defendants intended to deceive regulators. The banking regulation was insufficiently related to the supposed false entry to support its admission. The court also upheld the reversal of a misapplication conviction (18 U.S.C. § 657), relying on United States v. Beuttenmuller, 29 F.3d 973 (5th Cir. 1994).

United States v. Mulder, 147 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 1998)

Good faith constitutes a complete defense to a charge of fraudulent intent. In this case, the defendant was charged with bank fraud. At trial, he offered a financial statement which appeared to accurately reflect his assets and which was contained in the bank’s lending file. Excluding this document, even though it was internally inconsistent, was reversible error.

United States v. Mueller, 74 F.3d 1152 (11th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was engaged in civil litigation with a financial institution. During the course of that litigation, the defendant filed a false affidavit and engaged in obstruction of the discovery process. This did not support a bank fraud conviction.

United States v. Thorn, 17 F.3d 325 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant, an attorney, prepared a title insurance policy for a loan to a law office partnership of which the attorney was a member. The attorney knew that a prior mortgage existed on the property, but failed to note it in the title policy. This did not defraud the bank. The title policy did not make any representation about the existence of any prior mortgages; it simply insured against them. Indeed, the policy expressly stated that it would insure the lender against any existing mortgages. The bank, in short, was not the recipient of a false statement. The trial court correctly granted a post-trial judgment of acquittal.
BANKS, MISAPPLICATION OF BANK FUNDS

United States v. Flanders, 491 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2007)

18 U.S.C. § 656 makes it a federal crime for a bank officer or director to willfully misapply bank funds with the intent to inure or defraud the bank. Though the evidence was sufficient for a conviction on some counts of this indictment, the government failed to prove that the defendant willfully misapplied bank funds with regard to one count. There was insufficient evidence of an intent to defraud or an intent to injury the bank.
BANK ROBBERY

BANKRUPTCY FRAUD

_United States v. Knight_, 800 F.3d 491 (8th Cir. 2015)

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial in this case. The defendant, an attorney, was convicted of bankruptcy fraud and related offenses in connection with his representation of a real estate client. The government’s theory of the fraudulent conduct of the attorney was vague and authorized the trial court to grant a new trial based on the weakness of the case, even though there was sufficient evidence to support a conviction.

_United States v. Milwitt_, 475 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2007)

In order to properly allege a bankruptcy fraud offense under 18 U.S.C. § 157, the indictment must allege the defendant’s specific intent to defraud an identifiable victim or class of victims of the particular fraudulent scheme. The evidence at trial was insufficient to support a conviction of the defendant consistent with the charges contained in the indictment.

_United States v. Mitchell_, 476 F.3d 539 (8th Cir. 2007)

A prosecution for bankruptcy fraud may not be predicated on a failure to reveal income received pre-petition, even if the income is received from an asset that later is part of the estate.

_United States v. McIntosh_, 124 F.3d 1330 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with bankruptcy fraud and money laundering on the basis of his failure to disclose during his bankruptcy proceeding that he had received certain money and deposited some of those funds in a bank account he controlled through an unincorporated business he managed. The indictment also alleged that he failed to disclose his interest in real estate that was actually owned by his father, but at which he lived and paid the mortgage payments. Count one of the indictment charged him with failure to disclose his interest in the unincorporated business and in his house. Because he did not own his house, however, the evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction. Though the evidence was sufficient regarding the business, because the jury may have convicted the defendant on the basis of the failure to report the house (the judge instructed the jury that they could convict the defendant if they believed he concealed his interest in either asset), the conviction on this count had to be reversed. Also, one count charged the defendant with concealing an asset. Another count charged him with filing a false report in the bankruptcy court. These counts were multiplicitous.

_United States v. Gilbert_, 136 F.3d 1451 (11th Cir. 1998)

In a bankruptcy fraud concealment of assets case, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the debtor is discharged or denied a discharge. 18 US.C. § 3284. Here, the court held that if the defendant converts the corporate bankruptcy from a Chapter 11 to a Chapter 7, thus precluding discharge, the statute of limitations begins to run at that time. The prosecution in this case was barred by the statute of limitations.

_United States v. Rowe_, 144 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 1998)

The evidence was insufficient in this bankruptcy fraud prosecution to prove that the defendant’s answer on a bankruptcy schedule was fraudulent.

BILL OF PARTICULARS

United States v. GAF, Corp., 928 F.2d 1253 (2d Cir. 1991)
In the third trial of the corporation, the defense sought to introduce the bill of particulars which had previously been filed by the government in an earlier prosecution. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. The bill showed that the government had abandoned its earlier broad (and inconsistent) theory of the offense.

United States v. Davidoff, 845 F.2d 1151 (2d Cir. 1988)
The Second Circuit reversed the defendant’s conviction based on the denial of his request for a Bill of Particulars. In order to prove the existence of a RICO offense, the government introduced numerous instances of extortion which were not listed in the indictment but which the defendant requested in his Bill of Particulars. The Second Circuit holds that “it is simply unrealistic to think that a defendant preparing to meet charges of extorting funds from one company had a fair opportunity to defend against allegations of extorting against unrelated companies, allegations not made prior to trial.”

United States v. Bortnovsky, 820 F.2d 572 (2d Cir. 1987)
The government was required to provide a bill of particulars in this mail fraud and RICO case specifying with connection to various insurance fraud counts which insurance claims were fraudulent, and which invoices were allegedly falsified. In this case, the Second Circuit held that the failure to provide this information was reversible error.

The defendant, charged with income tax evasion, was entitled to a Bill of Particulars setting forth the alleged gross income, the adjusted gross income, the alleged unreported income, the alleged availability of deductions and exemptions, and corporate expenditures which were alleged to have been “constructive dividends.”

The district court dismissed a tax fraud indictment in this case for failing to specify what deductions were fraudulent.

Defendant’s bill of particulars would be granted with respect to the following matters: (1) co-conspirators; (2) the location of the acts performed by the principals; (3) the location where the principal offense occurred.

The defendant was charged in a 121-count indictment involving fraud, conspiracy and RICO. The district court held that he was entitled to a bill of particulars specifying in detail the laws and regulations which were allegedly violated. In particular, one count of the indictment stated that the defendant had violated certain regulations, without specifying which regulations in the 700-page code were violated.
In this narcotics prosecution, the defendants were entitled to the names of the persons whom the government claimed were co-conspirators; whether the individuals present during the commission of overt acts were, in fact, informants or undercover agents; the names of witnesses to overt and substantive acts; and the exact dates that the defendants joined the conspiracy. The defendants were also entitled to the statements which the government intended to rely upon to show an agreement among the conspirators; the quantity of cocaine distributed and possessed; and whether it was going to be the government’s contention that certain defendants were aiders and abettors. Finally, the court held that the government must specify the manner in which one defendant used a vehicle to facilitate a conspiracy, the names and places where the defendant met with others, and the time, place and manner in which the government would claim at trial that two defendants became members of the conspiracy.
BRADY

(Generally)

The government may implement a policy of permitting a defendant to enter a “fast-track” guilty plea, and receiving a downward departure, with the understanding that he will not receive any information from the government that could be used to impeach witnesses or support an affirmative defense. The defendant is not required to accept this offer, but there is nothing unconstitutional about making such an offer to the defendant, and conditioning the entry of a guilty plea and receiving a downward departure on waiving the right to receive such Giglio information.

In the Court’s most sweeping (and favorable) Brady decision in decades, the Court reverses this murder conviction on the basis of withheld information which was material to the issue of guilt or innocence. Along the way, the Court reviews a number of issues relating to materiality, including: (1) A showing of materiality does not require demonstration by a preponderance that disclosure of the suppressed evidence would have resulted ultimately in acquittal; rather, all that need be shown is a “reasonable probability” of a different result. In other words, “The question is not whether the defendant would more likely than not have received a different verdict with the evidence, but whether in its absence he received a fair trial, understood as a trial resulting in a verdict worthy of confidence. A reasonable probability of a different result is accordingly shown when the government’s evidentiary suppression ‘undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.’” (2) The question is not whether all the evidence, including the withheld evidence would result in sufficient evidence to convict, or not. The possibility of an acquittal on a criminal charge does not imply an insufficient evidentiary basis to convict. The question is whether the excluded evidence could reasonably be taken to put the whole case in such a different light as to undermine confidence in the verdict. (3) Once a showing of constitutional error has been made, there is no need for a “harmless error” analysis. By definition, if the excluded evidence was material under the tests above, the Brady violation could not be harmless. (4) In reviewing the materiality of the withheld evidence, it should be considered cumulatively, not in isolation, item-by-item. (5) It is no excuse that information is known to the police, and withheld from the prosecutor. The prosecutor should adopt procedures which ensure that information known to the police is conveyed to the prosecutor. In concluding, the Court notes that when faced with a tough question whether to disclose or not, the prosecutor should disclose: “This is as it should be. Such disclosure will serve to justify trust in the prosecutor as the representative of a sovereignty whose interest in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done. And it will tend to preserve the criminal trial, as distinct from the prosecutor’s private deliberations, as the chosen forum for ascertaining the truth about criminal accusations.”

The United States Supreme Court was confronted with the question of whether a welfare department could withhold its files in this child molestation case. In a lengthy opinion, Justice
Powell reviews the various means by which this information could be disclosed to the defendant, including subpoena power and the due process requirement that exculpatory evidence be disclosed to the defendant. Though the decision does not give hard and fast rules, it is a favorable decision insofar as it holds that a child welfare agency’s files must be produced to the defendant as Brady information if it contains exculpatory information. That is, the important aspect of this case is the holding that the welfare department is, in effect, an arm of the prosecution and thus under the duty to disclose exculpatory information.

United States v. Abdallah, 911 F.3d 201 (4th Cir. 2018)

The trial court erred in refusing to review agents’ notes and communications given the inconsistency in their versions of what occurred when the defendant was interrogated. If a defendant makes a plausible showing that exculpatory evidence exists in the government’s file, the court should review the information that is identified by the defendant as potentially including exculpatory information.

McCormick v. Parker, 821 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 2016)

The prosecutor utilized a Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner (SANE) in connection with the state court prosecution of the defendant. The SANE falsely testified that she was certified. The Tenth Circuit held that the SANE was a member of the prosecution team, and therefore, he false testimony was deemed to be known to the prosecution team (i.e., she knew she was testifying falsely, even if the prosecutor himself did not actually know). This misrepresentation was material for Brady purposes because of the importance of the SANE’s testimony and also because if her misrepresentation to the jury had been exposed, the jury may have given her remaining testimony less weight.

United States v. Pasha, 797 F.3d 1122 (D.C. Cir. 2015)

A criminal defense attorney and two investigators (both of whom were women) were prosecuted for obstruction of justice based on their effort to fabricate evidence to support a client’s defense. A witness to the events involving the fabrication had told the AUSA and law enforcement officers that he saw one man and one woman entering the house where the fabricated evidence was filmed. This statement was revealed just prior to trial (eight months after the witness’s interview). This statement was exculpatory, because both investigators (defendants) were women (mother and daughter). The AUSA then interviewed the witness again, and this time, he said that there were two women. The district court judge expressed concern that there was a Brady violation caused by the delay in furnishing to the defense the interview in a timely manner and by the time of trial, the witness’s memory was different. The district court wrote, “At the moment the eyewitness said the two individuals who arrived at the photo shoot were a man and a woman (rather than two women), ‘counsel for the Government should have understood that as soon as they were finished talking with that gentleman, they had an obligation to give that information to the defense.’” The district court ultimately held that the Brady violation was not prejudicial. The D.C. Circuit reversed: The failure to turn over the favorable interview in a timely manner was prejudicial and denied the defense the opportunity to obtain a sworn statement from the witness to preserve that testimony (and his memory). Not only did this taint the trial, but the remedy might be dismissal of the indictment, because now even more time passed since the witness made the exculpatory statement and there might be no way to recreate his favorable memory. The remedy decision needed to be made in the first instance by the district court on remand.

Lewis v. Connecticut Com’r. of Correction, 790 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2015)

There is no due diligence requirement on the defendant to discover allegedly exculpatory evidence before relief may be granted based on the prosecution’s failure to reveal the information. In this case, the prosecution failed to reveal that a witness had previously denied any knowledge about the crime.

Barton v. Warden, Southern Ohio Corr. Facility, 786 F.3d 450 (6th Cir. 2015)

Brady applies to exculpatory information, even if it is not admissible evidence, if the information might lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

Amado v. Gonzalez, 758 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2014)

The state’s failure to reveal impeaching evidence about a key prosecution witness was a Brady violation that necessitated setting aside the murder conviction in this case. The witness actually balked at testifying at trial, so his earlier statement to the police was read by the officer who interviewed the witness. The prosecution failed to reveal that the witness was on probation for a robbery offense and that he was a member of a rival gang at the time he made the statement to the police. The state appellate court rejected the Brady claim on the basis that the trial attorney could have found the information and thus it was not “withheld” by the prosecution. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant does not have the duty to seek exculpatory or impeaching information; the prosecution has the duty to produce it. There is no “due diligence” requirement imposed on the defense when it comes to Brady or Giglio information. In addition, citing Kyles v. Whitley, the court held that the prosecutor had a duty to locate and reveal this information, even if it was not literally in the prosecutor’s file: “[b]ecause the prosecution is in a unique position to obtain information known to other agents of the government, it may not be excused from disclosing what it does not know but could have learned.”

United States v. Olsen, 737 F.3d 625 (9th Cir. 2013)

Judge Kozinski’s dissent to the denial of en banc review is full of outrage about the epidemic proportions that Brady violations have reached, citing scores of cases from around the country in both state and federal courts. This case involved the failure to disclose a pending investigation into the incompetence of a laboratory analysis upon whose conclusions the conviction in this case was based.

Munchinski v. Wilson, 694 F.3d 308 (3rd Cir. 2012)

The Third Circuit described the Brady violations in this case as staggering and the lower court described the events as “extraordinary.” Police reports were intentionally redacted by state court prosecutors to eliminate references to recorded statements of witnesses; alternative suspects were not revealed and witness statements that implicated alternative suspects were never disclosed. Significant portions of an autopsy report were not revealed. An offer of leniency to the state’s key witness were not revealed and the prosecutor, in closing argument, expressly denied that any motive existed for the witness to testify for the prosecution. The Third Circuit concluded that there was clear and convincing evidence of actual innocence and that a successive habeas petition would be permitted and granted.

United States v. King, 628 F.3d 693 (4th Cir. 2011)

Generally, Brady violations are discovered post-trial and the existence and scope of the exculpatory information that was not revealed is known. Occasionally, however, the existence of exculpatory information is not known with certainty, but its location is “probable.” In that situation, the defendant should request that the trial court conduct an in camera inspection of the material to determine whether exculpatory information is contained therein. That would include records of social service agencies and, as in this case, grand jury testimony. A sufficient showing was made in this case to require a remand to review the grand jury testimony of one witness.

Arnold v. Secretary, Dept of Corrections, 595 F.3d 1324 (11th Cir. 2010), adopting district court decision 622 F.Supp.2d 1294 (M.D.Fla. 2009)

The police detective who was the lead investigator in this case had committed crimes that were clearly discoverable pursuant to Brady. However, only the detective and not the prosecutor knew about the detective’s crimes. The Eleventh Circuit held that this information was required to be furnished to the defense, because the detective was part of the prosecution team, and any information known to any member of the prosecution team must be disclosed.

United States v. Salem, 578 F.3d 682 (7th Cir. 2009)

Prior to trial, the government was aware that there was information that its star witness was involved in a murder. There was no plea agreement, or any other kind of agreement in place to protect the witness; nevertheless, this information should have been furnished to the defendant prior to his trial. However, further development of the record was necessary in order to determine if the defendant was entitled to a new trial.

United States v. Robinson, 583 F.3d 1265 (10th Cir. 2009)

The trial court erred in barring the defense from reviewing the mental health records of the key eyewitness in this case. The parties and the lower court knew that the defendant had just been released from a mental health facility prior to his testimony, but the defense was barred from reviewing the records. The trial court also erred in barring the defense from cross-examining the witness about his mental health infirmity and use of drugs. Among the cases relied upon by the Tenth Circuit were United States v. Lindstrom, 698 F.2d 1154 (11th Cir. 1983) and Greene v. Wainwright, 634 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1981).

United States v. Price, 566 F.3d 900 (9th Cir. 2009)

The AUSA who tried this case involving possession of a firearm by a convicted felon presumably did not know about his star witness’s repeated run-ins with local police officers, including numerous arrests and convictions for petty theft, and motor vehicle offenses involving dishonesty (false registration stickers). The Ninth Circuit holds that the witness’s criminal record was constructively known to the AUSA, because it was known to the law enforcement officers with whom he worked in this case: the local police officers who had access to the computers that contained the witness’s lengthy arrest and conviction records.
United States v. Burke, 571 F.3d 1048 (10th Cir. 2009)

The notion that there is automatically no Brady violation if the information is disclosed during trial is false. The question regarding the remedy for late disclosure of Brady must be determined on a case-by-case basis. Late disclosure – even during trial – could have an impact on pretrial strategy, including what defenses to investigate and pursue. The question is whether the defendant was prejudiced and that cannot be determined based on a rule that immutably excuses tardiness that is remedied at the time of trial. It may be too late by then.

Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623 (7th Cir. 2007)

After the defendant was convicted and while his case was proceeding through post-conviction proceedings, the police became aware of information that substantially undermined the reliability of the verdict. The defendant was ultimately released when it was discovered that he was falsely convicted. In this civil case, he sued the police for withholding the information. The Seventh Circuit held that the police had a continuing duty under Brady to reveal the exculpatory information to the defendant during post-conviction proceedings.

United States v. Duval, 496 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2007)

The First Circuit criticized the government’s delayed disclosure of impeaching and exculpatory information and noted especially the agent’s apparent failure to take notes when interviewing witnesses if the witness did not make statements that were consistent with the theory of guilt (thus, turning over the agents’ reports did not fully reveal the extent of Brady information known to the agents). Harmless error.

United States v. Rodriguez, 496 F.3d 221 (2d Cir. 2007)

The government does not relieve itself of its Brady obligation by simply not taking notes of interviews with witnesses who provide information that is exculpatory. In this case, while being questioned by the government, a cooperating witness was asked (and responded affirmatively) that everything he said during his first interview with the agents was a complete lie. The defense requested information about that interview. The agents explained that no notes were taken of the interview. The Second Circuit held that a remand was required to determine exactly what the lies were and whether the lies were material to the testimony of the witness.

United States v. White, 492 F.3d 380 (6th Cir. 2007)

In this complex white collar fraud case, it became apparent post-trial that certain documents were not revealed to the defense prior to trial that might amount to Brady information. The appellate court remanded the case to the district court for a fuller evaluation of the information and to conduct an evidentiary hearing on the post-trial Brady claim. In response to the government’s claim that the defendants were on a fishing expedition, the appellate court responded that “the fish swim just below the surface of the pond and for reasons squarely within the government’s control, the waters run cloudy, rendering the defendants unable to discern the nature of the fish.”

United States v. Velarde, 485 F.3d 553 (10th Cir. 2007)
Post-trial, in preparation for a new trial motion, the trial court should have empowered the defendant to subpoena records relating to the government’s chief witness, whose prior inconsistent statements (or prior false accusations directed at others) were not disclosed to the defense prior to trial.

_Ferrara v. United States_, 456 F.3d 278 (1st Cir. 2006)

Twelve years ago, the defendant entered a guilty plea to a RICO case that charged various predicate offenses, including murder. A key witness for the government provided a statement implicating the defendant in one of the charged murders. Later, however, he recanted and told the AUSA and the case agents that the defendant was not involved in the murder. The AUSA and agents met once again with the witness and he recanted his recantation. The witness’s recantation was never provided to the defense, despite _Brady_ obligations that were ongoing pursuant to the Constitution and Local Rules. The defendant entered a guilty plea, though during the plea colloquy, he never admitted participation in the murder. Years later, the witness’s recantation was revealed. The District Court granted § 2255 relief. The First Circuit affirmed, concluding that the government’s conduct amounted to a violation of _Brady_ and amounted to gross governmental misconduct.

_United States v. Risha_, 445 F.3d 298 (3rd Cir. 2006)

The defendant claimed that information known to state authorities was improperly withheld from him prior to his federal trial and that this information was exculpatory. The Third Circuit set forth the factors to be considered when determining whether such information should have been disclosed, even assuming it was not actually known by the federal prosecutor. (1) Were investigative agents working in tandem? (2) Was there a joint investigation? (3) Was the information readily available to the federal prosecutor? The Third Circuit decided to remand the case to the district court for further consideration of these factors.

_United States v. Blanco_, 392 F.3d 382 (9th Cir. 2004)

The government’s failure to reveal that an informant had an ongoing relationship with the INS (in addition to the disclosed relationship with DEA) and that he had been given a “special parole visa” enabling him to remain in the U.S. was error that necessitated a remand for consideration of an appropriate remedy. The record in this case demonstrated that, at least to some extent, the DEA was intentionally withholding information from the AUSA. This, of course, is no defense to a _Brady_ violation. The duty under _Brady_ extends to the DEA and any other law enforcement agency involved in the prosecution of the defendant.

_United States v. Sipe_, 388 F.3d 471 (5th Cir. 2004)

The government’s failure to reveal that one of the government witnesses told the government that he “disliked” the defendant; as well as the “benefits” granted to numerous other government witnesses, amounted to a _Brady_ violation that required setting aside the conviction. The Fifth Circuit noted that evidence of guilt was “significant,” but that the withheld evidence, when considered in the totality, undermined confidence in the verdict.

A Brady violation may taint a guilty plea, though the information that was not disclosed in this case was not deemed to be material. The court noted that if there was a Brady violation, a motion to withdraw a guilty plea must be granted – the court need not evaluate prejudice to the government.

United States v. Pelullo, 105 F.3d 117 (3rd Cir. 1997)

Rough notes of law enforcement interviews of witnesses contained Brady information that was not disclosed to the defense prior to his first trial. The conviction in that trial was tainted by this Brady violation. Two more trials followed that initial trial. In the last trial, the defendant’s testimony from the first trial was introduced. The defendant claimed that but-for the Brady violation, he would not have testified at the first trial. See Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968). This was a valid argument, but required additional fact-finding by the lower court.

United States v. Tincher, 907 F.2d 600 (6th Cir. 1990)

Despite the defendant’s request for Jencks or Brady material, the government failed to disclose material which clearly fell within the scope of both requests. The prosecutor failed to disclose grand jury testimony of the agent who was testifying against the defendant. In light of the deliberate misrepresentation of the prosecutor, the conviction was reversed.

Miller v. Vasquez, 868 F.2d 1116 (9th Cir. 1989)

A police officer’s bad faith failure to collect evidence at the scene of a crime may constitute a Brady violation. A hearing is necessary to determine whether the failure to collect potential exculpatory evidence is a result of an investigator’s bad faith. In this case, the law enforcement officer failed to collect and analyze the blood stained jacket of the victim after interviewing her at her apartment less than twenty-four hours after the attack.

United States v. Brooks, 966 F.2d 1500 (D.C.Cir. 1992)

The prosecutor has the duty not only to turn over favorable evidence, but also in certain circumstances, to actually search for information which may be exculpatory, including searching files of other agencies. In this case, the testimony of the investigating officer from the defendant’s first trial was read at the second trial. Between the first and the second trial, the officer was shot and killed with her own service revolver in the presence of another officer. The AUSA should have searched the files of the Metropolitan D.C. Police files to determine if there was anything in those files relating to the officer’s death which would have cast doubt on her credibility. The court reviewed precedents from several other Circuits dealing with the duty of the AUSA to engage in a search for exculpatory evidence in certain circumstances. See, e.g., United States v. Auten, 632 F.2d 478 (5th Cir. 1980); United States v. Deutsch, 475 F.2d 55 (5th Cir. 1973); United States v. Perdomo, 929 F.2d 967 (3rd Cir. 1991); Carey v. Duckworth, 738 F.2d 875 (7th Cir. 1984).
BRADY

Floyd v. Vannoy, 894 F.3d 143 (5th Cir. 2018)

The defendant was convicted in state court of killing a man with whom he allegedly had a gay relationship. The deceased was found naked, in his room and there were two glasses of whiskey on the table. Another man was killed in almost identical circumstances, leading the police to charge the defendant with that murder, too. The defendant confessed to the murders. But he had a limited IQ and he was easily persuadable. The state failed to reveal that fingerprints on the whiskey glasses in both locations showed that fingerprints were neither the victims’, nor the defendants. This contradicted the defendant’s alleged confession. Moreover, a statement by the defendant’s friend, that he preferred having sex with black men, was not revealed to the defendant, and one of the victims was white. The failure to reveal this information violated Brady and required setting aside the conviction.

The Fourth Circuit remands this habeas case back to the district court for a full evidentiary hearing on the Brady claim that included proof of undisclosed impeachment evidence and undisclosed exculpatory evidence. The case contains a lengthy discussion of the standards for granting an evidentiary hearing (and the test for materiality) in a § 2254 case.

United States v. Cessa, 861 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2017)

Reviewing certain 302’s after trial, the Fifth Circuit holds that some of the information in the 302’s relating to a key government witness qualified as exculpatory and in some instances contradicted the testimony of the witness. The trial court’s failure to furnish these reports to the defense violated Brady. A remand was necessary to determine what relief was appropriate.

Dennis v. Secretary, Pa. Dept. of Corrections, 834 F.3d 263 (3rd Cir. 2016)

This 100+-page en banc opinion results in granting habeas relief to a defendant sentenced to death for a murder over twenty years previously, based on Brady violations. The defendant approached two girls as they exited a Philadelphia subway and ripped the earrings off one of the girls and then shot and killed her. The defendant gave a statement that at the time of the shooting he was on a bus returning to his apartment complex and saw a girl he knew and waved at her. The girl gave a statement (and testified) that she remembered seeing him, but it was two hours later than he claimed, based on her chronology of activities that day (including picking up her welfare check at 3:03 that afternoon). After trial, it was revealed that she actually picked up her check at 1:03 that afternoon, which would have more-closely aligned with the chronology of the defendant’s statement (and would have significantly impeached the chronology that the witness provided at trial). The police had a copy of the proof of the time the girl picked up her check but did not reveal it to the defense. In addition, another witness told her parents that night of the shooting that she recognized the assailant from her high school, but the defendant did not attend that witness’s high school. At trial, the witness positively identified the defendant as the shooter. The police did not reveal this inconsistency to the defense. Finally, a jailhouse informant was told by a cellmate that he was the perpetrator. The police did not reveal this to the defense. This case is a hornbook of Brady law in the context of AEDPA review.
United States v. Pasha, 797 F.3d 1122 (D.C. Cir. 2015)

A criminal defense attorney and two investigators (both of whom were women) were prosecuted for obstruction of justice based on their effort to fabricate evidence to support a client’s defense. A witness to the events involving the fabrication had told the AUSA and law enforcement officers that he saw one man and one woman entering the house where the fabricated evidence was filmed. This statement was revealed just prior to trial (eight months after the witness’s interview). This statement was exculpatory, because both investigators (defendants) were women (mother and daughter). The AUSA then interviewed the witness again, and this time, he said that there were two women. The district court judge expressed concern that there was a Brady violation caused by the delay in furnishing to the defense the interview in a timely manner and by the time of trial, the witness’s memory was different. The district court wrote, “At the moment the eyewitness said the two individuals who arrived at the photo shoot were a man and a woman (rather than two women), ‘counsel for the Government should have understood that as soon as they were finished talking with that gentleman, they had an obligation to give that information to the defense.’” The district court ultimately held that the Brady violation was not prejudicial. The D.C. Circuit reversed: The failure to turn over the favorable interview in a timely manner was prejudicial and denied the defense the opportunity to obtain a sworn statement from the witness to preserve that testimony (and his memory). Not only did this taint the trial, but the remedy might be dismissal of the indictment, because now even more time passed since the witness made the exculpatory statement and there might be no way to recreate his favorable memory. The remedy decision needed to be made in the first instance by the district court on remand.

Comstock v. Humphries, 786 F.3d 701 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant acknowledged pawning a ring. The owner of the ring told the police that the ring was stolen, though it was possible that he mistakenly left the ring outside when he was cleaning his motorcycle. The prosecution neglected to tell the defendant of the “victim’s” alternative possibility. This was Brady information. The failure to disclose the information required setting aside the verdict.

Gumm v. Mitchell, 775 F.3d 345 (6th Cir. 2014)

The police were aware that witnesses had identified another perpetrator of the offense and that the other person had told the witnesses that he was the perpetrator. Failing to reveal this information to the defendant violated Brady and was material, even though the defendant confessed to the crime. The court noted that even inadmissible evidence must be disclosed if it can lead to admissible evidence and is material, although it concluded that the admissible information that was not disclosed was sufficient to merit habeas relief. In a related case, Bies v. Sheldon, 775 F.3d 386 (6th Cir. 2014), which involved the conviction of the co-defendant, the Sixth Circuit held that evidence about the shoddy investigation and the failure to follow up on leads would also have been admissible evidence and the failure to reveal this information was also a Brady violation.

Aguilar v. Woodford, 725 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 2013)

Someone exited a white Volkswagon and killed the victim. A “scent dog” indicated that the defendant had recently been in the Volkswagon and this was the strongest evidence linking the defendant to the crime. The state knew, however, that the dog had made false “scent” identifications in the past and, in fact, the dog evidence had been excluded previously in another case. This information was not revealed to the defense. The Ninth Circuit ordered that the writ be granted.

United States v. Tavera, 719 F.3d 705 (6th Cir. 2013)

Just prior to trial the AUSA interviewed the co-defendant, who entered a plea agreement and was told that the defendant was ignorant about the drugs in the truck. Later, the co-defendant changed his statement and said that the defendant was aware of the drugs in the truck. The co-defendant did not testify at trial. This was not disclosed to the defense. This was a Brady violation that required vacating the conviction. (The court also ordered the U.S. Attorney’s Office to investigate why this information was not revealed to the defense prior to trial). The Sixth Circuit rejected the government’s argument that the defendant had a due diligence obligation to learn about the co-defendant’s statements that were made in connection with his guilty plea. The Sixth Circuit also noted that the fact that the evidence was sufficient to convict is not relevant to whether the suppressed statement was material.

United States v. Mahaffy, 693 F.3d 113 (2d Cir. 2012)

Investigative depositions that were obtained by the SEC (and shared with the prosecutors) of various witnesses, were never disclosed to the defense prior to this criminal securities fraud trial. The depositions contained information that was inconsistent with the government’s theory of the case regarding the confidentiality of information that the defendants’ disclosed. During trial, one of the SEC lawyers who was serving as a special AUSA expressly advised another AUSA that there was Brady information in the depositions. The recipient AUSA ignored the warning. Failure to reveal this information to the defense was a Brady violation that warranted setting aside the verdict. “Even if it is by no means certain that arguments based on wrongfully withheld evidence would have swayed the jury, it is a real enough possibility to undermine confidence in the verdict.” The court also noted that the fact that some of the evidence was not “admissible” is not fatal to a Brady claim, because the information may have led to admissible evidence. Additionally, the court noted that certain portions of the withheld depositions could have been used to “discipline” a witness who denied that the information in the deposition was accurate – in other words, the depositions could have been used to show a prior inconsistent statement if the witness had been called by the defense and testified inconsistent with the prior sworn testimony.

Goudy v. Basinger, 604 F.3d 394 (7th Cir. 2010)

The state court failed to consider the overall effect of the exculpatory information that was withheld in this Indiana prosecution. Under the Kyles standard, the suppressed evidence must be considered cumulatively. The suppressed evidence included misidentifications of the defendant; reports that implicated another gunman (the person who testified at trial that the defendant was the perpetrator), and other information that was inconsistent with the state’s theory at trial.
United States v. Johnson, 592 F.3d 164 (D.C. Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute heroin that was found in his room during a search conducted by the FBI. At some point prior to trial, the FBI learned from an informant who was working with the FBI in a large gang investigation, that another target in that case had told the informant that the drugs found in the defendant’s house actually belonged to the target and that the target’s mother had told the defendant’s mother that he (the defendant) had to “take the beef.” The government’s failure to reveal this information to the defense was a Brady violation necessitating a reversal of the conviction. The fact that the defendant “must have known” prior to trial that the drugs belonged to the other person does not negate the significance of the fact that the government was in possession of a witness statement in which the actual owner of the drugs confessed that the drugs were his.

Simmons v. Beard, 590 F.3d 223 (3rd Cir. 2009)

A number of Brady violations, when considered collectively (rather than in isolation) were sufficient to set aside the verdict. One witness was intimidated by law enforcement officers to cooperate, on threat of being prosecuted for murder; another witness made false statements on a firearm application (for which the prosecutor helped avoid a criminal prosecution); and another witness failed to pick the defendant out of book of mug shots. This information should have been provided to the trial attorneys.

United States v. Thompson (The Williams Companies Inc.), 562 F.3d 387 (D.C. Cir. 2009)

The corporation was under investigation by DOJ for price manipulation in the natural gas market and wire fraud. The corporation retained an outside law firm to conduct an internal investigation. Eventually, the results of the investigation were furnished to the government with a cover letter that provided that it was confidential and should not be disclosed to any other party or entity. The corporation was given a deferred prosecution agreement. An individual in the corporation was indicted. He sought the results of the internal investigation under Rule 16 and Brady. The D.C. Circuit held that the trial court was required to review the material and furnish any information to the defendant that would qualify as discoverable under Rule 16 or Brady. The corporation’s desire to maintain the confidentiality of the internal investigation did not trump the defendant’s due process and Rule 16 rights.

Jells v. Mitchell, 538 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 2008)

In this death penalty habeas case, the Sixth Circuit concluded that various witness statements that were withheld from the trial defense counsel undermined the prosecution’s theory of the events leading up to the murder of the victim, including whether the victim was randomly kidnapped off the streets of Cleveland, as opposed to voluntarily went with the defendant in his van, prior to the murder. This tainted the penalty phase of the trial.

United States v. Aviles-Colon, 536 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2008)

The DEA had a report documenting the statement of a confidential informant that the defendant and his alleged co-conspirator were actually part of rival gangs who were at war. Failing to produce this report to the defense was a Brady violation that required setting aside the conviction.
United States v. Garner, 507 F.3d 399 (6th Cir. 2007)

Just as the trial was beginning, the government furnished to the defense cell phone records that were obtained by the government several days earlier. The cell phone records belonged to the victim of the carjacking. The cell phone was stolen along with the car and the records apparently disclosed the identity of people that the perpetrator called. Failing to turn the records over to the defense violated Brady. Alternatively, the trial court should have granted a continuance to enable the defense to investigate the numbers called by the perpetrator.

Trammell v. McKune, 485 F.3d 546 (10th Cir. 2007)

Despite the fact that an eyewitness identified the defendant as the perpetrator of a car theft, Brady information that was in the possession of the police pointed the finger at another person who was the perpetrator (in fact, this was one of the people who identified the defendant as the culprit). Failing to reveal this other evidence was error requiring that the writ be granted.

United States v. Jernigan, 492 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2007)

In this en banc decision, the Ninth Circuit held that it was a Brady violation for the government to fail to reveal that after the defendant’s arrest, nearby banks had been robbed by a woman whose description bore a physical resemblance to the defendant. This case contains a useful discussion of the fallibility of eyewitness identification.

Graves v. Dretke, 442 F.3d 334 (5th Cir. 2006)

The prosecutor neglected to inform the defendant that on the day before the key prosecution witness testified, he told the prosecutor that he, the witness, alone was responsible for the murders and had also revealed previously that his wife was involved. The prosecutor also asked the witness at trial whether all of his statements consistently implicated the defendant (with one exception). The witness responded affirmatively, as did a police officer who was asked the same question. Yet, the witness had not been consistent and had exculpated the defendant and implicated his wife. The Brady violation necessitated reversing the conviction.

Ganttt v. Roe, 389 F.3d 908 (9th Cir. 2004)

The prosecutor failed to reveal certain investigative interviews conducted by the police that produced information inconsistent with the prosecution’s theory. The murder defendant had a matchbook on him at the time of his arrest. The state theorized that he took the matchbook from the victim during the course of the robbery that preceded the killing. But a phone number written on the matchbook was linked to a restaurant at which nobody knew the victim. The court noted that proof of the prosecutor’s “bad faith” is not important in considering a Brady violation. If the prosecutor, or a police officer involved in the case, has favorable information and it is not revealed to the defense, there has been a Brady violation, notwithstanding the prosecutor’s good faith.

United States v. Rivas, 377 F.3d 195 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with conspiring to possess cocaine on board a ship arriving in the U.S. The principal government witness was a shipmate who acknowledged participating in prior drug transactions with the defendant. One day prior to trial, he revealed to government agents that he had actually brought the drugs on board that were found in the defendant’s locker.
(though he did not change his story that the drugs belonged to the defendant). The defense questioned the witness at trial about the last time he talked to the government and he said that it was three days prior to trial. The government agents did not disclose the existence of the conversation the day prior to trial; nor the fact that the witness now admitted actually bringing the drugs on board for the defendant. The Second Circuit initially criticized the AUSA for not correcting the false statement of the witness about the last time he was debriefed by the government. The court then went on to hold that the undisclosed information was exculpatory and required reversal of the conviction. The government’s post-trial excuse in the lower court, “There was a tactical reason – having the witness recount his receipt of the narcotics might well have confused him” – was, in the words of the Second Circuit, “totally unacceptable.”

Cooper v. Woodford, 358 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant made a sufficient showing of actual innocence to support the filing of a successive habeas petition. Affidavits from two witnesses demonstrated that law enforcement officers withheld favorable evidence that may have exonerated the defendant.

Hall v. Director of Corrections, 343 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 2003)

At the defendant’s murder trial, an informant’s written questions to the defendant (with the defendant’s written answers) was introduced in evidence. Later, the informant conceded that he re-wrote the questions to make the answers look incriminating. For example, at trial, the question posed was “After you guys killed the girl, did you kill her brother, too?” to which the defendant answered, “possibly.” The informant later acknowledged, however, that the question the defendant answered (before the informant changed the written question) was “Do you think you will get any time on this case?” Though Brady and Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959), generally apply only when the prosecutor is aware of the false evidence, to allow this conviction to stand would violate due process.

Jaramillo v. Stewart, 340 F.3d 877 (9th Cir. 2003)

The state’s failure to reveal the existence of an eyewitness to the homicide was a Brady violation that necessitated granting a writ of habeas corpus, if the petitioner could prove in the district court the factual basis for his claim.

DiLosa v. Cain, 279 F.3d 259 (5th Cir. 2002)

The defendant was charged with murdering his wife and faking a home invasion by a black male. The state withheld evidence from the defense that certain hairs found at the scene were, in fact, non-Caucasian. In addition, a taxi driver testified that he saw two suspicious black men leaving the neighborhood early in the morning. The state habeas court erroneously concluded that there was no Brady violation, because the excluded evidence would not have resulted in an acquittal; the proper test focuses on whether the evidence cast the case in such a different light as to undermine confidence in the verdict.

United States v. Fernandez, 136 F.3d 1434 (11th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was alleged to have tipped off some drug smugglers about possible federal law enforcement surveillance. After trial, it was revealed that the CIA might have been involved in the drug smuggling venture, and therefore may have been the origin of the tip. A hearing was necessary to inquire into the facts of this claim.

United States v. Service Deli, Inc., 151 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 1998)
A government attorney interviewed a former president of the defendant corporation and took notes of the interview. A typewritten version of the interview was produced, but the appellate court concluded that the rough notes contained information not included in the typewritten summary and that the omitted information that was material and exculpatory.

United States v. Spagnoulo, 960 F.2d 990 (11th Cir. 1992)
A new trial was necessary in light of the government’s failure to produce to the defendant a psychiatric report relating to the defendant. While awaiting trial, the defendant attacked another inmate at the jail. He was examined by a government psychiatrist who concluded that he suffered from a psychiatric disorder. In his drug trial, he did not assert an insanity defense. Nevertheless, though the government’s failure to disclose the report to the defense was not intentional, this amounted to a Brady violation. The fact that the report was in the possession of the FBI agent, and not the prosecutor, is not pertinent. The agent was a member of the “prosecution team.” Also, the fact that the defendant was aware that he was examined by a psychiatrist is not relevant: he did not know of the existence of a report. Finally, materiality was established, because the report would have “altered the defense strategy and made an insanity defense a viable option.”

United States v. Severdija, 790 F.2d 1556 (11th Cir. 1986)
During the course of boarding a vessel which was found to contain 8,000 pounds of marijuana, one of the boarding Coast Guard officers wrote a note about interviewing the defendant. This report was not released until after the jury had returned a guilty verdict. The report by the customs officer was consistent with the defendant’s statement that he did not know that drugs were in the boat. The Eleventh Circuit reverses the conviction.

United States v. Udechukwu, 11 F.3d 1101 (1st Cir. 1993)
The defendant was arrested carrying heroin at the airport in Puerto Rico. She immediately agreed to cooperate and claimed that she had been coerced into carrying the drugs by a sinister drug dealer in Aruba. The government investigated the identity of the Aruba connection and in fact determined that this person existed and was the target of an ongoing investigation. This was not made known to the defense. During closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly expressed skepticism about this supplier, intimating that there was no such person, or that he was not whom the defendant claimed he was. This was prosecutorial misconduct necessitating a reversal. The improper withholding of Brady information, coupled with the misleading closing argument denied the defendant her due process rights.

Miller v. Angliker, 848 F.2d 1312 (2d Cir. 1988)
The defendant entered a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. The prosecutor had withheld evidence from the defense that another person may have been the perpetrator of the crime. The Second Circuit holds that this violates Brady. Although the defendant acknowledged that he was the perpetrator when he entered his not guilty by reason of insanity plea, that does not excuse the government’s failure to notify the defense that another suspect existed. At trial, the defendant was in fact found not guilty by reason of insanity and committed to a mental institution. Nevertheless, the Second Circuit vacates the plea holding that the Brady violation violated the defendant’s right to due process.

_Guerra v. Johnson_, 90 F.3d 1075 (5th Cir. 1996)

The district court made findings — and they were supported in the record — that the state withheld exculpatory evidence from the defendant, including statements from witnesses who claimed that it was defendant’s colleague and not the defendant, who shot and killed the police officer. The district court also found that witnesses were threatened by the police to implicate the defendant and not the colleague (who was shot by police shortly after the police officer was killed). Because the district court’s findings were not clearly erroneous, the Fifth Circuit affirmed.

_Clemmons v. Delo_, 124 F.3d 944 (8th Cir. 1997)

The state withheld Brady information from the defense in this death penalty case, specifically, evidence that someone other than the defendant committed the prison murder. The conviction was set aside.

_United States v. Wood_, 57 F.3d 733 (9th Cir. 1995)

Though the prosecutor was not aware of the existence of information in the files of the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) which cast doubt on the nature of the substance which the defendant was charged with distributing, the FDA itself was certainly aware of this information. “For Brady purposes, the FDA and the prosecutor were one . . . Under Brady the agency charged with administration of the statute which has consulted with the prosecutor in the steps leading to the prosecution is to be considered as part of the prosecution in determining what information must be made available to the defendant charged with violation of the statute. The government cannot with its right hand say it has nothing, while its left hand holds what is of value.”

_United States v. Barton_, 995 F.2d 931 (9th Cir. 1993)

The government’s destruction of evidence prior to an evidentiary hearing on a motion to suppress (alleging a Franks v. Delaware violation) must be analyzed under the principles of Brady and Arizona v. Youngblood to determine if the defendant’s right to due process has been violated. Thus, if the evidence was exculpatory — in the sense of supporting the Franks violation — and the government acted in bad faith in destroying the evidence, a due process violation might be found.

_Banks v. Reynolds_, 54 F.3d 1508 (10th Cir. 1995)

The prosecutor failed to reveal to the defense that another person had previously been arrested for the murder which the defendant now stood accused. In addition, eyewitnesses had identified the other suspects as having been at the location of the crime shortly before the homicide. This information, too, was withheld from the defense. This was a Brady violation which necessitated granting a new trial to the defendant, who had been sentenced to death.

_United States v. Robinson_, 39 F.3d 1115 (10th Cir. 1994)

During the trial, the prosecutor interviewed a witness who claimed to have seen one person retrieve the drugs which were the subject of this prosecution. The prosecutor told defense counsel that the person he interviewed could not identify the person who retrieved the drugs. Actually, the witness did provide some identifying characteristics of the person who retrieved the drugs and the description clearly did not identify the defendant. In the context of this case, this evidence, had it been disclosed to the defense, may well have altered the result of the trial.

Bowen v. Maynard, 799 F.2d 593 (10th Cir. 1986)

The defendant should have been provided with the name of an early suspect in this case who had an equally valid motive to commit the murder. The failure to disclose this individual to the defendant required the granting of a habeas petition six years later.

United States v. Alzate, 47 F.3d 1103 (11th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was intercepted at the Miami airport attempting to smuggle a kilogram of cocaine into the country. His sole defense was duress. He claimed that he owed certain people in Colombia money and they threatened to kill him if he did not bring the suitcase from Colombia to Miami. At trial, the government introduced evidence that the defendant made a remark when he was arrested that carrying a quantity of cocaine to the United States might be worth $8,000.00. The defendant contended at trial that this was in response to the agent’s question about another quantity of cocaine which had been seized that day and which was on the table in the room where he was being interrogated. The prosecutor disputed this explanation at trial, arguing to the court, the jury, and in cross-examination of the defendant, that there was no other seizure that day, there was no cocaine other than the defendant’s sitting on the table, and that this was all the defendant’s fabricated explanation for his statement. Prior to the close of the evidence, the agent determined that there was another seizure that day, and the cocaine was sitting on the table in the room where the interrogation was taking place. The agent told this to the AUSA who decided not to reveal this information to the court or the defense. This was a Brady violation which warranted a new trial. Under the general Brady standard, the standard of materiality is as follows: evidence is material if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different. A ‘reasonable probability’ is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome. This case, however, involves the prosecutor making false statements to the court and the jury and failing to correct them when he learned that they were false. In this type of case, the proper question is whether the false testimony “could have” affected the judgment of the jury. The withheld evidence met that standard in this case. The court concluded, “It may be that Alzate will be convicted after a fair trial. We do not know, but we do know that he has not yet had one.”

United States v. Lloyd, 71 F.3d 408 (D.C.Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with aiding others in the preparation of false tax returns. He requested an opportunity to see the others’ tax returns for prior years to see if the same false statements were contained in those returns. The trial court decided that the defendant was not entitled to see the tax returns for the previous years. Even though it was the judge, and not the prosecutor who “withheld” the exculpatory information in this context, it was still a Brady violation and the conviction would be reversed. The court pointed out that Brady violations do not focus on the bad faith of the prosecutor; the issue is whether materially exculpatory information was withheld from the defendant, thereby meeting the standard that there was a reasonable probability that the result would have been different.
In a per curiam opinion issued without full briefing, the Supreme Court ordered a new trial for the petitioner in this Louisiana death penalty case. The state failed to reveal to the defense that one prosecution witness had told another inmate that he wanted the defendant to get the death penalty because the defendant had “jacked me over.” The state was also aware that that witness had coached another witness to lie. Another prosecution witness had twice sought a deal to reduce his existing sentence in exchange for testifying against the defendant. Another person who was described by the first witness as having been involved in the murder had recently had knee surgery (prior to the murder), which arguably made it unlikely that he was able to run, or lift any heavy weight, which was inconsistent with the first witness’s trial testimony. The Court held that the newly revealed evidence sufficed to undermine confidence in Wearry’s conviction. “The State’s trial evidence resembled a house of cards, built on the jury crediting the witness’s account rather than the defendant’s alibi.” “Even if the jury – armed with all of this new evidence – could have voted to convict Wearry, we have no ‘confidence that it would have done so.’” The Court also emphasized that Brady applies to information known to the police, even if it is not known to the prosecutor. Slip op. at 8, footnote 8.

The Supreme Court holds – in an 8-1 decision – that withholding from the defense a report that showed that the one eye-witness previously failed to identify the defendant was a Brady violation requiring that the conviction be set aside. The witness was portrayed by the state prosecutor (in New Orleans) as having consistently identified the defendant as the perpetrator of the quintuple murder, when, in fact, he had previously failed to identify the defendant.

Juniper v. Zook, --- F.3d --- (4th Cir. 2017)
The Fourth Circuit remands this habeas case back to the district court for a full evidentiary hearing on the Brady claim that included proof of undisclosed impeachment evidence and undisclosed exculpatory evidence. The case contains a lengthy discussion of the standards for granting an evidentiary hearing (and the test for materiality) in a § 2254 case.

Thomas v. Westbrooks, 849 F.3d 659 (6th Cir. 2017)
After a key witness testified for the federal government in a federal prosecution of the defendant for robbing and shooting an armored car driver, she was given $750 by the FBI as a reward. The defendant was later prosecuted in state court for the murder of the driver. The reward money was not revealed to the defense. During her testimony, the witness denied receiving any reward and the prosecutor emphasized that the witness was only testifying because it was “the right thing to do.” The Sixth Circuit vacated the conviction based on the Brady / Agurs violation.

United States v. Yepiz, 848 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2016)
The Ninth Circuit rejects the government’s argument that undisclosed evidence of money paid to an informant did not merit a new trial simply because the witness was otherwise impeached. The Ninth Circuit held that the additional impeachment evidence may have been sufficient to lead the jury to disbelieve the entirety of the witness’s testimony.

Dennis v. Secretary, Pa. Dept. of Corrections, 834 F.3d 263 (3rd Cir. 2016)
See discussion in the topic Brady (Other Exculpatory Information, above)

Fuentes v. Griffin, 829 F.3d 233 (2d Cir. 2016)
A witness’s psychiatric problems should be revealed to the defense if known by the prosecution and the failure to do so, like here, constitutes a Brady violation that necessitates granting a writ of habeas corpus. This was a rape case in which the “victim” had a psychiatric consult when she went to the hospital to report the rape and the record of that consult revealed that she was depressed for the past two years, she did not report that she was raped, she had problems living at home with her mother and she was a drug abuser.

United States v. Dvorin, 817 F.3d 438 (5th Cir. 2016)
The defendant was charged with bank fraud. After he was convicted, the government filed notice that it realized it had failed to reveal a part of a witness’s plea agreement. The conviction was set aside and the defendant was tried again. The issue in this case – the appeal of the second conviction – was whether sanctions against the prosecutor were appropriate and whether the second trial should have been barred based on the misconduct. Here is the background: A key prosecution witness was a co-conspirator. His plea agreement had a sealed addendum which provided that if he cooperated, his testimony could not be used against him at sentencing and the government, in its sole discretion, would file a motion to reduce the sentence. This document was not disclosed to the defense at trial and the witness testified that he hoped for a reduced sentence or leniency, but did not acknowledge the existence of the sealed agreement. The Fifth Circuit held that the document was not equally accessible to the defense, because it was sealed. Therefore, it was “suppressed.” The Court also held that it should have been furnished to the defense, because it qualified as material: the witness knew that the government had committed in writing to reduce the sentence if he satisfied the government’s standard of cooperation and also that his testimony could not be used against him. The court, quoting United States v. Bagley, noted, “the fact that the government's willingness to seek leniency for a defendant is not guaranteed, but “was expressly contingent on the [g]overnment's satisfaction with the end result, serve[s] only to strengthen any incentive to testify falsely in order to secure a conviction.” The court also held that the testimony satisfied the Napue standard, because the witness did not acknowledge the existence of the agreement and the government failed to correct this false testimony.

Shelton v. Marshall, 796 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2015)
In this state murder prosecution, the prosecutor failed to reveal to the defense that part of the deal with the key prosecution witness was that he would not obtain a competency test until after he testified. This was a Brady violation that necessitated setting aside the conviction. The prosecutor’s doubt about the witness’s mental competency should have been revealed to the defense.
United States v. Parker, 790 F.3d 550 (4th Cir. 2015)

The prosecution failed to reveal the existence of an SEC fraud investigation that was being pursued against a prosecution witness. The evidence of the fraud investigation would have been admissible to show the bias of the witness and motive to testify for the government. The information may also have been admissible pursuant to Rule 608(b).

United States v. Flores-Rivera, 787 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2015)

The lead cooperator in the case wrote a letter to the AUSA expressing concern about his girlfriend (and his desire that she be permitted to visit him in jail) and also about his children and requested that the prosecutor assist him in these matters. He also provided notes of conversations with other co-conspirators in the jail (who also testified at defendant’s trial). These notes were given to the prosecutor. At trial, the witness denied ever discussing testimony with the other witnesses. Finally, the agents’ rough notes of interviews with the witnesses contained additional impeaching information that was not revealed to the defense prior to trial. The First Circuit concluded that it was reasonably probable that the impeachment evidence would have caused the jury to acquit two of the defendants.

Amado v. Gonzalez, 758 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2014)

The state’s failure to reveal impeaching evidence about a key prosecution witness was a Brady violation that necessitated setting aside the murder conviction in this case. The witness actually balked at testifying at trial, so his earlier statement to the police was read by the officer who interviewed the witness. The prosecution failed to reveal that the witness was on probation for a robbery offense and that he was a member of a rival gang at the time he made the statement to the police. The state appellate court rejected the Brady claim on the basis that the trial attorney could have found the information and thus it was not “withheld” by the prosecution. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant does not have the duty to seek exculpatory or impeaching information; the prosecution has the duty to produce it. There is no “due diligence” requirement imposed on the defense when it comes to Brady or Giglio information. In addition, citing Kyles v. Whitley, the court held that the prosecutor had a duty to locate and reveal this information, even if it was not literally in the prosecutor’s file: “[b]ecause the prosecution is in a unique position to obtain information known to other agents of the government, it may not be excused from disclosing what it does not know but could have learned.”

United States v. Sedaghaty, 728 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with tax violations, but the focus of the trial was on the defendant’s activities that supposedly involved funding terrorists. A key witness for the government testified about the defendant’s desire to fund the terrorists. The government failed to reveal various interview notes with this witness and the fact that the witness was offered money by the FBI and her husband was offered substantial payments by the FBI. The district court denied the post-trial Brady motion, finding that the undisclosed information was clearly Brady (both the contents of the undisclosed interview notes, as well as the financial payments that were made and offered) and important to that witness’s credibility, but that the witness’s testimony related only to the reason the tax law violations occurred (in order to fund terrorists), whereas the charges focused on the fact that tax laws were violated regardless of the underlying motivation. The Ninth Circuit reversed and ordered a new trial: throughout the trial, the government trumpeted the terrorism-related purpose for the defendant’s conduct, repeatedly referring to terrorists, Bin-Laden, and other terrorist organizations and terrorist training camps.

_Browning v. Trammell_, 717 F.3d 1092 (10th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was sentenced to death for killing his girlfriend’s parents. The girlfriend was a key witness for the prosecution. The state had psychiatric records relating to the girlfriend in its possession (sent to the state by the girlfriend’s lawyer) that showed that she was severely mentally ill, including suffering from magical thinking and blurring of reality and fantasy. These records were not revealed to defense counsel. The Tenth Circuit affirmed the lower court’s granting a writ of habeas corpus.

_Milke v. Ryan_, 711 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was convicted of murdering her child. The only evidence supporting the conviction was a confession given to Officer Saldate. No recording of the confession was made and the defendant denied confessing to the officer. The state failed to reveal to the defense the fact that the Officer had been found to have lied about confessions on four separate occasions; that several other confessions had been suppressed based on courts finding violations of the accused’s Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights; that he had been suspended for taking “liberties” with a female motorist that he had stopped. More information was probably also available to the prosecution about the officer, none of which was revealed to the defense. The Ninth Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus based on the _Brady_ violation. The lengthy opinion documents the acts of misconduct by the officer, as well as the prosecutors, some of whom were actually aware of the officer’s checkered past, and others of whom failed to reveal the information even after the conviction was being challenged in state habeas proceedings.

_Johnson v. Folino_, 705 F.3d 117 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The state prosecutor failed to disclose voluminous amounts of information about the state’s key witness’s involvement in other crimes that should have been revealed to the defense. Though the information did not relate to convictions, the information may have led to admissible evidence and may have been effectively used in cross examination to establish the witness’s reasons for providing information to the police.

_Wolfe v. Clarke_, 691 F.3d 410 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was convicted of murder and given the death penalty. A principal witness at trial was a man named Barber, who was hired by Wolfe to kill the victim. When Barber was first arrested and before he implicated Wolfe in the murder, he was told by a police officer that if he implicated Wolfe, he (Barber) could avoid the death penalty. This conversation was memorialized in a police report that was never produced to the defense. This was a _Brady_ violation that required granting the writ as to the conviction and sentence. The Fourth Circuit also held that the conviction for being involved in a drug conspiracy would also be vacated, because had the _Brady_ information been disclosed, the defendant would likely not have testified at the trial and would not have been in the position of having to deny guilt of the murder, while admitting his role in the drug conspiracy.
Guzman v. Secretary, Dept. of Corrections, 663 F.3d 1336 (11th Cir. 2011)

A police officer testified falsely about whether any benefit had been provided to a key witness. The police denied that any benefit had been provided, but, in fact, the officer had given the witness, a crack addict, $500.00. The prosecutor was not aware of this benefit and was not aware that the officer testified falsely. Nevertheless, the knowledge (and false testimony) of the officer was attributed to the prosecutor and a new trial was ordered. This case contains a thorough review of the “materiality” standard for gauging Giglio violations post-conviction.

Sivak v. Hardison, 658 F.3d 898 (9th Cir. 2011)

The state’s failure to reveal certain benefits that the jailhouse snitch received from the prosecution (favorable parole letters) and the fact that the snitch lied as a witness about these benefits necessitated that the death sentence be set aside.

United States v. Kohring, 637 F.3d 895 (9th Cir. 2011)

The government failed to reveal to the defendant that a key prosecution witness was being investigated by state agents for child sex abuse offenses and efforts to obstruct justice in connection with those sex offenses. Though the trial court recognized that this evidence should have been disclosed, the trial court further held that the evidence would not have been admissible under Rule 403, because it would have confused the issues. The Ninth Circuit reversed. The evidence should have been disclosed and it would have been admissible to impeach the witness. This case contains a lengthy analysis of Brady violation jurisprudence, including the question when undisclosed impeaching evidence is “material” and sufficient to require a new trial. In one section of the decision, the court holds that the government’s failure to turn over investigators’ notes that revealed that the witness was having trouble remembering details of certain events was also a material Brady violation. In addition, emails between members of the prosecution team that might otherwise qualify as work product should have been disclosed, because the emails revealed exculpatory facts that were not otherwise revealed to the defendant.

The state prosecutor’s failure to reveal that a jailhouse witness (1) had requested a deal in exchange for his testimony, (2) had a prior conviction for a crime of assault with intent to rob, and (3) was the subject of a pending investigation for new charges, required that the writ be granted. The witness’s testimony was material even with regard to matters that he did not testify about, because if the witness was believed regarding matters that he did address, this meant that the defendant was lying, so that the defendant’s testimony on the other matters might also have been disbelieved by the jury.

Maxwell v. Roe, 628 F.3d 486 (9th Cir. 2010)

The state failed to reveal to the defense that the informant in this state murder prosecution had originally negotiated a certain deal in exchange for his testimony and that thereafter, the informant insisted on an even better deal in exchange for his testimony in the murder case. The informant also committed perjury during the course of his testimony, including about his background, his education, a conversation he had the with the prison rabbi about testifying against the defendant, as well as his history of providing “snitch” evidence in other cases. This case contains an extensive discussion of the perils of jailhouse informant testimony.
Simmons v. Beard, 590 F.3d 223 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The prosecution’s failure to reveal that a key witness had been pressured to cooperate with the police (and to surreptitiously record the defendant, albeit unsuccessfully) prior to his arrest violated Brady. At trial, the witness appeared to willingly condemn her boyfriend, which could have been rebutted, if the defense knew that she had been pressured to cooperate. Another witness had lied on an application to purchase a firearm, and the prosecution had helped her avoid liability for this offense. This evidence had also been withheld from the defense. New trial ordered.

Robinson v. Mills, 592 F.3d 730 (6th Cir. 2010)

The state’s failure to reveal that an eyewitness to the murder was also a confidential informant at the time that she witnessed the crime and at the time she testified at trial was a Brady violation that required granting the writ. The status of the witness would have demonstrated that she had a bias in favor of the prosecution; and the jury may have discounted the testimony of an informant more than a disinterested witness.

Wilson v. Beard, 589 F.3d 651 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The prosecution failed to turn over to the defense a key witness’s rap sheet; another witness’s financial relationship to the lead detective (i.e., the detective was giving loans to the witness in his capacity as an informant) and medical records and mental health records regarding another witness. The medical records would have been admissible to demonstrate the witness’s ability to perceive. The fact that the rap sheet was a matter of public record does not absolve the prosecution of its duty to furnish the information to the defense. All of these Brady violations required granting the writ.

United States v. Torres, 569 F.3d 1277 (10th Cir. 2009)

The government produced certain information about the testifying C.I., but failed to reveal that she had worked for the government as a C.I. previously and had “fallen off the wagon” and committed offenses while a C.I. that led to criminal prosecutions. Because the C.I.’s credibility was a central issue in this case, the failure to disclose this information was a reversible Brady violation.

Drake v. Portuondo, 553 F.3d 230 (2d Cir. 2009)

The state relied on an expert who testified about his various credentials, as well as his involvement in the investigation of this murder case. His testimony was false in virtually all respects. He was not an expert (he was a lab technician) and he had reviewed the evidence for the state for a period of time quite different than his testimony suggested. The state may not have known the extent to which he lied about his credentials, but it did know about the amount of time he had spent reviewing the evidence. In addition, the state prosecutor knew that the expert was not a “published scholar” but asked at trial whether the witness had “written papers in his field” to which the witness answered in the affirmative (technically, this was true, but nothing had been published). The Second Circuit granted the writ based on the state’s failure to reveal the perjurious nature of the “expert” at trial.
United States v. Banks, 546 F.3d 507 (7th Cir. 2008)

A crime lab expert testified at trial about the nature of the substance tested, as well as its weight. Unbeknownst to the prosecutor and the defendant (but known to the DEA), the expert was under investigation by the DEA for misuse of a government credit card. At the point she testified, she did not know the outcome of this investigation. Shortly thereafter, she received an informal reprimand. When the defendant learned about this after trial, he moved for a new trial and the trial court granted the motion. The Seventh Circuit affirmed, holding that the district judge was within the bounds of his discretion in granting the new trial based on this Brady violation.

Silva v. Brown, 416 F.3d 980 (9th Cir. 2005)

As part of a plea agreement, a witness and the state agreed that the witness would not undergo psychological testing until after he testified at the defendant’s trial. Failing to disclose this part of the deal to the defendant was a Brady violation that necessitated granting a writ of habeas corpus. Evidence of a witness’s competence (or lack thereof) is critically important impeaching information that should not be hidden from the defense. See also Benn v. Lambert, 283 F.3d 1040 (9th Cir. 2002) (holding that undisclosed evidence of a crucial government witness’s drug use during the defendant’s trial was material because it would reflect on that witness’s competence and credibility as a witness).

Conley v. United States, 415 F.3d 183 (1st Cir. 2005)

The government failed to reveal an FBI report of interview that contained a witness statement that was inconsistent with his trial testimony. The witness stated during the interview that he was uncertain about what he observed at the crime scene and his request to be hypnotized to help him recall. At trial he expressed no uncertainty. The failure to reveal this information was a Brady violation that necessitated a new trial.

United States v. Sipe, 388 F.3d 471 (5th Cir. 2004)

The government’s failure to reveal that one of the government witnesses told the government that he “disliked” the defendant; as well as the “benefits” granted to numerous other government witnesses, amounted to a Brady violation that required setting aside the conviction. The Fifth Circuit noted that evidence of guilt was “significant,” but that the withheld evidence, when considered in the totality, undermined confidence in the verdict.

United States v. Jackson, 345 F.3d 59 (2d Cir. 2003)

Brady applies to information about declarants who do not testify, but whose out-of-court statements are introduced in evidence.

Norton v. Spencer, 351 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003)

Affidavits from the alleged child molestation victim’s mother and sibling claimed that the allegations were false. The state did not reveal these affidavits to the defendant prior to the state trial. Habeas granted.

Silva v. Woodford, 279 F.3d 825 (9th Cir. 2002)
An evidentiary hearing was necessary to inquire into the facts of defendant’s Brady claim. The defendant claimed that a co-defendant who testified for the state had severe mental problems. In fact, the co-defendant’s attorney had intended to have his client’s competency evaluated, but was encouraged by the state (and there was an agreement between the co-defendant and the state) to wait until after the co-defendant testified at the defendant’s trial. The Ninth Circuit held that if this claim was shown to be true at an evidentiary hearing, the conviction would have to be set aside.

East v. Johnson, 123 F.3d 235 (5th Cir. 1997)

During the sentencing phase of the defendant's death penalty trial, the state called a witness who claimed that the defendant had brutally raped her, threatened to kill her, and revealed that he had killed other witnesses. The state failed to reveal to the defendant the witness's rap sheet. Had the defendant seen the rap sheet and investigated the witness's prior arrest, he would have discovered that she had been declared incompetent to stand trial because she experienced bizarre sexual hallucinations and believed that unidentified individuals were attempting to kill her. The psychiatric report further concluded that the witness was incapable of distinguishing between reality and fantasies caused by her hallucinations. This undisclosed impeaching information may well have had an impact on the jury's evaluation of the witness's credibility and this witness's testimony was significant in the death penalty presentation of the state. The sentence was vacated on the basis of this Brady violation.

Carriger v. Stewart, 132 F.3d 463 (9th Cir. 1997)

The state's star witness in this death penalty prosecution was a witness with a long history of lying to the police and blaming others for crimes he committed. The court quoted from its earlier opinion in United States v. Bernal-Obeso, 989 F.2d 331 (9th Cir. 1993): "[Informants granted immunity are] by definition . . . cut from untrustworthy cloth[,] and must be managed and carefully watched by the government and the courts to prevent them from falsely accusing the innocent, from manufacturing evidence against those under suspicion of crime, and from lying under oath in the courtroom . . . . Because the government decides whether and when to use such witnesses, and what, if anything, to give them for their service, the government stands uniquely positioned to guard against perfidy. . . . Accordingly, we expect prosecutors and investigators to take all reasonable measures to safeguard the system against treachery. This responsibility includes the duty as required by Giglio to turn over to the defense in discovery all material information casting a shadow on a government witness's credibility." The court also stressed that the government cannot avoid its obligation with the excuse that it did not possess the relevant files relating to their witness. When the state relies on a witness who has an extensive criminal record, the state has the burden to investigate prison records, and any information contained therein that might bear on the witness's credibility.

The prosecutor has the duty not only to turn over favorable evidence, but also in certain circumstances, to actually search for information which may be exculpatory, including searching files of other agencies. In this case, the testimony of the investigating officer from the defendant’s first trial was read at the second trial. Between the first and the second trial, the officer was shot and killed with her own service revolver in the presence of another officer. The AUSA should have searched the files of the Metropolitan D.C. Police files to determine if there was anything in those files relating to the officer’s death which would have cast doubt on her credibility. The court reviewed precedents from several other Circuits dealing with the duty of the AUSA to engage in a search for exculpatory evidence in certain circumstances. See, e.g., United States v. Auten, 632 F.2d 478 (5th Cir. 1980); United States v. Deutsch, 475 F.2d 55 (5th Cir. 1973); United States v. Perdomo, 929 F.2d 967 (3rd Cir. 1991); Carey v. Duckworth, 738 F.2d 875 (7th Cir. 1984).

United States v. Perdomo, 929 F.2d 967 (3rd Cir. 1991)

There was no evidence of a prosecution witness’s record in the NCIC; however, the local records (in the Virgin Islands) contained a criminal record of the witness. The prosecutor had the duty to ascertain whether such a record existed. (Virgin Island records are not contained in the NCIC). The fact that the public defender’s office had previously represented the witness – and the defendant in this case was also represented by the PD’s office – does not alter the result.

Carter v. Rafferty, 826 F.2d 1299 (3rd Cir. 1987)

The Third Circuit affirmed the district court’s grant of a habeas petition to Hurricane Carter twenty years after he was convicted of murder. The Third Circuit agrees with the district court that the government’s failure to produce information that the star prosecution witness was utterly incapable of telling the truth represented a violation of the defendant’s due process rights under Brady. The evidence withheld in this case was the lie detector report which revealed that the witness did not tell the truth. The court holds that lie detector reports of tests administered to a prosecution witness are material for purposes of Brady.

United States v. Kelly, 35 F.3d 929 (4th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was convicted of kidnapping. He had been retained by a woman to “recover” her daughter from a cult. He approached a woman, who identified herself as being the daughter, and brought her to the mother. The mother said that this was the wrong person. The “victim” was then returned to the place from which she was taken. The “victim” was another member of the cult and was also under investigation by the Feds for money laundering, CTR violations and filing false loan applications to a bank. At trial, she answered questions about the loan application falsely and the government failed to correct this testimony. Also, there were Brady violations: the government failed to disclose the extent of the victim’s participation in the cult, the true scope of her criminal conduct which was under investigation (including a search warrant affidavit which supported a search of her house) and the various false statements she had made to her employer, the EPA, to which she had lied about her health in order to use several months of paid sick leave – while she continued to work at other jobs.

Jean v. Rice, 945 F.2d 82 (4th Cir. 1991)

Prior to being hypnotized, the rape victim could not identify the defendant as the assailant. After being hypnotized, she could. The state was under a duty, pursuant to Brady, to disclose the tapes and other documents of the hypnosis sessions.

McDowell v. Dixon, 858 F.2d 945 (4th Cir. 1988)

Only one eyewitness identified the defendant who assaulted the victim. First the eyewitness stated that the assailant was white, though the defendant was black; the eyewitness testified that the assailant had shoulder length hair, but later that he had an afro. The prosecutor failed to reveal the prior misidentifications. This violated Brady and requires reversal of the conviction.

East v. Johnson, 123 F.3d 235 (5th Cir. 1997)

The state failed to reveal a penalty-phase witness’s criminal record which, if disclosed, would also have led to the discovery of the witness’s considerable mental health problems. Withholding this Brady information resulted in unimpeached testimony that the defendant posed a significant risk of future dangerousness. The appellate court set aside the death sentence.

United States v. Minsky, 963 F.2d 870 (6th Cir. 1992)

It was a Brady violation to withhold from the defense the fact that a witness had previously lied to the FBI.

United States v. Kehm, 799 F.2d 354 (7th Cir. 1986)

The government should have revealed to the defendant that a prosecution witness had refused, either out of fear or friendship, to testify against a certain group of people. It was part of the witness’ immunity agreement that he would not be prosecuted, and not required to testify or make any statements against the group.

United States v. O’Conner, 64 F.3d 355 (8th Cir. 1995)

Several co-conspirators who agreed to cooperate with the government threatened other cooperating witnesses in order to “get their story straight.” These threats were known to the DEA and to the AUSA. Nevertheless, the defense was not informed of this information. With regard to the counts of conviction for which there was no corroborating evidence, the failure to disclose this information was reversible error.

United States v. Wayne, 903 F.2d 1188 (8th Cir. 1990)

Following his conviction on drug related counts, the defendant was granted a new trial on two counts because the government had withheld evidence critical to the cross-examination of a key government witness. The information suppressed was a record of drug transactions kept by a cooperating witness. However, the trial court did not err in not granting a new trial as to other counts which were not affected by the suppression of this information.

Reutter v. Solem, 888 F.2d 578 (8th Cir. 1989)

The key witness against the defendant in this drug prosecution was his former law partner and close friend. Unbeknownst to the defense, this witness, who was currently serving a term of imprisonment himself, had applied for commutation of his sentence and the State was actively supporting it. Furthermore, among the members of the commutation board was the prosecutor in defendant’s trial. None of this information was provided to the defense despite a request for all exculpatory and impeaching evidence. This Brady violation was aggravated by the prosecutor’s closing argument during which he argued that the witness had no reason whatsoever to lie and had nothing to gain from cooperating with the State. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Steinberg, 99 F.3d 1486 (9th Cir. 1996)

A confidential informant was involved in a drug transaction involving counterfeit money with the defendant. The government agent was aware, but did not tell the defense at trial (or the prosecutor), that the informant was also involved in unauthorized counterfeit transactions at the same time. Also, the government was aware that the informant owed money to the defendant, but did not reveal this information to the defense. This evidence was material, because the informant’s testimony at trial was critical, and this evidence would have undermined his credibility. The failure to reveal this information to the defense was reversible error.

United States v. Kojayan, 8 F.3d 1315 (9th Cir. 1993)

Three people were caught smuggling drugs. Two defendants went to trial, while the third provided information to the government. The cooperating individual did not testify. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the third individual could not be compelled to testify. This was not true; the witness had signed a cooperation agreement and the government withheld this from the defense and the jury. This type of misconduct on the part of the government necessitated reversing the conviction. The government made this argument in response to the defendant’s argument that the government failed to call the cooperating individual, and therefore the witness probably had nothing to say that was favorable to the government. The government’s response was untrue and thus unfairly undercut the defendant’s argument.

United States v. Bernal-Obeso, 989 F.2d 331 (9th Cir. 1993)

Just prior to trial, the government alerted the defense that an informant had killed two people several years earlier, but had never been charged with a crime. The defense learned that the informant had in fact pled guilty to two counts of manslaughter and asked the court to permit the defense additional time to determine the background, and also asked to be permitted to ask the informant why he lied to the DEA about his background. Both requests were denied by the trial court. The Ninth Circuit reversed. “We expect prosecutors and investigators to take all reasonable measures to safeguard the system against treachery (by informants) including turning over, as Giglio requires, all material information casting a shadow on an informant’s credibility.” The defendant should be permitted to question the informant, pursuant to Rule 608(b), about his lying to the DEA regarding his criminal record.

One informant for the government testified that he went to Bolivia and witnessed the source of the cocaine involved in the conspiracy alleged in this indictment. No other cocaine was introduced, seized, or known to have been in possession of any of the defendants. The prosecutor acknowledged in both his opening and his closing that the informant’s testimony was the key to the case. The prosecutor, however, failed to reveal to the defense a memorandum written by a DEA agent who severely criticized the operation and the credibility of the informant. Only a redacted version was provided to the defense. Among other things, the memorandum documented various false claims of the informant and his predilection to “run” the operation. The memorandum also revealed that the informant declined to make undercover calls to the supposed “higher-ups” who were involved in the smuggling venture. The memorandum also qualified as Jencks Act material of the author of the memorandum – the disgruntled DEA agent who testified on behalf of the government.

Smith v. Sec’y of New Mexico Dept. of Corrections, 50 F.3d 801 (10th Cir. 1995)

After a lengthy review of the evidence in this double murder prosecution, the court holds that Brady information was withheld from the defense and the writ of habeas corpus would be granted. Along the way, the court recognized that the withheld information did not have to be known to the prosecutor, as long as the police were aware of the favorable information. Also, the fact that the information is characterized as “impeachment” is not fatal to the Brady claim. Impeachment evidence can also undermine confidence in the verdict. Finally, the state’s claim that its “open file” policy satisfied its Brady obligation was not persuasive. Of course, if the information is not in the prosecutor’s file, it will not have been disclosed to the defense in the open file review. Here, the information (including impeachment information relating to the state’s key witness) was undeniably in the possession of the law enforcement agents who investigated the murder.

Though an evidentiary hearing was necessary to develop the facts, the defendant made a colorable claim that the government violated Brady by failing to disclose to the defense that just prior to being brought into the grand jury, the co-defendant told the prosecutor that the defendant was not guilty of the arson with which he was charged.

United States v. Cuffie, 80 F.3d 514 (D.C.Cir. 1996)

The defendant’s conviction was spoiled by a Brady violation: the government was aware that one of its witnesses, a police officer who pled guilty to drug offenses and was testifying pursuant to a plea agreement, had also perjured himself in a prior arrest expungement proceeding involving his cousin. Even though the witness was otherwise impeached at trial concerning his drug conviction and plea agreement, the evidence of prior perjury was material and could have substantially affected the efforts of defense counsel to impeach the witness. In short, this was a different – yet powerful – kind of impeachment (prior perjury) that was not otherwise available to the defense.

United States v. Smith, 77 F.3d 511 (D.C.Cir. 1996)

The government failed to reveal to the defense that one of the government’s witnesses had a D.C. Superior Court case dismissed against him and also had a psychiatric history. This was reversible error. Citing Kyles v. Whitley, the appellate court observed that in determining the materiality of the non-disclosed information, the lower court should not simply determine whether the evidence was still sufficient to convict the defendant if the witness whose history was not disclosed were ignored.
BRADY
(Perjured Testimony / Inconsistent Statement of Witness)

The state presented an eyewitness that testified about a carjacking (which later led to the killing of the driver). The witness testified that she had an exceptionally good memory about the event. The state did not disclose to the defense, however, that the eyewitness had previously stated that she did not have a clear memory of the event, that she thought it was simply a college prank, that her memory was "muddled", that she once said she could not identify anybody, and that she once stated she could not remember being at the abduction site. Though there was a reasonable possibility that disclosure of this information to the defense may have produced a different result, there was not a reasonable probability that disclosure would have produced a different result. This is the correct Brady standard and federal habeas relief was not granted.

The Supreme Court set aside a death sentence and remanded this case to the lower court for further consideration of the validity of the guilt-innocence judgment, based on the Brady violations. Specifically, the state failed to reveal to the defense that a witness was a paid informant (though the witness denied it at trial).

United States v. Walter, 870 F.3d 622 (7th Cir. 2017)

A government witness testified that he had stopped selling drugs and had quit the business and repented. The government knew, however, that this was untrue and that the witness was still selling drugs. Failing to correct this false testimony resulted in setting aside the conviction.

Haskell v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 866 F.3d 139 (3rd Cir. 2017)

The state’s witness in this murder case testified that she had no deal with the prosecution, which the prosecutor knew was not true. The false testimony was not corrected by the prosecutor. The Third Circuit ordered that the writ be granted. Under Napue, a conviction obtained by the knowing use of perjured testimony is fundamentally unfair, and must be set aside if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury. The same result obtains where the state although not soliciting false evidence, allows it to go uncorrected when it appears. Moreover, a conviction must be set aside even if the false testimony goes only to a witness’s credibility rather than the defendant’s guilt.

Long v. Butler, 809 F.3d 299 (7th Cir. 2015)

A witness gave a statement to the police that she saw the defendant shoot the victim. At defendant’s first murder trial, the witness testified that she did not see the defendant shoot the victim and that she had recanted and told the police that her initial statement was not accurate. At the defendant’s second trial, the witness testified that she did see the defendant shoot the victim. When cross-examined and asked about her prior recantation, the witness denied having recanted her identification. The prosecution failed to correct this perjurious testimony. The Seventh Circuit granted a writ. The prosecutor had a duty pursuant to Napue to correct this false testimony. The appellate court also held that the appellate counsel’s failure to raise this issue on appeal was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel.

Dow v. Virga, 729 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant, a suspect in a robbery, was placed in a line-up. He had a scar under his right eye. Prior to the witness being brought into the line-up room, the defendant’s lawyer asked that all the participants in the line-up wear a bandage under the right eye so that the defendant’s scar would not differentiate him from the other participants in the line-up. At trial, the prosecutor asked the police officer about what happened at the line-up and the officer responded that the defendant insisted that everybody wear a bandage under their right eye so as not to differentiate him. The officer knew, as did the prosecutor, that it was the defendant’s lawyer and not the defendant himself who made this request. In closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the defendant’s request revealed a consciousness of guilt. The Ninth Circuit held that this was a Napue error requiring that the conviction be set aside.

Guzman v. Secretary, Dept. of Corrections, 663 F.3d 1336 (11th Cir. 2011)

A police officer testified falsely about whether any benefit had been provided to a key witness. The police denied that any benefit had been provided, but, in fact, the officer had given the witness, a crack addict, $500.00. The prosecutor was not aware of this benefit and was not aware that the officer testified falsely. Nevertheless, the knowledge (and false testimony) of the officer was attributed to the prosecutor and a new trial was ordered. This case contains a thorough review of the “materiality” standard for gauging Giglio violations post-conviction.

Sivak v. Hardison, 658 F.3d 898 (9th Cir. 2011)

The state’s failure to reveal certain benefits that the jailhouse snitch received from the prosecution (favorable parole letters) and the fact that the snitch lied as a witness about these benefits necessitated that the death sentence be set aside.

United States v. Freeman, 650 F.3d 673 (7th Cir. 2011)

In this drug conspiracy trial, a key witness for the government described an important meeting that occurred among the conspirators that included specific identified people, at a specific location at a specific time. Prior to trial, one of the defense attorneys alerted the prosecutor to the fact that his client – one of the identified participants in this meeting – was in jail at the relevant time. The prosecutor forged on ahead, despite this warning. At trial, the witness was thoroughly cross-examined, but the prosecutor did not relent, until several weeks later, when he offered a stipulation that one of the participants in this supposed meeting was, in fact, in jail at the time. During closing argument, however, the prosecutor argued that this was a minor mistake that could easily be the result of faulty memory about the date of the meeting. The trial court granted a post-trial motion for new trial on the basis of this Napue violation and the Seventh Circuit affirmed.

Lambert v. Beard, 633 F.3d 126 (3rd Cir. 2011)

The key witness for the state in this murder prosecution (a co-conspirator) was thoroughly impeached with several prior inconsistent statements. One part of his testimony, however, remained constant and was not the subject of a prior inconsistent statement: the defendant and one other person were the perpetrators. However, the state had failed to produce one other prior inconsistent statement in which the witness identified another perpetrator. The Third Circuit held that even though the witness was “thoroughly” impeached with prior inconsistent statements, the undisclosed statement was significant and of a different nature than the impeachment evidence that was previously furnished. The Third Circuit granted the writ.
Ct. 1195 (2012). On remand, though, in an unpublished decision, the Third Circuit again granted

Maxwell v. Roe, 628 F.3d 486 (9th Cir. 2010)
The state failed to reveal to the defense that the informant in this state murder prosecution had originally negotiated a certain deal in exchange for his testimony and that thereafter, the informant insisted on an even better deal in exchange for his testimony in the murder case. The informant also committed perjury during the course of his testimony, including about his background, his education, a conversation he had the with the prison rabbi about testifying against the defendant, as well as his history of providing “snitch” evidence in other cases. This case contains an extensive discussion of the perils of jailhouse informant testimony.

United States v. Triumph Capital Group, Inc., 544 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2008)
The government failed to reveal an agent’s notes of a witness’s proffer session that were materially inconsistent with the witness’s testimony at trial (and inconsistent with the Jencks material that was furnished to the defense).  See also United States v. Rivas, 377 F.3d 195 (2d Cir. 2004).

Mahler v. Kaylo, 537 F.3d 494 (5th Cir. 2008)
Prior to trial, witnesses gave statements that the defendant shot the victim while they were wrestling over a shotgun. At trial, however, the witnesses testified that the victim was walking away from the defendant when the defendant shot him in the back. Failing to provide the inconsistent witness statements to the defendant prior to trial was a Brady violation that required granting a writ of habeas corpus.

Jackson v. Brown, 513 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2008)
The prosecution failed to reveal promises it had made to prosecution witnesses and when the witnesses lied on the stand about any promises, the prosecutor failed to correct the misrepresentation. Other promises were made by the police to certain witnesses (and were not even known to the prosecutors). All these Brady errors required setting aside the death penalty.

Ferrara v. United States, 456 F.3d 278 (1st Cir. 2006)
Twelve years ago, the defendant entered a guilty plea to a RICO case that charged various predicate offenses, including murder. A key witness for the government provided a statement implicating the defendant in one of the charged murders. Later, however, he recanted and told the AUSA and the case agents that the defendant was not involved in the murder. The AUSA and agents met once again with the witness and he recanted his recantation. The witness’s recantation was never provided to the defense, despite Brady obligations that were ongoing pursuant to the Constitution and Local Rules. The defendant entered a guilty plea, though during the plea colloquy, he never admitted participation in the murder. Years later, the witness’s recantation was revealed. The District Court granted § 2255 relief. The First Circuit affirmed, concluding that the government’s conduct amounted to a violation of Brady and amounted to gross governmental misconduct.

Morris v. Ylst, 447 F.3d 735 (9th Cir. 2006)

A status report was prepared by a legal assistant that advised another prosecutor that a witness had perjured herself at the defendant’s trial. The Ninth Circuit held that this report – work product – was not required to be produced to the defense pursuant to Brady. However, the prosecutor did have a duty to investigate this allegation. A prosecutor may not remain willfully ignorant of the facts.

Graves v. Dretke, 442 F.3d 334 (5th Cir. 2006)

The prosecutor neglected to inform the defendant that on the day before the key prosecution witness testified, he told the prosecutor that he, the witness, alone was responsible for the murders and had also revealed previously that his wife was involved. The prosecutor also asked the witness at trial whether all of his statements consistently implicated the defendant (with one exception). The witness responded affirmatively, as did a police officer who was asked the same question. Yet, the witness had not been consistent and had exculpated the defendant and implicated his wife. The Brady violation necessitated reversing the conviction.

Slutzker v. Johnson, 393 F.3d 373 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The state’s failure to produce police reports in which an eyewitness affirmatively denied that she saw the defendant at the scene of the crime was a Brady violation. The same witness testified at trial that the defendant was the person she saw at the scene. The trial occurred fifteen years after the murder and the police report had been taken at the time of the murder. Though there were three other eyewitnesses, their testimony was dubious (two of the witnesses were 5 and 6 years old at the time of the murder and claimed to have recovered memories in which they saw the defendant at the scene of the crime).

Shih Wei Su v. Filion, 335 F.3d 119 (2d Cir. 2003)

The Second Circuit concluded that the prosecutor knowing elicited perjured testimony relating to a witness’s cooperation agreement with the government and granted a writ of habeas corpus. In fact, there was an agreement that if he cooperated, the witness would be afforded youthful offender treatment. At trial, however, it was represented that there was no agreement on the terms of the plea agreement.

Bailey v. Rae, 339 F.3d 1107 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was charged with sexual offenses that required, as an element, proof that the victim was incapable of giving consent to the sexual contact. The state was aware of, and had possession of therapy notes of the victim, that revealed that she knew the difference between good touching and bad touching. These reports contradicted, to some degree, the state’s contention that the victim was mentally defective to the extent that she could not give consent. Failure to provide this information to the defense was reversible Brady error.
United States v. Arnold, 117 F.3d 1308 (11th Cir. 1997)

The government possessed numerous tape recordings of an IRS special agent talking with the government’s star witness while he was in prison. On the tapes were several conversations involving the witness’s expectation of a reduced sentence and the agent’s assurance that the witness would receive a reduced sentence in exchange for his cooperation. These tapes were never disclosed to the defense. At trial, the witness denied any expectation of a reduced sentence in exchange for his cooperation. The Eleventh Circuit reversed the conviction.

Jacobs v. Singletary, 952 F.2d 1282 (11th Cir. 1992)

The government violated Brady by failing to reveal to the defense that a witness, in a prior statement to a polygrapher, had stated that he was not sure who shot the gun. This was inconsistent with the witness’s trial testimony. This was material evidence and withholding it required a new trial.

DeMarco v. United States, 928 F.2d 1074 (11th Cir. 1991)

Though the defense attorney was aware that one of the prosecutor’s witnesses was committing perjury, the prosecutor’s allowing this to occur and then capitalizing on the testimony in her closing was grounds to vacate the judgment. The perjured testimony in this case was the existence of deals and promises from the government. The defense attorney was formally provided notice of the deals, but at trial, the witness denied there were any deals and the prosecutor did nothing to correct this false testimony. The fact that the prosecutor referred to these lies in her closing argument is the reason for reversal despite the defense attorney’s knowledge of the lies.

Brown v. Wainwright, 785 F.2d 1457 (11th Cir. 1986)

The State knowingly introduced false testimony relating to a witness’ tentative plea agreement. In granting habeas relief, the Eleventh Circuit holds that the proper legal standard is not whether the defendant can prove that the correction of the false testimony “probably would have resulted in an acquittal.” Rather, where, as here, the State intentionally uses false testimony, a new trial is required if the false testimony “could in any reasonable likelihood have affected the judgment of the jury.”

United States v. Vozzella, 124 F.3d 389 (2d Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with conspiring to extend extortionate loans. A critical component of the government’s case was proof that the people to whom he made loans, made loans themselves with the borrowed money, hence the conspiracy. At trial, however, most of the borrowers testified that they used the money for their own purposes (such as gambling). The government relied on one borrower who did not testify, but whose records, according to an FBI agent reflected that he re-loaned the money. The government knew, however, from interviewing the witness that he did not re-loan the money. This amounted to the presentation of perjured, false testimony and the conviction had to be set aside. To the extent that the government did not know if all the records of the borrower reflected that he did not re-loan the money, the government’s ignorance in this regard was willful given the information that was provided by the borrower.

United States v. Payne, 63 F.3d 1200 (2d Cir. 1995)

A co-defendant, in a related case, filed an affidavit proclaiming her innocence. Later, she became a cooperating witness and testified against the defendant. Her affidavit was Brady information which should have been furnished to the defendant. Though her affidavit was filed in the public records of the related case, there was no reason to believe that defendant’s counsel would be aware of this affidavit. Harmless error.

United States v. Kelly, 35 F.3d 929 (4th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was convicted of kidnapping. He had been retained by a woman to “recover” her daughter from a cult. He approached a woman, who identified herself as being the daughter, and brought her to the mother. The mother said that this was the wrong person. The “victim” was then returned to the place from which she was taken. The “victim” was another member of the cult and was also under investigation by the Feds for money laundering, CTR violations and filing false loan applications to a bank. At trial, she answered questions about the loan application falsely and the government failed to correct this testimony. Also, there were Brady violations: the government failed to disclose the extent of the victim’s participation in the cult, the true scope of her criminal conduct which was under investigation (including a search arrant affidavit which supported a search of her house) and the various false statements she had made to her employer, the EPA, to which she had lied about her health in order to use several months of paid sick leave – while she continued to work at other jobs.

United States v. Fisher, 106 F.3d 622 (5th Cir. 1997)

The government produced an inconsistent statement of a witness to the defense after the woman testified on the last day of trial. This was reversible error. This decision was subsequently OVERRULED on other grounds in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000).

United States v. Weintraub, 871 F.2d 1257 (5th Cir. 1989)

At sentencing, the government furnished information in the PSI that the defendant was responsible for distributing 50 to 70 pounds of cocaine. The government withheld evidence that the witness had made a prior inconsistent statement suggesting that the defendant was responsible for a much smaller amount of cocaine. The sentence had to be set aside based on this improper withholding of evidence.

United States v. Boyd, 55 F.3d 239 (7th Cir. 1995)

Another of the El Rukn convictions was set aside because of the prosecutor’s failure to reveal the extent to which witnesses for the prosecution were rewarded with sexual favors, phone privileges, physical contact with relatives and drug transfers. One witness for the prosecution testified that he no longer used drugs, even though the prosecution was aware that he was dealing drugs in prison during the time that he testified. The failure to disclose this to the defense was a Brady violation which required reversal of the conviction. The trial court properly granted a new trial to the defendant.

United States v. Foster, 874 F.2d 491 (8th Cir. 1988)

The prosecutor failed to correct false and misleading testimony which was given by witnesses who had made agreements with the government. The failure to correct these misstatements amounted to the knowing use of false testimony by the government and violated the defendant’s right to due process.

United States v. Hanna, 55 F.3d 1456 (9th Cir. 1995)

Prior statements of a witness that are both material and inconsistent with his anticipated testimony fall within the Brady rule. Here, the police report prepared by the arresting officer contained material discrepancies with the witness’s trial testimony. A remand for further evaluation of this Brady issue was required, even though the inconsistencies were “aired” during the course of the trial.
BRADY
(Presentence Report and Probation Reports of Witnesses)

United States v. Garcia, 562 F.3d 947 (8th Cir. 2009)

The trial court erred in failing to conduct an in camera review of cooperating witnesses’ PSR’s.

United States v. Scroggins, 379 F.3d 233 (5th Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in declining to review the co-conspirators’ PSR’s to determine if any Brady or Giglio information was contained in their reports.

United States v. Alvarez, 358 F.3d 1194 (9th Cir. 2004)

The Ninth Circuit discusses the issues raised when a defendant seeks to have the district court review a witness’s presentence report. If the defendant has a basis for claiming that Brady information is contained in the file, the trial court should conduct an in camera review of the file.

United States v. Moore, 949 F.2d 68 (2d Cir. 1991)

When a defendant requests an opportunity to review a pre-sentence report of an accomplice-witness, the trial court should review the pre-sentence report to determine if there is any exculpatory information, or impeaching information contained therein and whether there is a compelling need to reveal that information to the defense.

United States v. Trevino, 89 F.3d 187 (4th Cir. 1996)

The court considered the question of when the trial court is required to review a government witness’s PSR at the request of the defendant, to determine if there is any Brady information contained therein. The court concluded that a district court is under no duty to conduct an in camera examination of a requested PSR unless the accused has first clearly specified the information contained in the report that he expects will reveal exculpatory or impeachment evidence.
BRADY
(Undisclosed Deals of Witness)

United States v. Mazzarella, 784 F.3d 532 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was convicted of bank fraud. At a subsequent trial relating to other defendants, a key witness (employee of the defendant’s company), testified that she obtained documents from the defendant’s company at the request of the FBI and also related that she had been urged to do so with the lure of not being prosecuted. The disclosure of this possible Fourth Amendment violation and Brady information, necessitated that the district court conduct a full evidentiary hearing.

Phillips v. Ornoski, 673 F.3d 1168 (9th Cir. 2012)

The state’s failure to reveal that it had agreed to dismiss charges against a prosecution witness violated Brady and Napue and required that a death sentence be vacated. The deal was reached between the prosecutor and the witness’s attorney, but it was conditioned on the witness’s attorney’s agreement not to tell the witness. Thus, the witness was not expressly told about the benefit that she would receive in exchange for her testimony. The fact that the “deal” was not disclosed to the witness by her attorney (at the request of the prosecutor) is not consequential. The prosecution knew that there was a deal and failed to correct false testimony. Moreover, the witness’s attorney had urged the witness to testify, thus, the “benefit” that she was to receive was an incentive for her to testify. The Ninth Circuit also noted the difference between the materiality standard for a Brady claim and a Napue claim: a Napue violation is material when there is “any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury.” United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 103 (1976). In contrast, a Brady violation is material to a jury’s verdict when “there is a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different by for the violation. United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 682 (1985).

Lacaze v. Warden Louisiana Correctional Institute for Women, 645 F.3d 728 (5th Cir. 2011)

The prosecution failed to reveal that a witness had been promised that in exchange for his cooperation, the witness’s son would not be prosecuted. The Fifth Circuit granted the writ.

Maxwell v. Roe, 628 F.3d 486 (9th Cir. 2010)

The state failed to reveal to the defense that the informant in this state murder prosecution had originally negotiated a certain deal in exchange for his testimony and that thereafter, the informant insisted on an even better deal in exchange for his testimony in the murder case. The informant also committed perjury during the course of his testimony, including about his background, his education, a conversation he had the with the prison rabbi about testifying against the defendant, as well as his history of providing “snitch” evidence in other cases. This case contains an extensive discussion of the perils of jailhouse informant testimony.

Douglas v. Workman, 560 F.3d 1156 (10th Cir. 2009)

Tacit agreements with cooperating witnesses must also be disclosed under the command of Brady, not just express agreements to provide leniency or no prosecution in the witness’s case.
Harris v. Lafler, 553 F.3d 1028 (6th Cir. 2009)
A key witness who testified for the prosecution had been promised that he would be released and that his girlfriend would be released based on his testimony establishing the defendant’s guilt. He was also told to deny, if asked, that any deals had been made for his testimony. When this came to light, after trial, the state court still concluded that the withheld evidence was immaterial. The Sixth Circuit disagreed and ordered that the conviction be set aside.

Tassin v. Cain, 517 F.3d 770 (5th Cir. 2008)
The state prosecutor’s failure to reveal the existence of a deal with a prosecution witness required that the defendant’s murder conviction be set aside. The witness’s attorney submitted an affidavit after trial that he had an understanding with the prosecutor that the witness would receive a ten year sentence, an agreement that the trial judge was also aware of.

United States v. Morris, 498 F.3d 634 (7th Cir. 2007)
During the trial the prosecutor repeatedly stressed that the cooperating witness was facing a mandatory minimum ten years in prison. In closing argument, the prosecutor emphasized this, again. After trial, the prosecutor filed a motion for a downward departure, including relief from the mandatory minimum. This amounts to prosecutorial misconduct. But harmless error.

Horton v. Mayle, 408 F.3d 570 (9th Cir. 2004)
The state’s failure to disclose the existence of an immunity agreement between a key prosecution witness and the state violated Brady. The witness’s testimony was the “glue” that kept the state’s case together and the immunity agreement would have been a powerful tool of impeachment.

Hayes v. Brown, 399 F.3d 972 (9th Cir. 2005)
The prosecutor and a witness’s attorney reached an agreement that provided that if the attorney’s client testified against the defendant, felony charges against the witness would be dismissed. One part of the agreement required the attorney to not disclose the agreement to the witness, so he could testify at the defendant’s trial and honestly deny the existence of any deal with prosecutors. The Ninth Circuit granted habeas relief, holding that this deal should have been disclosed to the defense, even though the witness did not know about the deal. The witness’s denial of a deal was, in fact false, and pursuant to Pyle and Acorta, the state had a duty to correct the false testimony.

United States v. Blanco, 392 F.3d 382 (9th Cir. 2004)
The government’s failure to reveal that an informant had an ongoing relationship with the INS (in addition to the disclosed relationship with DEA) and that he had been given a “special parole visa” enabling him to remain in the U.S. was error that necessitated a remand for consideration of an appropriate remedy. The record in this case demonstrated that, at least to some extent, the DEA was intentionally withholding information from the AUSA. This, of course, is no defense to a Brady violation. The duty under Brady extends to the DEA and any other law enforcement agency involved in the prosecution of the defendant.

United States v. Sipe, 388 F.3d 471 (5th Cir. 2004)

The government’s failure to reveal that one of the government witnesses told the government that he “disliked” the defendant; as well as the “benefits” granted to numerous other government witnesses, amounted to a Brady violation that required setting aside the conviction. The Fifth Circuit noted that evidence of guilt was “significant,” but that the withheld evidence, when considered in the totality, undermined confidence in the verdict.

Shih Wei Su v. Filion, 335 F.3d 119 (2d Cir. 2003)

The Second Circuit concluded that the prosecutor knowing elicited perjured testimony relating to a witness’s cooperation agreement with the government and granted a writ of habeas corpus. In fact, there was an agreement that if he cooperated, the witness would be afforded youthful offender treatment. At trial, however, it was represented that there was no agreement on the terms of the plea agreement.

Grisby v. Blodgett, 130 F.3d 365 (9th Cir. 1997)

Post-trial, a witness stated that he had lied at trial when he testified that he had not been offered a deal by the police detectives in exchange for his testimony. A full evidentiary hearing should have been conducted. The proffered evidence, if true, would establish that the witness gave perjured testimony. A conviction obtained by the knowing use of perjured testimony is fundamentally unfair, and must be set aside if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury.

Singh v. Prunty, 142 F.3d 1157 (9th Cir. 1998)

The state failed to inform the defendant in his state murder trial that a key prosecution witness was promised certain benefits for his testimony, including favorable treatment on various pending criminal charges.

DeMarco v. United States, 928 F.2d 1074 (11th Cir. 1991)

Though the defense attorney was aware that one of the prosecutor’s witnesses was committing perjury, the prosecutor’s allowing this to occur and then capitalizing on the testimony in her closing was grounds to vacate the judgment. The perjured testimony in this case was the existence of deals and promises from the government. The defense attorney was formally provided notice of the deals, but at trial, the witness denied there were any deals and the prosecutor did nothing to correct this false testimony. The fact that the prosecutor referred to these lies in her closing argument is the reason for reversal despite the defense attorney’s knowledge of the lies.

Moore v. Kemp, 809 F.2d 702 (11th Cir. 1987)

The prosecution’s withholding from the defendant of portions of the criminal record of the prosecution’s key witness, as well as failing to disclose an agreement the State had with that witness requires a further evidentiary hearing to determine whether the conviction and sentence should be set aside.
Brown v. Wainwright, 785 F.2d 1457 (11th Cir. 1986)

The State knowingly introduced false testimony relating to a witness’ tentative plea agreement. In granting habeas relief, the Eleventh Circuit holds that the proper legal standard is not whether the defendant can prove that the correction of the false testimony “probably would have resulted in an acquittal.” Rather, where, as here, the State intentionally uses false testimony, a new trial is required if the false testimony “could in any reasonable likelihood have affected the judgment of the jury.”

Gilday v. Callahan, 59 F.3d 257 (1st Cir. 1995)

The prosecutor made a deal with the witness’s attorney that, if the witness testified, no criminal charges would be brought against the witness. The witness’s attorney apparently did not reveal this to the witness, but did tell the witness that it would be in his best interest to testify. The failure to disclose this “deal” with the witness violated Brady. Nevertheless, it was harmless error in this case.

Ouimette v. Moran, 942 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1991)

The district court’s decision granting a writ of habeas corpus was affirmed. The district court found that the state prosecutor withheld evidence of deals made with prosecution witnesses, as well as the criminal record of witnesses. In a lengthy analysis of the evidence in the case and the extent of prosecutorial misconduct in withholding exculpatory and impeaching evidence, the appellate court concludes that the misconduct necessitated a new trial.

United States v. Luc Levasseur, 826 F.2d 158 (1st Cir. 1987)

The First Circuit upholds the trial court’s ordering the government to make pre-trial disclosure of all promises, rewards and inducements made to any witness the government intended to call in its case-in-chief.

United States v. Boyd, 55 F.3d 239 (7th Cir. 1995)

Another of the El Rukn convictions was set aside because of the prosecutor’s failure to reveal the extent to which witnesses for the prosecution were rewarded with sexual favors, phone privileges, physical contact with relatives and drug transfers. One witness for the prosecution testified that he no longer used drugs, even though the prosecution was aware that he was dealing drugs in prison during the time that he testified. The failure to disclose this to the defense was a Brady violation which required reversal of the conviction. The trial court properly granted a new trial to the defendant.

Bagley v. Lumpkin, 798 F.2d 1297 (9th Cir. 1986)

Despite specific requests by the defense, the government failed to produce evidence that the key prosecution witness was acting under financial inducements. This is the case which earlier had gone to the United States Supreme Court which redefined the standard of review in Brady cases. United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667. Back in the Ninth Circuit, the Court holds that a reversal was still required under the new standard.

United States v. Smith, 77 F.3d 511 (D.C.Cir. 1996)

The government failed to reveal to the defense that one of the government’s witnesses had a D.C. Superior Court case dismissed against him and also had a psychiatric history. This was reversible error. Citing Kyles v. Whitley, the appellate court observed that in determining the materiality of the non-disclosed information, the lower court should not simply determine whether the evidence was still sufficient to convict the defendant if the witness whose history was not disclosed were ignored.
BRIBERY AND GRATUITIES

SEE ALSO: MAIL FRAUD (INTANGIBLE RIGHTS -- HONEST SERVICES)
HOBBS ACT

An “official act” is a decision or action on a “question, matter, cause, suit, proceeding or controversy.” That question or matter must involve a formal exercise of governmental power, and must also be something specific and focused that is “pending” or “may by law be brought” before a public official. To qualify as an “official act,” the public official must make a decision or take an action on that question or matter, or agree to do so. Setting up a meeting, talking to another official, or organizing an event—without more—does not fit that definition of “official act.” On the other hand, a decision or action to initiate a research study would qualify as an “official act.” In addition, a public official’s effort to persuade another official to perform an official act also qualifies.

In order to violate the federal gratuity statute, 18 U.S.C. § 201(c)(1)(A), the government must prove that the gratuity was given to the official because of his performance of a specific act. It is not enough to merely prove that the gratuity was given because of the official's position generally. In short, the gratuity statute does not outlaw all gift-giving, just gifts that are linked to specific action on the part of the official.

Affirming the decision of the Eighth Circuit, the Supreme Court held that the government is not required to prove in a § 666 case that a bribe to a person who is an employee of a local government agency affected any federal program or federal funds. It is sufficient if the local agency receives federal funds and the employee is bribed to influence some official conduct.

In a §666 gratuity prosecution, there is no requirement that the government prove that the corrupt payment affected federal funds.

United States v. Silver, 864 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2017)

Sheldon Silver’s conviction for honest services fraud and Hobbs Act violations were reversed based on an error in the jury instructions, which failed the McDonnell requirements for an “official act.” The trial court incorrectly explained that an “official act” was any action taken or to be taken under color of official authority.

United States v. Skelos, --- F.3d --- (2d Cir. 2017)

Two New York state officials’ federal bribery convictions were reversed based on an erroneous jury instruction that did not comply with McDonnell.
United States v. Boyland, 862 F.3d 279 (2d Cir. 2017)

The district court’s instruction to the jury on the law of honest services fraud for a public official did not satisfy the standard of McDonnell, because it included within the definition of “official act,” “contacting or lobbying other government agencies.” But the error in the instruction in this case did not satisfy the plain error standard.

United States v. Pinson, 860 F.3d 152 (4th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with a RICO conspiracy with some of the predicate acts being § 666 violations. The various crimes, however, were not related to each other, though a couple grew out of his receipt of money from individuals or companies that benefitted from his role on the Board of Trustees of South Carolina State University. The Fourth Circuit held that the crimes did not demonstrate the type of continuity, relationship between the members of the supposed enterprise and longevity to qualify as an association in fact enterprise. The evidence also failed to support the § 666 violations, because the person receiving the illicit payments was not proven to be an agent of the covered entity. Finally, with regard to a third § 666 count, the evidence failed to show that the recipient of federal funds qualified under the $10,000 threshold, because the money received was earmarked for the construction of housing and this does not qualify as a grant, loan or contract.

United States v. Doran, 854 F.3d 1312 (11th Cir. 2017)

This § 666 conviction was reversed because the government failed to prove that the entity from which the defendant stole money received any federal money. The entity was a Student Investment Fund that was created to give students in the Florida State University Business School experience in investing money. None of the money in the fund came from either the School itself or from any federal source. Embezzling money from the fund, therefore, did not amount to a § 666 offense.

United States v. Tavares, 844 F.3d 46 (1st Cir. 2016)

The defendants were officials in the Massachusetts State Probation Department. They were charged with a RICO, bribery/gratuitities and mail fraud offenses based on their practice of hiring people for various Probation Department positions based on requests by State Legislators, who, in turn, would vote favorably on Probation legislation (including increased budgets). The First Circuit reversed the conviction on all counts: there was insufficient proof of a nexus between any act of the Probation Department officials (rigging the hiring process) and any official act of the legislature. Regarding the mail fraud counts, there was insufficient proof that any mailing was linked to any fraudulent conduct. Each mailing was a rejection letter to an applicant who was allegedly more qualified for a position than the person who was hired at the request of a legislator.

United States v. McLean, 802 F.3d 1228 (11th Cir. 2015)

In this comprehensive opinion evaluating the sufficiency of evidence to establish the $10,000 element of a § 666 offense, the Eleventh Circuit held that the government failed to offer sufficient evidence that federal funds that were earmarked for the city, some small portion of which was then sent to the agency which was affected by the bribe, were sufficiently linked to the bribe. The government offered virtually no evidence that the federal program (which sent money to the City) had a purpose or objective that had any relationship at all to the agency that ultimately received the money. The money was sent by the federal government to the city; the city later provided a few bus shelters to the Redevelopment Agency, the entity which later approved the bribe-payors application for funds.

United States v. Blagojevich, 794 F.3d 729 (7th Cir. 2015)

Though many of his convictions were affirmed, the Seventh Circuit reversed Blagojevich’s convictions on certain bribery / extortion counts. Those counts involved what was described as “logrolling”: The defendant asked for a cabinet appointment in exchange for appointing a particular person to the United States Senate, for example. A proposal to trade one public act for another is not the same as swapping an official act for a private payment.

United States v. Hawkins, 777 F.3d 880 (7th Cir. 2015)

Though 18 U.S.C. § 666 covers both bribes and gratuities, in order to violate § 1346, the payment must amount to a bribe, not a gratuity.

United States v. Fernandez, 722 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2013)

In this lengthy discussion of the elements of a § 666 offense, the First Circuit concludes that a §666 prosecution requires proof of a bribe, not just a gratuity. The essential difference between a bribe and a gratuity is the quid quo pro requirement. If the payment is made after the official act occurs, this is generally typical of a gratuity (though not conclusive).

United States v. Terry, 707 F.3d 607 (6th Cir. 2013)

Thorough discussion of the law regarding bribes vs. campaign contributions. The former requires a quid pro quo.

United States v. Owens, 697 F.3d 657 (7th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was a housing inspector who twice received $600 bribes to issue permits for units he did not actually inspect. But § 666 requires proof that the thing obtained in exchange for the bribe must be worth $5,000.00. There was insufficient evidence in this case that the permits were worth $5,000.00. The fact that the houses or the units were worth more than $5,000 is not sufficient.

United States v. Dean, 629 F.3d 257 (D.C. Cir. 2011)

The defendant received license fees from people in D.C. She told some of the applicants that they had to pay certain license fees in cash, which she then pocketed. The citizens were not aware of her theft. This does not constitute bribery under § 201, because there was no quid pro quo. This did not amount to a Hobbs Act violation for the same reason. Clearly, she had committed a theft, but the citizen who paid the money was never told that the money had to be paid to her personally for some reason other than to have the license issued in exchange for the proper amount of the fee. In fact, the citizens had no idea that she was pocketing the money.

United States v. Langston, 590 F.3d 1226 (11th Cir. 2009)
The government failed to prove that the defendant who stole state money under his control was actually a state “agent” as that term is defined in § 666. The defendant was an employee of a state commission, not of the state.

United States v. Whitfield, 590 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2009)

The defendants were state judges who accepted bribes in connection with their judicial decision-making. The only federal funds received by the judiciary involved grants given to the administrative office of the courts, which was not involved in judicial decision-making. The purpose of the administrative office of the courts is to “assist in the efficient administration of the nonjudicial business of the courts of the state.” The Fifth Circuit held that § 666 did not cover the judges.

United States v. Hoffman, 556 F.3d 871 (8th Cir. 2009)

The Eighth Circuit provides a thorough primer on the elements of a 18 U.S.C. § 201(c) illegal gratuity case. In particular the court focuses on the element of the offense that requires that the “gift” be given “because of” an official act. The court ultimately concludes that the evidence was sufficient in this case and though the jury instruction defining the relationship between the gift and the official act was not correct, the conviction was affirmed, because other instruction properly explained the law.

United States v. Ganim, 510 F.3d 134 (2nd Cir. 2007)

The Second Circuit extensively reviews the bribery / gratuity / honest services offenses in the context of a mayor who accepted money with the understanding that at some point in the future he would engage in future official acts that favored the payor. The court, reviewing the Evans, McCormick and Sun-Diamond decisions held that an agreement to perform some unspecified act in the future in exchange for the money violated federal bribery and honest services laws.

United States v. Abu-Shawish, 507 F.3d 550 (7th Cir. 2007)

In order to violate § 666, the defendant’s fraud must affect the program that employs the defendant. Thus, it is not enough that the defendant commit a fraud while employed by a covered organization (i.e., recipient of federal funds). The fraud must impact the organization. The indictment in this case failed to allege that the defendant defrauded the organization for which he worked. Though he was alleged to have defrauded the City of Milwaukee, he was not employed by Milwaukee. Thus, the indictment failed to allege that he defrauded the entity for which he worked and was fatally defective.

United States v. Thompson, 484 F.3d 877 (7th Cir. 2007)

An honest services fraud prosecution may not be predicated on proof that the defendant made decisions about awarding contracts for state work based on the contractor’s political affiliation or alliance with the political party in power. The court reversed not only the § 1346 honest services conviction, but also the § 666 bribery/gratuity/misapplication conviction. The defendant did not “misapply” the money by making a procurement decision based in part on political considerations, even if her decision was not completely in accordance with state procurement rules. With regard to the honest services conviction, even though the defendant received a raise, based in part on her work on this contract, this did not convert her state regulatory violation into a federal mail fraud offense.

United States v. Ford, 435 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2006)

In this § 666 prosecution, the defendant, who was running for a leadership position in a union, allowed another person to perform volunteer work for the campaign, supposedly in exchange for being awarded a contract by the union for work in the future. The trial court’s jury instruction failed to adequately explain that the volunteer work must have represented a quid pro quo for a contract to be awarded in the future. The essential problem with the instruction was that it focused on what the person paying the gratuity (i.e., performing the volunteer work) intended, as opposed to what the recipient intended. The fact that the volunteer expected to be rewarded with a contract is admissible evidence of the understanding between the parties, but it is not, in itself, all that is required to be proven by the government. The government must prove that the defendant/recipient accepted the volunteer work in exchange for the future benefit. Even if the recipient knows of the other person’s intent, this is not sufficient. Thus, even if the defendant knew that the volunteer expected to be rewarded, this would not be sufficient; the defendant must have accepted the volunteer work with the intent to provide the quid pro quo.

Valdes v. United States, 475 F.3d 1319 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

An informant paid a detective to run license plate numbers through a law enforcement data base. The D.C. Circuit, en banc, concluded that this did not amount to the payment of an unlawful gratuity, because the detective’s acts did not qualify as “an official act” under 18 U.S.C. § 201(c)(1)(B). To qualify under that provision, the act of the defendant must be something more than simply an act that he can perform within the scope of his official duties. Rather, the act must have some influence on the outcome of some public question. In other words, the act that the government employee undertakes must “directly affect a formal government decision made in fulfillment of the government’s public responsibility.”

United States v. Evans, 344 F.3d 1131 (11th Cir. 2003)

The court reversed the defendants’ § 201 convictions because the recipient of the “bribe” did not qualify as a federal official, or a person who had some degree of official responsibility for carrying out a federal program or policy. The recipient was an employee of an agency that owned housing units that received Section 8 housing assistance grants from the federal government. In this capacity, he was not a federal official and had no authority for carrying out a federal program or policy.

United States v. Ceballos, 340 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2003)

The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to distribute drugs and conspiracy to bribe a public official. The evidence was insufficient to establish his knowing participation in a conspiracy to bribe the public official. The government used undercover agents posing as drug purchasers who were capable of producing phony green cards through their supposed connection with a corrupt INS agent. The undercover agents would buy drugs from a middleman and pay partly in cash and partly in phony green cards which they (and the undercover INS agent) would manufacture for the middleman. As the operation continued, the undercover agents eventually convinced the middleman to introduce them to their drug supplier, the defendant in this case.
This evidence did not establish the defendant’s participation in the bribery conspiracy. Even if he knew that the money owed to him, as the drug supplier, was obtained by the purchaser from the proceeds of another crime committed by the purchaser, this does not make him a member of the purchaser’s conspiracy.

United States v. Choy, 309 F.3d 602 (9th Cir. 2002)

The defendant participated in a scheme to influence a food inspector, but the only thing of value that he gave the inspector was a computer with which he could carry out the fraudulent inspections. This was insufficient, the Ninth Circuit held, to satisfy the “thing of value” element of 18 U.S.C. § 201(b)(1).

United States v. Mills, 140 F.3d 630 (6th Cir. 1998)

In order to violate § 666, the value of the property obtained through the bribe, or gratuity, must be worth at $5,000.00. Bona fide wages, salary, fees, or other compensation cannot be included in the $5,000.00 amount. In this case, people paid the Sheriff money in exchange for being hired as a deputy sheriff. The government relied on the deputies' salaries to reach the threshold amount. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the decision of the trial court dismissing the indictment. The salaries were not shown to be other than bona fide and therefore, the value of the property obtained by virtue of the bribe, not including bona fide salary, did not exceed $5,000.00.

United States v. Copeland, 143 F.3d 1439 (11th Cir. 1998)

Title 18 U.S.C. § 666 makes it a crime to offer or receive anything of value of $5,000 or more, if the person taking the bribe is an agent of an organization or agency that receives in any one year, benefits in excess of $10,000 from the federal government involving a grant, contract, subsidy, loan, guarantee, insurance of other form of federal assistance. Lockheed, which is a prime Defense Department contractor does not qualify as such an organization. Though organizations that receive money pursuant to a “contract” qualify, according to the terms of the contract, the law only applies where the money is received in the form of federal assistance; it does not apply to organizations that provide goods or services to the government in exchange for the money.

United States v. Phillips, 219 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2000)

The defendant, who was charged with a §666 offense, was the tax assessor for a local parish that received food stamps. In this case, the government employee misappropriated purely local funds that had nothing to do with food stamps. The court held that the question of whether he is an agent turns on whether he, as tax assessor, was authorized to act on behalf of the parish with respect to federal funds. The court held the tax assessor is not an agent of the parish for § 666 purposes.

United States v. Jennings, 160 F.3d 1006 (4th Cir. 1998)

The court discusses at some length the difference between a bribe and a gratuity under 18 U.S.C. § 201. A bribe requires a specific corrupt intent to influence the action of a public official; a gratuity “rewards” a public official for action that he took (or is going to take) notwithstanding the payment of the gratuity. The court then turned to the question of what § 666 prohibits. The defendant argued that § 666 only outlaws bribes. The court declines to answer this question: the evidence was sufficient to prove the payment of a bribe. The Fourth Circuit agreed that the lower court’s definition of “corrupt intent” (the instruction did not include the concept of quid pro quo). However, it was not plain error and therefore the conviction was affirmed.

United States v. Rooney, 37 F.3d 847 (2d Cir. 1994)

The defendant was developing a senior citizens home and was using federal FMHA funds. This was a project covered by 18 U.S.C. §666. The defendant became indebted to the contractor and had a choice of either continuing with his debt to him or applying for more loans from FMHA to pay off this debt. The defendant told the developer that he would apply for more loans if the contractor would build a pond at the site. This did not violate §666. There was nothing corrupt about this “solicitation,” and a conviction under §666 could not be upheld.

United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990)

Numerous defendants were charged with tax evasion, extortion, and bribery in connection with payments made to a congressman. The evidence did not support the conviction of the congressman’s son for bribery. The government contended that payments made to the son were for the purpose of bribing the congressman. The evidence failed to show that the son was aware that the payments made to him were for the purpose of affecting the congressman’s actions as opposed to simply helping the congressman circumvent limits on the amount of money he could receive.

United States v. Cicco, 938 F.2d 441 (3rd Cir. 1991)

The defendants in this case told municipal workers that, unless they supported the defendants (the mayor and councilman), they would lose their jobs. This is not bribery under §666.

United States v. Valentine, 63 F.3d 459 (6th Cir. 1995)

18 U.S.C. §666 makes it a crime for a person working for an agency receiving at least $10,000 in federal funds to misappropriate $5,000. The Sixth Circuit holds that the $5,000 must be received during the course of one 12-month period. The government may not aggregate funds received over an extended period of time and rely on a total sum of $5,000 received over the entire period.
BRUTON

Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185 (1998)

Bruton bars the introduction of a non-testifying co-defendant’s confession that impliedly implicates the defendant, even if the defendant’s name was redacted from the confession.

A co-defendant’s confession may be admitted at a joint trial if the confession is redacted so that it omits all reference to the defendant and even to the existence of another guilty party if the jury could infer that the co-defendant’s statement implicates the defendant.

The Court rejects the “interlocking confession” rule. Even if the defendant has confessed, a co-defendant’s confession which implicates the defendant may not be introduced. Limiting instructions do not suffice.

Lambert v. Warden Greene SCI, 861 F.3d 459 (3rd Cir. 2017)

The prosecution arguably relied on the statements of one defendant to a psychiatrist that qualified as testimonial statements to implicate the other defendant in the murder. Though the statement itself only implicated the declarant/defendant, the trial court should have instructed the jury that the statement could only be used against the declarant/defendant. Trial counsel’s failure to seek a limiting instruction was ineffective assistance of counsel, which required a remand to evaluate the appropriate relief.

Brown v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 834 F.3d 506 (3rd Cir. 2016)

A co-defendant’s statement implicated the defendant, so it was redacted to remove references to the defendant. The prosecutor in closing argument, however, argued that the “other person” was the defendant. This was a violation of Bruton and required granting the writ.

Washington v. Sec’y Pa. Dep’t of Corr., 801 F.3d 160 (3rd Cir. 2015)

The redactions of the co-defendant’s statement to the police were not sufficient under Richardson. The redacted statement still contained references to “someone I know,” “another guy,” “the driver,” and other references to the defendant.

United States v. Taylor, 745 F.3d 15 (2d Cir. 2014)

The redactions of the defendant’s statement made it obvious that the names that were redacted were the co-defendants. This violated Bruton. In assessing whether the redactions are sufficient, the court should consider whether the jury would realize that specific names were omitted (i.e., the defendant’s actual statement was altered), or whether the redaction was done in such a way that the jury would believe that the defendant did not actually implicate the co-defendant. Thus, changing a statement to say, “I turned to another person and said, ‘look another person’, we need to get out of here” is not an appropriate redaction. Once it is obvious that specific names have been pruned from the actual statement, the question is whether the range of possibilities is narrow enough that the co-defendant’s identity is the obvious choice.
United States v. Powell, 732 F.3d 361 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant and his girlfriend were co-defendants and were alleged to have driven to Lubbock to purchase cocaine. The girlfriend made a statement confessing. At trial, the confession was redacted so that her statement only implicated herself. When the defendant testified, the prosecutor asked him repeatedly why his girlfriend acknowledged that she had been to Lubbock to purchase drugs? This questioning violated Bruton. The questioning had the effect of using the co-defendant’s statements “against” the defendant. Harmless error.

Washington v. Secretary of Pa. Dept. of Corrections, 726 F.3d 471 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The state violated Bruton in introducing the statement of a non-testifying co-defendant that implicated the defendant in the robbery/murder. The Third Circuit thoroughly reviews the law regarding efforts to redact references to the defendant by the use of pronouns – discussing the Supreme Court decisions in Richardson and Gray – and concludes that the redaction efforts in this case were insufficient to overcome the Confrontation Clause violation. Following remand from the Supreme Court, the Third Circuit reached the same decision in Washington v. Secretary Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, --- F.3d --- (September 1, 2015).

Ray v. Boatwright, 592 F.3d 793 (7th Cir. 2010)

The police officer who took the defendant’s statement testified at trial and recounted the circumstances of his interrogation of the defendant. Included in this recitation were statements such as, “When he was confronted with the fact that his co-conspirators claimed to have been present at the time of the shooting” and “When confronted with statements by the co-conspirators that the defendant was doing the shooting” – the defendant responded in a certain fashion. This amounted to a Confrontation Clause violation, because the co-conspirators did not testify and the officer who testified recounted exactly what they had told the police. The error was sufficiently harmful that a new trial was required.

United States v. Cabrera-Rivera, 583 F.3d 26 (1st Cir. 2009)

The prosecutor elicited testimony from a police officer about his interrogation of a co-conspirator. Despite minimal efforts to eliminate references to the defendant, the officer testified that based on his interrogation of the co-conspirator, he determined that the defendant had received part of the proceeds of the robbery. This was a clear violation of Bruton which was compounded by the prosecutor’s closing argument that stressed the information learned from the co-conspirator in proving the defendant’s guilt.

United States v. Tuyet Thi-Bach Nguyen, 565 F.3d 668 (9th Cir. 2009)

Allowing an officer to testify about the statement of a co-defendant and then allowing the co-defendant’s counsel to cross-examine the agent eliciting further details about the co-defendant’s statement was reversible error as to the defendant. The Ninth Circuit states, during the course of the opinion, that admitting the co-defendant’s statement was a Crawford Confrontation Clause violation and whether or not the statement implicated the defendant only related to the harmless/harmful nature of the error.

United States v. Hardwick, 544 F.3d 565 (3rd Cir. 2008)
The statements of a co-defendant – even redacted to remove the defendant’s name – sufficiently implicated the defendant that permitting those statements to be introduced violated Bruton.

_Vazquez v. Wilson_, 550 F.3d 270 (3rd Cir. 2008)

The state introduced the co-defendant’s statement at trial. In place of the defendant’s name, the court permitted the substitution of “my boy” and “the other guy” as a substitute for the defendant’s name in the co-defendant’s statement. This did not protect the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights and the _Bruton_ violation required that the writ be granted.

_United States v. Schwartz_, 541 F.3d 1331 (11th Cir. 2008)

This decision contains an encyclopedic review of _Bruton_ jurisprudence and ultimately concludes that an affidavit of a co-defendant, who did not testify at trial, that was introduced into evidence against the co-defendant, clearly implicated the defendant and, coupled with the prosecutor’s closing argument, which pointed to the affidavit and argued that the jury could infer the defendant’s guilt from the affidavit’s assertions, required reversal of the conviction. The affidavit did not implicate Schwartz by name. Rather, the out-of-court statement of the co-defendant only implicated Schwartz circumstantially (referring to corporations that Schwartz owned). The trial court cautioned the jury not to consider the affidavit against Schwartz (a cautionary note that _Bruton_ itself said is inadequate to protect a defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights). In _Richardson v. Marsh_, 481 U.S. 200 (1987), the Supreme Court held that redacting the defendant’s name from a co-defendant’s out-of-court statement is a satisfactory method of avoiding a Confrontation Clause problem. _Gray v. Maryland_, 523 U.S. 185 (1998), held that a redaction that replaces a defendant’s name with an obvious indication of deletion, such as a blank space, or [delete], does not avoid a _Bruton_ problem. Synthesizing these cases, as well as several Eleventh Circuit precedents, the court concluded, “A defendant’s confrontation right is violated when the court admits a codefendant statement that, in light of the Government’s whole case, compels a reasonable person to infer the defendant’s guilt.”

_Stevens v. Ortiz_, 465 F.3d 1229 (10th Cir. 2006)

A clear _Bruton_ violation. The state’s argument was that the statement had sufficient indicia of reliability to be admissible. The Tenth Circuit granted the writ: neither the fact that the statement was against the declarant’s penal interest (he accepted some responsibility for the murder, but “shared” that responsibility with the defendant), nor the fact that it had some indicia of reliability was sufficient to overcome the Confrontation Clause violation. _See Lilly v. Virginia_, 527 U.S. 116, 119 S.Ct. 1887 (1999).

_United States v. Santos_, 449 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2006)

The trial court redacted portions of a co-defendant’s post-arrest statement and removed references to the defendants and instructed the jury not to consider the statement as evidence of the defendants’ participation in the conspiracy. However, the statement that was included revealed that the intention of the conspirators was to rob through the use of force. This was a contested element of the Hobbs Act prosecution and admitting this portion of the statement violated the remaining defendants’ confrontation clause rights.
Madrigal v. Bagley, 413 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2005)

The Bruton error was obvious (and conceded by the state) and was also prejudicial. The defendant’s conviction and sentence of death was reversed.

United States v. Vega Molina, 407 F.3d 511 (1st Cir. 2005)

The trial court approved certain redactions in a co-defendant’s confession which replaced the defendant’s name with vague reference to “another person.” This was permissible under Bruton. However, the trial court failed to instruct the jury not to consider the confession of the co-defendant against the defendant. The defendant did not request such an instruction; nevertheless, it was plain error in this case, because the prosecutor, in closing argument, urged the jury to conclude that “another person” was, in fact, the defendant. Thus, the prosecutor argued precisely what the trial court should have instructed the jury was an improper inference.

Howard v. Walker, 406 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2005)

A co-conspirator’s statement to the police was excluded on Bruton grounds. However, an expert witness for the state relied on that statement in reaching her conclusion that the victim’s death was caused by conduct of the conspirators. Though an expert may generally rely on inadmissible evidence in reaching a conclusion, including hearsay, that rule assumes that an expert will carefully analyze the basis of his opinion and that the trial court will conduct a sufficient Daubert hearing to ensure the reliability of the expert’s underlying data from which she draws her conclusion. In this case, the unreliable statements of the co-conspirator were not reliable and the expert’s opinion was therefore improperly admitted.

Murillo v. Frank, 402 F.3d 786 (7th Cir. 2005)

The state trial court erroneously admitted the statement of a witness who made a custodial statement implicating the defendant shortly after the murder. The witness refused to testify at trial, even with a grant of immunity. This evidence would clearly be barred under Crawford, but Crawford does not apply retroactively. Nevertheless, this evidence was also inadmissible under Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 119 S.Ct. 1887 (1999).

United States v. Macias, 387 F.3d 509 (6th Cir. 2004)

A co-defendant offered the testimony (from prior grand jury testimony) of a law enforcement officer who stated, during the grand jury testimony that the co-defendant implicated the defendant. This is a Bruton violation. Confrontation Clause violations can be caused by the introduction of testimony by a co-defendant’s counsel.

United States v. Vejar-Urias, 165 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 1999)

Though it was harmless error, the trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce the co-defendant’s post-arrest statement. Merely replacing the defendant’s name with the word “someone” did not vitiate the Confrontation Clause violation. See Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185 (1998).

United States v. Peterson, 140 F.3d 819 (9th Cir. 1998)

The co-defendant's post-arrest statement made reference to the defendant, but the references were redacted at trial and replaced with "person X." During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that "person X" was the defendant. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the redaction was insufficient and violated Bruton. The closing argument of the prosecutor, needless to say, also violated Bruton. Reversible error.

United States v. Walker, 148 F.3d 518 (5th Cir. 1998)

The government improperly admitted evidence that violated Bruton. The government suggested that the evidence was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but the Fifth Circuit held that even if that were the case, there was still a Bruton violation. Harmless error.

Graham v. Hoke, 946 F.2d 982 (2d Cir. 1991)

The decision in Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186 (1987), which eliminated the interlocking confession exception to the Bruton rule, should be applied retroactively to cases on habeas review. Arguably, Cruz did not establish a new rule, but even if it did, the rule fit at least one of the Teague v. Lane exceptions to the non-retroactive application of new rules to old cases.

Holland v. Scully, 797 F.2d 57 (2d Cir. 1986)

Both the defendant and his co-defendant confessed prior to trial. Though they were similar in many details, the co-defendant’s confession indicated that the defendant was the mastermind and had invited him to commit the robbery. In this context, the introduction of the co-defendant’s confession was prejudicial error under Bruton.

United States v. Schmick, 904 F.2d 936 (5th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was confronted with the incriminating statements of his co-defendant in violation of Bruton. Despite the trial judge’s instructions to the jury to disregard the statements, the defendant was prejudiced by the admission of this testimony, especially in light of the prosecutor’s reliance on those statements during his closing argument. The trial court should have granted a new trial to the defendant.

Sanders v. Lane, 835 F.2d 1204 (7th Cir. 1987)

The admission of the co-defendant’s confession which implicated the defendant was reversible error. The defendant’s own confession was admitted during the course of this trial, but the statement of his co-defendant was more incriminating than his own confession.

United States v. Payne, 923 F.2d 595 (8th Cir. 1991)

The co-defendant’s redacted confession referred to helping “someone” escape from federal custody. Everyone at trial knew who the “someone” was: the co-defendant who was charged with conspiracy to escape. Though the error was harmless, this violated Bruton.

Hardnett v. Marshall, 25 F.3d 875 (9th Cir. 1994)

Three defendants were charged with murder. One of the defendants had made statements to the police about another one of the defendants. The declarant did not testify at trial. The other defendant did, and was cross-examined by the prosecutor about the statements of the non-testifying defendant. This violated Bruton, but was harmless error. See Robbins v. Small, 371 F.2d 793 (1st Cir. 1967).

Toolate v. Borg, 828 F.2d 571 (9th Cir. 1987)

A co-defendant testified and offered a confession which was incriminating both of himself and of the defendant. The co-defendant refused to be cross-examined by the defendant. This constitutes a violation of the Bruton rule even though Bruton refers to out-of-court confessions. The inability to cross-examine the co-defendant in court represents the same confrontation problems as envisioned in the classic Bruton situation.

United States v. Glass, 128 F.3d 1398 (10th Cir. 1997)

The Bruton violation in this case was harmful error requiring reversal of the defendant’s conviction. A police officer testified that one of the defendants (who did not testify) made a statement that incriminated herself and expressly incriminated another defendant, as well. The other defendant’s right to confront the testimony against him was violated by this Bruton violation.

United States v. Hill, 901 F.2d 880 (10th Cir. 1990)

The defendant and co-defendant were tried jointly. At the beginning of trial, the co-defendant’s attorney announced that his client would take the stand. In reliance on this prediction, the government introduced the co-defendant’s confession which implicated the defendant. The co-defendant did not take the stand. This constitutes a Bruton violation and the defendant’s conviction was reversed. The defendant cannot be penalized for the co-defendant’s attorney’s inaccurate prediction.

United States v. Brazel, 102 F.3d 1120 (11th Cir. 1996)

Though it was not plain error, the government improperly elicited testimony that one non-testifying co-defendant inculpated another defendant in his out-of-court statement.

Glock v. Singletary, 36 F.3d 1014 (11th Cir. 1994), rev’d on other grounds 65 F.3d 878 (11th Cir. 1995)

The state violated Bruton by introducing a non-testifying co-defendant’s confession. Even though the confessions “interlocked,” this does not eliminate the Bruton concerns. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Costa, 31 F.3d 1073 (11th Cir. 1994)

The government offered the confession of a co-defendant (who was not on trial with the defendant) which implicated both the defendant on trial, and the co-defendant, himself. The government relied on Rule 804(b)(3). The court reversed: even though the statement might appear to be against the declarant’s penal interest, the part of the statement implicating the defendant was not sufficiently against the declarant’s penal interest to be admissible under this theory. Under Bruton, such statements must be excluded. The declarant’s statement was made while he was in custody, and after he was told by the AUSA that if he did not provide substantial assistance, he would face life in prison.

United States v. Veltmann, 6 F.3d 1483 (11th Cir. 1993)

The Bruton violation in this case was not harmless error. Admitting evidence of a co-defendant’s jailhouse statement to a cellmate which implicated the defendant was reversible error.

United States v. Beale, 921 F.2d 1412 (11th Cir. 1991)

A non-testifying co-defendant’s post-arrest statement that another co-defendant used the alias “Bee” should not have been admitted at trial. Bruton errors are subject to the constitutional harmless error test. The error in this case was not harmless and the conviction of this defendant was reversed.
United States v. Perez-Garcia, 904 F.2d 1534 (11th Cir. 1990)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce testimony concerning what the defendant’s co-conspirator stated to a DEA agent following his arrest. An arrest amounts to a termination of the conspiracy and under Bruton, such statements are hearsay and are inadmissible. The failure to object to the introduction of this testimony, however, precluded reversal.

United States v. Pendegraph, 791 F.2d 1462 (11th Cir. 1986)

Even though the co-defendant’s confession was redacted to omit the defendant’s name, its admission was error under Bruton. There was no possible person other than the defendant who could have been referred to as “the individual” in the co-defendant’s confession.
CARJACKING

The carjacking statute makes it a federal crime to take a car by force, violence, or intimidation with the intent to cause death or serious bodily harm. Here, the defendant testified that he had no intent to cause death, or serious bodily harm, unless the driver resisted. The Court held that this "conditional intent" is sufficient to support a conviction.

_United States v. Bailey_, 819 F.3d 92 (4th Cir. 2016)

Fleeing from the police, the defendant jumped into a car being driven by the victim and implored the victim, “Drive, drive, drive, I’ll pay you anything.” The victim refused and the defendant placed a “cold hard object against the back of his neck.” Though the victim was justifiably scared, there was no evidence that the defendant actually had a weapon, or that his conduct satisfied the _Holloway_ standard. Conviction reversed.

_United States v. Petruk_, 781 F.3d 438 (8th Cir. 2015)

The defendant stole a truck belonging to Behning, but Behning was not present. When Behning was informed about the theft, he confronted the defendant shortly thereafter twice. On the first occasion, the defendant briefly stopped, then drove off; on the second occasion, the defendant pulled over in the truck and went back to the vehicle being driven by Behning and assaulted him and then drove off. Neither of these encounters qualified as carjacking. The defendant did not act with intent to cause death or serious bodily harm and the vehicle was not taken from the person of the victim (he was not present when the car was stolen).

_Brown v. Palmer_, 441 F.3d 347 (6th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was the driver of a car from which two occupants suddenly jumped out and carjacked another car. He jumped out of his car and ran away. The evidence did not establish that the driver was a participant in the crime.

_United States v. Harris_, 420 F.3d 467 (5th Cir. 2005)

The government failed to prove that the defendant, at the moment he seized control of the victim’s car, had the intent to kill or harm the victim if necessary to take the car.
CHANGE OF VENUE

United States v. Casellas-Toro, 807 F.3d 380 (1st Cir. 2015)

Three months after being convicted in a highly publicized murder trial in Puerto Rico, the defendant was tried for lying to FBI agents in an interview that preceded the murder but which was allegedly the defendant’s set-up to commit the murder of his wife. The presumption of prejudice was undeniable: the live broadcast of his sentencing in the murder case had “top Nielsen ratings.” Virtually all of the jurors knew about the murder conviction and two-thirds were disqualified for cause. The evidence in this case clearly satisfied the test of Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358 (2010).

In re Tsarnaev, 780 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 2015)

Though deciding that a change of venue was not required in the Boston Marathon Bombing case, the First Circuit thoroughly reviews the law on this topic in both the majority and dissenting opinions.

United States v. Garza, 593 F.3d 385 (5th Cir. 2010)

For reasons that were not adequately explained in the record, the district court transferred the case from one district to another, over the objection of the defendants. The trial was held 300 miles away from the original venue and several of the appointed defense attorneys were replaced. Though there was some indication that the reason for the transfer was the recusal of the initial judge (the defendants did move to recuse the judge), there was inadequate justification for transferring the case pursuant to Fed.R.Crim.P. 18.

United States v. Stanko, 528 F.3d 581 (8th Cir. 2008)

Fed.R.Crim.P. 18 requires that a district court give due regard to the convenience of the defendant and witnesses and the prompt administration of justice when deciding where, within the district the trial will be held. In this case, there was a Local Rule prescribing that all trials would be held in one of two divisions within the district. The defendant complained that these divisions were far from his home and requested that trial be held in a division closer to his home. The district court denied the motion, but there was no indication that the district court considered the factors (convenience of defendant and witnesses) in denying the motion. This was error. See also United States v. Burns, 662 F.2d 1378 (11th Cir. 1981) (same).

Daniels v. Woodford, 428 F.3d 1181 (9th Cir. 2005)

The saturated press coverage in the community of this double police officer homicide mandated a finding that there was a presumption of prejudice and, therefore, a change of venue should have been granted.

In the Matter of Balsimo, 68 F.3d 185 (7th Cir. 1995)

A refusal to transfer a criminal case can be challenged by means of a petition for a writ of mandamus. In this case, the lower court used the incorrect legal standard in evaluating a motion for change of venue under Rule 21(b). The lower court held that a change of venue would only be appropriate if the movant established “truly compelling circumstances.” It is enough if, all relevant things considered, the case would be better off transferred to another district.
CHARACTER EVIDENCE

SEE ALSO: EVIDENCE (Rule 404(a))

United States v. Hough, 803 F.3d 1181 (11th Cir. 2015)

The Eleventh Circuit affirmed its prior holding that “guilt-assuming” hypotheticals are inappropriate in cross-examining good character witnesses. See United States v. Guzman, 167 F.3d 1350 (11th Cir. 1999). In this case, however, the questions posed by defense counsel opened the door to this type of cross-examination. The defense attorney asked the witnesses if their opinion would remain the same about the defendant’s character if they were aware of the allegations in the indictment and the witnesses responded, “I wouldn’t believe it.”

United States v. Yarbrough, 527 F.3d 1092 (10th Cir. 2008)

The trial court erred in excluding good character evidence in this obstruction of justice trial. The fact that the defendant acknowledged committing the acts with which he was charged did not foreclose him from contending that he did not act willfully in violation of the law. His reputation for law-abidingness, and his general good character were relevant on this issue.

United States v. De Leon, 728 F.3d 500 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant did not testify at trial. The defense called a character witness who was asked if the defendant was a law-abiding person. The prosecutor objected, citing Rule 608(a). The trial court improperly sustained the objection. Rule 404(a) allows the defense to introduce evidence of the defendant’s law-abiding trait. This rule applies regardless of whether the defendant testifies. Rule 608(a), on the other hand, only applies to the credibility of a witness (either the defendant, or any other witness), and focuses on the issues of truthfulness, not law-abidingness. Harmless error.

United States v. Kellogg, 510 F.3d 188 (3rd Cir. 2007)

Generally, the government is not permitted to cross-examine a “reputation” good character witness in a manner that assumes the guilt of the defendant, because the witness could only speculate about the affect these assumed facts would have on the defendant’s reputation (i.e., other people’s opinion about the defendant). However, an “opinion” character witness may be asked hypothetical questions that assume the guilt of the defendant.

United States v. Ndiaye, 434 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was on trial for immigration fraud and related offenses. The government obtained a copy of a letter he wrote to a neighbor, which documented his extra-marital affair with the neighbor. When the defendant called a character witness in his defense, the prosecutor questioned the character witness about the defendant’s character, assuming he was the author of the letter and assuming he was engaged in an extra-marital affair. This was improper cross-examination of the character witness, because an extra-marital affair does not relate directly to the defendant’s truthfulness and honesty. Harmless error.

United States v. Damblu, 134 F.3d 490 (2d Cir. 1998)
The defendant defended a drug charge on the basis that he was entrapped into selling drugs to the agent on one occasion. He admitted that one sale. In cross-examining a character witness, the prosecutor asked, "In your opinion a person would not be honest if he went around selling crack, would he?" This was improper. Though a character witness may be cross-examined about a matter that the defendant admits, this cross-examination assumed that the defendant sold drugs on other occasions. Harmless error.

United States v. Oshatz, 912 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1990)

Though not reversible error, it was improper for the government to cross-examine the defendant’s character witnesses in a manner which assumed the guilt of the defendant. That is, the prosecutor may not pose a hypothetical to the character witnesses, assuming the facts as alleged by the government and then asking whether the character witnesses’ assessment of the defendant would remain the same assuming the truth of the hypothetical.

United States v. Mason, 993 F.2d 406 (4th Cir. 1993)

Guilt-assuming hypotheticals posed to a good character witness are inappropriate. This is so regardless of whether the good character witness offers his personal opinion, or reputation evidence. Reversible error.

United States v. Siers, 873 F.2d 747 (4th Cir. 1989)

Though not requiring reversal, it was improper to permit the prosecutor to cross-examine character witnesses in a manner that assumed that the defendant was guilty of the offense for which he was on trial.

United States v. Monteleone, 77 F.3d 1086 (8th Cir. 1996)

When a prosecutor cross examines a defendant’s reputation good character witness the prosecutor must not only have a good faith basis for believing that the defendant committed the offense (which the witness is being asked about), but also that the offense is known in the community. Here, the prosecutor believed that the defendant lied in a grand jury proceeding in the past, but that was not a matter that could have been known in the community and therefore it was improper – reversible error – to question the character witness about his knowledge that the defendant had lied in the grand jury room.

United States v. Wilson, 983 F.2d 221 (11th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was charged with engaging in a scheme to defraud banks by selling to an undercover agent credit card numbers. In cross-examining his good character witnesses, the prosecutor asked if their opinion would be the same if they knew that he had engaged in a scheme to sell these credit card numbers. This was not error, because the defendant did not deny selling the credit card numbers – he claimed he did it for an innocent purpose (selling a list of customers). Because the cross-examination did not assume the guilt of the accused, that is, the question did not assume that the defendant had the requisite mens rea, this was not improper cross-examination. See United States v. Candelaria-Gonzalez, 547 F.2d 291 (5th Cir. 1977).

ENTICING A MINOR FOR SEX
INTERSTATE OFFENSES
SEX TOURISM

United States v. Davis, 854 F.3d 601 (9th Cir. 2017)
The defendant was charged with sexual exploitation of a minor. The indictment alleged that he recruited the child to participate in a sex video, “knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that the person had not attained the age of 18.” The jury instruction, however, the trial court instructed the jury that the knowledge requirement of the offense could be satisfied with roof that “the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to observe “the person].” This amounted to a constructive amendment of the indictment, because it provided the jury a path to conviction that was not alleged in the indictment. See also United States v. Dipentino, 242 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2001).

United States v. DeFoggi, 839 F.3d 701 (8th Cir. 2016)
18 U.S.C. § 2252A(g) makes it a crime to engage in a child exploitation enterprise. This offense (like the drug CCE statute), requires proof that the defendant participate in three felony violations involving more than one victim and that these offense are commited in concert with three or more other persons. In this case, the court held that participating in a chat room and viewing child pornography available on a website that other child pornography viewers also view does not satisfy the “in concert” element of this offense.

United States v. Daniels, 653 F.3d 399 (6th Cir. 2011)
The defendant was charged with engaging in a child exploitation enterprise, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2252A(g)(2). This offense requires proof of three or more violations (a “series”) involving more than one victim, undertaken in concert with at least three or more persons. The “in concert” element cannot include child victims, even if the “victims” are consenting child pornography, or child prostitution participants. In this case, the government failed to prove that there were three or more people acting in concert with the defendant.

United States v. Broxmeyer, 616 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2010)
The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. § 2423, transporting a minor in interstate commerce with intent that the individual engaged in any sexual activity for which any person can be charged with a criminal offense. This statute is the offspring of the original Mann Act, which dealt primarily with transporting prostitutes across state lines. In this case, the defendant was a field hockey coach who was charged with transporting one of his players (a minor) across state lines in connection with a practice and engaging in sexual conduct with her. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction, because there was insufficient evidence to support the government’s theory that the defendant caused the defendant to travel across state lines with regard to the trip to the practice (her father drove her to the practice and was available to pick her up the next day, so the defendant was not the cause of her interstate travel). The defendant did eventually drive the minor back home after practice and during the return trip, they engaged in sexual conduct. However, the evidence established that the sexual conduct occurred prior to the crossing of a state line and in order to be guilty of a § 2423 offense, the defendant must form the intent to engage in sexual conduct before crossing the state line and then engage in the sexual conduct after crossing the state line.

United States v. Taylor, 640 F.3d 255 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant masturbated in front of a webcam while communicating with a child (actually, a police officer who he thought was a child) and also invited the girl to masturbate. He was prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 2422: using a means of interstate commerce to knowingly persuade, induce, entice or coerce any child to engage in any sexual activity for which any person can be charged with a criminal offense, or attempt to do so. Judge Posner decided that this activity did not constitute “sexual activity.” There is no definition of the term in the code. The term “sexual act” in a subsequent section of the code does require proof of physical contact.

United States v. Cherer, 513 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2008)

When a defendant has targeted an adult decoy posing as a child, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant believed that the person he was targeting was a child in order to convict the defendant for an offense under 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b).
CHILD SUPPORT RECOVERY ACT

United States v. Kerley, 544 F.3d 172 (2d Cir. 2008)
The defendant’s failure to pay child support in accordance with a court order to two children (twins) amounted to one § 228 violation.

United States v. Fields, 500 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2007)
The CSRA (18 U.S.C. § 228) requires proof that the defendant willfully failed to pay a past due support obligation to his child who resided in another state. Is the state required to prove that the defendant knew that his child resided in another state? According to this decision, the answer is “yes.” Though the “out of state” requirement is also a federal jurisdictional element of the offense, the court concludes that defendant’s knowledge of the location of the child is also an element of the offense that the government must prove.

United States v. Bigford, 365 F.3d 859 (10th Cir. 2004)
The Deadbeat Parents Punishment Act of 1998 criminalizes the willful failure to pay a support obligation with respect to a child who resides in another state. 18 U.S.C. § 228(a). Though virtually every Circuit to have considered the issue has held that the defendant may not attack the substantive lawfulness of the underlying state support obligation or permit a federal court to revise the order in any way, the Tenth Circuit holds that the federal court may inquire into the jurisdictional validity of the underlying support obligation. Thus, if the court that issued the support obligation lacked personal jurisdiction over the defendant and issued a default judgment, the defendant in a federal Deadbeat Parents case may raise that as a defense.

United States v. Mussari, 152 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 1998)
The defendant’s CSRA conviction was reversed because the court improperly considered conduct that occurred prior to the enactment of the statute. The Ninth Circuit also questioned the government’s selection of defendants: “In choosing among the thousands of persons delinquent in honoring their child support obligations, the government need not show itself an unfeeling monster, or make the law hideous, by selecting as its target an ineffectual worker, plagued by accidents and bad luck, without assets to make any restitution, without children to whom he has any legal connection, and with a present wife and family to whom he has important ties.”
CIGARETTE OFFENSES

United States v. Mohamed, 759 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 2014)

The government failed to prove that the cigarettes in the possession of the defendant were required to bear a tax stamp, because there was not sufficient proof that the cigarettes had been shipped, sold, distributed or consumed in Indiana. This is a prerequisite for proof of a violation of the state tax law. See 18 U.S.C. § 2341.

United States v. Tang Nguyen, 758 F.3d 1024 (8th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with conspiracy to fraudulently import contraband cigarettes. The Eighth Circuit held that although this is a general intent crime, the government is still required to prove “knowledge” that the defendant was transacting in contraband cigarettes. She undeniably knew that she was receiving cigarettes from overseas, but there was insufficient proof that she knew that they were contraband. A knowingly violation of the law requires proof that the defendant knew the essential facts, even if she did not know the law regarding contraband cigarettes.
CLASSIFIED INFORMATION PROCEDURE ACT

United States v. Sedaghaty, 728 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 2013)

In a lengthy opinion reviewing various aspects of this tax prosecution that involved terrorist funding, the Ninth Circuit held that the government violated CIPA by providing an unclassified summary of classified information that was not a fair summary of the exculpatory information.
CLOSING ARGUMENT

(Comment on Evidence or Information not in the Record or Mischaracterization of Evidence)

United States v. Davis, 863 F.3d 894 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

The defendant and his mother were prosecuted for tax offenses relating to their tax preparation business. The son was, at most, a minimal participant in the offense. During closing argument, however, the prosecutor stated that the “staggering” amount of money that he made, coupled with his failure to report his income, was evidence of his guilt. There was no evidence, however, about his income, or his underreporting of income on his taxes. The trial court’s cautionary instruction that the lawyers’ arguments are not evidence did not cure the harm caused by the prosecutor’s misrepresentations during closing argument. Along with other misstatements at closing argument, this misconduct necessitated reversing his conviction.

United States v. Maloney, 755 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc)

At the request of the government, the defendant’s conviction was reversed based on the prosecutor’s improper closing argument that discussed evidence that was not included in the record of the trial. At oral argument the prosecutor acknowledged that he had “sandbagged” the defense by waiting until rebuttal argument to mention the “evidence” but did not concede that this was improper. The U.S. Attorney for the district later filed a motion requesting that the conviction be vacated.

United States v. Wright, 625 F.3d 583 (9th Cir. 2010)

During the prosecutor’s closing argument in this child pornography case, he stated that he had tried numerous similar cases and that it was not infrequent for the defendant to blame the crime on his roommate, or that some other person (or hacker) put the child pornography on his computer, and that the interrogating officer did something wrong. The prosecutor then commented that seeing all three arguments in one case—a trifecta—was unusual. The Ninth Circuit held that this argument was improper, because it amounted to introducing evidence that was not in the record and also “denigrated the defense as a sham.” Harmless error.

United States v. Klebig, 600 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2009)

In this firearms prosecution, the prosecutor conducted a “demonstration” during the closing argument, showing that a device (described as a silencer) fit over a shotgun. There had been no testimony explaining this, and no opportunity for the defense to challenge the demonstration. This was reversible error.

United States v. Reyes, 577 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir. 2009)

In this “combative” trial involving allegations of illegal options back-dating, the defendant, who was a corporate executive who signed corporate financial statements defended on the basis that he thought the Finance Department was aware of the back-dating and properly documented the options transactions in the financial statements. Only one person from the Finance Department testified for the government and she testified that she did not know about the back-dating. However, the government knew – both through FBI interviews and through a pending SEC lawsuit against other people in the Finance Department – that people in the Finance Department were aware of the back-dating. No other people from the Finance Department testified (in part because they asserted the Fifth Amendment right not to testify). In closing argument, the defendant argued that other people in the Finance Department knew (though there was no evidence of this at trial). The government then responded that no other people in the Finance Department knew (though the government knew that this was false). The Ninth Circuit held that this amounted to prosecutorial misconduct that necessitated reversing the conviction.

“We do not lightly tolerate a prosecutor asserting as a fact to the jury something known to be untrue or, at the very least, that the prosecution had every strong reason to doubt.”

United States v. Farinella, 558 F.3d 695 (7th Cir. 2009)

In this case involving misbranded food, the prosecutor repeatedly misrepresented the nature of the evidence. The food that the defendant purchases wholesale had a “best when sold by” date on the label. He changed that date and re-sold the food. There was no evidence what the “best when sold by” date referred to. There was no evidence that the food expired or was unhealthy after that date. Nevertheless, throughout the trial, the prosecutor referred to the food as having “expired” and being rancid and suggested that it posed a health risk. None of this was true. To make matters considerably worse, the prosecutor also decried the “high-paid” lawyer and urged the jury not to let the defendant “buy his way” out of a conviction. All of these comments amounted to reversible error and merited sanctions imposed on the prosecutor. Because the conviction was reversed on sufficiency grounds, the appellate court could not provide any further relief to the defendant.

United States v. Mendoza, 522 F.3d 482 (5th Cir 2008)

A prosecutor may not comment, during closing argument, on the defendant’s demeanor at counsel table in a case in which the defendant did not testify. Harmless error.

United States v. Azubike, 504 F.3d 30 (1st Cir. 2007)

The AUSA mistakenly stated during rebuttal closing argument that a taped conversation revealed that the defendant did know one of the co-conspirators. This was inaccurate, yet the prosecutor made the statement twice. Though it was not shown that the prosecutor intentionally misled the jury, the “misconduct” was prejudicial and required that the conviction be reversed. The trial judge’s admonition that lawyer’s arguments are not evidence and instruction to the jury to listen to the tapes and make up their own mind about what was said was not an adequate cure. Because portions of the tape were unintelligible, the prosecutor’s statement might have served as a substitute for the evidence which could not be heard by the jury.

United States v. Carpenter, 494 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with mail and wire fraud in connection with a scheme by which he defrauded investors into investing money with him based on the safe nature of the investments he would make. In fact, his investments were very risky and he lost considerable money. During trial, the defense repeatedly objected to references to “gambling” by the government’s expert witnesses and the trial court noted that the focus of the allegations was on the representations made by the defendant at the time the money was obtained, not his ultimate trading losses. Nevertheless, the prosecutor repeatedly made references to gambling and gambling metaphors during the closing arguments. The trial court granted a new trial based on these arguments and the First Circuit affirmed.

Hodge v. Hurly, 426 F.3d 368 (6th Cir. 2005)

The Sixth Circuit wrote, “During his egregiously improper closing argument, the prosecutor commented on the credibility of witnesses, misrepresented the facts of the case, made derogatory remarks about the defendant, and generally tried to convince the jury to convict on the basis of bad character, all while defense trial counsel sat idly by. We conclude that defendant’s trial counsel was constitutionally ineffective in failing to object to this misconduct . . .”

United States v. Silva, 380 F.3d 1018 (7th Cir. 2004)

On more than occasion during the course of the trial, the government offered evidence that was clearly hearsay (including what informant’s told the police and the results of drug tests by crime labs) under the theory that the testimony was offered to explain the officers’ conduct, not for the truth of the matter asserted in the out of court statement. The Seventh Circuit reversed. The evidence was compounded by the prosecutor’s closing argument during which he relied on the hearsay evidence to show that the defendant was guilty.

During the trial, several defense witnesses were cross-examined about when they first told anybody their “story.” They responded that they told the defense attorney’s investigator several months earlier. The court took judicial notice that defense attorney had been retained just prior to trial. However, there was discussion between counsel and the court (not heard by the jury) that the newly-retained attorney had been in contact with the defendant prior to being retained for several months. During closing argument, the prosecutor asked the jury to infer that the witnesses were lying, because it was unreasonable to assume that a newly retained attorney would have talked to these witnesses prior to being retained. This was an improper argument because it asked the jury to infer facts that the prosecutor knew, in fact, to be untrue. “The prosecutor had every reason to doubt, and no good reason to support, the inferences he propounded to the jury in his closing argument.” Reversible error.

United States v. Maddox, 156 F.3d 1280 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

When the police approached the defendant on the street, he was seen dropping a key. The police retrieved the key and in the car that it matched a gun was found. The defendant was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. The key was not introduced in evidence and the defense made a point of that failure. In closing argument, the prosecutor stated that the key was returned to the rental car company. But there was no evidence that this is what occurred and it was not a reasonable inference from the record. The prosecutor added that the there were other witnesses (police officers) who would have testified about seeing the defendant drop the keys, but that it was unnecessary. The Court of Appeals wrote, “When a prosecutor starts telling the jury about what other potential witnesses would have said if the government had only called them, it is time not merely to sustain an objection but to issue a stern rebuke and a curative instruction, or if there can be no cure, to entertain a motion for a mistrial.” Conviction reversed.

290

United States v. Udechukwu, 11 F.3d 1101 (1st Cir. 1993)
The defendant was arrested carrying heroin at the airport in Puerto Rico. She immediately agreed to cooperate and claimed that she had been coerced into carrying the drugs by a sinister drug dealer in Aruba. The government investigated the identity of the Aruba connection and in fact determined that this person existed and was the target of an ongoing investigation. This was not made known to the defense. During closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly expressed skepticism about this supplier, intimating that there was no such person, or that he was not whom the defendant claimed he was. This was prosecutorial misconduct necessitating a reversal. The improper withholding of Brady information, coupled with the misleading closing argument denied the defendant her due process rights.

United States v. Santana-Camacho, 833 F.2d 371 (1st Cir. 1987)
Although no objection was raised at trial, the prosecutor’s remark in closing argument that the defendant had illegally entered into the United States required reversal. There was no evidence that the defendant had entered the country illegally during the course of this trial where the defendant was charged with transporting illegal aliens within the United States.

United States v. Forlorma, 94 F.3d 91 (2d Cir. 1996)
The prosecutor’s closing argument had no factual basis in the record. The defendant was arrested at the airport when customs agents found four kilos of heroin in one of his suitcases. The defendant denied ownership of that bag, claiming that someone else gave him the suitcase before he boarded his flight back to the U.S. In closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly stated that one of the suits in the suitcase fit the defendant. There was no evidence to support this argument. Considering these unsupported statements in the context of the entire trial, the defendant was denied a fair trial. Even after cautionary instructions to the jury and sustaining the objection of defense counsel, this argument had too great a potential to mislead the jury.

United States v. Valentine, 820 F.2d 565 (2d Cir. 1987)
The prosecutor committed reversible error by mischaracterizing the testimony during the closing argument. Specifically, the prosecutor referred to the witness’ grand jury testimony inaccurately.

United States v. Molina-Guevara, 96 F.3d 698 (3rd Cir. 1996)
The government’s case against the defendant relied on the testimony of one co-conspirator, as well as a statement made by the defendant to two interviewing government agents. Only one of the agents testified at trial. The defense attorney, in closing argument, suggested that the testifying agent was erroneous in her testimony about the defendant’s statement. The prosecutor responded by stating that the other agent who was present (but who did not testify) would support the testifying agent’s testimony. This was reversible error. It was also reversible error for the prosecutor to state, with regard to the agent who did testify, that it was ridiculous to suggest that the government would put liars on the stand.

United States v. Kang, 934 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1991)
It was reversible error to permit a prosecutor to argue to the jury that hearsay evidence admitted for the sole purpose of explaining an agent’s conduct (in initiating an investigation) was substantive evidence of the defendant’s predisposition to commit the offense. The evidence was admitted for a limited purpose and it could not be used for another purpose in the closing argument.

United States v. Murrah, 888 F.2d 24 (5th Cir. 1989)

During the course of the defendant’s trial on charges of mail fraud in connection with an arson scheme, the prosecutor, in opening statement, promised that a witness would be presented who had been solicited by the defendant to burn the building previously. The witness never appeared. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the defense had tried to hide a witness from the prosecution. No such evidence of an effort to hide a witness had been presented at trial. These comments required reversal of the conviction even though the court sustained objections to the improper remarks. A prosecutor may not directly refer to, or even allude to, evidence that was not adduced at trial; he may not give a personal opinion about the veracity of a witness; and he may not suggest that other supportive evidence exists which the government chose not to develop.

United States v. Catton, 89 F.3d 387 (7th Cir. 1996)

The conviction in this case was reversed, because a government agent lied on the stand (he claimed to have talked to a third party about critical evidence the day before, when, in fact, he had one of his agents ask the witness to fax information to the government’s case agent) and the prosecutor, in closing argument, misstated the evidence on a crucial point.

United States v. Keskey, 863 F.2d 474 (7th Cir. 1988)

The prosecutor committed error in arguing during his rebuttal argument about why a potential government witness was not called. The prosecutor knew that his offered explanation was not honest. However, the witness was not a key witness and the error did not constitute plain error.

United States v. Kojayan, 8 F.3d 1315 (9th Cir. 1993)

Three people were caught smuggling drugs. Two defendants went to trial, while the third provided information to the government. The cooperating individual did not testify. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the third individual could not be compelled to testify. This was not true; the witness had signed a cooperation agreement and the government withheld this from the defense and the jury. This type of misconduct on the part of the government necessitated reversing the conviction. The government made this argument in response to the defendant’s argument that the government failed to call the cooperating individual, and therefore the witness probably had nothing to say that was favorable to the government. The government’s response was untrue and thus unfairly undercut the defendants’ argument.

United States v. Schuler, 813 F.2d 978 (9th Cir. 1987)

During closing argument, the prosecutor referred to the defendant’s laughing during the trial. The defendant did not testify in this case and these remarks by the prosecutor constituted reversible error: It was an attempt to put the defendant’s character in issue and also represented a comment on his failure to testify. Finally, references to the defendant’s demeanor while at counsel table represented the introduction of evidence during the closing argument which was not admitted at trial.
United States v. Word, 129 F.3d 1209 (11th Cir. 1997)

A man and woman were charged with securities fraud and related offenses. They were romantically involved when the offenses were occurred, and subsequently were married. The wife sought to offer evidence at their joint trial that she was battered and obeyed her husband’s demands without question. The trial court excluded this evidence. The government, however, then argued that the wife had to have guilty knowledge – after all, she was married to the man who orchestrated the fraud – and the jury never learned about the acrimony in their relationship. The combination of allowing the government to make this argument and excluding the defendant’s evidence was reversible error.

Davis v. Zant, 36 F.3d 1538 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defense contended that another person was the actual perpetrator of the murder and that person gave a taped confession to the defense. At trial, however, the actual perpetrator refused to testify and the trial court ruled that her statement could not be admitted. During his testimony, the defendant referred to the perpetrator’s confession. This was improper testimony on the part of the defendant, but the prosecutor engaged in improper conduct by objecting with the statement, “that is not true, and it’s not evidence.” Also, in closing argument, the prosecutor argued that this theory of another perpetrator was a recent fabrication of the defense. This argument was a blatant lie. The prosecutor intentionally painted for the jury a distorted picture of the realities of this case in order to secure a conviction.

United States v. Blakey, 14 F.3d 1557 (11th Cir. 1994)

During closing argument, the prosecutor stated that the defendant was a professional criminal; that he presented insufficient exculpatory evidence; and that he was arrested with false credit cards, indicating that the defendant had “real problems.” Each of these remarks was improper. There was no evidence of any prior record – the defendant was not a “professional criminal.” The failure to introduce exculpatory evidence was an improper burden-shifting argument; and the reference to the circumstances of the arrest violated a pretrial agreement limiting the relevance of this evidence. The cumulative effect of these arguments required a reversal, even though the trial court instructed the jury to disregard these arguments.

Mann v. Dugger, 817 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1987), reh’g on other grounds, 844 F.2d 1446 (11th Cir. 1988)

The prosecutor blatantly mischaracterized the defendant’s expert testimony when he stated during his closing argument the defendant had admitted other criminal episodes to the psychiatrist. The prosecutor further erred in telling the jury that he had not shown the jury everything that was available but only that evidence which the judge would permit him to introduce.

The defendant was charged with conspiring with another person to steal her leased car so she could get out from the onerous payments. In closing argument, that prosecutor told the jury that the payments were $600 per month for four more years and this was what motivated the crime. However, this was inaccurate, because had she turned the car back in, the value of the car would have been deducted from this amount and, in fact, she would have had to pay almost nothing. The prosecutor’s erroneous closing argument was reversible error because of its substantial misrepresentation of fact that provided a non-existent motive to commit the crime.
United States v. Foster, 982 F.2d 551 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

During closing argument, the prosecutor made repeated references – some implicit, some explicit – to the fact that the defendant had made numerous prior drug sales. There was no evidence of this at trial, however. Such comments as “There were some complaints” and “The cloud started long, long, before” clearly suggested that there was additional evidence which was not presented at trial. This was impermissible argument by the prosecutor.

United States v. Perholtz, 842 F.2d 343 (D.C.Cir. 1988)

Though not plain error, the prosecutor’s closing remarks about the purpose of bank accounts in the Cayman Islands was unsupported by any evidence in the case.
CLOSING ARGUMENT
(Improper Comment on Defendant's Failure to Testify)

Ford v. Wilson, 747 F.3d 944 (7th Cir. 2014)

Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976) prohibits impeaching a defendant with the defendant’s post-Miranda silence (i.e., “You didn’t tell this story after you were arrested, did you?”). In Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), the Supreme Court held that a prosecutor may not comment during closing argument about the defendant’s failure to testify at trial. Both of these decisions address the improper suggestion that invoking the Fifth Amendment can be costly to the defendant. Griffin, however, is subject to exceptions if the defense attorney’s closing argument raises the issue and the prosecutor is simply responding. United States v. Robinson, 485 U.S. 25 (1988). In this case, the defendant was charged with murder. The defense attorney argued in his closing that the prosecutor failed to prove any motive why the defendant would kill the victim. In response, in his closing, the prosecutor argued that there were only two people were there who could explain what happened and one of them was dead. “The next possible source is the person who committed the offense. If that person who committed the offense don’t talk, how would we ever know?” In this habeas, case, the Seventh Circuit ultimately held that habeas relief was not required for procedural reasons.

United States v. Lopez, 818 F.3d 125 (3rd Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. At trial he protested that he was framed by the police. After having been Mirandized, he made no statements. Yet, the prosecutor cross-examined the defendant about his failure to raise this “framed” defense prior to trial and also argued to the jury that this was a reason to question the defendant’s credibility. This violated Doyle and was reversible error.

Gongora v. Thaler, 710 F.3d 267 (5th Cir. 2013)

Repeatedly during his closing argument, the prosecutor rhetorically asked, “Who do you expect to hear from?” This rhetorical question was posed in connection with the various people in a car from which shots were fired. The defendant was one of the occupants. The prosecutor said, “You’re not going to hear from the shooter, of course.” And he then tried to correct this improper comment, by saying, “of course the defendant has no duty to testify.” He then continued to rhetorically ask, “Who do you expect to hear from?” Though the state trial judge repeatedly sustained objections and also instructed the jury to disregard the improper comments, the Fifth Circuit held that this was a violation of the defendant’s Fifth Amendment rights and necessitated granting a writ of habeas corpus.

Girts v. Yanai, 501 F.3d 743 (6th Cir. 2007)

During closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly made reference to the “only person” who could answer certain questions. This amounted to an improper comment on the defendant’s failure to testify. Trial counsel’s failure to object and preserve the error for appellate review was ineffective assistance of counsel.

Ben-Yisrayl v. Davis, 431 F.3d 1043 (7th Cir. 2005)
The prosecutor made improper comments during closing argument that focused on the defendant’s failure to offer an explanation at trial why he had confessed to the murder if he had not, in fact, committed the murder: “Let the defendant tell you why somebody would freely and voluntarily confess . . .” See Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965).

DePew v. Anderson, 311 F.3d 742 (6th Cir. 2002)

The prosecutor’s improper comment on the defendant’s failure to testify, along with numerous other improper comments deprived the defendant of a fair death penalty sentencing proceeding. The Sixth Circuit granted the writ, noting that the state court’s statement that despite the errors, the brutality of the murder supported the community’s expectation of the death penalty, was not the proper way to evaluate constitutional violations.

United States v. Johnston, 127 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1997)

The prosecutor erred in arguing to the jury that they should not go back to the jury room and "make up a story" for the defendants. He continued, "You can't play 'what if.' You can't say, 'Well, if they testified, well, maybe they would have explained this. Maybe they would have said that.'" This amounted to an improper comment on the defendants' failure to testify.

United States v. Roberts, 119 F.3d 1006 (1st Cir. 1997)

The prosecutor stated in closing argument that when the defense decides to present a defense, it has the same responsibility as the government, that is, to present a compelling case. This remark was made immediately after advising the jury that the defendant has no burden to testify and the fact that he did not testify should not be considered by the jury. This argument required setting aside the conviction.

United States v. Hardy, 37 F.3d 753 (1st Cir. 1994)

The prosecutor argued that the two defendants were still “running and hiding,” just as they had the night of the arrest. Because the defendants were in court, they clearly were not hiding. Therefore, this argument could only have been interpreted to mean that the defendants were hiding behind their right not to testify. This was an improper comment on the defendants’ right not to testify and the conviction was reversed.

Floyd v. Meachum, 907 F.2d 347 (2d Cir. 1990)

The Second Circuit holds that the cumulative effect of the prosecutor’s improper arguments denied the defendant a fair trial requiring granting a writ of habeas corpus. Among the prosecutor’s improper statements was the statement that the Fifth Amendment guarantee that a conviction must rely upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt is a shield for the innocent, not a shield for the guilty. The prosecutor also repeatedly referred to her position as a prosecutor, “seeking justice.” Furthermore, the prosecutor’s repeated references to the Fifth Amendment constituted an improper comment on the defendant’s refusal to testify.

United States v. Sardelli, 813 F.2d 654 (5th Cir. 1987)

A prosecutor commented during closing argument about the total absence of defense evidence. There is only one person who could possibly have had any knowledge, the defendant. This constituted an impermissible comment on the defendant’s failure to testify.
Repeated references to the uncontradicted nature of the evidence violated the defendant’s right to remain silent. Actually, much of the evidence was rebutted, the only missing link was the defendant’s testimony. Thus, the conviction must be reversed.

A prosecutor’s comment that the government’s case was “uncontradicted,” “undenied,” “unrebutted,” “undisputed,” “uncontroverted,” etc., amount to a violation of the defendant’s Fifth Amendment rights if the only person who could have contradicted, denied, rebutted or disputed the government’s evidence was the defendant himself. In this case, the remarks satisfied this standard and the defendant’s conviction was reversed.

The prosecutor asked rhetorical questions during closing argument which clearly emphasized the defendant’s failure to testify. Specifically, the prosecutor urged the jury to address questions to defense counsel, repeatedly asking him to explain this, or that, during the defendant’s closing argument: “Ask him why it took him so long to produce his bank records . . . Ask him why he set up separate accounts” etc. This was error; but the defendant did not object and the error did not amount to plain error.

During closing argument, the prosecutor referred to the defendant’s laughing during the trial. The defendant did not testify in this case and these remarks by the prosecutor constituted reversible error: It was an attempt to put the defendant’s character in issue and also represented a comment on his failure to testify. Finally, references to the defendant’s demeanor while at counsel table represented the introduction of evidence during the closing argument which was not admitted at trial.

During the closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly referred to the defendant as the only person who could explain the incriminating evidence, and the evidence went unexplained. The case was sent back to the lower court to determine whether the error was sufficient to warrant setting aside the conviction.
CLOSING ARGUMENT
(Improper Restriction on Defendant’s Closing Argument)

When the prosecutor argues during closing argument that the imposition of the death penalty is the only sure way to ensure that the defendant will not pose a danger to the community in the future, the defendant may argue, or obtain an instruction from the trial court, that the only available option to the death penalty is life without parole.

United States v. Brown, 859 F.3d 730 (9th Cir. 2017)

18 U.S.C. § 2251(d)(1) makes it a crime to advertise the availability of child pornography. The defendant had a bulletin board on his website that advertised the availability of child pornography, but it was a “closed” bulletin board. The government moved in limine to bar the defendant from arguing to the jury that the fact that the bulletin board was “closed” meant that it did not qualify as an advertisement. The trial court granted the motion. The Ninth Circuit reversed. While the defense counsel’s proposed argument did not suggest that a “closed” bulletin board was legally incapable of qualifying as an advertisement, it was fair game to argue that the jury could decide that the closed nature of the bulletin board meant that it did not qualify as an advertisement. It was a fact question, not a legal question and the defendant was entitled to make his argument to the jury.

United States v. Lawson, 494 F.3d 1046 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

A “missing witness” argument is generally only appropriate if the party who supposedly failed to call the witness had a special ability to do so. In this case, involving a sale of drugs, the defendant claimed that there was insufficient evidence that he committed the offense and pointed out in closing argument that one of the supposed witnesses to the sale did not testify. He did not argue, however, that the missing witness presumably had something favorable to say for the defense (and thus was not called by the prosecution). Rather, he was simply pointing out the types of evidence that were not presented (i.e., eyewitness testimony). This was an appropriate argument and the trial court erred in cautioning the jury that the “missing witness” argument was invalid. Harmless error.

United States v. Miguel, 338 F.3d 995 (9th Cir. 2003)

Defense attorney’s efforts to argue to the jury that the shooting was accidental had an evidentiary support in the record and the trial court’s restriction of this argument was constitutional error that required reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Poindexter, 942 F.2d 354 (6th Cir. 1991)

It was reversible error to preclude the defense attorney from arguing about the lack of fingerprint evidence on the container in which the cocaine was found. The attorney simply wanted to argue that the government’s failure to present fingerprint evidence – after it was determined that the container had been “dusted” – was sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt.
United States v. Tory, 52 F.3d 207 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defense should be allowed to argue that the government’s failure to produce relevant evidence within its control gives rise to an inference that the evidence would be unfavorable to it. Here, there was some dispute about what the bank robber was wearing. The bank had surveillance photographs, but they were not introduced in evidence.

United States v. Thompson, 37 F.3d 450 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was arrested at the L.A. airport and her suitcase contained several kilos of crack. She claimed that she was an unwitting mule – her friend gave her the suitcase to bring to a person in Cleveland. The government moved in limine to exclude evidence that the government failed to take any fingerprints from inside the suitcase. The trial court erred in granting this motion: Evidence comes in various forms, some stronger and some weaker, and a defendant is entitled to argue to the jury that the government’s failure to present a particular type of strong evidence against her – e.g., fingerprints – weakens its case. Where, as here, the defense is lack of knowledge, the absence of fingerprint evidence may be argued in closing argument.
CLOSING ARGUMENT
(Improper Vouching or Bolstering)

SEE ALSO: WITNESSES (IMPROPER VOUCHING)

Jordan v. Hepp, 831 F.3d 837 (7th Cir. 2016)

Three times during closing argument the prosecutor vouched for the detective’s credibility, stating that the detective would lose her job if she gave false testimony. This type of improper vouching is improper, because it introduced information to the jury that was not in evidence (the consequences when a detective provides false testimony). Defense counsel was ineffective in failing to object. The attorney’s deficient performance was prejudicial, though a remand was necessary to determine if the attorney had a strategic reason for failing to object.

United States v. Smith, 814 F.3d 268 (5th Cir. 2015)

During closing argument, the prosecutor stated that the government’s witnesses were worthy of belief and also rhetorically questioned why the government would prosecute an innocent person. The prosecutor then stated he was “totally convinced” that a government witness was truthful. Though there was no contemporaneous objection, these improper arguments constituted plain error that resulted in reversing the conviction.

United States v. Alcantara-Castillo, 788 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2015)

It was plain error for the prosecutor to question the defendant, “So it is your testimony that [the agent] was inventing stories about you [in his testimony]?” This cross-examination required setting aside the conviction. See also United States v. Combs, 379 F.3d 564 (9th Cir. 2004), discussed below. Also improper was the prosecutor’s rebuttal closing argument that the agent should be believed, because he is sworn to uphold the law. This improper closing argument merits reversing a conviction, even if the judge promptly tells the jury to disregard the comment.

United States v. Alexander, 741 F.3d 866 (7th Cir. 2014)

It is not proper for the prosecutor to argue that the professional oath taken by law enforcement officers is somehow proof of their veracity. Moreover, it is not proper to argue that a police officer has no “incentive” to lie or falsely implicate the defendant. This argument implies that there is some undisclosed punishment that would occur if the officer testified falsely. Not plain error, however.

United States v. Raney, 633 F.3d 385 (5th Cir. 2011)

The Fifth Circuit strongly condemns the prosecutor’s argument that suggested that “the police have no reason to lie” and “the officers wouldn’t put their careers on the line.” The Fifth Circuit held that the failure of prosecutors to heed the decisions of the appellate courts that forbid this type of argument might result in the court reconsidering its jurisprudence on curative instructions and plain error.

United States v. Miller, 621 F.3d 723 (8th Cir. 2010)

The defense argued that the police officer may have been mistaken about the location that a gun was found (or when or who dropped it). The prosecutor responded by stating that in order to find the defendant not guilty, the jury would have to believe that the officer was lying. This was improper – and inaccurate – and necessitated reversing the conviction. It was also improper to argue that in order to acquit, the jury would have to find that the officer would jeopardize his career by lying in court.

_United States v. McCann_, 613 F.3d 486 (5th Cir. 2010)

A prosecutor should not argue to the jury that it is improper for a defense attorney to challenge the credibility of a police officer, because a police officer risks his life to protect the community and doesn’t deserve to be “shot at again” in the courtroom by defense counsel. Harmless error.

_United States v. Gracia_, 522 F.3d 597 (5th Cir. 2008)

The prosecutor’s rebuttal argument, which offered his personal assurance of the truthfulness of government witnesses (“In my opinion, they were very, very credible witnesses”); and that law enforcement witnesses should be believed because they were doing their job, amounted to plain error requiring reversal of the conviction. The court held that a prosecutor may not ask the jury the rhetorical question whether federal agents would risk their careers to commit perjury.

_United States v. Brown_, 508 F.3d 1066 (D.C. Cir. 2007)

During closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly stated that he believed the government witnesses. Improper vouching suggests to the jury that there may be additional evidence known to the prosecutor that supports the witness’s credibility, and also suggests that the prosecutor, as a representative of the government should be trusted because of his status. There was no objection, however, and the argument of the prosecutor did not satisfy the plain error standard.

_United States v. Harlow_, 444 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 2006)

Telling the jury in closing argument that the trial judge had to approve allowing a cooperating witness to receive a reduced sentence and plea agreement in return for his cooperation (thus vouching for the witness’s credibility) was error, though harmless in this case.

_United States v. Weatherspoon_, 410 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2005)

Two improper arguments by the prosecutor required reversing the conviction: (1) the prosecutor improperly vouched for the the cops’ testimony by arguing that they would lose their jobs if they lied at trial; (2) the prosecutor urged the jury to convict the defendant in order to reduce the crime rate generally.

_United States v. Combs_, 379 F.3d 564 (9th Cir. 2004)

It is not proper for a prosecutor to ask a defendant who is testifying whether a government agent was lying when his testimony was inconsistent with the defendant’s testimony. _See also United States v. Sanchez_, 176 F.3d 1214 (9th Cir. 1999). In this case, the error was plain error, particularly because it was compounded by the prosecutor’s statements in closing argument that in order to acquit the defendant, the jury would have to believe that the agent risked losing his job by lying on the stand. This amounts to improper vouching of the government’s witness.

United States v. Walker, 155 F.3d 180 (3rd Cir. 1998)

At great length, the Third Circuit reviews the law regarding improper vouching by the prosecutor during closing argument. Repeatedly, the prosecutor stated such things as, “I submit that there was no reason for the witness to lie. . .” The court concludes that this does not amount to improper vouching. Where a prosecutor argues that a witness is being truthful based on the testimony given at trial, and does not assure the jury that the credibility of the witness based on his own personal knowledge, the prosecutor is engaging in proper argument and is not vouching. Likewise, a prosecutorial comment that points to a lack of evidence in the record which supports a defendant’s argument that the witness is not credible is proper so long as the comment does not constitute an assurance by the prosecutor that the witness is credible.

United States v. Garcia-Guizar, 160 F.3d 511 (9th Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor committed the sin of vouching when he characterized one witness’s testimony as “compelling” and called the defendant a liar. The prosecutor did not ask the jury to draw inferences from the evidence, but simply announced his view of the defendant’s and witness’s veracity.

United States v. Manning, 23 F.3d 570 (1st Cir. 1994)

During closing argument, the prosecutor declared that the prosecution witnesses were “bound by the truth” and that prosecution witnesses “cannot” engage in lying. This was improper vouching. He also stated that the government “had to be fair” in acknowledging that the partial fingerprints were not sufficient to link the defendant to the briefcase; this implicitly suggested that the fingerprints were the defendant’s, but there were not enough points to allow for a positive identification. These improper statements necessitated reversing the conviction.

United States v. Mejia-Lozano, 829 F.2d 268 (1st Cir. 1987)

It is improper for a prosecutor during closing argument to state that a DEA officer is “honest” and that the witness was “telling you the truth.” However, the error was harmless in this case.

United States v. Ingraldi, 793 F.2d 408 (1st Cir. 1986)

It is improper for a prosecutor to remark during closing argument that the chief government witness, who was a government informant, had not been indicted. Error, but not reversible.

United States v. Melendez, 57 F.3d 238 (2d Cir. 1995)

The prosecutor stated in closing that the trial judge knew the cooperating witness was telling the truth. This was more prejudicial than simply saying the prosecutor believed in the credibility of the witness. Nevertheless, because the court told the jury to disregard the remark and the defense counsel requested no further cure, this was not reversible error.
United States v. Molina-Guevara, 96 F.3d 698 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The government’s case against the defendant relied on the testimony of one co-conspirator, as well as a statement made by the defendant to two interviewing government agents. Only one of the agents testified at trial. The defense attorney, in closing argument, suggested that the testifying agent was erroneous in her testimony about the defendant’s statement. The prosecutor responded by stating that the other agent who was present (but who did not testify) would support the testifying agent’s testimony. This was reversible error. It was also reversible error for the prosecutor to state, with regard to the agent who did testify, that it was ridiculous to suggest that the government would put liars on the stand.

United States v. DiLoreto, 888 F.2d 996 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The prosecutor vouched for the credibility of one of his witnesses, relying on evidence which was not in the record. This is reversible per se. The prosecutor explained to the jury that the government “does not put liars on the stand.” This requires that the conviction be set aside. In a later opinion, the Third Circuit held that, though it was error to make this argument, such errors are not to be considered reversible per se. United States v. Zehrbach, 47 F.3d 1252 (3rd Cir. 1995).

United States v. Carroll, 26 F.3d 1380 (6th Cir. 1994)

In his closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly stressed that the cooperating witnesses would receive no benefit if they told a lie – only by telling the truth could they benefit. Moreover, the prosecutor stressed that the judge would not reduce the witnesses’ sentences if they told a lie. This was improper closing argument. Implicit in these arguments is the suggestion that the government was somehow able to determine the truth by some independent means and that the determination had been made that the witnesses were truthful. The error in this case required a new trial.

United States v. Skarda, 845 F.2d 1508 (8th Cir. 1988)

It was improper for a prosecutor to argue that there was no motive for the government to have an accomplice-witness lie. The prosecutor continued that the government was doing the best it could to convict someone whom the government obviously felt should be convicted. Because of the overwhelming evidence in this case, the error was harmless.

United States v. Frederick, 78 F.3d 1370 (9th Cir. 1996)

The prosecutor engaged in misconduct during her closing argument. First, she improperly vouched for a witness by claiming that the witness’s in-court testimony was consistent with her out-of-court statements to law enforcement agents (but her out-of-court statements were not admitted in court). Second, she complimented the defense attorney for successfully cross-examining a prosecution witness and confusing her on the stand. She also said that the defense attorney’s job is to ask the jury to look at a tiny piece of the evidence, while “the government and the judge will be asking you to consider all of the evidence in making your decision.”

The prosecutor’s closing argument amounted to plain error. The prosecutor argued that his job was to present the truth to the jury and that he would prosecute anybody for perjury who told a lie. He also stated that the court would not let him do anything wrong. He repeatedly stated that his job was not to secure a conviction, but only to present the truth and to turn over all favorable evidence to the defense. Because the witness for whom the prosecutor was vouching was a critical witness for the government, this was plain error – that is, reversible error, despite the absence of a contemporaneous objection.

It is improper for a prosecutor to force a defendant to evaluate the credibility of other witnesses for the government. Thus, when a defendant is testifying, he should not be asked by the prosecutor why government law enforcement agents would lie about him. The error was compounded in this case when the prosecutor stated in closing argument that there was no reason for the law enforcement witnesses to lie and that they would not put their careers on the line by lying in this case. Harmless error in this case.
CLOSING ARGUMENT
(Other Improper Arguments)

United States v. Barragan, 871 F.3d 689 (9th Cir. 2017)

Prosecutors should not implore the jury to return a guilty verdict in order to “send a message” to the community, or to otherwise deter other people from committing crimes. The prosecutor may urge the jury to convict based on what the defendant has done, not what others may do in the future.

United States v. Williams, 836 F.3d 1 (D.C. Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with second degree murder for his role in a “hazing” incident involving another soldier on a military base. The hazing involved several soldiers beating another soldier (with his consent) for a few minutes. The incident resulted in the death of the hazee. The defendant argued that the victim’s consent was relevant to the defendant’s state of mind. Second degree murder requires the government to prove malice and malice can be proven by showing that a defendant intended to kill or, as the government argued here, that he consciously disregarded an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury. While it is true that the defendant cannot “blame the victim,” the defense is still entitled to offer evidence that negates his culpable state of mind. The defense counsel argued that the victims’ consent to being hazed was relevant to the determination whether the defendant acted with malice. In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jury that that was entirely erroneous and that the victim’s consent was not relevant to any issue in the case. After closing argument, the judge declined to issue an instruction that explained that the victim’s consent could be relevant to the issue of malice. The D.C. Circuit reversed the conviction. The victim’s consenting behavior—that is, his “continued, and enthusiastic, statements that he wanted the initiation to continue”—suggested that Williams was not conscious of an extreme risk that Johnson might die or be seriously injured.

Government of the Virgin Islands v. Mills, 821 F.3d 448 (3rd Cir. 2016)

The government made numerous improper arguments during its closing argument, including arguments that suggested to the jurors that they would not be safe, even in their own homes, if the defendant were not convicted; an argument that the gun used by the defendant to kill the victim was never found, so it poses a danger to children; and the use of gruesome crime scene photos of the corpse during the rebuttal closing argument. Nevertheless, these arguments did not satisfy the plain error standard and the conviction was sustained.

United States v. Green-Bowman, 816 F.3d 958 (8th Cir. 2016)

In Judge Bright’s dissenting opinion, he explains why improper argument by the prosecutor concerning the proper way to consider Rule 404(b) evidence should have resulted in a reversal of the conviction in this case. This dissenting opinion persuasively shows that when a prosecutor uses a “paralleling” argument, the jury is likely to consider the 404(b) evidence for an improper propensity purpose. In this case, the defendant was charged with possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. He had previously been convicted of the same offense. The prior offense was admitted to prove “knowledge” that the gun was in the car next to him. In closing argument, the prosecutor argued, “The prior conviction shows what he knows, what happens: When I have a gun, when I run, and when I eventually admit that I had the gun, I get convicted of carrying a weapon. So what did he do here? He walks away, he lies about even being in the car, an obvious lie. He walks away nonchalantly. The defendant knew – based on the context of what he had done previously and what happened the time previously, it shows what he knew on that day and why he acted the way he did.”

A prosecutor’s erroneous explanation of law during closing argument may amount to a violation of due process. In this case, the erroneous explanation was prejudicial and required that the state court conviction be set aside. The defendant was charged with attempted lewd act upon a minor in violation of state law. He was in a chat room and invited a young girl (actually, an undercover agent) to meet him. The first meeting was just going to be a meeting to talk (and he would give her some pie), but no touching. Then, they could have sex on another occasion, if they wanted to. When the defendant arrived at the pre-arranged location, he had the pie with him (and some condoms). He was immediately arrested. The prosecutor argued that to convict the defendant of the attempted offense, the state did not have to prove that he intended to have sex with her that day; the intent could be to have sex at some future day, perhaps a few weeks in the future. This was wrong under state law. Because the defendant’s entire defense was that he was not guilty of attempt, because he had no intention of having sex with the girl that day, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the prosecutor’s misstatements about the law were prejudicial and constituted a violation of clearly established constitutional law. Darden v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 168 (1986). See also Parker v. Matthews, 132 S. Ct. 2148 (2012). United States v. Centeno, 793 F.3d 378 (3rd Cir. 2015)

A constructive amendment of an indictment may occur as a result of a prosecutor’s closing argument. In this case, the defendant was charged with aiding and abetting an assault (in a federal park). In closing argument, the prosecutor argued that the defendant could be found guilty of aiding an abetting the assault if he drove the person who actually committed the assault away from the scene. But this would not be aiding and abetting an assault, because the crime was already completed; instead, this would be accessory after the fact. This argument had the effect of amending the indictment and required setting aside the verdict. Zapata v. Vasquez, 788 F.3d 1106 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with murdering a Mexican man on a street. There was at least one witness who saw the shooting, but he could not hear what was said prior to the two shots being fired, though he could see the shooter gesticulating at the victim. In the prosecutor’s closing argument, he repeatedly asked the jury to imagine the last words heard by the victim, “You fuckin’ wetback.” There was no support for this argument, which was repeated several times during the rebuttal argument. There was no reason for the defense attorney to fail to object to this improper argument. The state habeas court’s conclusion that a defense attorney could have thought that this argument would backfire was objectively unreasonable. United States v. Certified Environmental Services, Inc., 753 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2014)
The prosecutor’s closing argument was improper in several respects, including comments that amounted to improper vouching for witnesses, comments that there was additional evidence that was not introduced, and comments that the jury’s verdict would have important consequences.

_Cauthern v. Colson_, 736 F.3d 465 (6th Cir. 2013)

The state prosecutor’s closing argument in this death penalty was patently improper and required granting a writ. The prosecutor compared the defendant to the two most recent notorious killers (Daumer and Susan Smith), but the present case and those cases had no similarity. The prosecutor also made numerous Biblical references that were inappropriate and implored the jurors to perform their duty to return a death penalty, which the prosecutor suggested was, in fact, obligatory.

_United States v. Andaverde-Tinoco_, 741 F.3d 509 (5th Cir. 2013)

The prosecutor improperly referenced the defendant’s post-arrest silence during closing argument in an effort to imply that this disproved the defendant’s defense that he was justified in illegally crossing the border after being beaten and robbed before crossing the Rio Grande. Not plain error, however.

_United States v. Richards_, 719 F.3d 746 (7th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy. He denied knowing that he was being used as a drug courier. The government offered Rule 404(b) evidence to show that the defendant was familiar with the drug trade. Admitting this testimony was not error. However, the government during closing argument insisted that the evidence proved that the defendant was, in fact, a drug dealer and therefore, the jury could infer that he was guilty of the charged offense. This was an improper propensity argument that was inconsistent with the limited purpose for which the 404(b) evidence was offered.

_United States v. Woods_, 710 F.3d 195 (4th Cir. 2013)

The prosecutor may not state during closing argument that “the defendant lied when he testified” because this implies that the prosecutor has some basis for claiming that the defendant lied other than the evidence in the case. This error was “plain” error, but not sufficient to warrant reversal of the conviction.

_United States v. Darden_, 688 F.3d 382 (8th Cir. 2012)

A prosecutor should not argue to the jury that in order to find the defendant not guilty, it would mean that police officers were lying, who had no motive to lie to frame an innocent man and who face danger in their jobs everyday from violent criminals. Harmless error (though no one judge dissented, stating that the argument was reversible error, and noted other ways in which the argument was improper, including denouncing defense counsel).

_United States v. Parkes_, 668 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 2012)

The defendant, a customer of a small Tennessee bank, was charged with participating in bank fraud. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued, “And if it’s right to acquit them, you do it, you let them keep the $4 million, you tell the government, “Shame on you for “persecuting these poor people.” This was improper for at least two reasons: First, the government knew that in a civil settlement, the defendant had already agreed to a repayment plan. Second, even if there had been no repayment plan that was not a reason to convict if there had been no fraud. In fact, the government had previously moved to exclude evidence that the defendant had, in fact, repaid most of the money. “Even a single misstep on the part of the prosecutor may be so destructive of the right to a fair trial that reversal is mandated.”

United States v. Sanchez, 659 F.3d 1252 (9th Cir. 2011)

The defense in this drug smuggling case was that the suppliers in Mexico threatened the courier to bring the drugs into the U.S. In his closing argument, the prosecutor said that if the defendant’s argument was validated, we might as well send a memo to the Mexican cartels that the defense of duress was all that was needed to win an acquittal in a drug smuggling case. The Ninth Circuit held that this was plain error requiring reversal of the conviction even in the absence of an objection. This was a plea to convict the defendant despite his defense, which if believed, was a valid defense. Asking the jury to convict because of the possible social consequences of acquitting – despite a valid defense – is an improper argument.

United States v. Aguilar, 645 F.3d 319 (5th Cir. 2011)

The prosecutor committed plain error by arguing to the jury that the agent risked their lives by pursuing drug dealers, only to come to court to be called a liar by the defense. The Fifth Circuit reversed the conviction.

United States v. Delgado, 631 F.3d 685 (5th Cir. 2011)

Several errors in this case – when considered cumulatively – required that the conviction be set aside: (1) there was insufficient evidence offered to support a deliberate ignorance instruction, because there was no evidence of the defendant’s knowledge of the high probability of the criminal activity; (2) the prosecutor improperly stated during closing argument that the defendant, who did not testify, had “lied to agents when they interviewed her” when she denied guilt. This amounted to an improper statement of the prosecutor’s personal opinion; (3) a government agent testified (non-responsive to a question) that defendant’s trucking company had been involved in other drug trafficking; (4) the absence of a full transcript of the proceeding. In a separate holding, the Fifth Circuit also reversed the defendant’s conspiracy conviction on sufficiency grounds. All these errors, when considered cumulatively, denied the defendant a fair trial.

United States v. Warshak, 631 F.3d 266 (6th Cir. 2010)

The prosecutor impermissibly commented about his service in the military and the JAG Corps, none of which was relevant in any way to the issues on trial. He simply attempted to increase his stature with the jury, which was not proper. The prosecutor also improperly suggested that the decision of the grand jury to indict the defendant pointed to their belief that the defendants were guilty. Again, an improper argument. Harmless error.

United States v. Wright, 625 F.3d 583 (9th Cir. 2010)

During the prosecutor’s closing argument in this child pornography case, he stated that he had tried numerous similar cases and that it was not infrequent for the defendant to blame the crime on his roommate, or that some other person (or hacker) put the child pornography on his computer, and that the interrogating officer did something wrong. The prosecutor then commented that seeing all three arguments in one case—a trifecta—was unusual. The Ninth Circuit held that this argument was improper, because it amounted to introducing evidence that was not in the record and also “denigrated the defense as a sham.” Harmless error.

United States v. Hills, 618 F.3d 619 (7th Cir. 2010)
During the prosecutor’s closing argument in this multi-defendant case, the prosecutor said, “And you don’t really need to worry about that Fifth Amendment protection unless you’re worried that you’re doing something illegal. They knew perfectly well precisely what they were doing. . . . In this case, they’re using the Fifth Amendment not as a shield to protect themselves from incrimination, but as a sword to prevent the IRS from getting the information that they are entitled to.” This improper argument amounted to prosecutorial misconduct that required setting aside one defendant’s conviction under the plain error standard. See Griffin v. California, 380
U.S. 609 (1965).

United States v. Reyes, 577 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir. 2009)
In this “combative” trial involving allegations of illegal options back-dating, the defendant, who was a corporate executive who signed corporate financial statements defended on the basis that he thought the Finance Department was aware of the back-dating and properly documented the options transactions in the financial statements. Only one person from the Finance Department testified for the government and she testified that she did not know about the back-dating. However, the government knew—both through FBI interviews and through a pending SEC lawsuit against other people in the Finance Department—that people in the Finance Department were aware of the back-dating. No other people from the Finance Department testified (in part because they asserted the Fifth Amendment right not to testify). In closing argument, the defendant argued that other people in the Finance Department knew (though there was no evidence of this at trial). The government then responded that no other people in the Finance Department knew (though the government knew that this was false). The Ninth Circuit held that this amounted to prosecutorial misconduct that necessitated reversing the conviction.
“We do not lightly tolerate a prosecutor asserting as a fact to the jury something known to be untrue or, at the very least, that the prosecution had every strong reason to doubt.”

United States v. Ayala-Garcia, 574 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2009)
The defendants were prosecuted for drugs and firearm offenses. During rebuttal closing argument, the prosecutor held up the individual bullets—31 of them—and said that each bullet represented a life that was saved. He further argued that there was a war going on in the housing projects and the defendant was a soldier in that war. The First Circuit held that these improper arguments necessitated granting a new trial.

United States v. Mannava, 565 F.3d 412 (7th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was charged under 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b) with attempting to persuade a person to engage in sexual activity that constitutes a violation of state law. The state law that was allegedly violated was statutory rape, which is actually termed “child molestation” under Indiana law. Repeatedly, however, the prosecutor decried the defendant’s effort to “rape” the victim in this case (there was no victim, just FBI agent posing as a child in email conversations with the defendant). These improper accusations by the prosecutor were reversible error.

United States v. Farinella, 558 F.3d 695 (7th Cir. 2009)

In this case involving misbranded food, the prosecutor repeatedly misrepresented the nature of the evidence. The food that the defendant purchases wholesale had a “best when sold by” date on the label. He changed that date and re-sold the food. There was no evidence what the “best when sold by” date referred to. There was no evidence that the food expired or was unhealthy after that date. Nevertheless, throughout the trial, the prosecutor referred to the food as having “expired” and being rancid and suggested that it posed a health risk. None of this was true. To make matters considerably worse, the prosecutor also decried the “high-paid” defense lawyer and urged the jury not to let the defendant “buy his way” out of a conviction. All of these comments amounted to reversible error and merited sanctions imposed on the prosecutor. Because the conviction was reversed on sufficiency grounds, the appellate court could not provide any further relief to the defendant.

United States v. Clark, 535 F.3d 571 (7th Cir. 2008)

A prosecutor should not argue that a defendant’s defense is “the standard defense” raised by defendants in drug cases. As the Supreme Court noted in Taylor v. Kentucky, 436 U.S. 478 (1978), arguments such as this (and arguments that diminish the importance of the presumption of innocence and the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt) improperly suggest that all defendants are guilty. Harmless error.

United States v. Mendoza, 522 F.3d 482 (5th Cir 2008)

A prosecutor may not comment, during closing argument, on the defendant’s demeanor at counsel table in a case in which the defendant did not testify. Harmless error.

United States v. Shoup, 476 F.3d 38 (1st Cir. 2007)

The government may not invite the jury to make an inference regarding the absence of a witness whose unavailability has arisen because of the invocation of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. In this case, the prosecutor referred to the “phantom” witness, who the prosecutor knew had invoked his Fifth Amendment right not to testify. Harmless error.

United States v. Palma, 473 F.3d 899 (8th Cir. 2007)

In this Social Security fraud trial, the prosecutor pointed to each member of the jury and told them that they were each victims of this crime. This was improper argument. Characterizing the jurors as victims was akin to the prohibited “golden rule” argument.

United States v. Van Eyl, 468 F.3d 428 (7th Cir. 2006)

The prosecutor’s closing argument advanced a theory of guilt that had previously been rejected by the trial court. The trial court acted within its discretion in granting a new trial. The prosecutor repeatedly referred to various witnesses’ lay opinion that the defendant’s conduct in this complex fraud trial was fraudulent. The prosecutor repeatedly referred to witnesses’ testimony that it did not take a CPA to tell the difference between right and wrong.
United States v. Yakobowicz, 427 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 2005)

The trial court utilized a procedure that allowed both sides to offer a brief summary argument after each witness testified. The defendant objected. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction, holding that this procedure, which is not envisioned in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, gives an unfair advantage to the prosecutor. Though interim arguments or summaries have been permitted in certain circumstances, in this case, there was no need. In addition, the government used the summary procedure to repeatedly argue its case (not just to summarize complex testimony), asking rhetorical questions and urging the jury to draw inferences from the testimony that was just heard.

Weaver v. Bowersox, 438 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 2006)

The prosecutor urged the penalty phase jury to do their duty and vote to execute the defendant. The comments implored the jury to act as good soldiers do and protect the community. This is business. Toughen up. The message for these types of people must be death. I am the top law enforcement officer in this jurisdiction and I determine which cases are appropriate for the death penalty. Etc. The Eighth Circuit held these comments were too inflammatory and required setting aside the death penalty. The comments also violated Caldwell, and Zant v. Stephens.

United States v. Perlaza, 439 F.3d 1149 (9th Cir. 2006)

During the closing argument, the prosecutor argued to the jury that once the evidence was introduced, the presumption of innocence went out the window. When the defense objected, the judge failed to correct this erroneous statement, commenting, instead, that “that’s proper rebuttal.” The defendant’s conviction was reversed.

Hodge v. Hurly, 426 F.3d 368 (6th Cir. 2005)

The Sixth wrote, “During his egregiously improper closing argument, the prosecutor commented on the credibility of witnesses, misrepresented the facts of the case, made derogatory remarks about the defendant, and generally tried to convince the jury to convict on the basis of bad character, all while defense trial counsel sat idly by. We conclude that defendant’s trial counsel was constitutionally ineffective in failing to object to this misconduct . . .”

Ward v. Dretke, 420 F.3d 479 (5th Cir. 2005)

Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to object to closing argument statements by the prosecutor that the jury would be ridiculed if they sentenced the defendant too leniently; and that they should use Biblical standards in imposing punishment.

United States v. Holmes, 413 F.3d 770 (8th Cir. 2005)

Statements by the prosecutor that the defense counsel was “colluding” with the defendant to deceive the jurors was an improper argument. Arguments by the prosecutor that repeatedly referred to counsel, by name, and claimed that he was using red herrings to confuse the jury were inappropriate. The prosecutor was encouraging the jury to focus on defense counsel, rather than the evidence. The improper argument of the prosecutor required that the conviction be set aside.

Bates v. Bell, 402 F.3d 635 (6th Cir. 2005)
In this death penalty trial, the prosecutor’s closing argument included the following improper arguments (1) suggested to the jury that if the defendant’s life was spared, the jurors would be accomplices in the defendant’s subsequent crimes; (2) accused the defense attorney of being paranoid and criticized the attorney’s frequent objections to evidence; (3) commented on the credibility, by expressing personal opinions, about the defense mental health experts; (4) likened the defendant to a rabid dog, the only solution to which is death. The Sixth Circuit set aside the death penalty.

United States v. Weatherspoon, 410 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2005)

Two improper arguments by the prosecutor required reversing the conviction: (1) the prosecutor improperly vouched for the cops’ testimony by arguing that they would lose their jobs if they lied at trial; (2) the prosecutor urged the jury to convict the defendant in order to reduce the crime rate generally.

United States v. Moore, 375 F.3d 259 (3rd Cir. 2004)

Defendant was charged with arson and possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. Throughout the trial, the prosecutor introduced various “bad acts” evidence that had no bearing whatsoever on the charged offenses, including domestic abuse and drug dealing. No objection was raised by the defense attorney. Then, in closing argument, the prosecutor labeled the defendant a terrorist. Again, no objection. The Third Circuit held that the prosecutor’s behavior amounted to plain error and reversed the conviction, noting, “There was a serious break down here.”

The prosecutor improperly impugned the integrity of the defense attorney when he argued that it was incredible that the defense attorney could make his arguments “with a straight face.” Arguments such as this and arguments that suggest that defense attorneys’ role is to muddle the issues are inappropriate. See also, United States v. Vaccaro, 115 F.3d 1211 (5th Cir. 1997). Harmless error.

Boyle v. Million, 201 F.3d 711 (6th Cir. 2000)

Among the sins committed by the special prosecutor in this murder case was “accusing” the defendant of hiring the best expensive lawyer he could who nit-picked every issue. A host of other improper arguments resulted in granting a writ and setting aside the murder conviction.

Frazier v. Huffman, 343 F.3d 780 (6th Cir. 2003)

It was improper for the prosecutor to place an empty chair in front of the jury (representing the decedent) during the closing argument. Not grounds for granting a writ, however.

The defendant was on trial for CCE. There was evidence that on occasion, a person came to his apartment complex and grabbed something from him and that he took out a gun and fired at the car when it drove off. During closing argument, the prosecutor suggested that the defendant shot and killed the driver of the car. The defendant was not charged with murder and there was, in fact, no evidence that the driver was shot, or killed.  This closing argument was improper and required reversing the conviction. (In fact, the prosecutor knew that someone else had been convicted in state court for the murder of the driver).

United States v. Boyd, 131 F.3d 951 (11th Cir. 1997)

The prosecutor's closing argument that referred to the War on Drugs and the defendants' participation in that war, as the enemy, was inappropriate. Harmless error.

United States v. Rodrigues, 159 F.3d 439 (9th Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor’s closing argument criticized the defense counsel’s theory of the defense. However, the defendant’s theory – that is, his explanation of what the government was required to prove, but failed to prove – was theoretically correct. The prosecutor argued, in essence, that the government was not required to prove what the defense attorney claimed it was required to prove. But the defense counsel was correct. Moreover, the prosecutor improperly argued that the defense attorney had attempted to deceive the jury from the start. “When [the prosecutor] says the defendant’s counsel is responsible for lying and deceiving, his accusations cannot fail to leave an imprint on the jurors’ minds. And when no rebuke of such false accusations is made by the court, when no response is allowed the vilified lawyer, when no curative instruction is given, the jurors must necessarily be thinking that the false accusations had a basis in fact. The trial process is distorted.”

United States v. Udechukwu, 11 F.3d 1101 (1st Cir. 1993)

The defendant was arrested carrying heroin at the airport in Puerto Rico. She immediately agreed to cooperate and claimed that she had been coerced into carrying the drugs by a sinister drug dealer in Aruba. The government investigated the identity of the Aruba connection and in fact determined that this person existed and was the target of an ongoing investigation. This was not made known to the defense. During closing argument, the prosecutor repeatedly expressed skepticism about this supplier, intimating that there was no such person, or that he was not whom the defendant claimed he was. This was prosecutorial misconduct necessitating a reversal. The improper withholding of Brady information, coupled with the misleading closing argument denied the defendant her due process rights.

Arrieta-Agressot v. United States, 3 F.3d 525 (1st Cir. 1993)

The prosecutor’s “war on drugs” closing argument, referring to the defendants as enemy soldiers who have poisoned the youth of the society was improper and required reversing the convictions. The court characterized this argument as “150 proof rhetoric.”

United States v. Mandelbaum, 803 F.2d 42 (1st Cir. 1986)

It is error for a prosecutor to tell jurors to “do their duty and return a verdict of guilty.” It was harmless error in this case.

United States v. Burns, 104 F.3d 529 (2d Cir. 1997)

After the defense attorney completed his closing argument, the prosecutor responded by sarcastically applauding, suggesting that it was a great “act.” This was inappropriate, but not reversible error.
United States v. Friedman, 909 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1990)

The prosecutor told the jury during closing argument that “some people go out and investigate drug dealers and prosecute, while there are others who defend them, try to get them off, perhaps even for high fees.” The prosecutor also referred to the defendant’s opening statement as “unsworn testimony.” These improper remarks by the prosecutor required reversal of the conviction. This is so even though the trial court sustained certain objections to the closing argument of the Assistant United States Attorney.

Floyd v. Meachum, 907 F.2d 347 (2d Cir. 1990)

The Second Circuit holds that the cumulative effect of the prosecutor’s improper arguments denied the defendant a fair trial requiring granting a writ of habeas corpus. Among the prosecutor’s improper statements was the statement that the Fifth Amendment guarantee that a conviction must rely upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt is a shield for the innocent, not a shield for the guilty. The prosecutor also repeatedly referred to her position as a prosecutor, “seeking justice.” Furthermore, the prosecutor’s repeated references to the Fifth Amendment constituted an improper comment on the defendant’s refusal to testify.

United States v. Thame, 846 F.2d 200 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The defendant refused to consent to a search of his suitcase. During closing argument, the prosecutor argued that this was evidence that the defendant knew that the suitcase contained cocaine. This was error. This does not constitute plain error, however, and thus the failure to object at trial waives the issue.

United States v. Flores-Chapa, 48 F.3d 156 (5th Cir. 1995)

Twice during the course of the trial, the judge instructed the prosecutor not to elicit hearsay testimony from the agents relating to what a co-conspirator told them after his arrest. Then, in closing argument, the prosecutor explicitly made reference to the post-arrest statement of the co-conspirator. This amounted to plain error.

Guidroz v. Lynaugh, 852 F.2d 832 (5th Cir. 1988)

The prosecutor’s argument concerning the effect of a jury verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity constituted reversible error.

United States v. Jones, 839 F.2d 1041 (5th Cir. 1988)

During closing argument, the prosecutor stated that a defense witness perjured himself when he accused a government witness of lying, and further, that the defense attorneys sponsored the perjury. Though this argument was reprehensible, it was harmless in light of the overwhelming evidence, the substantial grounds for disbelieving the testimony of the witness, and the curative instruction by the trial judge.

United States v. Solivan, 937 F.2d 1146 (6th Cir. 1991)

Although it is permissible for the prosecutor to appeal to the jury to act as the community conscience, inciting the jury by means of prejudice and passion are not permissible. Here, the prosecutor argued to the jury that because of the defendant’s transactions, the drug problem facing the community would continue if they did not convict her. The defendant’s constitutional right to a fair trial was violated because the appeal to the community conscience in the context of the War on Drugs prejudicially impacted her. The court held that this was not harmless error. Throughout the opinion, the court observes that the War on Drugs is no excuse for suspending constitutional rights.
Throughout the course of the closing argument, the prosecutor made disparaging references to the defense attorneys, including their activities representing the defendant prior to trial and their arguments to the jury during the course of trial. A prosecutor may not argue that an accused’s decision to meet with counsel, even shortly after the incident giving rise to a criminal indictment, implies guilt. Nor may a prosecutor suggest to the jury that a defendant hires an attorney in order to generate an alibi, take care of everything, or get his story straight. A writ of habeas corpus was granted.

The key issue in this case was whether a witness who claimed to see the defendant drop a weapon in the bushes was credible. The defense claimed he was not. The prosecutor argued that it was a sad day when a person in the community was willing to come to court and testify and the defense attorney called him a liar. The prosecutor then asked the jurors to consider how they would feel if they came to testify about something they saw and were then labeled a liar. This was improper argument. In short, the prosecutor violated the proscription against appealing to the jurors’ emotions and inviting the jury to consider the social consequences of its verdict. Harmless error.

The prosecutor committed error in arguing during his rebuttal argument about why a potential government witness was not called. The prosecutor knew that his offered explanation was not honest. However, the witness was not a key witness and the error did not constitute plain error.

It was inappropriate for the prosecutor during closing argument to turn to the defendant and thank him for “coming to the area so that my sister can use drugs.” The error was harmless in this case.

The defendants, who were African-American, were tried in North Dakota on drug and weapons charges. The percentage of African-Americans in North Dakota is approximately .6%. During the rebuttal closing argument, the prosecutor stated the defendants were “bad people” and “We are lucky where we live not to come in contact with as many as there may be in other parts of the country. But there are still some around here.” While this was not explicitly a racial comment, the appellate court determined that it was a thinly veiled reference to race and reversed the conviction of both defendants on all counts.

During his sentencing phase closing argument in this death penalty trial, the prosecutor made numerous improper comments, including: (1) pointing to the victim’s family and telling the jury, “You know what their presence here is asking you to do . . . you should consider their wishes” (none of the victim’s family testified); (2) noting the tremendous financial burden on the taxpayers for food, clothing and guards a life sentence entails; (3) urging the jury not to award the defendant with a life without parole sentence, because the defendant had escaped once before; (4) referring to the failure of the defendant to take the stand during the penalty phase; (5) observing that in his life as a prosecutor, he had never seen a tougher defendant. These comments violated the defendant’s right to due process under the standard set forth in Donnelly.

v. DeChristoforo, 416 U.S. 637 (1974). With regard to the cost of a life sentence argument, “there is simply no legal or ethical justification for imposing the death penalty on the basis that it is less costly than life imprisonment.”

Antwine v. Delo, 54 F.3d 1357 (8th Cir. 1995)

During the closing argument, the prosecutor suggested that the gas chamber presented a quick and painless death to the defendant. Actually, evidence established that the death can be prolonged and painful, including several minutes of conscious suffocation. The prosecutor’s argument may have affected the jury’s decision and was impermissible under Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320 (1985). In addition, the prosecutor erred in imploring the jury to sentence the defendant to death to save the taxpayer’s money.

United States v. Johnson, 968 F.2d 768 (8th Cir. 1992)

In light of the marginal evidence presented against the defendant, it was reversible error for the prosecutor to argue to the jury that they must act as the bulwark against drugs in the community. The court reviews several cases, including Supreme Court precedent condemning this type of argument: “The drug problem is a matter of great concern in this country today. This court is sympathetic to prosecutors’ vigorous efforts to prosecute participants in the drug trade. However . . . the pressing nature of the problem does not give prosecutors license to encumber certain defendants with responsibility for the larger societal problem in addition to their own misdeeds.”

Reutter v. Solem, 888 F.2d 578 (8th Cir. 1989)

The key witness against the defendant in this drug prosecution was his former law partner and close friend. Unbeknownst to the defense, this witness, who was currently serving a term of imprisonment himself, had applied for commutation of his sentence and the State was actively supporting it. Furthermore, among the members of the commutation board was the prosecutor in defendant’s trial. None of this information was provided to the defense despite a request for all exculpatory and impeaching evidence. This Brady violation was aggravated by the prosecutor’s closing argument during which he argued that the witness had no reason whatsoever to lie and had nothing to gain from cooperating with the State. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Frederick, 78 F.3d 1370 (9th Cir. 1996)

The prosecutor engaged in misconduct during her closing argument. First, she improperly vouched for a witness by claiming that the witness’s in-court testimony was consistent with her out-of-court statements to law enforcement agents (but her out-of-court statements were not admitted in court). Second, she complimented the defense attorney for successfully cross-examining a prosecution witness and confusing her on the stand. She also said that the defense attorney’s job is to ask the jury to look at a tiny piece of the evidence, while “the government and the judge will be asking you to consider all of the evidence in making your decision.”

United States v. Kerr, 981 F.2d 1050 (9th Cir. 1992)

The prosecutor committed plain error in his closing remarks by repeatedly stating that “he didn’t think” the witnesses were lying; and “he didn’t think the witnesses were hoodwinking” the agents. Even absent objection, these comments necessitated reversing the conviction. The only objection which was made – and was sustained – was when the prosecutor suggested that the judge believed the witness in accepting his plea agreement. The sustained objection, however, was not sufficiently forceful and did not remove the taint of the improper argument.

Mahorney v. Wallman, 917 F.2d 469 (10th Cir. 1990)

The prosecutor’s incorrect and misleading comments about the presumption of innocence necessitated a new trial.

United States v. Smith, 806 F.2d 971 (10th Cir. 1986)

It is plain error for a prosecutor during closing argument to refer to the defendant’s co-conspirators having pled guilty. The prosecutor stated that these pleas should be used as substantive evidence against the defendant.

United States v. Gainey, 111 F.3d 834 (11th Cir. 1997)

The prosecutor argued as follows: Mr. Gainey’s residence was a drug den. He had the spoons. He had the needles. He had the cut. He had the heroin around his neck. And he had the weapons. These are all tools of the drug trade. Ladies and gentlemen, we live here in south Florida and we are very familiar with it by now. This was an improper reference to current events. Jurors may be asked to rely on their common sense, but they may not be implored to consider current events from the newspaper. The prosecutor tried to exploit inappropriately the widespread community fears about drugs.

United States v. Blakey, 14 F.3d 1557 (11th Cir. 1994)

During closing argument, the prosecutor stated that the defendant was a professional criminal; that he presented insufficient exculpatory evidence; and that he was arrested with false credit cards, indicating that the defendant had “real problems.” Each of these remarks was improper. There was no evidence of any prior record – the defendant was not a “professional criminal.” The failure to introduce exculpatory evidence was an improper burden-shifting argument; and the reference to the circumstances of the arrest violated a pretrial agreement limiting the relevance of this evidence. The cumulative effect of these arguments required a reversal, even though the trial court instructed the jury to disregard these arguments.

United States v. Beasley, 2 F.3d 1551 (11th Cir. 1993)

The prosecutor’s references in the closing argument to the war on drugs and the jury’s role in that war was improper and was calculated to inflame the jury. Nevertheless, the trial court sustained an objection and neutralized any harm.

Presnell v. Zant, 959 F.2d 1524 (11th Cir. 1992)

In this death penalty habeas, the court holds that the state prosecutor’s closing argument which recited potions of the 1873 Georgia Supreme Court decision in Eberhart v. State, was prejudicial. The Eberhart court had decried the plea for mercy and held that the victim’s family was more important than the defendant.

Cunningham v. Zant, 928 F.2d 1006 (11th Cir. 1991)

The prosecutor argued to the jury that he was “offended” that the defendant had exercised his Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial in the guilt innocence phase of the trial. This was an outrageous argument, which, along with other errors, warranted the granting of the writ.

McCorquodale v. Kemp, 829 F.2d 1035 (11th Cir. 1987)

During McCorquodale’s death penalty trial, the prosecutor stated that, “after your decision, the appellate court will have a very important responsibility.” It is improper to refer to appellate review in a capital case. However, the trial court’s admonition that the statement was highly improper and that the case ended with the jury’s verdict, was sufficient to correct any improper impression the jury may have had about the importance of what it was deciding.

United States v. Richardson, 161 F.3d 728 (D.C.Cir. 1998)

The prosecutor was black; the jurors were black; the defendant was black and the eyewitness was black. The defense attorney was white. The defense was misidentification. In closing argument, the defense attorney argued vigorously that the eyewitness may have confused the defendant with someone else who may have been the perpetrator. The prosecutor responded that the jury should not fall prey to the “we all look alike” argument. The prosecutor repeated that “we all don’t look alike.” Then, in response to the defendant’s argument that the eyewitness was only 17, and therefore able to make a mistake, the prosecutor responded that in the defense attorney’s world, perhaps 17 year olds have not come of age, but in this world, they are grownups. Both of these arguments played on racial prejudice and amounted to plain error necessitating reversal of the conviction, even without there having been any objection by defense counsel.
CO-DEFENDANT’S GUILTY PLEA OR CONVICTION

United States v. Head, 707 F.3d 1026 (8th Cir. 2013)
In order to prosecute a person for accessory after the fact, the government must prove that some other person actually committed the underlying offense. Proving only that the other person was convicted of the underlying offense is not sufficient. Introducing the principal’s conviction in this case was reversible error and the failure to prove that the principal actually committed the offense resulted in an appellate determination that the government offered insufficient evidence to support the accessory’s conviction, thus barring a retrial. The defendant in the accessory prosecution must also be permitted to offer evidence that she was not aware that the principal committed the offense, or that the principal was acting in self-defense.

United States v. Landron-Class, 696 F.3d 62 (1st Cir. 2012)
Evidence, or argument about co-defendants’ or co-conspirators’ guilty pleas or convictions is inadmissible.

United States v. Maliszewski, 161 F.3d 992 (D.C. Cir. 1998)
It was error (though harmless) for the district court judge to explain to the jury that certain co-defendants listed in the indictment had entered guilty pleas prior to trial.

United States v. Polasek, 162 F.3d 878 (5th Cir. 1998)
The defendant denied her guilt of participating in an odometer roll-back scheme. When the case agent was testifying, the prosecutor repeatedly asked if the defendant’s name was included in the paperwork that was associated with other people who were prosecuted in connection with the scheme. The Fifth Circuit held that this line of questioning essentially suggested that the fact that the defendant had done title work for individuals later convicted of odometer fraud established her guilt. This was improper guilt by association. Reversible error.

United States v. Ramirez, 973 F.2d 102 (2d Cir. 1992)
The only evidence against the defendant in this conspiracy prosecution was offered by a guilty-pleading codefendant. The trial court committed reversible error in failing to instruct the jury that they should not consider the co-defendant’s plea as evidence against the defendant.

United States v. Cosentino, 844 F.2d 30 (2d Cir. 1988)
Once a defendant launches an attack on the credibility of a co-conspirator who is testifying for the government, the government is free to introduce the entire plea agreement, including those portions which bolster the witness’ credibility. However, absent such an attack, such evidence is not admissible to support a witness’ credibility. The government is always permitted to introduce the impeaching aspects of the plea agreement in order to diffuse the defendant’s efforts to introduce such matters in a more damaging manner. But the bolstering aspects of a plea agreement may only be introduced once the credibility of the witness has been attacked, even if this occurs in the opening statement.
The credibility of a government witness was not challenged on cross-examination to the extent justifying the admissibility of a cooperation agreement between the government and a witness on re-direct examination. Only after a witness’ credibility has been challenged is a plea agreement by that witness admissible.

The prosecutor stressed during closing argument the fact that the defendant’s witness, an alleged co-conspirator, was convicted of the same crime and his version of the facts was apparently rejected by the prior jury. This was plain error, necessitating a reversal even though there was no objection at trial.

Though the error was harmless, the trial court should not have permitted the government to reveal to the jury, and should not himself have mentioned, that six non-testifying co-defendants had pleaded guilty to various counts of the indictment.

References to a co-conspirator’s guilty plea may amount to plain error. An exception to this rule applies when the record reflects a defensive strategy which relies on the co-conspirator’s guilt. Here, with respect to some of the counts, the error was plain error. The prosecutor had the duty, after realizing that the guilty co-conspirator would not testify, to request an instruction which limited or struck the evidence which he had introduced regarding that co-conspirator’s guilty plea.

The government improperly introduced in evidence at the defendants’ counterfeit trial the guilty plea of his relatives for the offense of passing counterfeit currency. The government introduced no evidence that the defendants were aware of their relatives’ guilty plea, and thus no proof that the defendants were aware that the currency was counterfeit.

The trial court erred – but it was harmless – in permitting the government to offer the guilty pleas of five non-testifying co-defendants on the basis that it would put the charged conspiracy “into context.”

Though the error was harmless in this case, it was error to permit a co-defendant’s counsel to refer during opening statement to another co-defendant’s guilty plea.

During the trial, news accounts of the guilty plea of a corporate co-defendant were read by certain jurors. After trial, questioning of the jurors revealed that some of the jurors considered this information in their deliberations. This extraneous influence on the jury’s deliberations supported the trial judge’s decision to grant a new trial.

It is plain error for a prosecutor during closing argument to refer to the defendant’s co-conspirators’ having pled guilty. The prosecutor stated that these pleas should be used as substantive evidence against the defendant.
United States v. Eason, 920 F.2d 731 (11th Cir. 1990)

The government committed reversible error in introducing evidence of a co-conspirator’s conviction. The co-conspirator did not testify, and thus there was no need to impeach him. The court reviews the government’s various arguments why the evidence should have been admissible, and also that it was harmless error, and rejects each of these arguments. The error was harmful and tainted not only the conviction with regard to counts where the co-conspirator was involved, but also all other counts of the indictment. The court characterized the government’s efforts to introduce this evidence as governmental misconduct.

United States v. McLain, 823 F.2d 1457 (11th Cir. 1987)

A co-defendant’s guilty plea may not be used as substantive evidence of a defendant’s guilt. The admission of the co-defendant’s unredacted plea agreement was clear error, even though the trial judge instructed the jury the plea agreement could be considered only for purposes of evaluating the co-defendant’s credibility.
COMPETENCE TO STAND TRIAL OR ENTER GUILTY PLEA

The Court found insufficient justification to forcibly medicate the defendant in order to render him competent to stand trial. The four factors to consider are (1) the treatment is medically appropriate; (2) the medication is substantially unlikely to have side effects that may undermine the fairness of the trial; (3) there are no less intrusive alternatives; and (4) the medication is necessary to significantly further important governmental trial-related interests.

Though the state may presume that the defendant is competent and require him to shoulder the burden of proving his incompetence by a preponderance of the evidence, the state may not require that the defendant prove incompetence by clear and convincing evidence.

Despite language in precedents to the contrary, the standard for assessing the competence of a defendant to enter a guilty plea is the same as for assessing the defendant’s competence to stand trial: whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him. Moreover, the defendant’s capacity to waive the assistance of counsel is measured by the same standard – the ability to understand the nature of the proceeding and to waive the right to counsel with an understanding of what is being waived.

The involuntary administration of anti-psychotic medication to a defendant during his murder trial, in the absence of findings by the district court about the need for that treatment, created a substantial risk that the defendant’s right to participate in his own defense was impaired.

_United States v. Berry_, 911 F.3d 354 (6th Cir. 2018)

Among the reasons that it was not appropriate to forcibly medicate the defendant was the fact that if the defendant were forcibly medicated, tried and convicted, his maximum sentence would approximate the amount of time he had already served pretrial. This fact significantly undercuts the government’s interest in pursuing the case and requiring

_Anderson v. United States_, 865 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2017)

The district court was aware that the defendant suffered from some form of mental illness and the defendant’s responses during the guilty plea colloquy were such that the judge should have ordered a competency examination.

_United States v. Ohuoha_, 820 F.3d 1049 (9th Cir. 2016)

The government failed to demonstrate that the treatment plan that was proposed to restore the defendant to competency was medically appropriate for the defendant.

_United States v. Kowalczyk_, 805 F.3d 847 (9th Cir. 2015)

A defendant facing a competence hearing is not entitled to waive the right to counsel.
United States v. Watson, 793 F.3d 416 (4th Cir. 2015)

The government failed to meet its burden of proving that involuntary medication was substantially likely to restore the defendant’s competency. “Forcible medication is not justified every time an incompetent defendant refuses treatment; on the contrary, ‘those instances may be rare.’”

United States v. Wingo, 789 F.3d 1226 (11th Cir. 2015)

The trial court failed to sua sponte conduct a competency hearing when it became apparent that there were issues relating to the defendant’s competence prior to accepting his guilty plea.

United States v. Brooks, 750 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2014)

The trial court did not make sufficient findings on the first Sell factor, that is, whether there are sufficiently important governmental interests at stake to justify the administration of involuntary medication. One ingredient of this calculus is the amount of time the defendant is facing if convicted versus the amount of time that he would be involuntarily committed based on his refusal to take the medication and therefore remain hospitalized based on his incompetence to stand trial (coupled with the amount of time he has already been committed). The court should also consider other factors including any risk that evidence would be lost due to any delay, or other prejudice that might affect the government’s ability to proceed to trial at a later date.

United States v. Curtis, 749 F.3d 732 (8th Cir. 2014)

The trial court failed to make adequate findings on the fourth Sell factor, whether administering anti-psychotic drugs constituted medically appropriate treatment for the defendant. The district court did not consider the circumstances relevant to such a required finding, such as the defendant’s need for long term treatment and his current quality of life.

United States v. Debenedetto, 757 F.3d 547 (7th Cir. 2014)

The trial court made inadequate findings on several of the Sell factors and the Seventh Circuit remanded the case to the lower court for further findings.

United States v. Chavez, 734 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 2013)

At the Sell hearing, the expert testified that a specific treatment plan had not yet been prepared and the decision about which drugs to use had not yet been made. The expert testified that he was awaiting court approval before making these decisions. The Tenth Circuit held that the treatment plan and the specific drugs must be identified before the hearing to enable the trial judge to make the appropriate Sell findings.

United States v. Chatmon, 718 F.3d 369 (4th Cir. 2013)

The trial court failed to adequately address the Sell factor relating to less intrusive means of restoring defendant to competence. A remand was required to address this consideration.

United States v. Gillenwater, 717 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2013)
The defendant was represented by counsel at a competency hearing. The attorney refused to call him to the stand and the defendant complained – disruptively – and was removed from the courtroom. The Ninth Circuit holds that a defendant has a constitutional right to testify at his competency hearing, even over the advice of counsel. (The dialogue at the hearing was essentially as follows: “Counsel: I have advised him not to testify.” Defendant: “That’s because you’re a criminal.” Court: “Mr. Gillenwater, that’s enough.” Defendant: “Then get me the fuck out of here.”)

United States v. Ross, No. 09-1852 (6th Cir. 2012)

Even though the defendant had previously waived his right to counsel and was permitted to proceed pro se, when the government moved for a competency hearing and the judge agreed, an attorney should have been appointed to represent the defendant.

United States v. Grigsby, 712 F.3d 964 (6th Cir. 2013)

In a particularly fact-intensive opinion, the Sixth Circuit concludes that involuntary medication of the defendant was not appropriate in this case. Among the factors the court considered was the length of the possible sentence (according to the Guidelines), the likelihood of a successful insanity defense, and the likelihood and length of involuntary civil commitment if the prosecution did not proceed.

United States v. Dreyer, 693 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant, a psychiatrist, developed dementia at the age of 63 and entered into a drug conspiracy. He entered a guilty plea. The Ninth Circuit held that at the sentencing hearing, the judge should have sua sponte ordered a competency hearing. At the sentencing hearing, the defense attorney declined to have the defendant speak, because he didn’t know what the defendant would say and his dementia might lead him to deny responsibility and he might say something inappropriate. This should have prompted the trial judge to order a competency examination. The appellate court also ordered that the case be reassigned to a different judge on remand because of comments made by the trial judge that reflected her premature judgment about the defendant’s possible incompetence and his manipulative behavior. See also 705 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2013) (opinion regarding denial of rehearing en banc).

United States v. Neal, 679 F.3d 737 (8th Cir. 2012)

Both the defense and the government agreed that a competency determination was appropriate. The government insisted on an in-patient examination; the defendant argued that out-patient evaluation was sufficient. The Eighth Circuit held that as a matter of Due Process, the trial court must make findings before ordering an in-patient (custodial) evaluation under 18 U.S.C. §4241.

United States v. Loughner, 672 F.3d 731 (9th Cir. 2012)

This comprehensive opinion reviews the law regarding forced medication under the standards of See, Riggins and Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210 (9th Cir. 2012), ultimately holding that forced medication in this case was appropriate.

United States v. Duncan, 643 F.3d 1242 (9th Cir. 2011)
In this federal death penalty trial, the defendant insisted on representing himself. The Ninth Circuit held that even over the defendant’s objection, standby counsel has the right to assert that the defendant was not competent to waive his right to counsel, or to waive his right to appeal.

United States v. Ruiz-Gaxiola, 623 F.3d 684 (9th Cir. 2010)

The trial court erred in its application of the Sell factors. The defendant was charged with illegal reentry. The Ninth Circuit began by holding that the government must establish that the Sell factors are met with clear and convincing evidence. The government failed to prove the second factor (the administration of drugs is substantially likely to render the defendant competent and that there will not be significant side effects impairing the defendant’s ability to consult with counsel). The government also failed to satisfy the fourth factor; the medication is in the defendant’s best interest.

United States v. White, 620 F.3d 401 (4th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was incompetent to stand trial. The district court, however, ordered that she be medicated in order to render her competent. The Fourth Circuit held that the trial court did not properly apply the Sells test. The Sells test requires that even if the government has an important interest in prosecuting the defendant, there may be special circumstances that are countervailing. The lower court failed to consider sufficiently the special circumstances in this case. Such circumstances include the length of time already served by the defendant; the nature of the crime; the treatment proposed; and, finally, a determination of whether this case is sufficiently exceptional (as opposed to routine) to justify forced medication. The court also noted that the presumption of innocence should play a role in the court’s consideration of the forced medication issue.

Maxwell v. Roe, 606 F.3d 561 (9th Cir. 2010)

The state court judge failed to order a psychiatric examination, despite the fact that the defendant had a history of mental illness, attempted suicide during trial and was committed to a psychiatric facility during trial. Failing to assess his competency violated the Due Process Clause.

United States v. Arenburg, 605 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2010)

Defendant’s behavior during trial should have prompted the court to re-evaluate whether the defendant was competent to stand trial (to say nothing of representing himself). 18 U.S.C. § 4241(a).

United States v. Bush, 585 F.3d 806 (4th Cir. 2009)

The court reviews the various factors that the court should consider in deciding whether the government has a sufficient interest in forcefully medicating the defendant in order to render her competent to stand trial. Among the factors that weigh against the government’s purported interest would be the amount of time the defendant has already served in pretrial confinement; the fact that the defendant might be involuntarily committed to a psychiatric facility if the criminal case is not pursued; the likelihood that medication will succeed in allowing the defendant to regain her competence. The trial court in this case did not engage in the proper analysis and a remand was necessary to address these various factors.

United States v. Ruston, 565 F.3d 892 (5th Cir. 2009)
The trial court erred in failing to sua sponte conducting a competency hearing when the defendant, acting pro se, cross-examined witnesses about completely irrelevant matters and accused the judge and agents of being members of a conspiracy.

Hummel v. Rosemeyer, 564 F.3d 290 (3rd Cir. 2009)
The defendant was tried for murder in state court and found guilty. The record established that he suffered from the effects of a gunshot to the head (self-inflicted) and psychological trauma. He slept through much of the trial and suddenly screamed during the prosecutor’s closing argument and was removed from the courtroom. Trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move for a competency hearing.

McMurtrey v. Ryan, 539 F.3d 1112 (9th Cir. 2008)
There was considerable evidence during the state trial that the defendant was not competent, including the amount of medication he was taking, his lack of memory and his erratic behavior. The state trial court’s failure to conduct a competency hearing violated the defendant’s right to due process. This due process violation was not cured by a hearing conducted thirteen years later.

The Ninth Circuit extensively reviews Sell jurisprudence and concludes that the trial court failed to spell out limitations on its Sell order that allowed the B.O.P. to medicate the defendant so that he would be competent. The trial court may not provide unlimited authority to the B.O.P. to provide necessary treatment and medication.

Nara v. Frank, 488 F.3d 187 (3rd Cir. 2007)
The defendant sufficiently demonstrated that he was incompetent when he entered a guilty plea to a double murder twenty years earlier. Granting habeas relief was appropriate.

United States v. Valenzuela-Puentes, 479 F.3d 1220 (10th Cir. 2007)
The district court did not clearly apply the correct standard in determining that the defendant would be competent if he was administered medication involuntarily. This finding must be made under a standard of clear and convincing evidence.

United States v. Collins, 430 F.3d 1260 (10th Cir. 2005)
Because of acrimony between the defendant and his counsel, counsel moved to withdraw. On the day his motion was filed, the court conducted a competency hearing. Counsel declined to participate in light of his pending motion to withdraw. After a brief discussion, the court determined that the defendant was competent. This procedure was improper. The defendant was denied the right to counsel at his competency hearing.

United States v. Baldovinos, 434 F.3d 233 (4th Cir. 2006)
The defendant was medicated for the purpose of enabling him to be sentenced. The government did not, however, satisfy the Sell factors.

United States v. White, 431 F.3d 431 (5th Cir. 2005)

The district court improperly ordered that the defendant be involuntarily medicated without first following the administrative procedures outlined in 28 C.F.R. § 549.43. These procedures permit the defendant to have a due process hearing before a psychiatrist. The district court is not permitted to bypass these procedures.

United States v. Rivera-Guerrero, 426 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2005)

The trial court improperly ordered that the defendant be involuntarily medicated without first following the administrative procedures outlined in 28 C.F.R. § 549.43. These procedures permit the defendant to have a due process hearing before a psychiatrist. The district court is not permitted to bypass these procedures.

Burt v. Uchtman, 422 F.3d 557 (7th Cir. 2005)

The defendant in this death penalty trial was under heavy medication, including psychotropic drugs. Suddenly, during trial and against the advice of his attorney, he insisted on entering a guilty plea. The trial court should have conducted a competency hearing to determine whether the defendant was competent to make this decision.

United States v. Morrison, 415 F.3d 1180 (10th Cir. 2005)

The trial court failed to properly analyze the need for the administration of antipsychotic drugs under the Sell standard. Before undertaking the four-part analysis, the court must first decide whether it is appropriate to medicate the defendant to ensure the defendant’s safety or the safety of others. See Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210 (1990) (deciding standard for administration of drugs to convicted felon); Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127 (1992) (applying Harper to pre-trial detainees).

United States v. Evans, 404 F.3d 227 (4th Cir. 2005)

Though the government adequately addressed the issue of the importance of the case because of the seriousness of the charges, the presentation in the lower court did not adequately address the Sell factor dealing with the specific medications that would be used and that the medications were necessary. A remand to address these concerns was ordered.

United States v. Ghane, 392 F.3d 317 (8th Cir. 2004)

The government’s experts opined that if the defendant was forcibly medicated, there was a ten percent chance that he would be restored to competency to stand trial. The Eighth Circuit concludes that this evidence was insufficient to satisfy the Sell test for the forcible medication of a defendant. The second Sell factor articulated above, includes a component that the involuntary medication is substantially likely to render the defendant competent to stand trial. A ten percent chance is not a substantial likelihood.
United States v. Howard, 381 F.3d 873 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant offered proof in his § 2255 petition that he was under the influence of a powerful narcotic drug (painkiller) at the time he entered his guilty plea and that his attorney was aware of this. The district court erred in not conducting an evidentiary hearing to inquire into the factual support for this claim.

United States v. Friedman, 366 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2004)

The trial court correctly concluded that the defendant was incompetent to stand trial. The Ninth Circuit also held that the government was entitled to appeal this decision as an appealable collateral order.

United States v. Rinaldi, 351 F.3d 285 (7th Cir. 2003)

Between the time the defendant entered his plea and the scheduled sentencing date, the defendant moved to withdraw his plea, claiming that he suffered from A.D.D. The trial court ordered that the defendant be committed for a 45-day evaluation. The Seventh Circuit held that the provisions of Fed.R.Crim.P. Rule 12.2 do not apply, because the defendant was relying on a defense of insanity: his claim related only to his intent to present a diminished capacity defense (lack of capacity to form specific intent).

Deere v. Woodford, 339 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir. 2003)

An evidentiary hearing in the district court would be required to determine whether the defendant was competent to enter a guilty plea. A psychiatrist offered his opinion that the defendant understood what was going on around him, but he had no ability to help in his defense and had a compulsion to be punished with the death penalty. His guilty plea was the product of that compulsion. In short, he was bent on self-destruction.

United States v. Jones, 336 F.3d 245 (3rd Cir. 2003)

Pursuant to Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162 (1975) and Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375 (1966), a trial court must order a competency hearing must be conducted if there is reasonable cause to believe that the defendant is not competent to participate in the proceeding. The court must examine the unique circumstances of the case and decide whether the defendant has the capacity to assist in his own defense and comprehend the nature and possible consequences of a trial. If either prong is not met, the court has reasonable cause to order a competency hearing. The trial court’s failure to order a competency hearing in this case was reversible error.

United States v. Loyla-Dominguez, 125 F.3d 1315 (9th Cir. 1997)

Defendant's suicide attempt on the eve of trial should have prompted a competency hearing. When questioned about his understanding of why he was in court, his only response was, "I don't know. I've never been here like this, so I don't know." A hearing to determine his competency should have been held.

United States v. Nevarez-Castro, 120 F.3d 190 (9th Cir. 1997)

After a defendant is released from a hospital where he had been committed pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 4241(d), the court shall conduct a competency hearing in accordance with § 4247(d).
18 U.S.C. § 4241(e). This is not discretionary. The court's failure to conduct a competency hearing in this case required a remand to conduct a competency hearing and a new trial.

United States v. Boigegrain, 122 F.3d 1345 (10th Cir. 1997)

A commitment order pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 4241(d) is appealable. That section empowers the district court to commit the defendant to the custody of the Attorney General for a period up to four months for treatment and to determine if the defendant is likely to attain the capacity to permit the trial to proceed.

United States v. Haywood, 155 F.3d 674 (3rd Cir. 1998)

After the defendant was examined by one psychiatrist who found him incompetent to stand trial, the defendant was committed to an institution. About one month later, a psychiatrist certified that the defendant was then competent. The trial was held. Two times prior to trial, however, the judge received reports that suggested that the defendant might not be competent to proceed. At no time was a hearing held. The failure to hold a hearing violated 18 U.S.C. § 4241. Even after an expert opines that the defendant has regained his competence, subsection (e) of § 4241 mandates in no uncertain terms that a hearing beheld and a finding made.

United States v. Soldevila-Lopez, 17 F.3d 480 (1st Cir. 1994)

In deciding whether to grant a continuance, the factors which should be considered are (1) the extent of the defendant’s diligence in preparing his defense prior to the date set for hearing; (2) the likely utility of the continuance if granted; (3) the inconvenience to the court and the opposing party, including witnesses; (4) the extent to which the moving party may have suffered prejudice from the denial. Here, the defendant sought a continuance to obtain a psychiatric evaluation of his competence to be sentenced. Though the defendant was not particularly diligent and there was certain inconvenience to the expert witnesses, the trial court erred in not granting a short continuance in order to enable the defendant to retain an expert to evaluate his competence to be sentenced.

United States v. Purnett, 910 F.2d 51 (2d Cir. 1990)

The trial court expressed serious reservations about the defendant’s mental competence to stand trial; yet, at the same time he allowed the defendant to “knowingly and intelligently” waive his right to trial counsel. Because the trial court failed to adequately address the competence of the defendant prior to allowing him to waive his right to trial counsel, a new trial was necessary.

United States v. Renfroe, 825 F.2d 763 (3rd Cir. 1987)

At his sentencing hearing, it was established that the defendant had been a habitual cocaine user for 16 years and was not able to help his attorney in structuring his defense. Under these circumstances, a hearing was required to determine whether the defendant was competent to stand trial and participate in his own sentencing.

United States v. Mason, 52 F.3d 1286 (4th Cir. 1995)

18 U.S.C. §4241 requires the district court to conduct a competency hearing at any time prior to sentencing if there is reasonable cause to believe that the defendant may presently be suffering from a mental disease or defect rendering him mentally incompetent to the extent that he is unable to understand the nature and consequences of the proceedings against him or to assist properly in his defense. In this case, the trial court denied defendant’s request for a hearing. This was error. In determining whether there is reasonable cause to order a competency hearing, a trial court must consider all evidence before it, including evidence of irrational behavior, the defendant’s demeanor at trial, and the medical opinions concerning the defendant’s competence. Here, the defendant attempted to commit suicide the day after the verdict was reached, but prior to the forfeiture proceeding. Medical experts opined that he suffered from depression before the suicide attempt, possibly as long as two years before the trial.

United States v. Davis, 93 F.3d 1286 (6th Cir. 1996)

The defendant gave notice that she was intending to offer the defense of diminished capacity and or mental disease or defect, pursuant to Rule 12.2(b). The district court ordered that the defendant be detained and examined, pursuant to Rule 12.2(c) and 18 U.S.C. §§4241 and 4242. The appellate court reversed. Because the defendant did not indicate that she would be raising an insanity defense, those provisions did not apply. Moreover, there was no basis for ordering a competency examination, because there was no information suggesting that she was not competent to stand trial.

United States v. Graves, 98 F.3d 258 (7th Cir. 1996)

The defendant, who had never committed a crime, had a severe stroke and suddenly began robbing a bank, over and over again. At the guilty plea proceeding he had apparent trouble understanding some of the questions. The trial judge questioned the defendant closely about his understanding of the proceedings and concluded on the record that he did understand the proceedings. The Seventh Circuit, however, held that in this situation, a full-scale hearing with expert testimony is required to determine the competency of the defendant.

Reynolds v. Norris, 86 F.3d 796 (8th Cir. 1996)

The defendant had a long history of mental illness. Prior to the beginning of his trial, he had been committed to a hospital after it was determined that he was not competent to stand trial. Subsequent hearings revealed that he had improved to the point that he was competent. Nevertheless, the trial court erred in not conducting another hearing immediately prior to (or during) the trial. During the trial, the defendant testified that the murder was somehow related to the Gulf War, or perhaps President Bush. He also commented on the balanced budget, the “Reagan Party” and Bill Clinton’s tenure as governor (this was in Arkansas), and his increase in taxes. The appropriate remedy was to conduct a post-conviction competency hearing.

Miles v. Stainer, 108 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir. 1997)

The Due Process Clause requires a trial judge to sua sponte conduct a competency hearing whenever the evidence before it raises a reasonable doubt whether a defendant is mentally competent to go to trial, or enter a guilty plea. In this case, the defendant had previously been declared incompetent and was taking large doses of anti-psychotic drugs. The state trial court should have inquired whether the defendant was using the drugs at the time of the plea. Indications existed that he was not using the drugs, and thus his ability to comprehend the proceedings would have been compromised.

United States v. Hoskie, 950 F.2d 1388 (9th Cir. 1991)

The record established that the defendant was not competent to stand trial.
United States v. Williams, 113 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant’s conduct during the trial should have triggered a competency hearing. The defendant spoke rapidly and at times incoherently and, according to the appellate court was “out of control.”

Sena v. New Mexico State Prison, 109 F.3d 652 (10th Cir. 1997)

One year prior to entry of the plea, the state court judge had declared the defendant incompetent to stand trial. Between then and the time the plea was entered, no judicial determination had been made that the defendant had regained his competence. Even though there was a report submitted to the court that the defendant was competent, the trial judge was obligated to conduct an adversary hearing to properly resolve this issue.

Lafferty v. Cook, 949 F.2d 1546 (10th Cir. 1991)

The trial court erred in holding that the defendant, who suffered from paranoid delusions, was competent to stand trial. The state trial court used an incorrect legal standard, focusing on the defendant’s awareness of his surroundings, rather than inquiring into his rational thought process, as well.

James v. Singletary, 957 F.2d 1562 (11th Cir. 1992)

An evidentiary hearing was required to determine the validity of defendant’s contention that he was tried while incompetent in violation of Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375 (1966). The Court spells out the difference between a claimed violation of Pate which requires that a competency determination be made sua sponte when the trial court determines that the defendant may not be competent; and a claim simply that the defendant was tried while incompetent – but not focusing on the trial court’s failure to sua sponte conduct a competency hearing.

Tiller v. Esposito, 911 F.2d 575 (11th Cir. 1990)

Courts must focus on three factors in determining whether the trial court violated the defendant’s procedural due process rights by failing to hold sua sponte a competency hearing: (1) Evidence of the defendant’s irrational behavior; (2) the defendant’s demeanor at trial; and (3) prior medical opinion regarding the defendant’s competence to stand trial. The state trial court in this case erred in not conducting such a hearing in light of the evidence which indicated that the defendant may well have been incompetent to enter a guilty plea. There was psychiatric testimony that the defendant suffered from auditory hallucinations, and was a severe paranoid schizophrenic. During the plea colloquy, the defendant asked if he could have psychiatric treatment. Furthermore, the state trial judge wrote a letter to the Department of Corrections requesting that the defendant be committed to Central State Hospital. Finally, there was evidence that the defendant had attempted suicide on more than one occasion. Therefore, the writ of habeas corpus was granted and the case remanded to determine whether a nunc pro tunc inquiry could be made into the question of whether the defendant was, at the time of the plea hearing, incompetent to plead guilty.

Bailey v. Spears, 847 F.2d 695 (11th Cir. 1988)

A habeas petitioner alleged sufficient facts to raise questions about his sanity at the time of the offense, and his competence to stand trial, requiring a remand for the taking of additional evidence.
Demos v. Johnson, 835 F.2d 840 (11th Cir. 1988)

The trial court erred in refusing to grant the defendant’s request for a psychiatric examination. Evidence indicated that the defendant had a history of glue sniffing and had two prior occasions of psychiatric treatment.

Agan v. Dugger, 835 F.2d 1337 (11th Cir. 1987)

During the course of the grand jury proceedings, and at sentencing, the defendant expressed no regret at having committed a murder, expressed dissatisfaction that his victim had not died a more painful death, and announced his intention to find and murder the partner of his victim. The court holds that this “highly irregular” conduct should have prompted the judge to conduct a competency hearing prior to accepting the guilty plea.

United States v. Weissberger, 951 F.2d 392 (D.C.Cir. 1991)

An order pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §4241(a), requiring the defendant to submit to a thirty-day evaluation, is appealable. This is an order analogous to an order denying bond. Though not a final order, it is a collateral order which is immediately appealable.
COMPUTER FRAUD AND ABUSE ACT

United States v. Valle, 807 F.3d 508 (2d Cir. 2015)

The defendant, a NYC police officer was given access through his job to a law enforcement website that allowed him to engage in certain investigations, including access to the NCIC. At home, at night, however, he accessed these sites to track down women who he fantasized raping. He never actually engaged in any such criminal conduct with the women. (See the discussion of this case in the topic Conspiracy). He was prosecuted for violating the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act. One provision of that Act provides that it is a crime to “intentionally access[] a computer without authorization or [to] exceed authorized access and thereby obtain[] information ... from any department or agency of the United States.” 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(2)(B). The defendant was, in fact, permitted to access the NCIC, so his access to that site, alone, would not be a crime, unless his access for an unauthorized purpose is included in the criminal provision. The Second Circuit holds that the statute is ambiguous, because “exceeds authorized access” could mean either that the defendant’s “purpose” for accessing the site was beyond authorization, or it could mean that the defendant accessed a site that he was not authorized to access. Invoking the rule of lenity, the Second Circuit held that a conviction for accessing a site that the defendant was authorized to access, but not for a proper purpose, is not an offense under the CFAA.

United States v. Auernheimer, 748 F.3d 525 (3rd Cir. 2014)

The Third Circuit discussed various issues relating to the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, including the question of venue in a computer hacking case. The court decided the venue in a hacking case brought under 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(2)(C). The Third Circuit did not address the issue resolved in Nosal, but with regard to venue, held that venue is proper where the defendant accessed a computer without authorization or obtained information from it.

United States v. Nosal, 676 F.3d 854 (9th Cir. 2012)

The Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1030, only applies to individuals who violate an employer’s restrictions on access to a computer, not to limitations on the use of the computer. The court explained that under the government’s interpretation, if an employee logged on to ESPN.com while at work, this would be a federal crime, if the employer forbids employees from non-work use of a computer. If someone logged onto another person’s Facebook page – even with the other person’s permission – this would be a federal crime, because Facebook forbids people from accessing another person’s account. Other websites prohibit minors from using the site, including Amazon and Netflix. Making a misrepresentation on a dating website (which is forbidden by the websites’ rules) would be a federal crime. If “exceeding permissible use” was in fact a crime, in each of these situations, the user of the computer would be committing a federal crime. This decision is contrary to the decisions of other Circuits, including United States v. Rodriguez, 628 F.3d 1258 (11th Cir. 2010); United States v. John, 597 F.3d 263 (5th Cir. 2010). After remand, the case was tried and the appellate decision affirming the conviction is found at 828 F.3d 865 (9th Cir. 2016). That opinion also reviews at great length (with a dissent by Judge Reinhardt) various aspects of the CFAA.

DONALD F. SAMUEL · GARLAND, SAMUEL & LOEB, P.C., ATLANTA, GEORGIA · 404-262-2225 · dfs@gsllaw.com
United States v. Christensen, 801 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 2015)

The conviction in this case was reversed based on Nosal. This decision was amended and superseded on denial of rehearing at 828 F.3d 763 (9th Cir. 2016).
COMPULSORY PROCESS

SEE ALSO: (EVIDENCE – DEFENDANT’S RIGHT TO PRESENT EXCULAPTORY EVIDENCE)

United States v. Carmen, 697 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 2012)

Deporting a potentially exculpatory witness prior to providing the defense an opportunity to interview the witness violates the defendant’s right to compulsory process and to due process. The defendant, however, is required to show that the government acted in bad faith, a showing that was, in fact, made in this case.

Harris v. Thompson, 698 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2012)

The trial court’s decision to exclude a defense witness who was 6-years old based on the child’s competence as a witness violated the defendant’s Compulsory Process rights to present evidence in his defense. The child had critical exculpatory evidence and the jury should have been allowed to evaluate the credibility issue. The fact that the child believed in the tooth fairy, Santa Claus and Spiderman did not render him unfit to testify. (Part of the child’s apparent confusion about who was “real” and who was not “real” was the way that questions were posed, which drew a distinction between characters in movies that were cartoons, or animated, and characters who were played by live actors). The state trial court violated the state statute that placed the burden of proving incompetency of a witness on the state, rather than proving competence of witness on the party calling the witness, as the court did in this case. In addition, the court held that the trial attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to properly litigate the competency issue and to interview and prepare the child to testify. This case contains an encyclopedic review of Compulsory Process cases.

In this celebrated 9/11 trial of the suspected terrorist, the defendant sought access to witnesses who were in custody of the U.S. military as suspected Al Qaeda terrorists. He sought access to them to interview them, and to take their depositions pursuant to Rule 15, Fred.R.Crim.P. The Fourth Circuit agreed with the lower court and held that the Compulsory Process Clause, as well as the defendant’s due process right to present a defense necessitated granting him access to these witnesses – or, in the alternative, granting some other relief (such as dismissal of the death penalty) if such access was denied as a matter of national security. See also 382 F.3d 453 (4th Cir. 2004).
CONFESSION

(Fruit of Illegal Arrest or Illegal Search)

A confession resulting from custodial interrogation following an illegal arrest must be excluded from evidence unless “intervening events break the causal connection” between the confession and the illegal arrest so that the confession is sufficiently an act of free will to purge the primary taint.

United States v. Hernandez, 670 F.3d 616 (5th Cir. 2012)

The police received a tip that the defendant was harboring illegal aliens. They went to her trailer and started banging on the door and windows and demanding entry. The defendant came to the door and acknowledged that there was an illegal alien inside. The Fifth Circuit concluded that the banging on the doors and windows and demanding entry amounted to a Fourth Amendment violation (an illegal seizure) and the defendant’s subsequent statement was not attenuated from that illegal conduct. Therefore, her statement should have been suppressed. The court also held that the statements obtained by witnesses inside (as well as additional evidence) were the fruit of the Fourth Amendment violation, as well and those statements, too, would be suppressed.

United States v. Shetler, 665 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2011)

Based on a tip, the police conducted a warrantless search of the defendant’s garage (which the district court held was justified by exigent circumstances and was a valid security sweep) and then the police entered the house without a warrant and continued to conduct a search. This latter search was not lawful. The defendant, confronted with evidence that was uncovered during the search, made numerous incriminating statements. The Ninth Circuit held that all statements were the fruit of the poisonous tree and should have been suppressed. The Court further held that the confession was not sufficiently “attenuated” from the illegal search so as to break the causal chain. The fact that he was Mirandized prior to making the statements also did not break the causal chain.

United States v. Olivares-Rangel, 458 F.3d 1104 (10th Cir. 2006)

If a defendant is illegally seized or arrested and as the result of that illegal arrest, the defendant makes a statement, the defendant’s identity is learned, and his illegal status is ascertained, the court may suppress all the evidence. The suppression of the defendant’s statement is governed by Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975). The suppression of the identity evidence (as well as the defendant’s “A-file”) is more complicated. The government argued that INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032 (1984), holds that the identity of the defendant may never be suppressed. The Tenth Circuit rejected this argument. The defendant, himself, may not be suppressed (i.e., he may be brought to court), but evidence derived from the illegal detention may be suppressed, including fingerprint evidence in certain circumstances (see Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969); Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811 (1985)) and independently created and maintained government records. The fact that the defendant does not have an expectation of privacy in the government records is not relevant. The standing issue focuses on the defendant’s rights regarding the illegal arrest. The defendant need not have an expectation of privacy in the fruits that are the result of the unlawful arrest. In other words, the defendant is not required to prove an expectation of privacy in both the primary violation and the fruits. If his expectation of privacy was violated, the fruits of that violation may be suppressed, regardless of whether the fruits are discovered in a place for which the defendant does not have an expectation of privacy.

United States v. Shaw, 464 F.3d 615 (6th Cir. 2006)

A woman reported to the police that her three-year old child reported that he had been sexually molested by a relative. Based only on that report, the police arrested the defendant (the relative). After his arrest, the relative confessed. The Sixth Circuit held that the second-hand report from the mother was not sufficient to support an arrest. There was no corroborating evidence (a medical examination produced no physical signs of trauma or sexual penetration). The confession was tainted by the unlawful arrest.

United States v. Reed, 349 F.3d 457 (7th Cir. 2003)

The court concluded that the defendant’s confession, made several hours after an illegal arrest (i.e., an arrest not supported by probable cause) was the fruit of the arrest and not sufficiently attenuated to purge the initial taint. There were no external circumstances that separated the arrest from the confession. A remand was necessary, however, to determine the precise time of the illegal arrest.

United States v. Patzer, 277 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2002)

The police lacked probable cause to arrest the defendant for DUI, because the officer may have believed that the defendant had ingested marijuana, but there was no information suggesting that this impaired his ability to drive which is an element of the DUI offense. Absent probable cause to arrest the defendant, the ensuing search of his automobile could not be justified as a search incident to arrest. Similarly, the defendant’s consent was tainted by the unlawful arrest. Finally, the court ordered suppressed the statements made by the defendant that were the product of the illegal arrest.
CONFESSION
(Fruit of Illegally Obtained Confession)

The Supreme Court held that the exclusionary rule does not bar the introduction of physical evidence that is discovered as the result of a Miranda tainted statement of the defendant. The defendant was arrested for violating a restraining order. The police officer questioned the defendant at the time of the arrest without properly advising him of his Miranda rights. The defendant told the officer where his gun was located in the house. The 5 – 4 decision of the Supreme court concluded that the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine did not extend to physical evidence discovered as a result of a statement taken without Miranda warnings.

The police intentionally interrogated the suspect without providing Miranda warnings. During the course of this interrogation, the suspect confessed to being involved in a murder. Immediately thereafter, the police Mirandized the suspect and asked her to repeat what she had just said. The Supreme Court held that this procedure violated Miranda and ordered that the subsequent, Mirandized statement be suppressed. Distinguishing Oregon v. Elstad, the Court concluded that the intentional effort to circumvent Miranda in a manner that eviscerated the protection rendered the subsequent statement inadmissible. In Oregon v. Elstad, the initial questioning amounted to a brief casual question that elicited an incriminating response, followed much later by a Mirandized statement that did not exploit the earlier statements.

United States v. Ray, 803 F.3d 244 (6th Cir. 2015)

This case contains a lengthy discourse on the Seibert decision. The court notes that there was no majority opinion on precisely how to evaluate whether the officers engaged in the improper sequential interrogation. The court ultimately concludes that the proper test is an objective test, not the subjective intent of the officers. Under the objective test, the factors that should be considered are the completeness and detail of the questions and answers in the first round of interrogation, the overlapping content of the two statements, the timing and setting of the first and the second interrogations, the continuity of police personnel, and the degree to which the interrogator’s questions treated the second round as continuous with the first.

Reyes v. Lewis, 798 F.3d 815 (9th Cir. 2015)

The state court violated clearly established Supreme Court law in failing to hold that the interrogation technique used in this case violated Seibert. The initial questioning of the defendant (a juvenile) was at the police station after the defendant’s house was searched. The questioning began with the officer telling the defendant that he was free to leave, but that he had strong evidence pointing to the defendant as the perpetrator of a murder. Repeatedly, during this questioning, the defendant asked that officers to stop asking him questions. The officers refused. Thereafter, he was brought home. The next day, he went with the police to take a polygraph test. After he took the test, he was told that he failed the test and during additional questioning that followed he made incriminating statements. Later, Miranda warnings were given and the defendant gave an incriminating statement. The Ninth Circuit granted the writ.
Lujan v. Garcia, 734 F.3d 917 (9th Cir. 2013)

After his arrest for murder, the defendant was given defective Miranda warnings that failed to properly advise him of his right to counsel. He gave a full confession. The state trial court denied a Motion to Suppress. The California appellate court held that the confession should have been suppressed pursuant to Miranda, but it was otherwise voluntary. The defendant’s testimony at trial, therefore, was not tainted by virtue of the improperly admitted confession. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant’s testimony at trial represented the fruit of the poisonous tree. Relying on Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968), the court held that once the trial court permitted the inadmissible confession into evidence, the defendant’s testimony, which was prompted by the need to explain the confession, was the fruit: “The question is not whether the petitioner made a knowing decision to testify [at trial], but why. If he did so in order to overcome the impact of confessions illegally obtained and hence improperly introduced, then his testimony was tainted by the same illegality that rendered the confessions themselves inadmissible.”

United States v. Barnes, 713 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 2013)

The agents’ interrogation technique in this case was a clear violation of the principle announced in Missouri v. Seibert. The defendant was questioned in custody without Miranda warnings. He incriminated himself. The defendant was then given the warning and repeated the incriminating statement.

United States v. Swanson, 635 F.3d 995 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was arrested on a warrant charging him with possession of a weapon in violation of state law. The judge who issued the warrant wrote on the warrant that there would be no bond, unless the defendant turned in his gun. When he was arrested, the defendant was told about the bond condition by the arresting officer before he was Mirandized. This statement by the police amounted to interrogation. The defendant responded by telling the police where his guns were in the house. The statement should have been suppressed. Later the defendant was taken to the police station where he received Miranda warnings and he gave a statement. This latter statement was inadmissible pursuant to Seibert. The court also held that the defendant’s supposed consent to search his vehicle to find an additional shotgun was involuntary, because the officers serving the arrest warrant stated that he was “ordered” to turn over all guns, thus implying that he had no choice in the matter.

United States v. Capers, 627 F.3d 470 (2d Cir. 12/1/10)

The Second Circuit elaborates on the rule announced in Missouri v. Seibert. First, the court agreed with several other courts in holding that Justice Kennedy’s concurring opinion represents the controlling decision in the Seibert decision. Second, the court holds that numerous factors, objective and subjective, may be considered in deciding whether the two-step interrogation procedure was intentionally used by the police. Finally, the court holds that the government has the burden of proving that the procedure used was not deliberately designed to evade the Miranda protection. The court concluded that the procedure utilized in this case constituted a violation of Seibert and that the government failed to prove that it was not a deliberate violation.
When initially questioned, the defendant stated that he would not answer questions without a lawyer. The police approached the defendant a second time, did not Mirandize him and offered to “cut him a deal” after which the defendant made an incriminating statement. He was the Mirandized and repeated the incriminating statement. The statement was inadmissible because it was obtained in violation of Miranda, it violated his right to counsel, it was not “voluntary” (because of the offer of a deal) and violated Seibert. THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED, HOLDING THAT THE TWO-STEP SEIBERT TYPE OF INTERROGATION WAS NOT EMPLOYED BY THE POLICE IN THIS CASE. Bobby v. Dixon, 132 S.Ct. 26 (2011).

If physical evidence is seized as the result of a confession that was obtained in violation of Miranda, the physical evidence is not suppressed. United States v. Patane. However, if physical evidence is seized as the result of a confession that was obtained pursuant to an illegal detention (and therefore a Fourth Amendment violation), then the physical evidence is the fruit of the Fourth Amendment violation and is suppressed pursuant to Wong Sun v. United States.

The Seventh Circuit explored the problem of interpreting Seibert in light of the fractured opinions that composed the decision to reverse the conviction. No majority explained what the rationale of the decision was. One interpretation is that Elstad has been limited and the focus is on the defendant’s state of mind. Another interpretation focuses on whether the police intended to exploit the two-step process. The Heron court did not decide how to resolve this dilemma, but the case is worth considering whenever a Seibert issue arises.

After learning incriminating information from the defendant during pre-Miranda questioning, the police promptly Mirandized the defendant and asked him the same questions. This violated Seibert and required that the post-Miranda statements be suppressed.

Relying on Seibert, the Eighth Circuit held that a Mirandized statement that was obtained immediately after obtaining an un-Mirandized statement was the fruit of the tainted statement and should be suppressed.

The federal agents interrogated the defendant in the manner described in Seibert – that is, a two-step procedure in which the defendant is interrogated without being warned of his rights, and as soon as he confessed, he was Mirandized and asked to repeat, or write down, the confession. The Ninth Circuit remanded this case to the district court to reconsider its decision in light of Seibert. The Court noted, moreover, that because of the splintered opinions in Seibert, the rationale that garnered at least five votes was the opinion of Justice Kennedy (albeit not the “majority” opinion), which stated that the two-step interrogation process must have been conducted intentionally for the purpose of subverting Miranda’s protection. Thus, not all pre-"Miranda" statements will taint a subsequent "Mirandized" statement, even if the latter statement follows close on the heels of the earlier statement.

United States v. Naranjo, 426 F.3d 221 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The Third Circuit remanded this case to the trial court to conduct a more thorough Seibert analysis. The court noted that Justice Kennedy’s test – which focuses on the intention of the officers in conducting a “two-step” interrogation – was not properly analyzed by the trial court.

United States v. Aguilar, 384 F.3d 520 (8th Cir. 2004)

For nearly two hours, the police interrogated the defendant prior to giving him "Miranda" warnings. The defendant was told that if he cooperated, he would be released. Based on Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600, 124 S.Ct. 2601 (2004), the "Mirandized" statement was inadmissible. Moreover, the post-Miranda statements were the product of coercion. Though the promise of release is not alone a basis for finding the confession involuntary, it is one of many factors that supported the trial court’s finding that the confession was not voluntary.

United States v. Byram, 145 F.3d 405 (1st Cir. 1998)

The defendant was present when two friends played Russian Roulette, resulting in the death of one of the friends. The defendant was later arrested on a parole violation warrant. While in court on his matter, the police questioned him (without "Mirandizing" him) and asked about the killing. He implicated the surviving friend, as well as himself. He later was asked to testify at the surviving friend’s murder trial, which he did (further implicating himself). The First Circuit concluded that the testimony at the friend’s trial was the inadmissible fruit of the "Miranda"-tainted interrogation. The court considered whether the prior trial testimony was involuntary, but concluded that though it was obtained through some deception (the officer did not advise the defendant the purpose for which he was being questioned, and even assured him that it was not for purposes of a criminal case against him), the statement did not satisfy the definition of “involuntary” in current Supreme Court parlance. See Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986). Turning to the "Miranda" issue, the court concluded that the defendant was being interrogated and was “in custody” – though he was already under arrest for his own parole matter, the interrogation occurred in a separate room in the courthouse where the defendant was taken by the interrogating officer. The next question is whether testimony at a co-defendant’s trial can qualify as “fruit” of a "Miranda"-tainted statement. The Supreme Court has already held that "Miranda" does not apply to testimony in court. United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564 (1976) (grand jury witness is not entitled to a "Miranda" warning before testifying). Also, Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298 (1985) held that there is no “fruit” exclusionary rule where a "Miranda"-tainted statement is followed by a statement that is preceded by a fully "Miranda" warning and waiver. In this case, however, the First Circuit distinguished Elstad. Here, the initial tainted statement was not the product of a mere “technical” "Miranda" violation. Second, there was a substantial nexus between the first statement and the trial testimony. Third, the trial testimony (which the government was seeking to introduce at the defendant’s own trial) was itself not preceded by "Miranda." In all three respects, Elstad is distinguishable.
CONFESSION
(Miranda – Sufficiency of Waiver)

The defendant was read the Miranda warning and did not respond when asked if he waived the right to remain silent. He was then questioned for several hours, during which time he answered very few questions, just silently listening to the interrogation. Then he answered one question. The Supreme Court held that in order to invoke the right to remain silent and to thereby terminate further interrogation, the defendant must unequivocally invoke the right to remain silent. Simply remaining silent is not sufficient. In addition, once the defendant answered the question, this amounted to a waiver of the right to remain silent.

United States v. Giddins, 858 F.3d 870 (4th Cir. 2017)

The defendant’s car was used in a bank robbery. The perpetrators who were arrested told the police that Giddins was involved in a prior robbery. An arrest warrant was taken out for the defendant, but before it was served, the police told him that his car had been seized and he could come to the police station to claim it. When he arrived at the police station, he was brought to an interrogation room where he was repeatedly told that he was “not in trouble at this time” and that in order to retrieve his car, the police had to ask few questions and he would be required to waive his Miranda rights. The defendant then waived his Miranda rights and answered questions. The Fourth Circuit held that the defendant was in custody and that the police tactic vitiated the voluntariness of his Miranda waiver. While trickery is permissible and there is no requirement that the police reveal the existence of an arrest warrant, the police in this case affirmatively misled the defendant about whether he was in trouble, thus leading him to waive his rights. In addition, it was improperly coercive to tell the defendant that he could not have his car back without waiving his Miranda rights.

Sessoms v. Runnels, 691 F.3d 1054 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc)

After receiving Miranda warnings, in order to invoke the prohibition of further questioning required by Edwards v. Arizona, the defendant’s invocation of the right to an attorney must be unambiguous. Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994). What happens, however, if the defendant invokes his right to counsel in an ambiguous manner before he is read his Miranda rights? In this en banc decision, the Ninth Circuit holds that questioning must stop. The rationale is that an effort to obtain the assistance of counsel prior to being read Miranda warnings must be honored even if the request is not clear, because the target may not fully understand his rights at that point in time; whereas after having been informed of his rights, the defendant’s rights should be clear to him and therefore, his invocation must be unambiguous. Following remand from the U.S. Supreme Court, the en banc court concluded that the invocation in this case was, in fact, unambiguous, so further questioning was inappropriate. Sessoms v. Grounds, 776 F.3d 615 (9th Cir. 2015). The defendant asked, “There wouldn’t be any possible way that I could have a – a lawyer present while we do this?” and then “Yeah, that’s what my dad asked me to ask you guys – uh, give me a lawyer.” There was nothing ambiguous about this request.

Garner v. Mitchell, 557 F.3d 257 (6th Cir. 2009)
The panel opinion, 502 F.3d 394, contained a thorough consideration of the law requiring that a Miranda waiver must be voluntary (i.e., free from coercion) and knowing. The court begins by reminding that the requirement that a confession be voluntary is a different matter than requiring that a Miranda waiver be voluntary. Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 421 (1986). In order to prove that a confession is involuntary, police coercion is required, Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986). Police coercion is not required in order to establish that a Miranda waiver was not voluntary. In this case, based on the defendant’s age, education and IQ and other factors relating to his mental state, the panel concluded that the evidence did not establish that the defendant voluntarily waived his Miranda rights. Rehearing was granted – and the en banc court reversed the panel opinion, reinstating the conviction, 557 F.3d 257 (6th Cir. 2009)( en banc).
CONFESSION
(Miranda – Sufficiency of Warning)

A somewhat ambiguous Miranda warning was not sufficiently defective to warrant excluding the resulting confession. The police advised the defendant that he could have the assistance of counsel before being interrogated. The defendant claimed that this was erroneous, because he was entitled to the assistance of counsel during interrogation, as well. The defendant was correct about the right to counsel, but was wrong when he insisted that his confession should be excluded on the basis of this erroneous Miranda warning. Miranda does not require a precise formulation of the warning. See California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. 355 (1981) and Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195 (1989).

United States v. Botello-Rosales, 728 F.3d 865 (9th Cir. 2013)
The Spanish translation of the Miranda warning stated that the defendant could receive a “free” lawyer. Experts testified that the word “libre” in Spanish, however, meant that a lawyer who was available (i.e., not otherwise busy), as opposed to a lawyer who would cost no money. The warning also did not make it clear that a lawyer would definitely be provided by the government, as opposed to the appointment being contingent on a court’s approval. This warning was not adequate and the confession should have been suppressed. In addition, the court held that a correct English-language warning that was read to the defendant was not sufficient, because even if the defendant spoke English, providing inconsistent warnings without clarifying which warning provided the accurate advice does not satisfy Miranda’s requirement.

United States v. IMM, 747 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2014)
Miranda warnings must be read to the defendant, not simply in his presence. In this case, the juvenile was present when the officer read the Miranda warnings to the juvenile’s mother. This does not satisfy the requirement that the defendant receive the warning.

United States v. Wysinger, 683 F.3d 784 (7th Cir. 2012)
The officer’s Miranda warning was confusing and inaccurate. The warning suggested that the time to invoke the right to counsel had not yet arrived – this was told to him when he unambiguously invoked his right to counsel – and also suggested that the defendant must choose either to invoke his right to counsel either before the questioning began, or during the questioning.

Doody v. Schriro, 596 F.3d 620 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc)
The Ninth Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus in this murder case because of two flaws in the state’s method of gaining the defendant’s confession: first, the Miranda warning was confusing and inaccurate – the police advised the defendant that he had the right to counsel if he was involved in the crime; the police also advised the defendant (a juvenile) that the warnings were “just formalities.” The one-page Miranda form was explained by the police over twelve pages of the interrogation transcript. In addition, a thirteen hour long interrogation of a sleep-deprived teenager resulted in a confession that was not voluntary. Relentless questioning implies to the suspect that he does not, in fact, have the right to remain silent. Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49 (1949); Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948). Rehearing the case once again after remand from the U.S. Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit reached the same result, even after considering Florida v. Powell, 130 S. Ct. 1195 (2010). Doody v. Ryan, 649 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2011).

United States v. Street, 472 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2006)

Advising the defendant that he had the right to remain silent and the right to counsel during questioning was not sufficient to satisfy the warning requirement of Miranda. The warning omitted the warning that whatever the defendant said could be used against him and omitted the advice that a lawyer would be appointed if he could not afford one. As Judge Carnes, wrote, “This is one instance in which halfway is not close enough for government work.”

United States v. Perez-Lopez, 348 F.3d 839 (9th Cir. 2004)

The Miranda warning included the phrase, “You have the right to solicit the court for an attorney if you have no funds.” This was incorrect. The government is required to appoint a lawyer if the defendant has no funds. The defendant’s post-Miranda statements had to be suppressed based on this erroneous advice.

Zappulla v. New York, 391 F.3d 462 (2d Cir. 2004)

When initially arrested on theft charges, the defendant waived his Miranda rights and gave a statement. Shortly thereafter a dead body was found in his hotel room. He briefly escaped from custody and when re-captured, was interrogated about the murder, but without new Miranda warnings. The New York State courts, as well as the federal courts, all agreed that the interrogation was conducted in violation of Miranda; the Second Circuit concluded that the admission of his statements was not harmless error and required that a writ of habeas corpus be granted.
CONFESSION
(Miranda – In Custody Requirement)

The suspect’s age is a factor that the court must consider in deciding whether the defendant would reasonably believe that he was “in custody” and thus whether Miranda warnings were required.

Howes v. Fields, 131 S. Ct. 1047 (2012)

The prisoner in this case was not “in custody” when he was asked by sheriff’s deputies to answer questions about another investigation. The defendant was brought to a conference room in another building in the prison, but was not restrained and was specifically told that he was free to leave.

In Edwards v. Arizona, the Court held that once the defendant invokes the right to counsel during custodial interrogation, the police must cease interrogation and can never re-initiate interrogation. The question in this case is whether the “never can re-initiate questioning” rule applies even if the defendant is released from custody? The Court holds that once the defendant is released from custody (and that includes being returned to general population in prison, which is not “in custody” for Miranda purposes), the police may re-initiate questioning after fourteen days. In other words, if the defendant invokes his right to counsel and is later released from custody, the police must wait at least fourteen days prior to contacting the defendant and interrogating him.

In this habeas case, the Supreme Court held that the state court did not unreasonably apply controlling Supreme Court doctrine when it held that a suspect’s age is not factor to be considered in deciding whether he is “in custody” for Miranda purposes. The Court did not definitively hold that age is not a factor, but simply held that in the context of a habeas petition, the state court did not err in holding that age is not a factor. The Court indicated, however, that whether a suspect is “in custody” should be decided under a strict objective standard – not a subjective evaluation of whether the suspect in this case believed he was in custody. The suspect’s age, lack of experience with the criminal justice system, or other psychological factors, are not relevant considerations, because the police cannot be expected to know all of these characteristics of the suspect and would not know, consequently, when Miranda warnings are necessary. Note, again, that this is a habeas case and the Court did not definitively decide this question; rather, it simply held that lower federal courts should have deferred to the state court habeas decision.

In a per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court reiterates that the question whether a person is in custody for Miranda purposes focuses on the objective circumstances, not the subjective intent of the police officer. While an officer’s knowledge or beliefs may bear upon the custody issue if they are conveyed by word or deed to the individual being questioned, the officer’s personal view of whether he was going to let the suspect go, or not, is irrelevant, in and of itself. The officer may be asked about his intent, insofar as this may be relevant in testing his or her credibility of what happened during an interrogation.

The defendant was in jail on charges unrelated to a murder which the police were investigating. The police put an undercover agent in the jail cell block who elicited a confession from the defendant about the murder. The confession was admissible. His right to remain silent and his right to counsel were not violated. Because the essential ingredients of a “police dominated atmosphere” were missing, there was no need for the undercover agent to advise the defendant of his Miranda rights. The atmosphere in the prison was not coercive, at least not with respect to the undercover agents’ conversation with the defendant. The Sixth Amendment was not implicated, because no murder charges had been filed against the defendant at the time of the “interrogation.” Thus, the decisions in Massiah and United States v. Henry and Maine v. Moulton are all distinguishable. In those cases, the undercover agent questioned the defendant about the charges which had already been filed against the defendant, and for which his Sixth Amendment rights had attached.

Rivera v. Thompson, 879 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2018)

The police responded to a report of a stabbing. When an officer arrived at the scene, a man was seen jogging away. The officer ordered the man to lie down, pulled his weapon and asked him what he was doing. The defendant’s responses should have been suppressed. The defendant was in custody and was being interrogated. Trial counsel’s failure to move to suppress the statements was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Giddins, 858 F.3d 870 (4th Cir. 2017)

See annotation, above (Confession – Sufficiency of Waiver).

United States v. Molina-Gomez, 781 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2015)

Though a person being questioned at the border may not be “free to leave” this does not necessarily mean that the defendant is in custody for Miranda purposes. In this case, however, the secondary questioning was conducted in a small windowless room with two CBP officers. He was held in the room for between one-and-a-half and two hours. The questioning was not routine; it was already known to the officers that the defendant was an American citizen. The focus of the interrogation on illegal activity elevated this encounter to the level of “custodial interrogation” for Miranda purposes.

United States v. Borostowski, 775 F.3d 851 (7th Cir. 2014)

When the police executed a search warrant at the defendant’s house, he was handcuffed and confined to a small room for three hours. This satisfied the “in custody” requirement of Miranda. While the agents’ statement to the defendant “You are not under arrest” is relevant, it did not counterbalance the other factors that would lead a reasonable person to believe that he was not free to leave.

United States v. IMM, 747 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2014)

For purposes of Miranda, the juvenile defendant was in custody when he was questioned. He was in a police interrogation room. As far as the juvenile could determine, the room was locked (he was told that if he needed to go to bathroom, he should knock on the door and obtain a detective’s permission. The police station was located 30 – 40 minutes from his home. He was alone in the room. Though his mother had been told that the juvenile was not in custody, the question must be addressed from the defendant’s point of view, not his mother’s.

United States v. Hashime, 734 F.3d 278 (4th Cir. 2013)

Though he was told that he was not under arrest, the defendant was awaken by numerous armed agents who were executing a search warrant in his house. He was taken at gunpoint to a storage room where he was questioned for several hours and told that during the execution of the search warrant, he must remain under guard. The defendant was in custody and the failure to Mirandize him required that the confession be set suppressed.

United States v. Cowan, 674 F.3d 947 (8th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was in custody when he was handcuffed, patted down, and questioned. The encounter occurred in an apartment that was being searched pursuant to a search warrant. The defendant was a visitor in the apartment. When the search started, he was handcuffed and ordered to produce identification. He was then asked questions about where he had come from and why he had car keys in his possession if he had taken the bus there. The defendant’s statements were not preceded by Miranda warnings and his statements should have been suppressed.

United States v. Cavazos, 668 F.3d 190 (5th Cir. 2012)

Fourteen law enforcement officers executed a search warrant at the defendant’s house. He was handcuffed and led into the kitchen and separated from his family. Thereafter, the handcuffs were removed and he was brought to a bedroom where he sat the bed and two officers sat across from him and questioned him. He was told that he was not in custody. The Fifth Circuit held that the number of agents involved, the movement of the defendant around the house while he was continuously monitored, the fact that he was initially handcuffed, all led the conclusion that he was in custody for Miranda purposes.

United States v. Rogers, 659 F.3d 74 (1st Cir. 2011)

The defendant, a soldier, was ordered to return to his home by his commanding officer. There, he was questioned by police, but expressly told that he was not under arrest. In an opinion by retired Justice David Souter, the First Circuit held that the defendant was “in custody” for Miranda purposes because of the compulsion resulting from his military status and orders from his superiors.

United States v. Villa-Gonzalez, 623 F.3d 526 (8th Cir. 2010)

The defendants were in custody when they were confronted and questioned on the porch outside their trailer. Several law enforcement officers questioned the brothers. They were accused of being drug dealers. Their identification papers were taken from them. This amounted to a seizure of Fourth Amendment purposes and for Miranda purposes.
United States v. Slaight, 620 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2010)

A Judge Posner opinion on the definition of “in custody” for Miranda purposes concludes that the defendant was in custody, even though the police told him he was “free to leave.” The police used a battering ram to gain entry into the defendant’s house with a search warrant. After the dust settled, the police “invited” him to come to the police station to be interviewed about child pornography on his computer. He agreed and was placed in a small interview room in the police station. The room was approximately eight by eight and had no window. The defendant knew the police had already discovered the child porn on his computer. The defendant eventually confessed. The court also notes that some police manuals advise the police to tell the suspect that he is not in custody in order to avoid having to Mirandize the suspect, and after the defendant confesses the defendant should be Mirandized. The Seventh Circuit reverses, holding that the failure to advise the defendant of his Miranda warnings was error.

United States v. Chavira, 614 F.3d 127 (5th Cir. 2010)

At the initial border checkpoint, the defendant was not in custody during routine questioning. But when she was brought to a secondary processing, the situation changed dramatically. She was handcuffed to a chair; the officers already knew that she had made a false statement and acknowledged that she was not free to leave; the officers stated that they intentionally did not Mirandize her, because they wanted her to confess first; the questioning was clearly not limited to routine immigration questions; her identification papers had been confiscated and were in possession of the agents.

Simpson v. Jackson, 615 F.3d 421 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was in custody in the prison when investigators came to interview him about a murder case. The Supreme Court vacated and remanded for further consideration in light of Howes v. Fields.

United States v. Brobst, 558 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2009)

When the defendant arrived home, agents were executing a search warrant at his house. He was directed to “come with me” by one of the agents and was confronted with the fact that the agents had located child pornography in the house. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the defendant was “in custody” for Miranda questioning and he should have been advised of his rights.

United States v. Craighead, 539 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2008)

The police questioned the defendant in his home without Mirandizing him. The government argued that the defendant was not in custody – he was in his own home and was told that he was not in custody. The Ninth Circuit holds that the defendant was in custody and that he should have been Mirandized. Interrogations in the home, particularly where, as here, the police are executing a search warrant and therefore are not in the home with the defendant’s consent, may be more “custodial” than interrogations elsewhere. Moreover, telling the defendant that he is free to leave is a rather unusual suggestion, because the defendant is in his own home and it is not a sign of “freedom” that he has been invited by the police to leave his own home. The court rhetorically asked, “Where will he go? The library? The police station? He is already in the most constitutionally protected place on earth: [his own home].”

United States v. Colonna, 511 F.3d 431 (4th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was in custody, for Miranda purposes, when twenty-three officers went to his house, kicked open his bedroom door and at gunpoint, ordered him to get dressed and come downstairs. Despite the fact that one officer told the defendant that he was not under arrest, his circumstances amounted to being in custody and he should have been Mirandized before being interrogated.

United States v. Mittel-Carey, 493 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2007)

Agents were executing a search warrant at the defendant’s house. The agents went into his bedroom, where he was asleep, ordered him to get up and get dressed. He was escorted downstairs. He was questioned for a period of time. He was allowed to go to the bathroom and to speak with his girlfriend when she left to go to work. The agents left without arresting him. The First Circuit held that the defendant was “in custody” for Miranda purposes and the statements he made were properly excluded by the trial court.

United States v. Martinez, 462 F.3d 903 (8th Cir. 2006)

The police spotted the defendant, who generally matched the description of a man who recently robbed a bank. The police approached him and told him about the robbery. He responded that he had a lot of money in his pocket. He was frisked and when the police found the money, they handcuffed him. He then was further questioned and made incriminating statements. The Eighth Circuit held that when the defendant was handcuffed, he was in custody for Miranda purposes and his subsequent statements were inadmissible. The court rejected the notion that a Terry stop (as opposed to an arrest) does not trigger the necessity for Miranda warnings. A detention that does not rise to the level of an arrest may still be sufficiently “custodial” to necessitate warnings before interrogation. See generally Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984); Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99 (1995).

United States v. Ollie, 442 F.3d 1135 (8th Cir. 2006)

The defendant’s parole officer instructed him to go to the police station and talk with the chief about a pending investigation. The defendant did so, but was not Mirandized by the police when he arrived at the station. The Eighth Circuit holds that the defendant was in custody during this questioning and his statement should have been suppressed. Though Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984), had held that an interview with a probation officer need not be preceded by Miranda warnings, in this case, the defendant was “ordered” by the parole officer to speak with the police chief, thus creating a reasonable expectation that failure to speak would result in consequences.

United States v. Jacobs, 431 F.3d 99 (3rd Cir. 2005)

The defendant, a confidential informant for the police, was in-custody when she was asked to come to the police station and then confronted with evidence of her criminal activity. Among the factors considered by the Third Circuit was the confrontational and intimidating nature of the questioning, the location of the questioning, and the officer’s belief, which he conveyed to the defendant, that she was guilty. In addition, the defendant believed that she was still an active informant for the FBI and was required to continue cooperating with the agency.

Reinert v. Larkins, 379 F.3d 76 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The defendant was in custody when he made a statement to the police while in an ambulance. Harmless error.

A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787 (7th Cir. 2004)

The state court determined that the defendant was not “in custody” when he was being interrogated. The state trial court’s failure to take into account the fact that the defendant was an 11-year old at the time he was being interrogated amounted to an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law. (This decision was reached while Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 124 S.Ct. 2140 (2004) was pending in the Supreme Court; the Seventh Circuit cited the lower court’s decision in Yarborough that held that age is a relevant factor in deciding the question of custodial status).

In deciding whether a person is “in custody” for Miranda purposes, one factor is whether the defendant is “free to leave” at the time the questioning occurs. But this factor is not outcome determinative, because a motorist stopped for a motor vehicle offense is not “free to leave” but is not entitled to Miranda warnings prior to being questioned. Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984). Rather, the “free to leave” factor is just one of the factors; other factors include whether the questioning occurs in a coercive atmosphere, whether the defendant was handcuffed, the length of time involved in the detention, the public versus private setting, the number of officers involved in the stop, and presence of firearms being brandished by the police. The ultimate question is whether the defendant was subject to “formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement of the degree associated with a formal arrest.” California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121, 1125 (1983). In this case, the defendant was “in custody.” The fact that he was expressly told that he was not under arrest did not establish that he was not, in fact, in custody for Miranda purposes. The court went on to hold, however, that the “public safety” exception exempted the police from issuing a Miranda warning.

Parsad v. Greiner, 337 F.3d 175 (2d Cir. 2003)

The state court’s determination that the defendant was not in custody for Miranda purposes was an unreasonable determination of the facts, but the error in admitting the defendant’s statement was harmless. Police officers told the defendant that they were going to take him to the police station to talk to him (he was homeless). Once at the station, the defendant removed his pants, which further inhibited his ability to leave.

The stop of the defendant’s vehicle was justified, because the defendant was driving on two flat tires. The court determined that this was a Terry stop and not a full-scale arrest. Nevertheless, for Miranda purposes, the defendant was “in custody” and therefore should have been read his rights when the police started questioning him about the ownership of guns that were found in the car. See also United States v. Perdue, 8 F.3d 1455 (10th Cir. 1993).
United States v. Chamberlain, 163 F.3d 499 (8th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was a state prisoner who worked in a prison office that had computers. The police suspected he was involved in obtaining child pornography. He was interviewed in the office of the prison. The Eighth Circuit concluded that he was “in custody” for Miranda purposes during this interview. Though all interrogations of suspects who are already incarcerated is not necessarily “custodial,” in this case, the defendant was escorted to the room where he was interviewed; the room was in a secure area; he was never told that the questioning was voluntary, or that he could leave.

Tankleff v. Senkowski, 135 F.3d 235 (2d Cir. 1998)

The defendant was in custody, and should have been Mirandized, when the police questioned him for several hours, and told him (untruthfully) that the victim had come out of a coma and accused the defendant of the assault. At that point in the questioning, when he was accused of the crime, he would not have felt free to leave. Nevertheless, the defendant’s subsequent Mirandized statement was admissible.

United States v. Byram, 145 F.3d 405 (1st Cir. 1998)

The defendant was in custody on a parole violation warrant. While in the courthouse lock-up awaiting a hearing on this charge, the police questioned him about a murder case involving a friend (and, ultimately, the defendant). The defendant was taken to another room in the courthouse by the police before he was questioned. The defendant was “in custody” and should have been Mirandized.

United States v. Madoch, 149 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 1998)

Law enforcement agents entered the defendant’s house and arrested her husband. She was escorted into the kitchen and questioned for several hours. During the course of the questioning, she was permitted to go to the bathroom to pump her breast milk, but only with a female agent watching. The totality of the circumstances demonstrated that she was not free to leave and she should have been advised of her Miranda rights.

United States v. Doe, 878 F.2d 1546 (1st Cir. 1989)

The Coast Guard seized a vessel on the high seas and questioned the defendants about their citizenship. In light of the circumstances, Miranda warnings should have been issued.

United States v. Ali, 68 F.3d 1468 (2d Cir. 1995)

Miranda warnings are required whenever a person is in custody. This includes a detention short of an arrest. Thus, if a suspect is interrogated in the context of a Terry stop, Miranda warnings are still necessary. In this case, the defendant was asked to step away from the boarding area, his travel documents were removed and he was surrounded by seven officers with visible handguns. This amounted to being in custody – the defendant would not have felt free to leave – and statements he made without being Mirandized should have been suppressed. The Second Circuit reached this decision on the basis of the trial record after deciding that a remand was not necessary because the question is a legal question. See 86 F.3d 275 (2d Cir. 1996).
United States v. Johnson, 846 F.2d 279 (5th Cir. 1988)

Although postal inspectors advised the suspect that he was not under arrest, their inquiries took the form of demands and their hostile reactions to the suspect’s explanations altered the nature of the contact into an arrest.

United States v. Griffin, 922 F.2d 1343 (8th Cir. 1990)

An “interview” of a bank robbery suspect in his home amounted to an arrest and should have been preceded by Miranda warnings. The defendant was never told that he was under arrest and was not physically restrained; nevertheless, he was not told that he could leave and when he walked around the house to get cigarettes, an agent would accompany him. Among the factors to be considered in determining whether the defendant was in custody are: (1) whether he was told that he was free to leave; (2) whether he had unrestrained freedom during the course of the interview; (3) whether the suspect contacted the agents, or the agents approached the suspect at the beginning of the interview; (4) whether strong-arm or deceptive practices were utilized by the agents; (5) whether the atmosphere of the interview was “police dominated”; (6) whether the suspect was formally arrested at the conclusion of the interview.

United States v. Carter, 884 F.2d 368 (8th Cir. 1989)

A bank employee was brought to the bank president’s office and questioned by postal inspectors. No Miranda warnings were given. The mere fact that the questioning occurred at the accused’s place of employment does not detract from the fact that the questioning was clearly custodial in nature. The improper interrogation spoils not only the confession given in the room but a subsequent written confession as well.

United States v. Longbehn, 850 F.2d 450 (8th Cir. 1988)

A police officer was suspected of criminal conduct. Although he was not placed under formal arrest, his forced removal from the work place to his home represented a de facto arrest. Under the totality of the circumstances, the suspect’s freedom of action was curtailed to a degree associated with formal arrest. The failure to give Miranda warnings tainted the subsequent statements.

United States v. Ricardo, D., 912 F.2d 337 (9th Cir. 1990)

The Ninth Circuit concludes that the detention of the juvenile during field questioning amounted to a de facto arrest. The juvenile was patted down, gripped by the arm, told he was not to run, and directed to the back of one of two patrol cars present at the scene. This conduct transformed the investigatory stop into an arrest.

United States v. Perdue, 8 F.3d 1455 (10th Cir. 1993)

Defendant was properly stopped based on an articulable suspicion, pursuant to Terry v. Ohio, when he approached property in a rural location that was being searched. He was ordered out of the car at gunpoint, handcuffed and ordered to lie down on the ground, as was his pregnant fiancée. He was asked what he was doing there and responded that he was there to check out his marijuana. Though this was a Terry stop, and not a full-scale arrest, Miranda warnings were required. Miranda warnings are not necessary for every Terry stop (Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984)), but where, as here, the Terry stop involves a degree of force and a show of authority which represents a significant curtailment of the defendant’s freedom, the warnings are required. See also United States v. Smith, 3 F.3d 1088 (7th Cir. 1993). A subsequent interrogation, which followed this initial questioning and which was preceded by Miranda warnings was tainted by the improper use of force and was thus involuntary, despite Miranda warnings. Helicopters were flying overhead; the defendant was told that his pregnant fiancée could go free if he confessed; the questioning occurred in an isolated rural area; fifteen to twenty law enforcement officers surrounded the defendant.

_United States v. Griffin_, 7 F.3d 1512 (10th Cir. 1993)

The defendant and her friend were approached by agents at the airport. Currency was seized from them and they were brought to the police office where they stood in a conference room while the money was counted. The defendant was then asked to come into a small room with a police officer who began to question her. The only way out of the room was past the officer; she was never advised of her right to refuse to answer questions, or to leave; she was separated from her friend; questioning continued even after the defendant made incriminating statements. Given these facts, the defendant was “in custody” and should have been given full _Miranda_ warnings.

_United States v. Adams_, 1 F.3d 1566 (11th Cir. 1993)

The government agents tracked a plane leaving U.S. airspace heading south. When the plane returned to U.S. airspace several hours later, the agents followed the plane to the landing site, ordered the pilot to lie down on the tarmac, emptied the pilot’s suitcase, ordered him to remain where he was, and held him at gun point. The pilot was “in custody” and his un-Mirandized statements should not have been admitted. Harmless error.

_Jacobs v. Singletary_, 952 F.2d 1282 (11th Cir. 1992)

After running a roadblock and having had her car shot at by police, the defendant crashed her car. When she emerged from the car, she was confronted by several officers with guns drawn. One officer asked her if she liked shooting at troopers. Her response (“We had to.”) was inadmissible. The defendant was in custody at the time she exited the car and because the police did not Mirandize her, this was improper interrogation. The state’s claim that the question was merely rhetorical and thus, not “interrogation,” was not persuasive. “Assuming _arguendo_ the question was rhetorical, if the accused is in custody, the police do not read the accused her rights and a question is asked and answered, then the statement must be suppressed.”
CONFESSION
(Impeaching Defendant With Miranda- or Massiah-Tainted Statement)

SEE ALSO: Post-Arrest Silence

   The Supreme Court concluded that a Massiah-tainted statement was admissible to impeach the defendant if he testified inconsistently with his out-of-court statement at trial. The Court has already ruled that statements obtained in violation of Miranda may be used to impeach

United States v. Lopez, 818 F.3d 125 (3rd Cir. 2016)
   The defendant was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. At trial he protested that he was framed by the police. After having been Mirandized, he made no statements. Yet, the prosecutor cross-examined the defendant about his failure to raise this “framed” defense prior to trial and also argued to the jury that this was a reason to question the defendant’s credibility. This violated Doyle and was reversible error.

United States v. Ramirez-Estrada, 749 F.3d 1129 (9th Cir. 2014)
   The use of the defendant’s post-Miranda silence to impeach his testimony at trial was improper. At trial, the defendant testified that he was seeking medical assistance when he came to the border, he was not trying to sneak into the country. After invoking his Miranda rights at the time of arrest, he was asked if he had any medical problems and he answered, “no.” The government should not have been permitted to use his post-Miranda silence to impeach him.

United States v. Caruto, 532 F.3d 822 (9th Cir. 2008)
   Generally, a defendant who invokes his Miranda rights may not be impeached by evidence that he invoked his rights or that he remained silent. Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976); Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284 (1986). In this case, the defendant started making a statement – waiving her right to remain silent – but then stopped and invoked her right to remain silent. At trial, when she was cross-examined, she expanded on her statement. The prosecutor then cross-examined her, pointing out that various facts included in her testimony at trial were not included in her statement to the police. The “omission” was the result of her invocation of the right to remain silent. In other words, the only way the defendant could explain that certain portions of her trial testimony were omitted from her statement to the police, was to explain that she invoked her right to remain silent. The Ninth Circuit held that in this limited circumstance, the prosecutor should not be permitted to cross-examine the defendant about the omitted portion of the statement.
CONFESSION
(Miranda -- Interrogation Requirement)

When a defendant has been indicted, the Sixth Amendment forbids the use of any statement that has been “deliberately elicited” from him by the police. In this case, the defendant had been indicted and the police went to his house and told him that they were there to discuss his involvement in a drug distribution conspiracy. The defendant responded in an incriminating way. The Supreme Court held that the statement was inadmissible because the statement was deliberately elicited by the police. The Court held that “deliberately elicited” is different than the “interrogation” standard of Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980).

Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582 (1990)

After his arrest for driving under the influence, the defendant was brought to a police station where he was asked a number of questions, including his name, address, height, weight, eye color, and the date of his sixth birthday. He was unable to answer this last question. He also made several incriminating statements during the course of performing a physical sobriety test. At that point, he was advised of his Miranda rights. The Supreme Court holds that only the defendant’s response to the question concerning his sixth birthday constituted a testimonial response to custodial interrogation. His other comments during the course of the physical sobriety test were not the product of interrogation and could be admitted despite the failure of the police to issue prompt Miranda warnings. Thus, evidence about the defendant’s slurred speech and lack of muscular coordination revealed by his responses to the demographic questions was admissible. The question relating to his sixth birthday, however, elicited a testimonial response, because it was the content of his answer, not the method of speaking, which the state sought to introduce.

The defendant invoked his right to remain silent after his arrest. Subsequently, the defendant’s wife went to the police station and talked to the defendant in a private room. In the room, however, was a police officer for purposes of safety and a tape recorder which was clearly visible to anyone. The Supreme Court holds that this does not constitute interrogation and the statements made by the defendant were permitted to be introduced at trial to rebut his insanity defense.

Rivera v. Thompson, 879 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2018)

The police responded to a report of a stabbing. When an officer arrived at the scene, a man was seen jogging away. The officer ordered the man to lie down, pulled his weapon and asked him what he was doing. The defendant’s responses should have been suppressed. The defendant was in custody and was being interrogated. Trial counsel’s failure to move to suppress the statements was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Williams, 842 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2016)

Booking questions that elicit an arrestee’s response about gang affiliation are subject to Miranda. Though most booking questions to do not elicit an incriminating response – and thus the “booking exception” to Miranda – if the arrestee is asked about gang affiliation, the arrestee’s response is not admissible at trial unless the arrestee was warned and waived his Miranda rights.

Jackson v. Conway, 763 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2014)

The defendant was in custody in a county jail on charges that he raped his wife, ex-wife and a daughter. A social worker interviewed the defendant for a possible “family court action.” The Second Circuit held that this amounted to custodial interrogation and should have been preceded by a Miranda warning. A social worker is a mandatory reporter and thus is involved in law enforcement. Moreover, as the United States Supreme Court held in Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968), if a civil IRS agent questions a defendant while in custody, Miranda warnings are required. See also Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981) (court-appointed psychiatrist interviewing defendant should have given Miranda warning). Admitting the statements that the defendant gave to the social worker was reversible error that required granting a writ.

United States v. Benard, 680 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was stopped on the road on suspicion that he was involved in a drug transaction. Eventually, he was arrested. He was asked, “Will I find anything in the car when I search it?” The defendant responded that there was a gun in the car. The question qualified as “interrogation” and was not subject to the public safety exception. Because this appeal followed a conditional guilty plea, the proper remedy was to remand the case and allow the defendant to withdraw his plea, if he chooses to do so.

United States v. Swanson, 635 F.3d 995 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was arrested on a warrant charging him with possession of a weapon in violation of state law. The judge who issued the warrant wrote on the warrant that there would be no bond, unless the defendant turned in his gun. When he was arrested, the defendant was told about the bond condition by the arresting officer before he was Mirandized. This statement by the police amounted to interrogation. The defendant responded by telling the police where his guns were in the house. The statement should have been suppressed. Later the defendant was taken to the police station where he received Miranda warnings and he gave a statement. This latter statement was inadmissible pursuant to Seibert. The court also held that the defendant’s supposed consent to search his vehicle to find an additional shotgun was involuntary, because the officers serving the arrest warrant stated that he was “ordered” to turn over all guns, thus implying that he had no choice in the matter.

Smiley v. Thurmer, 542 F.3d 574 (7th Cir. 2008)

The police asked the defendant numerous questions about his knowledge of the cause of the victim’s death, who lived in the same house as the defendant. The defendant was in custody on other charges at the time. No Miranda warnings were given and the state explained that this was permissible, because the defendant was not being interrogated; he was just being asked questions. The Seventh Circuit rejected this argument and held that pursuant to Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980), any “questioning” constitutes interrogation, for Miranda purposes if the police anticipate that the person being questioned will provide answers to the questions. Admitting the un-Mirandized statements was error that required granting the writ.

United States v. Jackson, 544 F.3d 351 (1st Cir. 2008)
The police were at the defendant’s apartment searching for a gun. The government conceded that he was in custody. The police urged the defendant to cooperate and offered leniency. The defendant did not respond. The police then obtained consent to search the apartment from another occupant and announced this, within earshot of the defendant. He then revealed the location of the gun. The First Circuit held that this encounter amounted to “interrogation” for Miranda purposes and because no warnings were given, the defendant’s statement should have been suppressed.

United States v. Pacheco-Lopez, 531 F.3d 420 (6th Cir. 2008)
Certain “booking” questions do not amount to interrogation for Miranda purposes. The questions that were posed to the defendant in this case, however, did not qualify as “booking” questions. Questions such as, “When he arrived at his house?” were not booking-type questions.

United States v. Brownlee, 454 F.3d 131 (3rd Cir. 2006)
The defendant carjacked a jeep and then had a wreck. He was in the back of a patrol car after the wreck and the officer, who knew the defendant from the neighborhood, engaged him in conversation. The conversation was not preceded by a Miranda warning and the defendant answered questions about how he got there, how he got out of the jeep and where he got the gun. This “conversation” qualified as “interrogation” for Miranda purposes. The Third Circuit noted that the perception of the defendant and the intent of the officer are relevant in deciding whether the “conversation” amounts to interrogation.

United States v. Chen, 439 F.3d 1037 (9th Cir. 2006)
INS questioning of the defendant amounted to “interrogation”. Chen was in INS custody in administrative detention; an agent went to talk to him about the target of an alien-smuggling investigation. The statements that he gave during this interview were later used as the basis for proving that earlier statements he made to the INS were false.

United States v. Padilla, 387 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2004)
During the process of arresting the defendant, the officer said something to the effect that this was the defendant’s last chance to cooperate in the investigation of another target. This statement was not preceded by Miranda warnings. The statement qualified as “interrogation” and the defendant’s response should have been suppressed – though the failure to suppress the evidence was harmless error.

United States v. Westbrook, 125 F.3d 996 (7th Cir. 1997)
Questions posed by the police to the defendant after he was in custody amounted to "interrogation" and should have been preceded by Miranda warnings. One officer asked the defendant where the other people he had been with were. This question was not a simple information-gathering query, such as when an officer is merely asking for someone's identity. The question was posed to ascertain who the co-conspirators were. Harmless error.
United States v. Montana, 958 F.2d 516 (2d Cir. 1992)
After effectively invoking his right to remain silent, the defendant was transported in the DEA agent’s car. The agent said to the defendant that he could help himself if he cooperated. This amounted to interrogation and the defendant’s response was not admissible.

Nelson v. Fulcomer, 911 F.2d 928 (3rd Cir. 1990)
Two defendants were arrested for murder. One confessed; the other was confronted with his confederate and asked, “How much did you tell them?” That statement was admitted at trial. The Third Circuit concludes that this does constitute interrogation, if the defendant was, in fact, aware that his confederate had confessed when he was confronted with him. The decision contains a lengthy discussion of the current status of Rhode Island v. Innis, and its application to cases in which a defendant, who has asserted his right to remain silent, is confronted with circumstances that the police should know will elicit an incriminating statement, such as the confession of a co-defendant.

United States v. Elias, 832 F.2d 24 (3rd Cir. 1987)
The defendant was detained in his parked vehicle and asked about irregularities in his driver’s license. During the suppression hearing, there were inconsistencies in the State’s evidence regarding the level of coercive pressure to which the defendant was subjected. The lower court held that the defendant made an “uninvited spontaneous utterance” that was not the product of interrogation. The record, however, clearly revealed that the defendant was answering the officers’ questions when he acknowledged the presence of cocaine in his briefcase. The statement should have been suppressed, because the defendant was never Mirandized.

United States v. Soto, 953 F.2d 263 (6th Cir. 1992)
After the defendant invoked his right to the assistance of counsel, the police began to inventory his property. Upon finding a picture of the defendant’s wife and child, the officer asked, “What were you doing with crap like that when you have these two waiting for you at home?” The defendant responded, “That’s not my coke.” This statement was not admissible and required a new trial. The officer’s question amounted to interrogation.

United States v. D.F., 63 F.3d 671 (7th Cir. 1995)
The defendant, a juvenile, was involuntarily committed to a mental health facility due to drug problems. Patients were encouraged to talk to therapists and were rewarded for doing so. A therapist, aware that the juvenile was a suspect in a murder case, questioned the juvenile about her past behavior, without clearly informing her that the questioning was designed, in part, for investigative purposes. This rendered the confession involuntary. Though the therapist was not a law enforcement agent, she questioned the defendant with an eye toward a future prosecution. This decision was re-affirmed after remand from the Supreme Court at United States v. D.F., 115 F.3d 413 (7th Cir. 1997). In this latter decision, the court addresses at some length the role of an appellate court in determining the voluntariness of a confession.

Killebrew v. Endicott, 992 F.2d 660 (7th Cir. 1993)
Though it was harmless error, the state trial court erred in allowing the state to introduce a non-Mirandized statement. The officer “told” the defendant (who was in custody) that he wanted to know whether the defendant acted alone; and advised the defendant that any cooperation would be made known to the D.A. The defendant said he acted alone. The state argued that the officer did not “ask” the defendant anything; he merely “told” him what he was interested in. This was interrogation, nevertheless.

_Pope v. Zenon_, 69 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 1995)

Prior to the time that the defendant was given his _Miranda_ warnings, he was told about the incriminating evidence which the police already had against him. He promptly made an incriminating statement. The tactic of revealing incriminating evidence against the defendant amounted to interrogation. The statement made by the defendant at that time was not admissible. The officers then read the defendant his _Miranda_ warning and he made additional incriminating statements. These statements, too, had to be suppressed. The initial statements represented the “beachhead” in interrogation parlance and, once that is achieved – that is, once the defendant makes the first admission – subsequent admissions are easier to obtain. _See Missouri v. Seibert_, 542 U.S. 600 (2004). The police are not allowed to use the tactic of using pre-advice interrogation to open up a suspect. Admitting the confession, however, was harmless error.

_United States v. Henley_, 984 F.2d 1040 (9th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was stopped by police investigating a bank robbery. The police had reason to believe that the car in which the defendant was stopped was the car used in the robbery. The police asked the defendant whose car it was. The defendant responded that it was his car. This amounted to interrogation and did not qualify as “routine booking questions” in light of the officer’s knowledge about the car and his intent in asking the question – and his knowledge that the inquiry could lead to an incriminating response. _Miranda_ warnings should have preceded this inquiry.

_United States v. Disla_, 805 F.2d 1340 (9th Cir. 1986)

During questioning, the police asked the defendant what his address was. The officer knew at that point that a large quantity of cocaine had been found at an apartment and he was interrogating the defendant to find out if that was his apartment. The defendant’s response should have been preceded by a _Miranda_ warning and the responses were therefore suppressed.

_United States v. Ramsey_, 992 F.2d 301 (11th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was arrested at the airport. He was brought to the DEA office and read his _Miranda_ warnings by one of the arresting agents. He responded by turning his head away. This was, at least, an equivocal invocation of his right to remain silent and further questioning had to be preceded by an attempt to ascertain whether the defendant did, in fact, desire to remain silent. Nevertheless, within twenty minutes of this occurrence, other agents told the defendant about the length of the sentence he was facing and the value cooperation would be at this time. This amounted to interrogation and in light of the equivocal request to remain silent, was improper. Admitting the subsequent statement into evidence was reversible error. This case probably did not survive the decision in _Davis v. United States_, 512 U.S. 452 (1994). _See Coleman v. Singletary_, 30 F.3d 1420 (11th Cir. 1994).

_Jacobs v. Singletary_, 952 F.2d 1282 (11th Cir. 1992)

After running a roadblock and having had her car shot at by police, the defendant crashed her car. When she emerged from the car, she was confronted by several officers with guns drawn. One officer asked her if she liked shooting at troopers. Her response (“We had to.”) was inadmissible. The defendant was in custody at the time she exited the car and because the police did not Mirandize her, this was improper interrogation. The state’s claim that the question was merely rhetorical and thus, not “interrogation,” was not persuasive. “Assuming arguendo the question was rhetorical, if the accused is in custody, the police do not read the accused her rights and a question is asked and answered, then the statement must be suppressed.”

United States v. Gomez, 927 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir. 1991)

After his arrest, the defendant was advised of his Miranda rights and responded that he wanted to speak with an attorney. Following this request, an agent told the defendant that he should immediately discuss with his attorney the benefits of cooperating and that if he cooperated he could get a sentence of less than life in prison. A few minutes later, the defendant – having not seen an attorney – gave a full statement. The agent’s comments amounted to improper continued “interrogation” and the resulting confession should have been suppressed. “Interrogation” means “any words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect.”
CONFESSION
(Public Safety Exception)

United States v. Simmons, 661 F.3d 151 (2d Cir. 2011)

The police went to the defendant’s apartment, accompanied by his former roommate who told the police that the defendant had a gun. When the police entered the apartment, they asked the defendant about the presence of a gun, which the defendant acknowledged and then said that the gun was in his bedroom. This statement was within the public safety exception. However, the police then went into the bedroom. This was impermissible. There were no exigent circumstances that justified the warrantless search of the bedroom. There were no other occupants in the house and no other reason that the police could not have obtained a warrant to search the bedroom.

United States v. Brathwaite, 458 F.3d 376 (5th Cir. 2006)

The public safety exception to Miranda – New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984) -- did not apply in this case. The defendant was in handcuffs and the police had completed two sweep searches of the house and, therefore, there was no urgency to the interrogation regarding the location of guns in the house. See also United States v. Raborn, 872 F.2d 589 (5th Cir. 1989).
CONFESSION
(Psychiatric Examination)

Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. 596 (2013)
The defendant provided notice that he would rely on a mental capacity defense. The court ordered that he submit to a psychiatric examination. At trial, the defendant introduced the testimony of an expert that the defendant was suffering from the effects of long term voluntary intoxication. This opened the door to the state’s introduction of the expert testimony of the state’s expert on rebuttal.

Neither the defendant nor his counsel was advised that psychiatric examinations which were to be performed were for the purpose of determining the issue of future dangerousness.
There was no basis in the record to conclude that the defendant waived his Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

Following the defendant’s arraignment, the state arranged for a psychiatrist to question the defendant. A notice was filed by the District Attorney and by the court but such notices were not served on the defendant’s attorney and he was not aware of these documents having been filed. The Court holds that this violates the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel. See Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981). The Court also held that a harmless error analysis can be applied, but that the error was not harmless in this case.

Petrocelli v. Baker, 869 F.3d 710 (9th Cir. 2017)
The state trial occurred one year after Estelle v. Smith was decided and the psychiatric interview suffered from the same Fifth and Sixth Amendment violation, including interviewing the defendant in jail without notice to his attorney and without a Miranda warning.

Gibbs v. Frank, 387 F.3d 268 (3rd Cir. 2004)
Prior to the defendant’s first state trial, he advised that he was raising a mental health defense. He waived his Miranda rights and submitted to a court-ordered psychiatric examination. At his second trial (his first trial resulted in a conviction that was reversed), he did not raise a psychiatric defense. The state was not permitted to use statements he made during the psychiatric examination. Permitting the state to do so was grounds for granting a writ of habeas corpus. The court reviewed the relevant Supreme Court precedent: Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. compelled psychiatric interview implicates Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights. The warnings must advise the defendant of the consequences of foregoing the right to remain silent. When the defendant initiates the interview, the Fifth Amendment privilege is waived to the extent that the state may use the results to rebut a psychiatric defense. In this case, the state did not establish that the waiver involved a clear explanation of the consequences of the interview (i.e., that it could be used in any subsequent trial, including one in which the defendant did not raise a psychiatric defense).
Woods v. Johnson, 75 F.3d 1017 (5th Cir. 1996)
It was error, but harmless, to permit a psychiatrist to testify as to future dangerousness, where the psychiatrist’s examination of the defendant was conducted without notice to counsel, and without Miranda safeguards.

Brown v. Butler, 876 F.2d 427 (5th Cir. 1989)
The defendant was compelled to be interviewed by a forensic psychiatrist. Though the error was harmless, it was improper during the State’s rebuttal to use the defendant’s non-Mirandized statements to the psychiatrist.

United States v. Wagner, 834 F.2d 1474 (9th Cir. 1987)
The trial court gave a consciousness of guilt instruction based on the defendant’s refusal to submit to a psychiatric examination. Though error, the court holds that it was not plain error and the defendant’s failure to object constitutes a waiver of the error.

Delguidice v. Singletary, 84 F.3d 1359 (11th Cir. 1996)
The defendant had two pending charges and two attorneys. When the defendant was ordered to submit to an examination with regard to one of the cases, neither lawyer was informed that the psychiatrist would examine the defendant with regard to both cases. Admitting the psychiatrist’s testimony in the second case was reversible error.
CONFESSION
(Right To Counsel)

For 22 years, since the decision in Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U.S. 625 (1986), the law has been that once a defendant has been indicted and an attorney has been requested at arraignment, the police may not initiate questioning of the defendant. That is, the indictment and request for counsel at arraignment was, in the Sixth Amendment context, the same as a defendant invoking his right to the assistance of counsel after being advised of his Miranda rights in the Fifth Amendment context. Police-initiated questioning is not permitted after a defendant invokes his right to counsel in either context, even if the defendant waives his right to counsel after the police improperly initiate the questioning. In this decision, however, the United States Supreme Court overruled Michigan v. Jackson. Noting that requesting an attorney at arraignment is not the same as requesting an attorney during interrogation, the Court concluded that the police should be permitted to initiate questioning even after a defendant has requested the assistance of counsel in court. The defendant, of course, is free to refuse to be interviewed and once he refuses a request to be interviewed, further police-initiated questioning is generally barred (especially, of course, if the defendant is in custody).

In Edwards v. Arizona, the Court held that once the defendant invokes the right to counsel during custodial interrogation, the police must cease interrogation and can never re-initiate interrogation. The question in this case is whether the “never can re-initiate questioning” rule applies even if the defendant is released from custody? The Court holds that once the defendant is released from custody (and that includes being returned to general population in prison, which is not “in custody” for Miranda purposes), the police may re-initiate questioning after fourteen days. In other words, if the defendant invokes his right to counsel and is later released from custody, the police must wait at least fourteen days prior to contacting the defendant and interrogating him.

When a defendant has been indicted, the Sixth Amendment forbids the use of any statement that has been “deliberately elicited” from him by the police. In this case, the defendant had been indicted and the police went to his house and told him that they were there to discuss his involvement in a drug distribution conspiracy. The defendant responded in an incriminating way. The Supreme Court held that the statement was inadmissible because the statement was deliberately elicited by the police. The Court held that “deliberately elicited” is different than the “interrogation” standard of Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980).

Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994)
After initially waiving his right to counsel and interrogation commenced, the defendant stated, “Maybe I should talk to a lawyer.” The Military appellate court held that clarifying questions by the interrogators were appropriate, and that it was not necessary to cease all questioning. The Supreme Court holds that absent a clear invocation of the right to counsel, there is no reason to cease questioning. While asking clarifying questions after an ambiguous request may be prudent, it is not necessary. Thus, if a suspect says, “Maybe I should talk to a lawyer,” the police may continue questioning without clarifying the suspect’s intent.

The defendant was charged with one offense, robbery, and at his first appearance, requested the assistance of counsel. An attorney was appointed. This did not prohibit the police from questioning the defendant about uncharged crimes. Under Edwards v. Arizona, of course, once an accused seeks the assistance of counsel in connection with interrogation – a Fifth Amendment right – the suspect may not be interrogated about any offense without complying with his request for counsel. However, where the defendant asserts his right to counsel in connection with a legal proceeding – that is, his Sixth Amendment right to counsel – this is an “offense-specific” request which does not prevent interrogation on unrelated charges.

There is no exception to the “offense-specific” rule for closely related, or factually related crimes. Thus, if a defendant has counsel in connection with one charged offense, the police may question the defendant, or initiate questioning about another offense, even if the other offense is factually related to the charged offense for which the defendant has counsel.

Surprisingly, the bright line of Edwards v. Arizona was neither bent nor curved in this Supreme Court decision which holds that once an accused requests the assistance of counsel, he cannot be further questioned by the police even if an interview with his attorney has occurred. That is, even if the defendant’s right to counsel is honored and he begins communications with an attorney, the police are thereafter still precluded from attempting to initiate communications with the defendant.

The defendant was in jail on charges unrelated to a murder which the police were investigating. The police put an undercover agent in the jail cell block who elicited a confession from the defendant about the murder. The confession was admissible. His right to remain silent and his right to counsel were not violated. Because the essential ingredients of a “police dominated atmosphere” were missing, there was no need for the undercover agent to advise the defendant of his Miranda rights. The atmosphere in the prison was not coercive, at least not with respect to the undercover agent’s conversation with the defendant. The Sixth Amendment was not implicated, because no murder charges had been filed against the defendant at the time of the “interrogation.” Thus, the decisions in Massiah and United States v. Henry and Maine v. Moulton are all distinguishable. In those cases, the undercover agent questioned the defendant about the charges which had already been filed against the defendant, and for which his Sixth Amendment rights had attached.

In Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U.S. 625 (1986), the Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment bars the police from initiating any interrogation of a defendant who has been formally charged and who has requested the right to counsel. In this case the Supreme Court holds that a violation of this rule does not bar the use of the subsequently obtained statements to impeach the defendant. That is, though the statements may not be used in the State’s case-in-chief, the statements may be used to impeach the defendant if he testifies contrary to his statements.

Advising a suspect that an attorney would be appointed “if and when you go to court” complies with Miranda. That advice correctly reflects the State’s procedure for appointment of counsel which occurs after the defendant’s first court appearance.

Following the defendant’s indictment on murder charges, he gave two confessions after being advised of his Miranda warnings and waiving those rights. At trial, the defendant claimed that, because his right to counsel had been triggered by the indictment, the Miranda warnings were not sufficient to protect his Sixth Amendment rights. The Supreme Court disagrees. A waiver of the right to remain silent and the right to counsel may be knowingly made by a defendant even after indictment.

The defendant was arrested on charges of burglary. He immediately invoked his right to counsel, thereby shutting off any further interrogation. Three days later, another police officer, unaware of the invocation of the right to counsel, asked the defendant if he would discuss a separate burglary with him. The defendant gave an incriminating statement about that separate burglary. The Supreme Court reverses: Once the defendant has invoked his right to remain silent, he cannot be questioned about any crime. That includes the crime for which he was arrested and all other crimes which the police may want to investigate.

Hendrix v. Palmer, --- F.3d --- (6th Cir. 2018)

After he was arrested, the defendant invoked his right to counsel. Interrogation stopped, but two days later, the police went back to him and questioned him some more and he made statement that were used against him at trial. The Sixth Circuit granted the writ.

Rodriguez v. McDonald, 872 F.3d 908 (9th Cir. 2017)

The state trial court clearly erred in holding that the police scrupulously honored the defendant’s request for counsel. Rather than honoring the request, the police continued the interrogation and obtained additional incriminating information from the defendant. After invoking the right to counsel, the police reminded the defendant, who was 14 years old that they would let the prosecutor know of any cooperation he provided an otherwise played on his youth and immaturity to induce him to waive his right to counsel and to answer more questions.

Grueninger v. Dir., Virginia Dept. of Corrections, 813 F.3d 517 (4th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was questioned by the police after he was arrested and he promptly said, “These are felonies, I need an attorney.” The police immediately stopped the questioning, but came back a few days later, initiated further discussions when additional warrants were served during which the defendant confessed to having had sexual contact with his minor daughter. The Fourth Circuit held that this was a violation of Edwards v. Arizona, and trial counsel’s failure to file a motion to suppress the confession was deficient performance that required setting aside the conviction.
Mays v. Clark, 807 F.3d 968 (9th Cir. 2015)

Though not satisfying the AEDPA standard for granting a writ, the facts of this case demonstrated a failure to honor a suspect’s invocation of the right to counsel. During interrogation, the defendant requested that he wanted to call his step-dad “and have my lawyer come down here.” This was not ambiguous and questioning should have stopped at that point.

United States v. Hunter, 708 F.3d 938 (7th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was shot by the police and was in the hospital, handcuffed to a gurney. The officer who was sitting with him started talking to him and then read him his Miranda warnings. The defendant responded, “Can you call my lawyer?” The Seventh Circuit concludes that this request amounted to an unambiguous request for counsel and any further interrogation should have immediately ceased.

United States v. Santistevan, 701 F.3d 1289 (10th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was in custody, having been arrested for armed robbery. When initially Miranized, he invoked his right to counsel. Later he called the FBI agent and told him he wanted to discuss the matter. However, before the agent arrived at the jail, he was contacted by the defendant’s lawyer who said that the defendant did not want to talk at this time and that the defendant had a letter expressly invoking the right to counsel at any interrogation. When the agent arrived at the jail, the defendant handed the letter to the agent. The agent then asked the defendant if he wanted to talk to him; the defendant said that he did and then made incriminating statements. The Tenth Circuit held that his was improper interrogation that violated Edwards v. Arizona. Once the letter invoking the right to counsel was handed to the agent, any further interrogation, or attempt to initiate questioning was improper. There was no ambiguity in the letter.

Moore v. Berghuis, 700 F.3d 882 (6th Cir. 2012)

After his arrest, the defendant was placed in an interrogation room. When the police started to interrogate him, he gave the officer an attorney’s business card and asked the officer to call the attorney, commenting, “Maybe I should talk to an attorney.” The officer did so, but just connected to an answering machine. The officer returned to the interrogation room and asked the defendant if he wanted to continue and make a statement, which the defendant agreed to do. The Sixth Circuit held that providing the attorney’s business card was a sufficient invocation of the right to counsel and the officer re-initiation of interrogation was improper. Though Thompkins v. Berghuis held that the invocation of the right to remain silent must be unequivocal, that did not alter the rule that once counsel had been invoked, as in this case, a subsequent waiver may not be initiated by the police. See Edwards v. Arizona. The ensuing confession should have been suppressed and the writ of habeas corpus was granted.

United States v. Wysinger, 683 F.3d 784 (7th Cir. 2012)

The defendant’s invocation of the right to counsel was not ambiguous and the failure to cease interrogation necessitated suppressing the statements made after he sought the assistance of counsel.

United States v. Scott, 693 F.3d 715 (6th Cir. 2012)
The defendant was presented with a Miranda waiver of rights form. The second to last question was, “Do you understand the rights I’ve explained to you?” The last question was, “Having these rights in mind, do you wish to talk to us now?” The defendant answered “yes” to the first question and “no” to the second question. The government contended that the “no” answer only applied to his decision to remain silent, and not necessarily to his right to counsel. If he only invoked his right to remain silent, the police could re-initiate questioning later. If he invoked his right to counsel, however, the police could never re-initiate questioning. The Sixth Circuit held that any ambiguity in the form was held against the government.

_Sessoms v. Runnels_, 691 F.3d 1054 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc)

After receiving Miranda warnings, in order to invoke the prohibition of further questioning required by _Edwards v. Arizona_, the defendant’s invocation of the right to an attorney must be unambiguous. _Davis v. United States_, 512 U.S. 452 (1994). What happens, however, if the defendant invokes his right to counsel in an ambiguous manner before he is read his Miranda rights? In this en banc decision, the Ninth Circuit holds that questioning must stop. The rationale is that an effort to obtain the assistance of counsel prior to being read Miranda warnings must be honored even if the request is not clear, because the target may not fully understand his rights at that point in time; whereas after having been informed of his rights, the defendant’s rights should be clear to him and therefore, his invocation must be unambiguous. After remand from the United States Supreme Court (for further consideration in light of _Salinas v. Texas_, 133 S. Ct. 2174 (2013)), the en banc court concluded that the invocation of the request for counsel was, in fact, unambiguous, and therefore any further questioning was improper. _Sessoms v. Grounds_, 776 F.3d 615 (9th Cir. 2015) (en banc). The defendant asked, “There wouldn’t be any possible way that I could have a – a lawyer present while we do this?” and then “Yeah, that’s what my dad asked me to ask you guys – uh, give me a lawyer.” There was nothing ambiguous about this request.

_Wood v. Ercole_, 644 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2011)

When the police said that they wanted to tape the defendant’s statement, he said, “I think I should get a lawyer.” This was an unambiguous request for counsel and any further interrogation was improper.

_Dixon v. Houk_, 627 F.3d 553 (6th Cir. 2010)

When initially questioned, the defendant stated that he would not answer questions without a lawyer. The police approached the defendant a second time, did not Mirandize him and offered to “cut him a deal” after which the defendant made an incriminating statement. He was the Mirandized and repeated the incriminating statement. The statement was inadmissible because it was obtained in violation of Miranda, it violated his right to counsel, it was not “voluntary” (because of the offer of a deal) and violated Seibert. THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED, HOLDING THAT THE TWO-STEP SEIBERT TYPE OF INTERROGATION WAS NOT EMPLOYED BY THE POLICE IN THIS CASE. _BOBBY v. DIXON_, --- S.Ct. --- 10-1540 (11/7/11).

_Ayers v. Hudson_, 623 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2010)
When the police place an informant in a cell with a defendant and the defendant confesses to the informant, this presents a Massiah or United States v. Henry issue, which involves a violation of the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel through the use of an “agent” of the state. Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964); United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980). The question in this case was what makes the informant an “agent of the state?” The Sixth Circuit held that a violation of the Sixth Amendment does not require proof that the police expressly directed the informant to question the defendant. In fact, a Sixth Amendment violation can occur even when the police specifically instruct the informant not to initiate any conversation with the defendant regarding the offense with which the defendant has been indicted. The focus of the court’s analysis must be on the likely result of the state’s conduct. The facts of this case showed that the detectives may have actually provided to the informant certain topics about which the police needed more information. The Sixth Circuit granted a writ.

Tolliver v. Sheets, 594 F.3d 900 (6th Cir. 2010)

During the course of the interrogation of the defendant, he announced that he did not want to talk anymore prior to seeing a lawyer. The police continued the interrogation despite this clear invocation of his right to counsel. Admitting the ensuing incriminating statements (some of which were introduced to show the defendant’s lack of credibility, even though the statements were not explicitly incriminating), was error. Harmless error.

United States v. Mir, 525 F.3d 351 (4th Cir. 2008)

The defendant, an attorney, was charged with certain offenses relating to immigration fraud. While the case was pending, the government learned that he was trying to induce certain witnesses to lie to the grand jury and to the prosecutors. The government wired these witnesses and sent them in to talk to the defendant. Though the defendant was indicted for the immigration fraud offense, the investigation was for a separate offense (witness tampering and obstruction of justice), therefore, communication with the defendant was not barred by the Sixth Amendment under the Texas v. Cobb, rule. The court noted that if the defendant had requested that portions of the undercover tapes be redacted, a severance might have been appropriate to delete any references to the underlying fraud offense.

United States v. Lee, 413 F.3d 622 (7th Cir. 2005)

After having the Miranda rights read to him, the defendant asked, “Can I have a lawyer?” This was an unambiguous request for counsel and any further interrogation or effort to clarify was improper.

United States v. Mills, 412 F.3d 325 (2d Cir. 2005)

In Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162 (2001), the Supreme Court held that the “offense-specific” feature of the Sixth Amendment means that if a defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights are invoked with regard to one offense, that invocation has no bearing on related, but different offenses. In this case, however, the defendant had been indicted in state court on firearm charges and was improperly questioned in violation of the Sixth Amendment. But the feds argued that they could use the statements, because the subsequent federal charges – virtually indistinguishable federal firearms charges – were not the same offense. The Second Circuit held that Texas v. Cobb notwithstanding, the improper state interrogation for the firearms charge could not be utilized by the federal government in a prosecution for the same firearm possession. The Fourth Circuit reached a contrary result (as have numerous other courts) in United States v. Alvarado, 440 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2006).

United States v. Johnson, 400 F.3d 187 (4th Cir. 2005)

After being advised of his Miranda rights, the defendant was given a written waiver form which had the following question: “Do you want to make a statement at this time without a lawyer?” The defendant responded “No.” The government argued that this amounted to an invocation of the right to remain silent (after which the police were entitled to renew questioning with further advice of rights), as opposed to an invocation of the right to counsel, which bars any further questioning at any time. The Fourth Circuit rejected the government’s argument, holding that this was not an equivocal request and that any ambiguity in the form was the fault of the government, which drafted the form. Admitting the subsequent statement of the defendant was harmless error.

Guidry v. Dretke, 397 F.3d 306 (5th Cir. 2005)

The defendant invoked his right to counsel and the police then left the room. Shortly thereafter they returned and told the defendant that his attorney told them it was ok for him to make a statement. Actually, the police never contacted the attorney. The ensuing confession should have been suppressed.

United States v. Johnson, 400 F.3d 187 (4th Cir. 2005)

A form was given to the defendant after he was arrested and he checked the “no” box next to the question, “Do you want to make a statement at this time without a lawyer?” This amounted to a request for counsel and subsequent interrogation violated the rule of Edwards v. Arizona, which bars any questioning after the invocation of the right to counsel. The checked box was not limited to the issue of right to remain silent, because of the explicit reference to the right to counsel. If the defendant had only invoked his right to remain silent (as opposed to the additional right to counsel), subsequent questioning would have been permitted).

Abela v. Martin, 380 F.3d 915 (6th Cir. 2004)

When initially questioned by the police, the defendant stated, “Maybe I should talk to a lawyer,” and then displayed his lawyer’s card and mentioned him by name. This is an unequivocal request for counsel and further questioning should not have occurred. The court distinguished the seminal case on equivocal requests, Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994), because in that case, the question, “Maybe I should talk to a lawyer” was too non-specific and did not relate to a specific lawyer. The fact that the officer left the room and then returned and read Miranda warnings to the defendant did not cure the problem, because pursuant to Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981), the police may not re-initiate interrogation of a suspect after the suspect has requested the assistance of counsel.

Randolph v. California, 380 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir. 2004)

Although the facts were not clearly established in the lower court, one interpretation of the facts indicated that the police returned a jailhouse informant to a jail cell in which the defendant was housed. The police knew the informant was seeking leniency in his case and that the informant had made specific reference to the fact that he was housed with the defendant. No specific promise was made to him, however, and there was no deal in place. Sure enough, the informant testified at defendant’s trial about statements made by the defendant after the informant was returned to the jail. This interpretation would amount to a Massiah violation.
Placing the informant back in the jail, knowing that he was going to attempt to obtain statements from the defendant in exchange for leniency in his own case amounted to “specifically eliciting” statements from the defendant in violation of his Sixth Amendment rights. Because the timing of the initial meeting with the police was not clear, however, a remand for better development of the facts was required.

Hart v. Florida Attorney General, 323 F.3d 884 (11th Cir. 2003)

After waiving his Miranda rights, the defendant asked to speak with a detective with whom he was acquainted. He asked the detective about the pros and cons of having an attorney.
The detective told him that the “con” was that the attorney would tell him not to answer the police officer’s questions. The detective also told the defendant that honesty wouldn’t hurt him.”
The defendant then confessed. The Eleventh Circuit held that the detective’s statements violated Miranda. Honesty could, in fact, hurt the defendant, and the statement discouraging the use of a lawyer was inappropriate. Both statements contradicted the protection of Miranda.

Ghent v. Woodford, 279 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 2002)

The continued questioning of the defendant after he requested the assistance of counsel was error. Suggesting, moreover, that the defendant talk to a psychiatrist was error, after the defendant invoked his right to counsel. The use of the defendant’s post-invocation statements was reversible error at the penalty phase of his death penalty trial.

United States v. Abdi, 142 F.3d 566 (2d Cir. 1998)

Following defendant’s arraignment on drug importation charges, he gave a statement to an INS agent. The government sought to introduce this statement (characterizing it as “impeachment”) to prove that the defendant understood English. The defendant had already retained counsel at the time of this interview and had not waived his right to counsel. Because there was no waiver of the right to counsel, this statement was not even admissible as impeachment. See United States v. Spencer, 955 F.2d 814 (2d Cir. 1992) (Michigan v. Harvey limited Michigan v. Jackson, by holding that a statement obtained during police initiated questioning after a request for counsel, while violative of Sixth Amendment prophylactic standards, may be admissible to impeach a defendant on cross-examination if given after a knowing and voluntary waiver of his right to counsel). Absent such a waiver, the statement would be inadmissible even for impeachment purposes.

United States v. Bender, 221 F.3d 265 (1st Cir. 2000)

While awaiting trial on charges of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, the defendant told some of cellmates that he planned to fabricate an alibi and possibly murder government witnesses. His cellmates reported the plans to the authorities and an undercover agent went to the jail, posing as an “alibi-for-hire.” The agent did not discuss the present charges (i.e., the possession of the firearm), but did talk about the plans to fabricate an alibi and to hire a hit man. The trial court suppressed the statements on the grounds that the interrogation of an indicted defendant violated his sixth amendment rights. Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159 (1985). The First Circuit affirmed. The government argued that the statements related to a future crime (suborning perjury and murder) not the indicted offense. The First Circuit disagreed: the statements were plainly incriminating as to the charged offense. The government is free to use the statements in a subsequent prosecution for suborning perjury, or attempted murder; but the statements are not admissible in the felon in possession case.

United States v. Browne, 891 F.2d 389 (1st Cir. 1989)

Law enforcement agents failed to honor the defendant’s request to consult with a lawyer prior to the continuation of interrogation. All subsequent statements violated the rule of Edwards v. Arizona and should have been suppressed at trial.

United States v. Szymaniak, 934 F.2d 434 (2d Cir. 1991)

Defendant requested to have counsel present before answering any questions. Specifically, the defendant stated, “I’m in a lot of trouble and I want to speak to my lawyer.” At trial, the government was permitted to introduce this statement. This was reversible error.

United States v. Hammad, 846 F.2d 854 (2d Cir. 1988)

The Assistant United States Attorney encouraged an informant to question a suspect who the prosecutor knew was represented by an attorney. No prosecution had yet been commenced, so there was no Massiah problem. Nevertheless, the Second Circuit holds that this conduct violates DR7-104(A)(1) which prohibits a lawyer from communicating with a “party” he or she knows to be represented by counsel regarding the subject matter of that representation. The Second Circuit holds that in many circumstances, the exclusion of evidence would be a permissible sanction, but that in this case, because the law was previously unsettled, suppression would be an inappropriate remedy. In a revised opinion, 858 F.2d 834, the court added this caveat: In those rare cases where a career criminal has retained “house counsel” the prosecutor is “authorized by law” to employ certain investigative techniques despite the defendant’s having retained an attorney.

United States v. Arnold, 106 F.3d 37 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel is offense-specific. Thus, generally, if a person has been indicted for one offense and is represented by counsel, the police may not question the defendant about that offense, but may initiate questioning of the defendant with regard to another, uncharged offense. In this case, however, the defendant was indicted for witness intimidation and the police initiated questioning on the subject of attempted murder (of the same witness). The court held that these offenses were “closely related” and the Sixth Amendment barred this questioning. That is, the Sixth Amendment prohibits questioning an indicted defendant about the charged offense, or any “closely related” charge. THIS DECISION WAS OVERRUULED by Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162 (2001).

Wilson v. Murray, 806 F.2d 1232 (4th Cir. 1986)

At the time of his arrest, the defendant refused to answer any questions and sought the advice of counsel. He renewed his request for counsel at the time of his arraignment. Nevertheless, shortly after the arraignment, police confronted the defendant with a co-defendant who had confessed. When confronted with his co-defendant, the defendant made statements which were incriminating. The Fourth Circuit ruled these statements inadmissible under Edwards v. Arizona, and Michigan v. Jackson, (request for attorney at arraignment foreclosed further questioning).

United States v. Rodriguez, 993 F.2d 1170 (5th Cir. 1993)

Defendant and several others were arrested on state drug charges. An attorney was appointed at arraignment to represent the defendant. Later, one of several co-conspirators contacted a federal agent and said “they” wanted to talk to him. The federal agent interviewed the defendant who made a statement. This interview was “initiated” by the police under the Edwards v. Arizona standard because the defendant did not initiate the interview. His statement should have been suppressed and his conviction was therefore reversed.

United States v. Cannon, 981 F.2d 785 (5th Cir. 1993)

Though the record was in need of further development, the defendant offered sufficient proof that after he requested the assistance of counsel, the agents renewed questioning of him. After making an incriminating statement to one agent, he later made a statement to another agent after being advised of his Miranda rights again. Nevertheless, if the first statement was Edwards-tainted, then the second statement would also be tainted as the fruit of the first statement.

United States v. Johnson, 954 F.2d 1015 (5th Cir. 1992)

The defendant was aware that one of his co-defendants had announced his intention to enter a guilty plea. After the co-defendant entered into the plea, he was wired by IRS agents and he went to the defendant’s home and taped him — eliciting incriminating responses. This “interrogation” violated Massiah and Maine v. Mouton. Though the defendant was aware that the co-defendant had entered a plea, he did not know that he was being questioned, in essence, by the police, in the absence of his lawyer.

Davis v. Puckett, 857 F.2d 1035 (5th Cir. 1988)

While in the custody of a sheriff, the defendant unequivocally requested the services of an attorney. Counsel failed to appear and the sheriff initiated another round of interrogation. Although the defendant was fully advised of his rights and signed the waiver of those rights, the police initiated questioning was improper requiring the suppression of the statement. However, because of a procedural default, the issue was waived.

United States v. Wolf, 879 F.2d 1320 (6th Cir. 1989)

The defendant, in state custody awaiting trial on unrelated charges, was questioned by federal agents about a murder. The defendant had sought the assistance of counsel at her state court arraignment. The questioning by federal agents was improper and the statement was not admissible. The court held that the defendant’s request for counsel at the arraignment was the equivalent of asking for counsel for Miranda purposes and, pursuant to Arizona v. Roberson, the police could not initiate questioning about any crime, once the defendant seeks an attorney for Miranda purposes. This decision would probably be different post-McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171 (1991).

Espinoza v. Fairman, 813 F.2d 117 (7th Cir. 1987)

At the time of his arraignment on weapons charges, the defendant accepted the appointment of a public defender. Subsequently, police questioned him about an unrelated murder charge. The Seventh Circuit holds that this is improper. Once the defendant has an attorney at arraignment, he cannot be questioned about related crimes. This constitutes a

Pope v. Zenon, 69 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 1995)
During interrogation, the defendant asked about one of the clauses of the Miranda waiver form, which provided that he had the right to have the advice of counsel before questioning. The officer responded that he could not have a lawyer until tomorrow. The questioning then continued. This was impermissible. The defendant has the right to the assistance of counsel before questioning continues, not “tomorrow.” Admitting the confession, however, was harmless error.

United States v. Cheely, 36 F.3d 1439 (9th Cir. 1994)
The defendant was in prison, but was being investigated for a mail bomb murder. Postal inspectors read him his Miranda rights and he declined to sign a waiver, explaining, “My attorney would not want me to talk with you.” The officers responded, “With that in mind, would you still want to talk to us?” The defendant said he would speak. This was improper interrogation. Once the defendant made the statement about his attorney, further questioning should have ceased. The court re-affirmed its ruling after reconsideration in light of Davis v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 2350 (1994).

United States v. de la Jara, 973 F.2d 746 (9th Cir. 1992)
Though there was some ambiguity to the defendant’s request for counsel (made in Spanish), the officer apparently understood the defendant to be asking for a lawyer and thus, the interrogation should have ceased.

United States v. Martinez, 972 F.2d 1100 (9th Cir. 1992)
The defendant was arrested on a state weapon charge, and at arraignment requested the assistance of counsel. The state charges were subsequently dropped, but the defendant was held in jail on the basis of a parole violation. Later, the federal grand jury indicted the defendant for possessing the same weapon which gave rise to the state charge. He was approached by federal law enforcement agents, Mirandized and made incriminating statements. In Michigan v. Jackson, the Supreme Court held that once a defendant has been indicted and exercises his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, he cannot be re-interrogated. However, in McNeil v. Wisconsin, the Court held that this right was “offense-specific”; that is, the police may interrogate the defendant about offenses other than those for which the Sixth Amendment applied, the offense set forth in the indictment. Here, the question is whether McNeil applies to the same “conduct” (possessing the weapon), or the same offense (state charges vs. federal charges). The Ninth Circuit holds that the request for counsel in connection with the offense conduct does not necessarily trigger the absolute bar of Michigan v. Jackson, but McNeil v. Wisconsin does not clearly authorize the interrogation in this case. If both charges were pending at the same time, then the question is simply whether the prosecutions were inextricably intertwined. Here, however, the charges in the state system had been dismissed prior to the federal indictment. In that situation, the question is whether the governments cooperated in a manner designed to circumvent the Sixth Amendment. A remand for further fact-finding was required.

United States v. Lucas, 963 F.2d 243 (9th Cir. 1992)
Defendant was arrested on an auto theft charge and, when read his Miranda rights, requested the assistance of counsel. Shortly thereafter, the FBI arrived to question the defendant about his participation in a recent bank robbery. Defendant waived his rights and confessed. The confession should have been suppressed. Re-interrogation was not permissible after the invocation of the right to counsel. The fact that it was different officers, asking about a different case, is inconsequential. Arizona v. Roberson.

Collazo v. Estelle, 940 F.2d 411 (9th Cir. 1991)

When he was first interrogated the defendant requested the assistance of counsel. The police responded that that would make it worse for him, and then left. Three hours later, the defendant initiated further contact and then confessed. This amounted to an involuntary waiver of Miranda rights and the confession should not have been admitted. Not only did the police misconduct amount to a Miranda violation, it also rendered the confession involuntary since it suggested that the failure to confess right then would have severe consequences. The lapse in time between the officer’s “threat” and the defendant’s re-initiation of contact did not cure the error. The defendant’s communication with the police reflected his fear of what would happen if he didn’t: a fear engendered by the police officer’s threat. Even under Arizona v. Fulminante, the coerced confession was grounds for reversal.

Robinson v. Borg, 918 F.2d 1387 (9th Cir. 1990)

Upon being interrogated, the defendant told the police officers, “I have to get me a good lawyer, man.” This constitutes an unambiguous request for an attorney and all further questioning should have immediately ceased.

United States v. Kimball, 884 F.2d 1274 (9th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was in custody on money laundering charges. Informants were sent to the jail and asked the defendant to help them recover money which was owed to them. The court held that not only the suppression of the defendant’s statements to the informant and other agents was necessary, but evidence derived from those statements, including statements of co-conspirators would also be suppressed. It is enough that absent the unconstitutional jailhouse encounter, the co-conspirator probably would not have continued to deal with the agents.

Smith v. Endell, 860 F.2d 1528 (9th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was arrested on drug charges and waived his Miranda rights and began providing information to the police. The interrogation turned to the issue of an unresolved murder and the defendant stated if he was a suspect in that, he would like to talk to a lawyer. The officer stated that he might be a suspect but failed to terminate questioning at that point. Suppression of the ensuing confession was required.

United States v. Nordling, 804 F.2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1986)

A detainee stated that he wanted to speak with his lawyer. This is sufficient to invoke his right to remain silent and subsequent questioning by a narcotics officer was improper and resulting statements were suppressed.

United States v. March, 999 F.2d 456 (10th Cir. 1993)

The defendant interrupted questioning with the inquiry, “Do you think I need an attorney?” This amounted to an ambiguous request for counsel which required the cessation of all substantive questioning. The police properly told the defendant that the “call was his” and that they would ask no further questions if he wanted to speak with an attorney. Thereafter the defendant agreed to be questioned.
United States v. Kelsey, 951 F.2d 1196 (10th Cir. 1991)

During the course of a search of the defendant’s house, but before he had the Miranda rights read to him, the defendant requested to see his lawyer. Thereafter, he was Mirandized and questioned. He made incriminating statements. The statements should have been suppressed. The fact that the request for counsel preceded the reading of the Miranda rights did not avoid the bright line rule of Edwards v. Arizona. Also, the fact that the interrogating officers were different than the officers to whom the defendant made his request for counsel is not consequential. Once a request for counsel is made, knowledge of that request is imputed to all law enforcement officers.

United States v. Mitcheltree, 940 F.2d 1329 (10th Cir. 1991)

Defendant, after being released on bond, contacted her friend and hairstylist about her pending prosecution. She knew her friend was a potential witness. Her friend, unbeknownst to her, was bugging her. The method by which the hairdresser questioned the defendant and led her to certain topics was a violation of Massiah and Maine v. Moulton and United States v. Henry. The government’s argument that they were investigating witness tampering would be meritorious (Illinois v. Perkins), except for the fact that the informant was clearly working at obtaining incriminating admissions about the pending indictment. Finally, the court concludes that the statements were not admissible even in the witness tampering counts: “When a deliberate Sixth Amendment violation occurs concerning pending charges, the government may not use defendant’s uncounseled incriminating statements at a trial of those or very closely related subsequent charges.” This case contains an encyclopedia of case law on the issues presented.

Parker v. Singletary, 974 F.2d 1562 (11th Cir. 1992)

Shortly after the defendant’s arrest, he was brought to the DA’s office. He refused to talk. He was later brought to the jail where he told a magistrate that he was going to hire an attorney. Later, the public defender’s office informed the sheriff that they represented the defendant. A student intern from the P.D.’s office was sent over to meet with the defendant. The defendant insisted on hiring his own lawyer, however. Nevertheless, the defendant, in the presence of the intern from the P.D.’s office, made a full statement to the sheriff. During the course of the statement, the defendant repeatedly stated that he was still interested in having his mother hire a lawyer for him. Even though the intern was present, this confession was taken in violation of the defendant’s right to have counsel present. At a minimum, defendant’s persistent requests to have his own attorney present amounted to an equivocal request for counsel.

Stokes v. Singletary, 952 F.2d 1567 (11th Cir. 1992)

Immediately after being arraigned and having an attorney appointed to represent him, the defendant was brought to an interrogation room and questioned about his participation in a murder. In a lengthy opinion reviewing the standards for evaluating this type of claim in a habeas proceeding, the court holds that a further evidentiary hearing was necessary to determine whether the state violated defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

Cannady v. Dugger, 931 F.2d 752 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant stated, “I think I should call my lawyer.” After balking at making a phone call the defendant was asked by the police, “Would you like to talk about it?” This was improper interrogation and was not a request for clarification of an ambiguous request for counsel.
United States v. Gomez, 927 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir. 1991)

After his arrest, the defendant was advised of his Miranda rights and responded that he wanted to speak with an attorney. Following this request, an agent told the defendant that he should immediately discuss with his attorney the benefits of cooperating and that if he cooperated he could get a sentence of less than life in prison. A few minutes later, the defendant – having not seen an attorney – gave a full statement. The agent’s comments amounted to improper continued “interrogation” and the resulting confession should have been suppressed.

United States v. Terzado-Madruga, 897 F.2d 1099 (11th Cir. 1990)

After arresting the defendant, the police arranged to have a former colleague of his make a number of taped phone conversations while the defendant remained in jail. The defendant was taped in his efforts to enlist his former colleague in murdering another individual. This violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights. Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964); United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980); Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159 (1985). However, evidence of the defendant’s murder for hire plot was not introduced in his drug trial which was the subject of this appeal; the severance of counts and the exclusion of the statements rendered the Sixth Amendment violation moot with regard to this prosecution. The court goes on to hold, however, that the incriminating statements with regard to the murder-for-hire scheme would be admissible in that trial since his Sixth Amendment right to counsel had not yet attached with regard to that offense.

Cervi v. Kemp, 855 F.2d 702 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was arrested and brought before a magistrate for an initial court appearance at which time he requested the services of an attorney. The defendant was subsequently moved to Georgia where he was interrogated without being furnished the services of an attorney. The defendant’s invocation of his right to an attorney barred all further counselless questioning unless initiated by the defendant himself.

Owen v. Alabama, 849 F.2d 536 (11th Cir. 1988)

After being advised of his Miranda rights, the defendant stated, “I think I’ll let you all appoint me one.” Interrogation of the defendant should have been suspended in order to determine whether he, in fact, did want an attorney present.

Fleming v. Kemp, 837 F.2d 940 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant stated that he did not want appointed counsel because he was going to get his own attorney. This constitutes the invocation of the right to counsel and subsequent police-initiated questioning was invalid under Edwards v. Arizona. The admission of these statements, however, did not require vacating the death sentence since these statements had no bearing on the aggravating circumstance of whether the victim had been murdered while engaged in the performance of his duties as a police officer.

United States v. Johnson, 812 F.2d 1329 (11th Cir. 1986)

Following his invocation of the right to counsel, the defendant stated, “All this trouble, all for trying to get some money.” This statement was not admissible at trial as it was made after his invocation of the right to remain silent. Furthermore, the defendant’s subsequent testimony at trial admitting his participation in some criminal activity did not moot the issue. Had the statement been ruled inadmissible, the defendant might not have taken the stand and the error would not have been rendered moot.
CONFESSION
(Right to Remain Silent)

See also: Post Arrest Silence

The defendant was read the Miranda warning and did not respond when asked if he waived the right to remain silent. He was then questioned for several hours, during which time he answered very few questions, just silently listening to the interrogation. Then he answered one question. The Supreme Court held that in order to invoke the right to remain silent and to thereby terminate further interrogation, the defendant must unequivocally invoke the right to remain silent. Simply remaining silent is not sufficient. In addition, once the defendant answered the question, this amounted to a waiver of the right to remain silent.

United States v. Abdallah, 911 F.3d 201 (4th Cir. 2018)

There was nothing ambiguous about the defendant’s invocation of his Miranda right to refuse to answer any questions. When the agent was giving the defendant the Miranda warning, the defendant interrupted and said, “I am not going to say anything at all.” There was not an ambiguous invocation and admitting his subsequent statement was reversible error. The interrogators failed to scrupulously honor his request to remain silent. Though the court may consider the circumstances that preceded the invocation to determine if it was ambiguous, the court cannot consider subsequent events to find ambiguity that arose because the interrogators failed to scrupulously honored the request.

Jones v. Harrington, 829 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2016)

Once a defendant, during interrogation, stated, I don’t want to talk no more, man” any further questioning or effort to seek clarification, was improper. The unequivocal request to remain silent should have been scrupulously honored.

Garcia v. Long, 808 F.3d 771 (9th Cir. 2015)

The police suspected Garcia of child molestation. He was brought to the police station for questioning and read his Miranda warning, after which the officer asked, “Now understanding your rights, do you wish to talk to me?” Garcia answered: “no.” That was his only response. Further questioning of any kind was not permissible, even to ask for clarification, because the answer “no” needed no clarification. The fact that Garcia, after being asked a couple more times, then provided a three-hour confession does not mean that the initial answer was ambiguous.

United States v. Okatan, 728 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2013)

When confronted by the police – but not while in custody – the defendant answered a few questions, but then invoked his right to counsel. Repeatedly during trial, the government highlighted the fact that when questioned by the police, the defendant invoked his right to counsel. This occurred during the examination of the interrogating officer and during closing argument. This was reversible error. Unlike the situation in Salinas v. Texas, the defendant in this case did not simply remain silent in response to questions, here, the defendant affirmatively asserted his right to counsel. Using that express assertion of the privilege to remain silent (which, in this context was the same as the invocation of the right to counsel), as evidence of guilt, violates the Fifth Amendment rights of the defendant, even post-Salinas.

_Tice v. Johnson_, 647 F.3d 87 (4th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was a suspect in a rape / murder. During the course of his interrogation, he agreed to have a polygraph administered. After the polygraph was administered by another police officer, the defendant was asked if he wanted to continue making a statement and he said that he did not want to answer any more questions. Thereafter, the initial interrogation officer returned to the room and continued the interrogation. No further _Miranda_ warnings were given. The Fourth Circuit held that trial counsel was ineffective in failing to move to suppress the ensuing confession.

_Hurd v. Terhune_, 619 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2010)

The defendant shot and killed his wife. The police took him into custody and began to interrogate him. He initially waived his _Miranda_ rights. The police asked him to re-enact the shooting (he claimed it was an accident). He refused to do the re-enactment. At trial, the prosecutor repeatedly relied on this refusal as evidence of the defendant’s guilt. The Ninth Circuit granted habeas relief. Once a defendant waives his right to remain silent, he retains the right to re-assert his right to remain silent at any time. And when the defendant does assert the right to remain silent, this fact may not be used against him. _Doyle v. Ohio_, 426 U.S. 610 (1976). The Ninth Circuit distinguished _Berghuis v. Thompkins_, which, according to the Ninth Circuit, only held that the police may continue to ask questions after an ambiguous request to remain silent. The Supreme Court did not hold, according to the Ninth Circuit, that the defendant’s silence can be used against him, even if he has not unambiguously invoked the right to counsel. In addition, there was nothing ambiguous about the defendant’s refusal to perform a re-enactment.

_Perkins v. Herbert_, 596 F.3d 161 (2d Cir. 2010)

Once a defendant invokes his right to remain silent, the police must scrupulously honor his right. _Michigan v. Mosley_, 423 U.S. 96 (1975). However, unlike when the defendant invokes his right to counsel, the police are permitted to re-initiate questioning of the defendant after a period of time, but only after providing fresh _Miranda_ warnings. In this case, the defendant invoked his right to remain silent. The police waited a period of time, and then returned and began questioning the defendant again, without having re-advised him of his _Miranda_ rights. The resulting confession should have been suppressed. Harmless error. _Anderson v. Terhune_, 516 F.3d 781 (9th Cir. 2008)

During questioning, the defendant said, “I don’t even wanna talk about this no more” and “Uh! I’m through with this” and finally stated, “I plead the Fifth.” These statements amounted to unequivocal invocations of the right to remain silent and any further interrogation was improper. The continued questioning of the defendant represented the antithesis of scrupulously honoring his expressed invocation of the right to remain silent.

_United States v. Rodriguez_, 518 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 2008)

If a defendant makes an equivocal request to remain silent prior to waiving his rights pursuant to _Miranda_, the police must cease interrogation and resolve the ambiguous request.
The rule that requires that questioning must cease only after an unequivocal request is made (Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994)), only applies after the defendant has initially waived his right to remain silent.

United States v. Lafferty, 503 F.3d 293 (3rd Cir. 2007)

The defendant and her boyfriend were both Mirandized and invoked their right to remain silent. Later, the boyfriend told the police that he wanted to make a statement with his girlfriend in attendance. The boyfriend signed a written waiver, but the defendant did not. They then incriminated themselves. This violated the defendant’s Miranda rights. She did not re-initiate questioning and her boyfriend’s conduct could not be attributed to her unless she expressly agreed to re-initiate questioning.

United States v. Jumper, 497 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 2007)

During the course of an interrogation that the defendant initially agreed to undergo, he repeatedly refused to answer certain questions. When this occurs, that portion of the interrogation may not be offered in front of the jury. The defendant has the right to selectively invoke his right to remain silent.

Arnold v. Runnels, 421 F.3d 859 (9th Cir. 2005)

The defendant initially waived his Miranda rights and gave a statement. When the police brought out a tape recorder, however, he refused to talk on tape. The tape was put on and questions were asked, to which the defendant responded, “No comment.” Playing this tape violated the defendant’s right to remain silent.

United States v. Rambo, 365 F.3d 906 (10th Cir. 2004)

Shortly after the defendant’s interrogation began, the officer asked the defendant, “So, do you want to talk to me about this stuff?” to which the defendant succinctly responded, “No.” Any further questioning, or statements about the consequences of failing to talk, or statements about what the police were going to do next, were impermissible and the ensuing statements by the defendant were inadmissible.

Jackson v. Giurbino, 364 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2004)

The law enforcement officer’s blatant violation of Miranda resulted in a statement that should have been excluded at trial. Admitting the statement of the defendant was reversible error.

United States v. Tyler, 164 F.3d 150 (3rd Cir. 1998)

The admissibility of statements obtained after the person in custody has decided to remain silent depends under Miranda on whether his right to cut off questioning was scrupulously honored. Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975). In this case, the defendant promptly invoked his right to remain silent when he was arrested. He was later brought to a room in a different police station – a room which was “decorated” with crime scene photos and time lines. Officers began talking to him about hunting, the defendant’s education and his mother’s health. The defendant began to cry and made an incriminating statement. The officers’ conduct did not satisfy the “scrupulously honor” standard and the statement should have been suppressed. A remand was needed to determine whether a later statement by the defendant should also be suppressed, despite the fact that it was obtained after a Miranda waiver was executed.

United States v. Barone, 968 F.2d 1378 (1st Cir. 1992)

Even if a defendant’s statement is factually voluntary, if it is obtained by exploiting a Miranda violation, it is inadmissible. The defendant told the police that he did not want to make a statement. A day and a half later, another officer approached the defendant and urged him to talk, which the defendant did. Because this violated the simple rule of Miranda and Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975)(restricting the officer’s right to re-interrogate the defendant after the defendant invoked his right to remain silent), the statements were correctly suppressed by the trial court.

Coppola v. Powell, 878 F.2d 1562 (1st Cir. 1989)

When confronted on the street, the suspect told the police, “Let me tell you something. I’m not one of your country bumpkins. I grew up on the streets of Providence, Rhode Island. And if you think I’m going to confess to you, you’re crazy.” This constitutes the invocation of the right to remain silent and is inadmissible in the prosecution’s case-in-chief. When a defendant does not testify at trial it is impermissible to refer to any Fifth Amendment rights that he has exercised.

United States v. Montana, 958 F.2d 516 (2d Cir. 1992)

After being advised of his Miranda rights, the defendant said nothing. Despite repeated questioning, he remained silent. This conduct is sufficient to invoke the right to remain silent and terminate further questioning. The defendant in this case refused even to answer standard pedigree questions.

Vujosevic v. Rafferty, 844 F.2d 1023 (3rd Cir. 1988)

Though the defendant invoked her right to remain silent, New Jersey police officers questioned her four more times. Subsequent statements were ruled inadmissible.

Charles v. Smith, 894 F.2d 718 (5th Cir. 1990)

On two occasions, the defendant refused to waive his right to remain silent. Despite these unequivocal requests to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights, the defendant was then asked by a police officer who owned a hat and a coat found at the rape scene. This question was clearly designed to provoke an answer from the defendant and the answer which was given should have been suppressed at trial. The court holds, however, that the admission of this testimony was harmless error.

Kordenbrock v. Scroggy, 919 F.2d 1091 (6th Cir. 1990)

In an en banc decision, the Sixth Circuit concludes that the admission of defendant’s confession, which was elicited by the police after he repeatedly invoked his right to remain silent, was error requiring reversal of both the guilt phase and the penalty phase of the trial.

United States v. Soliz, 129 F.3d 499 (9th Cir. 1997)

When the defendant was questioned, he stated that he was willing to answer questions about his citizenship. The police asked questions about other topics, however. This violated the defendant’s right to limit the topics of questioning and to cut off questioning at any time. A person in custody may selectively waive his right to remain silent by indicating that he will respond to some questions, but not to others. Introducing his statements was reversible error.

United States v. Poole, 794 F.2d 462 (9th Cir. 1986)

An F.B.I. agent questioned the defendant about his name, date of birth and place of birth. The Court held that this amounted to interrogation which should not have taken place after defendant asserted the right to remain silent.

United States v. Ramsey, 992 F.2d 301 (11th Cir. 1993)

After being read his Miranda rights, the defendant acknowledged that he understood; but, when he was asked whether he wanted to make a statement, he looked away. This amounted to at least an ambiguous request to remain silent, which should have terminated further questioning without a determination made whether the defendant did, in fact, wish to make a statement. “Once warnings have been given, the subsequent procedure is clear. If the individual indicates in any manner, at any time prior to questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease . . . One way an individual can invoke his right to remain silent is by refusing to speak.” This case probably did not survive the decision in Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994). See Coleman v. Singletary, 30 F.3d 1420 (11th Cir. 1994).

Jacobs v. Singletary, 952 F.2d 1282 (11th Cir. 1992)

After being arrested, the defendant was Mirandized and questioned about her participation in a murder. She did not say anything, refused to sign the Miranda form, refused to identify herself and would not answer any questions about herself. Though she did not specifically invoke her right to remain silent, this conduct amounted to the invocation of her right to remain silent and further questioning should not have occurred. Furthermore, the efforts of the police to re-interrogate her repeatedly over the course of the next few hours – even with fresh Miranda warnings – violated her right to remain silent.

United States v. Pena, 897 F.2d 1075 (11th Cir. 1990)

Following his arrest, the defendant was asked if he wanted to make a statement. He responded, “I really want to but I can’t. They will kill my parents.” This amounted to at least an ambiguous invocation of his right to remain silent. The government should have clarified the defendant’s desire before continuing the interrogation. His subsequent incriminating statements should not have been used, though it was harmless error. Also, the Court notes that a defendant’s post-Miranda ambiguous expression of a desire to remain silent is not admissible in evidence. The same is true, of course, for an unambiguous expression of intent to remain silent. This case probably did not survive the decision in Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994). See Coleman v. Singletary, 30 F.3d 1420 (11th Cir. 1994).

Christopher v. Florida, 824 F.2d 836 (11th Cir. 1987)

The defendant invoked his right to remain silent. The police officers continued to interrogate the defendant and claimed at trial that his subsequent answers evidenced his decision to no longer remain silent. The Eleventh Circuit grants the habeas petition and holds that all questioning should have ceased. The defendant was brought to the police station on an accusation of murder. He stated that if he was charged with murder then he had nothing else to say. The police continued to question him and he repeated his invocation of the right to remain silent. Interrogation continued. The police attempted to justify further questioning and the admissibility of the confession on the grounds that the invocation of the right to remain silent was equivocal as demonstrated by his subsequent confession. The Eleventh Circuit holds that the invocation of the right to remain silent was not equivocal and further questioning was improper. The confession should have been suppressed. The Eleventh Circuit reviews a substantial body of case law involving an equivocal verses unequivocal invocation of the right to remain silent, and the right of the police to re-initiate questioning.
CONFESSION
(Jackson-Denno hearings)

United States v. Mathurin, 148 F.3d 68 (2d Cir. 1998)

The defendant moved prior to trial to suppress his custodial statements, claiming in an affidavit that he never waived his right to counsel before making the incriminating statement. An assertion that Miranda warnings were not given, when the government asserts the contrary creates a specific factual dispute. That dispute cannot properly be resolved without an evidentiary hearing. The failure to hold a hearing in this case was error. Although the defendant’s assertion that warnings were not given is conclusory, any statement that a specific event did not occur will normally be conclusory.

United States v. Juvenile Male, 595 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 2010)

The requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 5033 apply even if the law enforcement officer is unaware of the suspect’s age. The requirement applies, even if the defendant gives a false birthday to the police officer, thus causing the police officer not to know his juvenile status.

United States v. L.M.K., 149 F.3d 1033 (9th Cir. 1998)

Holding the defendant for 33 hours before she was brought to a magistrate violated 18 U.S.C. § 5033. The failure to notify the juvenile’s parents in a reasonable time, another violation of the Act. The juvenile’s statements should have been suppressed but the failure to do so was not reversible error.
CONFESSION
(McNabb-Mallory Rule)

The Supreme Court considered the effect of Congress’s apparent effort to undermine McNabb-Mallory when it enacted 18 U.S.C. § 3501. That provision had been read by some courts to mandate a strict “voluntariness” test, regardless of whether the defendant’s statement was obtained more than six hours after arrest without presentment to a Magistrate. The Corley Court decided that that McNabb-Mallory survived the enactment of § 3501. Though § 3501(a) reflected Congress’s attempt (albeit unsuccessful) to overrule Miranda (see Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)), when Congress enacted § 3501(c), it expressly preserved the prophylactic rule of McNabb-Mallory that ensures that statements obtained outside the six-hour time frame (i.e., if more than six hours have elapsed and the defendant was not presented to magistrate) are not admissible absent a finding by the trial judge that presentment to a magistrate earlier was not reasonable.

United States v. Thompson, 772 F.3d 752 (3rd Cir. 2014)

Delaying presentment to a magistrate in order to explore the possibility of cooperation is not an acceptable excuse and any statements made by the defendant during this period of time should have been suppressed.

United States v. Pimental, 755 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2014)

The delay in presenting the defendant to a Magistrate following his arrest was not reasonable and the statement he made during the delay should have been suppressed. The defendant was a passenger in a vehicle that was crossing the border. At the border, a drug dog alerted to the vehicle. After the defendant was initially interrogated and invoked his right to counsel, the agents arrested him. Four hours later, a federal Magistrate had a calendar call. The defendant was not brought to court. The agents knew that the next available court calendar would be several days later because of a holiday weekend. Approximately 48 hours after his arrest, he made a statement to the agents, while being transported to a holding cell, still having not been presented to a Magistrate. The delay in this case was not reasonable or necessary and the statement should have been suppressed. The delay was not caused by the necessity for further investigation about whether to charge the defendant, because he had already been charged.

United States v. Valenzuela-Espinoza, 697 F.3d 742 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was not brought before a magistrate, following his arrest, for over twenty-four hours. Approximately six hours after his arrest, he was questioned and provided a detailed incriminating statement. The delay in bringing him to a Magistrate, coupled with interrogating him during the delay, rendered the confession inadmissible. The court noted that an internal policy adopted by Magistrates in the district that required paperwork to be completed in the morning if a first appearance was to be scheduled in the afternoon, did not trump the requirements of Rule 5 (requiring prompt presentment of an arrestee to a Magistrate) and the McNabb-Mallory rule.
The police arrested the defendant, but waited thirty hours to bring him before a magistrate (who was in court fifteen minutes away) until the police could re-tape an interview with the defendant. The tape recorder was broken and the delay was caused by the need to obtain a replacement. The Ninth Circuit held that this delay was not reasonable and suppressed the statement.
CONFESSION
(Sufficiency of Evidence to Corroborate a Confession)

United States v. Adams, 583 F.3d 457 (6th Cir. 2009)

The trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that it could not convict the defendant based solely on the defendant’s own confession, without corroborating evidence. The fact that there was other corroborating evidence does not eliminate the need to properly instruct the jury if a request is made.

United States v. Stephens, 482 F.3d 669 (4th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was arrested and found in possession of a gun. He promptly confessed that he had been involved in a drug deal and needed the gun for protection (and had actually shot at another participant in the drug deal). Though the police had heard the gunshots (this is what prompted the defendant’s arrest), there was no other evidence to establish the existence of any drug transaction. The evidence was insufficient to support his convictions of carrying a gun in relation to a drug trafficking crime and conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

United States v. Irving, 452 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with a variety of crimes, including sex tourism. The government relied, on certain counts, on journals that were seized from the defendant and which purported to chronicle his illegal acts with minors in a foreign country. The Second Circuit held that the journals did suffice to prove his guilt on those counts when coupled with other evidence developed in the case. In the initial panel decision, 432 F.3d 401 (2005), the Second Circuit held that the journal was not sufficient, based on the principle that a defendant’s confession is sufficient, even without corroboration to prove his guilt of the crime if the corpus delecti is established in the confession and is reliable. See Opper v. United States, 348 U.S. 84 (1954). The Second Circuit has applied Opper to permit a conviction based on a confession if there is substantial independent evidence which would tend to establish the trustworthiness of the statement. In the rehearing decision, however, the Second Circuit held that there was sufficient corroboration of the journals.

United States v. Norris, 428 F.3d 907 (9th Cir. 2005)

Though the evidence was sufficient on other counts of the indictment, the evidence was insufficient on one of the indictment for which only the defendant’s confession established that he committed the offense charged.

United States v. Reynolds, 367 F.3d 294 (5th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with robbing three banks. The victims never witnessed his possession of a firearm, however. When he was arrested he made the statement that he “always had that gun with him” and that he “never intended on using the gun either on a victim teller or on the police but on himself in the event that he got caught.” These uncorroborated confessions by the defendant were not sufficient to sustain a §924(c) conviction.
CONFESSION
(Voluntariness)

The bad news is that an erroneously admitted coerced confession may be harmless error. The good news is that in this case, the error was not harmless. The defendant was in custody on a weapons charge. He was threatened by other inmates because of rumors that he had murdered a child. A government informant who was in prison with the defendant told the defendant that he would protect him— but only if he told him the truth about the murder. This amounted to a coerced confession.

In considering whether a confession was voluntary or not, the focus of the inquiry must be on whether there was any police overreaching.

United States v. Allen, 864 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 2017)

The Fifth Amendment prohibition on the use of compelled testimony in criminal proceedings applies even when a foreign government compels a foreigner to answer questions, which are then used in a prosecution of the foreigner in an American court. In this case, the foreigner (British citizen) was given use immunity, but not derivative use immunity and compelled to answer questions by British authorities. He was later prosecuted in New York. One of the witnesses against him had reviewed the defendant’s answers to the British interrogation and his testimony was affected by his review of those statements. The Second Circuit held that the Fifth Amendment applied, that the government was required to satisfy the Kastigar requirement to prove that the witness’s testimony was not affected by his review of the defendant’s compelled testimony, and that the witness’s simple assurance that his testimony was not affected, was insufficient to satisfy the Kastigar requirement.

Dassey v. Dittman, 860 F.3d 933 (7th Cir. 2017)

This is the case made famous by the Netflix series, “Making a Murderer.” In this panel opinion, the Seventh Circuit held that the interrogation of Dassey resulted in an involuntary confession. After this ruling was issued, however, it was vacated when the Seventh Circuit granted rehearing en banc on August 4, 2017. Stay tuned.

United States v. West, 813 F.3d 619 (7th Cir. 2016)

The defense sought to introduce expert testimony that would have explained that the defendant was a mentally ill person with a low IQ and was suggestible (all for the purpose of explaining that his confession was not reliable). The trial court excluded the expert testimony on the basis that it was just a back door way of trying to get an insanity defense before the jury. The Seventh Circuit reversed: evidence which shows that a confession is not reliable is admissible and expert testimony is no exception.

Sharp v. Rohling, 793 F.3d 1216 (10th Cir. 2015)

During the course of her statement to the police, the defendant asked if she was going to go to jail. To encourage her to keep talking, the officer responded, “No, no, no, no.” The officer also stated that he would help the defendant and her children find a homeless shelter. At no point did he qualify his assurance about no jail time with a statement that the prosecutor makes the final recommendation. The confession was involuntary and the writ was granted.

United States v. Hufstetler, 782 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2015)

It is not necessarily impermissible for the police to coax a statement from a defendant by noting that the police may decide not to prosecute or arrest a spouse, or girlfriend. In order to render a confession involuntary, the defendant would need to show that the spouse or girlfriend was not subject to being arrested; in other words, the threat essentially warned the defendant that if he did not confess, the police would arrest the spouse without a lawful basis to do so. See, e.g., United States v. Tingle, 658 F.2d 1332 (9th Cir. 1981) (threatening mother that she would not be able to see her child); Brown v. Horell, 644 F.3d 969 (9th Cir. 2011) (same); United States v. Ortiz, 943 F.Supp.2d 447, 456 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) and United States v. Andrews, 847 F.Supp.2d 236, 249 (D.Mass. 2012).

United States v. Taylor, 745 F.3d 15 (2d Cir. 2014)

The police apprehended the defendant as he was leaving the scene of a robbery. The defendant consumed a bottle of pills as he was arrested. He was hospitalized and interrogated by the police. He was essentially stupefied when he made his post-arrest statements. He fell asleep repeatedly during questioning and was only intermittently alert. Although he was supposedly lucid when he made the statements that were introduced in evidence at trial, the entire interrogation was tainted by his obvious inability to voluntarily make statements to the police, a fact that the police took advantage of during their questioning. The defendant’s conviction was similar to the condition of the defendant in Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978), where a hospitalized suspect was interrogated, despite his obvious impairment. The conviction was reversed based on the use of these involuntary statements.

United States v. Preston, 751 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc)

The personal characteristics of the suspect are relevant in determining whether the tactics used by the police during an interrogation are coercive and thereby render any confession involuntary. In this case, the defendant had a low IQ and, though the tactics used by the police to interrogate the defendant might not be deemed to be coercive if employed with a more intelligent suspect, the low IQ of the defendant was a factor that should have been considered by the trial court in assessing the voluntariness of the confession. Among the tactics used by the police was questioning such as: Either you molested the victim because you are a monster, or because it was just a one-time thing; which was it? The police also assured the defendant that if he wrote out an apology to the victim, they would keep it confidential.

Aleman v. Village of Hanover Park, 662 F.3d 897 (7th Cir. 2011)

In this civil rights case, the Seventh Circuit held that if the police lie to a suspect about the nature of a victim’s injuries (e.g., the cause of the victim’s injuries must have been the defendant’s conduct), a statement obtained from the suspect is not voluntary. In this case, the suspect admitted that she shook a baby in order to wake the baby up. The police lied to the suspect, telling her that the only way the baby could have sustained the injuries was from this type of shaking. The suspect then said that she must be responsible, because she did, in fact, shake the baby.
When initially questioned, the defendant stated that he would not answer questions without a lawyer. The police approached the defendant a second time, did not Mirandize him and offered to “cut him a deal” after which the defendant made an incriminating statement. He was the Mirandized and repeated the incriminating statement. The statement was inadmissible because it was obtained in violation of Miranda, it violated his right to counsel, it was not “voluntary” (because of the offer of a deal) and violated Seibert. THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED, HOLDING THAT THE TWO-STEP SEIBERT TYPE OF INTERROGATION WAS NOT EMPLOYED BY THE POLICE IN THIS CASE. Bobby v. Dixon, --- S.Ct. --- 10-1540 (11/7/11).

The police went to the location where the defendant in this case had been the victim of a robbery. After reading Miranda warnings to the defendant, the officer explained that he wanted to know about the crime for which the defendant was a victim, not the crimes that the defendant had perpetrated. The officer also said that any information the defendant shared with the police would not be used to prosecute him. During the course of the ensuing statement of the defendant, he confessed to crimes that he had perpetrated. The Eleventh Circuit held that the confession was involuntarily obtained and was inadmissible under the Due Process Clause. See Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532 (1897) (A confession, in order to be admissible, must be free and voluntary; that is, must not be extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight.”). It is not significant that the defendant was not in custody. A statement is inadmissible if it is not voluntary, even if it is not a custodial statement and regardless of whether Miranda warnings were given. The Eleventh Circuit also discussed the use of deception on the part of the police. The court noted that deception as to certain facts does not necessarily render a confession involuntary (for example, distorting the amount of information already known to the police); while deceiving the defendant about a legal matter (nothing you say will be used against you) is a different matter. See also United States v. Rutledge, 900 F.2d 1127 (7th Cir. 1990); United States v. Walton, 10 F.3d 1024 (3rd Cir. 1993).

The Ninth Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus in this murder case because of two flaws in the state’s method of gaining the defendant’s confession: first, the Miranda warning was confusing and inaccurate – the police advised the defendant that he had the right to counsel if he was involved in the crime; the police also advised the defendant (a juvenile) that the warnings were “just formalities.” The one-page Miranda form was explained by the police over twelve pages of the interrogation transcript. In addition, a thirteen hour long interrogation of a sleep-deprived teenager resulted in a confession that was not voluntary. Relentless questioning implies to the suspect that he does not, in fact, have the right to remain silent. Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49 (1949); Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948). Rehearing the case once again after remand from the U.S. Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit reached the same result, even after considering Florida v. Powell, 130 S. Ct. 1195 (2010). Doody v. Ryan, 649 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2011).

   The district court condemned the provision in the Thompson Memo that states that a corporation’s payment of attorney fees for targeted employees is a factor that the prosecutor should consider in deciding whether to indict the corporation for the conduct of employees. The Court held that the employees’ due process rights to have their attorneys’ fees paid by their employer – as had been customary with this employer (KPMG) – was violated. The court also relied on the Sixth Amendment right to counsel which, the court held, was infringed by the prosecutor’s efforts to dissuade the corporation from paying the employees’ fees. The result was the suppression of statements made by the defendants that were “coerced” by their employer, KPMG, which felt compelled to require the employees to speak to the government because of the Thompson Memo requirement that corporations cooperate. The Second Circuit affirmed, United States v. Stein, 541 F.3d 130 (2d Cir. 2008), in a decision annotated above in ATTORNEYS (Right to Counsel).

United States v. Lopez, 437 F.3d 1059 (10th Cir. 2006)
   When the police provide an assurance of a specific sentence that the defendant will receive if he confesses, and assures him that the sentence will be more if he doesn’t confess, the resulting confession is not voluntary.

United States v. Jacobs, 431 F.3d 99 (3rd Cir. 2005)
   A promise by a law enforcement agent that a defendant’s statement will not be used against him is a factor – and perhaps a significant factor – in determining that the statement was not voluntary. In this case, the Court determined that the statements made by the defendant during one interview were subject to a promise that the statements would not be used, based in part on the fact that the defendant had been providing information to the FBI agent for ten years.

United States v. Aguilar, 384 F.3d 520 (8th Cir. 2004)
   For nearly two hours, the police interrogated the defendant prior to giving him Miranda warnings. The defendant was told that if he cooperated, he would be released. Based on Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600, 124 S.Ct. 2601 (2004), the Mirandized statement was inadmissible. Moreover, the post-Miranda statements were the product of coercion. Though the promise of release is not alone a basis for finding the confession involuntary, it is one of many factors that supported the trial court’s finding that the confession was not voluntary.

Taylor v. Maddox, 366 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2004)
   The Ninth Circuit concluded that the state trial court, the state appellate court and the federal habeas trial court all erred in finding the defendant’s confession voluntary. The defendant was a sixteen year old boy who was brought to the police station late at night by several police officers after they entered his apartment while he was asleep. They interrogated him in a small room for over two hours before finally turning on a tape recorder and recording his confession. Immediately after this confession, he called an attorney and told the attorney that he had promptly asked to speak to an attorney and to his mother, that this request was denied, that he was threatened with a life sentence if he did not confess, but would receive a shorter sentence if he did confess, that he was tired and confessed to a crime he did not commit so the interrogation would end and he could call the attorney. The Ninth Circuit

United States v. Garibay, 143 F.3d 534 (9th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in finding that the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived his Miranda rights. The record clearly established that the defendant spoke limited English. The agent did not offer to provide the Miranda warnings in Spanish and had to repeat and explain the concepts to the defendant, who clearly did not understand English. The evidence also established that the defendant was borderline mentally retarded. The burden of proof is on the government to prove a waiver—the burden is not on the defendant to prove that he understands no English. Admitting the defendant’s statement was reversible error.

Weaver v. Brenner, 40 F.3d 527 (2d Cir. 1994)

A coerced confession may not be introduced at any stage of a criminal proceeding, including the grand jury.

United States v. Swint, 15 F.3d 286 (3rd Cir. 1994)

The defendant was invited to a state D.A.’s office to make an off-the-record proffer in connection with a proposed plea agreement. During the course of the initial conversation, the DEA arrived and confronted the defendant with evidence of additional criminal conduct. The defendant then made a full statement. This was not a confession which could be used in court. Though the DEA portion of the interview was not announced to be “off-the-record,” it was never made clear to the defendant that it was “on-the-record” and thus, the government failed to prove that the statement was voluntary. The trial court’s findings that the government engaged in an inappropriate “bait and switch” was amply supported by the record. A comparable case is United States v. Rogers, 906 F.2d 189 (5th Cir. 1990).

United States v. Walton, 10 F.3d 1024 (3rd Cir. 1993)

The defendant was involved in illegal firearm sales. He called an old friend who was an ATF agent and asked if he could have an “off the record” conversation. He did not know that he was already being investigated by the ATF. They met on a park bench and the agent agreed they could talk “off the cuff.” The ATF agent also brought along another agent. The defendant’s subsequent statements could not be introduced against him. The assurance of confidentiality rendered the ensuing confession involuntary. Even under the Arizona v. Fulminate standard, this statement was involuntary. Given the uniquely influential nature of a promise from a law enforcement official not to use a suspect’s inculpatory statement, such a promise may be the most significant factor in assessing the voluntariness of an accused’s confession in light of the totality of the circumstances.

United States v. Rogers, 906 F.2d 189 (5th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was summoned to a state sheriff’s department and asked about stolen guns which he had purchased from a third party. The state agents told him he would not be prosecuted if he identified the person from whom he had obtained the guns and helped in retrieving the guns. Later, he became the focus of a federal investigation but was never advised that his continuing cooperation would be used against him. Though he was Mirandized, his subsequent statement should not have been used against him because of the failure of the federal agents to advise him that the earlier assurances of the state agents no longer applied.

United States v. Finch, 998 F.2d 349 (6th Cir. 1993)

Five police officers broke down the door where the defendant was residing, drew their weapons, and then broke down the door where the defendant and a woman were. When the police encountered the defendant, he was told that they were looking for cocaine and if they found any, everybody in the house would be arrested. The defendant then pointed out where the cocaine was located. This confession was involuntary. Coercion may involve psychological, as well as physical threats. Threats to arrest members of the suspect’s family may render a confession involuntary.

Cooper v. Scroggy, 845 F.2d 1385 (6th Cir. 1988)

Police officers assaulted the suspect thus rendering involuntary any subsequent statements. Furthermore, the assault on the suspect rendered his co-arrestee’s statement involuntary as well.

United States v. D.F., 63 F.3d 671 (7th Cir. 1995)

The defendant, a juvenile, was involuntarily committed to a mental health facility due to drug problems. Patients were encouraged to talk to therapists and were rewarded for doing so. A therapist, aware that the juvenile was a suspect in a murder case, questioned the juvenile about her past behavior, without clearly informing her that the questioning was designed, in part, for investigative purposes. This rendered the confession involuntary. Though the therapist was not a law enforcement agent, she questioned the defendant with an eye toward a future prosecution. This decision was re-affirmed after remand from the Supreme Court at United States v. D.F., 115 F.3d 413 (7th Cir. 1997). In this latter decision, the court addresses at some length the role of an appellate court in determining the voluntariness of a confession.

Wilson v. O’Leary, 895 F.2d 378 (7th Cir. 1990)

A rape suspect was accosted by the victim’s husband, as well as a group of his friends (including an off-duty police officer). He made an un-Mirandized involuntary statement. Later, an officer arrested the defendant and asked him what he told the mob which accosted him. He responded that he identified the second rapist. Both statements were inadmissible. Though the first statement to the group was not introduced, the second statement was equally inadmissible and required vacating the conviction.

Woods v. Clusen, 794 F.2d 293 (7th Cir. 1986)

The confession of a 16-1/2-year-old was ruled inadmissible. The police showed graphic pictures of the murder scene and told the accused a number of lies about the strength of the case against him. Despite the fact that he was uncommunicative, the defendant was confronted with additional questioning until he finally confessed.

United States v. Wimberly, 930 F.2d 16 (8th Cir. 1991)

Even though the trial court had already made a determination that the defendant’s confession was voluntary, the defendant was still permitted to introduce evidence tending to show that the statement was involuntary. This is true, even though at trial the defendant denied making the statement at all.

United States v. Harrison, 34 F.3d 886 (9th Cir. 1994)

Shortly after being arrested, the defendant was asked rhetorically by the police whether she thought it would be better if the judge were told she had cooperated or had not cooperated. Though a suggestion that cooperation will be rewarded is sometimes permissible, a suggestion that silence will be punished is always improper. Even, as in this case, implying that the failure to cooperate will be brought to the attention of the prosecutor, or court, renders a confession involuntary.

Collazo v. Estelle, 940 F.2d 411 (9th Cir. 1991)

When he was first interrogated the defendant requested the assistance of counsel. The police responded that that would make it worse for him, and then left. Three hours later, the defendant initiated further contact and then confessed. This amounted to an involuntary waiver of Miranda rights and the confession should not have been admitted. Not only did the police misconduct amount to a Miranda violation, it also rendered the confession involuntary since it suggested that the failure to confess right then would have severe consequences. The lapse in time between the officer’s “threat” and the defendant’s re-initiation of contact did not cure the error. The defendant’s communication with the police reflected his fear of what would happen if he didn’t: a fear engendered by the police officer’s threat. Even under Arizona v. Fulminante, the coerced confession was grounds for reversal.

United States v. Jenkins, 938 F.2d 934 (9th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was arrested after a shootout with the police. When he was apprehended, he was kicked in the groin and stomach, and threatened with being killed. His confession to possessing a sawed-off shotgun should have been suppressed. One confession was made five hours after the beating (and after being released from the hospital); the second confession was made five hours after the first confession. Both were tainted by the beating. The error in admitting the confession was not harmless under Arizona v. Fulminante.

United States v. Moreno, 891 F.2d 247 (9th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was arrested after she admitted being a resident in a house which had just been searched and found to have substantial quantities of cocaine and cash. The defendant was brought into the kitchen where she was told to make a call to make arrangements for the baby to be picked up. Just before the baby was taken away, the defendant saw her three children being taken away in handcuffs, her sixteen-year-old daughter in tears. The defendant, at that point, asked to make a statement. The Ninth Circuit held that it was error for the District Court not to hold a hearing to determine whether the ensuing confession was voluntary. Although the Fifth Amendment does not protect the defendant from moral and psychological pressures to confess emanating from sources other than official coercion, Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986), in these circumstances, the moral and psychological pressure to confess may have resulted from the law enforcement official’s action.

United States v. Perdue, 8 F.3d 1455 (10th Cir. 1993)

Defendant was properly stopped based on an articulable suspicion, pursuant to Terry v. Ohio, when he approached property in a rural location which was being searched. He was ordered out of the car at gunpoint, handcuffed and ordered to lie down on the ground, as was his pregnant fiancée. He was asked what he was doing there and responded that he was there to check out his marijuana. Though this was a Terry stop, and not a full-scale arrest, Miranda warnings were required. Miranda warnings are not necessary for every Terry stop (Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984)), but where, as here, the Terry stop involves a degree of force and a show of authority which represents a significant curtailment of the defendant’s freedom, the warnings are required. See also United States v. Smith, 3 F.3d 1088 (7th Cir. 1993). A subsequent interrogation, which followed this initial questioning and which was preceded by Miranda warnings was tainted by the improper use of force and was thus involuntary, despite Miranda warnings. Helicopters were flying overhead; the defendant was told that his pregnant fiancée could go free if he confessed; the questioning occurred in an isolated rural area; fifteen to twenty law enforcement officers surrounded the defendant.

Griffin v. Strong, 983 F.2d 1540 (10th Cir. 1993)

In this civil rights action, the plaintiff established that a confession he made which led to a prior criminal conviction had been coerced. The Tenth Circuit agreed: the officer threatened the defendant and warned him that he would never see his daughter again unless he confessed to raping her. At a subsequent session, the officer promised to protect the defendant from being injured in the jail if he would make an additional statement. This type of interrogation, too, rendered the statement involuntary.

Smith v. Zant, 887 F.2d 1407 (11th Cir. 1989)

The defendant had a mental age of ten or eleven and an I.Q. of about 65. Expert testimony revealed that the defendant would have difficulty understanding the Miranda warnings. His purported waiver of Miranda rights was not voluntary requiring the suppression of his statements. The error was harmless as to guilt-innocence, but required vacating the death sentence. This decision is the product of an equally divided en banc court affirming the district court judgment.

Miller v. Dugger, 838 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir. 1988)

Cognizant of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Colorado v. Connelly, the Eleventh Circuit holds that although a suspect’s mental problems cannot by themselves negate a waiver of Miranda rights on the basis of voluntariness, such mental illness may establish that the waiver of constitutional rights was not intelligent.

United States v. Bradshaw, 935 F.2d 295 (D.C.Cir. 1991)

Colorado v. Connelly involves the defendant’s mental capacity to voluntarily waive his Miranda rights and held that the question of voluntariness focuses only on the existence vel non of police coercion. Here, the question was whether the schizophrenic defendant comprehended his Miranda rights, that is, whether his waiver was knowing and intelligent. In connection with this inquiry, the Connelly limitation (i.e., did the police coerce the defendant) does not apply. Rather, the trial court must determine whether the defendant had the mental capacity to knowingly and intelligently waive his Miranda rights.
CONFLICT OF INTEREST

United States v. White Eagle, 721 F.3d 1108 (9th Cir 2013)

18 U.S.C. § 208 is the basic criminal conflict of interest statute that makes it a crime for a federal official to participate in a proceeding, application or contract determination in which he has a financial interest. In this case, the defendant supposedly concealed another person’s criminal conduct in order to facilitate the continuation of a government program in which she also was a participant. This did not qualify as a conflict of interest.
CONFRONTATION

See also: Cross Examination
Defendant’s Right to Be Present
Evidence (Hearsay – Evidence Offered by the Government)

The Supreme Court reversed this state court murder conviction on the grounds that the state was permitted to introduce the statement of a co-defendant that implicated the defendant. The co-defendant was not tried with the defendant (thus, this was not a Bruton situation) and he invoked his Fifth Amendment right not to testify. In his out-of-court statement, he admitted some participation in the crime spree, but implicated the defendant (his brother) in the murder. The state argued that this was admissible under the state exception to the hearsay rule for statements against the declarant's penal interest. The Supreme Court held that the statement implicating the defendant in the murder was not sufficiently against the declarant's penal interest to be admitted. The admission of this testimony violated the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment.

Statements of a child molestation victim which were admitted pursuant to the hearsay exceptions for spontaneous declarations and as part of a medical examination were admissible even without proof of the declarant’s unavailability.

Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990)

The right of confrontation may be satisfied absent a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial where the denial of such confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy and only where the testimony’s reliability is otherwise assured. The State’s interest in protecting a child witness from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of a special procedure such as allowing the child to testify by video tape. In order to use such a procedure, however, there must be a finding by the trial court which is case specific. In this case, the child was permitted to testify through a one-way closed circuit television.

Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805 (1990)

The Supreme Court holds that the admission of hearsay statements made by a child to an examining pediatrician violated the defendant’s rights under the confrontation clause of the Sixth Amendment. The Court held that the child’s statements did not fall within a traditional hearsay exception and lacked “particularized guarantees of trustworthiness” because the doctor had conducted the interview without procedural safeguards: He failed to videotape the interview, asked leading questions, and had a preconceived idea of what the child should be disclosing.

In child molestation cases, the Iowa courts permit a screen to be placed which prevents the child witness from seeing the defendant during trial. The United States Supreme Court holds that this violates the defendant’s right to confront the witnesses against him.

The victim of a brutal assault was able to identify the defendant while in the hospital recuperating. By the time of trial, the witness was no longer capable of identifying the defendant as the assailant, but was able to recall identifying him while in the hospital. The United States Supreme Court holds that this does not violate the confrontation clause or the rule against hearsay and affirms the conviction based on the out-of-court identification and the in-court testimony about that identification.

Richardson v. Griffin, 866 F.3d 836 (7th Cir. 2017)

The state introduced testimony from an officer concerning what witnesses told him about the identity of the shooter. The state argued that his evidence was introduced to explain the course of the police investigation, not for the truth of the matter asserted. The Seventh Circuit held that this violated the Confrontation Clause and granted the writ.

United States v. Jimison, 825 F.3d 260 (5th Cir. 2016)

Though the right of Confrontation is more limited in a supervised release hearing, in this case, the Fifth Circuit held that the defendant’s due process rights were violated by limiting the defendant’s right to cross-examine the law enforcement agent who repeated what he was told by an informant regarding the defendant’s criminal acts. The district court also erred in preventing the defendant from calling the informant to the stand to testify.

Etherton v. Rivard, 800 F.3d 737 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was convicted in state court of possessing cocaine in his vehicle. The prosecution introduced testimony from his co-defendant who was in the car with him, but that witness was significantly impeached. The other evidence (other than finding the cocaine in the vehicle) was a tip received by the police that the car was on the interstate and it had cocaine in it. This existence of the tip was introduced twice and the prosecutor referred to the tip in his closing argument. There was no objection to this evidence at trial and the issue was not raised on appeal. The tip was inadmissible evidence and violated the defendant’s rights under the Confrontation Clause. The Sixth Circuit granted habeas relief. The Supreme Court reversed: The federal court did not afford sufficient AEDPA deference to the conclusion of the state courts. The “tip” was not necessarily introduced for the truth of the matter asserted and trial counsel may have had a strategic reason not to object. 578 U.S. --- (2016).

United States v. Brooks, 772 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2014)

The prosecutor asked a DEA agent to tell the jury “in summary” what he was told by a postal supervisor. The fact that the agent summarized what he was told rather than reciting word-for-word what he was told did not alleviated the Confrontation Clause violation. The government’s alternative theory that the statements were not offered for the truth of the matter asserted was also rejected by the Ninth Circuit.

Blackston v. Rapelje, 780 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2014)

If the state introduces a prosecution witness’s prior sworn testimony at defendant’s trial, the defense is entitled to introduce evidence that the witness recanted that testimony. This is implicit in the right to confront one’s accusers. The prior sworn testimony in this case occurred at the defendant’s first trial. After that trial, two of the principal witnesses recanted. At the retrial, the two witnesses refused to testify and the state was permitted to read their testimony from the first trial. The defense was prohibited from impeaching their testimony with the recantations. This error required granting a writ of habeas corpus.

United States v. Jordan, 742 F.3d 276 (7th Cir. 2014)

Though the Confrontation Clause does not require that the government present non-hearsay evidence at a supervised release revocation hearing, the trial court must explicitly balance the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights with the government’s reasons for denying these rights. See Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972).

Ortiz v. Yates, 704 F.3d 1026 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defense sought to cross-examine the defendant’s wife regarding whether she was afraid to deviate from her initial statements accusing her husband of abuse because of threats the prosecutor’s investigator made towards her about changing her story (that is, the investigator had threatened to put her in prison for lying at the preliminary hearing if she did not stick to that version of events). The trial court prevented this line of questioning. This violated the defendant’s right of Confrontation.

United States v. Walker, 673 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2012)

The government offered considerable evidence about what an informant said, and did, without putting the informant on the stand. Undercover tapes in which the informant talked to the defendant and statements that the informant made to the officers were also introduced. The Seventh Circuit held that the Confrontation Clause was violated, but it was harmless error.

Sussman v. Jenkins, 636 F.3d 329 (7th Cir. 2011)

Trial counsel failed to provide pretrial notice of the intent to introduce evidence that the child molestation victim had made prior false allegations of sexual abuse against another man (his father). Trial counsel’s failure was ineffective assistance of counsel, because such evidence – prior false allegation evidence – was admissible and significant evidence relating to the child’s credibility and motive for fabricating allegations (i.e., to get attention, or for punishing people for not paying attention to him). This evidence was clearly admissible under the Confrontation Clause.

Adamson v. Cathel, 633 F.3d 248 (3rd Cir. 2011)

The defendant testified and explained that his confession was false and that he had been shown the statements of his alleged co-conspirators prior to making his confession and that is how he learned the facts that formed the basis for his confession. When the prosecutor cross-examined the defendant, he read to him significant portions of the co-conspirator’s statement (much of which was unrelated to the defendant’s own confession) that clearly implicated the defendant in the crimes. The trial court did not issue a limiting instruction to caution the jury not to consider the co-conspirator’s statement for the truth of the matter asserted. Informing the jury about the co-conspirator’s statement that implicated the defendant violated the defendant’s rights under the Confrontation Clause and required setting aside the conviction. See Tennessee v.
Street, 471 U.S. 409 (1985) (approving use of co-conspirator’s statement in this manner, but only with a limiting instruction).

Perkins v. Herbert, 596 F.3d 161 (2d Cir. 2010)

The state trial court concluded that the defendant procured a witness’s unavailability and therefore, the hearsay statement of the witness was admissible. The factual finding of the trial court, however, was not supported by sufficient evidence and the admission of the witness’s grand jury testimony violated the Confrontation Clause. Harmless error.

Earhart v. Konteh, 589 F.3d 337 (6th Cir. 2009)

Over objection of the defendant, the state utilized a deposition of one witness who had a prepaid vacation scheduled for the day of trial. There was no effort made by the state to secure the witness’s presence and no showing of necessity was made. Using the deposition violated the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Tirado-Tirado, 563 F.3d 117 (5th Cir. 2009)

The government insisted on using the videotaped deposition of a witness who was deported to Mexico after the deposition. The defendant argued that the witness was not “unavailable” because the government did not make good faith efforts to secure the attendance of the witness. The Fifth Circuit agreed. The court lists the various measures that the prosecution could have taken to assure, or at least improve the chances that, the witness would appear at trial. In the absence of a good faith effort on the part of the government to secure the attendance of the witness, using the deposition violated the Confrontation Clause. The fact that the defendant had the full opportunity to cross examine the witness at the deposition does not change the fact that the witness was not legally “unavailable for trial” because of the absence of good faith efforts to secure his appearance and, therefore, the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights were violated.

Taylor v. Cain, 545 F.3d 327 (5th Cir. 2008)

The state offered testimony from an investigating officer about the investigation he performed including the information provided to him by other witnesses to the murder that implicated the defendant as the perpetrator. This constituted inadmissible hearsay that violated the defendant’s right of Confrontation.

Fratta v. Quarterman, 536 F.3d 485 (5th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was tried in state court for hiring hitmen to kill his wife. The trial was conducted pre-Crawford. At trial, the statements of the hitmen, neither of whom testified, were admitted. To some extent the statements were redacted to eliminate the defendant’s name as the employer for the hit. Nevertheless, the statements still implicated the defendant. The Fifth Circuit held that the evidence violated the Confrontation Clause even as it was interpreted pre-Crawford.

Barbe v. McBride, 521 F.3d 443 (4th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was charged with child sexual assault. An expert testified that the victim exhibited signs of sexual abuse. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the defendant had been abused by other adults (and the child had made prior accusations about these prior assaults). Relying on the state rape shield statute, the trial court excluded the evidence. The Fourth Circuit granted the writ. Excluding evidence that would provide an alternative explanation for the expert’s findings violated the defendant’s right to confront the evidence against him. Pursuant to Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991), the trial court must make a case-by-case determination whether the state evidence rule trumps the Sixth Amendment. In this case, the state trial court invoked a per se ban on any evidence of prior sexual activity of the victim.

United States v. Becker, 502 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2007)
Prior to Crawford, the Second Circuit had held that a person’s plea allocution was sufficiently against the person’s penal interest that it would be admissible in another person’s trial. Pursuant to that rule, a co-conspirator’s statement at his plea was introduced against the defendant in this case to prove the existence of a conspiracy. Post-Crawford, this violated the Confrontation Clause and required that the defendant’s conviction be set aside. Same result was reached in United States v. Riggi, 541 F.3d 94 (2d Cir. 2008).

United States v. Hearn, 500 F.3d 479 (6th Cir. 2007)
Permitting the government to introduce considerable hearsay evidence to “explain the officer’s conduct” in keeping the defendant under surveillance, violated the rule against hearsay as well as the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Powers, 500 F.3d 500 (6th Cir. 2007)
The trial court erred when it permitted the prosecution to elicit evidence about what the confidential informant told the police. The evidence implicated the defendant was not necessary to provide background, or to explain the officers’ conduct. Harmless error.

Winzer v. Hall, 494 F.3d 1192 (9th Cir. 2007)
The defendant was alleged to have said to his wife and child that he was going to “smoke them” (kill them). They called the police and the police officer interviewed them and they confirmed that this happened. The wife did not testify at trial and the child, who did testify, did not remember the event. The police officer testified about the statements made to him by the two “victims.” Even though this trial was held pre-Crawford, the evidence was admitted in violation of the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights and the Ninth Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus. Because the statements were made to the police hours after the supposed threat, they did not qualify as “excited utterances.”

Vasquez v. Jones, 496 F.3d 564 (6th Cir. 2007)
The state trial court’s decision to bar the defense from introducing impeachment evidence relating to a hearsay declarant’s criminal record violated the Confrontation Clause. The right to offer evidence of a witness’s criminal record to demonstrate his lack of credibility is a core principle of the Confrontation Clause and applies with equal force to a “witness” who does not appear at trial but whose out-of-court statements are offered through a hearsay exception.

United States v. Thomas, 453 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2006)

403
Even post-Crawford, if the government seeks to introduce hearsay that does not qualify under a traditional hearsay exception, the test of Ohio v. Roberts must be satisfied, i.e., particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. Even though Crawford held that the Confrontation Clause only applied to testimonial statements, this did not mean that non-testimonial statements were exempt from Confrontation Clause analysis. This case involved a “non-testimonial” 911 call, that the court held satisfied the Ohio v. Roberts standard.

United States v. Larson, 460 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring defense counsel from cross-examining a cooperating witness about the mandatory minimum sentence he would face but for his cooperation. Harmless error. The en banc court reached the same conclusion, finding that excluding evidence about the mandatory minimum sentence was a Confrontation Clause violation, but was harmless. (August 1, 2007 decision).

Kittelson v. Dretke, 426 F.3d 306 (5th Cir. 2005)

At the defendant’s child molestation trial, the state was permitted to introduce evidence that suggested that another girl had alleged that the defendant molested her, as well. That girl, in fact, had made the allegation the same time as the victim (they were friends) but immediately recanted her allegation. Allowing the prosecutor to introduce the evidence (albeit by inference) and barring the defense from introducing the fact that the girl had, in fact, made the statement, but then recanted, denied the defendant his Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Bordeaux, 400 F.3d 548 (8th Cir. 2005)

After the child witness expressed fear of the defendant, the court allowed the witness to complete her testimony via two-way closed-circuit television. Though 18 U.S.C. § 3509(b)(1)(B)(i) permits this procedure in certain circumstances, the Eighth Circuit held that the Confrontation Clause was violated in this case. Pursuant to Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990), the court may employ closed-circuit television where there is a finding that the child is fearful of testifying in front of the defendant. It is not enough, however, if the child is simply fearful of testifying in a courtroom. If the fear is of the courtroom generally, the court may permit testimony in a more accommodating environment, but still in the presence of the defendant. To the extent that § 3509(b)(1)(B)(i) permits the use of closed-circuit television based on the child’s fear of the courtroom, it violates the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Yates, 438 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir. 2006)(en banc)

Two-way video-conferencing of a witness’s testimony does not satisfy the Confrontation Clause. The government used a two-way teleconference to obtain the testimony of an out-of-country witness. Though the witness could see the defendant and vice-versa, this was not adequate face-to-face confrontation.

Fischetti v. Johnson, 384 F.3d 140 (3rd Cir. 2004)

Defendant was tried twice in state court for a series of burglaries. At the second trial, some of the burglary witnesses’ testimony was presented through the transcript of their testimony at the first trial. However, there was no showing that those witnesses were unavailable.
to testify at the second trial. Admitting the prior testimony violated his Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Turning Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004)

After briefly questioning the child-victim, the court concluded that because the child was afraid of the defendant (her father) and also afraid of the prosecutor and the jury, the child would testify via closed-circuit television. The Eighth Circuit concluded that the court’s findings were not adequate to comply with the requirements of Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990). The trial court failed to find that the child’s fear was prompted by the father, as opposed to the courtroom, in general. In fact, the child testified at the hearing relating to her inability to testify in court and it was apparent that it was the jury, more than the defendant, that frightened her. See also Hoversten v. Iowa, 998 F.2d 614 (8th Cir. 1993).

Brown v. Keane, 355 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2004)

The state offered evidence that a 911 caller reported that two men were in front of a bar shooting. The state offered the tape under the “present sense impression” exception to the hearsay rule. The federal district court, on habeas review, concluded that it was not certain that the caller was actually witnessing the shooting; it was possible the caller had earlier seen the two men, and then heard shooting and assumed that the men were involved in the shooting. The lower court concluded, however, that the present sense impression exception to the hearsay rule was “firmly rooted” and therefore the evidence should be admitted, despite the fact that there was an absence of a particularized guarantee of trustworthiness. The Second Circuit reversed: First, the court concluded that the tape did not qualify as a present sense impression for the same reason that the lower court found a lack of trustworthiness – there was no proof that the caller was actually describing events that he was contemporaneously witnessing. The court also rejected the theory that the caller’s statement qualified as an “excited utterance.” Again, however, excitement without contemporaneous observation does not qualify under that hearsay exception.

Lewis v. Wilkinson, 307 F.3d 413 (6th Cir. 2002)

The Sixth Circuit held that the application of a state rape shield statute in this rape prosecution denied the defendant of his Sixth Amendment right of Confrontation. In the victim’s diary, there were various references to her other sexual conduct and the fact that she was apparently viewed by boys as a “nympho.” She wrote, “I’m just not strong enough to say no to them. I’m tired of being a whore. This is where it ends.” Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

United States v. Moses, 137 F.3d 894 (6th Cir. 1998)

The trial court violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights (and the Child Victims’ and Child Witnesses" Rights Act – 18 U.S.C. § 3509(b)(1)(B)) when it permitted a child witness to testify by closed circuit television. The Act provides that a closed circuit television may be used where there is a case-specific showing a child witness would suffer substantial fear or trauma and be unable to testify or communicate reasonably because of the physical presence of the defendant. The trial court’s findings in this case were insufficient to trigger the provisions of the Act. The witness, in fact, specifically stated that she was not afraid of the defendant. The testimony of a government expert—a social worker—on this subject was also insufficient.

_Crespin v. New Mexico_, 144 F.3d 641 (10th Cir. 1998)

Admitting the co-conspirator’s statement that implicated the defendant was erroneous. The state’s theory that the statement was “against the declarant’s penal interest” did not survive appellate habeas scrutiny. The Tenth Circuit held that the state courts failed to properly apply the “indicia of reliability” test. The court reiterated the “time-honored” principle that “a codefendant’s confession inculpating the accused is inherently unreliable.”

_Horton v. Zant_, 941 F.2d 1449 (11th Cir. 1991)

Under Georgia law, a co-conspirator declaration may be admissible during the “concealment phase” of the conspiracy—that is, after the offense has been completed, but before the culprits have been caught. The statement need not be in furtherance of the conspiracy. Here, a co-conspirator statement was admitted which fell within the expanded Georgia definition. The court holds that in this case, the hearsay statement violated the confrontation clause. The statement was exculpatory as to the declarant and was wholly declarative of a past event (i.e., the defendant killed the decedent). This statement did not have indicia of reliability. Though _Dutton v. Evans_, 400 U.S. 74 (1970), held the Georgia statute constitutional, that case dealt with a particular application—an out-of-court declaration which did have indicia of reliability. The statement in this case did not have such characteristics and admitting the statement was a confrontation clause violation. Furthermore, the error was not harmless.

_Gholston v. Jones_, 848 F.2d 1156 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant’s parole revocation was based solely on the unsworn violation report by a parole officer. This violated the parolee’s due process right to confront the witnesses against him.

_Brown v. Dugger_, 831 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987)

Two defendants were arrested and charged with murder. They were put in a room together with the police officer encouraging one to incriminate the other. At trial, the police officer testified that one of the defendants did, in fact, incriminate the other. This violated the defendant’s right to confront the witnesses and is inadmissible hearsay (a _Bruton_ violation). The murder sentence was vacated based on this Sixth Amendment violation.
CONFRONTATION CLAUSE

(Crawford v. Washington)

SEE ALSO: BRUTON

Overruling Ohio v. Roberts, in part, the Supreme Court held that the Confrontation Clause bars the use of out-of-court declarations that are “testimonial” in nature and which do not satisfy a standard “firmly rooted” hearsay exception. The Ohio v. Roberts “indicia of reliability” alternative basis for admitting out of court statements was jettisoned in this case. The Court did not set forth a precise definition of “testimonial” but held that statements made to law enforcement officers certainly fit the definition and therefore are excluded, regardless of the “indicia of reliability” of the statement. The same applies for prior sworn testimony that was not subject to cross-examination.

Crawford applies to crime lab technicians. Thus, a state law that allows the prosecution to introduce a crime lab report without bringing in the technician for cross-examination is unconstitutional.

A very complicated decision that appears to alter the landscape of the Bullcoming and Melendez-Diaz terrain. In this case, a DNA test established that the blood of the perpetrator had certain characteristics. Nobody from Cellmark testified. However, an expert was permitted to testify that the DNA results from Cellmark matched the DNA of the defendant. This was a bench trial, a fact stressed by Judge Alito in his plurality opinion. He concluded that the Cellmark test results were not actually introduced for the truth of the matter asserted. He also concluded that even if they were introduced for that purpose, it was not a Confrontation Clause violation. The fifth vote, by Justice Thomas, agreed that it was not a Confrontation Clause violation for an entirely different reason. Justice Breyer, who agreed with Justice Alito, stressed the fact that it was a bench trial. Four Justices concluded that this was a Confrontation Clause violation.

If a person makes a 911 call to report a crime – particularly an ongoing crime – and the purpose of the call is to seek immediate aid, the statement is not “testimonial” in the Crawford sense. But if a person tells the police facts about a past crime, that statement is “testimonial” in the Crawford sense. The focus of the inquiry is on the “primary purpose” of the interrogation. The Court noted that even in the 911-call situation, if the conversation evolves into a recitation of past facts, the trial court should redact the statement to ensure that any “testimonial” component of the statement is eliminated.

The police responded to a report that a man had been shot. When the police arrived, they asked him what happened. The victim said that he had been shot by “Rick” at “Rick’s house. Shortly thereafter the victim was taken to the hospital and died. The Supreme Court concluded that the victim’s statements to the police were not “testimonial” and were not barred by the Confrontation Clause. The existence of an “emergency” as that term was discussed in Davis v. Washington is not outcome-determinative on the question of whether a statement is testimonial. The ultimate question is whether the statement by the declarant was obtained or made for the purpose of subsequent use, or to deal with an immediate cause for concern. The type of weapon used, the location of the assault or shooting, the relationship between the victim and the assailant, the location of the assailant, are all factors that are relevant in deciding why the police asked the questions and why the declarant responded.

Bullcoming v. New Mexico, 131 S. Ct. 2705 (2011)

The Supreme Court decided that a surrogate crime lab technician may not be used to offer testimony about a drug test, or other chemical test that the surrogate did not participate in performing. Simply reciting what another analyst wrote, or reading the results from the machine that the surrogate did not have any role in preparing, violates the Confrontation Clause.

The child victim made a statement to a teacher about being molested by his mother’s boyfriend. The Supreme Court held that the statement to the teacher did not qualify as a “testimonial” statement covered by the Confrontation Clause. The child’s statements to the teacher were not made for the “primary purpose” of creating evidence for the prosecution of the perpetrator.

Lambert v. Warden Greene SCI, 861 F.3d 459 (3rd Cir. 2017)

The prosecution arguably relied on the statements of one defendant to a psychiatrist that qualified as testimonial statements to implicate the other defendant in the murder. Though the statement itself only implicated the declarant/defendant, the trial court should have instructed the jury that the statement could only be used against the declarant/defendant. Trial counsel’s failure to seek a limiting instruction was ineffective assistance of counsel, which required a remand to evaluate the appropriate relief.

Etherton v. Rivard, 800 F.3d 737 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was convicted in state court of possessing cocaine in his vehicle. The prosecution introduced testimony from his co-defendant who was in the car with him, but that witness was significantly impeached. The other evidence (other than finding the cocaine in the vehicle) was a tip received by the police that the car was on the interstate and it had cocaine in it. This existence of the tip was introduced twice and the prosecutor referred to the tip in his closing argument. There was no objection to this evidence at trial and the issue was not raised on appeal. The tip was inadmissible evidence and violated the defendant’s rights under the Confrontation Clause. The Sixth Circuit granted habeas relief. The Supreme Court reversed: The federal court did not afford sufficient ADEdPA deference to the conclusion of the state courts. The “tip” was not necessarily introduced for the truth of the matter asserted and trial counsel may have had a strategic reason not to object. 578 U.S. --- (2016).
United States v. Esparza, 791 F.3d 1067 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was arrested at the border, driving a car that had marijuana hidden in various compartments. He claimed that he had borrowed the car from a friend. At trial, the government introduced a Department of Motor Vehicles Form that was signed by the previous owner of the vehicle that declared that she had sold the car to the defendant six days prior to the arrest. The DMV form had been sent to the previous owner with an accompanying letter that explained that the car had been seized with drugs. The previous owner sent in the form, aware that there was a criminal investigation. The form, therefore, was testimonial. It was not a routine business record, though it was in the DMV files, because it was not created by an agency employee in the routine course of business and because of the criminal investigation, the previous owner had a motive to disassociate herself from the vehicle.

United States v. Brooks, 772 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2014)

A postal inspector was permitted to repeat what he was told by the supervisor about the identity of the person who was mailing certain parcels. The fact that the supervisor's statements were not repeated verbatim is irrelevant. The content of the supervisor’s identification testimony was introduced and the defendant was not able cross-examine the supervisor. “Out of court statements admitted at trial are statements for the purpose of the Confrontation Clause if, fairly read, they convey to the jury the substance of an out-of-court, testimonial statement of a witness who does not testify at trial.” The statements in this case were testimonial, because the supervisor knew his statements were being used to further an investigation and would be used to collect information necessary to make out a case against the suspect.

McCarley v. Kelly, 759 F.3d 535 (6th Cir. 2014)

A child’s statements to a child psychologist about the murder of the child’s mother were testimonial statements and allowing the psychologist to read these statements to the jury violated Crawford. The child was interviewed by the psychologist after the child was brought to the doctor by the police who were investigating the murder of the child’s mother. The Supreme Court granted cert and reversed and remanded for further consideration in light of Davis v. Ayala (2015). On remand, the Sixth Circuit again granted the writ, concluding that the child’s statements were admitted in violation of the Confrontation Clause. McCarley v. Kelly, 801 F.3d 652 (6th Cir. 2015).

United States v. Ferguson, 752 F.3d 613 (4th Cir. 2014)

At the defendant’s supervised release revocation hearing the government offered a laboratory analysis to prove that the substance possessed by the defendant was marijuana. Rule 32.1(b)(2)(C) permits hearsay evidence if the government offers good cause for not presenting first hand information (such as the unavailability of the witness). There was no showing of good cause in this case. Even a showing of reliability is not alone sufficient to establish good cause, though reliability of the evidence is also a component of good cause.

United States v. Duron-Caldera, 737 F.3d 988 (5th Cir. 2013)

The fact that an out of court declarant made a statement that was not “accusatory” does not mean that it was not “testimonial” or that it comes within the rule announced in Williams v.
Illinois. In this case, the out of court declaration was testimonial and was inadmissible under the Confrontation Clause. The statement was made by the defendant’s grandmother decades earlier in an affidavit that was prepared in connection with an investigation of the defendant’s parents’ immigration status. It was used in this case, which alleged that the defendant was guilty of illegal reentry.

United States v. James, 712 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2013)

If there is any uncertainty about the complexity or long-term effect of the decision in Williams v. Illinois, 132 S. Ct. 2221 (2012), this decision should dispel that thought. The Second Circuit concludes that there is no way to discern what is the holding subscribed to by a majority of the Justices and, furthermore, there is no way to determine with any degree of certainty, whether the holding requires the exclusion of testimony relating to an autopsy and toxicology report. The case is an excellent primer on the confusing nature of the Williams decision.

United States v. Cameron, 699 F.3d 621 (1st Cir. 2012)

A report from Yahoo! that implicated the defendant in the possession and trading of child pornography should not have been admitted at trial. The report qualified as testimonial evidence. The court held that these reports did not qualify as business records.

United States v. Bustamante, 687 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 2012)

In order to prove the defendant’s guilt of illegal reentry, the government introduced a document purporting to be a transcription of a birth certificate from the Phillipines. The Ninth Circuit held that this document was testimonial and introducing it at trial violated defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights. The document was not an actual birth certificate, but a document prepared by a Phillipine official in response to a request for this information by an American official. Thus, it was prepared for use at trial and it fell within the scope of the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Walker, 673 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2012)

The government offered considerable evidence about what an informant said, and did, without putting the informant on the stand. Undercover tapes in which the informant talked to the defendant and statements that the informant made to the officers were also introduced. The Seventh Circuit held that the Confrontation Clause was violated, but it was harmless error.

Peak v. Webb, 673 F.3d 465 (6th Cir. 2012)

The government played the confession of a co-conspirator who made himself available to testify if either party called him as a witness. Without deciding whether this procedure violated the Confrontation Clause, the Sixth Circuit held that under the AEDPA standard, it was not so clear that this violated the Constitution since the witness was available to be cross-examined.

United States v. Ignasiak, 667 F.3d 1217 (11th Cir. 2012)

The defendant, a doctor, was charged with over-prescribing pain medication resulting in the deaths of certain patients. Over a Confrontation Clause objection, the government was permitted to introduce autopsy reports through the testimony of a medical examiner who did not perform the autopsy. The Ignasiak court held that the autopsy reports qualified as “testimonial” evidence. The government argued that the reports were admissible under the business records exception to the hearsay rule. The Eleventh Circuit rejected this argument. The exceptions to the hearsay rules are not automatically exceptions to the Confrontation Clause. Of course, most business records are not “testimonial” in nature, because they are not prepared in anticipation of being used “prosecutorially.” Autopsy results, however, are prepared with this expectation. Thus, the Confrontation Clause applies and the reports should only have been admitted through the testimony of the person who actually performed the autopsy.

United States v. Ramos-Gonzalez, 664 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2011)

Utilizing an expert witness to testify about crime lab results (drug analysis) despite the fact that the expert was not present when the drug tests were performed, violates Bullcoming, even though the actual drug test results were not introduced in evidence. This is a pre-Williams v. Illinois decision and the First Circuit expressly noted that the decision in Williams (which had already bee argued, but not yet decided when this decision was reached), could impact the result in this case.

Merolillo v. Yates, 663 F.3d 444 (9th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with murder. He carjacked a vehicle and one of the occupants tried to escape, but was dragged along the payment for several hundred yards before breaking free. One month later she died from a ruptured aorta. The issue at trial was whether the defendant’s conduct caused her death. An autopsy pathologist testified at a preliminary hearing, but his testimony was somewhat equivocal, though he ultimately concluded that the carjacking was a contributing cause of death. At trial, the prosecution did not call that witness to the stand. Instead, the prosecutor called other experts, each of whom relied, to some extent, on the conclusions of the autopsy pathologist. This violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Moore, 651 F.3d 30 (D.C.Cir. 2011)

In this lengthy drug/murder/CCE trial, certain crime lab and autopsy evidence was offered that violated the rule announced in Bullcoming (a decision that was issued after oral argument in this case). The D.C. Circuit remanded certain counts of conviction to the trial court to evaluate whether admitting the evidence in violation of the Confrontation Clause was harmless error.

Ocampo v. Vail, 649 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2011)

A police officer testified that a witness – who was not available to testify, because he had returned to Mexico – corroborated the testimony of other witnesses that implicated the defendant’s presence at the shooting. Though the specifics of what the missing witness said was not revealed, the substance of his testimony was unmistakable and was not only introduced through the testimony of the officer, but was also relied on during the prosecutor’s closing argument as further proof of the defendant’s guilt. The Ninth Circuit ordered that the writ be granted.

United States v. Meises, 645 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2011)
A DEA agent was asked on direct examination whether he interviewed one of the drug conspirators who had been arrested. He responded that he did interview him. He was then asked if he did anything after that interview. He responded that he arrested the defendant. This violated the Confrontation Clause. Masking the hearsay by not asking specifically what was said by the conspirator did not avoid the error.

United States v. Smith, 640 F.3d 358 (D.C. Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. Just prior to trial, the prosecutor asked the clerk of the court where the defendant had his felony conviction to verify his record. The clerk sent a letter that verified the existence of a felony conviction. The letter was signed by the clerk and was “certified.” The court held that this violated the Confrontation Clause. The letter was testimonial – it was written for the express purpose of being used at defendant’s trial.

Jones v. Basinger, 635 F.3d 1030 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with murder. The key witness for the state testified that he participated in the home invasion with the defendant. That witness was vigorously cross-examined. The prosecution responded by calling the police officer who received a tip from an informant who provided considerable evidence against the defendant, as well as recited what he (the informant) had been told by one of the other participants in the murder. The state argued that this was offered to explain the police officers’ investigation and not for the truth of the matter asserted in the informant’s statement. The Seventh Circuit held that the evidence was not, in fact, offered for this purpose and was inadmissible hearsay that violated the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Causevic, 636 F.3d 998 (8th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was prosecuted for a § 1001 and § 1546 violation, relating to lying on an immigration form about whether he had ever killed anybody (he denied having ever killed anybody). In order to prove that this was a lie, the government introduced a Bosnian conviction for murder. The defense claimed that this violated his Confrontation Clause rights. The Eighth Circuit agreed. Though the judgment (proof of the conviction for murder) is admissible as a public record, the judgment was not admissible of proof of the facts underlying the conviction. In short, the judgment was admissible to prove that the defendant had been convicted of murder; but it was not admissible to prove that he had ever killed anybody. See also Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47 (1899).

United States v. Jackson, 636 F.3d 687 (5th Cir. 2010)

A DEA agent explained how and why drug traffickers keep drug ledgers. A co-conspirator’s drug ledgers that implicated the defendant were then introduced into evidence under the Business Records exception to the hearsay rule (the co-conspirator did not testify) and as a co-conspirator statement. The Fifth Circuit held that this was error. The agent’s testimony did not satisfactorily authenticate the records, or establish the necessary foundation that these records were kept in the regular course of business or that they were prepared during the course of the conspiracy. Though a person other than a record custodian may authenticate a business record, the witness must be able to authenticate this business record and not, as here, business records (or drug ledgers) in general. Admitting the ledgers constituted a violation of Confrontation Clause and required that the conviction be reversed. The Fifth Circuit further explained that the notebooks were inadmissible on Confrontation Clause grounds, because the government failed to prove that they were not testimonial. Because no effort was made to authenticate the notebooks (i.e., how or when they were written), the introduction of the notebooks became, in essence, the functional equivalent of the author testifying live in court. It is the government’s burden to prove that an out-of-court statement is non-testimonial.

United States v. Williams, 632 F.3d 129 (4th Cir. 2011)

The government asked the defense to stipulate to the drugs in this drug prosecution. The defense attorney agreed, but the defendant himself objected. The defense attorney told the judge that she would stipulate, over the objection of the defendant, if the court approved. The court approved. This violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights. Though a defense attorney may waive the Confrontation Clause rights of a defendant under usual circumstances, this waiver may not occur over the objection of the defendant.

United States v. Holmes, 620 F.3d 836 (8th Cir. 2010)

The issue in this case was whether the defendant lived at a house where drugs and guns were found during the execution of a search warrant. When cross-examining the police officer, the defense attorney asked whether a certain item of evidence was all there was linking the defendant to the house. On re-direct, the prosecutor asked the officer to read the search warrant affidavit at length, which included the statement of a C.I. who did not testify at trial and who linked the defendant to the house. The Eighth Circuit held that this was error on hearsay and Confrontation Clause grounds. The evidence was not offered to “explain the officer’s conduct” and the defense attorney’s cross-examination did not “open the door” to the rebuttal, or waive the defendant’s Confrontation Clause guarantee.

United States v. Gomez, 617 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2010)

The police arrested Rivas. The officer told Rivas to call the person who supplied him with all the ecstasy pills. Rivas called the defendant, Gomez. At trial, the government offered this evidence to support the charge that Gomez was the supplier for Rivas. Rivas did not testify at trial. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction, holding that this was hearsay evidence (by inference) that also amounted to a violation of the Confrontation Clause. Even a limiting instruction by the court to the jury cautioning the jury not to consider the evidence for the truth of the matter asserted was not sufficient to cure the error. See also Ryan v. Miller, 303 F.3d 231 (2d Cir. 2002).

United States v. Smalls, 605 F.3d 765 (10th Cir. 2010)

This case contains a thorough review of the impact that Crawford had on Ohio v. Roberts and explains the current Confrontation Clause jurisprudence. The court explained that Ohio v. Roberts was wrong for two reasons, according to Crawford. First, with regard to non-testimonial hearsay, the Confrontation Clause provides no prohibition. If the out-of-court statement is not testimonial, then only the traditional hearsay rules apply, not the Confrontation Clause. On the other hand, if the out-of-court statement is testimonial, then the statement is automatically excluded, regardless of how reliable it is. Thus, Ohio v. Roberts excluded some testimony that should have been admissible (at least under Constitutional standards) and permitted the introduction of other evidence that should have been excluded without regard to reliability.

Jones v. Cain, 600 F.3d 527 (5th Cir. 2010)

A witness to a murder provided recorded statements to the police prior to his death from unrelated causes. He also testified at a suppression hearing prior to this death. His testimony at the suppression hearing was admissible, because it was prior sworn testimony. His statements to the police, however, were not admissible. The state argued that the statements to the police were not offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but this was clearly belied by the record. The statements were not merely used to “shore up the witness’s credibility” or to “explain the investigators’ conduct.”

United States v. Martinez-Rios, 595 F.3d 581 (5th Cir. 2010)

A “certificate of the non-existence of a record” is a testimonial statement that is covered by Crawford. In this case, the government introduced a certificate that established that the defendant’s alien file revealed no documents that allowed him to re-enter the country.

Jensen v. Romanowski, 590 F.3d 373 (6th Cir. 2009)

During the defendant’s state trial, an officer testified about what a prior victim told him about the defendant’s sexual assault. There was no basis for admitting this hearsay evidence and this violation of the Confrontation Clause necessitated granting a writ of habeas corpus.

Bobadilla v. Carlson, 575 F.3d 785 (8th Cir. 2009)

A child’s statement to a clinical social worker who has been asked to conduct a forensic interview in connection with a child abuse investigation is “testimonial” under Crawford. In this case, the child’s statement to the social worker was admitted at trial and the child was deemed incompetent to testify live at trial. The Eighth Circuit held that this violated the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Tuyet Thi-Bach Nguyen, 565 F.3d 668 (9th Cir. 2009)

Allowing an officer to testify about the statement of a co-defendant and then allowing the co-defendant’s counsel to cross-examine the agent eliciting further details about the co-defendant’s statement was reversible error as to the defendant. The Ninth Circuit states, during the course of the opinion, that admitting the co-defendant’s statement was a Crawford Confrontation Clause violation and whether or not the statement implicated the defendant only related to the harmless/harmful nature of the error.

United States v. Lee, 549 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 2008)

The government conceded that introducing the out-of-court statement of a conspirator that implicated the defendants in the murder for hire was error. The Second Circuit concluded that the error was not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt and reversed the defendants’ convictions.

United States v. Mejia, 545 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2008)
The government offered the testimony of an expert in this gang case. The expert testimony about the structure of the gang, its history and various other matters that was admissible because (1) the testimony was not based on any data or information that was the proper subject of expert testimony; (2) the testimony included the expert’s lay opinion, rather than expert opinion; (3) the expert simply repeated some things he was told by co-conspirators and was therefore testimonial hearsay in violation of Crawford. Reversible error.

United States v. McGee, 529 F.3d 691 (6th Cir. 2008)

The statements of a confidential informant to a police officer providing information about the defendant qualify as testimonial and, in this case, the officer should not have been permitted to testify about what the informant told him, even as “background” or to “explain the officer’s conduct.” Harmless error.

United States v. Harwick, 523 F.3d 94 (2d Cir. 2008)

Introducing the co-conspirators plea colloquy was plain error in light of Crawford.

United States v. Alvarado-Valdez, 521 F.3d 337 (7th Cir. 2008)

The defendant’s co-conspirator fled to Mexico prior to trial. Before fleeing, however, the co-conspirator made a lengthy statement to the police, outlining the defendant’s role in the conspiracy. The trial was held pre-Crawford and the trial court held that the statements had sufficient indicia of reliability. Post-Crawford, the Seventh Circuit held that this was reversible error. The government’s effort to establish harmless error under the Chapman v. California standard was rejected.

United States v. Maher, 454 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2006)

The fact that the government offers an informant’s statements to the police “to explain the officer’s conduct” does not eliminate a Confrontation Clause problem. If the point of the inquiry is simply to explain what the officer did, then the officer should simply be asked, “Based on information received did you . . . .” Because the defense did not object in this case, however, the error was only reviewed for plain error and was not sufficiently prejudicial to require setting aside the judgment.

United States v. Santos, 449 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2006)

The trial court redacted portions of a co-defendant’s post-arrest statement and removed references to the defendants and instructed the jury not to consider the statement as evidence of the defendants’ participation in the conspiracy. However, the statement that was included revealed that the intention of the conspirators was to rob through the use of force. This was a contested element of the Hobbs Act prosecution and admitting this portion of the statement violated the remaining defendants’ confrontation clause rights.

An out of court statement qualifies as “testimonial” if statement was made under circumstances that would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial. The defendant’s statement to the police identifying the perpetrator was a testimonial statement. Harmless error.
United States v. Pugh, 405 F.3d 390 (6th Cir. 2005)

Introducing the out-of-court identification statement of a witness that fingered the defendants as the bank robbery (based on the declarant’s viewing of a surveillance tape) violated Crawford. The statement was given by the declarant to a police investigator (thus it was “testimonial”) and the statement was offered for the truth of the matter asserted – not, as the government suggested, merely to explain the officer’s conduct.

Murillo v. Frank, 402 F.3d 786 (7th Cir. 2005)

The state trial court erroneously admitted the statement of a witness who made a custodial statement implicating the defendant shortly after the murder. The witness refused to testify at trial, even with a grant of immunity. This evidence would clearly be barred under Crawford, but Crawford does not apply retroactively. Nevertheless, this evidence was also inadmissible under Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 119 S.Ct. 1887 (1999).

United States v. Bordeaux, 400 F.3d 548 (8th Cir. 2005)

A child’s statement to a social worker who was investigating charges of child molestation was “testimonial” and introducing these statements violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights. Significantly, the child’s testimony at trial was partially conducted via closed-circuit television, thus the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights were not protected by the child’s in-court appearance. The court also reversed the conviction based on the use of the closed-circuit television (see annotation in previous section).

United States v. Summers, 414 F.3d 1287 (10th Cir. 2005)

Attempting to provide answers that were side-stepped by Crawford, the Tenth Circuit holds that statements that qualify as “testimonial” reflect the objective intention of the declarant. Thus, the question is whether “a reasonable person would objectively foresee that his statement might be used in the investigation or prosecution of a crime.” In this case, a bank robber, when apprehended by the police, asked, “How did you guys find us so fast?” This was a testimonial statement and introducing the statement against the defendant violated his confrontation clause rights. Harmless error.

Dorothy v. Jones, 398 F.3d 783 (6th Cir. 2005)

At Dorothy’s trial, the state was permitted to introduce the testimony of a witness who could not be located that was given at a co-defendant’s earlier trial. Evaluating the Confrontation Clause issue under Ohio v. Roberts (this case was tried prior to Crawford), the Sixth Circuit held that the state court’s decision was clearly contrary to the law even under Ohio v. Roberts. There were no particularized guarantees of trustworthiness, and the fact that the witness was cross-examined by a co-conspirator’s counsel was factually erroneous, because the defense in the earlier trial was clearly not the same as the defense in this case.

United States v. Gilbert, 391 F.3d 882 (7th Cir. 2004)

When the defendant’s spouse refused to testify at trial, relying on the marital privilege, the trial court allowed the government to play her previous statement, because the court found that it had circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness. Post-Crawford, this was erroneous.
United States v. Rodriguez-Marrero, 390 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004)

The government offered the testimony of a witness who recited what a cooperating witness had told him. The government argued that the cooperating witness’ death (he was murdered) rendered the evidence admissible, because the statements were reliable and because the defendant “acquiesced” in his murder, though he was not directly responsible for the murder. The First Circuit held that Crawford v. Washington barred this evidence on Confrontation Clause grounds, and that Rule 804(b)(6) did not apply, because the lower court made no findings that would support the conclusion that the defendant was responsible (in the conspiratorial sense) for the murder of the witness, as opposed to simply being aware of the order from others that the witness was to be killed.

United States v. Cromer, 389 F.3d 662 (6th Cir. 2004)

During the defendant’s cross-examination of a police officer, he asked questions about a CI’s description that linked him to drug dealing. On re-direct, the government was permitted to pursue this line of questioning by asking about the specific statements made to the police by the CI. The trial court admitted the hearsay on the basis that the defendant “opened the door.” The Sixth Circuit disagreed. While as a matter of evidence law, the defendant may have opened the door, as a matter of constitutional law, he did not forfeit his rights under the Confrontation Clause. The admission of the CI’s statement to the police was a clear violation of Crawford. The cross-examination of the police officer amounted to foolish trial strategy, not misconduct that would forfeit the Confrontation Clause rights. Moreover, the government elicited other hearsay from the officer when he was asked about the basis for obtaining a search warrant.

United States v. Bruno, 383 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2004)

The trial court committed plain error in permitting the government to introduce the plea allocution of one co-conspirator and the grand jury testimony of another. These statements were “testimonial” under the Crawford definition. The inadmissible evidence was critical evidence with regard to certain counts of the indictment and reversal on those counts was therefore required.

United States v. Wilmore, 381 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2004)

The government’s introduction into evidence of a witness’s grand jury testimony, coupled with the lower court’s restriction of defendant’s cross-examination of that government witness amounted to a violation of defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights and necessitated reversal of the conviction. The witness had testified at the grand jury that she had seen the defendant (charged with being a felon in possession of a gun) in possession of a gun. At trial, she was called as a witness for the government and denied seeing the defendant in possession of the weapon. The government introduced relevant portions of the grand jury testimony and when the witness was confronted by the government with her previous grand jury testimony, she ultimately invoked her Fifth Amendment rights. The judge then instructed defense counsel to avoid asking any questions that would lead to further invocations of the Fifth Amendment. This was erroneous. Because the grand jury testimony was actually introduced in evidence by the government, the defendant could not be limited in his cross-examination of the witness regarding the circumstances of that testimony. More importantly, the introduction of the grand jury testimony testimony amounted to testimony that was not subject to cross-examination, which violated Crawford v. Washington, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (2004).

United States v. McClain, 377 F.3d 219 (2d Cir. 2004)
Relying on Crawford, the Second Circuit held that the admission of co-conspirators’ plea allocutions was error, but harmless. See also United States v. Al-Sadawi, 432 F.3d 419 (2d Cir. 2005) (same)

United States v. Jones, 371 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2004)
The defendant’s co-codefendant confessed to the crime with which he was charged, but then became a fugitive prior to trial. The government offered the co-conspirator’s confession at trial, though all references to the defendant were redacted. The Seventh Circuit held that the statement should not have been admitted. First, because the declarant was not at trial, the statement obviously could only be used against the defendant, thus, redacting the defendant’s name did not satisfy the Bruton concerns. Second, according to Crawford v. Washington, this statement could not be admitted without violating the defendant’s right of confrontation.
CONSPIRACY

(Drug Cases – Insufficient Evidence)

SEE ALSO: CONSPIRACY (Drug Cases -- Buyer-Seller Cases)

United States v. Louis, 861 F.3d 1330 (11th Cir. 2017)

The police received a tip that a ship was smuggling drugs into the country. The police set up surveillance of the ship and at one point, boxes were removed from the ship and placed on the dock. Later, the boxes were placed in a car and the defendant was watched driving the car away from the dock. The police stopped the car and the defendant tried to flee. The boxes contained cocaine. The Eleventh Circuit holds that this evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was involved in a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute the cocaine. There was insufficient proof that he knew what was in the boxes and even his flight did not establish his specific intent to possess with intent to distribute cocaine.

United States v. Loveland, --- F.3d --- (9th Cir. 2016)

Another buyer-seller decision that dooms a drug conspiracy conviction. Even if the amount of drugs sold is more than the buyer could consume, this does not mean that the seller and buyer had a conspiratorial relationship to sell the drugs. Absent such proof, a conviction for conspiracy could not be sustained.

United States v. Lomax, 816 F.3d 468 (7th Cir. 2016)

The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the principle that a buyer-seller relationship is not necessarily sufficient to prove the existence of a conspiracy, required reversing the conviction in this case. Though the defendant was buying the drugs to resell, that was not a basis for denying his request for a buyer-seller instruction.

United States v. Blue, 808 F.3d 226 (4th Cir. 2015)

The evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of constructive possession of heroin, or of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute at least 100 grams of heroin. The defendant was observed selling heroin to an informant. Later, he was observed going into an apartment. At a later time, the police obtained a search warrant for that apartment, found two people inside, as well as over 100 grams of heroin. Though the defendant had a key to that apartment, the evidence was not sufficient to show that he used the apartment as a stash house or that he had any connection to the 100 grams that were found in that apartment. The court held that this evidence was insufficient to convict him of constructive possession or conspiracy. The government’s invitation to remand for entry of a judgment of conspiring to possess less than 100 grams based on the other transation was rejected by the Fourth Circuit.

United States v. Cruse, 805 F.3d 795 (7th Cir. 2015)

The Seventh Circuit once again reverses a conviction because of the trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the principle that a buyer-seller relationship is not, alone, sufficient to prove a conspiracy. In this case, there was considerable evidence of sales to and from the defendant and even an occasional credit sale, but this evidence did not necessarily refute the defendant’s defense that he was simply involved in buyer-seller relationships with the other parties.

United States v. Santos-Soto, 799 F.3d 49 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant, a police officer was involved in a conspiracy to deprive certain people of their civil rights. However, there was insufficient evidence to support her conviction for knowingly joining a conspiracy to distribute controlled substance. “It is hard to imagine how someone furnishing a peripheral service to a drug conspiracy could be deemed to join that conspiracy unless he knew both that the drug conspiracy existed and that the peripheral service being furnished was designed to foster the conspiracy.”

United States v. Randolph, 794 F.3d 602 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy with various members of his family. On the verdict form, the jury was asked to first mark whether the defendant was “guilty” or “not guilty” of the conspiracy charge and then, “If you unanimously find that a particular controlled substance was not involved in the offense [i.e., cocaine, crack cocaine, marijuana], mark ‘none’ on the appropriate special verdict form.” The jury returned a verdict of guilty against Randolph, but marked “none” beside each of the three drugs. The Sixth Circuit held that this amounted to an acquittal, because the jury had to find that the conspiracy had as its object at least one of the drugs. This is not a case in which there are inconsistent verdicts (which generally do not require a reversal). This was one count of the indictment for which the jury apparently found insufficient evidence with regard to one of the elements of the offense.

United States v. Burgos, 703 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2012)

The defendant was a police officer. The government alleged that he was aware that a car repair shop on his “beat,” where his brother-in-law had worked as a mechanic, was a drug dealing location. The defendant also used the repair shop for his own vehicles. The defendant also became aware that the Vice Squad was surveilling the location. The defendant told the owner that his repair shop was “hot.” The First Circuit held that this evidence was insufficient to support the defendant’s conviction of being a member of a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute drugs.

United States v. LaPointe, 690 F.3d 434 (6th Cir. 2012)

Defendant was charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute oxycodone. He requested an instruction on the lesser included offense of conspiracy to possess oxycodone (a conspiracy). The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury as requested. First, the court held that the fact that the indictment alleged that the defendants conspired to distribute and to possess with intent to distribute did not mean that a conspiracy to possess was a lesser included offense because it is not a lesser offense of the conspiracy to distribute. (An indictment frequently charges in the conjunctive, but a jury can convict of either of the methods). Second, the fact that all conspirators did not share the limited conspiracy to simply possess the drugs did no mean that the defendant did not have that limited agreement with others.

United States v. Gaskins, 690 F.3d 569 (D. C. Cir. 2012)
The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was a member of the large drug conspiracy that was prosecuted in this case. Virtually no evidence linked him to any drugs, any drug transactions or conversations about drugs involving the conspirators. One drug sale that was proven had no relationship to the charged conspiracy. The fact that the defendant purchased plane tickets for other conspirators did no link him to the conspiracy because no evidence established that he knew the purpose of the co-conspirators’ travels.

United States v. Silva, 620 F.3d 630 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was instrumental in procuring a van that was later used to transport marijuana and was also observed engaging in activity that appeared to be counter-surveillance. This evidence, alone, did not suffice to support a conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. The defendant was not present when the van was loaded. The defendant was clearly in a scheme, but the evidence did not show that he knew the scheme involved the distribution of marijuana. For the same reason, the defendant could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the marijuana.

United States v. Torres, 604 F.3d 58 (2d Cir. 2010)

The evidence was insufficient to support the defendant’s conviction for being a member of a drug conspiracy. The case involved the aborted delivery of two large packages from Puerto Rico to the defendant at a location in New York. UPS attempted to deliver the packages, but the defendant’s identification, though listing his name correctly, failed to show that he resided at that address. UPS refused to deliver the packages to him. Later, UPS brought the packages back to the office and opened them discovering that cocaine was hidden in the packages. The defendant was called to the UPS store and was given the packages, after which he was arrested. This evidence failed to show that he was a knowing member of a narcotics conspiracy. There was no additional evidence that he knew what was concealed in the packages, or that he was being paid to participate in the distribution of cocaine.

United States v. Caldwell, 589 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was asked by another drug dealer for a recommendation of another drug source. The defendant introduced him to his supplier. The defendant was present at the first meeting, but had no further dealings between the other two and received no money, commissions or other benefit from the others’ dealings. This did not make the defendant a member of a three-person drug distribution conspiracy. The mere introduction of a common supplier, made by one drug dealer to another, is not sufficient to create a single conspiracy among all the dealers. Having concluded that there was a variance, the Tenth Circuit then concluded that the variance was not prejudicial and affirmed the conviction.

United States v. Tran, 568 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was in a car that exited a warehouse that had been used as a drug distribution site. The defendant was a passenger and the marijuana was in the trunk. There was insufficient evidence establishing that the defendant possessed the marijuana with intent to distribute it, or that he conspired to do so. The Rule 404(b) evidence may have established that he had knowledge of the marijuana (the limited purpose for which the evidence was admitted), but it did not establish that he constructively or actually possessed the marijuana — or aided and... abetted the possession of the marijuana – or that he conspired to do so. See also United States v. Sanchez-Mata, 925 F.2d 1166 (9th Cir. 1991) and United States v. Estrada-Macias, 218 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2000).

United States v. Paret-Ruiz, 567 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2009)

Though there was considerable evidence that the defendant had conversations with other individuals about possible cocaine loads, the only “agreement” he had to import drugs was with an undercover agent. There was insufficient evidence that the conversations with others matured into an agreement to commit the drug offenses.

United States v. Boidi, 568 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 2009)

A conspiracy to possess drugs is a lesser included offense of a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute. The government acknowledged that possession is a lesser included offense of possession with intent to distribute; but argued that this logic does not apply to conspiracy offenses. The First Circuit rejected this argument, but held that in order to insist on such an instruction, the defendant must show that, on the evidence presented, it would be rational for the jury to convict only on the lesser included offense and not the greater one. Failure to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense in this case was error. This case also includes a useful discussion of the “buyer-seller” doctrine that provides that a buyer-seller agreement is not, ipso facto a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute.

United States v. Ogando, 547 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2008)

The defendant, a hired cab driver, was at the airport waiting to transport a drug smuggler to the smuggler’s intended destination. The smuggler had already been arrested and was wearing a wire. The cab driver, who acknowledged being called earlier and told to meet the person at the airport, was not shown to be a member of the conspiracy and his conviction was reversed by the Second Circuit. The fact that the defendant made certain false statements to the police at the time of his arrest is not sufficient to support the verdict. Though such evidence is admissible and probative, it is not unreasonable to assume that anybody who is arrested might tend to falsify information that looks incriminating, while still being innocent of the charged offense.

United States v. Lorenzo, 534 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2008)

Though there was ample evidence that there was a drug smuggling conspiracy and that the two defendants engaged in activity that furthered the conspiracy, there was insufficient proof that the defendants knew that what they were doing was in furtherance of a drug conspiracy. Both defendants participated in ferrying a smuggler from the airport to a hotel and one defendant even delivered money to the smuggler, but no evidence demonstrated that either defendant saw drugs, talked about drugs, or was informed by a knowing participant that they were involved in cocaine smuggling. One defendant’s false exculpatory statement about his activities does demonstrate a consciousness of guilt, it did not show that the defendant was aware that he was involved in a cocaine smuggling conspiracy.

United States v. Garcia, 497 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 2007)
With regard to certain counts, the evidence was not sufficient to prove that the defendant could be held responsible for conduct of other conspirators under a Pinkerton theory, because he was not shown to have been a member of the conspiracy at that time.

United States v. Lopez-Vanegas, 493 F.3d 1305 (11th Cir. 2007)

Though the courts have applied the drug laws extraterritorially, there are limits. In this case, the defendants, while in Florida, discussed transporting cocaine from Colombia to France for distribution throughout Europe. There was no intention that the drugs ever come to (or through) the United States. The Eleventh Circuit held that the defendants could not be convicted in the United States of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. See also United States v. Benbow, 539 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2008) (holding that in a case somewhat similar to Lopez-Vanegas, it was reversible error to fail to instruct the jury that the government was required to prove that the defendant conspired to either possess, or to distribute drugs in the United States).

United States v. Esquivel-Ortega, 484 F.3d 1221 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was a passenger in a van that was found to be smuggling a large quantity of drugs. The evidence was insufficient to convict of possessing the drugs with intent to distribute, or with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute. Mere presence in the van is not sufficient to convict the defendant of possession or conspiracy.

United States v. Radomski, 473 F.3d 728 (7th Cir 2007)

The defendant and his colleague certainly conspired to do something, and while it is possible that the something was to sell drugs, it was equally likely that they actually conspired to rip off the potential purchaser. Given this state of the record, a conspiracy conviction for conspiring to sell drugs could not be sustained.

United States v. Korey, 472 F.3d 89 (3rd Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with using a firearm during and in relation to a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. A correct instruction on the law of conspiracy to distribute cocaine was required. The evidence established that the defendant was asked by a cocaine dealer to kill someone, in exchange for which the dealer would pay the defendant with cocaine. The district court judge instructed the jury that if they found that the defendant agreed to accept cocaine in payment for killing the victim, that is a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. This was erroneous. This instruction failed to explain correctly that a conspiracy to distribute cocaine requires proof of a “unity of purpose” between the conspirators to distribute cocaine and this instruction did not include that concept. Merely accepting payment in the form of cocaine is not the same as sharing a purpose with the dealer to distribute cocaine. Reversible error.

United States v. Arbane, 446 F.3d 1223 (11th Cir. 2006)

The government failed to prove that there were any co-conspirators (other than a government informant) in defendant’s importation offense, thus, a conspiracy conviction could not be sustained. Though there was some evidence of at least one other person’s awareness of the defendant’s plan and that the other person helped store drugs in a foreign county, the evidence was insufficient to prove that the other person conspired to import the drugs. The government is obligated to prove that the defendant and the other person shared the same object in order to find the existence of a conspiracy. If the other person only conspired to possess the drugs, or conspired to distribute the drugs in South America, this would not be sufficient.

United States v. Mendoza-Larios, 416 F.3d 872 (8th Cir. 2005)

Two defendants, driving a car owned by another person, were found guilty of possessing cocaine that was hidden in a welded compartment under the air bag compartment. The Eighth Circuit holds that the evidence was insufficient to convict either defendant. There was no proof that either defendant had knowledge of the drugs that were concealed in the car.

United States v. Dunmire, 403 F.3d 722 (10th Cir. 2005)

Post-Apprendi, the government is required to prove to the jury that a certain threshold quantity of drugs is involved in an offense. In this case, for example, the government was required to prove that the defendant conspired to distribute at least fifty grams (or, as a lesser included offense, five grams) of crack cocaine. The evidence established that she actually distributed 2.97 grams, but the government argued that the surrounding circumstances established a conspiracy to distribute more. The Tenth Circuit rejected this argument, holding that there was insufficient evidence that the defendant conspired to distribute the quantity that would trigger the higher sentence.

United States v. Jones, 393 F.3d 107 (2d Cir. 2004)

The evidence was insufficient to support the defendants’ possession with intent, and conspiracy to possess with intent, convictions. Though the two defendants were located in a house from which drugs were distributed, there was no evidence linking them to the activity.

United States v. Cruz, 363 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant was “hired” by a drug dealer to assault some men, but later the task was changed to “watch my back [while I finish] a deal.” This evidence was not sufficient to support a conviction of the “back-watcher” for possession with intent to distribute. While the defendant may have known that some type of crime was in progress, there was insufficient proof that he knew that it was a drug deal. See also United States v. Rodriguez, 392 F.3d 539 (2d Cir. 2004) (in same case, another defendant’s conspiracy conviction was likewise insufficiently proven).

United States v. Garcia-Torres, 280 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002)

Though the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant participated in a kidnapping and murder, there was insufficient proof that he was aware that the crimes were designed to further (or were in any way related to) his colleagues’ drug enterprise. He could not be convicted of conspiracy of possession with intent to distribute cocaine.

United States v. Cartwright, 359 F.3d 281 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was a knowing “lookout” for a drug transaction (as opposed to some other offense) and therefore his convictions for being a member of a drug conspiracy and for aiding and abetting the drug offense were reversed on sufficiency grounds. The government failed to prove that the defendant knew specifically that the illegal activity in which he was participating involved drugs rather than some other form of contraband. The court notes several other Third Circuit cases that have overturned drug conspiracy and aiding and abetting convictions because of the absence of evidence that the defendant agreed to participate in the specific crime alleged in the indictment. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Gore, 154 F.3d 34 (2d Cir. 1998)
Proof of the existence of a buyer-seller relationship, without more, is not sufficient to prove the existence of a conspiracy. The § 846 conviction in this case was reversed.

United States v. Mercer, 165 F.3d 1331 (11th Cir. 1999)
A co-defendant was approached by an informant about buying drugs. The co-defendant referred the informant to the defendant, but refused to personally make an introduction, or to call the defendant. This did not sufficiently establish the existence of a conspiracy between the defendant and the co-defendant. Additional evidence that the defendant sold cocaine to undercover officers did not establish a conspiracy, because the person from whom the defendant was buying the drugs (to then sell to the undercover agent) was not shown to have been in a conspiratorial relationship with the defendant (as opposed to simply being his supplier). The government’s additional theory (all cocaine comes from South America, and therefore the distribution of cocaine is part of a conspiracy) was rejected by the Eleventh Circuit, as well.

United States v. Toler, 144 F.3d 1423 (11th Cir. 1998)
The evidence against one of the indicted conspirators was insufficient. The only evidence at trial was that the defendant allowed a former boyfriend to use her apartment (she had moved to her mother’s apartment) for a brief period of time. She did not consent to his use of the apartment to deal, or store drugs. After the drug dealer over-stayed his welcome, the defendant changed the locks on the apartment and appropriated some drugs he left behind to reimburse her for utility expenses. The Eleventh Circuit held that this evidence was insufficient. The court also explained that the “slight evidence” rule did not refer to the quantum of evidence needed to support a conviction (only proof beyond a reasonable doubt will suffice), but refers to the extent of the defendant’s participation in the conspiracy that the government must prove.

United States v. Jensen, 141 F.3d 830 (8th Cir. 1998)
Witnesses identified Jensen as their methamphetamine supplier. Witnesses testified that occasionally they bought drugs from Jensen and re-sold them. This evidence was not sufficient to support a conspiracy conviction. The evidence only established a series of buyer-seller relationships.

United States v. Thomas, 150 F.3d 743 (7th Cir. 1998) and 284 F.3d 746 (7th Cir. 2002).
The defendant indisputably sold crack cocaine to an informant. Two sales of drugs (plus a prior sale of bogus drugs) occurred during the course of one week. There was no evidence that the defendant had any stake in the informant’s subsequent sales. The Seventh Circuit held that the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that a mere buyer-seller relationship does not suffice to convict the seller for being in a conspiracy with the buyer. An agreement (the essence of a conspiracy) is not the equivalent of repeated transactions, though the latter may be evidence of the former. The defendant requested an instruction to this effect, but failed to object. Nevertheless, it was plain error to fail to instruct the jury on this principle. Upon retrial, moreover, the evidence was insufficient to establish the existence of a conspiracy. United States v. Thomas, 284 F.3d 746 (7th Cir. 2002). The government’s evidence established that the defendant sold cocaine to another person and through the other person, to his customers. This evidence did not establish that the defendant “conspired” with the other people. This only demonstrated a buyer-seller relationship. Even if the seller knows that the buyer is re-selling the drugs, this does not prove that there is a conspiracy.

United States v. Idowu, 157 F.3d 265 (3rd Cir. 1998)
The government failed to prove that the defendant was aware of the specific unlawful object of the conspiracy. Though the government satisfactorily proved that the defendant was a knowing participant in some form of unlawful activity involving contraband, there was insufficient proof that he was aware that the co-conspirator was involved in a drug transaction. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Meyer, 157 F.3d 1067 (7th Cir. 1998)
The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that a conspiracy could not be proven with proof of only a buyer-seller relationship. The defendant purchased drugs from his co-defendants, sometimes for cash, sometimes on credit. Though there was considerable evidence that the defendant was also involved in various aspects of the drug dealing enterprise (constructing false fuel tanks, transporting drugs, acting as a “lieutenant”), there was also evidence that he was simply one of many customers of the principal distributors. The jury should have been instructed on the law regarding a “buyer-seller” relationship.

United States v. Morillo, 158 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 1998)
The evidence failed to support defendant’s drug conspiracy conviction. The government theorized that the defendant’s apartment in Puerto Rico was used by various mules as the operational center for drug storing and packaging. Though the defendant had previously lived in the apartment and paid rent there, he was not shown to have been involved in any drug dealing, nor was there evidence that he participated in any of the storing or packaging of the drugs.

United States v. Valerio, 48 F.3d 58 (1st Cir. 1995)
The police searched an apartment known to have been occupied by a co-defendant. Drugs were found in the apartment, as well as a gun. The defendant was also in the apartment. Rent receipts were found in the defendant’s name, but the co-defendant testified that the defendant rarely stayed there. The landlord also testified that he had never seen the defendant there before, though rent receipts were made out in her name. Though the government need not exclude every reasonable hypothesis of innocence in order to sustain the conviction, the court is loath to stack inference upon inference in order to uphold the jury’s verdict. There was no evidence that the defendant participated in, or helped facilitate, the distribution of drugs. There was no proof that she intended the drugs found in the apartment to be distributed. Thus, the only theory relied on by the government was the inference that, from the quantity of drugs found, it could be inferred that she was part of a conspiracy to distribute drugs. But the government failed to establish that this defendant was even aware of the bulk of the cocaine secreted in the apartment.

United States v. Ocampo, 964 F.2d 80 (1st Cir. 1992)

The evidence failed to establish the defendant’s participation in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. Though defendant shared a townhouse with another conspirator and probably knew about the cocaine sales, there was insufficient evidence to show that she had agreed to participate in the transaction. A conspiracy cannot be established by piling inferences upon inferences.

United States v. Aponte-Suarez, 905 F.2d 483 (1st Cir. 1990)

The evidence failed to support a conspiracy conviction for one of the defendants. This defendant had been asked by other conspirators for the use of his airstrip. He refused. Later, however, he introduced one conspirator to another, but did not participate in any subsequent efforts toward the successful completion of any drug importation venture. Although the defendant was aware that the drug importation scheme was taking place, the government presented no evidence that he participated in the venture at all besides the mere introduction of one conspirator to another. “Clearly, this evidence is insufficient to establish guilt.”

United States v. Steuben, 850 F.2d 859 (1st Cir. 1988)

The evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction of the boat captain, the mechanic, and the English-speaking seaman. The evidence was not sufficient with regard to another crewman who was present during a communication between the captain and the overseer of the marijuana scheme as no other evidence linking him to the crime was presented.

United States v. Glenn, 828 F.2d 855 (1st Cir. 1987)

The indictment in this drug conspiracy case charged the defendant with being a member of a conspiracy to import and possess marijuana from Thailand and hashish from Pakistan. The evidence only connected the defendant to the conspiracy involving Pakistan hashish. The variance was sufficient that a new trial should have been granted to the defendant.

United States v. Atehortua, 17 F.3d 546 (2d Cir. 1994)

Members of a cocaine conspiracy had a falling out and one of the leaders decided to kidnap and hold for ransom another member. The leader recruited the appellant to carry out the task. The government introduced no evidence, however, that the appellant knew that the purpose of the kidnapping was to hold the victim for ransom related to a cocaine transaction debt. Though the appellant was undeniably guilty of kidnapping, this evidence did not support a conviction for conspiracy to possess and possess with intent to distribute cocaine. The evidence also failed to establish that the defendant possessed a weapon in connection with a narcotics trafficking offense.

United States v. Nusraty, 867 F.2d 759 (2d Cir. 1989)

The evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of participating in a conspiracy to smuggle heroin. There was no direct evidence of the defendant’s agreement with any co-conspirators and no evidence that would warrant an inference that the defendant, in fact, had joined the conspiracy.

United States v. Thomas, 114 F.3d 403 (3rd Cir. 1997)

While the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant knew he was engaged in some kind of illicit activity, the evidence did not establish that he knew the object of the conspiracy was possession with intent to distribute a large quantity of cocaine. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Obialo, 23 F.3d 69 (3rd Cir. 1994)

Though there was sufficient evidence of defendant’s actual possession with intent to distribute heroin, there was insufficient evidence to establish that he conspired with anybody to do so. During discussions with an informant about the drugs, the defendant did use the term “we” when discussing how the heroin was smuggled into the country, and there was evidence that the defendant’s uncle had some heroin and paraphernalia at his house. Nevertheless, the uncle was granted a Rule 29 directed verdict on the basis that the evidence of his knowledge of the drugs in his house and evidence of his participation in a conspiracy was insufficient. The evidence did not support the trial court’s holding that the defendant was shown to have conspired with unknown “third persons.” Though it is not necessary for the government to actually name the other conspirators, the government must introduce evidence that the defendant conspired with someone. Also, the mere amount of heroin in which the defendant was involved does not alone establish that he was part of a conspiracy.

United States v. Salmon, 944 F.2d 1106 (3rd Cir. 1991)

The defendant clearly was acting as a lookout for a narcotics transaction. While the evidence showed that he knowingly acted as a lookout, however, there was no evidence that he knew the transaction involved the distribution of cocaine. A conviction for aiding and abetting the cocaine transaction, or for conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, could not be sustained on this evidence alone. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Terselich, 885 F.2d 1094 (3rd Cir. 1989)

Drugs were found hidden in an automobile. Though the defendant shared driving chores and lodging with the driver, there was no evidence of his participation in a conspiracy.

United States v. Wexler, 838 F.2d 88 (3rd Cir. 1988)

While there was substantial evidence that the jury could conclude that the defendant was involved in a conspiracy concerning the movement of a truck’s cargo, there was no evidence that the defendant knew the cargo was hashish. His conviction for conspiracy to distribute hashish was reversed on sufficiency grounds. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Lewis, 53 F.3d 29 (4th Cir. 1995)

The defendant participated in a deal to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. Arguably, however, the only other “conspirators” were government informants/agents. The defendant requested an instruction to advise the jury that a conspiracy can only occur if at least one of the other conspirators is not a government agent. The trial court committed reversible error by failing to instruct the jury in accordance with this request.

United States v. Baker, 985 F.2d 1248 (4th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine; however, there was a plausible theory that he intended to purchase the cocaine in order to consume it. It was reversible error to fail to instruct the jury on the lesser offense of conspiring to possess cocaine.

United States v. Giunta, 925 F.2d 758 (4th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with conspiracy to import drugs. The conspiracy involved two undercover agents, the defendant, and others. The proof at trial showed that the defendant’s motive in dealing with the undercover agents was to “rip them off,” not to actually pursue any drug transaction. This was not sufficient evidence to sustain the defendant’s conviction for conspiracy to import drugs. Also, a “facilitator’s” efforts to put a willing buyer in contact with a willing seller does not necessarily prove that he is a member of a conspiracy to sell or buy drugs. Finally, if two “facilitators” are working at helping a buyer to purchase drugs, but one of the facilitators is actually planning only to rip off the buyers, then the other facilitator cannot be found guilty of a conspiracy with the bogus facilitator. Note: A subsequent Fourth Circuit decision overruled the standard of review invoked by Giunta. United States v. Burgos, 94 F.3d 849 (4th Cir. 1996).

United States v. Ross, 58 F.3d 154 (5th Cir. 1995)

Two drug dealers sold cocaine to an undercover agent. The agent did not have the correct change to pay the dealers, but they agreed to make the change among themselves. This evidence, alone, did not make the two dealers conspirators. The mere act of making change, albeit for an illegal transaction, does not provide proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the two were conspirators.

United States v. Flores-Chapa, 48 F.3d 156 (5th Cir. 1995)

The evidence was not sufficient to support the defendant’s drug conspiracy conviction. The only evidence linking the defendant to the conspiracy was his possession of a small amount of cocaine, a pager which linked him to other members of the conspiracy, and the unsupported testimony of agents who opined that someone other than the other conspirators was also involved.

United States v. Maltos, 985 F.2d 743 (5th Cir. 1992)

Mere presence and association is not sufficient to support a conspiracy conviction. The government may not prove up a conspiracy merely by presenting evidence placing the defendant in a climate of activity that reeks of something foul. Here, the evidence was insufficient.

United States v. Rosas-Fuentes, 970 F.2d 1379 (5th Cir. 1992)

No evidence supported the inference that the defendant controlled the vehicle in which marijuana was found or that he controlled the marijuana. There was no proof that the defendant even knew of the marijuana hidden in the gas tank. His possession conviction, therefore, was reversed. The government could not rely on a Pinkerton theory because there was no evidence that he knowingly entered into a conspiracy.

United States v. Menesses, 962 F.2d 420 (5th Cir. 1992)

Simply because one associates with conspirators does not mean that a jury can reasonably find that he is a member of the conspiracy. Here, the evidence did not support the inference that the defendant was involved in the conspiracy to distribute drugs. Juries must not be allowed to convict on mere suspicion and innuendo.
United States v. Sacerio, 952 F.2d 860 (5th Cir. 1992)

Defendant agreed to drive a car for a friend from Miami to New Orleans. He was stopped in Mississippi and, after consenting to a search of the car, two kilos of cocaine were discovered hidden in the car. In the meantime, defendant had requested a friend to come out and help him. When the room was searched where the defendant and his friend were staying, 1/2 gram of cocaine was found. The evidence did not support the defendant’s (or his friend’s) conviction for conspiracy to possess the cocaine in the car or possession of cocaine in the car. Although some of the circumstances are suspicious, mere suspicion cannot support a verdict of guilty. It is not enough that the defendant merely associated with those participating in a conspiracy, nor is it enough that the evidence “places the defendant in a climate of activity that reeks of something foul.”

United States v. Skillern, 947 F.2d 1268 (5th Cir. 1991)

The evidence did not support one of the defendant’s conspiracy convictions. In this case, the defendant associated with the conspirators, and another conspirator speculated that the defendant was involved. Another witness testified that the defendant and another were present at a particular transaction and stated that “they” did this and that, without specifying who was actually engaged in the transaction. This evidence did not support a conspiracy conviction.

United States v. Guerra-Marez, 928 F.2d 665 (5th Cir. 1991)

The evidence did not support defendant’s conspiracy conviction. The government relied on the fact that the defendant was related to another conspirator and had discussed a heroin deal with the supplier of the other conspirator. The evidence showed, however, that the defendant was not conspiring with the other conspirators charged in the indictment. In short, while the evidence showed that the defendant distributed drugs, the evidence did not show that this conduct was part of the conspiracy proved at trial.

United States v. Lewis, 902 F.2d 1176 (5th Cir. 1990)

The evidence was not sufficient to sustain one defendant’s conviction for conspiracy. The only evidence relating to this defendant was his relationship to an individual who was in possession of cocaine. The defendant’s mere presence at the scene where drugs were seized and the fact that he had a beeper, like the other defendant, was not sufficient to sustain his conviction for being a conspirator.

United States v. Villasenor, 894 F.2d 1422 (5th Cir. 1990)

Though the evidence supported defendant’s conviction for possessing marijuana with intent to distribute, there was inadequate evidence that he was a member of a conspiracy to do so. There was no proof that he knew of any unindicted co-conspirators. While there likely were co-conspirators, there was no proof as to who they were or what roles they played with regard to the marijuana found in the defendant’s house.

United States v. Espinoza-Seanez, 862 F.2d 526 (5th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was arrested and in possession of a cellular telephone and a large amount of cash. While this may have created a suspicion that he was a drug trafficker, it was not sufficient to sustain a conviction for conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute.

United States v. Peters, 15 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 1994)

The police executed a search warrant at an apartment. The male was found in the bedroom, where a small quantity of cocaine and a firearm were also found. A female was found downstairs, dressed in a nightgown. This evidence was insufficient to convict the female of possessing either the gun or the drugs. The evidence also failed to establish that the two were engaged in a conspiracy.

The trial court properly dismissed an indictment which charged the defendant supply company with supplying materials so that others could grow marijuana. The indictment charged the defendant with conspiring to aid and abet the growing of marijuana. The problem here is combining the conspiracy and aiding and abetting offenses. In order to conspire to aid and abet, there must be a crime in progress that the defendant agreed to aid. Here, there was no allegation in the indictment that there was a crime being aided or a crime that the defendant agreed to aid. The court considered Falcone and Direct Sales in reaching this result: a supplier of innocent material can only be convicted of conspiring to produce an illegal product if the supplier knows of the end result and intends to further the illegal ends of the manufacturers.

United States v. Pearce, 912 F.2d 159 (6th Cir. 1990)

The record was devoid of any evidence that two defendants entered into an agreement to distribute drugs. One defendant’s mere presence in the house does not, by itself, demonstrate any tacit or mutual understanding between him and the other defendant to distribute drugs. Furthermore, the fact that one of the defendants shouted, “It’s a bust!” when the police entered the house does not contribute sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict.

United States v. Mims, 92 F.3d 461 (7th Cir. 1996)

The defendant defended this drug conspiracy charge on the basis that he was a purchaser of cocaine from the alleged supplier and was not a co-conspirator. The court held that the mere agreement to buy cocaine supplied by another person does not amount to a conspiracy. Even one who is a frequent purchaser is not necessarily a conspirator. Moreover, even proof that one purchases drugs from another for the purpose of re-selling the drugs is not necessarily sufficient to prove a conspiracy. Unless there is an agreement that binds the parties in the illicit enterprise, the mere fact that one buys drugs from another, even if the buyer later re-sells the drugs, is not sufficient to prove a conspiracy. The failure to properly instruct the jury in this case amounted to plain error.

United States v. Smith, 34 F.3d 514 (7th Cir. 1994)

A conspiracy conviction cannot be based solely on proof that the defendant purchased a large quantity of cocaine base from another on one occasion.

United States v. Lechuga, 994 F.2d 346 (7th Cir. 1993)(en banc)

Evidence that a defendant sold a quantity of drugs to another person in excess of a consumer quantity is not alone sufficient to sustain a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine. Though it is assumed that the purchaser will distribute the cocaine, this does not, alone, establish that there was a conspiracy between the defendant and his wholesale purchaser. There must be proof of an agreement to commit a crime other than the crime that consists of the sale itself. The evidence of a conspiratorial relationship between the defendant and his purchaser, as well as subsequent purchasers, was sufficient in this case.

United States v. Blankenship, 970 F.2d 283 (7th Cir. 1992)

Defendant rented his trailer to people who he knew intended to manufacture methamphetamine at that location. The court concluded that, under the facts of this case, said conduct alone did not suffice to make the defendant a co-conspirator in the methamphetamine manufacturing conspiracy. The court canvassed the law, dating back to Judge Learned Hand’s decision in United States v. Falcone, 109 F.2d 579 (2d Cir. 1940), the Supreme Court decision in Falcone, 311 U.S. 205 (1940), and Direct Sales Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 703 (1943). Even the fact that the defendant charged exorbitant rent for the trailer does not alter the result. In deciding that the landlord was not guilty of being a member of the conspiracy, the court also discusses the reasons why a purchaser is not a member of the conspiracy.

United States v. Sullivan, 903 F.2d 1093 (7th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was found in possession of cocaine when stopped at the train station in Chicago. He was convicted of possession with intent to distribute cocaine and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. There was no evidence that the defendant was acting in concert with any other person, however. The mere fact that the defendant had a substantial quantity of cocaine with a high purity level does not indicate that he was engaged in a conspiracy. This simply does not constitute sufficient evidence to prove the existence of a conspiracy.

United States v. Mancari, 875 F.2d 103 (7th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was charged with being a member of a narcotics conspiracy. The only named co-conspirator was acquitted. Though there were other suppliers, this evidence was admitted as “other crimes evidence” without notice having been given to defendant of the possibility that this evidence would be used to establish his membership in a conspiracy. Evidence insufficient.

United States v. Douglas, 818 F.2d 1317 (7th Cir. 1987)

It is plain error for the trial court to fail to give a “buyer/seller” instruction. That is, a buyer and seller of narcotics are not engaged in a conspiratorial relationship sufficient to justify a conviction for conspiracy. The defendant has a right to a clear instruction on this point.

United States v. Manzella, 791 F.2d 1263 (7th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was a broker in a major cocaine deal, but never possessed, either constructively or actually, the cocaine involved. He could not be convicted of the substantive offense of possessing the drug with the intent to distribute. He could, however, be convicted of conspiring to distribute the drug. Furthermore, under the Pinkerton doctrine, as a conspirator, he could be held liable for the crimes of another if committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. Because the government did not rely upon the Pinkerton doctrine, the possession with intent to distribute charge is reversed.

United States v. West, 15 F.3d 119 (8th Cir. 1994)

On several occasions, the defendant sold consumer quantities of cocaine to several individuals. This evidence only established a buyer-seller relationship, which is not enough to support a conspiracy conviction.

United States v. Rork, 981 F.2d 314 (8th Cir. 1992)

Following defendant’s conviction for conspiring to distribute cocaine, the district judge granted a judgment of acquittal; the Eighth Circuit affirmed. The defendant was present when his friend sold cocaine to an undercover agent. Defendant’s knowledge, coupled with his presence, was not enough to sustain a conspiracy conviction.
Evidence that the defendant had sold methamphetamine, coupled with evidence that he knew a supplier of methamphetamine, did not suffice to prove that the defendant and the other person were conspiring to sell methamphetamine.

United States v. Carper, 942 F.2d 1298 (8th Cir. 1991)

The person acting as a government informant in negotiating a drug purchase with the defendant cannot be the defendant’s co-conspirator in connection with those drug sales.

United States v. Sweeney, 817 F.2d 1323 (8th Cir. 1987)

Though the defendant drove a car loaded with marijuana, the government never proved that he was aware of what was in the car. It was not his car, and the undisputed evidence was that he was asked by a co-defendant to “fetch” the car and was never told what was in the car. A conspiracy conviction cannot be sustained on this evidence. A later Ninth Circuit case questioned the standard of review used by the Ninth Circuit in this case. United States v. Nevils, 598 F.3d 1158 (9th Cir. 2010).

United States v. Wiseman, 25 F.3d 862 (9th Cir. 1994)

Evidence that the defendants were present during discussions about a drug transaction and that they were later present when drugs were delivered to an undercover agent was insufficient to support a conviction for either conspiring to possess drugs or for aiding and abetting the possession of the drugs. After reviewing the various theories the government advanced to support the conviction, the court wrote, “That a defendant is probably guilty is not enough. Our system works well. We can be proud of the safeguards that protect the innocent, even though they sometimes allow a guilty person to go free. No system can ensure accurate results in all cases. We learned long ago that it is better to err on the side of caution than to convict an innocent person. That historic wisdom remains true today, notwithstanding the current willingness to abandon constitutional protections in order to further the seemingly endless and potentially futile war on drugs.”

United States v. Martin, 4 F.3d 757 (9th Cir. 1993)

The evidence failed to show that one of the defendants was involved in the overall conspiracy as charged in the indictment. The defendant introduced an undercover agent to his partner in the drug business. Unknown to the defendant, however, his “partner” double-crossed him and began dealing to the undercover agent, along with the other co-conspirators. The defendant was not aware of these other deals and thus could not be convicted of being a member of that conspiracy.

United States v. Umagat, 998 F.2d 770 (9th Cir. 1993)

Several people were involved in numerous marijuana smuggling ventures into Guam. On the last haul, some of the conspirators enlisted the defendant, a rental car dealer, to provide a non-traceable car; he agreed. There was no evidence that he was aware of the full scope of the smuggling conspiracy. The defendant’s reward for providing the car was an ounce of marijuana.

United States v. Ocampo, 937 F.2d 485 (9th Cir. 1991)

The evidence did not support defendant’s conviction for possession with intent to distribute and for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute. A pickup, parked in the garage of defendant’s house, was found to contain 82 kilos of cocaine; the defendant did not have a key to the truck, but a fingerprint of the defendant was found on one window of the truck. Though defendant was seen in the company of another conspirator who was involved in the distribution of cocaine, the evidence did not support defendant’s conviction on either a substantive or conspiracy count.

United States v. Sanchez-Mata, 925 F.2d 1166 (9th Cir. 1991)

The evidence did not sufficiently link the defendant with the conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. Defendant was a passenger in a car containing 141 pounds of marijuana in the trunk, but there was no other link between him and the drugs. The government introduced evidence that he had a prior drug conviction, but this did not suffice to establish anything other than that he may have had knowledge of the existence of the marijuana; however, knowledge alone is not sufficient to sustain a conspiracy conviction.

United States v. Ramirez, 880 F.2d 236 (9th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was found in the master bedroom of his mother’s house during the execution of a search warrant. Substantial quantities of heroin and cocaine were found in the residence. A triple beam scale was found in plain view in the bathroom. A jar of heroin in the bathroom drawer, cocaine in a shoe box, a quantity of currency, drug packaging material, and a ledger recording drug sales were also located. A roll of $20 bills with traces of cocaine, as well as a razor blade and some plastic bags, were found on the defendant’s person. Nevertheless, the evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant for conspiracy to distribute the cocaine and heroin found in the house. The evidence only established the defendant was a cocaine user in a house where large amounts of cocaine were found.

United States v. Penagos, 823 F.2d 346 (9th Cir. 1987)

The evidence was insufficient to link the defendant to a narcotics conspiracy where the only evidence was that he had been observed looking up and down the street as nearby drug dealers loaded and unloaded cocaine from automobiles.

United States v. Jones, 44 F.3d 860 (10th Cir. 1995)

There was insufficient evidence to support the conviction of a passenger of a car which was transporting over 200 kilos of cocaine for either conspiracy to possess the drugs or for aiding and abetting the possession of the drugs. Throughout the interrogation of the driver on the side of the interstate, the passenger said virtually nothing: she did not have keys to the car or the trunk; she did not have any belongings in the trunk where the cocaine was; nor were the passenger’s fingerprints found on the cocaine. Even if a jury could believe that the passenger had knowledge of the drugs in the trunk, mere knowledge that the car in which she was a passenger contained cocaine does not make her a conspirator.

United States v. Riggins, 15 F.3d 992 (10th Cir. 1994)

A state trooper stopped a van in which the defendant was a passenger. The driver consented to a search of the car. In a bag belonging to another passenger (not the defendant), the trooper found cocaine. This evidence did not support a conviction of the defendant for conspiring to possess cocaine. Evidence of mere presence at the scene of the crime or association with co-defendants is not enough to support a conspiracy conviction. “We cannot sustain a conspiracy conviction if the evidence does no more than create a suspicion of guilt or amounts to a conviction resulting from piling inference on top of inference.”
United States v. Anderson, 981 F.2d 1560 (10th Cir. 1992)

Though the defendant was seen delivering a small quantity of marijuana to other conspirators, the evidence did not establish that he was a member of the others’ conspiracy to distribute large quantities of marijuana. Only by piling inference upon inference could the conviction for conspiracy be sustained.

United States v. Evans, 970 F.2d 663 (10th Cir. 1992)

The mere knowledge of illegal activity, even in conjunction with participation in a small part of the conspiracy, does not by itself establish that the person has joined the grand conspiracy. Thus, even if a person knows that his cocaine comes from Medellin, that does not make him a member of a grand conspiracy including all purchasers of Medellin cocaine. Also, a single conspiracy does not exist merely because several people purchase cocaine from a common supplier. There must be a shared objective joining the spokes of the wheel. Here, one conspirator was shown to have purchased four ounces of cocaine from the principal supplier. There was no evidence that this was not for personal consumption. Though she had scales which she provided to the supplier on one occasion, this could have been an isolated act among friends, as opposed to an act in furtherance of the conspiracy. The proof in this case amounted to proof that this defendant simply occupied the position of a buyer, as opposed to a conspirator. The court must be particularly vigilant when the government seeks to bring many individuals under the umbrella of a single conspiracy. The risk is that a jury will be so overwhelmed with evidence of wrongdoing by other alleged co-conspirators that it will fail to differentiate among particular defendants.

United States v. McIntyre, 836 F.2d 467 (10th Cir. 1987)

The defendant purchased cocaine from several sources and, in certain instances, shared cocaine with the informant and others. Nevertheless, the evidence was insufficient to sustain the defendant’s conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

United States v. Jones, 808 F.2d 754 (10th Cir. 1987)

The defendant, a doctor, lost his license to write prescriptions. Thereafter, he tried to help his assistant get a job with another doctor where he could write fraudulent prescriptions. The evidence was insufficient in this case to convict the defendant of being a member of the drug conspiracy.

United States v. Lopez-Ramirez, 68 F.3d 438 (11th Cir. 1995)

A truck containing cocaine and an unidentified passenger drove to a house where the defendant resided and backed up to the garage. It was not established that the defendant was the passenger. The driver was seen unloading the cocaine in the garage, and the defendant was seen standing in the garage at this time. This evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of conspiracy to possess the drugs or for possessing the drugs with intent to distribute. Mere association with a conspirator and presence in a vehicle that engages in counter-surveillance maneuvers is not sufficient to establish participation in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine or possession with intent to distribute cocaine. There was no evidence in this case that the defendant was aware of the contents of the container that was unloaded into the garage of the house where she was arrested.

United States v. Newton, 44 F.3d 913 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant rented an apartment for the leader of a drug conspiracy so that the leader could have a place for his girlfriend to live. There was no evidence that the defendant used (or knowingly used) tainted funds to make any of the rent payments or that the apartment was used to facilitate the drug conspiracy in any way. This evidence did not support a money laundering conviction or a conviction for aiding and abetting the drug conspiracy. It is not enough that the defendant knew the kingpin, and it is not enough that he leased a house for the kingpin.
Association with a co-conspirator is insufficient to prove participation in a conspiracy. At a minimum, the defendant must willfully associate himself in some way with the criminal venture and willfully participate in it as he would in something he wished to bring about.

United States v. Stanley, 24 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was a passenger in a car being driven by a drug distributor and which had another occupant who was involved in the distribution of drugs. Drugs that were to be distributed were in the car. This evidence alone did not suffice to convict the defendant of either a conspiracy or substantive offense involving the drugs.

United States v. Clavis, 977 F.2d 538 (11th Cir. 1992)

In assessing whether the evidence is sufficient in a conspiracy case, the proper standard is whether, viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the government, the jury necessarily must have entertained a reasonable doubt concerning the guilt of the defendant. The previously announced standard, which held that, once the existence of a conspiracy has been established, only slight evidence need connect the defendant to it, is not the proper standard and will not be employed.

United States v. Andrews, 953 F.2d 1312 (11th Cir. 1992)

The government offered no evidence linking the defendant to the conspiracy alleged in the indictment. Though the defendant was shown to have bought cocaine on several occasions, there was nothing to link these purchases with the conspiracy alleged in the indictment. On the contrary, the evidence showed that the defendant was a competitor of the other individuals in the conspiracy.

United States v. Mieres-Borges, 919 F.2d 652 (11th Cir. 1990)

The evidence was not sufficient to convict one of the defendants of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. Mere presence, even coupled with flight, is not sufficient to convict the defendant of possession or of conspiring to possess.

United States v. Villegas, 911 F.2d 623 (11th Cir. 1990)

The evidence against one defendant was insufficient to sustain a conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. The government’s theory was that the defendant was engaged in counter-surveillance activity when he accompanied his brother to the site of a drug transaction and then “stood guard” while the transaction occurred inside. In reversing the conviction, the Court reviews a number of prior Eleventh Circuit decisions which reversed convictions on sufficiency grounds.

United States v. Khoury, 901 F.2d 948 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendants were convicted of conspiring to create a counterfeit substance, 21 U.S.C.
§841(a)(2). At a minimum, the government must provide some evidence that the conspirators planned to place on the substance or its container a trademark, a trade name, or other identifying mark of a manufacturer other than the person actually manufacturing the substance. The government failed to introduce sufficient evidence in this case, and a conviction on this count was reversed.
United States v. Hernandez, 896 F.2d 513 (11th Cir. 1990)

The evidence was insufficient to sustain one defendant’s conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. The defendant was clearly associated with a member of the conspiracy who transacted in drugs and was present when the transaction occurred. Although the defendant’s prior conviction for a drug offense was probative of his intent to join the conspiracy, there was no proof that he had any knowledge that a conspiracy even existed. Conspiratorial intent cannot exist without knowledge; evidence of knowledge must be clear and unequivocal.

United States v. Hardy, 895 F.2d 1331 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant frequently had parties at his home where guests would consume cocaine. Fifteen of the defendant’s friends and acquaintances testified at trial that they had been at his home and had consumed cocaine there. None of these witnesses, however, identified the defendant as a drug dealer. There was no evidence that the defendant at any time possessed more than an eighth of an ounce of cocaine or that he had ever earned money through the sale of cocaine. The evidence was not sufficient to sustain a conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. The fact that the defendant possessed and shared a small amount of cocaine is not a sufficient basis for the inference that he intended to distribute cocaine or entered into an agreement to do so. There was no evidence that he possessed drug packaging paraphernalia, large quantities of money, “cut,” or any other items that would support the inference that he intended to distribute cocaine, rather than consume it himself. Furthermore, joint possession of a controlled substance does not prove a conspiracy to distribute. Finally, transferring a small amount of cocaine to a guest in his home does not support a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt. One isolated incident of distribution does not establish a prior contemporaneous agreement, which is necessary for a conspiracy conviction. The Court concluded with the admonition, “Conspiracy law is not a dragnet for apprehending those with criminal dispositions."

United States v. Kelly, 888 F.2d 732 (11th Cir. 1989)

The defendant, a criminal defense attorney, was prosecuted for being a member of a drug conspiracy. The attorney was approached by a former client who was working undercover for the government. The client sought to have the attorney obtain cocaine from another client, but the attorney refused. The government alleged that the attorney was in a conspiracy to protect the other client’s cocaine. The Eleventh Circuit reverses. The attorney did what he should do – refuse to participate in the proposed plan.

The defendant purchased less than an ounce of cocaine from the lead member of the cocaine conspiracy on several occasions. The evidence was insufficient to support the defendant’s conviction for conspiracy to distribute or possess with intent to distribute cocaine. There was no evidence that he resold the cocaine or took any other measures to aid the objects of the conspiracy.

United States v. Fredericks, 857 F.2d 733 (11th Cir. 1988)

A deputy sheriff’s conspiracy conviction was not based on sufficient evidence where the government’s proof was limited to evidence that the defendant was seen standing on a bridge while smugglers were bringing marijuana ashore. The testimony of the witnesses was that the person might have been standing next to what appeared to be a police car. But their testimony identifying the defendant was inconclusive and uncorroborated.

United States v. Andrews, 850 F.2d 1557 (11th Cir. 1988)

Overruling the decision of the former Fifth Circuit, the Eleventh Circuit holds that a drug conspiracy defendant may be convicted despite the fact that his co-conspirator was found not guilty in a joint trial. Because there was sufficient evidence to support the defendant’s conviction, the inconsistent verdict does not invalidate his conviction.

United States v. Fernandez, 797 F.2d 943 (11th Cir. 1986)

Evidence that the defendant recommended a pilot to a person who wished to import marijuana by air was not sufficient to establish the existence of a conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute on the part of the referrer.

United States v. Morris, 836 F.2d 1371 (D.C.Cir. 1988)

The defendant sold a total of three ounces of PCP to a co-defendant on two occasions. Though he also referred to “my people” being available for the sale of drugs, this was not sufficient to support his conviction for conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute PCP. The evidence failed to support the inference that the co-defendant was a regular source.
CONSPIRACY
(Drug Conspiracy – Buyer / Seller Cases)

United States v. Musgraves, 831 F.3d 454 (7th Cir. 2016)

Even if the defendant sells to another wholesaler, this does not mean that the buyer and seller are in a conspiratorial relationship. Also, the existence of a “trusting relationship” between the buyer and seller does not make a conspiracy. Conspiracy conviction reversed.

United States v. Loveland, 825 F.3d 555 (9th Cir. 2016)

Another buyer-seller decision that dooms a drug conspiracy conviction. Even if the amount of drugs sold is more than the buyer could consume, this does not mean that the seller and buyer had a conspiratorial relationship to sell the drugs. Absent such proof, a conviction for conspiracy could not be sustained.

United States v. Lomax, 816 F.3d 468 (7th Cir. 2016)

The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the principle that a buyer-seller relationship is not necessarily sufficient to prove the existence of a conspiracy, required reversing the conviction in this case. Though the defendant was buying the drugs to resell, that was not a basis for denying his request for a buyer-seller instruction.

United States v. Cruse, 805 F.3d 795 (7th Cir. 2015)

The Seventh Circuit once again reverses a conviction because of the trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the principle that a buyer-seller relationship is not, alone, sufficient to prove a conspiracy. In this case, there was considerable evidence of sales to and from the defendant and even an occasional credit sale, but this evidence did not necessarily refute the defendant’s defense that he was simply involved in buyer-seller relationships with the other parties.

United States v. Boykin, 794 F.3d 939 (8th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was simply a buyer of drugs from his supplier and was not in a conspiratorial relationship with him. There was no agreement to purchase drugs for resale and no evidence of multiple sales of resale quantities, the evidence will generally support only a buyer-seller relationship.

United States v. Pulgar, 789 F.3d 807 (7th Cir. 2015)

Though the defendant was a substantial seller of cocaine to the purchaser who eventually became an informant and testified at trial, the relationship was a buyer-seller relationship, not a conspiratorial relationship. There was insufficient proof of credit transactions, or “fronting”; there was evidence that they had a “return” policy if the drugs were not good, but this does not establish that there was a conspiracy. A return policy may be evidence that the sales were made on a consignment basis (which is typically a feature of a conspiracy), but here the return policy was limited to instances where the product was bad. Finally, evidence that the buyer and seller were friends and had a social relationship did not mean that they were conspirators to distribute drugs. The conspiracy conviction was reversed.
United States v. Brock, 789 F.3d 60 (2d Cir. 2015)

The Second Circuit reverses a drug conspiracy conviction because the government proved nothing more than a buyer-seller relationship. Though the defendant purchased quantities of drugs from the seller on a regular basis and then resold the drugs, this did not envelope the buyer and seller in a conspiratorial relationship. The buyer was not restricted as to where he could resell the drugs, he purchased drugs from other people, as well and he did not share the profits with the seller. Though he bought from the seller regularly and in significant quantities, these two facts, standing alone, do not make this a conspiratorial relationship.

United States v. Brown, 726 F.3d 993 (7th Cir. 2013)

A lengthy opinion that clarifies the Seventh Circuit’s jurisprudence on the issue of conspiracy vs. buyer-seller.

United States v. Johnson, 592 F.3d 749 (7th Cir. 2010)

Another conspiracy conviction falls victim to the buyer-seller rule that the Seventh Circuit announced in United States v. Colon (see below). Even if the buyer purchases a large quantity of drugs, this does not make him a conspirator with the seller. Even a repeat wholesale customer is not necessarily a co-conspirator. Indications that a conspiracy existed are such things as (1) sales on credit or consignment; (2) an agreement to look for other customers; (3) payment of commission on sales; (4) an indication that one party advised the other on the conduct of the other’s business; (5) an agreement to warn of future threats to each other’s business stemming from competitors or law enforcement authorities. None of these circumstances were present in this case.

United States v. Colon, 549 F.3d 565 (7th Cir. 2008)

The evidence only established the existence of a buyer-seller relationship between the defendant and his supplier. Therefore, he could not be convicted of either conspiracy (with the supplier) or aiding and abetting the conspiracy with the supplier. The Seventh Circuit held that a purchaser – even a wholesale purchaser who buys a large quantity – is not, by that evidence alone, conspiring with the supplier. The Seventh Circuit cited with approval, United States v. Dekle, 165 F.3d 826 (11th Cir. 1999).

United States v. Hawkins, 547 F.3d 66 (2d Cir. 2008)

The Second Circuit affirms the defendant’s conspiracy conviction but includes a lengthy discussion that explains why a buyer is not a co-conspirator with the seller, unless something more is shown than the simple buyer-seller relationship. The evidence established in this case an ongoing relationship that the “buyer” would be a distributor for the “seller.”

United States v. Wexler, 522 F.3d 194 (2d Cir. 2008)

The defendant, a doctor, wrote prescriptions to a patient for various drugs, including dilaudid. The doctor knew that the patient was distributing the drugs to others and the prescriptions themselves were not medically necessary. The patient did not, however, distribute any of the dilaudid and the prescriptions were not in amounts that would have led the doctor to believe the patient was distributing the dilaudid. Rather, the patient was consuming the dilaudid... himself. The patient died from the dilaudid. The jury found the defendant guilty of conspiring to distribute drugs, including distribution that led to the death of that patient. The Second Circuit reversed. With respect to the dilaudid, the doctor and patient had a “buyer-seller” relationship and therefore a conspiracy conviction between them could not be upheld.

United States v. Dekle, 165 F.3d 826 (11th Cir. 1999)

A buyer-seller relationship does not qualify as a § 846 conspiracy. The buyer’s purpose is to buy; the seller’s purpose is to sell. There is, therefore, no joint objective. Even if the sales are repeated, there is no proof of a conspiracy, unless the sales are for the purpose of re-sale and the generation of proceeds.
CONSPIRACY
(Generally)

The Ninth Circuit decision, which had held that a conspiracy conviction may not be sustained unless the defendant joined the conspiracy before its mission was doomed to failure by police interception, was reversed by the Supreme Court. The fact that the police had infiltrated the conspiracy and seized the drugs, before the defendants agreed to participate in the venture did not protect them from conspiratorial liability.

The defendant was a police officer who accepted bribes from a car repair shop to which he referred car accident victims. He was prosecuted under the Hobbs Act – extortion – for receiving money, with the consent of the car repair shop owner, under color of official right. The charge alleged that he conspired with the owner to violate the law. The officer claimed that he could not “conspire” with the person who was allegedly the victim of the extortion. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the defendant and the car repair shop owner did, in fact, conspire to commit the Hobbs Act violation, which essentially criminalizes the payment of bribes in this context.

United States v. Ellis, 868 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was sentenced to a mandatory minimum sentence of life in prison based on a finding by the judge that the drug conspiracy with which he was involved involved at least 5 kilos of cocaine, coupled with a recidivist notice. The jury, however, made no findings regarding drug quantity, and absent a finding of at least 5 kilos of cocaine, the appropriate statutory range was 0 – 30 years. Pursuant to Alleyne v. United States, 570 U.S. 99 (2013), the court could not impose a sentence of life in prison absent a jury finding that triggered the greater statutory range.

United States v. Valle, 807 F.3d 508 (2d Cir. 2015)

The defendant was a participant in an online chat room whose participants fantasized about various brutal and graphic schemes of kidnapping, torturing, cooking, raping, murdering and cannibalizing various women. The defendant also participated outside the chatroom with other people (whom he never met, talked to, or even knew the true identifies of) about the same topics. The government offered no evidence that the defendant ever engaged in any criminal activity, to say nothing of any of the activity described in the chats, though he did post pictures of some of the women whom he fantasized killing or torturing. He was charged with conspiracy to kidnap the women. The district court granted a Rule 29 motion after trial and the Second Circuit affirmed. The fantasy chats and the “real chats” were, for purposes of determining the existence of a conspiracy, indistinguishable and there was, therefore no proof of an agreement to actually commit any crime. The fact that some of the “victims” were real women; and the fact that the defendant engaged in internet searches to learn how to “cannibalize” a person, did not convert the fantasy into a conspiracy. Not only did the government fail to prove that the defendant had a real conspiratorial intent, it also failed to prove that the people with whom he was chatting had conspiratorial intent and, of course, it takes two to tango.
United States v. Willner, 795 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2015)

This case involved a health care fraud conspiracy in which recruiters were paid to send ineligible patients to a facility that was supposedly performing sleep studies. The patients were not eligible, they were kept as long as Medicare would pay, then they were discharged and often then re-admitted so that more fraudulent billings could occur. The evidence was sufficient to support the conviction of most of the defendants who were involved in this scheme. However, one doctor, Dr. Abreu, was not shown to have had knowledge of the scheme and her conviction was reversed on sufficiency grounds.

United States v. Tobin, 676 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2012)

The court held that “willfulness” is not an element of a § 841 offense (distribution of a controlled substance) and therefore, it is no defense that the defendant did not realize that his conduct was illegal or that he had consulted with a lawyer and the lawyer said the conduct was not illegal (this was an Internet Pharmacy prosecution). However, to be convicted of conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance, the defendant is required to act with knowledge of the illegality of his conduct, because under § 846, willfulness is an element of the offense and therefore, advice of counsel is a defense to a § 846 offense.

United States v. Weeks, 653 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2011)

In the context of reviewing an ineffective assistance of counsel claim for a defendant who entered a guilty plea to a conspiracy offense, the Tenth Circuit emphasized that a conspiracy conviction requires proof that the defendant knew that his agreement involved a violation of the law, not simply an agreement to engage in certain conduct: “An agreement with others that certain activities be done, without knowing at the time of the agreement that the activities violate the law, is therefore insufficient to establish conspiracy.”

United States v. Tyson, 653 F.3d 192 (3rd Cir. 2011)

There was sufficient evidence to support defendant’s conviction of several firearms counts, but there was insufficient evidence that his crime was committed as part of a conspiracy with another person. The co-defendant / alleged co-conspirator was acquitted at trial; and though the rule of consistency has been abolished, there was no evidence to support the defendant’s conspiracy conviction, because there was no evidence that the conspirator was in league with him in the commission of the crimes.

United States v. Rigas, 605 F.3d 194 (3rd Cir. 2010)

A conviction under § 371’s conspiracy offense clause bars a subsequent prosecution under § 371’s defraud clause. The two offenses included in § 371 are two ways of committing the same offense. In this case, the prosecution of Rigas under the conspiracy to commit an offense clause was shown to be sufficiently close to the pending defraud clause prosecution that the burden was on the government to prove that the former did not bar, on double jeopardy grounds, a prosecution under the latter provision. ON REHEARING EN BANC, the court affirmed this decision. 605 F.3d 194 (3rd Cir. 2010).

United States v. Boidi, 568 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 2009)
A conspiracy to possess drugs is a lesser included offense of a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute. The government acknowledged that possession is a lesser included offense of possession with intent to distribute; but argued that this logic does not apply to conspiracy offenses. The First Circuit rejected this argument, but held that in order to insist on such an instruction, the defendant must show that on the evidence presented, it would be rational for the jury to convict only on the lesser included offense and not the greater one. Failure to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense in this case was error.

United States v. Turner, 548 F.3d 1094 (D.C. Cir. 2008)

Determining when a conspiracy ends is important in numerous contexts, including a defense that the statute of limitations has expired; a claim that a co-conspirator statement was not made during the course of a conspiracy and, as in this case, in deciding which version of the Sentencing Guidelines to apply (i.e., a possible Ex Post Facto claim). In this case, the conspirator forged certain documents that enabled them to receive money as the beneficiary of another person who died. The forgery and receipt of the money occurred in 2001. When questioned by the police about these events in 2006, the conspirators lied. The D.C. Circuit held that the conspiracy ended in 2001 when the objects of the conspiracy were achieved. See generally Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391 (1957); Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440 (1949); Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604 (1953).

United States v. Kapelioujnyj, 547 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2008)

The evidence in this § 2315 case was insufficient to prove that the defendant was aware that the stolen property he was enlisted to help sell was worth at least $5,000.00. The government also failed to prove the interstate commerce element of the offense. Though the stolen property had traveled between New York and New Jersey, the defendant was not, at that time, a member of the conspiracy to sell the stolen property. The fact that the seller was attempting to get others to help sell the stolen item cannot be imputed to the defendant, who was never shown to have entered a conspiracy to sell stolen property across state lines.

United States v. Mendez, 528 F.3d 811 (11th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was charged with a § 371 fraud clause offense; that is, he was charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States, as opposed to conspiring to commit a federal offense. In order to sustain a conviction under this theory, the government must prove that the government was, in fact, the target of the defendant’s offense. Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107 (1987). In this case, the defendant was alleged to have engaged in a fraudulent effort to produce documents to obtain a Florida commercial driver’s license. This offense did not target the United States, even if there was a collateral impact on the Department of Transportation’s ability to monitor commercial driver’s licenses.

United States v. Salgado, 519 F.3d 411 (7th Cir. 2008)

The defendants attempted to rob a person who they thought was bringing money to purchase drugs. Actually, the person was an informant, working with the DEA. The informant had no money in his possession. The government prosecuted the defendant for attempting to rob a person who was in possession of money belonging to the United States (18 U.S.C. § 2114) and conspiracy to commit that offense. The Seventh Circuit held that neither theory could be used.
The defendant could not be convicted of conspiracy, because the defendants did not know they were attempting to rob a government employee, thus, their agreement could not be to steal government money. They could not be convicted of attempting to steal government money, because the informant had no money in his possession.

United States v. Lopez, 443 F.3d 1026 (8th Cir. 2006)

In gauging the sufficiency of evidence of a defendant’s participation in a conspiracy, courts have sometimes said that if there is proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of a conspiracy, only “slight evidence” is needed to show the defendant’s participation in the conspiracy. The Eighth Circuit – like many other Circuits – held in this case that the slight evidence rule did not relax the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Rather, the slight evidence rule simply means that the defendant’s role in the conspiracy may be slight, or minor. The evidence, however, must still establish the defendant’s participation beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Johnson, 440 F.3d 1286 (11th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with money laundering and conspiracy to launder money. The court reversed several counts of conviction. First, the court held that the mere transfer of money from one account to another (even overseas) did not satisfy the “concealment prong” of a money laundering prosecution, without further proof of the defendant’s efforts to conceal the location or source of the money. Second, the court held that the conspiracy conviction could not be sustained, because the only alleged co-conspirator was not shown to have knowledge of the tainted source of the money. If the other member of the conspiracy, as a matter of law, was not proven to be guilty, then a conspiracy conviction could not be sustained.

United States v. Santos, 449 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendants tried to rob an undercover drug agent by flashing fake DEA badges. The use of the fake badge did not amount to “force” in support of a Hobbs Act robbery charge. With regard to one alleged co-conspirator, moreover, the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was a knowing participant in the conspiracy to rob the victim. Mere presence and association with the other conspirators was all that was established.

United States v. Summers, 414 F.3d 1287 (10th Cir. 2005)

The evidence was insufficient to establish one defendant’s membership in the conspiracy to rob a bank. His presence and companionship with the other perpetrators after the robbery, coupled with evidence that there was one more participant in the robbery (i.e., there was an unidentified getaway driver) did not establish that the defendant was the getaway driver.

United States v. Chandler, 388 F.3d 796 (11th Cir. 2004)

Forty-three defendants were charged with conspiring to commit mail fraud. The conspiracy involved cheating in a McDonald’s game. The leader of the alleged conspiracy stole winning “stamps” from McDonald’s products and then, through a series of transfers, would “sell” the winning stamps to other members of the conspiracy. In fact, down the “food chain” some of the purchasers did not know the source of the winning pieces. The four defendants who were tried in this part of the case were not even alleged to have known that the winning pieces were embezzled. Instead, the government alleged that these people claimed to be legitimate “winners” when, in fact, they knew that they had purchased the winning pieces from someone else. The definition of “legitimate” was quite problematic, because the McDonald’s game rules did not clearly set forth who was a “legitimate” winner (the transfer of a winning piece from one person to another was not specifically prohibited). The Eleventh Circuit reversed the convictions. First, the appellate court addressed the allegation that the defendant conspired to commit mail fraud by defrauding McDonalds. The fraudulent representation was alleged to be the representation that the game piece was acquired through legitimate means. Yet, it was never clear what this meant. McDonald’s representatives acknowledged that winning pieces were traded on E-bay and that pieces could even be traded on McDonald’s own web site. Thus there was no unequivocal prohibition on trading or selling winning pieces and the act of redeeming the piece did not amount to a representation that the piece was acquired in any one particular manner. Again, there was no proof that these defendants ever knew that the pieces were initially stolen. Second, the court focused on the absence of an agreement that united the alleged conspirators. Given the fact that the ultimate purchasers of the game pieces were unaware that they were stolen, or even obtained illegally, the government failed to prove the existence of one conspiracy with members all having agreed to commit a crime. Moreover, the initial thief – the person who embezzled the pieces – kept it a secret from each of the people he recruited to sell the pieces that there were other sellers and buyers. This was a classic hub-and-spoke conspiracy without a rim. Each spoke in this scenario amounts to a separate conspiracy.

United States v. Jones, 371 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2004)

Defendant accompanied another man to a gun store where the other man purchased a gun as a straw purchaser (filling in an incorrect name on the “owner of firearm” space in the paperwork). The defendant’s presence when the gun was purchased, however, was not sufficient to convict of conspiring to commit the false statement offense. Even if he knew what the other man was doing, such knowledge, alone, does not mean that he conspired to commit the offense. “Even though a jury may infer facts, each link in the chain of inferences must be sufficiently strong to avoid a lapse into speculation.”

United States v. Ceballos, 340 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2003)

The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to distribute drugs and conspiracy to bribe a public official. The evidence was insufficient to establish his knowing participation in a conspiracy to bribe the public official. The government used undercover agents posing as drug purchasers who were capable of producing phony green cards through their supposed connection with a corrupt INS agent. The undercover agents would buy drugs from a middleman and pay partly in cash and partly in phony green cards which they (and the undercover INS agent) would manufacture for the middleman. As the operation continued, the undercover agents eventually convinced the middleman to introduce them to their drug supplier, the defendant in this case. This evidence did not establish the defendant’s participation in the bribery conspiracy. Even if he knew that the money owed to him, as the drug supplier, was obtained by the purchaser from the proceeds of another crime committed by the purchaser, this does not make him a member of the purchaser’s conspiracy.

United States v. Syme, 276 F.3d 131 (3rd Cir. 2002)
The Third Circuit explains that where a conspiracy alleges that the defendants conspired to commit an offense in several ways, if the evidence is sufficient with regard to certain ways, but not others, a general verdict of guilty will be sustained on the theory that the jury properly evaluated the evidence and convicted on the sufficient basis. However, where the judge instructs the jury incorrectly about one of the ways, the verdict will not be upheld, because the jury may not have realized the legal elements of one of the alternative methods of committing the offense. In this case, the conviction was upheld. See generally Griffin v. United States, 502 U.S. 46 (1991); Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957); Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931).

_United States v. Hernandez_, 141 F.3d 1042 (11th Cir. 1998)

To be guilty of conspiring to commit murder-for-hire the government must show an agreement by two or more persons to achieve the unlawful purpose of murder-for-hire, the defendant’s knowing and voluntary participation in the agreement, and an overt act committed by any one of the conspirators in furtherance of the conspiratorial objective. In this case, the court found insufficient evidence, where the defendant was present when other family members discussed a murder-for-hire, but he did not participate in the discussion or participate in the actual homicide.

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant aided and abetted, or conspired with others to murder the victim. Though the defendant advised the two principals of the victim’s whereabouts, there was insufficient evidence that he knew that the other two intended to kill the victim. Even though he knew the two were looking for the victim, there was no proof that he knew why.

_United States v. Garcia_, 151 F.3d 1243 (9th Cir. 1998)

Gang membership itself cannot establish guilt of a crime, and a general agreement, implicit or explicit, to support one another in gang fights does not provide substantial proof of the specific agreement required for a conviction of conspiracy to commit assault. There can be no conviction for guilt by association. Though the defendant participated in a fight with others, there was no proof of a concerted or coordinated effort to engage in a fight.

_United States v. Williams_, 809 F.2d 75 (1st Cir. 1986)

During the course of the trial, a number of overt acts alleged in the conspiracy count of the indictment were not proven. The Court rules that the better practice is to edit the conspiracy count by removing those overt acts before submission of that count of the indictment to the jury. Reading to the jury overt acts in the indictment which were not supported by the evidence is an error of constitutional dimension.
CONSPIRACY
(Multiple Conspiracies)

United States v. Jones, 858 F.3d 221 (4th Cir. 2017)
In the Eastern District of Virginia, the defendant pled guilty to being in a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine during the summer of 2012. Later, he was indicted in the Western District of Virginia he was charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine from 1998 to 2012 (including the same people identified in the Eastern District conspiracy). The Fourth Circuit held that the latter indictment was barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause.

United States v. Mize, 814 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2016)
The proof at trial suffered from a prejudicial variance from the indictment. There were two separate conspiracies proven at trial, not one overarching conspiracy. Most of the evidence presented at trial focused on the other conspiracy, which was not the indicted conspiracy. The defendant’s were prejudiced by this variance and a new trial was necessary.

United States v. Lapler, 796 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2015)
The defendant was charged with conspiracy to sell drugs over a fifteen month period. The proof at trial, however, showed two separate conspiracies, one with one supplier, another with a second supplier. In this situation, the jury should have been instructed that the jurors must unanimously agree on what conspiracy the defendant was involved in (or both). There was a genuine possibility of jury confusion in this case.

United States v. Franco-Samtiago, 681 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2012)
The defendant was charged with being a member of a conspiracy that participated in five armed robberies. Only the last robbery occurred within five years of the return of the indictment. The government agreed that the defendant had no involvement in the first three robberies. The evidence was sufficient to demonstrate his participation in the fourth. After he was convicted of the conspiracy count, the government conceded at sentencing that he was not involved in the fifth robbery. The First Circuit concluded that the defendant only agreed to participate in one conspiracy and that he could not be held responsible for participating in the overarching conspiracy that involved several other defendants and the other four robberies. Though he agreed to join the conspiracy, the conspiracy that he agreed to join only involved the one robbery that occurred outside the statute of limitations. NOTE: The United States Supreme Court, in Musacchio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1737 (2016), held that raising a statute of limitations defense for the first time on appeal was too late and not subject to plain error review.

United States v. Dellosantos, 649 F.3d 109 (1st Cir. 2011)
The First Circuit concluded that the variance between the charged overarching conspiracy to distribute cocaine and marijuana, and the proof at trial, which showed separate conspiracies that involved a different combination of drugs, was prejudicial and required reversal of the conspiracy conviction. The separate conspiracies were not interdependent and involved different people.
United States v. Rabhan, 628 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to commit bank fraud in Georgia in connection with obtaining a loan from one bank. At the same time that he was engaged in defrauding that bank, he also defrauded another bank in Mississippi for another business loan. The conspiracies involved the same time frame, the same personnel, the same substantive offense. The Fifth Circuit held that the double jeopardy clause barred the second prosecution in Mississippi.

United States v. Caldwell, 589 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was asked by another drug dealer for a recommendation of another drug source. The defendant introduced him to his supplier. The defendant was present at the first meeting, but had no further dealings between the other two and received no money, commissions or other benefit from the others’ dealings. This did not make the defendant a member of a three-person drug distribution conspiracy. The mere introduction of a common supplier, made by one drug dealer to another, is not sufficient to create a single conspiracy among all the dealers. Having concluded that there was a variance, the Tenth Circuit then concluded that the variance was not prejudicial and affirmed the conviction.

Robertson v. Klem, 580 F.3d 159 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The opposite of a multiple conspiracy problem is where a defendant is convicted of two conspiracy charges where there was but one agreement. In this case, the defendant was convicted of two counts of conspiracy to commit murder (there were two victims). Both victims were killed at the same time as the result of one conspiratorial agreement. Only one conspiracy existed and only one count of conviction could be sustained.

United States v. Swafford, 512 F.3d 833 (6th Cir. 2008)

The defendant sold iodine, an ingredient for the production of methamphetamine, to numerous customers. The customers, however, were not affiliated with one another. This does not constitute one overarching conspiracy. This was a wheel conspiracy with no rim connecting the spokes. Because the joinder of the various “sales” into one overarching conspiracy would have led the jury to believe that the offense was considerably more nefarious (as opposed to evidence of individual sales to different customers), the variance was prejudicial and required setting aside the conspiracy conviction.

United States v. Stigler, 413 F.3d 588 (7th Cir. 2005)

The government alleged that the defendant was part of a larger conspiracy that involved the negotiation of several counterfeit checks. The evidence at trial, however, only demonstrated his knowledge of one check and that he had no role in, or knowledge of, the other checks being handled by other people. This amounted to an improper variance.

United States v. Geibel, 369 F.3d 682 (2d Cir. 2004)

An insider provided inside information to two other people, who traded on this information. Unbeknownst to the insider, the other people were selling the information to other people, as well. The conspiratorial agreement between the insider and his tippee did not encompass or envision further remote tippees. The court considered several factors in deciding whether there was one overarching, as opposed to separate conspiracies: (1) the insider’s knowledge of remote tippees; (2) the insider’s mutual dependence on the remote tippees; (3) the extent to which the insider discouraged the further dissemination of the information; (4) the foreseeability of additional tippees. The Second Circuit concluded that there was not one overarching conspiracy, but also decided that the variance -- charging the defendants in one conspiracy – did not prejudice them.

United States v. Glinton, 154 F.3d 1245 (11th Cir. 1998)

The court rejected the government’s contention that there was a single conspiracy in this drug case. The case presented a classic wheel conspiracy with no rim: one defendant was the supplier of drugs for many of the alleged co-conspirators, but there was nothing linking these various purchasers. The court concluded, however, that there was no prejudice to the defendants by this variance.

United States v. Johansen, 56 F.3d 347 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendant used fraudulent credit cards in schemes with two different sets of co-conspirators. Other conspirators also used fraudulent credit cards among themselves. The proof at trial did not show that there was one overarching conspiracy; rather, there were separate conspiracies. The error was prejudicial in this case because the evidence relating to other conspirators involved allegations of “mob” connections (including a connection to John Gotti). This evidence had no connection to the defendant. Moreover, the judge instructed the jury that, if a conspiracy involving the defendant was shown to exist, the acts of other conspirators could be considered in weighing the evidence against the defendant.

United States v. Stowell, 947 F.2d 1251 (5th Cir. 1991)

Defendant was charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. He contended at trial that he never entered into that conspiracy and that he only conspired to import the marijuana. The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the law of multiple conspiracies was reversible error.

United States v. Guerra-Marez, 928 F.2d 665 (5th Cir. 1991)

The evidence did not support defendant’s conspiracy conviction. The government relied on the fact that the defendant was related to another conspirator and discussed a heroin deal with the supplier of the other conspirator. The evidence showed, however, that the defendant was not conspiring with the other conspirators charged in the indictment. In short, while the evidence showed that the defendant distributed drugs and was part of a conspiracy, the evidence did not show that this conduct was part of the conspiracy alleged in the indictment.

United States v. Erwin, 793 F.2d 656 (5th Cir. 1986)

It was reversible error to refuse to give a multiple conspiracy instruction in this case. Though the evidence would warrant affirming the jury’s finding of a single conspiracy, an instruction on multiple conspiracies should have been given. Two groups operated similarly in the same time period and in close proximity. They cooperated with each other, shared information, and the two “bosses” shared supplies. However, co-conspirators testified that they worked for one or the other of the alleged bosses and turned their supplies and profits over to their respective bosses. With one minor exception, there was no interchange of personnel. In this circumstance, a multiple conspiracy instruction should have been given.

United States v. Dennis, 917 F.2d 1031 (7th Cir. 1990)

The government failed to prove that there was one conspiracy involving three individuals. Rather, the evidence seemed to indicate that there were two conspiracies, both of which had one common member. The fact that the common member referred to his supplier as “my man” did not establish that the other defendant had any relationship to that supplier.

United States v. Rosnow, 977 F.2d 399 (8th Cir. 1992)

Though each of the alleged conspirators engaged in a pattern of filing false reports with the IRS (phony 1099s, reporting income to their “enemies”), the defendants were not acting jointly and were not members of one overall conspiracy. This was a wheel conspiracy with no rim. The success of the venture of each taxpayer was not dependent on the success of any other person’s acts, so this was not a valid chain conspiracy. There were, therefore, multiple conspiracies, which, in turn, amounted to a material variance from the indictment. The defendants suffered from “an imputation of guilt from others’ conduct.”

United States v. Martin, 4 F.3d 757 (9th Cir. 1993)

The evidence failed to show that one of the defendants was involved in the overall conspiracy as charged in the indictment. The defendant introduced an undercover agent to his partner in the drug business. Unknown to the defendant, however, his “partner” double-crossed him and began dealing to the undercover agent, along with the other co-conspirators. The defendant was not aware of these other deals and could not be convicted of being a member of that conspiracy.

United States v. Harrison, 942 F.2d 751 (10th Cir. 1991)

The evidence at trial revealed the existence of three separate conspiracies, not one overall conspiracy as charged. Nevertheless, the error did not affect defendant’s right to a fair trial. Evidence against others in the indictment did not affect the jury’s consideration of the evidence against the defendant.

United States v. Coy, 19 F.3d 629 (11th Cir. 1994)

A low-flying airplane dropped bales of marijuana into the Gulf of Mexico, apparently after being chased by a Customs plane. Two boats that happened to be in the vicinity retrieved the marijuana and brought it to shore, where the owners of the boats then distributed the marijuana separately. Though the crews and owners of the boats knew each other, there was no evidence that the two groups were acting as a single conspiracy; rather, though they engaged in similar conduct, there was no proof that this represented a conspiracy among the two occupants of the two boats. However, the defendants suffered no prejudice.

United States v. Andrews, 953 F.2d 1312 (11th Cir. 1992)

The government offered no evidence linking the defendant to the conspiracy alleged in the indictment. Though the defendant was shown to have bought cocaine on several occasions, there was nothing to link these purchases with the conspiracy alleged in the indictment. On the contrary, the evidence showed that the defendant was a competitor of the other individuals in the conspiracy.
United States v. Fernandez, 892 F.2d 976 (11th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was charged with being in a conspiracy to illegally influence the operations of an employee-benefit plan. The defendant was the president of a local union and allegedly received a bribe to steer the health care contract to another defendant. The individual who paid the bribe also paid another bribe to another defendant who was a union official. The evidence at trial failed to establish that there was one overarching conspiracy linking all the defendants. Rather, the evidence indicated that there were separate conspiracies, neither of which was the indicted conspiracy. The defendant moved for a severance under Rule 8(b), but failed to renew the motion under Rule 14 following the close of the government’s case. Though this was the preferred method, the Eleventh Circuit held that the defendant’s reliance on the initial Rule 8 motion was not unreasonable and that, thus, the Court would decide whether the failure to sever at the close of the government’s case would have constituted an abuse of discretion had the motion been made. The Court holds that the improper joinder was prejudicial in this case.
A conspiracy may exist even if a conspirator does not agree to commit or facilitate each and every part of the substantive offense. If conspirators have a plan that calls for some conspirators to perpetrate the crime and others to provide support, the supporters are as guilty as the perpetrators. A person, moreover, may be liable for conspiracy even though he was incapable of committing the substantive offense.

Though the police officer-defendant was guilty of conspiring to deny the dealer’s civil rights by planting drugs on a drug dealer, the conviction for conspiring to possess with intent to distribute the drugs could not be sustained, because there was insufficient evidence that she intended to possess, or distribute the drugs.

The defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy with various members of his family. On the verdict form, the jury was asked to first mark whether the defendant was “guilty” or “not guilty” of the conspiracy charge and then, “If you unanimously find that a particular controlled substance was not involved in the offense [i.e., cocaine, crack cocaine, marijuana], mark ‘none’ on the appropriate special verdict form.” The jury returned a verdict of guilty against Randolph, but marked “none” beside each of the three drugs. The Sixth Circuit held that this amounted to an acquittal, because the jury had to find that the conspiracy had as its object at least one of the drugs. This is not a case in which there are inconsistent verdicts (which generally do not require a reversal). This was one count of the indictment for which the jury apparently found insufficient evidence with regard to one of the elements of the offense.

Defendant was charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute oxycodone. He requested an instruction on the lesser included offense of conspiracy to possess oxycodone (a conspiracy). The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury as requested. First, the court held that the fact that the indictment alleged that the defendants conspired to distribute and to possess with intent to distribute did not mean that a conspiracy to possess was not a lesser included offense because it is not a lesser offense of the conspiracy to distribute. (An indictment frequently charges in the conjunctive, but a jury can convict of either of the methods). Second, the fact that all conspirators did not share the limited conspiracy to simply possess the drugs did not mean that the defendant did not have that limited agreement with others.

The defendant was prosecuted for conspiring to import “khat” a plant grown in the Africa that sometimes contains a controlled substance known as cathinone. The plant itself is not illegal, but cathinone is. The evidence was sufficient to prove that he conspired to import khat containing cathinone. However, the jury instruction explaining the offense to the jury was erroneous. The jury instruction suggested that if the defendant conspired to import any controlled substance, the jury could convict the defendant. In this case, however, because of the confusion about whether khat was a controlled substance (it is not, but many government witnesses erroneously testified that it is), the judge should have specifically instructed the jury that the government had to prove that the defendant conspired to import khat containing cathinone in order to convict him of the conspiracy offense.

United States v. Howard, 517 F.3d 731 (5th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was charged with several counts of fraud, including one count that alleged that he falsified the company’s books (or was a co-conspirator with someone else who falsified the books) and thus committed honest services mail fraud. One theory on which the government relied was that pursuant to Pinkerton, he was guilty of the substantive acts of his co-conspirators. That theory, however, relied on an improper definition of honest services mail fraud. Because there was no way to determine if the jury relied on this improper theory, as opposed to another theory that would have been a permissible basis for a conviction, the Fifth Circuit agreed with the lower court that the conviction needed to be vacated.

United States v. Arbane, 446 F.3d 1223 (11th Cir. 2006)

The government failed to prove that there were any co-conspirators (other than a government informant) in defendant’s importation offense, thus, a conspiracy conviction could not be sustained. Though there was some evidence of at least one other person’s awareness of the defendant’s plan and that the other person helped store drugs in a foreign country, the evidence was insufficient to prove that the other person conspired to import the drugs. The government is obligated to prove that the defendant and the other person shared the same object in order to find the existence of a conspiracy. If the other person only conspired to possess the drugs, or conspired to distribute the drugs in South America, this would not be sufficient.

United States v. Richardson, 421 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 2005)

When there are alternate grounds on which a jury can convict a defendant on one count, an issue often arises on appeal whether a deficiency with regard to one alternative requires that the appellate court set aside the verdict. This may occur where there is a conspiracy to commit more than one offense (for example, the defendant is charged with conspiring to sell drugs and launder the proceeds), or a perjury prosecution with numerous false statements alleged in the same count. This case explains how an appellate court considers these types of challenges: if the appellant contends that the evidence was insufficient with regard to one alternative, then the conviction will not be reversed, because the court will assume that the jury relied on the alternative that was supported by sufficient evidence. But if the appellant contends that the deficiency with regard to one of the alternatives was in the jury instruction, then the appellate court will reverse, because the jury will not be presumed to have known that the jury instruction was erroneous and may have relied on the improper definition to convict the defendant of that alternative means of committing the offense. See generally Griffin v. United States, 502 U.S. 46 (1991). See also United States v. Banki, 660 F.3d 665, 677-78 n.9 (2d Cir. 2011).

United States v. Garcia-Torres, 280 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002)
Though the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant participated in a kidnapping and murder, there was insufficient proof that he was aware that the crimes were designed to further (or were in any way related to) his colleagues’ drug enterprise. He could not be convicted of conspiracy of possession with intent to distribute cocaine.

United States v. Nattier, 127 F.3d 655 (8th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged in one count with conspiring to embezzle money and then to launder the proceeds of this embezzlement. The trial court cured any potential duplicity problem by instructing the jury that in order to convict the defendant on this count, the jury was required to unanimously agree on the particular object of the conspiracy the defendant agreed to commit (i.e., embezzlement, or money laundering, or both).

United States v. High, 117 F.3d 464 (11th Cir. 1997)

The defendants were charged in one count with conspiring to violate several criminal laws, one of which was structuring currency transactions in violation of the CTR laws (31 U.S.C. § 5324). The trial was held prior to the decision in Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135 (1994), which held that a defendant had to be shown to have known the illegality of his conduct before he could be convicted of a CTR structuring violation. The trial court erroneously instructed the jury on this object of the conspiracy (incorrectly stating that ignorance of the criminal law was no defense). The Eleventh Circuit held that where the trial court erroneously sets forth the elements of one of the objects of a multi-object conspiracy, the conviction on the conspiracy count may not be sustained, even if there is sufficient evidence on the other objects and the other objects were properly defined.

United States v. Idowu, 157 F.3d 265 (3rd Cir. 1998)

The government failed to prove that the defendant was aware of the specific unlawful object of the conspiracy. Though the government satisfactorily proved that the defendant was a knowing participant in some form of unlawful activity involving contraband, there was insufficient proof that he was aware that the co-conspirator was involved in a drug transaction. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Durham, 825 F.2d 716 (2d Cir. 1987)

The defendants were charged with a conspiracy to commit arson. They requested an instruction that they must have had the specific intent to commit the arson in order to be guilty of the charged conspiracy. Their theory of defense was that they simply intended to take money for the venture, but never actually commit the arson. The trial court refused to give the instruction; this constituted reversible error.

United States v. Thomas, 114 F.3d 403 (3rd Cir. 1997)

While the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant knew he was engaged in some kind of illicit activity, the evidence did not establish that he knew the object of the conspiracy was possession with intent to distribute a large quantity of cocaine. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).
United States v. Alston, 77 F.3d 713 (3rd Cir. 1996)

This was a pre-1994 (i.e., Ratzlaf-controlled) CTR prosecution in which the defendant was charged with a double-edged §371 conspiracy (conspiracy to commit a CTR offense and conspiracy to defraud the U.S.), as well as with a substantive CTR violation. The court concludes that the erroneous instruction regarding willfulness infected the entire case. Obviously, the substantive count was invalid because of Ratzlaf. In addition, the conspiracy to commit the CTR offense was void because, in order to convict a defendant of conspiracy under the “offense” clause, the government must prove whatever level of mens rea is required for conviction of the underlying substantive offense. The Third Circuit concluded here, moreover, that proving a conspiracy to defraud the United States also requires proof that the defendant know the CTR structuring prohibition.

United States v. Schramm, 75 F.3d 156 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The defendant, who was a wholesaler of diesel fuel, was charged with conspiring to evade the payment of retail state fuel taxes. He claimed that the evidence only supported a charge that he conspired to evade the payment of wholesale federal fuel taxes. This was a valid defense. The evidence did not show that the defendant knew, or should have known, that the retailers intended to evade the payment of their retail taxes. The mere fact that defendant’s actions aided the retailers in evading their taxes was not sufficient without proof that he knowingly engaged in that conspiracy. In a conspiracy charge like this, the object of the conspiracy, as alleged, must be proved.

United States v. Wexler, 838 F.2d 88 (3rd Cir. 1988)

Where there was substantial evidence that the jury could conclude that the defendant was involved in a conspiracy concerning the movement of a truck’s cargo, there was no evidence that the defendant knew the cargo was hashish. His conviction for conspiracy to distribute hashish was reversed on sufficiency grounds. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Palazzolo, 71 F.3d 1233 (6th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with a conspiracy which had three illegal objects, one of which was structuring financial transactions. The trial court instructed the jury erroneously about the mens rea element of the structuring offense (see Ratzlaf v. United States, 114 S.Ct. 655 (1994)). The conspiracy conviction had to be set aside. Because the jury may have relied on the invalid object – that is, the object that was improperly defined – the general verdict could not be upheld.

United States v. Martinez, 83 F.3d 371 (11th Cir. 1996)

The government must prove that the object of the conspiracy, as alleged in the indictment, is, in fact, the object the defendant agreed to achieve. Here, the defendant participated in the theft of a suitcase, which the other participants knew contained drugs. He claimed that he thought he was participating in a theft of money. Because there was no testimony that he was told that the theft involved drugs, his conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute drugs was reversed.

United States v. Howard, 918 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1990)

The evidence was not sufficient to support the defendant’s conviction for conspiring or attempting to kidnap a DEA agent. The defendants were attempting to “rip-off” the undercover DEA agent. When he was inspecting the cocaine he was about to purchase, the agent was pushed into a car and guns were drawn. He immediately drew his gun and escaped. This was not sufficient evidence to prove that the defendants were attempting to kidnap, or conspiring to kidnap, him.
CONSPIRACY
(Pinkerton)

United States v. Howard, 517 F.3d 731 (5th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was charged with several counts of fraud, including one count that alleged that he falsified the company’s books (or was a co-conspirator with someone else who falsified the books) and thus committed honest services mail fraud. One theory on which the government relied was that pursuant to Pinkerton, he was guilty of the substantive acts of his co-conspirators. That theory, however, relied on an improper definition of honest services mail fraud. Because there was no way to determine if the jury relied on this improper theory, as opposed to another theory that would have been a permissible basis for a conviction, the Fifth Circuit agreed with the lower court that the conviction needed to be vacated.

United States v. Bruno, 383 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2004)

The conspirators could not have envisioned that six years after they participated in a murder, one of their confederates would lie to investigators about the crime. Under a Pinkerton theory, a conviction for making a false statement could not be sustained.

United States v. Tarallo, 380 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2004)

The government sought to sustain certain counts in this securities fraud prosecution under the “co-schemer” theory that provides that when a group of people perpetrate a fraud, one fraudster is responsible for the frauds committed by his confederates. The problem in this case, however, is that the government did not request an instruction to the jury on this theory and therefore a conviction on this theory could not be sustained.

United States v. Rawlings, 341 F.3d 657 (7th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was the driver for a couple armed bank robbers. He was aware that they possessed guns when the other two exited the car to rob the bank, though there was no evidence that he was aware of their possession of the guns before that time. The trial court instructed the jury that possession had to be “knowing” but did not instruct the jury on the concept of constructive possession, or Pinkerton. In a decision by Judge Posner, the court held that the evidence was insufficient to prove the defendant’s conviction of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The problem, according to Judge Posner was not the instructional error, there was simply insufficient proof that the defendant was, in fact, in either actual or constructive possession of the firearms that his co-defendants possessed. There was no evidence that he purchased the guns, gave them to the conspirators, or encouraged them to be armed. No other evidence suggested that he exercised dominion or control over the guns. With regard to Pinkerton, that concept enables a person to be convicted of an offense committed by someone else in the conspiracy, but it does not authorize the finding of specific elements of some other offense (such as the possession of a weapon) based on a conspirator’s conduct. Thus, the defendant, on a Pinkerton theory, could be found guilty of other offenses of the conspirators, but not, on that theory, of their possession of a firearm.

United States v. Morfin, 151 F.3d 1149 (9th Cir. 1998)
The trial court erroneously instructed the jury that “any person who conspires to commit an offense . . . is guilty of the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy.” It is not true that conviction of a conspiracy automatically results in conviction of the substantive offense. This instruction, however, was harmless error.

_United States v. Blackmon_, 839 F.2d 900 (2d Cir. 1988)

It is improper to instruct the jury in a conspiracy case that it is the jury’s duty to convict a member of a conspiracy for substantive offenses committed by co-conspirators prior to the defendant’s entry into the conspiracy. The defendant cannot be held retroactively liable for substantive offenses committed prior to his joining the conspiracy.

_United States v. Labat_, 905 F.2d 18 (2d Cir. 1990)

There was no evidence supporting the defendant’s conviction of possessing cocaine. Although the evidence was sufficient to support his conspiracy conviction, the trial judge did not instruct the jury on the law of _Pinkerton_, thus the Court of Appeals could not affirm the conviction on that theory.

_United States v. Polk_, 56 F.3d 613 (5th Cir. 1995)

Though a conspirator may be found guilty of substantive offenses committed by co-conspirators which were within the scope of the conspiracy under the _Pinkerton_ theory, if the jury is not instructed about the _Pinkerton_ theory, then a conviction on this theory may not be upheld. In this case, the conviction of one conspirator on one of the substantive counts was reversed because the only evidence of his participation was that his car was used in a drug transaction; however, he was not seen in the car nor was he identified as having participated in the transaction in any way.

_United States v. Elizondo_, 920 F.2d 1308 (7th Cir. 1990)

The trial judge gave an incomplete _Pinkerton_ instruction; nevertheless, it was harmless error in this case.

_United States v. Spudic_, 795 F.2d 1334 (7th Cir. 1986)

In this mail fraud prosecution, the jury was not instructed on a _Pinkerton_ theory of culpability. That is, the jury was not instructed that the acts of one co-conspirator can be attributed to the defendant if he had agreed to be a member of the conspiracy. If the jury so found, the defendant could be found guilty of the substantive offenses committed by other co-conspirators. Because the jury was not instructed on a _Pinkerton_ theory, the substantive conviction could not stand.

CONSPIRACY (Withdrawal)

Smith v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 714 (2013)

If a defendant claims that he withdrew from a conspiracy outside the statute of limitations period, he has the burden of proving, by a preponderance of the evidence, this defense.

United States v. Arias, 431 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2005)

The defendant introduced sufficient evidence to warrant an instruction on the law of withdrawal from the conspiracy – and thus a statute of limitations defense. The defendant, a doctor, was charged with conspiring with others to defraud Medicare. More than five years prior to the indictment, he wrote a letter to Medicare, stating that he no longer would be a Medicare provider at the facility where the crime was being committed, thus signaling his withdrawal from the conspiracy to other conspirators who had previously relied on his participation in the program as a means to commit the crime.
CONTEMPT

(Procedural Issues)

The Supreme Court set forth a number of rules governing contempt proceedings in the context of failure to comply with a court order. The Court concludes that the type of remedy or punishment imposed provides a strong indication whether the proceeding is criminal or civil, but that other considerations must also be evaluated. If the Court determines that a proceeding is criminal, the full panoply of constitutional protections must be afforded the accused: he must be provided with adequate notice and the State must prove beyond a reasonable doubt all the elements of the offense, including, in a contempt proceeding, the ability of the respondent to comply with the court order. In a civil case, on the other hand, it is permissible to require the respondent to demonstrate that he was incapable of complying with the court order, such as the payment of child support.

Young v. United States ex rel Vuitton Et Fils, 106 S.Ct. 3270 (1987)

The Supreme Court holds that it is permissible to have a private prosecutor in a contempt action, but it is improper to appoint a party that would be the beneficiary of the court order that supposedly had been violated. A private prosecutor should be as disinterested in the outcome of a criminal prosecution as a public prosecutor would be.

United States v. Agosto-Vega, 731 F.3d 62 (1st Cir. 2013)

Prior to the re-trial of the defendant, counsel filed numerous motions in limine. The trial court held the lawyer and the defendant in contempt and fined them $2,000 for the “abusive” late filing of the motions. There was nothing in the record, however, that limited the right to file motions in limine, or set forth a timetable for such motions. The trial court also failed to provide any notice to the lawyer or defendant about the proposed sanctions, and did not give them a right to be heard on this issue. The sanctions, therefore, could not be upheld.

United States v. Britton, 731 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 2013)

Defense counsel failed to appear at a status conference and was held in contempt following a show cause hearing. The trial judge found that the attorney make false statements about his reason for not appearing both in writing and at the show cause hearing (i.e., he claimed to have a conflict in another court). The Seventh Circuit reversed, because the summary contempt procedures outlined in Rule 42(b) were not appropriate in this circumstance. The failure to appear in court is not conduct that occurs “in the presence of the court” so that conduct does not justify summary contempt proceedings and because the trial court relied on extrinsic evidence in making his findings about the lawyer’s statements at the show cause hearing, this cannot support summary contempt proceedings.

United States v. Peoples, 698 F.3d 185 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was prosecuted for contempt of court. At his contempt trial, he appeared late (he had appeared late at previous proceedings, as well). The court held the defendant in contempt on the charged offense and then summarily held him in contempt a second time for being late to court for the contempt hearing. The Fourth Circuit held that a summary contempt proceeding was not appropriate for the charge that he was late to court. The court should have set this matter down for a hearing, provided time for the defendant to prepare and appointed a prosecutor.

Federal Trade Commission v. Trudeau, 606 F.3d 382 (7th Cir. 2010)

The defendant in this FTC action was not pleased with the course of the proceedings and on his radio program, he exhorted his audience to send emails to the district court judge on his behalf. The judge held the defendant in direct criminal contempt because of this “virtual” contact with the judge. The Seventh Circuit reversed. Because the judge had to engage in fact-finding (i.e., had to determine the genesis of the emails that were sent to him) and the defendant’s conduct did not occur in the immediate presence of the court this could not be characterized as direct criminal contempt that required immediate action without a hearing.

In re Gates, 600 F.3d 333 (4th Cir. 2010)

Counsel appeared in court fifteen minutes late for a change of plea hearing. This does not constitute an act committed “in the actual presence of the court” and is therefore not punishable summarily under Rule 42(b). See also United States v. Nunez, 801 F.2d 1260 (11th Cir. 1986) (same). The Fourth Circuit also concluded that the evidence was insufficient to find that the attorney was in willful contempt of court. The attorney explained that his assistant had received an ambiguous phone call from the prosecutor stating that the change of plea hearing might occur the next day (as opposed to the previously scheduled date). The trial court’s statement that the attorney should have followed up and clarified the matter was not a basis to hold the attorney in contempt.

United States v. Cohn, 586 F.3d 844 (11th Cir. 2009)

The Eleventh Circuit holds that a contempt “conviction” is not a felony under the sentencing statutes. In fact, it is neither a felony, nor a misdemeanor. Rather it is sui generis. No particular sentencing guideline applies.

United States v. Moncier, 571 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2009)

The attorney disobeyed a court order rather than appealing. This supported a contempt conviction. However, the case should have been tried before a judge other than the judge whose order was disobeyed. Rule 42(a)(3).

In re Troutt, 460 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in suspending the attorney from practicing in federal court as a sanction for his alleged criminal contempt. The only two penalties for criminal contempt are a fine, or imprisonment. If the judge wanted to impose some other form of punishment, he should have instituted disciplinary proceedings. In addition, the conduct in this case – writing vitriolic letters to the judge – was not direct contempt and should have been heard by a different judge after due process protections were afforded the attorney.

In re Contempt Order (Petersen), 441 F.3d 1266 (10th Cir. 2006)
A Magistrate held a prosecutor in summary contempt for being five minutes late to a hearing. This was improper. Being late to court is not conduct that occurs “in the presence of the court” and the attorney must be afforded the right to explain his tardiness.

United States v. Glass, 361 F.3d 580 (9th Cir. 2004)

The trial court held the defendant in summary contempt for making misrepresentations about her finances during an inquiry into her eligibility for appointed counsel. There was no need to conduct summary contempt proceedings, however, and the Ninth Circuit reversed. There was no need to dispel an immediate threat to the court; and the contemptuous conduct that was committed in the presence of the court could only be proved with facts that were extrinsic to the proceedings. See Pounders v. Watson, 521 U.S. 982 (1997) (Rule 42(b) summary contempt is appropriate only where all of the essential elements of the misconduct are under the eye of the court and are actually observed by the court).

United States v. Cooper, 353 F.3d 161 (2d Cir. 2003)

The attorney reported to the judge that his client was going to be hospitalized for a cancer operation. The District Court judge responded, “If you’re stating that somebody is sick, we have to have a doctor’s affidavit that says that.” Later, the attorney reported that the client was suffering from a heart condition. The judge, in a phone conference with the attorneys, again demanded a written doctor’s affidavit. The attorney produced a fax from the hospital documenting the client’s admission to the hospital’s coronary care unit. When the hearing was held, the client did not appear and the judge held the attorney in contempt for failing to produce an affidavit. The Second Circuit reversed: The attorney did nothing to disrupt the proceedings in such a manner that the summary contempt proceedings were necessary to restore order. The appellate court also questioned whether the failure to produce an affidavit in this situation could even have amounted to contemptuous conduct. The absence of any formal Order from the trial court (i.e., the trial judge relied on her telephone conversation to support the contempt citation) however, was fatal to the adjudication of contempt.

Even in summary contempt proceeding, the “defendant” must be afforded the right to make a statement before the court makes a finding of contempt. Only the need to take immediate action obviates this requirement. In this case, the defendant was a lawyer who pursued a line of questioning that had been previously ruled improper.

United States v. Pina, 844 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1988)

Three contempt hearings were held during the course of the trial that served as the stage for the contemnor’s misconduct. The contempt hearings were conducted without a jury. Each hearing involved numerous contempt charges, and the total possible sentence far exceeded six months for each hearing. The First Circuit holds that the contemnor had a right to trial by jury.

United States v. 20th Century Fox Film Corp., 882 F.2d 656 (2d Cir. 1989)

A corporation is entitled to a jury trial in a prosecution for criminal contempt under the Sixth Amendment if there is a possibility of the imposition of a substantial fine. The Second Circuit holds that a fine in excess of $100,000 is automatically sufficient to trigger the right to a jury trial.

United States v. Ayer, 866 F.2d 571 (2d Cir. 1989)

A contempt order in this case required the defendant to serve 15 days of confinement. There was no method by which the defendant could purge the order of contempt. Therefore, this was a criminal contempt order and was invalid because of the failure to provide the procedural safeguards necessary for an adjudication of criminal contempt.

Taberer v. Armstrong World Industries, Inc., 954 F.2d 888 (3rd Cir. 1992)

When contemptuous conduct occurs in proceedings before a Magistrate, the District Court must conduct a de novo hearing. The district judge may not rely on the record established in the Magistrate’s division. The Third Circuit also reviews the general rules governing criminal contempt proceedings. No prior civil contempt sanction must be attempted prior to resorting to criminal contempt and no “obstruction of justice” must occur as a prerequisite to criminal contempt proceedings, unless summary contempt proceedings are utilized.

United States v. Neal, 101 F.3d 993 (4th Cir. 1996)

A witness failed to appear after being subpoenaed. The district judge conducted a contempt proceeding and acted as the prosecutor, asking the witness questions, and then adjudicating the recalcitrant witness guilty. This was procedurally flawed. The district court should have appointed a prosecutor to handle the prosecutorial function of the case.

In re Johnson, 921 F.2d 585 (5th Cir. 1991)

An attorney was held in contempt and barred from practicing in the bankruptcy court because of an apparent misrepresentation she made to one judge about what another judge had said. The judge whose statement had been erroneously repeated by the attorney entered the contempt and disbarment order. The judge should have recused himself in light of his evident partiality.

S.E.C. v. Carter, 907 F.2d 484 (5th Cir. 1990)

The S.E.C. issued an injunction relating to certain activities of two corporations and an individual. The S.E.C. alleged that the defendants violated the injunction and sought to hold them in contempt. It was improper for the S.E.C. lawyers to handle the case on behalf of the government.

Griffith v. Oles, 895 F.2d 1503 (5th Cir. 1990)

Bankruptcy courts have no authority to hold a party in criminal contempt for willful disobedience of its orders. For a contempt charge governed by 18 U.S.C. §401(3), the party must be tried in District Court.

The court imposed a fine on the defendant corporation because of its failure to comply with injunctive orders issued by the court. These fines were not contingent on the defendant’s taking, or refraining from taking, any action and were not compensatory – the fines were paid to the court, not the government (plaintiff). The fines, therefore, were punitive and thus criminal in nature, not civil. As such, the fines were improper because the government was not required to prove that the defendant was in contempt beyond a reasonable doubt.
In re Chandler, 906 F.2d 248 (6th Cir. 1990)

The defendant’s tardiness upon appearing in court should not have been punished by contempt. He was late because of a conflict of which he was unaware until the day in question. The defendant lacked the requisite intent, and his contempt citation was vacated. The Sixth Circuit holds that, not only was the evidence insufficient, but the procedure followed by the District Court was inadequate. The trial court could not have known why the attorney was late, thus the contemptuous conduct did not occur in his presence. Summary disposition of the matter was therefore inappropriate.

In re Contempt of Greenberg, 849 F.2d 1251 (9th Cir. 1988)

A defense attorney was held in summary criminal contempt because of his action of slamming his book down on the table and demanding “at the top of his voice” a ruling on his objection. However, the trial judge, in his order of contempt, failed to comply with Rule 42(a) because he failed to certify that he “saw or heard” the contemptuous conduct. The transcript of the proceedings may not be used to fulfill the certification requirement.
CONTEMPT
(Miscellaneous)

_United States v. Murphy_, 326 F.3d 501 (4th Cir. 2003)

The defendant twice called the judge an obscene name following the imposition of sentence, and then made an obscene gesture. This amounts to one act of contempt under 18 U.S.C. § 401(1).

_United States v. Arredondo_, 349 F.3d 310 (6th Cir. 2003)

A defendant filed a § 2255 petition, claiming that his attorney failed to advise him of plea offers that had been made prior to his conviction. The trial court found that the assertions made by the defendant in his affidavits and in his testimony at the § 2255 hearing were false and held him in contempt. The Sixth Circuit reversed. The defendant could be prosecuted for perjury, but this type of conduct is not contemptuous.

_United States v. Marquardo_, 149 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 1998)

The defendant was the subject of a civil contempt proceeding when he refused to testify before a grand jury, despite having been granted immunity. When the term of the grand jury expired, he was released. Thereafter, he was indicted for criminal contempt. The First Circuit holds that this does not violate double jeopardy. This case contains a lengthy discussion of the differences between civil and criminal contempt, both historically and in modern practice.
CONTEMPT
(Substantive Issues)

The Court reiterated the principle that summary contempt procedures must be reserved for those cases in which the misconduct occurs in the presence of the judge, which disturbs the court’s business, where all of the essential elements of the misconduct are under the eye of the court and are actually observed by the court, and where immediate punishment is essential to prevent demoralization of the court’s authority before the public. The Court upheld a summary contempt conviction in this case where an attorney asked his client a question about the possible sentence he was facing after the court repeatedly warned the attorneys in the case that this evidence was not admissible during the guilt phase of this trial.

In re Goode, 821 F.3d 553 (5th Cir. 2016)

In order to punish an attorney for contumacious behavior pursuant to the court’s inherent powers, there must be a finding that the attorney acted in bad faith. To punish an attorney for violating local rule, however, does not require a finding of bad faith. In this case, an attorney spoke to the press about a case during a lunch break. Prior to the break, the court indicated that it intended to declare a mistrial after lunch and, in fact, after lunch it did declare a mistrial (one of the defendants committed suicide that morning). The Fifth Circuit held that punishing the attorney for making the lunch time press statement violated the First Amendment. The Local rule essentially forbid any communications with the press. However, prior restraints on trial participants must be narrowly tailored to only prohibit speech that has a “meaningful likelihood of materially impairing the court’s ability to conduct a fair trial.”

United States v. Pickering, 794 F.3d 802 (7th Cir. 2015)

A woman was summoned to appear for jury duty and failed to appear. She explained at a show cause hearing that she forgot about the notice to appear. If true, her forgetfulness was not the equivalent of willful disobedience of a summons. The trial judge, however, improperly put the burden on her to prove her forgetfulness and this was improper. There was not proof beyond a reasonable doubt that she did not forget, so the evidence was insufficient to convict her.

United States v. Farah, 766 F.3d 599 (6th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was held in contempt for refusing to testify about a fellow gang member. In a separate proceeding, the defendant refused to testify about another gang member. This does not support separate contempt prosecutions. Once the defendant announced the refusal to testify against fellow gang members, the government may not create additional “opportunities” for the defendant to be held in contempt again. See also Yates v. United States, 355 U.S. 66 (1957) (the prosecution cannot multiply contempts by repeated questioning on the same subject of inquiry within which a recalcitrant witness already refused answers).

United States v. Aleo, 681 F.3d 290 (6th Cir. 2012)

Defense counsel filed a motion that the district court decided was designed to intimidate the child abuse victim from testifying. The Sixth Circuit held that the record did no support the defense counsel’s motion was filed in bad faith. Whether the position the attorney advanced was right or wrong, it was not a bad faith effort to obstruct justice.

United States v. Kimsey, 668 F.3d 691 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with contempt under § 402 on the basis that he was ghost-writing pleadings for a pro se litigant and was not a licensed attorney. This violated a local rule of court which adopted state criminal offenses. The Ninth Circuit, agreeing with the DC Circuit, held that violating a local rule is not the proper subject of a contempt conviction under § 402. Only violations of orders, writs, processes or commands qualifies to support a contempt prosecution. Even though the list also includes “rules” the intent of Congress was not to include local rules.

United States v. Allen, 587 F.3d 246 (5th Cir. 2009)

In order to be found guilty of contempt under 18 U.S.C. § 401(3), the elements are (1) a reasonably specific order; (2) violation of the order; and (3) the willful intent to violate the order. The third elements – willfullness – requires more than negligence. In this case, the court explained that the willfullness element could be established with proof that the defendant “reasonably should have been aware that her conduct was wrong.” This is not the correct standard. At a minimum, the defendant must have acted recklessly, not negligently.

In re Troutt, 460 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in suspending the attorney from practicing in federal court as a sanction for his alleged criminal contempt. The only two penalties for criminal contempt are a fine, or imprisonment. If the judge wanted to impose some other form of punishment, he should have instituted disciplinary proceedings. In addition, the conduct in this case – writing vitriolic letters to the judge – was not direct contempt and should have been heard by a different judge after due process protections were afforded the attorney.

United States v. Rangolan, 464 F.3d 321 (2d Cir. 2006)

A plaintiff in a civil case approached a juror who was in the cafeteria of the courthouse (ten floors away from the courtroom) and suggested that he read certain papers. The juror promptly reported the contact to the court. The Second Circuit holds that this contact did not amount to contempt “in the immediate presence of the court” as required by 18 U.S.C. § 401(1). The cafeteria was too far away from the courtroom (and court was not in session when the contact occurred) to satisfy this element of the criminal contempt statute.

In re Contempt Order (Petersen), 441 F.3d 1266 (10th Cir. 2006)

A Magistrate held a prosecutor in summary contempt for being five minutes late to a hearing. This was improper. Being late to court is not conduct that occurs “in the presence of the court” and the attorney must be afforded the right to explain his tardiness.

United States v. Cooper, 353 F.3d 161 (2d Cir. 2003)

The attorney reported to the judge that his client was going to be hospitalized for a cancer operation. The District Court judge responded, “If you’re stating that somebody is sick, we have to have a doctor’s affidavit that says that.” Later, the attorney reported that the client was suffering from a heart condition. The judge, in a phone conference with the attorneys, again demanded a written doctor’s affidavit. The attorney produced a fax from the hospital documenting the client’s admission to the hospital’s coronary care unit. When the hearing was held, the client did not appear and the judge held the attorney in contempt for failing to produce an affidavit. The Second Circuit reversed: The attorney did nothing to disrupt the proceedings in such a manner that the summary contempt proceedings were necessary to restore order. The appellate court also questioned whether the failure to produce an affidavit in this situation could even have amounted to contemptsuous conduct. The absence of any formal Order from the trial court (i.e., the trial judge relied on her telephone conversation to support the contempt citation) however, was fatal to the adjudication of contempt.

United States v. Arredondo, 349 F.3d 310 (6th Cir. 2003)

The defendant filed a § 2255 in which he alleged that his trial attorney failed to notify him about a plea offer. The defendant’s version changed, however and it was apparent that he was fabricating his story. The District Court denied the § 2255 petition and then held the defendant in contempt. The Sixth Circuit upheld the denial of the petition, but reversed the contempt conviction. Perjury committed in court is not, alone, a basis for holding a person in contempt.

United States v. Rapone, 131 F.3d 188 (D.C. Cir. 1997)

The defendants were charged with violating a court order that prohibited correction officers from retaliating against department employees who claimed they were victimized by sexual harassment. With regard to one defendant, however, the evidence failed to show that he did anything other than complain generally about the employee's work habits, as opposed to retaliating against her in response to her sexual harassment claim.

United States v. West (Fawer), 21 F.3d 607 (5th Cir. 1994)

After disobeying the judge’s directions limiting certain areas of cross-examination, the defense attorney was fined $200 for being in contempt. After the jury left the room, the defense attorney said that he would not pay the fine. The trial judge then ordered the attorney incarcerated for 12 hours. This was inappropriate: the attorney’s conduct was disrespectful and imprudent, but it did not cross the line into the area of criminal contempt.

In re Chandler, 906 F.2d 248 (6th Cir. 1990)

The defendant’s tardiness upon appearing in court should not have been punished by contempt. He was late because of a conflict of which he was unaware until the day in question. The defendant lacked the requisite intent, and his contempt citation was vacated. The Sixth Circuit holds that, not only was the evidence insufficient but the procedure followed by the District Court was inadequate. The trial court could not have known why the attorney was late, thus the contemptuous conduct did not occur in his presence. Summary disposition of the matter was therefore inappropriate.

United States v. Mottweiler, 82 F.3d 769 (7th Cir. 1996)

While the jury was deliberating, the attorneys were told to remain “accessible” in case a question or verdict was returned. The attorney gave his pager number to the clerk and then left. The jury returned a verdict, but the attorney’s pager did not work. This did not amount to willful wrongdoing and did not support a criminal contempt conviction. Perhaps the lawyer could be ordered, in a civil context, to reimburse the court for the expense of bringing the jurors back the next day, but a criminal contempt conviction was not appropriate.

In re Betts, 927 F.2d 983 (7th Cir. 1991)

Defense counsel was held in contempt for failing to appear at a hearing involving the recusal of the trial judge. The notice of hearing, however, did not clearly require the attendance of counsel. The notice simply set a date for a final hearing and acknowledged the receipt of memoranda. This did not provide an adequate basis for contempt. Also, even though the attorney served his sentence (15 days), because of collateral consequences of a contempt conviction, the case was not moot.

United States v. Wunsch (Swan), 84 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir. 1996)

After the attorney was conflicted out of representing the defendant, he sent a letter, which had sexist content, to the female assistant United States attorney. This was not a basis for imposing sanctions on the attorney. His conduct did not interfere with the administration of justice and did not impugn the integrity of the court. A local rule which adopted a California statute which provided “it is the duty of an attorney to abstain from all offensive personality” was unconstitutionally vague.

United States v. Maynard, 933 F.2d 918 (11th Cir. 1991)

An attorney failed to appear on time at a status conference and was held in contempt of court. He explained to the judge that he was on a scheduled flight that would have arrived on time, but the flight was cancelled and the next flight resulted in his being one and one-half hours late. The trial judge erred in holding the attorney in contempt. To be in willful contempt, the attorney must have acted deliberately and intended to violate the court’s order. The evidence in this case was insufficient to uphold a contempt citation.

United States v. Robinson, 922 F.2d 1531 (11th Cir. 1991)

An attorney made a “speaking objection.” (“Your honor, I would submit he has no independent recollection and that this is the only way he can identify it, and I would object. That’s what the government has done all throughout this trial.”) This “objection” was not sufficient to subject the attorney to being held in contempt. “It is the right of counsel for every litigant to press his claim, even if it appears farfetched and untenable, to obtain the Court’s ruling. Full enjoyment of that right, with due allowance for the heat of controversy, will be protected by appellate courts when infringed by trial courts.”

Krasnow v. Navarro, 909 F.2d 451 (11th Cir. 1990)

The Eleventh Circuit upheld an attorney’s contempt conviction. The attorney failed to appear at a scheduled trial and provided no notice to the trial court that he was in trial in another court at that time. Although the attorney did have a real conflict, he should have notified the Court.

In re Finkelstein, 901 F.2d 1560 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant, the attorney for certain civil rights plaintiffs, prevailed during the liability portion of the trial. Prior to the commencement of the damages hearing, the attorney wrote a letter to the defendant’s counsel which contained numerous veiled threats about the attorney’s intentions of contacting the press and local union organizers. The district court issued an order suspending the attorney from the practice of law because of his unprofessional conduct.
Eleventh Circuit reverses. Because the attorney was not on notice that such conduct would be considered unethical in the Middle District of Georgia, his suspension could not be upheld.

United States v. Burstyn, 878 F.2d 1322 (11th Cir. 1989)

The Court of Appeals holds that a defense attorney’s failure to appear on the first day of a specially set trial suffices to authorize a conviction for contempt. The attorney was specifically ordered by the Court to appear on that day and failed to notify the Court of a conflict which necessitated his being out of town.

United States v. Wright, 854 F.2d 1263 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant’s action in hitting his defense attorney in the courtroom was sufficient to support a contempt conviction under 18 U.S.C. §401(1). Because the sentencing proceeding had not yet ended, his conduct did interfere with the administration of justice.

United States v. Turner (In re Moore), 812 F.2d 1552 (11th Cir. 1987)

The attorney was held in contempt for pursuing a line of questioning which had been prohibited by the court. The prohibition, however, was not sufficiently specific. The contempt conviction could not be upheld.

United States v. NYNEX Corp., 8 F.3d 52 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

The consent decree in this case was not sufficiently clear to authorize a contempt conviction for its violation.
CONTINUANCES

United States v. Sellers, 645 F.3d 830 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant hired one attorney to represent him at trial. Another attorney, at the request of the retained attorney, made the first appearance and attended various preliminary hearings and ultimately filed motions. As the trial date neared, however, the retained attorney had still not filed his appearance and the defendant complained that he wanted the retained attorney to represent him. Ultimately, the retained attorney had a conflict and could not appear on the scheduled trial date and the defendant insisted that a newly-retained attorney be substituted as his attorney, but that this would require a continuance, since this new attorney was not prepared. The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s request for a continuance to enable his newly-retained attorney to prepare. The attorney who had been representing the defendant up until that point had never been retained by the defendant and was only filling in for the initially retained attorney. That attorney as required to proceed to trial. Though the continuance would cause inconvenience to the court and other litigants, the defendant’s right to counsel was not adequately considered by the trial court. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Kloehn, 620 F.3d 1122 (9th Cir. 2010)

Shortly before the defendant was scheduled to testify in his criminal trial, his son was suddenly stricken ill and was expected to die imminently. The defense requested a continuance. The trial court denied the motion and required the defendant to testify on schedule, but excused the defendant thereafter. The Ninth Circuit reversed. Forcing the defendant to prepare for his testimony while his son was about to die was unreasonable and a continuance should have been granted mid-trial.

United States v. Williams, 576 F.3d 385 (7th Cir. 2009)

Denying the defendants’ motion for a continuance of trial was an abuse of discretion. Five days prior to trial, the AUSA announced that he had an additional witness in this armed robbery case: the getaway driver. In addition, the government revealed that it had released from subpoena another witness (whose testimony would have been inconsistent with the getaway driver’s testimony). The defendants were not able to locate the witness and secure his testimony. The Seventh Circuit held that denying a continuance was an abuse of discretion. The Seventh Circuit also held that the defendants are not required to prove actual prejudice in arguing prejudice post-trial. In other words, the defendants are not required to do the investigative work that they could have done pretrial (if given enough time) in order to show that denying the continuance resulted in actual prejudice.

United States v. Heron, 564 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2009)

The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s motion for a continuance. One key witness for the government (defendant’s erstwhile co-defendant) had provided a statement to the DEA that the defendant was a reluctant participant in one drug transaction. The night before trial, however, the witness changed his story and revealed that the defendant had participated in prior drug transactions with the witness. The trial court erred in denying defendant’s motion to grant a continuance so the new allegations could be investigated.
Carlson v. Jess, 526 F.3d 1018 (7th Cir. 2008)

Shortly before trial, the defendant requested a continuance in order to switch from one retained counsel to another, revealing that there was a breakdown in communication with his current lawyer and a failure to prepare the case as needed. Both attorneys appeared and urged the court to grant the continuance in order to facilitate the change of counsel. The trial court refused, noting that the administration of justice required that the case proceed to trial. The Seventh Circuit concludes that the state court acted arbitrarily in denying the request for a continuance in this situation. “In sum, the trial judge ignored the presumption in favor of Carlson’s counsel of choice and insisted upon expeditiousness for its own sake.” The court finally concluded that the denial of his right to retain his chosen counsel had an adverse effect on the presentation of his case.

United States v. Garner, 507 F.3d 399 (6th Cir. 2007)

Just as the trial was beginning, the government furnished to the defense cell phone records that were obtained by the government several days earlier. The cell phone records belonged to the victim of the carjacking. The cell phone was stolen along with the car and the records apparently disclosed the identity of people that the perpetrator called. Failing to turn the records over to the defense violated Brady. Alternatively, the trial court should have granted a continuance to enable the defense to investigate the numbers called by the perpetrator.

United States v. Rivera-Guerrero, 426 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2005)

The trial court erred in denying the defendant a continuance after the government experts testified about the types of drugs they intended to use to medicate the defendant “back into competency.” The attorney could have hired an expert prior to the hearing, but the expert would have needed more time after the government witnesses testified to prepare a response to their planned treatment protocol. The other factors governing whether a denial of a continuance was an abuse of discretion also counseled in favor of reversing the decision of the lower court.

Pazden v. Maurer, 424 F.3d 303 (3d Cir. 2005)

In a complicated white collar prosecution, counsel requested a continuance in order to prepare. This request was denied and the defendant then announced that he would represent himself, because the attorney could not be ready. The defendant did, in fact, proceed pro se and the Third Circuit held that this amounted to a violation of his sixth amendment right to counsel. The defendant’s waiver of his right to counsel was not the product of a free and meaningful choice.

United States v. Verderame, 51 F.3d 249 (11th Cir. 1995)

The trial court, in its haste to dispose of cases on its docket, denied the defendant his Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel. Here, there were 34 days between the arraignment and the trial. The case involved two drug conspiracies and massive criminal forfeitures which were predicated on a net worth theory. The trial court should have granted the defendant’s motion for a continuance to prepare his defense. Additionally, the government did not comply with a request for a bill of particulars until shortly before trial, and was also late in

Bennett v. Scroggy, 793 F.2d 772 (6th Cir. 1986)

It was reversible error to fail to give the defendant an overnight continuance to secure the attendance of a subpoenaed witness who would have testified favorably to him.

United States v. Mejia, 69 F.3d 309 (9th Cir. 1995)

At the defendant’s suppression hearing, the defense requested a one-day continuance in order to secure the attendance of the two investigating officers, the credibility of whom was critical to the findings of the judge conducting the hearing. The judge denied the motion, holding instead that he would read the transcript of the officers’ testimony at an earlier suppression hearing which was held before a different judge who could not conclude the hearing and who then became ill. Even though the defense attorney had cross-examined the two witnesses at the earlier aborted hearing, this was an abuse of discretion. The initial judge had made no findings of fact regarding the testimony of the officers. When the credibility of a witness’s testimony is essential to the trier of fact, the fact-finder must observe the demeanor of the witness before deciding whether the witness is credible.

Manlove v. Tansy, 981 F.2d 473 (10th Cir. 1992)

The state trial court denied petitioner’s right to due process by denying his motion for a continuance in order to have a witness in court. The defendant was being tried for rape. The prosecutrix’s roommate indicated to defense counsel that the prosecutrix had made up these “fantasies” before – similar to her description of this alleged occurrence. The witness, however, successfully evaded service of a subpoena in fear for her safety.

United States v. West, 828 F.2d 1468 (10th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was entitled to a continuance to obtain a defense witness who would have testified that a third person involved in a fight between the defendant and the victim had struck the fatal blow to the back of the victim’s head. The defendant’s murder conviction was reversed.
CONTINUING CRIMINAL ENTERPRISE

Richardson v. United States, 119 S.Ct. 1707 (1999)
In a CCE prosecution, the jury must unanimously agree on the three predicate offenses the defendant committed. Thus, if the government alleges that the defendant committed more than three predicate drug offenses, the jury must agree on the three (or more) predicate offenses the defendant committed. Merely agreeing that there were three predicates (while disagreeing on which three) is not sufficient.

United States v. Eiland, 738 F.3d 338 (D.C. Cir. 2013)
The evidence was insufficient to support the defendant’s CCE conviction. The government failed to develop sufficient evidence of the defendant’s leadership role with regard to a sufficient number of supervisees.

United States v. Lewis, 476 F.3d 369 (5th Cir. 2007)
With regard to one defendant, the evidence was insufficient to prove that he was guilty of CCE, because there was not proof that he managed or supervised fire persons in the methamphetamine trade.

United States v. Bass, 310 F.3d 321 (5th Cir. 2002)
The fact that the defendant has numerous drug customers does not satisfy the five-person “organizer, manager or supervisor” component of a CCE prosecution.

United States v. Russell, 134 F.3d 171 (3rd Cir. 1998)
The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury must agree on the specific three predicate offenses committed by the defendant in order to convict him of a CCE charge. Merely instructing the jury that they had to unanimously agree that there were three predicate offenses is not sufficient.

United States v. Otis, 127 F.3d 829 (9th Cir. 1997)
The government failed to prove that the defendant supervised or managed at least five other people in this CCE prosecution and the CCE conviction was reversed.
CONTINUING CRIMINAL ENTERPRISE (CCE)
(Underlying Conspiracy Conviction)

United States v. Dixon, 132 F.3d 192 (5th Cir. 1997)

A conspiracy conviction and a CCE conviction cannot both stand if the conspiracy involves the same enterprise.
COPYRIGHT

United States v. Liu, 731 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2013)
In a criminal copyright prosecution, 17 U.S.C. § 506(a), the term “willfully” requires proof that the defendant intended to violate a criminal law, not just that he or she intended to make a copy of a copyrighted work. In a case involving counterfeit labels, the term “knowingly” requires proof that the defendant knew that the labels were counterfeit, not just that he knew that he was trafficking in labels that happened to turn out to be counterfeit.
COUNTERFEIT GOODS

United States v. Liu, 731 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2013)

In a criminal copyright prosecution, 17 U.S.C. § 506(a), the term “willfully” requires proof that the defendant intended to violate a criminal law, not just that he or she intended to make a copy of a copyrighted work. In a case involving counterfeit labels, the term “knowingly” requires proof that the defendant knew that the labels were counterfeit, not just that he knew that he was trafficking in labels that happened to turn out to be counterfeit.

United States v. Yi, 460 F.3d 623 (5th Cir. 2006)

With regard to one of counterfeit counts of this indictment, the evidence was insufficient to show that the defendant was aware that he was selling counterfeit Nike sandals.

United States v. Habegger, 370 F.3d 441 (4th Cir. 2004)

Defendant was charged with trafficking in counterfeit goods, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2320. The Fourth Circuit concluded that there was insufficient evidence to support the trafficking element of the offense. The term “traffic” means transport, transfer, or otherwise dispose of, to another, as consideration for anything of value, or make or obtain control of with intent so to transport, transfer, or dispose of.” In this case, there was insufficient proof of any consideration. The government argued that the defendant transferred the goods to his customer in order to foster good will and encourage subsequent counterfeit transactions. Yet, there was no proof that the purchaser was going to make any additional purchases, or was going to pay for these goods. “For a shipment of goods to constitute consideration, there must be more than a mere hope on the part of the sender that the recipient will purchase goods in the future.”
COUNTERFEITING

United States v. Schmuckler, 792 F.3d 158 (D.C. Cir. 2015)

A counterfeit check is a check that was “falsely made or manufactured in its entirety” rather than an otherwise “genuine document that was simply falsely altered.” Both types of checks are outlawed by 18 U.S.C. § 513, but in this case, the government only charged the defendant with uttering a counterfeit security. The check that was the subject of one count in this case was not shown to have been counterfeit, as opposed to altered. Therefore, the evidence was insufficient to prove the counterfeiting charge.

United States v. Cone, 714 F.3d 197 (4th Cir. 2013)

Under 18 U.S.C. § 2320, the criminal counterfeiting statute eliminates from the universe of “counterfeit marks” any mark that was placed on a good by its authorized manufacturer and confirms that goods that have been marked in that fashion are not counterfeit. The defendant’s conduct of altering the product that is marked with a legitimate mark to be a different product than the one to which the mark was originally fixed does not amount to counterfeiting.

United States v. Canty, 499 F.3d 729 (7th Cir. 2007)

The police found counterfeit money on the defendant’s printer. There was no question that the money was counterfeit and the defendant was manufacturing the bills. The defendant claimed, however, that he was manufacturing the bills as a favor to the government, because he was going to give the bills to the police who could then use them as “flash money.” The defendant was facing a pending drug charge and thought that this “assistance” could inure to his benefit. At trial, the court precluded the defendant from offering this defense, because the defense did not give pretrial notice of public authority defense pursuant to Rule 12.3(a)(1). The Seventh Circuit reversed: the defendant’s defense was not that he actually had the public authority to counterfeit the money, but that he lacked the intent to defraud, which is an essential element of a counterfeiting charge under 18 U.S.C. § 471.

United States v. Lee, 439 F.3d 381 (7th Cir. 2006)

Fake checks that do not identify either a real drawee bank or a real corporate account holder do not qualify as “counterfeit” checks under 18 U.S.C. § 513.
CREDIT CARD FRAUD

SEE ALSO: IDENTITY THEFT

United States v. Hughey, 147 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant opened a checking account in a false name and then deposited counterfeit checks into the account and withdrew cash. This does not qualify as unauthorized use of an access device, because that offense – 18 U.S.C. § 1029 – does not include transfers that originated solely by paper instruments.
CRIME OF VIOLENCE

NOTE: Because this topic generally involves issues relating to sentencing – a topic not covered in this volume – I have not updated this section with the hundreds of cases that focus on whether a certain crime triggers various sentencing enhancements, or recidivist punishment.

The Supreme Court held that prior DUI’s do not count as violent felonies under § 924(e)(2)(B). Though DUI’s do pose a danger to people, the Court concluded that only crimes that are similar in kind to the listed offenses in § 924(e)(2)(B)(ii) – burglary, arson, extortion, and crimes involving explosives – qualify as violent felonies. The listed crimes all involve purposeful, violent and aggressive conduct, unlike DUI’s.

United States v. Fuertes, 805 F.3d 485 (4th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with a § 924(c) violation in connection with the offense of sex trafficking by force, fraud, or coercison. 18 U.S.C. § 1591(a). In order to be convicted of a § 924(c) offense, the underlying crime must be a crime of violence, which is defined in § 924(c)(3) as an offense which requires the use of force as an element, or which, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense. The Fourth Circuit held that the crime is “indivisible” under the Descamps v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 2276 (2013) standard, and because the offense can be committed by “fraud” (which is not “force”), the offense does not categorically qualify as a crime of violence. Nor is the offense of sex trafficking by its nature, an offense that involves a substantial risk of physical force. Therefore, a § 924(c) conviction may not be based on the use of a weapon in connection with a sex trafficking offense.

United States v. Hull, 456 F.3d 133 (3rd Cir. 2006)

18 U.S.C. § 842(p)(2)(A) makes it a crime to distribute information about explosives with the intent that the explosives would be used in a crime of violence. The Third Circuit holds that it is not a violation of this section to simply teach someone how to make a pipe bomb, since the mere fact of making or possessing a pipe bomb is not a “crime of violence.” The term “crime of violence” is defined at 18 U.S.C. § 16 and was construed in Leocal v. Ashcroft, 543 U.S. 1 (2004). In Leocal, the court concluded that DUI was not a crime of violence, because § 16 requires the active employment of force, or knowledge that physical force might be used against another in committing the offense.
CROSS-EXAMINATION

SEE ALSO: CONFRONTATION

The Supreme Court, in a per curiam decision, reversed the defendant’s kidnapping, rape, and forcible sodomy conviction because of improper restrictions on the cross-examination of the alleged victim. The defendant sought to establish that the victim was trying to protect her relationship with her boyfriend when he saw her disembark from the defendant’s car. The defendant contended that the sexual conduct was consensual. The trial court prevented the defendant from cross-examining the victim about her living arrangements with her boyfriend. Citing Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974); Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965); Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673 (1986), the Court held that this limitation on a matter which represents a prototypical form of bias on the part of the witness required reversal of the conviction.

United States v. Nickle, 816 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 2016)

Barring the defense from questioning prosecution witnesses about a possible Rule 35 that they were anticipating was reversible error. The fact that a Rule 35 had not yet been filed did not prevent the defense from showing possible bias of the witnesses who may have been testifying in anticipation of a future Rule 35.

Nappi v. Yelich, 793 F.3d 246 (2d Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with felon in possession of a firearm that was located in his house. His wife, who resided in the house, but in a separate bedroom, was the principal witness against him. At trial, the defense wanted to cross-examine her about her relationship with another man and argued that this was her motive to frame the defendant to get rid of him. The trial court excluded this line of cross-examination as a “collateral matter.” The Second Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus.

Blackston v. Rapelje, 780 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2014)

If the state introduces a prosecution witness’s prior sworn testimony at defendant’s trial, the defense is entitled to introduce evidence that the witness recanted that testimony. This is implicit in the right to confront one’s accusers.

United States v. Mergen, 764 F.3d 199 (2d Cir. 2014)

The government was permitted to ask an FBI agent if he believed that his informant – the defendant – had done anything wrong. The agent testified that he had violated the terms of his informant agreement and was criminally responsible for his conduct. The defendant offered a taped statement of the defendant talking to the agent in which the informant asked the agent, “Did I do anything wrong” and the agent responded, “No, no.” Excluding this impeachment evidence on evidentiary grounds (including hearsay) was reversible error.

Alvarez v. Ercole, 763 F.3d 223 (2d Cir. 2014)
The state trial court erred in preventing the defense from cross-examining the lead detective about other investigations that were not pursued. The investigation that was not done was not subject to a hearsay objection, because the issue is not the truthfulness of what was told to a police officer conducting the investigation, but whether there were leads that were not followed. Denying the defense the right to cross-examine the detective violated the Confrontation Clause and was particularly harmful, because the prosecutor argued in closing that the investigation was thorough.

Ortiz v. Yates, 704 F.3d 1026 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defense sought to cross-examine the defendant’s wife regarding whether she was afraid to deviate from her initial statements accusing her husband of abuse because of threats the prosecutor’s investigator made towards her about changing her story (that is, the investigator had threatened to put her in prison for lying at the preliminary hearing if she did not stick to that version of events). The trial court prevented this line of questioning. This violated the defendant’s right of Confrontation.

United States v. White, 692 F.3d 235 (2d Cir. 2012)

Based on Cedeno, noted below, which was decided after the trial was held in this case, the Second Circuit held that it was reversible error to exclude evidence of a prior judicial finding that a government witness was not credible. The prior judicial finding involved the law enforcement officer’s testimony at a suppression hearing which the judge, in that case, refused to credit. The appellate court also held that excluding evidence of the government’s initial charging decision was also reversible error. The defendant was an occupant of a vehicle with four women. Three guns were found in the car. One of the guns was allegedly found in the defendant’s pocket. The women, however, were initially charged with possessing all the guns, including the gun allegedly found in the defendant’s pocket. Subsequently, the government changed its charging decision. The appellate court held that the defendant should have been permitted to introduce evidence about the initial arrest of the women for that gun.

United States v. Sanabria, 645 F.3d 505 (1st Cir. 2011)

A co-conspirator came to the defendant’s attorney’s office and reported that the agents had intimidated him and threatened him to conform his story to the testimony that helped the government. At trial, the co-conspirator testified for the government. The defense attorney sought to cross-examine the co-conspirator about having been intimidated by the agents, as had been reported to the attorney. The trial judge excluded this testimony on the theory that it was outside the scope of direct. This was error.

United States v. Woodard, 699 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2012)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from cross-examining a law enforcement officer about a prior judge’s determination that the officer was not credible. This method of impeachment is permitted under Rule 608(b). The factors the court should consider in exercising his discretion are as follows: (1) whether the prior finding involved a determination of the officer’s credibility generally, or just in that case; (2) whether the prior testimony involved a subject matter similar to the subject matter in the instant case; (3) whether the prior “lie” was in a judicial proceeding or some other forum; (4) whether the prior lie was about a significant matter;
(5) how much time had elapsed between the two proceedings; (6) whether the witness had a motive to lie in the prior proceeding and whether the same motive existed in this proceeding; (7) whether any explanation offered by the witness in the prior proceeding was plausible. The holding in this case is not limited to prior testimony of law enforcement officers, but applies to any witness.

United States v. Cedeno, 644 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2011)

The trial court erred – though it was harmless error – in barring the defense from questioning a prosecution witness about a prior judicial finding that the witness was not credible. The witness’s prior testimony can be viewed as prior conduct that comes within the scope of Rule 608(b). See also, United States v. Terry, 702 F.2d 299, 316 (2d Cir. 1983).

United States v. Kohring, 637 F.3d 895 (9th Cir. 2011)

The government failed to reveal to the defendant that a key prosecution witness was being investigated by state agents for child sex abuse offenses and efforts to obstruct justice in connection with those sex offenses. Though the trial court recognized that this evidence should have been disclosed, the trial court further held that the evidence would not have been admissible under Rule 403, because it would have confused the issues. The Ninth Circuit reversed. The evidence should have been disclosed and it would have been admissible to impeach the witness.

Sussman v. Jenkins, 636 F.3d 329 (7th Cir. 2011)

Trial counsel failed to provide pretrial notice of the intent to introduce evidence that the child molestation victim had made prior false allegations of sexual abuse against another man (his father). Trial counsel’s failure was ineffective assistance of counsel, because such evidence – prior false allegation evidence – was admissible and significant evidence relating to the child’s credibility and motive for fabricating allegations (i.e., to get attention, or for punishing people for not paying attention to him). This evidence was clearly admissible under the Confrontation Clause.

Childers v. Floyd, 642 F.3d 953 (11th Cir. 2011)

The defendant, a county commissioner, was on trial for paying a bribe to another commissioner to vote on a particular project that benefited a citizen who was paying the bribe money. The second commissioner was the key government witness. At a trial involving the citizen bribe-payor, the second commissioner testified and the bribe payor was acquitted. The second commissioner then was debriefed again and added to his factual recitation and changed other facts. The government threatened to revoke his plea agreement, but the court would not allow it. The first commissioner’s trial then was held and the trial judge held that the defendant could not mention the acquittal of the bribe payor or the circumstances surrounding the second commissioner’s change of story, though he was allowed to cross-examine the witness about the prior inconsistent statements. A panel of the Eleventh Circuit reversed the conviction, but the en banc court held that regardless of what the court might do in a case on direct review, under the deference required pursuant to the AEDPA, it was not proper to grant the writ. See also 736 F.3d 1331.

United States v. Robinson, 583 F.3d 1265 (10th Cir. 2009)
The trial court erred in barring the defense from reviewing the mental health records of the key eyewitness in this case. The parties and the lower court knew that the witness had just been released from a mental health facility prior to his testimony, but the defense was barred from reviewing the records. The trial court also erred in barring the defense from cross-examining the witness about his mental health infirmity and use of drugs. Among the cases relied upon by the Tenth Circuit were United States v. Lindstrom, 698 F.2d 1154 (11th Cir. 1983) and Greene v. Wainwright, 634 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1981).

Holley v. Yarborough, 568 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with child molestation. Barring cross-examination of the child about her “active” sexual imagination and her prior statements about having sex with neighborhood children and her brother deprived the defendant of his Sixth Amendment right of Confrontation and required that the writ be granted. The excluded evidence would have shown her tendency to exaggerate, if not fabricate allegations of sexual conduct and demonstrate her familiarity with sexual terminology.

Slovik v. Yates, 556 F.3d 747 (9th Cir. 2009)

A witness for the state was on probation as a result of a DUI conviction. He was asked by the defense whether, at the time of his testimony, he was on probation. He responded that he was not. This was not true and the defense sought to cross-examine him with a document that showed that he was on probation. The state judge excluded the cross-examination. This was constitutional error for two reasons: first, the cross-examination that he was on probation was admissible as evidence of bias; second, the witness’s false testimony that he was not on probation was a further basis for cross-examination to show the jury that the witness was willing to lie under oath.

Brinson v. Walker, 547 F.3d 387 (2d Cir. 2008)

The defendant was accused of robbing the victim. The defense attempted to cross-examine the victim on his racist attitudes. The defense was that the victim concocted the entire robbery story because he was a racist, even though he had no particular animus directed toward the defendant personally. Precluding this line of questioning violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right of confrontation and the Second Circuit held that the writ should have been granted. The Second Circuit reached a similar result in a decision five days later in United States v. Figueroa, 548 F.3d 222 (2008), where the defendant sought to cross-examine the witness about his swastika tattoos to demonstrate that he was a bigot, thus showing the jury the witness’s bias against the defendant. The court in Figueroa held that limiting the cross-examination violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights but was harmless error.

Vasquez v. Jones, 496 F.3d 564 (6th Cir. 2007)

The constitutional right to cross-examine a witness is not limited to exploring motive, bias and prejudice. Other attacks on credibility, including information about the prior criminal record of the witness, are also protected by the Sixth Amendment’s Confrontation Clause. In this case, barring the defense from introducing impeachment evidence (criminal record) of a non-testifying hearsay declarant was a violation of the Confrontation Clause.

485
United States v. Larson, 495 F.3d 1094 (9th Cir. 2007)

Though it was harmless error, the trial court erred in limiting the defendant’s cross-examination of a witness about the mandatory minimum sentence she faced (and was trying to eliminate based on her cooperation).

United States v. Jiminez, 464 F.3d 555 (5th Cir. 2006)

The trial court committed reversible error by limiting the defendant’s cross-examination of an officer on the subject of his exact location when he claimed to have surveilled the defendant’s house, and the defendant selling drugs from her house.

United States v. Smith, 454 F.3d 707 (7th Cir. 2006)

When a defense attorney is cross-examining a government witness, if the witness is prepared to answer questions about what his lawyer told him (i.e., the value of cooperating, the meaning of a § 5K1.1 departure, etc), the government may not object on grounds of attorney-client privilege. The government may bring the privilege to the attention of the court and the witness, but may not object. The privilege may only be asserted by the witness. Thus, in this case, when the government objected and the trial court promptly granted the objection (without the witness every having invoked the privilege), it was error. Harmless error in this case.

United States v. Watler, 461 F.3d 1005 (8th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring the defense from cross-examining a witness about a threat he made to stab the defendant if he ever met him in the street. Harmless error.

United States v. Larson, 460 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring defense counsel from cross-examining a cooperating witness about the mandatory minimum sentence he would face but for his cooperation. Harmless error. The en banc court reached the same conclusion, finding that excluding evidence about the mandatory minimum sentence was a Confrontation Clause violation, but was harmless. (August 1, 2007 decision).

United States v. Smith, 451 F.3d 209 (4th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring the defense from questioning a law enforcement officer about the destruction of evidence (drugs) that were the basis for the prosecution in this case. The drugs had been seized by state agents and were initially the focus of a state prosecution. When the case was transferred to the federal prosecutors, the state case was dismissed and the drugs were destroyed. Cross-examination on the inappropriate destruction of the contraband should have been permitted – but the error was harmless.

United States v. Montelongo, 420 F.3d 1169 (10th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was convicted of transporting marijuana in a truck. The owner of the truck also owned other trucks and another of the trucks was also found to have been carrying marijuana. When the owner testified, the defendant sought to cross-examine him about the other incident (to suggest that the owner was using the trucks to haul marijuana, unbeknownst to the drivers). Barring this cross-examination was reversible error. The defendant was permitted under Rule 404(b) to show the other incident to prove his innocence.
White v. Coplan, 399 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2005)

A state court decision that limited a defendant’s ability to cross-examine two child molestation victims about prior false allegations violated the Confrontation Clause. The state court required that before such evidence may be admitted, the trial court must find that the prior allegations were “demonstrably false” – a threshold that the First Circuit held was too demanding in the context of this case.

Kittelson v. Dretke, 426 F.3d 306 (5th Cir. 2005)

The state court violated the defendant’s confrontation clause rights by barring cross examination in this child molestation on the topic of prior false allegations.

Fowler v. Sacramento County Sheriff’s Department, 421 F.3d 1027 (9th Cir. 2005)

Barring questioning about prior false molestation accusations violated the defendant’s right to confront his accuser.

United States v. Vega Molina, 407 F.3d 511 (1st Cir. 2005)

Limiting a defendant’s cross-examination of a cooperating co-conspirator was reversible error. Among the topics that should have been allowed was probing the witness’s relationship to another defendant who was on trial and who supposedly conspired with the witness to frame the defendant. In addition, the other defendant’s abuse of the witness was a proper subject of cross-examination.

Howard v. Walker, 406 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2005)

A co-conspirator’s statement to the police was excluded on Bruton grounds. However, an expert witness for the state relied on that statement in reaching her conclusion that the victim’s death was caused by conduct of the conspirators. Though an expert may generally rely on inadmissible evidence in reaching a conclusion, including hearsay, that rule assumes that an expert will carefully analyze the basis of his opinion and that the trial court will conduct a sufficient Daubert hearing to ensure the reliability of the expert’s underlying data from which she draws her conclusion. In this case, the unreliable statements of the co-conspirator were not reliable and the expert’s opinion was therefore improperly admitted. The error was compounded by the state trial court’s ruling that if the defense cross-examined the witness about her conclusions, the inadmissible Bruton statement would be admitted. A defendant cannot be compelled to sacrifice one right – the Sixth Amendment right to cross-examine witnesses – to protect another right – i.e., the right of Confrontation embodied in the Bruton doctrine. Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968).

De LiSi v. Crosby, 402 F.3d 1294 (11th Cir. 2005)

A witness who waives his Fifth Amendment privilege with regard to a topic in a judicial proceeding, may not later invoke the privilege, even in a separate legal proceeding, on the same topic. In this case, a prosecution witness previously waived his Fifth Amendment rights regarding possible charges of tax evasion. When cross-examined by the defendant at the defendant’s trial, the trial court erred in permitting the witness to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights. Harmless error.
United States v. Schoneberg, 396 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2004)

Because the witness’s plea agreement left it up to the government whether to offer the witness a reduction in sentence, the defendant should have been allowed to cross-examine the witness about his expectation of a Rule 35. The specific questions that were disallowed focused on the fact that only the government had the power to file the Rule 35 motion. This was not harmless error, even though the jury was able to review the witness’s plea agreement, which was admitted in evidence with the Rule 35 language. The trial court’s repeated statements that it was the jury in this case, not the prosecutor who assessed the credibility of the witness missed the point of the cross-examination, which was to explore the witness’s motive to exaggerate, fabricate, and shade his testimony to please the government.

United States v. Wilmore, 381 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2004)

The government’s introduction into evidence of a witness’s grand jury testimony, coupled with the lower court’s restriction of defendant’s cross-examination of that government witness amounted to a violation of defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights and necessitated reversal of the conviction. The witness had testified at the grand jury that she had seen the defendant (charged with being a felon in possession of a gun) in possession of a gun. At trial, she was called as a witness for the government and denied seeing the defendant in possession of the weapon. The government introduced relevant portions of the grand jury testimony and when the witness was confronted by the government with her previous grand jury testimony, she ultimately invoked her Fifth Amendment rights. The judge then instructed defense counsel to avoid asking any questions that would lead to further invocations of the Fifth Amendment. This was erroneous. Because the grand jury testimony was actually introduced in evidence by the government, the defendant could not be limited in his cross-examination of the witness regarding the circumstances of that testimony. More importantly, the introduction of the grand jury testimony amounted to testimony that was not subject to cross-examination, which violated Crawford v. Washington, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (2004).

United States v. Whitmore, 359 F.3d 609 (D. C. Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in precluding the defendant from cross-examining a police officer about his prior untruthful testimony in an unrelated trial. In that prior trial, the trial judge concluded that the officer had lied and granted a judgment of acquittal for the defendant on trial. Excluding the evidence of that prior perjury was erroneous. “Nothing could be more probative of a witness’s character for untruthfulness than evidence that the witness has previously lied under oath.” The D.C. Circuit also held that the trial court erred in preventing the defense from cross-examining the officer about his suspended driver’s license and his failure to pay child support. Reversible error.

United States v. Chandler, 326 F.3d 210 (3rd Cir. 2003)

Barring the defense attorney from questioning a witness about the sentence he could have faced had he been held responsible for the large amount of drug dealing with which he was involved was reversible error.

United States v. Love, 329 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2003)
The trial court erred in preventing the defense counsel from questioning a critical government witness about his mental defects. The witness suffered from short- and long-term memory impairment. The nature of the mental defect, coupled with the timing of the diagnosis made this evidence relevant to the jury’s evaluation of the credibility of his testimony.

United States v. Cruz-Garcia, 344 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defense attempted to prove the facts underlying the witness’s prior convictions to show that he had the capacity to commit the offenses with which the defendant was charged. The trial court erroneously excluded this evidence. The evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove the witness’s capacity to commit the crime. Indeed, the prosecutor had repeatedly argued that the witness was too stupid to have committed the crime without the defendant’s help. The court noted that Rule 404(b) should be more liberally interpreted when the evidence is being offered against a witness, as opposed to the defendant.

United States v. Mills, 138 F.3d 928 (11th Cir. 1998)

Both a corporate and individual defendant were charged with Medicare Fraud. The trial court became impatient with duplicative cross-examination of witnesses and finally declared that only one attorney could cross-examine one of the government's summary witnesses. This was error; but harmless. A party may not be denied the right of cross-examination, despite the similarity of interest of that party with another party.

United States v. Stavroff, 149 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to question a cooperating co-conspirator about his hopes in entering a plea agreement. The court also criticized the trial judge for sua sponte excluding this line of cross-examination, despite the government’s failure to raise an objection. If the trial judge believes that a question posed by the defense is inappropriate, but the government does not object, the trial court should ask the lawyers to approach the bench, rather than taking on an adversarial role with the defense counsel. Harmless error.

United States v. Lynn, 856 F.2d 430 (1st Cir. 1988)

The trial court erred in preventing the defendant from cross-examining a co-conspirator on the issue of a polygraph examination that was administered pursuant to a plea agreement. The inquiry was intended to show the motivation of the witness to continue to lie to curry favor with the government.

United States v. Kaplan, 832 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1987)

It was error for the trial court to prohibit the defense from questioning a government witness about his cocaine use. Because the defendant sought to establish that the witness was using cocaine during the times relevant to his testimony, and in connection with his ability to remember or observe the events about which he was testifying, the impeachment was relevant. Harmless error in this case.

United States v. Giovanelli, 945 F.2d 479 (2d Cir. 1991)

The trial court erred in prohibiting counsel from cross-examining witnesses about their testimony in the prior trial of the defendants—a trial which resulted in mistrials and acquittals. The trial court’s concern with the jury’s inability to digest the fact that there had been a prior trial was understandable, but the defendant’s Sixth Amendment rights to confront witnesses, to point out prior inconsistent testimony and to suggest recent fabrication were improperly sacrificed.

Harper v. Kelly, 916 F.2d 54 (2d Cir. 1990)

A defendant was denied his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation when his attorney was prevented from cross-examining an armed robbery victim about her state of mind at the time of the incident. The purpose of the cross-examination was to demonstrate the frailty of the victim’s identification testimony. The exclusion of this line of questioning was reversible error.

United States v. Riggi, 951 F.2d 1368 (3rd Cir. 1991)

The trial court’s failure to permit the defense to re-cross-examine witnesses, after the government was permitted to ask “new” questions on redirect, was reversible error. Even though the defense counsel did not object to new matters being covered on redirect, this did not forfeit his right to cross-examine the witness about these new matters.

United States v. Williams, 892 F.2d 296 (3rd Cir. 1989)

Though a ten-year old conviction cannot be used for impeachment purposes, a defendant should have been permitted to use that conviction to show the witness’ bias. The error in excluding this testimony, however, was harmless.

United States v. Nelson, 852 F.2d 706 (3rd Cir. 1988)

The defendant was on trial for obstruction of a grand jury investigation. The defendants were prohibited from cross-examining a government witness about the purpose for which the grand jury subpoena was issued, a line of questioning intended to demonstrate that the subpoenas were not issued for the purpose of obtaining evidence before a grand jury. Reversible error.

United States v. Landerman, 109 F.3d 1053 (5th Cir. 1997)

Restricting defendant’s cross-examination of a prosecution witness was reversible error. Specifically, the trial court erred in prohibiting the defense from questioning a witness about a pending state felony charge which carried a potential life sentence.

United States v. Stewart, 93 F.3d 189 (5th Cir. 1996)

The trial court abused its discretion in the manner in which it limited the defendant’s cross-examination of the police officer during the suppression hearing. The attorney attempted to place the witness’s testimony in the context of his prior testimony and the judge erroneously barred this method of examining the witness on the theory that it was simply a reiteration of prior testimony. Harmless error.

United States v. Alexius, 76 F.3d 642 (5th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred in prohibiting the defendant from cross-examining a government witness about pending federal felony charges. This was reversible error.

United States v. Cooks, 52 F.3d 101 (5th Cir. 1995)

The trial court granted a new trial to one defendant because of an improper limitation on the defendant’s cross-examination of the witness relating to the possible sentence on pending charges in another jurisdiction which, arguably, the witness was trying to mitigate by his cooperation in this case. The court also disallowed questioning about a subsequent and pending purse-snatching charge. The government appealed the granting of the new trial. The Fifth Circuit affirmed.
United States v. Smith, 831 F.2d 657 (6th Cir. 1987)
Defense counsel was entitled to cross-examine a prosecution witness as to the bias that witness held against the defendants because of the defendants’ alleged threat to have the witness’ baby taken away from her if the witness did not engage in immoral conduct. Refusal to permit this cross-examination was harmless in this case.

United States v. Ebens, 800 F.2d 1422 (6th Cir. 1986)
A key witness in this civil rights prosecution had been “coached” in preparation of his testimony. The defense attorney sought to play a tape of this coaching but was prohibited by the trial court which held that this constituted impermissible hearsay. The Sixth Circuit holds that this is incorrect. The tapes were introduced not to prove the truth of the matter asserted – quite the contrary – they were introduced to show that the witness was influenced by this coaching.

Lindh v. Murphy, 124 F.3d 899 (7th Cir. 1997)
The state introduced evidence from an expert psychiatrist about the defendant’s mental condition when he committed several murders. The trial judge barred the defense from cross-examining the psychiatrist about the fact that he had sexually abused some of his patients, was about to lose his medical license and his prestigious faculty positions and stood a chance of going to prison. Though the psychiatrist had no reason to believe that his testimony would alter his future (that is, that the state would reward him), the false impression created by the prosecutor about the psychiatrist’s impeccable credentials necessitated allowing the defense to show the jury the truth about the psychiatrist.

Clark v. O’Leary, 852 F.2d 999 (7th Cir. 1988)
In the defendant’s murder trial, he sought to demonstrate that certain state’s witnesses were members of a gang to suggest that their testimony was colored by fear of retaliation and gang loyalty. The trial court’s refusal to permit such cross-examination violated the defendant’s right to full confrontation. The trial court’s preliminary screening of the credibility of the witnesses was improper and required reversal.

United States v. Eagle, 867 F.2d 436 (8th Cir. 1989)
The trial court was clearly wrong in preventing a defendant from cross-examining a witness about the details of her plea agreement. The witness had been a co-defendant in this murder prosecution but had agreed to testify in exchange for a plea to voluntary manslaughter. Because the witness’s testimony did not incriminate the defendant, the error was not reversible.

United States v. Barnes, 798 F.2d 283 (8th Cir. 1986)
Prior to trial, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss the indictment on grounds that the chief DEA agent had lied about the existence of exculpatory tapes. The motion was denied by the trial court on the grounds that the DEA agent may have misunderstood his obligations under Brady. At trial, the defense attorney, while cross-examining the DEA agent, sought to question him about his misconduct in the case. The trial court denied this line of questioning. This was reversible error. The court of appeals relies on the Supreme Court decision in Crane v. Kentucky, in holding that a pre-trial ruling does not bar relevant cross-examination on the same issue. In this case, the cross-examination may have served to impeach the credibility of the DEA agent who, according to the defense theory, was using improper means to secure a conviction.
United States v. Dees, 34 F.3d 838 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with mail fraud in connection with her scheme to defraud a couple who sent the defendant money to adopt her child. The defendant sought to question the victim about a movie contract she had signed about her plight and thus her efforts to profit from the conviction of the defendant. The trial court’s limitation of this cross-examination was an abuse of discretion, though harmless error. If a victim/witness stands to gain more from a conviction than an acquittal, then that fact is relevant to bias.

United States v. Mayans, 17 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 1994)

The trial court erred in holding that the best evidence of the witness’ understanding of a plea agreement was the agreement itself. Rather, the witness’ understanding is an issue which the defense is allowed to probe with the witness himself, regardless of what the agreement actually provides.

United States v. Bernal-Obeso, 989 F.2d 331 (9th Cir. 1993)

Just prior to trial, the government alerted the defense that an informant had killed two people several years earlier, but had never been charged with a crime. The defense learned that the informant had in fact pled guilty to two counts of manslaughter and asked the court to permit the defense additional time to determine the background, and also asked to be permitted to ask the informant why he lied to the DEA about his background. Both requests were denied by the trial court. The Ninth Circuit reversed. A lie by an informant-witness to the authorities paying for his services about his felony criminal record would be relevant evidence as to the informant’s credibility.

United States v. Jones, 982 F.2d 380 (9th Cir. 1992)

The trial court’s ruling which precluded re-cross-examination after re-direct was a violation of defendant’s right to confront the witnesses. Because new matters were brought out on re-direct, the defense had a right to re-cross the witness about these new matters.

United States v. Vargas, 933 F.2d 701 (9th Cir. 1991)

In order to prevent any improper questioning of a witness in front of the jury, the trial judge required the attorneys to question the witness with the jury out of the courtroom and then, when the jury returned the next day, the lawyers were only permitted to question the witness from the transcript – as edited by the judge. If the witness’s answer differed in front of the jury from the rehearsed testimony, the judge “impeached” the witness with the transcript. This procedure amounted to a denial of the right to cross-examine the witness and required the reversal of the conviction of all defendants on all counts.

United States v. Platero, 72 F.3d 806 (10th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with sexually assaulting the victim. He sought to cross-examine the victim about the relationship she had with another man (not her husband) a la Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988). The trial court determined that there was insufficient evidence of such a relationship and barred the testimony pursuant to Rule 412. This was error. If a jury could believe that such a relationship existed, the defendant must be allowed to probe this topic. The judge may not make a preliminary factual finding barred the testimony if there is evidence which would support the jury’s determination. See Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988).
United States v. DeSoto, 950 F.2d 626 (10th Cir. 1991)

The witness testified that the defendant was carrying a gun when he purchased a car from her boyfriend. The defendant sought to cross-examine the witness with evidence that the defendant had accused the boyfriend of stealing the defendant’s money, and thus the girlfriend was “retaliating” on behalf of her boyfriend for these earlier allegations. The trial court’s ruling precluding this area of cross-examination was reversible error. Any motive for a witness to falsify her testimony may be probed by the defendant.

United States v. Morales-Quinones, 812 F.2d 604 (10th Cir. 1987)

The defendant may impeach a government witness by cross-examining him about specific instances of conduct not resulting in conviction if the conduct is probative of the witness’ character, truthfulness or untruthfulness.

United States v. Burston, 159 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 1998)

The district court erred – though harmlessly – in restricting the defense from cross-examining the government’s witness about his numerous prior felony convictions. The witness had four prior felony convictions for theft, aggravated assault and armed robbery. The trial court limited the defense to asking simply if the witness had a prior felony conviction, without even specifying the number or nature of the offenses. This was an improper limitation on the defendant’s right to present evidence pursuant to Rule 609 to impeach the witness.

United States v. Sheffield, 992 F.2d 1164 (11th Cir. 1993)

A witness may be cross-examined about a prior failure to make a statement which was consistent with the statement made at trial. That is, a prior failure to implicate the defendant in a statement made by the witness is the proper subject of cross-examination.

United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992)

The defendant, the Sheriff of Fulton County, Georgia, was on trial for extortion and filing false tax returns. One of the prosecution’s witnesses had two sons who had been charged in the state with selling marijuana. The defense sought to cross-examine the witness about his sons to show a possible motive or bias. The trial court’s preclusion of this topic of cross-examination was reversible error. The fact that there was, in fact, no deal does not foreclose the admissibility of this line of inquiry, for it is the witness’s perception and personal motive, not the actual existence of a deal which is probative. Furthermore, the fact that the son had already been prosecuted and sentenced was not determinative, because there could have been a separate federal prosecution. “A reasonable juror could have concluded that [the witness’s] testimony was the result of his desire to protect his sons and to obtain federal assistance in avoiding a subsequent federal prosecution against them.”

United States v. Williams, 954 F.2d 668 (11th Cir. 1992)

The trial court committed reversible error by excluding evidence about the amount of reward money received by the informant. Incredibly, the trial court held that the amount of money given to the informant (nearly $450,000) was so obscene (he was given 25% of all assets seized in connection with his deals), that it would prejudice the government to allow this evidence to be heard by the jury. The Eleventh Circuit holds that it is precisely for this reason that the evidence is admissible: “The jury has the right to know what may be motivating a witness, especially a government paid, regularly employed, informant-witness. If the amount paid an informant is felt by the government to be too prejudicial for an American jury to hear... about, the solution is for the government to make reasonable payments; the solution is not for the court to rule the evidence irrelevant as too prejudicial.”

United States v. Cohen, 888 F.2d 770 (11th Cir. 1989)

One of the government’s key witnesses was a former business partner of the defendants who testified that they were engaged in a tax fraud scheme. The defense sought to cross-examine the witness and demonstrate that he had previously engaged in fraudulent acts unbeknownst to the defendant. The trial court excluded the evidence. The defendants argued that the evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b): The evidence of the witness’ other crimes, wrongs or acts demonstrated his ability to concoct and manage a fraudulent scheme without the knowledge of the defendants. This case is significant in recognizing that Rule 404(b) can be applied against a government witness, not just a criminal defendant.

Brown v. Dugger, 831 F.2d 1547 (11th Cir. 1987)

A police officer testified about the statements of a third party. Defense counsel sought to cross-examine that officer in a way to demonstrate bias on the part of that third party declarant. The trial court prohibited this mode of cross-examination of the officer. This was error of constitutional dimensions and required reversal.

United States v. Smith, 77 F.3d 511 (D.C.Cir. 1996)

In the context of considering a Brady challenge to a conviction, the D.C. Circuit held that evidence of a witness’s prior psychiatric history may be admissible to impeach the witness. Therefore, the district court should have reviewed the medical records to determine if the witness’s medical condition was the proper subject of cross-examination.

United States v. Shyllon, 10 F.3d 1 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

The defendant claimed that the prosecution witnesses had been intimidated by the investigator into testifying against him. In support of this argument, he sought to call a potential prosecution witness, who did not testify for the government, and elicit testimony that the investigator threatened him, too. The defendant also tried to cross-examine the investigator about his threatening that non-testifying witness. The trial court erroneously excluded the testimony and the cross-examination. If the investigator intimidated that potential witness, it would make it more likely that he intimidated the other witnesses; therefore, the testimony was relevant under Rule 401. Harmless error.

United States v. Foster, 982 F.2d 551 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

A police officer was a witness to several drug sales by the defendant. At the preliminary hearing, the officer made no mention of seeing the defendant give the proceeds to anybody. When the defendant was arrested, he had no cash on him. At trial, however, the police officer testified that he observed the defendant give the sales proceeds to another individual after each sale. The defense sought to cross-examine the officer about why he did not testify about this at the preliminary hearing. The trial court’s ruling curtailing this topic of cross-examination was reversible error. Moreover, even though the officer’s written report was introduced – and it, too, was silent about where the proceeds went – the defense should have been permitted to question the officer about his prior sworn testimony. (Majority opinion authored by Judge, now-Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg).
United States v. Stock, 948 F.2d 1299 (D.C.Cir. 1991)

The defendant sought to impeach a police officer with a prior statement of his which did not contain the same allegations as his courtroom testimony. Prior statements that omit details covered at trial are inconsistent if it would have been “natural” for the witness to include them in the earlier statement. The judge’s error in denying this cross-examination prevented defense counsel from arguing that the officer had a poor memory or was fabricating parts of his story in order to ensure a conviction. Harmless error.

United States v. Pryce, 938 F.2d 1343 (D.C.Cir. 1991)

The trial court erred in prohibiting defense counsel from cross-examining a prosecution witness about hallucinations the witness suffered prior to the time of the transaction about which the witness was testifying. Limiting the cross-examination to the month of the transaction was an improper restriction. The defense attorney decided not to ask about hallucinations during that month, fearful that the witness would deny hallucinations at that time and the defendant would not be able to impeach the witness with the psychiatric report he had obtained for the prior months. The defendant’s decision not to ask the question about the particular month did not waive the issue as to the trial court’s error in preventing the attorney from asking about the prior months.

Murder charges against a prosecution witness had been dismissed recently but could have been revived. The defense sought to cross-examine the witness with regard to these charges. The trial court’s exclusion of the evidence was a violation of the defendant’s right to confront the witness and demonstrate possible motives for fabrication or exaggeration.
CROSS-EXAMINATION
(Improper Prosecutorial Questioning)

_United States v. Pereira_, 848 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 2017)
The prosecutor repeatedly asked the defendant on cross-examination whether he thought the government’s other witnesses simply “made” up their testimony (which implicated the defendant in the drug conspiracy) and whether he thought the witnesses were lying. This was improper cross-examination and was reversible error.

_United States v. Lopez_, 818 F.3d 125 (3rd Cir. 2016)
The defendant was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. At trial he protested that he was framed by the police. After having been _Mirandized_, he made no statements. Yet, the prosecutor cross-examined the defendant about his failure to raise this “framed” defense prior to trial and also argued to the jury that this was a reason to question the defendant’s credibility. This violated _Doyle_ and was reversible error.

_United States v. Alcantara-Castillo_, 788 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2015)
It was plain error for the prosecutor to question the defendant, “So it is your testimony that [the agent] was inventing stories about you [in his testimony]?” This cross-examination required setting aside the conviction. _See also United States v. Combs_, 379 F.3d 564 (9th Cir. 2004), discussed below. Also improper was the prosecutor’s rebuttal closing argument that the agent should be believed, because he is sworn to uphold the law. This improper closing argument merits reversing a conviction, even if the judge promptly tells the jury to disregard the comment.

_United States v. Abair_, 746 F.3d 260 (7th Cir. 2014)
The prosecutor improperly cross-examined the defendant in a manner that assumed her culpability for false statements on a tax return and on a student financial aid application. This was improper Rule 608(b) impeachment. When the defendant denied making the false statement, which should have concluded the Rule 608(b) inquiry, the prosecutor pressed on, assuming the defendant’s guilt of the false statement without sufficient foundation. The government failed to offer sufficient reason to believe that the tax return and financial aid application had any bearing on the defendant’s truthfulness.

_United States v. Truman_, 688 F.3d 129 (2d Cir. 2012)
A prosecutor may not question a witness about whether another witness is lying or mistaken. In this case, however, the Second Circuit held that this misconduct was not a sufficient basis to grant a new trial.

_United States v. Schmitz_, 634 F.3d 1247 (11th Cir. 2011)
A prosecutor may not ask a defendant whether other witnesses, in the defendant’s opinion, are lying. Asking one witness about the veracity of another witness invades the province of the jury. Also, just because two witnesses offer testimony that is inconsistent does not mean that one is lying. Faulty memory, or slightly different versions of the question, also explains inconsistent answers, for example.

United States v. Osazuwa, 564 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2009)

When a witness (including the defendant) is being cross-examined about a prior conviction, the fact of the conviction is the scope of the proper cross-examination. The cross-examination of the witness is controlled by Rule 609, not 608, if there is a conviction. Under Rule 609, the attorney may not ask the witness questions about the circumstances relating to the prior offense.

United States v. Moreland, 622 F.3d 1147 (9th Cir. 2007)

It was improper for the prosecutor to repeatedly cross-examine the defendant on the subject of whether he believed the prosecution witnesses were lying. However, this did not amount to plain error.

United States v. Nunez, 532 F.3d 645 (7th Cir. 2008)

The trial court erred in permitting the prosecutor to question the defendant about the veracity of the DEA agent. Harmless error.

United States v. Sine, 493 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2007)

In a prior civil proceeding, a judge made numerous extremely unflattering comments about the defendant, who was a lawyer in that case. When the defendant testified at his criminal trial – as well as other witnesses – the prosecutor confronted him with those observations by the judge. The district court should have excluded this line of cross-examination pursuant to Rule 403 and as hearsay.

United States v. Harris, 471 F.3d 507 (3rd Cir. 2006)

The prosecutor questioned the defendant about whether he thought other witnesses, police officers, were lying. The Third Circuit holds that this is improper cross-examination. One witness is not capable of determining whether another witness is “lying” or “mistaken” or “telling the truth.” Moreover, such questioning invades the province of the jury.

United States v. Williams, 461 F.3d 441 (4th Cir. 2006)

The defense attorney asked the defendant to try on a “fanny pack” to demonstrate that it did not fit him. The trial court decided that based on this demonstration, the prosecutor should be permitted to cross-examine the defendant, including asking him about prior convictions. This was error. A courtroom demonstration does not amount to a testimonial act, or a waiver of the Fifth Amendment right not to answer any questions. Harmless error.

United States v. Ndiaye, 434 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was on trial for immigration fraud and related offenses. The government obtained a copy of a letter he wrote to a neighbor, which documented his extra-marital affair with the neighbor. When the defendant called a character witness in his defense, the prosecutor questioned the character witness about the defendant’s character, assuming he was the author of the letter and assuming he was engaged in an extra-marital affair. This was improper cross-examination of the character witness, because an extra-marital affair does not relate directly to the defendant’s truthfulness and honesty. Harmless error.

United States v. McGee, 408 F.3d 966 (7th Cir. 2005)

The defendant testified at trial and on cross examination, he stated that he did not routinely lie to people to get out of trouble. The prosecution then played a taped phone call (made at the jail where he was held) between the defendant and his employer during which the defendant made up an elaborate lie about his absence from work. This violated the provision in Rule 608(b) which bars the use of extrinsic evidence. The tape was not admissible as a Rule 613 prior inconsistent statement, because the tape was not inconsistent with specific trial testimony; rather, it was offered to prove the defendant’s lack of credibility, that is, Rule 608(b) other bad act impeachment evidence. Harmless error.

United States v. McKee, 389 F.3d 697 (7th Cir. 2004)

The prosecutor erred in questioning the defendant about the credibility of other witnesses. It is improper to ask one witness to comment on the veracity of the testimony of another witness. This was not plain error, however.

United States v. Combs, 379 F.3d 564 (9th Cir. 2004)

It is not proper for a prosecutor to ask a defendant who is testifying whether a government agent was lying when his testimony was inconsistent with the defendant’s testimony. See also United States v. Sanchez, 176 F.3d 1214 (9th Cir. 1999). In this case, the error was plain error, particularly because it was compounded by the prosecutor’s statements in closing argument that in order to acquit the defendant, the jury would have to believe that the agent risked losing his job by lying on the stand. This amounts to improper vouching of the government’s witness.

United States v. Thiongo, 344 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2003)

It is improper for an attorney to ask a witness whether another witness lied on the stand. It is not improper to ask if another witness was mistaken, however.

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003)

The Fifth Circuit agrees with other Circuits that it is improper for a prosecutor to ask a defendant whether he believes that another witness lied. But, like other Circuits, it was not grounds to reverse a conviction.

Boyle v. Million, 201 F.3d 711 (6th Cir. 2000)

The Sixth Circuit granted a writ where the special prosecutor’s cross-examination of the defendant was described as follows: “Boyle's trial began innocently enough with Thomas Osborne serving as the special prosecutor in Weisenberger's stead. When Osborne began his cross-examination of defendant Boyle, however, the code of ethics and civility that should undergird the legal profession began to take devastating blow after blow. Immediately, Osborne launched into theatrics. He prefaced his third question to Boyle with the query, “Now, that is an outright lie, isn't it, Doctor?” With the boost from that springboard, he then began badgering Boyle, interrupting his answers, and even going so far as to throw a deposition into Boyle's lap.
When chastised by the court for his outburst, Osborne unrepentantly proclaimed before the jury, “Dr. Boyle, I apologize if I dropped those records in your lap too hard. I didn't mean anything by that. I just was frustrated that you were lying and I'm going to prove it...” (Emphasis added.) After further contentious questioning, Osborne drew an additional reprimand from the trial judge for suggesting, again before the jury while questioning Boyle, that Boyle needed a psychiatrist.”

United States v. Sullivan, 85 F.3d 743 (1st Cir. 1996)

It is not proper for a prosecutor to ask the defendant, or any other witness, whether another witness had lied.

United States v. Schwab, 886 F.2d 509 (2d Cir. 1989)

During the defendant’s testimony, the prosecutor was permitted to ask whether he had previously been charged with income tax fraud in 1970. Actually the defendant had been acquitted of these charges. Although this was error, it was harmless in light of the overwhelming evidence of the defendant’s guilt.

United States v. Richter, 826 F.2d 206 (2d Cir. 1987)

While the defendant was testifying, the prosecutor cross-examined him and asked him whether he believed that the law enforcement officer was simply mistaken or was lying when he testified to facts contradictory to the defendant’s version. When the defendant stated that the police officer had made false statements, the prosecutor called additional witnesses to corroborate the officer’s testimony. The Second Circuit holds this to be improper cross-examination, improper impeachment, and represents clear error requiring reversal.

United States v. Hall, 989 F.2d 711 (4th Cir. 1993)

Defendant’s wife made statements to an investigator which implicated the defendant in drug dealing. Prior to trial, however, the wife asserted her marital privilege and refused to testify. The prosecutor, in cross-examining the defendant made repeated references to the wife’s statement, even announcing to the jury that his questions were based on the wife’s three-page statement. Aside from violating the marital privilege, this amounted to the improper introduction of hearsay. Even a curative instruction, directing the jury to disregard the alleged statements of the wife, did not cure this error.

United States v. Norris, 910 F.2d 1246 (5th Cir. 1990)

It is improper to permit a prosecutor to cross-examine the defendant about the fact that he previously entered a not guilty plea. This cannot be the subject of impeachment.

United States v. Robinson, 8 F.3d 398 (7th Cir. 1993)

When a defendant is impeached with a prior conviction under Rule 609, it is not proper for the government to inquire into the specifics of the offense – all that is relevant is the fact of the conviction (the date, the nature of the offense, and the fact of conviction). Harmless error in this case. The prosecutor also improperly asked the defendant about other frauds he committed, knowing that he had no factual predicate for the question. Again, though, harmless error.

United States v. Elizondo, 920 F.2d 1308 (7th Cir. 1990)

Defendant testified that he was not at the scene of the drug transaction and produced a Mexican car accident report to support his alibi. On cross-examination, the prosecutor suggested that the accident report had been “bought” and prepared by the defendant. There was no support for this inquiry. When the prosecution asks damning questions that go to a central issue in the case, these questions must be supported by evidence available or inferable from the trial record.
The fact that the government had evidence that the defendant was at the transaction site (rather than in Mexico) does not support this type of cross-examination. Harmless error.

United States v. Monteleone, 77 F.3d 1086 (8th Cir. 1996)

When a prosecutor cross examines a defendant’s reputation good character witness the prosecutor must not only have a good faith basis for believing that the defendant committed the offense (which the witness is being asked about), but also that the offense is known in the community. Here, the prosecutor believed that the defendant lied in a grand jury proceeding in the past, but that was not a matter that could have been known in the community and therefore it was improper – reversible error – to question the character witness about his knowledge that the defendant had lied in the grand jury room.

United States v. Kallin, 50 F.3d 689 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with tax evasion. When he was cross-examined by the prosecutor, he was asked whether he had ever told the IRS agent that he was innocent; and asked whether he had hired a criminal defense attorney when he was first approached by the IRS. Both of these lines of questioning were improper and merited a reversal of the conviction, even though the trial court later directed the jury to disregard these questions and answers. The questions amounted to improper Doyle v. Ohio questions. Even with regard to non-custodial questioning by the IRS agent, because the agent advised the defendant of his right to an attorney, and his right to remain silent, the invocation of that right could not be used to impeach the defendant or suggest that he was demonstrating a consciousness of guilt. With regard to the curative instruction, the instruction merely repeated the offensive questions and answers and then urged the jury to ignore the testimony. This was not an adequate curative instruction.

United States v. Albers, 93 F.3d 1469 (10th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred when it permitted the government to ask the defendant specifics of his prior convictions. Only the fact of the conviction, the nature of the offense, and the sentence, but not the specifics of the crime may be probed.

United States v. Elkins, 70 F.3d 81 (10th Cir. 1995)

The defendant’s conviction was reversed because of the improper admission of evidence that a defense witness was a member of a gang. Such evidence is only admissible if it is shown that the witness belongs to the same gang as the defendant, or if it is shown that the witness was afraid of the defendant. Neither showing was made in this case and therefore the prosecutor’s cross-examination of the witness on this topic was reversible error.

It is improper for a prosecutor to force a defendant to evaluate the credibility of other witnesses for the government. Thus, when a defendant is testifying, he should not be asked by the prosecutor why government law enforcement agents would lie about him. The error was compounded in this case when the prosecutor stated in closing argument that there was no reason for the law enforcement witnesses to lie. Harmless error in this case.
CURRENCY TRANSACTION REPORTS (CTR)

United States v. Taylor, 816 F.3d 12 (2d Cir. 2016)

The defendant operated a liquor store and maintained the liquor store and his personal bank account at the same credit union. On several occasions, he would make two deposits – each for under $10,000, but totaling more than $10,000 – at the credit union at the same time. The deposits were either made into the same account, or into the liquor store and his personal bank account. The deposits were made with the same teller within seconds or minutes of each other. The evidence in this case did not support the jury’s verdict that required proof that the defendant structured his transactions with the intent to evade the reporting requirement. The tellers had the duty to file the CTR and there was insufficient evidence that the defendant’s conduct was designed to frustrate the teller’s duty. In fact, there was no evidence that the defendant was aware that a CTR was not filed. Finally, the evidence showed that on numerous occasions, the defendant deposited money in excess of $10,000 into one account, thus negating the inference that he wanted to evade the reporting requirement.

United States v. Lang, 732 F.3d 1246 (11th Cir. 2013)

The crime of structuring a financial transaction (31 U.S.C. § 5324), is not committed simply by the depositing of an amount of money in increments less than $10,000.00. Rather the offense is committed by the act of “structuring” not the act of “depositing” and the critical element is that there is a larger sum of money that is being broken into incremental deposits. Therefore, an indictment that simply alleges that the defendant made deposits of less than $10,000 (even if there are dozens of such deposits and some occurred on the same day), it is not a crime, unless the indictment expressly alleges that there was an amount of money in excess of $10,000 that was divided into separate deposits for the purpose of evading the reporting requirement. The indictment in this case was defective and the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Ibisevic, 675 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant carried over $10,000 into an international flight from Dulles Airport heading to Bosnia. An ICE agent who had a Puerto Rican accent questioned the defendant and his mother (the mother spoke no English) about whether they were carrying cash. The defendant responded that they had $5,000.00. During this “questioning” the defendant turned to his mother and translated, “They are asking how much the luggage is worth if it is lost.” The defendant and his mother actually had about $40,000 in the luggage, on their persons and in the mother’s purse. At trial, the defendant claimed that he did not understand the question and that the mother’s testimony (about what the defendant said to the mother) was admissible as a “present sense impression” to show a lack of understanding. The trial court held that this was hearsay and inadmissible. The Fourth Circuit reversed: The defendant’s statement was not hearsay (it was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted; it nevertheless would qualify as a present sense impression; and it was important to his defense regarding his lack of understanding that he was making a false statement or knowingly failing to file a currency form in violation of the law.

The attorneys failed to establish that revealing the identity of the clients who paid cash fees would disclose confidential, privileged information.

_Gerald B. Lefcourt, P.C. v. United States_, 125 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 1997)

A criminal law firm's willing and knowing failure to file a § 6050I form (Form 8300) when it received in excess of $10,000 from a client resulted in the assessment of a $25,000 penalty by the IRS. The Second Circuit rejected the law firm's effort seeking a refund of this penalty.
DEATH PENALTY

(Penalty Phase)

The Supreme Court narrowly approves the use of Oklahoma’s lethal injection method of execution. Justice Breyer, joined by Justice Ginsburg, questioned the constitutionality of the death penalty.

The death penalty procedure in Kansas is constitutional. That state permits the imposition of the death penalty where the aggravating factors are not outweighed by the mitigating factors. The defendant claimed that if the factors are in equipoise, the death penalty would be unconstitutional. The Supreme Court disagreed.

The state court’s jury instruction regarding mitigating evidence was not defective. The instruction invited the jury to consider “any other circumstance which extenuates the gravity of the crime even though it is not a legal excuse for the crime.” The defendant complained that this instruction did not encompass information relating to the defendant (as opposed to the crime) such as his post-offense jail house conversion. The Supreme Court held that the instruction was sufficient.

The death penalty may not be imposed in a case in which the defendant was under the age of 18 at the time the offense was committed.

Executing the mentally retarded violates the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause.

Pursuant to _Apprendi_, the jury must make the findings of fact on the essential elements required to impose the death penalty.

When the state introduces evidence that suggests that the defendant is dangerous, the trial court is required to instruct the jury about the defendant’s ineligibility for parole. It is not necessary that the prosecutor actually argue future dangerousness in order to require such an instruction.

Under Alabama’s capital sentencing scheme, the jury renders an advisory opinion. It does not offend the Eighth Amendment that the statute does not specify what weight the trial judge should give the jury’s recommendation when the judge imposes the sentence.

When the prosecutor argues during closing argument that the imposition of the death penalty is the only sure way to ensure that the defendant will not pose a danger to the community in the future, the defendant may argue or obtain an instruction from the trial court, that the only available option to the death penalty is life without parole.

At the defendant’s death penalty trial, evidence of his membership in a white racist organization was introduced. His affiliation with this group had nothing to do with the crime. The introduction of this evidence violated the defendant’s First Amendment rights.

The Court changes its mind and holds that victim impact evidence is admissible.

North Carolina’s death penalty scheme required the jury to find the existence of a particular mitigating factor with unanimity when balancing such factors against the existence of aggravating circumstances. This violated the Eighth Amendment insofar as it limited the jurors’ ability to recommend against a death sentence.

It is improper during the penalty phase instructions to fail to permit the jury to express its “reasoned moral response” to the mitigating evidence of the defendant’s mental retardation and his background of being abused. Nevertheless, the Eighth Amendment does not categorically prevent the state from executing a mentally retarded person. But see Atkins v. Virginia, noted above.

The prosecutor read a religious tract and a voter registration card that was found in the possession of a victim of a murder for which the defendant was being prosecuted. This evidence was not relevant to the defendant’s moral culpability and the reading of these papers to the jury required a new sentencing proceeding. (This decision was overruled in Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991).

The defendant’s death penalty was based in part on his having earlier committed a crime in New York State. However, following the imposition of the death penalty in Mississippi, New York vacated his conviction in that state. The Supreme Court unanimously holds that the Mississippi death sentence must be vacated.

A death sentence cannot constitutionally be imposed unless the jury is permitted to consider a verdict of guilt as to a lesser-included non-capital offense, provided that the evidence would support such a verdict.

Lawlor v. Zook, 909 F.3d 614 (4th Cir. 2018)

The state court committed constitutional error by prohibiting the defendant from introducing expert opinion during the penalty phase of his trial that he posed a very low risk of future violence if sentenced to life in prison.
Hedlund v. Ryan, 854 F.3d 557 (9th Cir. 2017)

The state trial court improperly limited mitigating evidence in this case to events or circumstances that had a causal connection to the crime.

Pensinger v. Chappell, 787 F.3d 1014 (9th Cir. 2015)

The state trial court’s failure to properly instruct the jury on the special circumstances required to return a death penalty violated the defendant’s right to due process and required setting aside the death sentence.

Van Tran v. Colson, 764 F.3d 594 (6th Cir. 2014)

The state courts failed to properly apply Atkins and a proper assessment of the defendant’s claim under the proper legal standard.

Dodd v. Trammell 753 F.3d 971 (10th Cir. 2013)

Habeas relief was granted in this death penalty case because a victim impact statement included a recommendation of death for the defendant.

Hodges v. Epps, 648 F.3d 283 (5th Cir. 2011)

The trial court erroneously instructed the jury that a life sentence would make the defendant eligible for parole. This was a due process violation that necessitated setting aside the death penalty.

Phillips v. Workman, 604 F.3d 1202 (10th Cir. 2010)

A Beck v. Alabama, 447 U.S. 625 (1980) error resulted in granting a writ in this death penalty case. If the trial court in a capital case fails to give a lesser included offense instruction that is appropriate under state law, this is a Beck violation.

Robinson v. Schriro, 595 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2010)

If a defendant does not order, intend, or participate in a murder, and the murder was not reasonably foreseeable, the state may not rely on the “cruel, heinous or depraved” aggravator.

Sechrest v. Ignacio, 549 F.3d 789 (9th Cir. 2008)

The prosecutor’s repeated references during closing argument in this death penalty case to the likelihood that the defendant would be paroled, if not sentenced to death, were constitutionally impermissible. Statements such as, “Nobody actually dies in prison” and “People don’t die of old age in prison” were false and denied the defendant his right to due process. The prosecutor also improperly labeled the defense a “fraud” and told the jurors that if the defendant was released and killed a child or another person, that would be the juror’s burden.

Kindler v. Horn, 542 F.3d 70 (3rd Cir. 2008)

Another death sentence vacated because of a Mills v. Maryland defect.

Abu-Jamal v. Horn, 520 F.3d 272 (3rd Cir. 2008)
The defendant’s death sentence suffered from a Mills v. Maryland defect. The trial court instructed the jury, “The Crimes Code provides that a verdict must be a sentence of death if the jury unanimously finds at least one aggravating circumstance and no mitigating circumstances. This may have led the jury to believe that a mitigating factor should not be considered unless the jury reached unanimous agreement about the mitigating factor. The flaw in this instruction was compounded by the verdict form that similarly suggested that a mitigating factor must be agreed to by the jury unanimously. The decision survived a subsequent remand from the United States Supreme Court, Abu-Jamal v. Secretary, Pa. Dept of Corrections, 643 F.3d 370 (3rd Cir. 2011).

Tennard v. Dretke, 442 F.3d 240 (5th Cir. 2006)

Following remand from the Supreme Court, the Fifth Circuit set aside the defendant’s death penalty on the basis that the trial court was too restrictive in preventing the defendant’s evidence of low IQ.

Weaver v. Bowersox, 438 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 2006)

The prosecutor urged the penalty phase jury to do their duty and vote to execute the defendant. The comments implored the jury to act as good soldiers do and protect the community. This is business. Toughen up. The message for these types of people must be death. I am the top law enforcement officer in this jurisdiction and I determine which cases are appropriate for the death penalty. Etc. The Eighth Circuit held these comments were too inflammatory and required setting aside the death penalty. The comments also violated Caldwell, and Zant v. Stephens.

Bigby v. Dretke, 402 F.3d 551 (5th Cir. 2005)

The state court’s penalty phase instruction offered the jury the option of disregarding relevant mitigating evidence: the defendant’s paranoid schizophrenia. This violated the Eighth Amendment. See Smith v. Texas, 125 S.Ct. 400 (2004)

Bates v. Bell, 402 F.3d 635 (6th Cir. 2005)

In this death penalty trial, the prosecutor’s closing argument included the following improper arguments (1) suggested to the jury that if the defendant’s life was spared, the jurors would be accomplices in the defendant’s subsequent crimes; (2) accused the defense attorney of being paranoid and criticized the attorney’s frequent objections to evidence; (3) commented on the credibility, by expressing personal opinions, about the defense mental health experts; (4) likened the defendant to a rabid dog, the only solution to which is death. The Sixth Circuit set aside the death penalty.

Jones v. Polk, 401 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 2005)

The defense sought to elicit testimony that the defendant had expressed remorse for his actions. The state trial court erred in excluding this testimony on hearsay grounds. A trial court may not apply hearsay rules mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice at a capital sentencing. Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979). Lockett holds that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments require that the sentencer not be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant’s character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death.
Mollett v. Mullin, 348 F.3d 902 (10th Cir. 2003)

The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury regarding the impact of a life without parole sentence violated Simmons v. South Carolina, 512 U.S. 154 (1994). Because the state argued future dangerousness, the trial court should have instructed the jury that LWOP means LWOP, rather than simply stating that the jurors should not be concerned with the issue of parole.

Spears v. Mullin, 343 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2003)

The victim was severely beaten and stabbed, but the medical experts agreed that he was either dead, or certainly unconscious long before the stabbings began and shortly after the beating began. During the penalty phase, the state introduced several gruesome photographs that showed the results of the stabbings and the beating. This violated the defendant’s right to due process and required that the death sentence be set aside.

Depew v. Anderson, 311 F.3d 742 (6th Cir. 2002)

The prosecutor’s cross examination of defense witnesses during the penalty phase and his closing argument contained numerous inflammatory and inadmissible statements, including a reference to an unproven (and untrue) prior knife assault committed by the defendant. He also told the jury that had the defendant taken the stand (he did not), the prosecutor would have asked him about a prior conviction. In addition, the prosecutor admitted, without any authentication, a picture of the defendant standing next to a marijuana plant. These errors necessitated granting the writ of habeas corpus.

Riley v. Taylor, 277 F.3d 261 (3rd Cir. 2001)

The prosecutor’s reference to “automatic appellate review” during his closing argument was a Caldwell error that was one reason the Third Circuit granted a writ of habeas corpus in this death penalty trial.

McLain v. Calderon, 134 F.3d 1383 (9th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in instructing the jury that a sentence of life without parole could be commuted by the governor, and reduced to a sentence that could lead to parole. Though this instruction may be appropriate in certain circumstances, see California v. Ramos, 463 U.S. 992 (1983), it was inappropriate in this case, where the governor did not have that power.

McDowell v. Calderon, 130 F.3d 833 (9th Cir. 1997)

The trial court’s failure to correct the jury’s misconception about the proper role of certain mitigating evidence violated the defendant’s rights under the Eighth Amendment. A note from the jury during deliberations suggested that a "hold out" juror was considering mitigating factors that the rest of the jurors thought should not be considered. The trial court should have instructed the jury that they could consider any mitigating facts, including those being considered by the hold out.

Frey v. Fulcomer, 132 F.3d 916 (3rd Cir. 1997)

The sentencer cannot be precluded from considering any mitigating evidence, either by statute, evidentiary rulings, or the jury instructions. Moreover, the jury may not be instructed that unanimity is required before a mitigating factor can be considered. The instruction in this case was ambiguous: "Remember that your verdict must be a sentence of death if you unanimously find at least one aggravating circumstance and no mitigating circumstances, or if you unanimously find one or more aggravating circumstances which outweigh any mitigating circumstances." This instruction was erroneous and required setting aside the death sentence.

Smith v. Singletary, 61 F.3d 815 (11th Cir. 1995)
In capital cases, the sentencer may not refuse to consider or be precluded from considering any relevant mitigating evidence. The trial court’s error in excluding such evidence in this case was not harmless error.

Duest v. Singletary, 967 F.2d 472 (11th Cir. 1992)
Defendant’s death sentence was based in part on a Massachusetts conviction which was subsequently set aside. Johnson v. Mississippi, 486 U.S. 578 (1988) dictates that the sentencing phase had to be retried. On remand from the United States Supreme Court, for analysis under the standard of Brecht v. Abrahamson, the Eleventh Circuit again reversed the sentence, 997 F.2d 1336 (11th Cir. 1993).

Gore v. Dugger, 933 F.2d 904 (11th Cir. 1991)
The trial court’s failure to instruct the jury about non-statutory mitigating circumstances required vacating the death sentence.

Jackson v. Dugger, 931 F.2d 712 (11th Cir. 1991)
Limiting the jury’s consideration of mitigating circumstances to those found in the statute was harmful error in light of the defendant’s military background which the jury was not allowed to consider. The defendant had served in Vietnam and had been in the armed forces for eight years.

Cunningham v. Zant, 928 F.2d 1006 (11th Cir. 1991)
The state trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that a life sentence could be rendered even if the state proved the existence of an aggravating circumstance beyond a reasonable doubt.

Aldridge v. Dugger, 925 F.2d 1320 (11th Cir. 1991)
The state trial court erred in instructing the jury that it could consider only statutory mitigating factors on the issue of the death penalty.

Booker v. Dugger, 922 F.2d 633 (11th Cir. 1991)
The state trial court committed a reversible Hitchcock error by failing to accurately instruct the jury about their right to consider non-statutory mitigating circumstances.

DeLap v. Dugger, 890 F.2d. 285 (11th Cir. 1989)
The trial judge erred in instructing the jury that only statutory mitigating circumstances could be considered in deciding whether the death sentence was appropriate. This violates the rule of Hitchcock v. Dugger, 481 U.S. 393 (1987) and Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978). The death sentence was also reversed because the sentencing jury was instructed on the law of felony murder as an aggravating circumstance, despite the fact that the defendant had previously been acquitted of the felony murder.
Jones v. Dugger, 867 F.2d 1277 (11th Cir. 1989)

The trial’s court’s failure to advise the jury that it should consider all mitigating evidence in the record in deciding whether to impose the death penalty was reversible error.

Knight v. Dugger, 863 F.2d 705 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defense attorney, the judge, and the prosecutor all suggested to the jury that only statutory mitigating factors can be considered by the jury. Because the jury can consider any mitigating factors, this was erroneous and required a new sentencing proceeding.

Ruffin v. Dugger, 848 F.2d 1512 (11th Cir. 1988)

The trial court failed to instruct the jury after reviewing the seven statutory mitigating factors, that the jury could also consider any other mitigating evidence present in the record. Despite the fact that the trial court did not tell the jury that the seven mitigating factors constituted an exhaustive list, the trial court’s failure to specifically advise the jury that it could consider other mitigating circumstances taints the death penalty verdict.

Mann v. Dugger and Harich v. Wainwright, 844 F.2d 1446 and 1464 (11th Cir. 1988)

Sitting en banc, the Eleventh Circuit reviewed closing arguments in two cases which involved a prosecutor minimizing the role of the jury in imposing the death penalty. In Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320 (1985), the Supreme Court held that this type of argument was inconsistent with the Eighth Amendment’s heightened need for reliability in determining whether death is the appropriate sentence. The prosecutor in these cases, arising in Florida, held that because a jury only makes an advisory verdict, Caldwell should not apply. The Eleventh Circuit disagreed and held that such argument by the prosecutor is as inappropriate in Florida as it is in Mississippi.

Stone v. Dugger, 837 F.2d 1477 (11th Cir. 1988)

The judge and jury improperly believed that they were limited to considering only statutory mitigating factors in fixing sentence. This required a reversal and a new sentencing proceeding.

Jackson v. Dugger, 837 F.2d 1469 (11th Cir. 1988)

The trial judge improperly instructed the jury that death is presumed to be the proper sentence for murder when one or more of the aggravating circumstances is found and is not overcome by mitigating circumstances. There is no such presumption.

Godfrey v. Kemp, 836 F.2d 1557 (11th Cir. 1988)

Having found that the evidence presented at the defendant’s first sentencing trial was insufficient to support the death sentence, the Double Jeopardy Clause barred resentencing the defendant to death. Only one aggravating circumstance was presented to the first jury and insufficient evidence was presented to support this basis for death.

Messer v. Florida, 834 F.2d 890 (11th Cir. 1987)

It was improper for the trial court during the sentencing phase of this death penalty trial to limit the jury’s consideration of mitigating circumstances. Having done so in this case, the death sentence was reversed.

Moore v. Kemp, 809 F.2d 702 (11th Cir. 1987)

It is improper for a trial court to inform a jury during the penalty phase in Georgia that the jury is required to return a death sentence if it finds aggravating circumstances. The proper rule is that the jury may return a death sentence if statutory aggravating circumstances are found.
DEATH PENALTY
(Federal Death Penalty)

Jones v. United States, 527 U.S. 373 (1999)
In its first review of a federal death penalty conviction, the Court upholds the conviction and sentence of death. The Court holds that it is not necessary that the jury be informed of the consequences of a "hung jury" (i.e., that this would result in a sentence of less than death, rather than a retrial). The Court also held that submitting duplicative, and vague aggravating factors to the jury may be harmless error.

United States v. Whitten, 610 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2010)
In its death penalty closing argument, the prosecutor suggested that the defendant’s decision to go to trial was an illustration of his lack of remorse and was one reason the death penalty should be imposed. The prosecutor also argued that the defendant could have testified during the penalty phase (rather than simply make an allocution that was unsworn and not subject to cross-examination). Both of these arguments were improper and led to reversal of the death penalty.

United States v. Williams, 610 F.3d 271 (5th Cir. 2010)
The FDPA includes the term “act of violence” as one of the qualifiers for imposition of the death penalty. The Fifth Circuit held that this requires the use of force. The defendant in this case failed to turn on his truck’s air conditioning, knowing that illegal aliens were left in the truck. Several of the aliens died in the truck. The Fifth Circuit held that failing to turn on the air conditioning does not qualify as an act of violence.

United States v. Brown, 441 F.3d 1330 (11th Cir. 2006)
Various constitutional challenges to the federal death penalty act were denied, as well as a challenge to the “pecuniary gain” aggravating circumstance.

United States v. Allen, 406 F.3d 940 (8th Cir. 2005)
A federal death penalty indictment must include at least one statutory aggravating factor and the mens rea element.

United States v. Fell, 360 F.3d 135 (2d Cir. 2004)
Reversing the decision of the trial court, the Second Circuit holds that the federal death penalty is constitutional. In particular, this case focused on the provision of the statute that permits the introduction of evidence during the sentencing phase that would not be admissible under the federal rules of evidence.

United States v. Allen, 357 F.3d 745 (8th Cir. 2004)
An indictment must contain the elements of the offense charged. Where a statutory aggravating factor operates as the functional equivalent of an element, it too must be noticed in the indictment. In this case, the death penalty indictment did not sufficiently allege the statutory aggravator that the defendant committed the offense in the expectation of pecuniary gain. See 406 F.3d 940.
United States v. Bernard, 299 F.3d 467 (5th Cir. 2002)

18 U.S.C. § 3592(c)(8) makes the fact that a murder was committed for pecuniary gain an aggravating circumstance supporting a death sentence. This provision is limited to murder-for-hire cases and other circumstances where the murder itself was committed as consideration for, or in expectation of, something of value. A carjacking or robbery that also leads to a murder is not included as a murder that is committed for pecuniary gain.
DEFENDANT’S APPEARANCE AT TRIAL (SHACKLING)

Shackling the defendant, even during the sentencing phase of a death penalty trial, violates due process. A defendant may not be forced to appear in shackles unless the trial court has found that such restraint is warranted by an essential state interest specific to the particular defendant.

Stephenson v. Neal, 865 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2017)

Requiring the defendant to wear a stun belt during the penalty phase of this death penalty trial was reversible error. Trial counsel’s failure to object was ineffective assistance of counsel.

United States v. Sanchez-Gomez, 798 F.3d 1204, 859 F.3d 649 (9th Cir. 2015)

A policy adopted in the Southern District of California required all detainees to appear in shackles for all non-jury proceedings. The Ninth Circuit held that this policy was unconstitutional. In order to shackle a defendant, a particularized need must be shown. Reviewing the case en banc, the Ninth Circuit reached the same decision in a decision issued in 2017, 859 F.3d 649.

United States v. Haynes, 729 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2013)

The trial court improperly ordered that the defendant be shackled during trial, despite the absence of any findings on the record regarding the need to shackle the defendant. The government indicated during oral argument that shackling the defendant is a routine practice in the NDNY and that the Marshal’s office communicates directly with the judge in each case about the need to shackle detained defendants. The Second Circuit condemned this practice (shackling is appropriate only when there is an on-the-record finding that shackling is necessary as a last resort to satisfy a compelling reason, such as the preservation of safety in the courtroom) and held that, along with various other errors at trial, necessitated reversing the conviction.

United States v. Banegas, 600 F.3d 342 (5th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was shackled at trial because, according to the judge, she always shackled pro se defendants. Though the evidence was unclear whether the jury could see the shackles, the burden was on the government to prove that the jury did not see the shackles; the burden was not on the defendant to show that the jury did see the shackles. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Miller, 531 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2008)

The defendant’s attorney expressed fear about sitting at counsel table with the defendant and said that the defendant had threatened her. The court declined to allow her to withdraw from representing the defendant, but required the defendant to wear a stun belt during trial. The Sixth Circuit held that the trial court failed to make an adequate inquiry prior to using the stun belt. There was no hearing and no evidence, other than the attorney’s statement. The defendant, however, never complained. The Sixth Circuit held that use of the belt was not plain error.

Gray v. Moore, 520 F.3d 616 (6th Cir. 2008)
Before a defendant may be removed from the courtroom because of his misbehavior, the trial court must warn the defendant of the consequences of his actions. Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337 (1970). Because the state trial court promptly removed the defendant from the courtroom when he yelled at a witness, “You’re lying” without warning the defendant of the consequences of his outburst, a writ of habeas corpus was granted.

Lakin v. Stine, 431 F.3d 959 (6th Cir. 2005)

It was error, but harmless, for the state court to shackle the defendant without having made a case-by-case determination of the necessity, and simply deferring to the request of the corrections officer’s request.

Ruimveld v. Birkett, 404 F.3d 1006 (6th Cir. 2005)

The defendant, an inmate in a state prison, was charged with poisoning a guard (putting cleaning fluid in the guard’s coffee). During trial, which occurred in a courtroom in the prison, the defendant was shackled. The Sixth Circuit granted a writ. Even in this situation—a known prisoner, in a prison courtroom—the defendant should not be shackled absent proof of the need for this procedure.

United States v. Durham, 287 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2002)

The Eleventh Circuit holds that the district court made insufficient findings regarding the use of a stun belt during trial. Though the belt was apparently not seen by jurors, the defendant claimed that his fear that the belt would be activated by the marshals deterred him from talking to his counsel during trial, or making any movements at defense table. He became preoccupied during trial that he would be stunned and could not concentrate on the evidence.

Gonzalez v. Pliler, 341 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2003)

Based on the Eleventh Circuit decision in Durham, the Ninth Circuit held that the state court’s use of a stun belt was not supported by any findings of the trial court. The case was remanded to the lower court for a hearing on the question of prejudice.

Rhoden v. Rowland, 172 F.3d 633 (9th Cir. 1998)

Shackling the defendant during trial in a manner that was visible to the jury is inherently prejudicial. Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337 (1970); Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501 (1976); Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 U.S. 560 (1986). When the shackling was unnecessary, it is reversible error.
DEFENDANT'S PRESENCE AT TRIAL

Pursuant to Rule 43, Fed.R.Crim.P., a defendant who does not appear on the first day of trial may not be tried in absentia. A defendant who leaves the jurisdiction during the course of trial may be tried in absentia.

United States v. Martinez, 850 F.3d 1097 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with unlawful re-entry. One issue that had to be decided unanimously by the jury was the date of his prior removal. A special verdict form required the jury to answer whether the defendant’s prior removal occurred after a specific date. The jury sent in a note during deliberations asking what the significance of his question was. The judge, without telling counsel, answered, “It is a matter for the court to consider, not the jury. The jury has to consider whether the defendant was deported or removed after that date.” Shortly thereafter the jury returned a verdict. The Ninth Circuit reversed. Answering the question without advising the attorneys or the defendant was erroneous. Proceeding in the absence of the defendant violated Rule 43(a). Trial counsel would have insisted that the judge advise the jury that the response to the question required the jury to believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the removal occurred after a specific date.

Jones v. Murphy, 694 F.3d 225 (2d Cir. 2012)

A very lengthy opinion that canvasses the law governing situations in which a defendant’s recalcitrant behavior leads to his exclusion from the courtroom. The Second Circuit ultimately concludes that proceeding in the absence of the defendant in this case was acceptable, because the trial court determined that the defendant was determined to interfere with the proceedings if he was permitted to return after initially being removed.

Ayala v. Wong, 693 F.3d 945 (9th Cir. 2012)

It is not proper to permit the prosecutor to present the race-neutral reasons for the exercise of strikes in an ex parte proceeding. The defense has the right to be present and to argue that the reasons are pretextual. See also 756 F.3d 656 (9th Cir. 2014). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the petitioner was not entitled to AEDPA relief. Davis v. Ayala, 135 S. Ct. 2187 (2015).

Grayton v. Ercole, 691 F.3d 165 (2d Cir. 2012)

The defendant has the right to be present at a pretrial evidentiary hearing at which the state seeks to admit certain hearsay on the theory that the defendant forfeited his right to contest the hearsay (and the Confrontation Clause protection) by his wrongdoing.

United States v. Collins, 665 F.3d 454 (2d Cir. 2012)

During deliberations, the jurors became embroiled in an altercation that clearly exceeded deliberations. A series of notes were sent to the judge. Initially, the judge shared the notes with counsel and responded appropriately. A subsequent note, however, was not shared with counsel but the judge told the parties he was going to have a private conversation with one of the jurors.
Defense counsel stated, “I am not consenting to this course of action.” The judge then spoke to the juror and admonished the juror to continue deliberating. The Second Circuit reversed the subsequent conviction, holding that this procedure violated the defendant’s right to be present at all stages of the proceedings.

United States v. Williams, 641 F.3d 758 (6th Cir. 2011)

Video conferencing is not permissible for a sentencing proceeding.

United States v. Ward, 598 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2010)

If the defendant is disruptive and the judge is contemplating removing him from the courtroom, the judge must first question the defendant – not just the defense attorney – about his conduct and warn the defendant personally of the consequences of his actions. Simply relying on defense counsel to advise the court about the defendant’s intentions is not sufficient.

Gray v. Moore, 520 F.3d 616 (6th Cir. 2008)

Before a defendant may be removed from the courtroom because of his misbehavior, the trial court must warn the defendant of the consequences of his actions. Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337 (1970). Because the state trial court promptly removed the defendant from the courtroom when he yelled at a witness, “You’re lying” without warning the defendant of the consequences of his outburst, a writ of habeas corpus was granted.

United States v. Demott, 513 F.3d 55 (11th Cir. 2008)

When a defendant is re-sentenced pursuant to a remand from the appellate court, he has the right to be present. The trial court’s summary imposition of the same sentence without announcing findings in open court and without the defendant present was error. On remand, the case would be assigned to a different judge because of the judge’s apparent lack of receptivity to the arguments of counsel (because he had not even given them an opportunity to be heard at the last proceeding).

United States v. Barnwell, 477 F.3d 844 (6th Cir. 2007)

During deliberations in this trial, an FBI agent in an unrelated case who was monitoring a wiretap determined that one of the deliberating jurors was possibly contacting people about her deliberations. Two prosecutors (not the trial prosecutors in this case), asked to speak to the judge and explained the situation. The trial prosecutors were aware of this ex parte communication. Over the next day or two, five ex parte meetings were held. The defendant and his attorneys had no idea this was occurring. There were also some meetings with the foreman (these were in the presence of the defense attorney, but he did not know exactly what prompted the meetings). Eventually, a mistrial was declared when the jury was unable to reach a verdict. The ex parte communications remained a secret. A new trial was held and the defendant was found guilty. After that trial, the events that occurred during the first trial were unsealed and furnished to defense counsel. The Sixth Circuit held that the ex parte communications violated the defendant’s right to counsel and his right to be present at all stages of the proceedings, as well as his right to be tried with an impartial judge. The court set aside the verdict in the second trial, even though it was not directly affected by the ex parte communication. The decision ends with a series of observations about the impropriety of conducting ex parte communications and the necessity of judicial impartiality.

United States v. Sepulveda-Contreras, 466 F.3d 166 (1st Cir. 2006)

After pronouncing the sentence in court, the judge prepared a written judgment that added conditions of supervised release. This violated the defendant’s right to be present when sentence was imposed.

United States v. Napier, 463 F.3d 1040 (9th Cir. 2006)

After imposing sentence orally in court, the judge entered a written order that set forth certain non-standard conditions of supervised release that exceeded what was said in court. This denied the defendant his Sixth Amendment (and Rule 43(a)(3)) right to be present when sentence was imposed.

Bradley v. Henry, 428 F.3d 811 (9th Cir. 2005)

Retained counsel asked to withdraw, claiming significant conflicts of interest, including the defendant’s failure to pay the fee. A hearing was held in chambers with the prosecutor, the defense attorney and lawyers who were destined to take over the case. The defendant, however, was not present. The Ninth Circuit held that this procedure violated the right to be present at critical stages of the proceedings. See generally Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730 (1987).

Bradley v. Henry, 428 F.3d 811 (9th Cir. 2005)

The exclusion of the defendant from a hearing in chambers that involved the replacement of retained counsel and a discussion about threats made to the prosecutor by the defendant’s father violated the defendant’s right to be present at all critical stages of the proceedings.

Moore v. Knight, 368 F.3d 936 (7th Cir. 2004)

During the course of their deliberations, the jury sent out a note asking specific factual questions about the defendant’s alibi. The trial judge responded, in writing, without consulting with the defendant or his counsel. The record is not entirely clear about what the judge’s responses were, but essentially, the judge instructed the jury that he would not answer their questions and that no further questions should be asked. The Seventh Circuit held that this improper ex parte communication with the jury was improper and granted a writ of habeas corpus.

United States v. Mejia, 356 F.3d 470 (2d Cir. 2004)

On the third day of deliberations, the jury sent a note to the judge indicating that they were divided 11-1 and that this had been the division for over two days. Though the parties had previously discussed an Allen charge and previous notes and responses were handled in the presence of the defendant and his counsel, this time, the judge simply sent a note back to the jury instructing it not to reveal its division to the court, hoping that the same note would be returned without a notation of the division. Shortly thereafter, the jury reached a verdict. The defendant unsuccessfully challenged the verdict on the basis of the court’s ex parte response to the jury’s note. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction, holding that responding to the jury without consulting with the attorneys and outside the presence of the defendant violated the Sixth Amendment. See also United States v. Ronder, 639 F.2d 931 (2d Cir. 1981); Krische v. Smith, 662 F.2d 177 (2d Cir. 1981).

United States v. Peters, 349 F.3d 842 (5th Cir. 2003)

During deliberations, the foreman sent out a note indicating that he was “not going to take insults and I ask to be relieved.” The parties agreed that the judge could talk to the juror in chambers alone. During the course of the meeting, however, the conversation between the court and the juror included a revelation about the current status of deliberations (11–1), the prospects of a mistrial (including a discussion akin to an Allen charge), and even a short explanation of the law, i.e., a substantive charge on the law.

United States v. Canady, 126 F.3d 352 (2d Cir. 1997)

A defendant’s right to be present at trial includes presence during a bench trial. It also includes a right to be present when the judge announces his decision. In this case, it was improper for the judge to conclude the trial and then mail his decision to counsel at a later date. The court’s announcement of the verdict should be performed in open court.

United States v. Rosales-Rodriguez, 289 F.3d 1106 (9th Cir. 2002)

The court was aware that one of the jurors would have to be excused on the second day of deliberations because of a scheduling conflict. In anticipation of the problem, the judge sent a note to the jury during the first day of deliberations explaining that if no verdict was reached by the end of the day, the deliberations would have to start over the next day with the alternate. Neither counsel, nor the defendant was aware that the court was sending this unsolicited note to the jury and neither was present when this occurred. This violated the defendant’s right to be present under Rule 43, Fed.R.Crim.P. and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments for all critical stages of the proceedings. Harmless error.

United States v. Torres-Palma, 290 F.3d 1244 (10th Cir. 2002)

The defendant’s right to be present in court is not satisfied by his presence via teleconferencing.

Cohen v. Senkowski, 290 F.3d 485 (2d Cir. 2002)

Though a defendant’s presence during the exercise of peremptory strikes is not constitutionally required, his presence at the pre-screening of jurors is constitutionally guaranteed. This applies to pre-screening sessions related to a juror’s substantive qualification, not to administrative matters, such as matters related to personal hardship.

Campbell v. Rice, 302 F.3d 892 (9th Cir. 2002)

Excluding the defendant from a hearing on his counsel’s potential conflict (the attorney was being prosecuted by the same DA’s office that was prosecuting the defendant) violated his Fourteenth Amendment right to Due Process. Reviewing the case en banc, the Ninth Circuit held that excluding the defendant from the proceeding was harmless error. 408 F.3d 1166.
United States v. Latham, 874 F.2d 852 (1st Cir. 1989)

The trial continued in the absence of the defendant after he attempted to commit suicide after the first day. This is erroneous. Unlike the case of flight to avoid trial altogether, the defendant’s attempt to commit suicide cannot be characterized as an attempt to postpone the proceedings. The mere fact that the defendant’s conduct was voluntary did not constitute a ground for proceeding in his absence.

United States v. Mackey, 915 F.2d 69 (2d Cir. 1990)

The voir dire, jury selection and the first prosecution witnesses testified prior to the defendant’s arrival at the courthouse. The defendant’s car had broken down but the trial judge concluded, “The animals do not run the zoo.” He also offered to permit the defendant to read the transcript prepared by the court reporter. The conviction was reversed.

United States v. Reiter, 897 F.2d 639 (2d Cir. 1990)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to the fourth superseding indictment and then fled. He was tried in absentia on the twelfth superseding indictment. The two indictments were insufficiently similar to justify a trial in absentia. Because of the lack of sufficient similarity, the court could not find that the defendant was aware of the nature of the proceedings against him. Absent the defendant’s appearance at arraignment, there can be no waiver of the constitutional right to be present, and the corresponding right under Rule 43.

United States v. Fontanez, 878 F.2d 33 (2d Cir. 1989)

The jury asked that certain testimony be read back to them and the judge delivered an Allen charge all in the absence of the defendant. This violates the defendant’s right to be present at all stages of the trial.

United States v. Rhodes, 32 F.3d 867 (4th Cir. 1994)

During deliberations, the jury asked about the definition of possession with intent, versus simple possession. The trial judge assembled the attorneys in chambers and discussed the proper response. The defendant was not present and his presence was not waived. This was error, though harmless.

United States v. Camacho, 955 F.2d 950 (4th Cir. 1992)

The trial judge commenced the defendant’s trial in the defendant’s absence. The defendant was delayed by bad weather. He arrived several hours after the beginning of trial – after jury selection and the first witness had been called. This was reversible error. The defendant’s failure to appear, in light of the weather problems, could not be deemed to be a waiver of his right to be present for the trial. Finally, defendant’s absence from the entire jury selection process cannot be deemed to be harmless error.

United States v. Alikpo, 944 F.2d 206 (5th Cir. 1991)

The trial court erred in conducting the bulk of the jury selection in the absence of the defendant. An express waiver by the defendant is necessary to waive the defendant’s presence at proceedings where counsel can assist the attorney, as opposed to hearings dealing solely with points of law.

United States v. Pressley, 100 F.3d 57 (7th Cir. 1996)

Rule 43(a) entitles a defendant to be present at all stages of his trial. This includes times when the judge communicates with the jury. Here, the judge communicated with a juror privately in chambers after the juror told a marshal she wanted to speak to the judge. The juror told the judge that she had previously served on a jury which had “hung” on racial lines, and this appeared to be happening again with this jury. The judge responded along the lines of “that kind of thing happens” and the juror returned. This was an improper communication outside the presence of the defendant, but the error was harmless.

United States v. Patterson, 23 F.3d 1239 (7th Cir. 1994)

While the jury was deliberating, a question was sent out. The judge instructed his secretary to call the two attorneys and solicit their proposed response. The defendant was not present and none of this was done in open court. This was improper. The defendant has a right to be present; the proceedings should be held in open court; and both attorneys should have been allowed to hear what the other attorney had to say to the judge (through the secretary). Harmless error.

United States v. Watkins, 983 F.2d 1413 (7th Cir. 1993)

The defendant resisted efforts while in the jail to be brought to trial on the first day. He was forcibly brought to court by the marshals. The defendant remained “limp” and had to be brought to court in a wheelchair. Without inquiring directly of the defendant whether he wished to waive his right to be present, the district court ordered that the defendant be removed. The court of appeals concluded that there was inadequate evidence in the record to support the lower court’s decision that the defendant waived his presence. The defendant was only present in the court for three minutes prior to his removal and the evidence of his conduct at the jail that morning was not adequately developed. Nor was the public interest served by a trial in absentia – a prerequisite even if the defendant did waive his presence.

Sturgis v. Goldsmith, 796 F.2d 1103 (9th Cir. 1986)

The trial court conducted a competency hearing without the defendant being present. This is reversible error.

Larson v. Tansy, 911 F.2d 392 (10th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was not present during the trial court’s instruction to the jury, the closing arguments and the rendering of the verdict. This violated his right to be present at all stages of the proceedings. The fact that the defendant’s attorney waived the defendant’s right to be present and the defendant said nothing when this occurred does not constitute an effective waiver. Mere acquiescence is not sufficient to waive a fundamental right. The defendant must himself waive the right to be present.

United States v. Songer, 842 F.2d 240 (10th Cir. 1988)

Although the defendant may be convicted of a criminal offense in absentia, a forfeiture proceeding cannot be held in the absence of the defendant. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure specifically provide for continuing a trial when a defendant intentionally absents himself, but no similar rule exists for forfeiture proceedings.

Cumbie v. Singletary, 991 F.2d 715 (11th Cir. 1993)

The trial court permitted the child molestation victim to testify via closed circuit television. The defendant was not in the room where the witness was testifying. This violated the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment and was grounds for habeas relief.
United States v. Gordon, 829 F.2d 119 (D.C.Cir. 1987)

Defense counsel waived the defendant’s right to be present during the entire jury selection process. Conviction reversed. Only a personal, on the record waiver by the defendant himself, constitutes valid waiver of his presence.
DEFENDANT’S RIGHT TO SELF-REPRESENTATION

SEE ALSO: Attorney – Client (Right to Counsel), for cases in which the Court holds that an inadequate Faretta hearing resulted in the denial of the right to counsel.

SEE ALSO: Attorney-Client: Right To Counsel (Waiver of Right – Faretta Issues)

A defendant who is mentally competent to go to trial is not, ipso facto, entitled to represent himself. A trial court may find that the defendant is competent to go to trial, but not mentally equipped to represent himself.

Tamplin v. Muniz, 894 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2018)

The defendant unequivocally expressed a desire to represent himself if the only option was to have a public defender appointed. This unequivocal request was denied when the court appointed a public defender. This violated the defendant’s Faretta right to represent himself.

A criminal defendant’s unsuccessful attempt to hire private counsel does not make equivocal his request to represent himself if the only alternative to self-representation is representation by a public defender.

Tatum v. Foster, 847 F.3d 459 (7th Cir. 2017)

The state trial court judge denied the defendant the right to represent himself because of his educational level, though he was found competent to stand trial. The Seventh Circuit granted a writ: even under the deferential AEDPA standard, the state courts’ decision was inconsistent with clearly established law. While Indiana v. Edwards authorizes the trial court to consider the defendant’s competence in deciding whether to accept a Faretta waiver, this does not authorize the court to consider the defendant’s scholastic achievements or trial skills.

United States v. Sanders, 843 F.3d 1050 (5th Cir. 2016)

The defendant unequivocally invoked his right to represent himself at sentencing and the trial court’s failure to allow him to do so required that the case be remanded to the trial court for a new sentencing hearing.

United States v. Smith, 830 F.3d 803 (8th Cir. 2016)

The trial court denied the defendant’s request to represent himself on the basis that he failed to comply with various pretrial procedures, he had a history of obstructionist conduct and had advanced improper arguments. The Eighth Circuit reversed: the defendant might be advancing arguments that would not carry the day, but he has the right to represent himself. His obstructionist conduct was not sufficient to deny him this right.

United States v. Hung Thien Ly, 646 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir. 2011)

The defendant represented himself at trial. The judge asked him if he wanted to testify. The defendant expressed concern that he would not a lawyer to ask him questions, and he would have to submit to cross-examination without having the opportunity to present his testimony.
The judge kept asking him, “Do you want to testify, or not?” without explaining that he would, in fact, have the opportunity to present his own sworn testimony. This was reversible error. Though a judge has no obligation to explain the law to a defendant who is representing himself, the judge is required to correct a misimpression as in this case.

United States v. Duncan, 643 F.3d 1242 (9th Cir. 2011)

In this federal death penalty trial, the defendant insisted on representing himself. The Ninth Circuit held that even over the defendant’s objection, standby counsel has the right to assert that the defendant was not competent to waive his right to counsel, or to waive his right to appeal.

Moore v. Haviland, 531 F.3d 393 (6th Cir. 2008)

Mid-trial, the defendant asked to be permitted to represent himself, because counsel wasn’t asking all the right questions. At a brief sidebar, the state judge said that request was not sufficiently clear and ignored it. The Sixth Circuit granted the writ, holding that the court should have conducted a full Faretta hearing. This was structural error that required granting a writ of habeas corpus.

United States v. Cano, 519 F.3d 512 (5th Cir. 2008)

A defendant has a constitutional right to represent himself at sentencing, even if he appeared with counsel at trial. Failing to conduct a hearing pursuant to Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975), to determine if the defendant should be permitted to represent himself on appeal was error, requiring a remand for re-sentencing after an adequate Faretta inquiry is conducted.

Frantz v. Hazey, 533 F.3d 724 (9th Cir. 2008)

The en banc Ninth Circuit discusses the role of stand-by counsel in a case in which a defendant exercises his Faretta right to represent himself. See McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984). The court concluded, tentatively, that an in-chambers conference about what to do about a jury note – a conference attended by stand-by counsel, but without the defendant – may have violated his right to represent himself. The decision is tentative because a remand was necessary to more fully develop the record about what actually occurred prior to the in-chambers conference.

United States v. Tucker, 451 F.3d 1176 (10th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from representing himself during voir dire. The defendant did not request a delay or a continuance when he requested that his attorney be discharged and that he be permitted to proceed pro se. Therefore, the trial court’s explanation for why his request to proceed pro se would be denied (i.e., the court held that further delay of trial was not proper) did not support the trial court’s decision. The fact that the trial court eventually relented and permitted the defendant to represent himself did cure the error in barring the defendant from representing himself during voir dire.

United States v. Virgil, 444 F.3d 447 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant has a right to counsel at the sentencing phase of his trial. In this case, the defendant fired his trial counsel and opted to proceed pro se, but the trial court conducted an inadequate Faretta inquiry. Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975). A Faretta violation at trial is not subject to harmless error analysis; nor is a Faretta violation at the sentencing phase subject to harmless error review.

Pazden v. Maurer, 424 F.3d 303 (3d Cir. 2005)

In a complicated white collar prosecution, counsel requested a continuance in order to prepare. This request was denied and the defendant then announced that he would represent himself, because the attorney could not be ready. The defendant did, in fact, proceed pro se and the Third Circuit held that this amounted to a violation of his sixth amendment right to counsel. The defendant’s waiver of his right to counsel was not the product of a free and meaningful choice.

United States v. Jones, 421 F.3d 359 (5th Cir. 2005)

The trial court failed to undertake the proper Faretta dialogue with the defendant. Allowing him to proceed pro se was error.

Hirschfield v. Payne, 420 F.3d 922 (9th Cir. 2005)

The state trial court erred in denying the defendant’s request to represent himself.

Jones v. Jamrog, 414 F.3d 585 (6th Cir. 2005)

The defendant asked to be permitted to represent himself, because certain discovery material was being furnished to his lawyer, but copies were not being furnished to him. The state had a policy that provided that certain discovery would only be provided to the defense attorney with the agreement that the material would remain in the attorney’s custody. The trial court concluded that the defendant’s request was not “voluntary” because it was predicated on his desire to obtain copies of the discovery, not an honest request to dispense with counsel. The Sixth Circuit concluded that the trial court’s decision violated Faretta.

United States v. Mack, 362 F.3d 597 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was permitted to represent himself, but was obstreperous, disobedient and otherwise impossible. The district court simply ordered him to keep quiet, barred him from calling witnesses or making a closing argument. His conviction could not be affirmed. Either counsel should have been appointed (and perhaps removing the defendant from the courtroom), or some other remedy should have been fashioned.

Van Lynn v. Farmon, 347 F.3d 735 (9th Cir. 2003)

The state trial court’s refusal to allow the defendant to represent herself because she lacked the ability to present her defense in “an informed, reasonable or intelligent manner” violated Faretta and required granting a writ of habeas corpus.

Williams v. Bartlett, 44 F.3d 95 (2d Cir. 1994)

A criminal defendant must make a timely and unequivocal request to proceed pro se in order to ensure the orderly administration of justice and prevent the disruption of both the pre-trial proceedings and a criminal trial. Assuming, however, that a defendant’s request to proceed pro se is informed, voluntary and unequivocal, the right of a defendant in a criminal case to act as his own lawyer is unqualified if invoked prior to the start of the trial. The trial court’s reasons for denying the request – the defendant’s lack of legal training, college education and skills or on-the-job training – furnish no basis to refuse a knowing, voluntary and unequivocal waiver of one’s right to counsel. The defendant’s conviction was set aside because of the denial of his constitutional right to self-representation.

Myers v. Johnson, 76 F.3d 1330 (5th Cir. 1996)

A defendant has a constitutional right to represent himself on appeal, at least to the extent of choosing what issues to raise and the preparation of the brief. A defendant does not have a constitutional right to argue his appeal in court, however.

Moore v. Calderon, 108 F.3d 261 (9th Cir. 1997)

A defendant’s request two weeks before trial for the right to represent himself was not untimely and the denial of that request provided grounds for granting habeas relief.

Peters v. Gunn, 33 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 1994)

The trial court denied the defendant the right to represent himself. A defendant has a Sixth Amendment right to represent himself. Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975). In order to invoke the right, the request must be knowing and intelligent, unequivocal, timely, and not for purposes of delay. The trial court’s reason for denying the defendant’s request in this case was a finding that, “It does not appear to me as if you have the capacity to represent yourself . . .” It was not clear what the judge meant by this. The defendant was apparently able to read and a defendant’s lack of legal qualifications cannot be a bar to a request to represent himself.

United States v. Baker, 84 F.3d 1263 (10th Cir. 1996)

The trial court denied the defendant his right to represent himself. In order for the defendant to invoke his right, he must clearly and unequivocally assert his intention to represent himself. Second, this assertion must be timely. Finally, there must be a showing that he knowingly and intelligently relinquishes the benefits of representation by counsel. The key question is whether the defendant is competent to waive his or her right to counsel, not whether the defendant possesses legal knowledge or is otherwise competent to represent him or herself. In this case, the defendant satisfied all three tests and the trial court’s reason for denying his request was a fear that the defendant did not have enough legal knowledge. This was an improper basis. The court noted that there is no harmless error analysis that can be undertaken in this context. Either the defendant was denied his right, or he was not.

United States v. McDermott, 64 F.3d 1448 (10th Cir. 1995)

When a defendant requests the right to represent himself and standby counsel is appointed to assist him, it is error to exclude the defendant from bench conferences where substantive issues are addressed.

United States v. McKinley, 58 F.3d 1475 (10th Cir. 1995)

With unmistakeable clarity, the defendant requested an opportunity to represent himself. In assessing the defendant’s competence to represent himself, the court should only be concerned with the defendant’s competence to waive his right to counsel, not his competence to represent himself. Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993). That is, the defendant’s legal prowess is not a factor in gauging his right to self-representation.
DEFENDANT’S RIGHT TO TESTIFY

_Casiano-Jimenez v. United States_, 817 F.3d 816 (1st Cir. 2016)

Trial counsel failed to advise his client of his right to testify and that the decision was his to make. Instead, a group of lawyers assembled a group of the defendants and said that the strategy would be for no defendant to testify. This amounted to ineffective assistance of counsel.

_United States v. Gillenwater_, 717 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was represented by counsel at a competency hearing. The attorney refused to call him to the stand and the defendant complained – disruptively – and was removed from the courtroom. The Ninth Circuit holds that a defendant has a constitutional right to testify at his competency hearing, even over the advice of counsel. (The dialogue at the hearing was essentially as follows: “Counsel: I have advised him not to testify.” Defendant: “That’s because you’re a criminal.” Court: “Mr. Gillenwater, that’s enough.” Defendant: “Then get me the fuck out of here.”)

_United States v. Hung Thien Ly_, 646 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir. 2011)

The defendant represented himself at trial. The judge asked him if he wanted to testify. The defendant expressed concern that he would not a lawyer to ask him questions, and he would have to submit to cross-examination without having the opportunity to present his testimony. The judge kept asking him, “Do you want to testify, or not?” without explaining that he would, in fact, have the opportunity to present his own sworn testimony. This was reversible error. Though a judge has no obligation to explain the law to a defendant who is representing himself, the judge is required to correct a misimpression as in this case.

_Canaan v. McBride_, 395 F.3d 376 (7th Cir. 2005)

Failing to advise a defendant in a death penalty case that he may testify during the penalty phase – even if he did not testify in the guilt-innocence phase, is ineffective assistance of counsel.

_United States v. Mullins_, 315 F.3d 449 (5th Cir. 2002)

Defense counsel prevented the defendant from testifying in his firearms trial. Counsel’s decision was based on the desire to keep out impeaching information, such as the defendant’s prior drug dealing and bad check charges. The Fifth Circuit concludes that barring the defendant from testifying is deficient performance under _Strickland v. Washington_, though there was no prejudice in this case. Counsel is obligated to advise the defendant of the strategy decisions being made, but with regard to whether the defendant should testify, the defendant makes the ultimate decision and that decision may not be vetoed by counsel.

_United States v. Midgett_, 342 F.3d 321 (4th Cir. 2003)

The defendant told his attorney that he was asleep in the backseat of the car when two other people committed the crime. There was no other evidence to support this version of events. The attorney asked to withdraw from the case, claiming an ethical issue and when the court denied the motion to withdraw, refused to call the defendant to the stand. The judge gave the defendant the choice to either proceed \textit{pro se} or acquiesce to the attorney’s decision that the defendant would not testify. This was improper. There was insufficient evidence to establish the defendant’s intent to commit perjury.

\textit{United States v. Vargas}, 920 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1990)

Though deciding the case on other grounds, the appellate court addressed the question of how a defendant should raise a claim that his attorney refused to call him to testify at trial. Without deciding the question, the court concludes that the defendant’s failure to complain at trial does not amount to a waiver of this claim that he was denied the constitutional right to testify.

\textit{United States v. Pennycooke}, 65 F.3d 9 (3rd Cir. 1995)

It is not appropriate for the trial judge to question the defendant about his decision whether to testify, or not. Instructing the defendant that he has the right to testify could influence the defendant to waive his Fifth Amendment right not to testify. Therefore, only in an unusual case, where there appears to be discord between the defendant and his attorney should the trial court address the issue – but even then, only discreetly.

\textit{Nichols v. Butler}, 953 F.2d 1550 (11th Cir. 1992)

The defendant’s attorney insisted that the defendant not testify in his own defense. The attorney threatened to withdraw if the client did testify. This violated the defendant’s right to testify and required a new trial. The right to testify at trial cannot be forfeited by counsel, but only by a knowing, voluntary, and intelligent waiver by the defendant himself. The right to testify in his own defense is a fundamental right. \textit{Rock v. Arkansas}, 483 U.S. 44 (1987). After rehearing \textit{en banc}, the decision was affirmed.

\textit{United States v. Teague}, 953 F.2d 1525 (11th Cir. 1992)

A defendant has the fundamental right to testify in his own defense. This may only be waived personally, not solely through counsel. Thus, if the attorney vetoes the defendant’s decision to testify, the defendant may challenge his conviction. After rehearing the case \textit{en banc}, the Eleventh Circuit re-affirmed the principle that the defendant has a fundamental right to testify and the right may not be unilaterally waived by his attorney. However, the facts in this case did not show that the defendant’s will was overborne. Rather, the attorney urged the defendant not to testify and the defendant agreed. Consequently, there was no ineffective assistance of counsel.
DEPOSITIONS

United States v. Farfan-Carreon, 935 F.2d 678 (5th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was caught smuggling drugs into the country. He claimed that he was set up by a Mexican who asked him to drive the truck across the border. On the morning of trial, the defendant moved to take the deposition of the Mexican, in Mexico. The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s motion to take the deposition pursuant to Rule 15(a).

United States v. Guadian-Salazar, 824 F.2d 344 (5th Cir. 1987)

The government introduced two videotaped depositions of government witnesses in this prosecution for illegal transportation of aliens. The court holds that this violated the defendant’s right of confrontation. Immediately following the signing of the depositions by the witnesses, the witnesses were released from Mexico and were present in the country at the time of trial.

United States v. Wang, 964 F.2d 811 (8th Cir. 1992)

When arrested, the defendant was charged with conspiracy to harbor illegal aliens. Prior to deporting the aliens, their depositions were taken with defendant and her counsel present. The defendant was later indicted on charges of harboring the aliens – but not with conspiracy. Using this deposition at trial was improper and the trial court properly granted a new trial. Taking a deposition while one charge is pending and using it during a trial on other charges violates the defendant’s right to confrontation.

United States v. Miguel, 111 F.3d 666 (9th Cir. 1997)

During a deposition taken pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §3509 (a deposition of an alleged child molestation victim), the arrangement provided for the defendant to speak with his attorney only during breaks. The statute provides that arrangements must be made for “contemporaneous communication” between the accused and his counsel. The procedure in this case violated the terms of the statute. Harmless error.

Guam v. Ngirangas, 806 F.2d 895 (9th Cir. 1986)

The Ninth Circuit holds that the trial court has discretion under Rule 15(a) to permit the taking of the deposition of a fugitive. The Court rules that although a fugitive may not invoke the protection of the criminal justice system, a defendant should not be deprived of evidence simply by virtue of the fact that a witness is a fugitive.

United States v. Ramos, 45 F.3d 1519 (11th Cir. 1995)

The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s motion to take a deposition in Colombia. The trial court’s conclusion that the deposition would be dangerous for the prosecutor to attend was not a sufficient basis to deny the defendant’s request. The three factors which the court should consider in determining whether to grant a Rule 15 motion to take a deposition are, (1) whether the witness will be unavailable to testify at trial; (2) whether injustice will result because testimony material to the movant’s case will be absent; (3) whether there are countervailing factors which render taking the deposition unjust to the nonmoving party. The witness, who had been deported prior to trial, was clearly unavailable. Though the court could not determine what the materiality of the witness’s testimony was, because the government conceded this prong, it was assumed that the witness’s testimony was material. None of the countervailing factors cited by the government were sufficient to deny the motion to take the deposition, including the fact that the witness would not face exposure to a perjury prosecution if he lied under oath; the danger to the prosecutor of traveling to Colombia; the time constraints for taking the deposition; and the lack of proof that the testimony would be relevant or admissible.
DESTRUCTION OF EVIDENCE

United States v. Zaragoza-Moreira, 780 F.3d 971 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with smuggling drugs across the border. She explained to the Border agent who arrested her that she acted under duress and that she was standing on line with the person who was coercing her and did everything she could to attract the attention of the guards. The Border agent then allowed the videotape of the people in line to be destroyed. This was more than simply negligence or recklessness. The destruction of the tape occurred after defense counsel wrote to the prosecutor to request that the tape be preserved. The acted in bad faith and violated the defendant rights to due process.

United States v. Plavcak, 411 F.3d 655 (6th Cir. 2005)

It is a federal crime to destroy evidence that is subject to seizure. 18 U.S.C. § 2232. In order to prosecute a person for committing the offense, the government must prove that there was either a valid warrant authorizing the seizure of the evidence, or an applicable warrant exception that would have resulted in the seizure of the evidence.

United States v. Barton, 995 F.2d 931 (9th Cir. 1993)

The government’s destruction of evidence prior to an evidentiary hearing on a motion to suppress (alleging a Franks v. Delaware violation) must be analyzed under the principles of Brady and Arizona v. Youngblood to determine if the defendant’s right to due process has been violated. Thus, if the evidence was exculpatory – in the sense of supporting the Franks violation – and the government acted in bad faith in destroying the evidence, a due process violation might be found.

United States v. Cooper, 983 F.2d 928 (9th Cir. 1993)

The DEA busted a home laboratory, believing that methamphetamine was being produced. Immediately after the equipment was seized, the defendant contacted the DEA and explained that it was not Meth, but an AIDS cure which the defendants were manufacturing. The DEA said the equipment was being kept for evidence, but the agents actually knew that the equipment was being destroyed. An expert for the defense testified that if the lab were configured as described by the defense, then methamphetamine could not have been the product. Because of the exculpatory nature of the destroyed evidence, as well as the bad faith conduct of the government, the only appropriate remedy was the dismissal of the indictment.

United States v. Bohl, 25 F.3d 904 (10th Cir. 1994)

Despite the defendants’ repeated efforts to obtain access to critical evidence in this case, the government destroyed the evidence. The prosecution was barred by the due process clause. In California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984), the Court held that the government violates a defendant’s right to due process when it destroys evidence whose exculpatory significance is “apparent before” destruction and the defendant remains unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means. In Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988), the Court extended Trombetta to provide that, if the exculpatory value of the evidence is indeterminate and all that can be confirmed is that the evidence was “potentially useful” for the defense, then a defendant must show that the government acted in bad faith in destroying the evidence. This case fits the Youngblood mold, because the evidence was not obviously exculpatory; however the defense has shown that the government acted in bad faith in destroying the evidence. The defendants were charged with making defective radio towers in conjunction with an FAA contract. The FAA destroyed all the towers prior to trial, despite numerous requests by the defendants and their attorneys to examine the material to perform independent tests.

The state officials’ destruction of the marijuana in this case barred a federal prosecution of the defendants for possessing the marijuana. This case is not controlled by Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988), which held that a defendant who complains of the loss of “potentially useful” evidence must demonstrate that the police displayed “bad faith.” See also California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984). Here, the evidence was not just “potentially useful,” it was the evidence which the government relied on in its case-in-chief. The evidence was critical to the state’s case, not just “potentially useful.”
DETAINERS

United States v. Kelley, 402 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2005)

The Interstate on Detainers (IAD), § 2, Art. III(d) requires that a person who is brought to a jurisdiction pursuant to a detainer must have his case resolved prior to being sent back to the jurisdiction from which he was brought. In this case, the government violated the anti-shuttling provision. The proper remedy was a dismissal without prejudice of the federal charge.
DISCOVERY

United States v. Abdallah, 911 F.3d 201 (4th Cir. 2018)

The trial court erred in refusing to review agents’ notes and communications given the inconsistency in their versions of what occurred when the defendant was interrogated. If a defendant makes a plausible showing that exculpatory evidence exists in the government’s file, including agents’ rough notes, the court should review the information that is identified by the defendant as potentially including exculpatory information.

United States v. Sellers, 906 F.3d 848 (9th Cir. 2018)

The Ninth Circuit concludes that the strict standard for authorizing discovery in a selective prosecution claim (i.e., the Armstrong standard), does not apply in a selective enforcement, reverse-sting case. The Ninth Circuit joined the Seventh and Third Circuits in this holding: United States v. Davis, 793 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2015); United States v. Washington, 869 F.3d 193 (3rd Cir. 2018).

United States v. Soto-Zuniga, 837 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2016)

The trial court erred in denying the defendant’s discovery request that sought information about the immigration checkpoint where the defendant was stopped and arrested. The defendant claimed that the immigration checkpoint was used to engage in drug interdiction, rather than legitimate immigration investigation.

United States v. Liew, 856 F.3d 585 (9th Cir. 2017)

Though generally, agent’s rough notes of interviews are not required to be disclosed to the defense, in this case, there was reason to believe that the 302’s did not accurately recite all that was said by the witness, who had died prior to trial. The witness’s lawyer revealed that his client, during the interviews, said exculpatory things about the defendants that were not included in the 302’s.

United States v. Mackin, 793 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2015)

Prior to trial, the government produced an incomplete chain of custody document. This apparently led the defendant to believe that he could base his defense on the flawed chain of custody. Mid-trial, the government produced the complete document that showed the complete chain of custody. The Seventh Circuit held that the trial court should have granted a mistrial. Whether the chain of custody document was subject to Rule 16 or not, because the government produced the misleading document prior to trial, it had a duty to furnish the correct document prior to the middle of trial.

United States v. Gray-Burriss, 791 F.3d 50 (D.C. Cir. 2015)

The defendant failed to comply with Rule 16 and at trial produced an exculpatory document that arguably refuted a component of the government’s mail fraud case. The trial court prohibited the defense from introducing the document because of the discovery violation. The D.C. Circuit, held that this sanction was inappropriate, given the absence of a finding of bad faith or any prejudice to the government. But the error was harmless in the guilt-innocence phase. A remand to determine whether the document would affect the sentencing calculation was required.

United States v. Sims, 776 F.3d 583 (8th Cir. 2015)

The government’s late disclosure of a DNA expert report justified the district court’s decision to exclude the evidence. While the district court could have granted a continuance, the court acted within its discretionary authority to exclude the evidence in light of the government’s reckless disregard of its discovery obligations.

United States v. Thomas, 726 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2013)

When the government relies on a drug dog alert in support of a search, the defendant has the right to request discovery about the dog’s training. The Ninth Circuit has held that the government is obligated to disclose the handler’s log, as well as training records and score sheets, certification records, and training standards and manuals pertaining to the dog. In this case, the records provided to the defense were so heavily redacted that the discovery was insufficient. A remand was required to determine what information was redacted.

United States v. Hernandez-Meza, 720 F.3d 760 (9th Cir. 2013)

The trial court erred in this case in permitting the government to re-open the evidence and introduce evidence that was not previously produced to the defense as required by Rule 16. The government protested that the defendant’s defense was unexpected (it was revealed when the defendant submitted his proposed requests to charge) and that the additional evidence was needed to refute the newly-revealed theory of defense. The Ninth Circuit held that allowing the government to re-open the evidence was reversible error. The fact that the new defense was factually not realistic is not relevant, the defense had the right to raise this defense and to point out the gaps in the government’s proof. Judge Kozinski wrote,

“[A] criminal defendant, unlike the government, needn't have a good faith belief in the factual validity of a defense. So long as the defendant doesn't perjure himself or present evidence he knows to be false—and Hernandez–Meza presented no evidence at all—he's entitled to exploit weaknesses in the prosecution's case, even though he may believe himself to be guilty. What matters in satisfying the government's burden of proof in a criminal case is not objective reality nor defendant's personal belief, but the evidence the government presents in court. No competent prosecutor would be surprised, based on what he thinks defendant should know, to find defense counsel poking holes in the government's case. The argument is without merit, yet the government made it before the district court, and again on appeal.

The government’s failure to produce the evidence in its Rule 16 production was not justified. The Rule requires the production of all documents “material to the preparation of the defense.” Information is material even if it simply causes a defendant to completely abandon a planned defense and take an entirely different path. If the defendant in this case knew that government had this evidence, the defendant may not have relied on this defense. Moreover, a defendant need not spell out his theory of the case in order to obtain discovery. Nor is the government entitled to know in advance specifically what the defense is going to be. Discovery must still be provided pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(E)(i). The Ninth Circuit held that the trial judge’s summary rejection of the defendant’s Rule 16 argument, as well as his unsupported decision to allow the government to re-open the evidence, required that the case be remanded and that a new judge preside over the case.

United States v. Muniz-Jaquez, 718 F.3d 1180 (9th Cir. 2013)

In this illegal reentry case, a relevant fact was whether the border patrol agent had the defendant under surveillance as he was crossing the border. During trial, it was learned that the patrol agent had called for back-up over his service radio and this call was tape recorded. The Ninth Circuit holds that under Rule 16, this tape should have been produced. Even if the information on the tape was not exculpatory, it was certainly relevant to the defense. “A defendant who knows that the government has evidence that renders his planned defense useless can alter his trial strategy. Or he can seek a plea agreement instead of going to trial.” The standard is not simply whether the information constitutes Brady or Jencks.

United States v. Budziak, 697 F.3d 1105 (9th Cir. 2012)

The trial court erred in refusing to require the government to make available to the defense discovery relating to the government’s forensic program that was used to develop the evidence of child pornography possession and distribution that was presented at trial. Discovery relating to the software should have been granted, because it could have resulted in the discovery of material evidence relevant to his defense or to the merits of the government’s case. A remand was required to determine if the defendant suffered prejudice.

United States v. Jarman, 687 F.3d 269 (5th Cir. 2012)

18 U.S.C. § 3509(m) provides that in a child pornography case, the pornography shall remain in the custody of the government or the court. In order for the defense to view the evidence pursuant to Rule 16, the law further provides, “property or material shall be deemed to be reasonably available to the defendant if the government provides ample opportunity for inspection, viewing and examination at a government facility by the defendant, his or her attorney, and any individual the defendant may seek to qualify to furnish expert testimony at trial.” § 3509(m)(2)(B). The district court in this case concluded that the defense expert was not given ample opportunity to forensically examine the material because of time limitations placed on the expert’s examination. The Fifth Circuit affirmed.

United States v. Liburd, 607 F.3d 339 (3rd Cir. 2010)

The defendant was arrested attempting to smuggle cocaine form the Virgin Islands into the United States. When he went through the TSA checkpoint in the Virgin Islands, two blocks were seen in the Xray scanner and when questioned about the items, he said that they were blocks of cheese. Later, another TSA agent found that the blocks were cocaine. At trial, the defendant claimed that someone must have placed the items in his bag. The government never revealed in discovery that the defendant had made the “cheese statement” and prior to trial told the court unequivocally that no statement of the defendant would be introduced at trial. Repeatedly during trial, however (including opening statement), the prosecutor referred to the cheese statement. This was misconduct and that necessitated granting a new trial.

United States v. Stever, 603 F.3d 747 (9th Cir. 2010)
The defendant was charged with growing marijuana on his property. He defended on the basis that Mexican drug organizations must have planted the marijuana on his property. He made a Rule 16 request for any information in the possession of the government about the practice of Mexican drug organizations planting marijuana on private property in this district. The government refused to provide the information. The Ninth Circuit held that the lower court’s failure to direct the government to produce this information was reversible error. The error was compounded by the lower court’s order directing both parties not to mention anything about Mexican drug organizations, because any such evidence was speculative. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant is entitled to present evidence of an alternative perpetrator and the lower court may not bar the defendant from presenting his defense.

United States v. Lee, 573 F.3d 155 (3rd Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute cocaine base. One central question in the case was how long he resided at a particular hotel (where the drugs were found). He claimed that he was there for just one day. The drugs were found in the hotel room several days later. A hotel registration card was obtained by the government and was copied and furnished to the defendant in discovery. It showed that he resided in the room for one day. The original registration card was introduced in evidence. The jury, during deliberations asked what the meaning of the back of the card meant (it indicated that the defendant extended his stay at the hotel for several days). The back of the card had not been copied or furnished to the defendant prior to trial. The government did not know that the back of the card contained incriminating evidence. The trial court instructed the jury not to consider the information on the back of the card. The Third Circuit reversed the conviction. Because the length of the defendant’s stay at the hotel was the critical question in this case and the critical document was not furnished to the defendant prior to trial – even though it was not withheld intentionally – a new trial was required. The fact that the card was accessible to the defense prior to trial did not defeat his claim that there was a Rule 16 violation. Moreover, the defendant’s failure to examine the card before it was introduced in evidence did not defeat his claim. Finally, the trial judge’s instruction to the jury was insufficient to avoid prejudice.

United States v. Thompson (The Williams Companies Inc.), 562 F.3d 387 (D.C. Cir. 2009)

The corporation was under investigation by DOJ for price manipulation in the natural gas market and wire fraud. The corporation retained an outside law firm to conduct an internal investigation. Eventually, the results of the investigation were furnished to the government with a cover letter that provided that it was confidential and should not be disclosed to any other party or entity. The corporation was given a deferred prosecution agreement. An individual in the corporation was indicted. He sought the results of the internal investigation under Rule 16 and Brady. The D.C. Circuit held that the trial court was required to review the material and furnish any information to the defendant that would qualify as discoverable under Rule 16 or Brady. The corporation’s desire to maintain the confidentiality of the internal investigation did not trump the defendant’s due process and Rule 16 rights.

United States v. W.R. Grace, 526 F.3d 499 (9th Cir. 2008)

The en banc Ninth Circuit held that the district court is authorized to direct the government to provide a witness list to the defense and to enter an order that the government may not call any witness not on the list. The court also approved the district court’s order requiring the government to identify its evidentiary documents prior to trial. Nothing in Rule 16 prohibits this kind of order and Rule 2 implicitly authorizes the exercise of the court’s discretion in this regard.

United States v. Nacchio, 555 F.3d 1234 (10th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was charged with insider trading. He filed notice pursuant to Rule 16 of his intent to introduce expert testimony from an economist who would offer testimony about trading patterns of the defendant and the economic consequences of the defendant’s trades. The trial court held that the notice was deficient (because the notice did not specifically detail the expert’s “methodology”) and even if the notice was sufficient, the subject matter was not the proper subject of expert testimony. The Tenth Circuit initially reversed on both grounds. With regard to the notice issue, the Tenth Circuit held that the defendant is required to provide notice of the subject matter of the expert’s testimony, as well as the bases and reasons of that opinion; but the notice is not required to include the “methodology.” Nor is the report required, on its face, to set forth a prima facie basis for complying with Daubert. A Daubert inquiry may or may not be necessary, but the defendant is not required to spell out his Daubert presentation in the Rule 16 notice. Thus, the failure to provide a detailed explanation of the expert’s methodology was not a basis for excluding the testimony. When the case was reviewed en banc, the Tenth Circuit did not question this aspect of the panel opinion. The en banc Court, however, held that the district court did not, ultimately, reject the defendant’s expert on the basis of a notice deficiency, but rather, excluded the expert after concluding that the defendant failed to satisfy the Daubert standard of admissibility. Thus, the conviction was affirmed.

Ferensic v. Birkett, 501 F.3d 469 (6th Cir. 2007)

Defense counsel was directed to furnish his expert witness reports to the state two months prior to trial, but waited until eleven days before trial to submit the report. The state trial court excluded the evidence. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the district court’s granting of a writ of habeas corpus. The exclusion of the evidence in this case operated to deny the defendant the Constitutional right to present a defense. See generally Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988). Less severe sanctions were available to remedy the defense attorney’s error that would have protected the defendant’s rights. This is especially so, because there was an inadequate showing that the state was prejudiced by the tardy disclosure.

United States v. White, 492 F.3d 380 (6th Cir. 2007)

Testimony offered by employees of Medicare fiscal intermediaries about the mechanics of Medicare reimbursement, as well as defining “related-party transactions” and “reasonable costs” qualified as “expert testimony.” The government did not qualify these witnesses as experts and failed to provide the required Rule 16 discovery regarding their testimony. Harmless error.

United States v. Medearis, 380 F.3d 1049 (8th Cir. 2004)

The defendant sought to cross-examine the government’s key witness with a letter written by the witness. The government objected that the letter had not been provided to the government in reciprocal discovery. The court erred in sustaining the government’s objection. Documents used by the defendant need not be provided under the rules of discovery if they are used to impeach a government witness. Reciprocal discovery is only required if the document is to be used by the defendant in his case in chief. Harmless error.

United States v. Cedano-Arellano, 332 F.3d 568 (9th Cir. 2003)

The government is obligated to provide all records relating to a drug-detecting dog’s training and certification. The court held that the records should have been produced under both Rule 16(a)(1)(E) and Rule 16(a)(1)(F).

Rule 16(a)(1)(C) requires the government to produce evidence it intends to use in its case-in-chief, as well as evidence that is "material to the preparation of the defendant's defense." This latter requirement is not limited to Brady or favorable evidence. In this case, the defendant claimed that he was not the person who returned a page to an informant. He announced that he was calling as a witness the person from whose phone the return call was made. The government had in its possession records from the jail showing that the witness had visited the defendant in jail (thus suggesting that she knew the defendant and that the defendant was at her house when the return phone call was made). The government did not turn these records over to the defense, however, on the theory that they were not helpful to the defense. The D.C. Circuit disagreed. Evidence that is material to the preparation of the defense need not be "helpful" or exculpatory; it can also reveal pitfalls in the defense. The trial court did not err, however, in failing to invoke the exclusionary rule.

United States v. Alvarez, 987 F.2d 77 (1st Cir. 1993)

The trial court committed reversible error by failing to suppress a statement of the defendant made to a customs officer which had never been produced pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(A). The statement amounted to the most incriminating evidence against the defendant and sabotaged the defense and prevented the defense from designing an intelligent defense strategy.

United States v. Formanczyk, 949 F.2d 526 (1st Cir. 1991)

The government initially disclosed to the defense that the informant had left the country. Later, the government learned that the informant had returned, but no disclosure of this was made to the defendant. The government was under a continuing duty to disclose this information, especially in circumstances where a prior discovery response is rendered misleading or wrong by new developments. Harmless error.

United States v. Molina-Guevara, 96 F.3d 698 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The agent’s rough notes of an interview of the defendant (during which the defendant supposedly made incriminating statements) should have been produced pursuant to Rule 16.

United States v. Butler, 988 F.2d 537 (5th Cir. 1993)

Upon request of the defendant, the government must permit an independent analysis of physical evidence, including, as in this case, cocaine. Fed.R.Crim.P. 16(a)(1)(C). The trial court erred in denying the request in this case. A remand was necessary to permit the test and determine if an issue of fact is raised by this test.

538
United States v. Santiago, 46 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 1995)

Information is “within the possession, custody or control of the government” under Rule 16(a)(1)(C) not just if it is in the possession of the prosecuting attorney. Here, the prosecutor should have produced Bureau of Prison files relating to the prosecution.

United States v. Bryan, 868 F.2d 1032 (9th Cir. 1989)

Under Rule 16(a)(1)(C) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the government must produce documents which are outside the district which the prosecutor has knowledge of and access to. The government’s obligation to produce documents which are “in the possession of the government” which are material or intended to be used by the government in its case-in-chief or which were obtained from the defendant, includes documents wherever they are located if they are accessible to and known to the government.

United States v. Cargo-Vergara, 57 F.3d 993 (11th Cir. 1995)

Prior to trial, the government provided the defendant’s in-custody statement to the defense. The agent said that the defendant, when shown the cocaine, claimed to have said “No, I don’t want any, but [he] admitted touching it.” At trial, the agent said that the defendant said, “I touched it and the kilos were strange.” The statement about the cocaine being strange had not been revealed to the defense prior to trial. This was a discovery violation which required reversal of the conviction. The fact that the discovery violation was inadvertent does not render it harmless; the defendant was still prejudiced at trial. The defense attorney, in his opening statement, for example, stressed that the defendant simply denied wanting to have anything to do with the cocaine and that he had no prior experience with cocaine. If, as the agent testified, the defendant said that the cocaine was “strange,” this would indicate that he had some prior contact with cocaine.

In re United States, 918 F.2d 138 (11th Cir. 1990)

Under Rule 16, a corporate defendant is entitled to the same discovery as an individual defendant regarding statements of the “defendant.” With regard to a corporation, this requires that the government produce the statements of employees of the corporation to the government which the government intends to introduce at trial, where the declarant (1) was at the time the statement was made so situated as an officer or employee as to have been able to legally bind the defendant in respect to the conduct constituting the offense, or (2) was, at the time of the offense, personally involved in the alleged conduct constituting the offense and so situated as an officer or employee as to have been able legally to bind the defendant in respect to the conduct in which he was involved.

United States v. Lloyd, 992 F.2d 348 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

The defendant was charged with aiding and abetting various individuals in filing false tax returns. Pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(C), he requested copies of those individuals’ prior tax returns. The trial court erroneously denied the request. Under that Rule, the defendant is entitled to review documents in the possession of the government which are material to the defense. Establishing materiality under this Rule is not a heavy burden. In this case, if the prior years’ returns contained the same false information, this would buttress the defendant’s claim that the falsity originated with the taxpayers, not him. The court also noted 26 U.S.C. §6103(h)(4)(D), which cautions courts against disclosing tax returns. The court concludes that this statement of Congressional policy merely raises the level of materiality, but this higher standard was also met. in this case. Also, certain portions of the tax returns could be redacted to protect the privacy of the taxpayer.

United States v. Noe, 821 F.2d 604 (11th Cir. 1987)

The government had a tape recorded conversation of the defendant and an undercover agent which was used by the government to impeach the defendant’s alibi defense. The government had failed to disclose the existence of this tape-recorded conversation in violation of Rule 16. The Eleventh Circuit holds that this is reversible error. Had the existence of this tape recording been known, the defendant may not have taken the stand and avoided the impeachment.

United States v. Rodriguez, 799 F.2d 649 (11th Cir. 1986)

The government seized a wallet from the defendant at the time of his arrest. The defense asked if there was any discovery which should be provided to him, and the case agent denied the existence of any discovery. The Eleventh Circuit holds that this is reversible error, because of the government’s use of documents found in the wallet during cross-examination of the defendant.

The government would be required to turn over to the defense draft transcripts of monitored telephone calls. Because of the poor quality of the tapes, the different versions of the transcript might aid in determining what transcript is correct.

The defendants were entitled to obtain technical data and related information regarding the exportability of certain items. They were charged with conspiring to violate the Arms Export Control Act.

The defense was provided with a room full of discovery and attempted to make certain copies of key documents with the aid of the private contractor who was maintaining the discovery for the government. Unbeknownst to the defense, whatever they wanted copied, an extra copy was made for the prosecutor. This was improper and intruded on the attorney work product and violated the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The remedy, among other things, was the disqualification of the prosecutor who was made privy to what the defense considered important, and a mandatory disclosure to the defense of all witness statements and summaries of testimony of prospective witness. The appellate court agreed with this assessment, but reversed the lower court’s award of attorney’s fees and costs. 29 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1994).

In order to find a corporation criminally liable for the illegal acts of one of its officers or agents, it is essential that the illegal conduct be related to and done within the course of employment and have some connection with the furtherance of the business of the corporation. It is essential that the officer or agent intended, at least in part, to benefit the corporation through her illegal conduct. Though proof of actual benefit is not essential to establish the corporation’s guilt, proof of actual benefit or the lack thereof, has significant evidentiary value and thus may amount to Brady and is discoverable under the rules of discovery. Under Rule 16(a)(1)(C), evidence that is “material to the preparation of the defendant’s defense” has been broadly construed to allow discovery of documents for which there is a strong indication that they will play an important role in uncovering admissible evidence, aiding witness preparation, corroborating testimony, or assisting impeachment and rebuttal. The documents relating to the benefit to the corporation are discoverable under this standard. Also, documents which belong to the defendant but which are under the control of the government are discoverable.

In a case involving voluminous documentary evidence, the government should be required to at least point out the haystacks in which the needles might be found. Thus, the government should identify portions of material which will not be used.

A local rule obligated both the defense and the government to provide discovery to one another. This contravened Rule 16, which conditions the defendant’s obligation to provide discovery upon his request that the government provide discovery. Rule 57, which authorizes the promulgation of local rules, does not permit the creation of rules which are inconsistent with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

The defendants were entitled to a sample of the narcotics they were prosecuted for intending to distribute. If the government seeks to introduce such evidence in support of the prosecution, the defense has a right to test a sample.
DOUBLE JEOPARDY

(Collateral Estoppel)

The collateral estoppel component of the double jeopardy clause does not prohibit the use of a prior acquittal as 404(b) evidence in a subsequent trial.

Yeager v. United States, 129 S. Ct. 2360 (2009)

The Court re-affirms the principle announced in Ashe v. Swenson: if a jury acquits a defendant on certain charges, additional charges may not then be brought that would require, as proof, an element necessarily decided in favor of the defendant in the first trial. This is true even if the “additional charges” were separate counts in the first trial that resulted in a hung jury. Thus, as in this case, if the defendant is acquitted of certain fraud counts and failed to reach a verdict on insider trading counts, the government would be barred from retrying the defendant on the insider trading counts if the court determines that the basis of the fraud acquittal necessarily included a finding that an element of the insider trading count was not proven. On remand to the Fifth Circuit, the court held that applying the Supreme Court’s standard, a subsequent prosecution of Yeager would be barred by the collateral estoppels doctrine. United States v. Yeager, 5th Cir. 2009).

If a jury returns inconsistent verdicts on two counts (guilty on a substantive charge, but not guilty of the conspiracy charge involving the same offense), and the conviction is later reversed on some procedural ground, the defendant may not raise collateral estoppel on the basis of the acquittal on the conspiracy offense. The inconsistent verdicts precludes a determination that the jury in fact made a finding that the defendant did not commit the offense, or some element of the offense.

Wilkinson v. Gingrich, 806 F.3d 511 (9th Cir. 2015)

At his speeding trial, the defendant claimed that he was not the driver of the car. That was the only defense and he was found not guilty. Later he was prosecuted for perjury on the basis that he was, in fact, the driver of the car. The collateral estoppel prong of double jeopardy barred this prosecution.

United States v. Fernandez, 722 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2013)

The jury’s acquittal of the defendant on a charge of conspiring to violate § 666, the collateral estoppel doctrine foreclosed prosecuting the defendant for conspire to travel for the purpose of violating §666 and thus a conspiracy to violate the Travel Act could not be pursued.
United States v. Coughlin, 610 F.3d 89 (D.C.Cir. 2010)

Defendant’s acquittal on certain mail fraud counts (and a hung jury on several additional mail fraud counts) precluded, pursuant to the collateral estoppel doctrine, a retrial on the mail fraud counts that were part of the same scheme. The only logical explanation for the acquittals was a finding by the jury that there was no scheme to defraud. Given that finding, a retrial on the remaining mail fraud counts could not proceed.

United States v. Ohayon, 483 F.3d 1281 (11th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with attempted possession of ecstasy and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute the ecstasy. The defendant was enlisted by a drug dealer to transport a duffle bag from a courier to a drug dealer. The defendant claimed at trial that though he retrieved the duffle bag, he did not know the contents. The jury acquitted him of attempted possession of the drugs, but deadlocked on the conspiracy charge. In a lengthy decision that canvassed the law on the topic of collateral estoppel, the court concluded that a re-prosecution for the conspiracy charge was barred by the double jeopardy clause. The only rational explanation for the jury’s decision on the attempt charge was that the government failed to prove that the defendant knew the contents of the duffle bag. Given the unanimous decision on that “fact,” a subsequent jury could not find the defendant guilty of the conspiracy count. The court discounted the government’s argument that there are no legal elements common to the attempt and conspiracy offenses, holding that there are “facts” that needed to be proved for both offenses and having failed to convince the jury of these facts in one count, the government could not try again.

United States v. Castillo-Basa, 483 F.3d 890 (9th Cir. 2007)

The Ninth Circuit held that a defendant may not be prosecuted for perjury based on his testimony at a trial which resulted in his acquittal of another offense if, as a practical matter, the jury must have credited his testimony at that trial in order to return the not guilty verdict. At the defendant illegal re-entry trial, he testified that he did not attend the deportation hearing that resulted in his prior deportation. The jury acquitted him which, given the practicalities of the case, meant that the jury believed what he said. The government later found a tape that established that he was, in fact, at the deportation hearing. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant could not be prosecuted for perjury, because of collateral estoppel.

United States v. Ford, 371 F.3d 550 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was previously acquitted of a charge of opening a house for the purpose of distributing cocaine. The government then charged him with managing and controlling a house for the same purpose. Though the double jeopardy clause did not bar the subsequent prosecution because of the distinct elements of these offenses, the collateral estoppel principle applied, because the objective activity proscribed by the two subsections is identical.
United States v. Gallardo-Mendez, 150 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 1998)

In 1991, the defendant was deported as an illegal alien following a guilty plea to a charge of being an alien who illegally reentered the country. In a subsequent criminal case for illegal reentry of a deported alien, the government urged the trial court to instruct the jury that alienage was not a disputed issue – that the defendant was collaterally estopped from contesting that he was, in fact, an alien. The trial court agreed. The Tenth Circuit reversed. The government may not use a judgment in a criminal case following a plea of guilty, to collaterally estop a defendant from relitigating an issue in a subsequent criminal proceeding.

United States v. Gonzalez-Sanchez, 825 F.2d 572 (1st Cir. 1987)

The defendant was initially acquitted on a conspiracy charge. He was then tried for participation with the same co-conspirators in another conspiracy. It was reversible error for the trial court to permit the introduction of any evidence which related to the first conspiracy.

United States v. Pelullo, 14 F.3d 881 (3rd Cir. 1994)

Defendant was convicted of wire fraud in his first trial. At his second trial, which included a RICO count, the judge instructed the jury that the wire fraud conviction – one of the predicate offenses – was committed “as a matter of law.” The judge further instructed the jury that they did not have to further consider whether that offense had been committed, because, as a matter of law, it had been committed. This was reversible error. In a criminal trial, the prosecution must prove every element beyond a reasonable doubt, including the predicate offenses. The Third Circuit noted that the goal of collateral estoppel (efficiency and public policy concerns) is not necessarily consistent with the Sixth Amendment’s guarantee of a jury trial in all cases.

United States v. Morris, 79 F.3d 409 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was acquitted of a substantive money laundering charge, but the jury was deadlocked on a conspiracy charge which included, as one of the overt acts, the same money laundering transaction. On retrial, the doctrine of collateral estoppel did not bar introduction of evidence of this transaction as an overt act in the conspiracy. However, the court concluded that the jury would be confused by this limited admissibility of the evidence and decided that, pursuant to Rule 403, Fed.R.Evid., the evidence would be excluded. The Fifth Circuit affirmed, concluding that this was within the district court’s Rule 403 discretion.

United States v. Frazier, 880 F.2d 878 (6th Cir. 1989)

In a prior trial, the defendant was acquitted on some counts, but the jury was unable to reach a verdict on other counts. In such a situation, the principle of collateral estoppel may preclude retrial of certain charges.

United States v. Bailin, 977 F.2d 270 (7th Cir. 1992)

In the first trial, certain counts resulted in acquittals; others resulted in a mistrial. On retrial, the government could not prove facts that were necessarily decided in the defendant’s favor in the initial trial. Double jeopardy does not apply, because, according to Richardson v. United States, 468 U.S. 317 (1984), the “new” prosecution of the mistried counts does not amount to “new” or “double” jeopardy – the original jeopardy continues past the declaration of a mistrial due to a hung jury. Collateral estoppel, however, does bar an attempt to prove facts which were necessarily decided at the first trial in favor of the defendants for the counts which resulted in acquittals. Among other things, the government cannot rely on counts which resulted in acquittals in attempting, once again, to prove the predicate offenses of a RICO violation.

United States v. Romeo, 114 F.3d 141 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant drove a car across the border with a trunkful of marijuana. He was tried on charges of importation and possession with intent to distribute. The jury acquitted him on the possession charge, but deadlocked on the importation charge. The defendant’s defense was that he had no idea what was in the trunk, having been asked to drive the car across the border by an acquaintance. The collateral estoppel component of the double jeopardy clause barred a retrial on the importation charge.

United States v. Stoddard, 111 F.3d 1450 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant’s previous acquittal of a drug conspiracy charge collateral estopped a subsequent tax offense prosecution which required, for conviction, convincing the jury that the defendant was involved in a drug transaction that the earlier jury must have believed there was insufficient proof to convict.

United States v. McLaurin, 57 F.3d 823 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged alternatively with bank robbery and receipt of stolen bank funds. The trial court inadvertently failed to instruct the jury that they should first consider the bank robbery charge and only if the defendant was not guilty of that offense should they consider the lesser charge of receiving the stolen money. The jury remained hung on the bank robbery charge but convicted the defendant of the lesser “receipt” offense. This verdict barred a retrial on the bank robbery charge. The jury’s verdict represented a finding that the defendant did not steal the money, but that he received it after it was stolen. This collaterally estopped the government from retrying the defendant on the robbery charge.

United States v. Weems, 49 F.3d 528 (9th Cir. 1995)

In a civil forfeiture proceeding, the district court held that the defendant was an innocent owner of his property, unaware of the growing marijuana on the property. The defendant was later prosecuted for structuring currency transactions in violation of 31 U.S.C. §5324. At trial, the government sought to introduce evidence of the marijuana on the defendant’s property. The Ninth Circuit held that the government was collaterally estopped from introducing this evidence.

United States v. Barragan-Cepeda, 29 F.3d 1378 (9th Cir. 1994)

In a 1980 trial, the defendant was charged with being an alien who re-entered the country after deportation. He was acquitted. In this case, he was prosecuted for the same offense. He submitted affidavits from some 1980 jurors to the effect that they decided that he was not an alien. These affidavits were admissible, because the affidavits were not offered on the question of the validity of the 1980 verdict. Because the 1980 jury decided that the defendant was not an alien, the government was collaterally estopped from re-litigating this issue in this prosecution.

United States v. Cejas, 817 F.2d 595 (9th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was prosecuted for conspiracy in one district and convicted. Subsequently, he was prosecuted again and contended that the double jeopardy clause barred the indictment because many of the same overt acts were used in the second indictment as were used in the first indictment. The district court dismissed the indictment. The government did not appeal, instead they simply obtained a new indictment. The Court of Appeals holds that the dismissal of the indictment was a judgment on the merits of the double jeopardy claim and since it was not appealed, it constituted a final order. As such, it had a collateral estoppel effect on any future indictment for the same offense.

United States v. Rogers, 960 F.2d 1501 (10th Cir. 1992)

A prior civil case can erect a collateral estoppel bar to a subsequent criminal prosecution. Here, a prior SEC case resolved the tax shelter fraud charges in favor of the defendant. This precluded a subsequent prosecution for mail fraud relating to the same scheme.

Buck v. Maschner, 878 F.2d 344 (10th Cir. 1989)

The defendant was tried and acquitted on two counts of child molestation in 1982. In 1984 he was again tried for child molestation and the state was permitted to introduce evidence of the prior charges. The Tenth Circuit holds that the doctrine of collateral estoppel bars the use of such testimony as a matter of constitutional law. The risk is that the government may view scant evidence of a subsequent violation of the law as an opportunity to once again present evidence of the defendant’s prior alleged wrong-doing to a second jury, the vice which the Fifth Amendment specifically was designed to prevent. The risk is also great that the defendant will be convicted based not on the evidence for which he is charged but upon the evidence of the prior incident.

United States v. Shenberg, 89 F.3d 1461 (11th Cir. 1996)

The collateral estoppel bar may apply even in cases in which the double jeopardy clause would not bar a prosecution. In this case, the prior acquittal of the defendants on certain substantive counts barred the government from using these crimes as predicate offenses in a substantive RICO prosecution.

United States v. Garcia, 78 F.3d 1517 (11th Cir. 1996)

The defendant’s prior acquittal, on a Rule 29 motion, of conspiracy to import and possess cocaine, barred a subsequent Travel Act prosecution. The earlier acquittal was predicated on the government’s failure to prove that the defendant knew that the boat on which he was traveling was laden with cocaine. Given this finding, a prosecution for a Travel Act offense, based on the same venture, was barred.

United States v. Harnage, 976 F.2d 633 (11th Cir. 1992)

Though a criminal defendant may utilize collateral estoppel to bar a prosecution or argument of facts necessarily established in a prior proceeding or to completely bar a subsequent prosecution where one of the facts necessarily determined in the former trial is an essential element of the conviction the government seeks, the government may not collaterally estop a criminal defendant from relitigating an issue decided against him in a different court proceeding. Here, the trial court barred the defendant from asserting the attorney-client privilege concerning some discussions about a planned drug transaction. In a prior case, in another district, this same defense had been rejected by the trial court.

United States v. Farmer, 923 F.2d 1557 (11th Cir. 1991)

Initially charged with one count of conspiring to violate a person’s civil rights (18 U.S.C. §241) and one count of violating a person’s rights under color of state law (18 U.S.C. §242), the defendant was tried and acquitted of the former (conspiracy) and a hung jury resulted in a mistrial on the misdemeanor count (§242). The defendant was a private citizen who “worked over” a suspect with two law enforcement officers. Prior to his retrial, he argued that a retrial was barred under the principle of collateral estoppel because, as a private citizen, if he did not conspire with the law enforcement officers, he could not possibly have been acting “under color of state law,” an ingredient of the §242 offense. In a lengthy decision which reviews the doctrine of collateral estoppel, the Court rejected the argument. Conspiring with law enforcement officers is not the same as acting under color of state law. That is, a private citizen can act under color of state law without conspiring with law enforcement officers.

United States v. Corley, 824 F.2d 931 (11th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was acquitted of aiding and abetting the embezzlement of funds from a savings and loan. The jury was deadlocked on a conspiracy count relating to the same scheme. In retrying the defendant on the conspiracy count, the government was precluded from introducing any evidence relating to the aiding and abetting offense.

(Double Punishment)

The defendant, an American Indian, was convicted in tribal court for the offense of violence to a policeman. He was subsequently prosecuted in federal court for assaulting an officer. The Supreme Court held that the Indian tribe was a separate sovereign and a subsequent prosecution was therefore permissible under the dual sovereign doctrine.

Whether a particular punishment is criminal or civil is, at least initially, a matter of statutory construction. Thus, if Congress labels a particular punishment “civil,” only the clearest proof will suffice to override this legislative intent. Several factors must be considered, including whether the “civil” sanction involves an affirmative disability or restraint; whether it has historically been regarded as a punishment; whether the behavior to which it applies is already a crime; whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned; whether it comes into play only on a finding of scienter. In this case, the Court concluded that a prior civil monetary penalty imposed by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency did not bar a subsequent criminal prosecution for the same conduct that prompted the civil penalty.

Civil forfeitures do not amount to punishment for purposes of the Double Jeopardy Clause.

Following the defendant’s first conviction for distributing marijuana, his sentence was calculated including, as relevant conduct, cocaine which the defendant conspired to distribute during an earlier phase of the conspiracy. Later, he was indicted for the cocaine offense. This latter prosecution was not barred by the double jeopardy clause. The defendant was not previously put in jeopardy for the cocaine transaction which gave rise to the second prosecution. Double jeopardy principles do not bar a later prosecution or punishment for criminal activity where that activity has been considered at sentencing for a separate crime. At the second sentencing, the court may consider the prior sentence in imposing a Guideline sentence.

A Montana statute imposes a punitive tax on the possession and storage of dangerous drugs. Because of the high tax rate, coupled with the purpose of the statute which is to deter unlawful conduct, and the fact that the tax only applies to the commission of an unlawful act, the imposition of the fine amounts to double jeopardy and cannot be assessed following a criminal conviction for the possession of the marijuana.

The defendant was prosecuted for filing false claims for Medicare benefits. Subsequently, he was a defendant in a False Claims Act lawsuit. Under the terms of the act, he was subjected to a substantial penalty. The Supreme Court holds that this constitutes double jeopardy, because the civil penalty in the subsequent proceeding bore no rational relation to the goal of compensating... the government for its loss, but rather qualifies as “punishment” in the plain meaning of the word. Note, however, that the analysis of Halper was rejected later in Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93 (1997), where the court held that whether a particular punishment is criminal or civil is, at least initially, a matter of statutory construction.

United States v. Bonilla, 579 F.3d 1233 (11th Cir. 2009)

Constitutions for identity theft (§ 1028(a)(7)) and aggravated identity theft (§ 1028A(a)(1)) may not be sustained. Punishment for both offenses would violate the Double Jeopardy Clause. Neither of the statutes requires proof of an additional fact that the other does not.

United States v. Tann, 577 F.3d 533 (3rd Cir. 2009)

Convictions for both possession of a firearm and possession of ammunition for that firearm violate the double jeopardy clause. See Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81 (1955) (transporting two women across state lines in violation of Mann Act is only one offense).

United States v. Severns, 559 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was convicted of mail fraud (§ 1341), arson to commit mail fraud (§ 844(h)), arson to commit wire fraud (§ 844(h)), and arson (§ 844(i)). The Fifth Circuit held that consecutive sentences for arson and use of fire to commit mail fraud and mail fraud are permissible. However, consecutive sentences for use of fire to commit mail fraud and use of fire to commit wire fraud are not permissible if there is only one fire.

United States v. Davenport, 519 F.3d 940 (9th Cir. 2008)

A defendant may not be found guilty of both receiving and possessing child pornography. See also United States v. Johnston, 789 F.3d 934 (9th Cir. 2015); United States v. Schales, 546 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2008) and United States v. Lynn, 636 F.3d 1127 (9th Cir. 2011).

Willette v. Fischer, 508 F.3d 117 (2d Cir. 2007)

The defendant failed to notify law enforcement officers of his change of address which he was required to do under the state sex offender registration law. The state prosecuted him in three counts for three separate days of failing to report. The Second Circuit held that this was a continuing offense that could only be subject to one count of the indictment, and not multiple punishments.

Dye v. Frank, 355 F.3d 1102 (7th Cir. 2004)

Wisconsin’s tax on drug possession (an occupational tax) was so punitive that it constituted a criminal punishment, thereby barring a subsequent state prosecution for the same possession. The state actually seized money from his account, but later returned it. No matter: the seizure of the money amounted to the punishment and the attachment of “jeopardy.” The fact that the state then returned the money did not undo the punishment that had been imposed. See Department of Revenue of Montana v. Kurth Ranch, 511 U.S. 767 (1994).

549
The defendant was the subject of a civil contempt proceeding when he refused to testify before a grand jury, despite having been granted immunity. When the term of the grand jury expired, he was released. Thereafter, he was indicted for criminal contempt. The First Circuit holds that this does not violate double jeopardy. This case contains a lengthy discussion of the differences between civil and criminal contempt, both historically and in modern practice.

Rogers v. Lynaugh, 848 F.2d 606 (5th Cir. 1988)

The defendant had previously been convicted of three offenses. At the closing argument of the sentencing phase of the current trial, the prosecutor stated that each of the prior robberies was “worth at least 10 years.” This argument necessarily urged the sentencing judge to assess a new punishment in addition to the earlier punishments which were already imposed for those three prior offenses. This violates the double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment.

United States v. Horodner, 993 F.2d 191 (9th Cir. 1993)

The defendant purchased a gun on January 10; he brought it back to the shop and had it repaired, picking it up on January 20. He was charged with two counts of being a felon in possession of a firearm. This violated double jeopardy. His possession was continuous and constituted only one act of possession and he could only be punished once for this single offense.

United States v. Kaiser, 893 F.2d 1300 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant pled guilty to charges of filing a false tax return and tax evasion by virtue of the same tax return. Despite his plea of guilty, the defendant did not waive his double jeopardy claim. The two counts of the indictment violated the double jeopardy clause and this was evident from the face of the indictment. Cumulative punishment for the lesser and greater offense should not have been imposed.

United States v. Davis, 799 F.2d 1490 (11th Cir. 1986)

The defendant could not be sentenced consecutively for possession of a tractor-trailer as well as the transportation and sale of the stolen goods.
DOUBLE JEOPARDY
(Mistrials; Reversals and Dismissals)

Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462 (2005)

The trial judge granted a directed verdict at the close of the state’s case on one count of the indictment. At the close of the defendant’s case, however, the defendant’s case the judge reconsidered and allowed this count to go to the jury. The Supreme Court held that this violated the double jeopardy clause. Though reconsideration of a directed verdict motion may be a rule that can be enacted by the state, there was no such procedure in Massachusetts and therefore, the court’s earlier ruling could not be reconsidered after the defendant began his case.

A jury was empanelled and sworn, but the prosecutor refused to participate in the trial because the state was not ready. The trial court directed a verdict of not guilty. The Illinois appellate court held that in this situation, the defendant was not really ever at risk of a conviction and thus, jeopardy had not attached. The Supreme Court unanimously reversed. Once the jury was empaneled and sworn the defendant was in jeopardy. The Double Jeopardy Clause barred a new trial.

The defendant was charged with murder. The jury was instructed to first consider the offense of capital murder; if the jury found him not guilty of that offense, the jury should consider first degree murder; if the jury found him not guilty of that offense, the jury should consider manslaughter. During deliberations, the jury announced that it was deadlocked. The jury was brought into the courtroom and announced that it was unanimous for not guilty of capital murder and first degree murder, but deadlocked on the lesser charge of manslaughter. The judge issued an Allen charge and the jury then returned to deliberate. The jury then sent in another note declaring that they were deadlocked and a mistrial was declared. The U.S. Supreme Court held that the defendant could be retried on all charges: There was no “verdict” on the capital or first degree murder charge. A jury’s “announcement” does not constitute a verdict and there was nothing preventing the jury from reconsidering its initial vote on the greater offenses, during the continued deliberations. Therefore, there was no final verdict and no bar to retrying the capital and first degree murder charges.

In Pennsylvania, if the sentencing jury is unable to reach a unanimous verdict that the death penalty is appropriate, the judge will then enter a life sentence. In this case, the jury was deadlocked and a life sentence was ordered by the trial court. The defendant then appealed his conviction and the appellate court reversed. The state again sought the death penalty when the case was re-tried. The Supreme Court held that this was permissible. Had the first jury unanimously returned a life sentence, the defendant could not be sentenced to death on retrial. But because the first jury did not reach a verdict, the Double Jeopardy Clause was not violated. See Richardson v. United States, 468 U.S. 317 (1984).

The double jeopardy clause allows retrial of a defendant when the appellate court determines that a defendant’s conviction was based in part on evidence which was erroneously admitted and that the remaining evidence was insufficient to support a conviction. A retrial is permitted to enable the defendant the opportunity to obtain fair adjudication of his guilt with legal evidence.

The Double Jeopardy Clause does not apply in the context of a retrial of mistried counts, because a retrial is a continuation of the original jeopardy.

In California, a person convicted of a crime who has previously been convicted of a prior violent offense receives a considerably harsher sentence. At the sentencing proceeding, the state must prove the prior offense pursuant to the rules of evidence and with proof beyond reasonable doubt. The state offered insufficient evidence and the appellate court reversed, but remanded so the state could try again. This was permissible under the Double Jeopardy Clause (though the rule is otherwise if the state is seeking the death penalty, Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430 (1981)). The Double Jeopardy Clause does not apply to non-capital sentencing proceedings, because a sentencing proceeding does not place the defendant “in jeopardy” for an offense.

Relying on the AEDPA standard, the Supreme Court held that the Michigan Supreme Court did not act unreasonably in concluding that the state trial court acted within its authority in granting a mistrial after four hours of deliberations when the jury indicated that it was deadlocked. The Michigan Court applied the correct standard and its decision was not an “unreasonable application of clearly established Federal law.” There is no minimum time that the jury must be allowed to deliberate, and there is no constitutional requirement that the jury be questioned prior to the declaration of a mistrial.

United States v. Thompson, 690 F.3d 977 (8th Cir. 2012)

The trial judge granted a judgment of acquittal after hearing argument as to one count for one defendant. The defendant rested without putting on evidence. Another defendant then began putting on his case. The trial judge then called a recess and changed his mind, allowing the one count to proceed to verdict. The Eighth Circuit, relying on Smith v. Massachusetts and distinguishing United States v. Hill, 643 F.3d 807 (11th Cir. 2011), held that this violated double jeopardy. In Hill, the judge changed his mind shortly after having announced his decision and before any other proceedings occurred.

United States v. Alvarez-Moreno, 657 F.3d 896 (9th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with transporting an illegal alien for profit. The trial was conducted as a bench trial. After the bench trial was concluded, the judge realized that a proper waiver of a jury trial had not been accomplished. The judge then entered and order granting a new trial pursuant to Rule 33. This was not appropriate, however, because the defendant never filed a motion for a new trial. The judge then entered an Order mistrying the case. Before a retrial was initiated, the defendant filed a motion to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds. The Ninth Circuit holds that a retrial was not permissible, because the defendant never requested a mistrial and a manifest necessity was not present. Of course, if the defendant appealed the conviction resulting from the bench trial, a retrial would be permitted.

United States v. Fisher, 624 F.3d 713 (5th Cir. 2010)

The defendant’s trial started, but a two-day adjournment was necessitated by a problem with discovery furnished to the defense. During that two-day interim, government witnesses (including the drug laboratory chemist) became unavailable because of other cases at which he was required to testify and a seminar he needed to attend. The court then granted a mistrial over the objection of the defense. There was no manifest necessity for granting the mistrial and the double jeopardy clause barred re-initiating the prosecution.

United States v. Cornelius, 623 F.3d 486 (7th Cir. 2010)

After a sidebar conference that limited what a witness could say about one defendant’s conduct, the prosecutor asked a question which resulted in the witness saying precisely what he was not supposed to say. The prosecutor claimed that the answer was not responsive to the question that was asked (“Did you have any other suppliers?” to which the witness did not simply answer “yes” but, instead, answered, “Yes, Mike.”). The trial court granted a mistrial. The Seventh Circuit held that an evidentiary hearing was necessary to determine if the question by the prosecutor was designed to goad the defendant into requesting a mistrial. Though the prosecutor objected to the mistrial, and requested a limiting instruction – and this is probative of the prosecutor’s intention – this fact, alone, is not sufficient to conclude that the prosecutor did not intentionally goad the defendant into requesting a mistrial.

United States v. Lara-Ramirez, 519 F.3d 76 (1st Cir. 2008)

Without the consent of the defendant, the trial court granted a mistrial when a Bible was seen in the jury deliberation room and a juror said the foreman said that the jurors should consider what God says. Declaring a mistrial was not a manifest necessity. Retrying the defendant would violate the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Razmilovic, 507 F.3d 130 (2nd Cir. 2007)

Over the objection of defense counsel, the trial court declared a mistrial when the jury announced that they were deadlocked (after three days of deliberations). There was no manifest necessity for doing so. The jury only sent in one note of stating that they were deadlocked and no Allen charge had been given. The various factors that should have been considered before declaring a mistrial (length and complexity of trial; jury notes; length of deliberations; Allen charge) did not support this step, in light of the parties’ request that deliberations continue.

United States v. Lewis, 492 F.2d 1219 (11th Cir. 2007)

A defendant who failed to raise a double jeopardy claim in the district court is not forever foreclosed from raising a double jeopardy claim in the appellate court. He must establish, however, that it was plain error to allow the second trial to proceed. The court noted that there is a difference between forfeiting a claim (such as in this case, where the defendant simply fails to raise it, and thus must overcome the plain error standard of review) and affirmative waiver of an issue, which forecloses appellate review. See United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725 (1993).
Brazzel v. Washington, 491 F.3d 976 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with attempted murder and, as an alternative, assault. The jury left the attempted murder verdict form blank, but convicted the defendant of assault. There was no elaboration on the blank form. Pursuant to Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184 (1957), this amounted to an acquittal of the greater offense. On appeal, the conviction was reversed. Back in the trial court, the defendant was prosecuted for attempted murder again. Once again, the jury convicted him of the lesser offense. The Ninth Circuit granted the writ. The defendant should not have been forced to go to trial for the attempted murder charge again. Having been acquitted of that charge, the Double Jeopardy Clause barred a retrial, even if the conviction for the lesser offense was reversed. Forcing him back to trial on that count—even though he was once again acquitted and found guilty of assault—prejudiced his defense to the assault charge.

United States v. Blanton, 476 F.3d 767 (9th Cir. 2007)

After the defendant was found guilty of a firearm offense, he waived his right to a jury as the Armed Career Criminal Act sentencing enhancement phase. The trial court granted his Rule 29 motion with regard to certain offenses. The Ninth Circuit held that the government may not appeal this judgment because of the Double Jeopardy Clause.

Walck v. Edmondson, 472 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 2007)

The defendant sought federal habeas corpus relief (§ 2241) to bar the initiation of a state trial that was about to occur, on the basis that a prior mistrial had not properly been declared and the double jeopardy clause barred the state from proceeding. The Tenth Circuit held that federal habeas corpus relief was available to bar the initiation of trial and that Younger v. Harris abstention did not apply.

United States v. Black Lance, 454 F.3d 922 (8th Cir. 2006)

Following the cross-examination of the victim in this assault case, the trial judge told the prosecution that his case just went out the window and that he was dismissing the charges. This amounted to an acquittal, even though the prosecutor had not rested. See Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141 (1962).

United States v. Ogles, 440 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2006)

At the conclusion of the government’s case, the trial court granted a judgment of acquittal pursuant to Rule 29, on the basis that in the court’s view, the statute did not cover the conduct in which the defendant engaged. Whether the trial court’s view was correct or not, this amounted to an acquittal based on factual insufficiency of the evidence and a retrial could not be held.

United States v. Serawop, 410 F.3d 656 (10th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was charged with murder, but convicted of voluntary manslaughter. The trial court erred, however, in its instruction to the jury on the law of voluntary manslaughter. A retrial was permitted, but only on the voluntary manslaughter offense. The verdict for the lesser included offense operated as an acquittal of the charged offense. See Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184 (1957).

Stow v. Murashige, 389 F.3d 880 (9th Cir. 2004)
Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241, a defendant facing trial in a state court may file a federal habeas corpus petition seeking to bar the trial on double jeopardy grounds. In this case, the jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of attempted first degree murder, but also noted that the defendant was not guilty of attempted second degree murder. The first degree murder count was reversed by the state appellate court. Retrial on the attempted second degree murder count was barred by the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Rivera, 384 F.3d 49 (3rd Cir. 2004)

Just prior to the close of the government’s case, a key witness was in the middle of his testimony when court adjourned for the weekend. Over the weekend, the witness broke his leg and was hospitalized. Further delays resulted from the witness’s inability to travel back to the courthouse. Initially, defense counsel requested a mistrial, but this was denied. A couple days later (still waiting for the witness), defense counsel requested that the case go forward without the witness. The judge then declared a mistrial. There was no manifest necessity for doing so and the Double Jeopardy Clause barred further prosecution.

United States v. Patterson, 381 F.3d 859 (9th Cir. 2004)

Fallout from the decision in Ellis, which is annotated below: The defendant in this case entered a guilty plea pursuant to Rule 11(b)(1)(B). The amount of marijuana plants was acknowledged by the government and the defense to be in dispute and would require a hearing at sentencing. After the plea was entered, Apprendi was decided and the government acknowledged that the number of plants became an element of the offense. The district court vacated the plea. The Ninth Circuit held that this was impermissible. Once the plea was entered, only the defendant has the power to withdraw the plea; the court may reject the plea agreement, but it cannot vacate the guilty plea, itself. Vacating the plea in this case violated the Double Jeopardy Clause.

United States v. Toribio-Lugo, 376 F.3d 33 (1st Cir. 2004)

The trial court sua sponte declared a mistrial when one of the jurors failed to appear during the fourth day of trial, and then was informed that the missing juror had also missed part of the prior day’s proceedings. The defense attorney did not consent to the granting of the mistrial. There was no manifest necessity for declaring a mistrial, because defense counsel may have consented to an eleven-person jury. See Fed.R.Crim.P. Rule 23(b)(2)(A).

United States v. Bonas, 344 F.3d 945 (9th Cir. 2003)

The district court judge declared a mistrial after learning that certain jurors were not being paid by their employers and were going to suffer financial hardship as a result of their service. There was no manifest necessity for doing so and further prosecution was prohibited.

United States v. Bordeaux, 121 F.3d 1187 (8th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with attempted aggravated sexual abuse. The jury announced that it could not agree on a verdict on this charge, but found the defendant guilty of the lesser offense of abusive sexual contact by force. The conviction was set aside, because the trial court failed to properly instruct the jury on this lesser offense. Can the defendant be tried for the greater offense? Yes. Distinguishing Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184 (1957) and *Price v.
Georgia, 398 U.S. 323 (1970), the court concluded that there was no "implicit acquittal" of the greater offense -- the jury explicitly explained that it failed to reach a verdict on the greater offense -- so the closer analogy was to Richardson v. United States, 468 U.S. 317 (1984), which held that a mistrial caused by a hung jury does not terminate the first jeopardy, and therefore there is no "double" jeopardy when trial commences anew.

United States v. Lynch, 162 F.3d 732 (2d Cir. 1998)

The District Court initially issued a permanent injunction, barring the defendants from obstructing ingress into, or egress from, an abortion clinic. When the defendants allegedly violated the injunction, they were arrested and charged with criminal contempt. Though they acknowledged violating the terms of the injunction, both defendants were acquitted by the District Court judge, who reasoned that the defendants’ religious convictions led him to believe that their conduct was not “willful.” The government appealed. The Second Circuit held that Double Jeopardy barred the appeal of this acquittal.

United States v. Ramirez, 884 F.2d 1524 (1st Cir. 1989)

Because a mistrial was granted without manifest necessity, and because the defendants expressed a desire to continue with the trial despite irregularities in the selection of the jury, the double jeopardy clause prevented the retrial.

United States v. Rivera, 872 F.2d 507 (1st Cir. 1989)

During the deliberations in the defendant’s first trial, the jury indicated that it had reached a verdict on two counts but not on the third. The government accepted guilty verdicts on the two counts and dismissed the third count. Subsequently, the Court of Appeals reversed the conviction on the first two counts. Nevertheless, the government cannot retry the defendant on the third count which had previously been dismissed.

United States v. Huang, 960 F.2d 1128 (2d Cir. 1992)

At the first trial, it was discovered that the interpreter was not properly certified and had at one point been summarizing answers, as opposed to fully interpreting. Two of the four defendants moved for a mistrial, the other two objected to the request for a mistrial. A mistrial was granted. The double jeopardy clause barred a retrial for the two who contested the mistrial. There was no manifest necessity for a mistrial; there was no certainty that the error would have resulted in a reversal (one of the tests of manifest necessity) and the “summary interpreting” was not shown to have been inaccurate.

Love v. Morton, 112 F.3d 131 (3rd Cir. 1997)

Shortly after the defendant’s initial trial, the judge declared a mistrial for personal reasons – his mother-in-law died unexpectedly. The defendant did not consent to a mistrial. Actually, he neither objected, nor consented. Commencing a new trial violated the double jeopardy clause. There was no manifest necessity to declare a mistrial, since a continuance could have been considered, or the use of a substitute judge.

Gilliam v. Foster, 75 F.3d 881 (4th Cir. 1996)

In the last of several trips this case made to the Fourth Circuit, the court again holds that the double jeopardy clause barred the state trial court from trying the defendants following the earlier declaration of a mistrial. The court held that the federal court had the authority to enjoin the state trial where it was determined that the trial would violate the double jeopardy clause of the constitution.

_Gilliamb v. Foster_, 61 F.3d 1070 (4th Cir. 1995)

The defendants’ first state court trial ended in a mistrial at the request of the state when the defense allowed jurors to see pictures from the crime scene which were not formally introduced in evidence. The photos were cumulative of other photos which were admitted in evidence. When the case commenced a second time, over the double jeopardy objection of the defendants, the defendants filed a _habeas_ petition in federal district court, seeking to enjoin the state trial. The district court denied the petition, concluding that there was a manifest necessity for the mistrial. The Fourth Circuit, however, disagreed and entered an order enjoining the trial, which was then in progress, on the grounds that the defendants should not be required to endure a second trial. Following an evidentiary hearing in the lower court, the full court decided that the double jeopardy clause barred a new trial. 63 F.3d 287 (4th Cir. 1995).

_United States v. Sloan_, 36 F.3d 386 (4th Cir. 1994)

During his opening statement, the attorney for the defendant described the defendant’s Horatio Alger life. Throughout the course of the trial, moreover, the trial court stated that it based evidentiary rulings on the defendant’s asserted intention to take the stand. At the close of the government’s case, however, the defendant opted not to testify. The trial court declared a mistrial. There was no manifest necessity to do so and a retrial was barred by the double jeopardy clause. With regard to the evidentiary rulings, the record demonstrated that the few times the issue of the defendant’s expected testimony was raised, it was when the district court ruled out certain defense-offered testimony, on the basis that such evidence would have to wait until the defendant testified. With regard to the opening statement, the trial court did not entertain options short of declaring a mistrial. Here, unlike in _Arizona v. Washington_, 434 U.S. 497 (1978), the attorney did not refer to clearly inadmissible evidence. Rather, as in _Frazier v. Culp_, 394 U.S. 731 (1969), the attorney had a good faith belief in the availability of the evidence which he referred to in the opening statement.

_United States v. Shafer_, 987 F.2d 1054 (4th Cir. 1993)

During the course of this arson trial, the government introduced evidence that the defendant was in a precarious financial condition. In response to a defendant’s subpoena, a police officer brought to court a box full of documents which had been misplaced in the property room which demonstrated that defendant’s business was in good financial shape. These documents clearly should have been produced pursuant to _Brady_. The district court promptly declared a mistrial without asking what the defendant’s desire was. This was error and a retrial was barred. There were alternatives to granting a mistrial and the defendant did not move for, or agree to, a mistrial.

_United States v. Council_, 973 F.2d 251 (4th Cir. 1992)

During the jury’s deliberations, the trial court decided that he had improperly restricted the defendant’s offer of proof on the defense of justification and declared a mistrial. The defendant objected. Declaring a mistrial was not a manifest necessity and a retrial was therefore barred by the double jeopardy clause.
Harpster v. State of Ohio, 128 F.3d 322 (6th Cir. 1997)
The state trial judge declared a mistrial when the defense counsel, cross-examining a state’s witness revealed the possible penalty for the charged offense. There was no manifest necessity for the mistrial and retrying the defendant was barred by the double jeopardy clause.

Terry v. Potter, 111 F.3d 454 (6th Cir. 1997)
The defendant was initially charged with committing wanton or intentional murder under Kentucky state law. The jury convicted him of wanton murder and left the intentional murder verdict form blank. The state appellate court reversed the conviction, holding that “wanton” murder only applies where the intention to commit murder is found, but the wrong person is killed. This holding by the appellate court barred another prosecution for intentional murder. Even though the jury was silent on its findings regarding the intentional murder theory, the court concluded that this amounted to an “implicit acquittal.” See Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184 (1957).

United States v. White, 914 F.2d 747 (6th Cir. 1990)
The defendant’s first trial was aborted by a declaration of mistrial prompted by the prosecutor’s improper questioning of a witness. A co-defendant moved for a mistrial; the defendant said nothing. Because this defendant did not consent to the declaration of the mistrial and there was no manifest necessity for declaring a mistrial in regard to him, the Sixth Circuit concludes that a retrial of this defendant was barred on double jeopardy grounds.

Taylor v. Dawson, 888 F.2d 1124 (6th Cir. 1989)
The defendant’s initial trial was mistried, but because there was no “manifest necessity” the double jeopardy clause barred a retrial. The initial mistrial was declared because the defense attorney elicited testimony that the victim of the murder had beaten the defendant as well as others and had used drugs. The trial court had indicated that such evidence would not be admissible in the trial. The Sixth Circuit holds that the defense attorney had not been instructed to avoid those topics and, furthermore, Kentucky law specifically permitted the introduction of such testimony.

Saylor v. Cornelius, 845 F.2d 1401 (6th Cir. 1988)
The defendant was charged with murder in an indictment which would have supported a conviction on either a conspiracy or accomplice theory. At trial, the prosecutor introduced evidence which would have supported a verdict of guilty only on an accomplice theory. The judge instructed the jury only on a conspiracy theory. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The Kentucky State Supreme Court reversed the conviction but permitted a re-trial to allow the State to present its conspiracy theory. The federal court granted habeas relief: Although the State Supreme Court did not hold that the evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of murder, jeopardy had attached and a re-trial to permit the State to present its conspiracy theory would violate the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Oseni, 996 F.2d 186 (7th Cir. 1993)
In some cases, such as this one, it is appropriate to conduct an evidentiary hearing to determine if the prosecutor’s conduct in causing a mistrial was intended to do just that — that is, cause a mistrial in order to improve its position in a retrial. If that was the government’s intent, of course, a retrial would be barred by the double jeopardy clause. Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667 (1982). Here, an assistant U.S. attorney was called as a witness and her testimony improperly referred to statements of the defendant’s attorney during preliminary discussions.
which indicated that the attorney believed the defendant was lying. Whether the witness/prosecutor did this in order to induce a mistrial should have been the subject of an evidentiary hearing at which the prosecutor could be cross-examined.

United States v. Givens, 88 F.3d 608 (8th Cir. 1996)

Shortly after the trial began in this multi-defendant case, the attorney for one defendant notified the court that, in light of one witness’s testimony, he might have to appear as a witness to discredit that witness. The court suggested that a mistrial would be declared and that defendant could retain a new lawyer. The remaining defendants objected. Nevertheless, a mistrial was declared. The Double Jeopardy Clause barred a retrial. Judicial economy is not a proper basis for a finding of manifest necessity.

United States v. Allen, 984 F.2d 940 (8th Cir. 1993)

Three defendants were tried jointly. Mid-trial, it was learned that substantial exculpatory information about two of the defendants had not been produced. Over the objection of the third defendant, a mistrial was granted. The retrial of that defendant was prohibited by the double jeopardy clause. There was no necessity to declare a mistrial as to the defendant who objected and who had not been deprived of discoverable material prior to trial.

United States v. Cavanaugh, 948 F.2d 405 (8th Cir. 1991)

Defendants were charged with assault and murder. At trial, the government prevailed on the jury to return a verdict of guilty on the murder, without reaching any verdict on the assault charges. When the murder conviction was reversed on sufficiency grounds by the appellate court, a prosecution for assault could not be pursued.

United States v. Dixon, 913 F.2d 1305 (8th Cir. 1990)

A trial judge declared a mistrial based on the disclosure that jurors saw a TV broadcast which the trial judge determined was prejudicial to both the government and the defense. However, the trial judge did not make an effort to poll the jury or to warn the jury not to pay attention to any news reports. Consequently, there was no manifest necessity for declaring the mistrial and because jeopardy had attached during the first trial, a retrial was barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause.

United States v. Gaytan, 115 F.3d 737 (9th Cir. 1997)

Angered by the government’s Brady violation, the district court dismissed the case midtrial and declared that it was dismissed “with prejudice.” The appellate court reversed, holding that the discovery violation did not necessitate a dismissal of the indictment. A retrial was barred, however, because the defendant did not consent, or request the mistrial.

United States v. Sammaripa, 55 F.3d 433 (9th Cir. 1995)

In a jury trial, jeopardy attaches when the jury is impaneled and sworn. In this case, after the jury was impaneled and sworn, the prosecutor voiced a Batson challenge and the trial court thereafter granted a mistrial. There was no manifest necessity for doing so, because the prosecutor should have made the Batson challenge before the jury was impaneled and sworn. Therefore, the double jeopardy clause barred trying the defendant after this first aborted attempt.

Weston v. Kernan, 50 F.3d 633 (9th Cir. 1995)

When the state introduced evidence about the defendant’s character which the trial court had already held to be inadmissible, the defense attorney requested that the trial court grant a mistrial on its own motion on the grounds of prosecutorial misconduct and declare that a retrial would be barred by the double jeopardy clause. The trial court declared a mistrial “without prejudice” and denied the defendant’s double jeopardy motion. There was no manifest necessity for granting the mistrial and retrial was barred by the double jeopardy clause. It was clear that the defendant did not request a mistrial unless it was granted “with prejudice,” that is, without allowing the state to prosecute the defendant again. Thus, the defendant did not consent to the granting of the mistrial motion and a retrial was barred. A simple cautionary instruction was sufficient to cure the prosecutor’s error.

United States v. Blount, 34 F.3d 865 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with several counts relating to his efforts to prevent the “harvesting” of trees in a National Forest. At the conclusion of the government’s case, the defendant’s motion for judgment of acquittal was granted on certain counts. The next day, however, the trial court reinstated those counts as lesser included misdemeanors. This violated the double jeopardy clause: the district court’s ruling was clearly a determinative ruling on the merits and that ended the matter with regard to that charge, as well as any lesser included offense.

United States v. Bates, 917 F.2d 388 (9th Cir. 1990)

Despite the trial court’s ruling that a police officer could not give certain testimony without laying a proper foundation, the police officer did so. The trial court declared a mistrial without the defendant’s permission. This constituted an abuse of discretion and was not necessitated by any manifest necessity. A retrial was barred on double jeopardy grounds.

United States v. Baptiste, 832 F.2d 1173 (9th Cir. 1987)

A magistrate made a determination that the police lacked probable cause to order the defendant out of his car. Subsequently, the prosecution dismissed the indictment. This amounted to an acquittal and barred a subsequent prosecution.

Venson v. Georgia, 74 F.3d 1140 (11th Cir. 1996)

At the defendant’s state trial, his attorney asked a witness an impeaching question which was improper under state law. This witness was testifying about two counts of the three count indictment. Though a mistrial was properly granted as to the two counts about which the witness testified, there was no manifest necessity to grant a mistrial as to the other count. Retrial on this other count was, therefore, barred.

United States v. Butler, 41 F.3d 1435 (11th Cir. 1995)

An indictment charged nineteen people with being members of a drug conspiracy. The defendants were severed into two groups. During the second day of the first trial, all but one of the defendants in the first group entered guilty pleas. The government moved to mistry the case and put the remaining defendant into the second group. The defendant objected, noting that any interviews of these new witnesses (i.e., the former co-defendants) could be accomplished during the evening. Over objection, the trial court granted a mistrial. There was no manifest necessity for a mistrial and the double jeopardy clause barred a retrial. Moreover, the government’s fear that the defendant would have been prejudiced because the jury would know that all the co-defendants had pled guilty could be handled with a cautionary instruction.

United States v. Quiala, 19 F.3d 569 (11th Cir. 1994)

At the conclusion of the trial of the defendant’s co-defendants, the parties agreed that the defendant would be permitted to introduce certain additional evidence before submitting his case... to the jury which would have been prejudicial to the co-defendants. During an overnight recess, the defense counsel flew from Key West back to Miami, intending to return on the early morning flight the next day. She was accompanied by court personnel. The morning flight, however, was delayed by mechanical difficulties and the earliest the attorney could return was 11:30 a.m. In the meantime, the trial court granted a mistrial. There was no manifest necessity to do so and the double jeopardy clause barred a retrial.

United States v. Chica, 14 F.3d 1527 (11th Cir. 1994)

Two defendants moved for a mistrial when a witness testified about inadmissible matters which prejudiced them. The two other defendants insisted on proceeding. The trial court held that the mistrial was granted not only because of the inadmissible evidence, but also because a case agent was engaged in the Waco, Texas standoff. The latter explanation did not represent a manifest necessity, because the agent’s unavailability was known prior to the beginning of trial and arrangements were contemplated. With regard to the necessity of mistrying the other defendants, this represents nothing more than an interest in judicial economy – the trial court’s desire not to have to try the case twice if a severance of defendants were granted. However, judicial economy is not a manifest necessity. If the original jury is capable of rendering a fair verdict, then the inconvenience of trying the case twice can never amount to a manifest necessity.

Freer v. Dugger, 935 F.2d 213 (11th Cir. 1991)

Following his murder conviction, the defendant moved the trial court to enter a judgment of acquittal. The trial judge indicated that he thought the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction, but, at the urging of the state, simply granted a motion for new trial (thus permitting the appellate court to review the evidence and the state to retry the defendant). In light of the trial judge’s findings that the evidence was insufficient, a retrial was barred by the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Bennett, 836 F.2d 1314 (11th Cir. 1988)

At his first trial, the defendant was found not guilty of importation of drugs, but the jury deadlocked on other substantive and conspiracy offenses. Prior to the second trial, the Eleventh Circuit set forth the rules governing the government’s right to present evidence on the offenses which were already adjudicated and on the offenses which were not adjudicated. The Eleventh Circuit canvasses both the rules of collateral estoppel and double jeopardy. Essentially, all the evidence is admissible if it relates to the offenses for which the defendant is now standing trial, but the jury must be cautioned that the evidence should only be considered as relating to the counts which the evidence relates to.
DOUBLE JEOPARDY
(Same Crime; Lesser Included Offenses)

A prosecution for a criminal offense is barred by the double jeopardy clause if a prior contempt prosecution punished the same conduct, in the context of a violation of the condition of release. The criminal offense is, in effect, a lesser included offense of the contempt offense. In reaching this decision, a majority of the court voted to overrule Grady v. Corbin. Also, a prior civil contempt “prosecution” instituted against a husband for beating his wife barred a subsequent simple assault prosecution, though it did not bar a subsequent assault with intent to kill prosecution.

Conspiracy and substantive offenses may be prosecuted separately. The double jeopardy clause does not bar the government from prosecuting the defendant for a conspiracy offense after having prosecuted him for substantive offenses which were listed as the overt acts in the conspiracy prosecution.

United States v. Gonzales, 841 F.3d 339 (5th Cir. 2016)
18 U.S.C. §924(c) makes it a crime to use and carry a firearm during a drug trafficking offense.  18 U.S.C. § 924(j) makes it a crime to commit murder with a firearm in relation to a drug trafficking offense.  A defendant cannot be convicted and sentenced for both offenses.
The § 924(c) offense is a lesser included offense of the murder offense.

United States v. Jones, 858 F.3d 221 (4th Cir. 2017)
In the Eastern District of Virginia, the defendant pled guilty to being in a conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine during the summer of 2012. Later, he was indicted in the Western District of Virginia where he was charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine from 1998 to 2012 (including the same people identified in the Eastern District conspiracy). The Fourth Circuit held that the latter indictment was barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause.

United States v. Ehle, 640 F.3d 689 (6th Cir. 2011)
Convictions for both possessing and receiving child pornography violated the double jeopardy clause. The convictions could not stand, even though the defendant entered a guilty plea.

United States v. Lynn, 636 F.3d 1127 (9th Cir. 2011)
It violates double jeopardy to convict a person of both receiving and possessing child pornography. Even if the offenses were alleged to have occurred on different dates, this does not necessarily alleviate the constitutional problem.

United States v. Rabhan, 628 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 2010)
The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to commit bank fraud in Georgia in connection with obtaining a loan from one bank. At the same time that he was engaged in defrauding that bank, he also defrauded another bank in Mississippi for another business loan.

DONALD F. SAMUEL · GARLAND, SAMUEL & LOEB, P.C., ATLANTA, GEORGIA · 404-262-2225 · dfs@gslaw.com
The conspiracies involved the same time frame, the same personnel, the same substantive offense. The Fifth Circuit held that the double jeopardy clause barred the second prosecution in Mississippi.

United States v. Wayerski, 624 F.3d 1342 (11th Cir. 2010)

A defendant may not be convicted of both being a member of a child exploitation enterprise (18 U.S.C. § 2252A(g)) and conspiring to participate in a child exploitation enterprise. Analogizing to CCE and conspiracy convictions, the Eleventh Circuit held that the “acting in concert” language of the substantive offense and the “agreement” language of the conspiracy offense, rendered separate punishments a violation of the Double Jeopardy Clause.

United States v. Robertson, 606 F.3d 943 (8th Cir. 2010)

Convictions for the offenses of attempted aggravated sexual abuse and attempted abusive sexual contact in Indian country amounted to double jeopardy in this case.

United States v. Basciano, 599 F.3d 184 (2d Cir. 2010)

The defendant was previously convicted of a RICO offense based on his participation in the activities of the Bonnano Crime Family. He was subsequently prosecuted for a substantive RICO offense in connection with this Crime Family activities. The Second Circuit concluded that the pattern of racketeering activity described the same “pattern” and was therefore subject to the Double Jeopardy Clause.

United States v. Peel, 595 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was convicted of bankruptcy fraud and obstruction of justice based on his conduct of blackmailing a creditor into dropping a bankruptcy claim. This violated Double Jeopardy, because the obstruction offense was a lesser included offense of the bankruptcy fraud.

United States v. Diaz, 592 F.3d 467 (3rd Cir. 2010)

There can only be one § 924(c) conviction for each count of conviction of a drug offense. Thus, if there is only one drug offense set forth in the indictment, there can only be one § 924(c) conviction, even if more than one gun is possessed, and even if a gun is possessed on more than one occasion during the course of a drug conspiracy.

United States v. Rigas, 605 F.3d 194 (3rd Cir. 2010)

A conviction under § 371’s conspiracy offense clause bars a subsequent prosecution under § 371’s defraud clause. The two offenses included in § 371 are two ways of committing the same offense. In this case, the prosecution of Rigas under the conspiracy to commit an offense clause was shown to be sufficiently close to the pending defraud clause prosecution that the burden was on the government to prove that the former did not bar, on double jeopardy grounds, a prosecution under the latter provision.

United States v. McIntosh, 580 F.3d 1222 (11th Cir. 2009)

The defendant entered a guilty plea to certain charges and the court unconditionally accepted the plea. Prior to sentencing, the government moved to dismiss the indictment because of an error in a date and presented a second indictment which corrected the error. The defendant objected, claiming that jeopardy had attached. The defendant then conditionally entered a plea to the second indictment. The Eleventh Circuit held that jeopardy had attached and the defendant could not be prosecuted under the second indictment for the same offense.

United States v. James, 556 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2009)

Convictions for robbery and felony murder violated the double jeopardy clause, because the robbery was the underlying felony. The court also concluded that a § 924(c) conviction that was linked to the robbery offense could not be sustained, because the robbery conviction was barred by the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Hope, 545 F.3d 293 (5th Cir. 2008)

The defendant was arrested in possession of a firearm. It was determined that the same firearm had been used by the defendant the previous day to commit a robbery. There was no evidence that he ever relinquished control of the firearm. This evidence could not support two counts of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon.

United States v. Olmeida, 461 F.3d 271 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant was prosecuted in district court in North Carolina for unlawfully possessing ammunition in North Carolina “and elsewhere.” At the time the prosecution in North Carolina was brought, the government knew that the defendant also possessed ammunition in New York and had no reason to believe that the defendant possessed ammunition in any location other than North Carolina and New York. The defendant entered a guilty plea to the charge in North Carolina. The Double Jeopardy Clause barred a prosecution for possession of ammunition in New York.

Gonzalez v. Justices of Municipal Court, 382 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004)

Though rejecting the claim on the merits, the First Circuit holds that a defendant facing a state criminal trial that he claims would violate his rights under the Double Jeopardy Clause may file a habeas in federal court (28 U.S.C. § 2241) to prevent the trial from going forward. See also Stow v. Murashige, 389 F.3d 880 (9th Cir. 2004). The Supreme Court granted cert on the merits of the double jeopardy claim and remanded for further consideration in light of Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462 (2005).

United States v. Maslin, 356 F.3d 191 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant was previously charged and convicted of a marijuana conspiracy which was described by the prosecutor, in his opening statement, as a “far-flung conspiracy.” The defendant was later charged with a marijuana and cocaine conspiracy in another case in the same district. There was an overlap of time, co-conspirators, and methods of operation. Double jeopardy barred the subsequent prosecution.

United States v. Lopez, 356 F.3d 463 (2d Cir. 2004)

The two conspiracies with which the defendant was charged were, in fact, different aspects of one conspiracy.
Under Oregon law, the crime of intentional murder is a lesser included offense of aggravated felony murder, because intentional murder does not require proof of any element not contained within aggravated felony murder. In this case, the reprosecution for aggravated felony murder, following jury’s acquittal of the defendant for intentional murder, was barred by the double jeopardy clause.

The defendant was prosecuted under the Federal Bank Robbery statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a). Because the government failed to prove an essential element of the offense, the conviction was reversed. The government then sought to prosecute the defendant under the Hobbs Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1951. The Ninth Circuit held that the Double Jeopardy Clause barred this prosecution. It is impossible to violate the Federal Bank Robbery Act without also violating the Hobbs Act.

The defendant was charged with attempted aggravated sexual abuse. The jury announced that it could not agree on a verdict on this charge, but found the defendant guilty of the lesser offense of abusive sexual contact by force. The conviction was set aside, because the trial court failed to properly instruct the jury on this lesser offense. Can the defendant be tried for the Georgia, 398 U.S. 323 (1970), the court concluded that there was no "implicit acquittal" of the greater offense -- the jury explicitly explained that it failed to reach a verdict on the greater offense -- so the closer analogy was to Richardson v. United States, 468 U.S. 317 (1984), which held that a mistrial caused by a hung jury does not terminate the first jeopardy, and therefore there is no "double" jeopardy when trial commences anew.

Under the Blockburger test, the elements of second degree criminal sexual penetration include the offense of aggravated burglary, since the sexual offense (as alleged in this case) could only have been committed in the second degree if it was committed during the course of the aggravated burglary.

The state prosecuted the defendant for dealing in stolen car parts. The state prosecutor then referred the case to the U.S. Attorney’s office to proceed on a money laundering forfeiture action. The state prosecutor was deputized as a special assistant U.S. Attorney. The claimant argued that the proceeds from the forfeiture would be given to the state. This was sufficient to require a hearing on whether an exception to the dual sovereignty doctrine applied, as set out in Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959). This exception applies when one sovereign is acting "as a tool" for another. Before reaching the Bartkus issue, the Second Circuit conducts a lengthy analysis of the double jeopardy jurisprudence in the forfeiture context.

The defendant was prosecuted for possessing P2P and given a consecutive sentence for attempting to make methamphetamine. The Fifth Circuit reverses holding that these counts represent “successive steps in one criminal undertaking, the manufacture of methamphetamine.” Consequently, he can only receive one sentence.

The police executed a search warrant at the defendant’s house and found a substantial quantity of cocaine. The car in the driveway was impounded and several days later, it was found to contain another stash of cocaine. The defendant was tried twice, once for the quantity in the house and later for the quantity in the car. This violated the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Hebeka, 89 F.3d 279 (6th Cir. 1996)

The government cannot prosecute a defendant for both food stamp fraud, 7 U.S.C. §2024(c), and submitting a false claim, 18 U.S.C. §287. The latter statute does not contain any element that is not also required by the former statute.

Costo v. United States, 904 F.2d 344 (6th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was prosecuted for distribution of cocaine and attempting to distribute cocaine. The defendant first distributed one kilogram of cocaine to purchasers and immediately attempted to induce them to purchase more when they approved the first kilo sample. This constitutes only one offense and the defendant could not be convicted of both distributing the first kilo and attempting to distribute the other three kilos.

United States v. Podell, 869 F.2d 328 (7th Cir. 1989)

The defendant removed and tampered an automobile’s VIN and then altered the VIN on the same car. The proper unit of prosecution under 18 U.S.C. §511(a) is an individual automobile. Thus only one prosecution can be instituted for the alteration or tampering of a single automobile VIN.

United States v. Dickerson, 857 F.2d 414 (7th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was sentenced to four years under 18 U.S.C. §922(g) and fifteen years on §924(e)(1) in violation of the double jeopardy clause. Because the §924 sentence represented a sentence enhancement and not a sentence on an additional offense, two sentences could not be imposed.

McIntyre v. Caspari, 35 F.3d 338 (8th Cir. 1994)

Under Missouri law, the crime of tampering with an automobile is a lesser included offense of auto theft. Therefore, having been convicted of tampering with an automobile, the defendant could not later be prosecuted for theft of the same automobile. (This case was decided twice previously, once under prevailing Grady v. Corbin law; once after the decision in Felix, see supra).

McIntyre v. Trickey, 975 F.2d 437 (8th Cir. 1991)

On remand from the United States Supreme Court, the Eighth Circuit reaffirms its decision granting the writ of habeas corpus. The defendant was initially prosecuted for unauthorized use of a vehicle and subsequently prosecuted for theft of the automobile. Even after Felix, this violated the double jeopardy clause.

United States v. Corona, 108 F.3d 565 (9th Cir. 1997)

Title 18, U.S.C. §844(i) sets forth the crime of arson. Title 18, U.S.C. §844(h)(i) outlaws the use of fire in committing a felony. Convictions under 18 U.S.C. §844(h)(i) and §844(i) violate the double jeopardy clause where the §844(i) offense involves the same fire that triggers the §844(h)(i) conviction, and the felony set forth in the §844(h)(i) count is arson.

United States v. Bernhardt, 831 F.2d 181 (9th Cir. 1987)

Successive state and federal prosecutions are generally permissible. However, here, the federal prosecution was paid for and organized by the state prosecutor. The state prosecutor also acted as the prosecutor in the federal forum. The case had earlier been dismissed in the state court because of the statute of limitations defense. The Ninth Circuit holds that the case would be remanded to the trial court to determine whether there was “sufficient federal involvement” in the case to save the prosecution from an otherwise valid double jeopardy claim.

Mansfield v. Champion, 992 F.2d 1098 (10th Cir. 1993)

The defendant robbed a liquor store, taking cash from the cash register, liquor from the shelf and money from the clerk. He was prosecuted for two counts of robbery, one count dealing with the clerk’s money and the other count relating to the store’s property. This violated the double jeopardy clause. The defendant was being punished twice for the same act of robbery.

United States v. Frazier, 89 F.3d 1501 (11th Cir. 1996)

A defendant may not be prosecuted both for 21 U.S.C. §841 and §860. That is, a prosecution for possessing with intent to distribute drugs is a lesser included offense of possession with intent to distribute drugs within 1,000 feet of a school.

United States v. Reed, 980 F.2d 1568 (11th Cir. 1993)

A defendant who has already been convicted of being a member of a conspiracy to import cocaine cannot later be prosecuted for a CCE violation where the conspiracy was part of the “series” element of the CCE. Though the Supreme Court held in Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773 (1985) that a defendant could be prosecuted for CCE after a substantive drug conviction, that reasoning does not apply with regard to a prior conspiracy conviction.

Mars v. Mounts, 895 F.2d 1348 (11th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was charged with murder, and in a bill of particulars the State alleged that the crime occurred between 5:00 p.m. on January 29 and 12:59 a.m. on January 30. At trial, however, the evidence showed that the homicide occurred after 12:59 a.m. on January 30. The trial court instructed the jury that the State had to prove the facts specified in the bill of particulars. The jury indicated that it did not believe the crime occurred within that time period and acquitted the defendant. The State sought to retry the defendant alleging a different time. The Eleventh Circuit granted habeas relief. The second indictment charged the defendant with “the same offense” under the Blockburger test.

United States v. Fiallo-Jacome, 784 F.2d 1064 (11th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was convicted on two counts (among others) of possession of a controlled substance. Both counts involved cocaine and one count involved a lengthy period of time which contained the date alleged in the second count. This constitutes double punishment for the same offense since there was no evidence that there were separate possessions.

United States v. Rosenberg, 888 F.2d 1406 (D.C.Cir. 1989)

The defendant was convicted in New Jersey of conspiracy to possess unregistered firearms, explosives, and false identification documents. In D.C., he was prosecuted for the substantive offense of aiding and abetting in the bombing of several buildings. Though the defendants did not actually participate in the bombings, the government, proceeding on a Pinkerton theory, charged that they were responsible because of their membership in the conspiracy. The government conceded that the conspiracy to commit the bombings was the same conspiracy for which he had been convicted earlier. Thus, the defendant could not be prosecuted on a vicarious liability theory where he had previously been convicted of being a member of the conspiracy itself. In effect, the conspiracy was a lesser included offense of the substantive bombing offense.
DRUGS

(Analogue Act)

In a normal prosecution for possession, possessing with intent to distribute, or distributing a controlled substance, the government can satisfy the element of “knowledge” in one of two ways: (1) the defendant knew that he was possessing/distributing a controlled substance (though not necessarily which one – he or she did know however, that the object possessed was a controlled substance); or (2) the defendant knew that he or she was in possession of a particular substance (e.g., heroin, marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine) which is, in fact, a controlled substance, even if the defendant did not know that the particular substance that he knew he was possessing was in fact a controlled substance. In other words, the defendant must either know that the substance possessed was some kind of controlled substance (though not necessarily which one) or that the substance was a particular substance, even if he did not know that that substance was a controlled substance. In a case involving an Analogue Drug, the same rule applies: the defendant must either be shown to know that the substance possessed was a particular substance that he knew to be an analogue, or he must be shown to have known that he possessed a particular substance which is, in fact, a qualifying analogue.

United States v. Stanford, 823 F.3d 814 (5th Cir. 2016)

This case was tried prior to the decision in McFadden v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2298 (2015), but that Supreme Court decision was issued while this appeal was pending. The jury instruction at trial did not comply with McFadden’s knowledge requirement. The error was not harmless, even though a special interrogatory correctly included the knowledge requirement for a prosecution under the Analogue Act, because the special interrogatory did not repeat that the element of knowledge had to be found beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Makkar, 810 F.3d 1139 (10th Cir. 2015)

The district court erred when it instructed the jury that it could infer the defendant had the requisite mens rea in this Analogue Drug prosecution if the defendant knew that inhaling the “incense” had the same effect as marijuana. The government did not attempt to argue that the defendant knew the drug was illegal (one method of establishing intent under McFadden), and the instruction failed to include the second element of the mens rea requirement (knowledge of the chemical structure) which is part of the second McFadden method of proving intent. Instead, the instruction simply explained that if the chemical structure was the same and the defendant knew it had the same effect as a listed drug, the jury could infer that the defendant knew the chemical structure was the same. The effect of the lower court’s instruction was to eliminate one of the elements of the offense as explained by McFadden: the defendant’s knowledge that the drug had the same chemical composition as a listed drug. This was plain error.

United States v. Turcotte, 405 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 2005)

In order convict a defendant of possessing or distributing controlled substance analogues (21 U.S.C. § 802(32)(A)), the government must prove that the defendant (1) knew that the substance had a chemical structure substantially similar to a controlled substance; and either (2) that it has similar physiological effects, or (3) that he represented to others (or intended) that it had similar physiological effects.
DRUGS
(Causing Death)

In order to sentence the defendant pursuant to § 841(b)(1)(C), the government must prove that the defendant would not have died but for the drugs distributed by the defendant. On remand to the Eighth Circuit, the court of appeals held that under this standard, the evidence was insufficient to support the (b)(1)(C) sentence, because the government conceded that there was no evidence that the victim would have lived but for his heroin use. United States v. Burrage, 747 F.3d 995 (10th Cir. 2014). See also Ragland v. United States, 784 F.3d 1213 (8th Cir. 2015).

United States v. Hatfield, 591 F.3d 945 (7th Cir. 2010)

The Seventh Circuit tackles the question what the government is required to prove in order to establish that a defendant’s distribution of drugs “resulted in” death or serious bodily injury. 21 U.S.C. § 841(b)(1)(C). Specifically, the court rejected the trial court’s formulation of causation and concluded that a simple instruction as follows is sufficient: “The jury must determine whether the United States has established, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the victims died, or suffered serious bodily injury, as a result of ingesting a controlled substance or controlled substances distributed by the defendant.” The trial court erred by adding to this simple instruction, “the distribution of the controlled substance must have been a factor that resulted in death or serious bodily injury” and “must have at least played a part in the death or in the serious bodily injury.” These additional explanations were reversible error. The court discusses at length various issues relating to causation.

United States v. Tobin, 676 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2012)

The court held that “willfulness” is not an element of a § 841 offense (distribution of a controlled substance) and therefore, it is no defense that the defendant did not realize that his conduct was illegal or that he had consulted with a lawyer and the lawyer said the conduct was not illegal (this was an Internet Pharmacy prosecution). However, to be convicted of conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance, the defendant is required to act with knowledge of the illegality of his conduct, because under § 846, willfulness is an element of the offense and therefore, advice of counsel is a defense to a § 846 offense.

United States v. Lovern, 590 F.3d 1095 (10th Cir. 2009)

Prosecution of pharmacist for his role in dispensing drugs based on on-line prescriptions. The conviction of the lead defendant was upheld, but one employee’s conviction was reversed on sufficiency grounds, based on the failure to prove that he knew the prescriptions were issued on-line, rather than pursuant to the usual course of professional practice.

United States v. Bek, 493 F.3d 790 (7th Cir. 2007)

With regard to one count of the indictment, the evidence was insufficient to prove that the doctor prescribed medicine outside the scope of his medical practice. His conviction on several other counts was affirmed. The case contains a useful discussion of the elements of this kind of case – doctors acting as “drug dealers.”

United States v. Fuchs, 467 F.3d 889 (5th Cir. 2006)

Internet pharmacist and doctors prosecuted for drug dealing. They were using internet pharmacy to dispense hydrocodone. The pharmacist was convicted and sentenced under CCE to a mandatory minimum twenty year sentence. Not a favorable case, but good discussion of various internet pharmacy and CCE issues.

United States v. Hurwitz, 459 F.3d 463 (4th Cir. 2006)

In a lengthy opinion explaining the law governing the prosecution of doctors for prescribing pain medication, the Fourth Circuit concludes that reversible error occurred when the trial court instructed the jury that good faith is not a defense to a § 841 prosecution of a doctor. The core holding is that an objective standard is appropriate, but this is not necessarily inconsistent with a good faith defense.

United States v. Feingold, 454 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2006)

Though it is permissible to introduce evidence about the standard of care in prescribing medicine, the jury must be instructed carefully that violating the standard of care is not criminal. The district court must ensure that the benchmark for criminal liability is the higher showing that the practitioner intentionally has distributed controlled substances for no legitimate medical purpose and outside the usual course of professional practice. See United States v. Moore, 423
The court noted, “A practitioner becomes a criminal not when he is a bad or negligent physician, but when he ceases to be a physician at all. The court affirms the defendant’s conviction in this case after thoroughly reviewing the law in several Circuits on the issue of prosecuting a doctor for violating the Controlled Substance Act by over-prescribing drugs.”
DRUGS
(Importation)

United States v. Cabaccang, 332 F.3d 622 (9th Cir. 2003)

Transporting drugs on a flight between two places in the United States does not amount to importation, even if the plane travels across international borders during the flight. The defendant in this case carried drugs on a flight from L.A. to Guam.

United States v. Paul, 142 F.3d 836 (5th Cir. 1998)

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendants were involved in a conspiracy to import drugs into the United States. Their efforts to acquire drugs began after a ship carrying the drugs had arrived in port and there was no proof that either defendant was aware of the shipment’s existence until after they were called to help retrieve the drugs from the ship.
DRUGS
(Maintaining A House for Purpose of Distributing Drugs)

United States v. Mancuso, 718 F.3d 780 (9th Cir. 2013)

In order for a defendant to be found guilty of 21 U.S.C. § 856(a)(1), the manufacture, or distribution or use of drugs must be at least one of the primary or principal uses to which the house is put.
DRUGS
(Possession -- Possession with Intent to Distribute)

In a normal prosecution for possession, possessing with intent to distribute, or distributing a controlled substance, the government can satisfy the element of “knowledge” in one of two ways: (1) the defendant knew that he was possessing/distributing a controlled substance (though not necessarily which one – he or she did know however, that the object possessed was a controlled substance); or (2) the defendant knew that he or she was in possession of a particular substance (e.g., heroin, marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine) which is, in fact, a controlled substance, even if the defendant did not know that the particular substance that he knew he was possessing was in fact a controlled substance. In other words, the defendant must either know that the substance possessed was some kind of controlled substance (though not necessarily which one) or that the substance was a particular substance, even if he did not know that that substance was a controlled substance. In a case involving an Analogue Drug, the same rule applies: the defendant must either be shown to know that the substance possessed was a particular substance that he knew to be an analogue, or he must be shown to have known that he possessed a particular substance which is, in fact, a qualifying analogue.

United States v. Dorman, 860 F.3d 675 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

Drugs were found in the defendant’s mother’s house in a common area, but not in plain view. The defendant occupied a bedroom in that house. The D.C. Circuit held that the presence of drugs in a common area, but not in plain view cannot support a constructive possession conviction of one of several occupants of that house.

United States v. Lemus, 847 F.3d 1016 (9th Cir. 2016)

Though the defendant was charged with possession of 50 grams of methamphetamine, the police never seized any drugs from him and the prosecution relied on the defendant’s statements during an undercover negotiation that he had a pound of meth with him. The evidence was sufficient to support a conviction for possession, but not a conviction for possession of more than 50 grams of methamphetamine, because there was insufficient proof of the purity of the meth that he claimed to have and the agent’s testimony at trial about the typical purity of methamphetamine seized in Los Angeles was not sufficient to prove the purity of the meth that the defendant claimed to possess.

United States v. Simpson, 845 F.3d 1039 (10th Cir. 2017)

In the Tenth Circuit, constructive possession requires not only proof that the defendant knew about the guns (or drugs), but also that the defendant intended to exercise control over the items. The failure to include the requirement of intent amounted to plain error for some of the firearm counts of conviction in this case.

United States v. Blue, 808 F.3d 226 (4th Cir. 2015)

The evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of constructive possession of heroin, or of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute at least 100 grams of heroin. The defendant was observed selling heroin to an informant. Later, he was observed going into an apartment. At a later time, the police obtained a search warrant for that apartment, found two people inside, as well as over 100 grams of heroin. Though the defendant had a key to that apartment, the evidence was not sufficient to show that he used the apartment as a stash house or that he had any connection to the 100 grams that were found in that apartment. The court held that this evidence was insufficient to convict him of constructive possession or conspiracy. The government’s invitation to remand for entry of a judgment of conspiring to possess less than 100 grams based on the other transaction was rejected by the Fourth Circuit.

United States v. Washington, 783 F.3d 1198 (10th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was the driver of the car that had been borrowed by the passenger. In the passenger’s duffel bag was a substantial quantity of marijuana. There was also the smell of marijuana in the car. There were scales in the car, but they were not visible to the defendant. While the smell of marijuana might support the defendant’s conviction for consumption (possession) of marijuana, the evidence presented in this case was insufficient to support the defendant’s conviction for possession with intent to distribute the marijuana.

United States v. Rodriguez-Martinez, 778 F.3d 367 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant was a passenger in a car. When the car was pulled over, the defendant got out, walked to the corner and made a phone call. Drugs were found in the possession of the driver. The defendant was visibly nervous. A gun was found in the possession of the defendant. The First Circuit held that this evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the drugs. His nervousness did not prove that he knew the driver was in possession of drugs and may just as well have reflected his concern about his own possession of the firearm.

United States v. Clark, 740 F.3d 808 (2d Cir. 2014)

The defendant was arrested, handcuffed and placed in the back of a patrol car and was driven to the police station, which took about one minute. When he was removed from the car, an officer looked under the back seat (where the bottom and back of the seat meet) and found a quantity of crack cocaine. It was not in a baggie. There was not a trace of crack cocaine on the defendant’s clothes or on his hands. Though an officer testified that the car was checked before the defendant was placed in the car and he was the only “passenger,” the Second Circuit held that the likelihood that the defendant, while handcuffed removed a quantity of crack cocaine measuring five inches in length and one inch wide, without leaving any trace of the drug on his hands or in his pockets or on his clothes, was so remote that a verdict of possessing the drug could not be sustained. “However, one prefers to quantify an unacceptable risk of convicting the innocent, it is difficult to imagine a case where the possibility that an innocent person has been convicted of an offense is greater than the one now before us.”

United States v. Pillado, 656 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was enlisted by undercover agents to help unload a kilogram of marijuana from a truck. The defendant was at first reluctant, but later agreed to help. He was prosecuted for possession with intent to distribute the marijuana. He requested an instruction on simple possession. The Seventh Circuit held that the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on simple possession. Though he obviously did not possess the marijuana for personal use, that is not the only type of simple possession that exists. The government failed to prove that the defendant’s only possession could have been for the purpose of distributing it. The defendant may have simply abandoned the marijuana, in which case he would not have possessed it with the intent to distribute it.

United States v. Silwo, 620 F.3d 630 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was instrumental in procuring a van that was later used to transport marijuana and was also observed engaging in activity that appeared to be counter-surveillance. This evidence, alone, did not suffice to support a conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. The defendant was not present when the van was loaded. The defendant was clearly in a scheme, but the evidence did not show that he knew the scheme involved the distribution of marijuana. For the same reason, the defendant could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the marijuana.

United States v. Wilson, 619 F.3d 787 (8th Cir. 2010)

Though the defendant was involved in a cocaine and marijuana conspiracy with others, his conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine that was found in one of his co-conspirators’ cars on a particular date was not could not be sustained, because there was no evidence that he knew his co-conspirator had cocaine in the car on that day and there was no evidence that the defendant exercised dominion or control over the drugs in that car.

United States v. Aponte, 619 F.3d 799 (8th Cir. 2010)

The two defendants were stopped driving an SUV in Nebraska. They had borrowed the car from another person. The police searched the vehicle and noticed that a cooler found in the cargo area had an odd weight. They eventually found cocaine in a hidden compartment in the cooler. The Eighth Circuit held that there was insufficient evidence to support the defendants’ conviction. It was not obvious that the cooler had a hidden compartment and, because the vehicle had been borrowed from a friend, there was no basis to assume that the defendants possessed, or knew about the cocaine.

United States v. Perez-Melendez, 599 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 2010)

The defendant was driving a truck with palletes of paper, some of which contained cocaine. While the evidence supported the conclusion that the defendant was aware that he was aiding and abetting the commission of criminal activity, the evidence did not establish beyond a reasonable doubt that he knew the criminal activity he was aiding was a cocaine transaction. The defendants gave inconsistent answers to agents when questioned about their activities, but this did not establish that they were aware of the specific crime that they were aiding.

United States v. Dooley, 580 F.3d 682 (8th Cir. 2009)

The police found a gun in the vehicle that the defendant was driving. The defendant denied knowing the gun was in the car. The court, at the request of the government, instructed the jury that “A person who, although not in actual possession, has both the power and the intention at a given time to exercise dominion or control over a firearm, or over a vehicle in which the firearm is located, is then in constructive possession of the firearm.” This was reversible error. Being in possession of the vehicle (actually, or constructively) does not automatically equate to possession of all the contents of the vehicle. (This case involves a firearm, but is included in this section, because its logic applies equally to a drug possession case).

United States v. Tran, 568 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was in a car that exited a warehouse that had been used as a drug distribution site. The defendant was a passenger and the marijuana was in the trunk. There was insufficient evidence establishing that the defendant possessed the marijuana with intent to distribute it, or that he conspired to do so. The Rule 404(b) evidence may have established that he had knowledge of the marijuana (the limited purpose for which the evidence was admitted), but it did not establish that he constructively or actually possessed the marijuana – or that he conspired to do so. See also United States v. Sanchez-Mata, 925 F.2d 1166 (9th Cir. 1991) and United States v. Estrada-Macias, 218 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2000).

United States v. Garcia, 497 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 2007)

With regard to certain counts, the evidence was not sufficient to prove that the defendant could be held responsible for conduct of other conspirators under a Pinkerton theory, because he was not shown to have been a member of the conspiracy at that time.

United States v. Esquivel-Ortega, 484 F.3d 1221 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was a passenger in a van that was found to be smuggling a large quantity of drugs. The evidence was insufficient to convict him of possessing the drugs with intent to distribute, or with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute. Mere presence in the van is not sufficient to convict the defendant of possession or conspiracy.

United States v. Penaloza-Duarte, 473 F.3d 575 (5th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was a passenger in a car loaded with methamphetamine. When a trooper in Louisiana stopped the car and discovered the drugs, the defendant claimed to be a confidential informant for a California detective, which was, in fact, verified by the California police. Though there was sufficient evidence of the defendant’s knowing possession of the drugs (he acknowledged knowing the drugs were in the car), the evidence was not sufficient to prove that he associated himself with, and engaged in, some affirmative conduct designed to aid the criminal venture, which is an indispensable component of an aiding and abetting conviction. There was no evidence that he loaded, or assisted in loading the car, or that he did any of the driving, or that he even knew the location to which the load was heading. A conviction must be reversed if the evidence construed in favor of the verdict gives equal or nearly equal circumstantial support to a theory of guilt and a theory of innocence of the crime charged. A subsequent Fifth Circuit decision abrogated the standard of review in this case. United States v. Vargas-Ocampo, 747 F.3d 299 (5th Cir. 2014).

United States v. Rojas Alvarez, 451 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2006)

The evidence was insufficient to prove one defendant’s knowing possession of drugs that were found secreted in his trailer. The fact that he had custody and control of a residence are not dispositive of his knowledge of any narcotics located in that residence.
United States v. Scofield, 433 F.3d 580 (9th Cir. 2006)

The defendant’s conviction for possession with intent to distribute was reversed on sufficiency grounds. His presence in the house where the principal distributor operated was not a sufficient basis for finding that he was in constructive possession of the drugs in the house. Mere physical proximity to the drugs was not sufficient to sustain a possession conviction.

United States v. Mendoza-Larios, 416 F.3d 872 (8th Cir. 2005)

Two defendants, driving a car owned by another person, were found guilty of possession cocaine that was hidden in a welded compartment under the air bag compartment. The Eighth Circuit holds that the evidence was insufficient to convict either defendant. There was no proof that either defendant had knowledge of the drugs that were concealed in the car. See also United States v. Aponte, 619 F.3d 799 (8th Cir. 2010), annotated above.

United States v. Hussein, 351 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2003)

Claiming that it is an issue of first impression, the First Circuit holds that it is no defense to a § 841 charge that the defendant did not know the type, or quantity of drugs that he possessed. In this case, the defendant acknowledged that he possessed a controlled substance knowingly, but claimed he did not know what type of drug, or the quantity. The First Circuit held that even post-Apprendi, this is not a defense.

United States v. King, 345 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2003)

Drug dealers convicted under §841(a) need not know the type and quantity of drugs in their possession in order to be subject to sentencing enhancements contained in § 841(b). The court notes that this holding is consistent in virtually every Circuit.

United States v. Bennafield, 287 F.3d 320 (4th Cir. 2002)

The police found cocaine inside the defendant’s car and some more on the ground outside the car where he had been stopped. This only supports one prosecution for simple possession. The simultaneous possession of separate bags of drugs only amounts to one offense of possession under 21 U.S.C. § 844(a).

United States v. Cruz, 363 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant was “hired” by a drug dealer to assault some men, but later the task was changed to “watch my back [while I finish] a deal.” This evidence was not sufficient to support a conviction of the “back-watcher” for possession with intent to distribute. While the defendant may have known that some type of crime was in progress, there was insufficient proof that he knew that it was a drug deal. See also United States v. Rodriguez, 392 F.3d 539 (2d Cir. 2004).

United States v. Cartwright, 359 F.3d 281 (3rd Cir. 2004)

The evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant was a knowing “lookout” for a drug transaction (as opposed to some other offense) and therefore his convictions for being a member of a drug conspiracy and for aiding and abetting the drug offense were reversed on sufficiency grounds. The government failed to prove that the defendant knew specifically that the illegal activity in which he was participating involved drugs rather than some other form of contraband. The court notes several other Third Circuit cases that have overturned drug conspiracy and aiding and abetting convictions because of the absence of evidence that the defendant agreed to participate in the specific crime alleged in the indictment. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Jenkins, 345 F.3d 928 (6th Cir. 2003)
The defendant received an express mail package that the police believed contained drugs. The package was delivered to the defendant’s house and shortly thereafter she was approached by the police and questioned. She denied knowing what was in the package, claiming that she was paid $50 to receive it for someone else. The police “told” her it contained drugs and she responded, “Yeah” but again denied knowing what was in the package. The government offered evidence that she admitted to being a crack cocaine user, though she denied that it came from the person to whom the package was ultimately destined. The trial court committed error in admitting the statement that she used crack cocaine. The use of cocaine is not sufficiently probative of her intent to participate in the possession with intent to distribute cocaine. The court also concluded that the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction.

United States v. Brito, 136 F.3d 397 (5th Cir. 1998)
Two substantive counts of possession of marijuana were not supported by the evidence. The defendant participated in planning the shipment of marijuana, including finding drivers for the shipment. The defendant, however, did not participate in the actual shipment. The jury was not instructed that the defendant could be found guilty on the theory of aiding and abetting, so that theory was not available to support the conviction.

United States v. Valadez-Gallegos, 162 F.3d 1256 (10th Cir. 1998)
The defendant was a passenger in a truck with an attached camper that was stopped for driving too slowly. The defendant knowing the driver’s name; and the driver denied knowing the defendant’s name. The defendant claimed to have spent a few days at the driver’s aunt’s house. A subsequent search of the camper revealed a substantial quantity of ephedrine hidden in a fake roof. Though the defendant gave numerous inconsistent (and seemingly suspicious) statements during several interviews, the Tenth Circuit concluded that there was insufficient evidence linking him to the hidden contraband in the vehicle. Presence and proximity are inadequate to support a conviction.

United States v. Hunt, 129 F.3d 739 (5th Cir. 1997)
In a search of the defendant’s apartment, the police discovered 7.998 grams of crack, some of which was cut in small quantities. A police officer testified that the smaller quantities were sufficient to distribute to “crack heads.” The remaining evidence (including expert testimony and the presence of a gun in the apartment), was not sufficient to prove the “intent to distribute” element of the charged offense. A remand to enter a judgment on the lesser offense of misdemeanor simple possession was the appropriate remedy.

United States v. Delagarza-Villarreal, 141 F.3d 133 (5th Cir. 1997)
The defendant and his co-conspirator arranged to buy marijuana from (unbeknownst to them) an undercover agent. When the defendant and his co-conspirator arrived, the agent handed the co-conspirator a 4 ½ pound brick to inspect as a sample. The co-conspirator was satisfied with the sample (which he returned to the agent) and they agreed to engage in a large transaction later. This evidence did not support a conviction for aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the marijuana. The mere inspection of the sample did not constitute possession. Because the co-conspirator never possessed the marijuana, the defendant could not be convicted of aiding and abetting his possession of the marijuana.

United States v. Stephens, 118 F.3d 479 (6th Cir. 1997)

The defendant possessed two separate quantities of cocaine on the same date, but at different locations. Even though the drugs were acquired at different times, this amounted to only one offense of possession with intent to distribute. Thus, the defendant could not receive a gun enhancement pursuant to his possession of one cache of drugs (and a gun), and a § 942(c) sentence in connection with his possession of the other cache of drugs.

United States v. Leonard, 138 F.3d 906 (11th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was a passenger in the backseat of a vehicle that was stopped on the Interstate and found to contain drugs and guns. The evidence did not support the conviction of this defendant’s conviction. No evidence linked this defendant to the drugs hidden in the tailgate, and there was no evidence that he aided and abetted the other occupants’ possession of the contraband, even if he had knowledge of the drugs hidden in the car.

United States v. Stewart, 145 F.3d 273 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was the driver of a car that was stopped on the interstate. His passenger was found to be in possession of cocaine (the car was owned by the passenger’s girlfriend). There was no evidence linking the defendant to the cocaine found in the passenger’s pants. When the defendant and the passenger were arrested and put in the back of the patrol car, they were – unbeknownst to them – taped. The passenger repeatedly chastised the defendant for speeding; but this did not establish that the defendant knew that the passenger was carrying drugs. The defendant’s conviction was reversed. The Fifth Circuit later abrogated the standard of review used in this case. United States v. Vargas-Ocampo, 747 F.3d 299 (5th Cir. 2014).

United States v. Ortega Reyna, 148 F.3d 540 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant and his family came to the border driving a pickup truck that he claimed was borrowed. Drugs were found in the tire. Though a person’s control of a vehicle supports an inference that the person knows about drugs in the vehicle, something more is required when drugs are secreted in hidden compartments. This is particularly true where, as here, the person who is driving the car borrowed the car and had only been in control of the car a short time. Moreover, the defendant did not appear nervous; he readily answered the border patrol agents’ questions; he provided neither implausible, nor inconsistent answers about the vehicle or his travels; and he did not possess a large amount of cash. The standard of review in this case was later abrogated in United States v. Vargas-Ocampo, 747 F.3d 299 (5th Cir. 2014).

United States v. Quintanar, 150 F.3d 902 (8th Cir. 1998)
The defendant apparently arranged with a source to have drugs delivered to an unsuspecting third person. When the drugs arrived at that person’s house, she arranged to have the suspicious package delivered to her at another location, where she was then with the defendant. When the package was brought to her, she promptly got in the car with the drugs and drove to the police station. The defendant’s name was not on the package and neither his name, nor address was on the package. He never touched the package. This evidence did not establish the defendant’s constructive possession of the drugs.

United States v. Clotida, 892 F.2d 1098 (1st Cir. 1989)

There was no evidence to support the defendant’s conviction of possession with intent to distribute cocaine. The defendant was the traveling partner of another individual in whose suitcase a substantial quantity of cocaine was found. There was no evidence, however, that the defendant knew that her colleague was carrying the cocaine or participated or aided and abetted in this endeavor.

United States v. Martinez, 54 F.3d 1040 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendant possessed 3-1/2 grams of cocaine, a cutting agent, a hand-held scale, and a gun. In the original panel opinion, the court held that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant possessed the drugs with the intent to distribute. 44 F.3d 148. Reconsidering this opinion, however, the court decided to defer to the jury’s verdict, which was sufficiently supported by the evidence to establish the requisite intent. The court cited other cases in which substantially greater quantities of cocaine did not establish an intent to distribute. Turner v. United States, 396 U.S. 398 (1970)(14.68 grams of cocaine); United States v. Boissoneault, 926 F.2d 230 (2d Cir. 1991)(5 grams); United States v. Gaviria, 740 F.2d 174 (2d Cir. 1984)(7 grams); United States v. Garrett, 903 F.2d 1105 (7th Cir. 1990)(1 ounce of cocaine).

United States v. Boissoneault, 926 F.2d 230 (2d Cir. 1991)

The trial court should not have allowed an agent to conclude that all of the physical evidence in the case suggested that the defendant was involved in the street level distribution of cocaine. Such a conclusion was not beyond the ken of the jury. Furthermore, even assuming the admissibility of this testimony, the evidence was insufficient to support a conviction of possession with intent to distribute. The defendant was arrested after a traffic stop. He had none of the typical paraphernalia of a distributor. He had a ledger (which the agent described as a drug accounts receivable ledger), $1,460 in cash, and 5 grams of cocaine. Only a possession offense could be upheld.

United States v. Labat, 905 F.2d 18 (2d Cir. 1990)

There was no evidence supporting the defendant’s conviction of possessing cocaine. Although the evidence was sufficient to support his conspiracy conviction, the trial judge did not instruct the jury on the law of Pinkerton, thus the Court of Appeals could not affirm the conviction on that theory.

United States v. Jenkins, 90 F.3d 814 (3rd Cir. 1996)

The police followed suspects into an apartment where they found the defendant and another individual sitting in front of a coffee table on which there was 55 grams of cocaine, scales, guns and ziplock-bags. There was no evidence linking the defendant to the drugs on the table. He was a visitor in the apartment and did not have actual possession of the drugs, nor was there evidence that he exercised dominion or control over the drugs. Mere proximity to drugs, without more, does not support a possession conviction.

United States v. Brown, 3 F.3d 673 (3d Cir. 1993)

One of the defendants in this case was convicted based on the facts that she acknowledged that the house where drugs were found was hers (though the deed to the house was in another occupant’s name); she had a key to the house; and drugs were found in various locations, including the refrigerator (though not in her room). Two other men also resided at the house. The evidence supported a conclusion that the defendant was aware of the drugs in the house and also that she was probably aware that drugs were distributed from the house. Nevertheless, the evidence was insufficient to prove that the defendant possessed the drugs in the house.

United States v. Salmon, 944 F.2d 1106 (3rd Cir. 1991)

The defendant clearly was acting as a lookout for a narcotics transaction. While the evidence showed that he knowingly acted as a lookout, there was no evidence that he knew the transaction involved the distribution of cocaine. A conviction for aiding and abetting the cocaine transaction, or for conspiring to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, could not be sustained on this evidence alone. (NOTE: The Third Circuit later issued an opinion questioning whether this case utilized the proper standard of review, United States v. Caraballo-Rodriguez, 726 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2013).

United States v. Fountain, 993 F.2d 1136 (4th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was arrested in possession of two guns and approximately 2.3 grams of marijuana. The marijuana was in three baggies, all contained within another baggie. He also had some rolling papers and some change. This evidence did not support a conviction of possession with intent to distribute. Consequently, the gun possession conviction was also reversed, as the underlying drug offense must be a trafficking offense.

United States v. Baker, 985 F.2d 1248 (4th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was charged with attempted possession with intent to distribute cocaine. He made numerous attempts to obtain money from a bank, and his supplier was arrested in possession of a kilogram of cocaine. The evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of attempting to possess that cocaine. He might have been attempting to obtain money to pay a back bill for cocaine or he might have been attempting to obtain money to flee the area (he was being sought by the sheriff and his wife). Even more importantly, it was far from clear that he intended to purchase the cocaine in order to distribute it, as opposed to consume it. With regard to the conspiracy count, moreover, the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the lesser offense of conspiracy to possess cocaine, in addition to conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute.

Goldsmith v. Witkowski, 981 F.2d 697 (4th Cir. 1992)

The evidence was insufficient to sustain defendant’s state court conviction for possessing drugs found in an apartment where the defendant was visiting. Though drugs were found in plain view throughout the house, no evidence established that the defendant exercised actual or constructive possession of the drugs.
United States v. Jones, 945 F.2d 747 (4th Cir. 1991)

The evidence did not support defendant’s conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine. Though he possessed paraphernalia consistent with the distribution of drugs, this evidence did not suffice.

United States v. Skipper, 74 F.3d 608 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was arrested after committing a motor vehicle offense (and attempting to evade the officer) and was found in possession of 2.89 grams of crack. Also in the car was a razor. The Fifth Circuit held that, as a matter of law, this evidence did not support a conviction of possession with intent to distribute. On remand, the lower court should enter a judgment of conviction on the lesser offense of simple possession.

United States v. Polk, 56 F.3d 613 (5th Cir. 1995)

Though a conspirator may be found guilty of substantive offenses committed by co-conspirators which were within the scope of the conspiracy under the Pinkerton theory, if the jury is not instructed about the Pinkerton theory, then a conviction on this theory may not be upheld. In this case, the conviction of one conspirator on one of the substantive counts was reversed because the only evidence of his participation was that his car was used in a drug transaction; however, he was not seen in the car nor was he identified as having participated in the transaction in any way.

United States v. Rosas-Fuentes, 970 F.2d 1379 (5th Cir. 1992)

No evidence supported the inference that the defendant controlled the vehicle in which marijuana was found or that he controlled the marijuana. There was no proof that the defendant even knew of the marijuana hidden in the gas tank. His possession conviction, therefore, was reversed. In addition, the government could not rely on a Pinkerton theory because there was no evidence that he knowingly entered into a conspiracy.

United States v. Sacerio, 952 F.2d 860 (5th Cir. 1992)

Defendant agreed to drive a car for a friend from Miami to New Orleans. He was stopped in Mississippi and, after consenting to a search of the car, two kilos of cocaine were discovered hidden in the car. In the meantime, defendant had requested a friend to come out and help him. When the room was searched where the defendant and his friend were located, 1/2 gram of cocaine was found. The evidence did not support the defendant’s (or his friend’s) conviction for conspiracy to possess the cocaine in the car or possession of cocaine in the car. Although some of the circumstances are suspicious, mere suspicion cannot support a verdict of guilty. It is not enough that the defendant merely associated with those participating in a conspiracy, nor is it enough that the evidence “places the defendant in a climate of activity that reeks of something foul.”

United States v. Pigrum, 922 F.2d 249 (5th Cir. 1991)

The evidence linking defendant to the possession with intent to distribute the cocaine was as follows: (1) she was present in the house where the cocaine was discovered; (2) undergarments were found in the bedroom dresser; (3) drug residue and paraphernalia were in plain view in the house; (4) when the police arrived at the scene, defendant didn’t open the door until she announced to the other occupant in the house that the police were present; and (5) an undercover purchase of cocaine had been made at the house shortly before the search. This was not sufficient evidence to support the conviction.
United States v. Garcia, 917 F.2d 1370 (5th Cir. 1990)

The evidence was insufficient to support a conviction of the defendant for possessing contraband found in a vehicle. The evidence failed to establish that the defendant ever actually or constructively possessed the marijuana. In addition, the evidence did not support an inference that he had dominion or control over either the vehicle in which the marijuana was found or the parking lot in which the vehicle was parked.

United States v. Onick, 889 F.2d 1425 (5th Cir. 1989)

There was insufficient evidence to justify the conviction of one defendant for possession to distribute heroin or cocaine. The room in which this defendant was found contained no drugs and no one testified that this defendant possessed any drugs at any time. At most, the evidence revealed that the defendant associated with another defendant who was in possession of the drugs. This evidence was not sufficient.

Young v. Guste, 849 F.2d 970 (5th Cir. 1988)

Drugs were found on a dresser that also had the defendant’s jewelry on it. This evidence alone does not show that the defendant had constructive possession of the drugs. The jewelry on the dresser only indicated that the defendant had access to the general area, not the ability to exercise dominion or control over the contents of the dresser.

United States v. Moreno-Hinojosa, 804 F.2d 845 (5th Cir. 1986)

The defendant did not constructively possess the 50 kilograms of marijuana found in the trailer of a truck in which he was a passenger. The defendant did not have the key to the tractor or trailer, none of his fingerprints were found on any of the marijuana packages, and the government agents could find no marijuana residue on any of his clothes or boots.

United States v. Ledezma, 26 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 1994)

The defendant entered into a drug conspiracy after the drugs were distributed by the principals. Though he could be found guilty of being in the conspiracy, the evidence did not support his conviction for aiding and abetting the offense.

United States v. Peters, 15 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 1994)

The police executed a search warrant at an apartment. The male was found in the bedroom, where a small quantity of cocaine and a firearm were found. A female was found downstairs, dressed in a nightgown. This evidence was insufficient to convict the female of possessing either the gun or the drugs. The evidence also failed to establish that the two were engaged in a conspiracy.

United States v. Pena, 983 F.2d 71 (6th Cir. 1993)

The evidence did not support defendant’s conviction for possession of cocaine. She was a passenger in a car containing 17 kilograms of cocaine. Though she stated that she thought something illegal was in the car, she had no specific knowledge of what it was. There was no evidence that she took any steps to assist in the transportation or delivery of the contraband. The mere fact of being a passenger in the car is not sufficient to support a conviction.

United States v. Walker, 972 F.2d 679 (6th Cir. 1992)

Defendant was charged with possession of prescription drugs. All he actually possessed, however, was the prescription. Possession of the prescription does not amount to constructive possession of the drugs.
United States v. White, 932 F.2d 588 (6th Cir. 1991)

A marijuana patch was located three feet from the trailer in which the defendant lived with others. When questioned, the defendant acknowledged knowing about the patch. This knowledge, however, is not the same as possession or the intent to possess. The property did not belong to the defendant; therefore, the evidence was insufficient to support his conviction.

United States v. Mahar, 801 F.2d 1477 (6th Cir. 1986)

A conviction for unlawful distribution of a controlled substance to a patient of a medical clinic on a particular date could not be sustained solely on the evidence that, on that date, the patient received the medicine, but was not a patient of the clinic.

United States v. Kitchen, 57 F.3d 516 (7th Cir. 1995)

The defendant was the target of a reverse sting in which the government provided the cocaine and he provided the money. At the time of the proposed transaction, the defendant brought the money and the government agent brought the cocaine. The defendant picked up the cocaine to examine it for two or three seconds and was then arrested. The court holds that this did not amount to possession, and the defendant could not be convicted for possession with intent to distribute the cocaine. There was no evidence that the defendant was about to leave in possession of the drugs, which would have explained an expeditious arrest. Even though the defendant actually had the cocaine in his hands for a moment, he did not actually possess the cocaine since he did not exercise dominion or control of the cocaine and there was no evidence that he actually considered the sale complete.

United States v. Windom, 19 F.3d 1190 (7th Cir. 1994)

In order to be convicted of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute on a constructive possession theory, the government must do more than establish “legal authority” to possess or distribute the drugs. Rather, the government must establish that defendant has the “recognized authority in his criminal milieu” to possess and determine the disposition of the contraband. In this case, the defendant was found in a house in which a backpack was found to contain heroin and cocaine. This evidence did not establish defendant’s constructive possession of the cocaine and heroin.

United States v. Manzella, 791 F.2d 1263 (7th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was a broker in a major cocaine deal, but never possessed, either constructively or actually, the cocaine involved. He could not be convicted of the substantive offense of possessing the drug with the intent to distribute. He could, however, be convicted of conspiring to distribute the drug. Furthermore, under the Pinkerton doctrine, as a conspirator, he could be held liable for the crimes of another if committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. Because the government did not rely upon the Pinkerton doctrine, the possession with intent to distribute charge was reversed.

United States v. Lopez, 42 F.3d 463 (8th Cir. 1994)

The defendant’s possession of four grams of methamphetamine which was 41% pure was not sufficient to convict the defendant of possession with intent to distribute. Neither the quantity nor the purity was sufficient to establish that the defendant did not possess the drugs for personal consumption.
United States v. Dunlap, 28 F.3d 823 (8th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was in the apartment when it was searched. He was in possession of a gun. In the house was cocaine and paraphernalia associated with the distribution of cocaine. This evidence does not support a conviction for either aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute the cocaine or for constructively possessing the cocaine with intent to distribute. The evidence equally supported the theory that the defendant was present to purchase cocaine for his own use.

United States v. Townley, 942 F.2d 1324 (8th Cir. 1991)

Defendant’s conviction for possessing cocaine with intent to distribute was reversed on sufficiency grounds. Though defendant’s fingerprints were on the tape in which the drugs were wrapped and he was photographed with other people involved in the narcotics transaction, the evidence did not show that the defendant possessed the drugs at the time and at the location alleged in the indictment.

United States v. Pace, 922 F.2d 451 (8th Cir. 1990)

Though the defendant was arrested driving a car with 200 pounds of cocaine in the trunk and in the back seat, the evidence was not sufficient to support his conviction. He testified at trial that the passenger had hired him to drive the car to Chicago and that he had no idea what was in the trunk or in the closed containers in the back seat. Although the defendant was present and was helping to commit the crime, the evidence did not establish that he knew the cocaine was present or that he was transporting the drugs.

United States v. Kearns, 61 F.3d 1422 (9th Cir. 1995)

The defendant and her co-conspirator conspired to purchase marijuana from an undercover agent. At the location of the proposed sale, the co-conspirator was arrested shortly after examining the marijuana and then showing the “seller” the buy money. Because the conspirator never had actual or constructive possession of the marijuana, a conviction for possession with intent to distribute could not be sustained.

United States v. Earl, 27 F.3d 423 (9th Cir. 1994)

The evidence failed to establish that the defendant, who was found in a house with several other individuals, exercised constructive possession of any of the drugs found in the house. The fact that he was present when drug sales were discussed and saw cocaine openly in the house is not sufficient to establish his dominion over the drugs.

United States v. Ramos-Rascon, 8 F.3d 704 (9th Cir. 1993)

Evidence that the defendants were present during discussions about a drug transaction and that they were later present when drugs were delivered to an undercover agent was insufficient to support a conviction for either conspiring to possess drugs or for aiding and abetting the possession of the drugs. After reviewing the various theories which the government advanced to support the conviction, the court wrote, “That a defendant is probably guilty is not enough. Our system works well. We can be proud of the safeguards that protect the innocent, even though they sometimes allow a guilty person to go free. No system can ensure accurate results in all cases. We learned long ago that it is better to err on the side of caution than to convict an innocent person. That historic wisdom remains true today, notwithstanding the current willingness to abandon constitutional protections in order to further the seemingly endless and potentially futile war on drugs.”

United States v. Vasquez-Chan, 978 F.2d 546 (9th Cir. 1992)

Six hundred kilograms of cocaine were seized from a house in which the defendants were temporarily residing. The massive undercover operation and surveillance had never previously identified the defendants as participants in the conspiracy. None of the other conspirators ever mentioned these defendants in conversations with undercover agents. The defendants were residing in a “stash” house. One of the defendants’ fingerprints were on the various cartons of cocaine located in the bedroom of one of the defendants, but no prints were found inside the containers. The defendants admitted knowing the drugs were in the house, but denied “possessing” the drugs. The defendant’s mere proximity to the drug, her presence on the property where it was located, and her association with the person who controls it are insufficient to support a conviction for possession. The proof failed to establish that either defendant exercised dominion or control over the cocaine. This evidence did not support defendants’ conviction of possession, aiding and abetting the possession, or conspiring to possess the cocaine. The Ninth Circuit later questioned the standard of review that was used in this case. United States v. Nevils, 598 F.3d 1158 (9th Cir. 2010).

United States v. Rubio-Villareal, 967 F.2d 294 (9th Cir. 1992)

A trial court should not give an instruction to the jury to the effect that an inference can be drawn that the driver of a vehicle knows of the existence of any contraband in the vehicle. In effect, this instruction could lead the jury to ignore other relevant facts and make a decision based solely on the facts giving rise to the inference.

United States v. Ocampo, 937 F.2d 485 (9th Cir. 1991)

The evidence did not support defendant’s conviction for possession with intent to distribute and for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute. A pickup, parked in the garage of defendant’s house, was found to contain 82 kilos of cocaine. The defendant did not have a key to the truck. Although a fingerprint of the defendant was found on one window of the truck and the defendant was seen in the company of another conspirator who was involved in the distribution of cocaine, the evidence did not support this defendant’s conviction on either a substantive or conspiracy count.

United States v. Leos-Quijada, 107 F.3d 786 (10th Cir. 1997)

The defendant’s vehicle was seen at a location that appeared suspicious. The vehicle left hurriedly. The police believed that the vehicle was at that location to meet drug couriers, so the police brought a similar vehicle to the same location and, sure enough, drug couriers approached the vehicle. This evidence was not sufficient to convict the defendant of possession with intent to distribute.

United States v. Reece, 86 F.3d 994 (10th Cir. 1996)

The police stopped a car being driven by the defendant. In the passenger’s lap were two marijuana cigarettes and a bag containing marijuana. In his pockets was cocaine. The evidence was not sufficient to convict the defendant of possession of any of the drugs, even though it was his car and he was the driver.

United States v. Jones, 49 F.3d 628 (10th Cir. 1995)

Four occupants of a rented car were stopped on the interstate. A search of the trunk revealed cocaine and a gun in the lining of the trunk. One of the occupants, in whose name the car was rented, became a government witness. She testified that, prior to leaving L.A. en route to Denver, the two male defendants, who were in the back, loaded the trunk of the vehicle. The witness did not see either of the defendants place the cocaine or the gun in the vehicle. Only speculation could support the inference that the defendants were responsible for the drugs and gun in the car, and their convictions could not be upheld on this evidence alone.

United States v. Jones, 44 F.3d 860 (10th Cir. 1995)

There was insufficient evidence to support the conviction of a passenger of a car that was transporting over 200 kilos of cocaine for either conspiracy to possess the drugs or for aiding and abetting the possession of the drugs. Throughout the interrogation of the driver on the side of the interstate, the passenger said virtually nothing; she did not have keys to the car or the trunk; she did not have any belongings in the trunk where the cocaine was; and the passenger’s fingerprints were not found on the cocaine. Even if a jury could believe that the passenger had knowledge of the drugs in the trunk, mere knowledge that the car in which she was a passenger contained cocaine does not make her a conspirator or an aider and abettor.

United States v. Puryear, 940 F.2d 602 (10th Cir. 1991)

Charged with drug trafficking, the defendant was convicted of the lesser included offense of possession of cocaine base. The jury did not determine the quantity of drugs possessed. Because possession can be either a felony or a misdemeanor under §844, the quantity is an essential element of the offense. In the absence of a jury finding, the defendant can only be sentenced for the misdemeanor offense.

United States v. Derose, 74 F.3d 1177 (11th Cir. 1996)

The government initiated a reverse sting, offering to sell marijuana to the defendants. The defendants were given a key to the trunk of a car which contained the marijuana and were told that, if they liked the product, they should drive it to a certain location. The defendant looked into the back of the car, examined the marijuana, and, as he started to walk away, was arrested. This was insufficient to convict the defendant for possession with intent to distribute. The record did not show that the defendants either physically placed marijuana in, or removed marijuana from, the back of the vehicle. The defendant did not drive the car and, in fact, it was not shown that the key given to the defendant was the ignition key. The defendant never had constructive possession of the marijuana. After he examined the marijuana, he started to walk away. There was no evidence that he approved of the product or actually consummated the transaction.

United States v. Lopez-Ramirez, 68 F.3d 438 (11th Cir. 1995)

A truck containing cocaine and an unidentified passenger drove to a house in which the defendant lived and backed up to the garage. It was not established that the defendant was the passenger. The driver was seen unloading the cocaine in the garage; the defendant was seen standing in the garage at this time. This evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant of conspiracy to possess the drugs or for possessing the drugs with intent to distribute. Mere association with a conspirator and presence in a vehicle that engages in counter-surveillance maneuvers is not sufficient to establish participation in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine or possession with intent to distribute cocaine. There was no evidence in this case that the defendant was aware of the contents of the container which was unloaded into the garage of the house where she was arrested.

United States v. Stanley, 24 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was a passenger in a car being driven by a drug distributor and which had another occupant who was involved in the distribution of drugs. Drugs that were to be distributed were in the car. This evidence, alone, did not suffice to convict the defendant of either a conspiracy or substantive offense involving the drugs.

United States v. Clavis, 956 F.2d 1079 (11th Cir. 1992)

The government sought to sustain the defendant’s possession conviction on a Pinkerton theory. However, no evidence in the record established defendant’s membership in the conspiracy at the time that the witness testified that drugs were found in the house. Defendant’s conviction for possession could not be sustained. The evidence with respect to another defendant was also insufficient. This defendant was in jail at the time the drugs were found in a house he had previously resided in. He could not be found guilty of constructive possession and could not be found guilty on a Pinkerton theory, either.

United States v. Vidal-Hungaria, 794 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1986)

The evidence was not sufficient in this case to convict the crewmembers of a vessel of conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute. The vessel was a large cargo ship that also carried substantial legitimate cargo. The marijuana was stored in hidden sealed compartments. There was no evidence that the crew participated in the loading of marijuana and no residue was found on articles of clothing or bedsheets taken from the crew quarters. No crewmembers made any inculpatory statements and no attempt was made by the vessel to elude the Coast Guard when the ship was first approached.

United States v. Fiallo-Jacome, 784 F.2d 106 (11th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was convicted on two counts (among others) of possession of a controlled substance. Both counts involved cocaine and one count involved a lengthy period of time which included the date alleged in the second count. This constitutes double punishment for the same offense since there was no evidence that there were separate possessions.

An apartment was searched and drugs and a gun were found in various places. The defendant had been the tenant in the apartment several years earlier, but had sub-let the apartment to his relatives. His fingerprint was found on a shoebox which contained drugs, but the government witnesses conceded that fingerprints remained on objects an indefinite period of time. There was no dispute that the defendant had not lived in the apartment for several years. The D.C. Court of Appeals concluded, “There can be no doubt that the evidence was insufficient to prove [defendant’s] knowledge of drugs in the house.” The Court also decried the fact that the defendant spent nearly four years in prison awaiting this decision.

The police observed one defendant sell another defendant approximately 6 grams of crack cocaine. The purchaser was arrested and was also found in possession of just over $500. Both the seller and the purchaser were convicted of possession with intent to distribute cocaine within 1,000 feet of a school in violation of 21 U.S.C. §860(a). The evidence was insufficient with respect to the purchaser. The money was apparently the money that the purchaser intended to pay for the 6 grams of cocaine he had just purchased. Moreover, the cocaine he possessed was not broken down; it was one rock and was not packaged for further distribution. Finally, in order to infer an intent to distribute based solely on the quantity possessed, the quantity possessed must significantly exceed that necessary for personal use.
United States v. Teffer, 985 F.2d 1082 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

Though the defendant arrived in D.C. with a person who was carrying crack cocaine in his pocket, this evidence did not support defendant’s conviction of possessing cocaine. It is not a crime to travel with someone who is carrying drugs, even if the person is aware that his companion is in possession of contraband. “Mere negative acquiescence in the criminal conduct of others, even with guilty knowledge, is not sufficient to establish aiding and abetting.”
DRUGS

(Precursor Sales)

United States v. Munguia, 704 F.3d 596 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with possessing pseudoephedrine knowing or having reasonable cause to believe it would be used to manufacture meth. 21 U.S.C. § 841(c)(2). The Ninth Circuit holds that “reasonable cause to believe” is to be applied in a subjective, not an objective, manner. Thus, the question is whether this defendant had reasonable cause to believe that the listed chemical was destined to be used to manufacture meth, not whether a reasonable person would have cause to believe this.

United States v. Truong, 425 F.3d 1282 (10th Cir. 2005)

The defendant worked at a Texaco station and sold pseudoephedrine pills to customers. He sold the pills in large quantities and often was paid in cash. He also purchased the pills from a man he could not identify who allowed him to pay for the pills after Truong sold them. The statutes, 21 U.S.C. § 841(c)(2), §843(6) require proof that the defendant knew, or had reasonable cause to believe that the precursor was being purchased to be used to manufacture methamphetamine. The Tenth Circuit holds that the mens rea requirement requires proof that the defendant, himself, knew what the pseudoephedrine was being purchased for, not that a reasonable person would know. While the defendant may have known that the purchasers were “up to no good” there was insufficient evidence that he knew that their intention was to manufacture methamphetamine. Even evidence that the defendant attempted to hide the fact of his sales does not satisfy the mens rea requirement.
DRUGS
(School Yard / Playground)

United States v. Guzman-Montanez, 756 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2014)

While the government proved with sufficient evidence that the location of the drug transaction was within 1,000 feet of a school, the government failed to offer sufficient evidence that the defendant knew that the transaction occurred in close proximity to the school. No pictures of the scene were shown to the jury so the jury could draw the conclusion that the defendant would have seen the school. Nor did anybody testify that the defendant would have driven right past the school on the way to the drug transaction location.

United States v. Sepulveda-Hernandez, 752 F.3d 22 (1st Cir. 2014)

The government offered insufficient evidence that the location where the defendant committed a drug offense (a basketball court) was primarily used by minors. Thus the conviction under 21 U.S.C. §860(a), which doubles the maximum sentence for committing a drug crime within 100 feet of a public or private youth center was reversed.

United States v. Martin, 544 F.3d 456 (2d Cir. 2008)

In a prosecution under 21 U.S.C. § 860, the government is not required to prove that the defendant knew that he was within 1,000 feet of a public school, or that he intended to distribute drugs within 1,000 feet of a public school. As long as the government proves that the defendant was aware that he was in possession of drugs and that he intended to distribute the drugs, the mens rea element of the offense has been established.

United States v. Rojas Alvarez, 451 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2006)

Though the government proved that the defendant participated in drug sales that occurred in proximity to a park, there was no evidence offered that the park contained at least three child play apparatus, such as swing sets, sliding boards, etc. The existence of such apparatus is a definitional requirement of a “playground” pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 869(e)(1).

United States v. Jackson, 443 F.3d 293 (3rd Cir. 2006)

Possession with intent to distribute drugs is a lesser included offense of possession with intent to distribute drugs within 1,000 feet of a school and a defendant cannot be convicted and sentenced for both offenses.

United States v. Carpenter, 422 F.3d 738 (8th Cir. 2005)

The crime of manufacturing methamphetamine is a lesser included offense of manufacturing methamphetamine within 1,000 feet of a school and consecutive sentences may not be imposed for these two offenses.

United States v. Fenton, 367 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 2004)

The offense of distribution of a controlled substance is a lesser included offense of distribution of a controlled substance within 1,000 feet of a school.

United States v. Soler, 275 F.3d 146 (1st Cir. 2002)

595
The 1,000 feet must be measured from the school to the actual site of the drug deal, not just the curtilge, or outer wall of the building in which the drug deal occurred. In this case, the evidence established that it was 963 feet from the door of the house where the drug deal occurred to the school property. This evidence was insufficient. See also United States v. Applewhite, 72 F.3d 140 (D. C. Cir. 1995).

United States v. Chandler, 125 F.3d 892 (5th Cir. 1997)

Section 860 is not simply a sentence enhancer, but rather, is a separate substantive offense. Therefore, sentencing under § 860 can only occur where the defendant is convicted of that offense. Moreover, the guideline applicable to § 860 offenses (§ 2D1.2) does not apply even if a § 841 offense occurs within 1,000 feet of a school, as long as there is no conviction for a § 860 offense.
DRUGS
(Use of Juvenile)

United States v. Lombardi, 138 F.3d 559 (5th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was a knowing participant in a drug transaction and he knowingly aided and abetted the drug offense, but the evidence did not establish that he knew that a juvenile was involved in the venture. The conviction for knowingly and intentionally employing, hiring, using, persuading, inducing, enticing, or coercing a juvenile to commit a drug offense was not supported by this evidence. To be guilty of aiding and abetting an offense (i.e., using a juvenile), the defendant must now only knowingly participate in the drug offense, but also must knowingly participate in the offense of using a juvenile.

United States v. Caronia, 703 F.3d 149 (2d Cir. 2012)

The Second Circuit holds that prosecutions based on “off-label” promotion violates the First Amendment. The defendant’s were charged with promoting the off-label use of certain drugs (i.e., promoting the use of a drug that was approved by the FDA for one purpose, but advocating its use for another purpose). While it is perfectly legal for a doctor to prescribe a drug approved for a purpose other than the use for which the FDA approved the drug, it is not legal for the drug manufacturer to promote the drug’s use for any purpose other than the approved purpose. The Second Circuit held that this violates the First Amendment.

United States v. Smith, 573 F.3d 639 (8th Cir. 2009)

On-line pharmacy prosecution. Discussion of relationship between doctor’s reasonable exercise of judgment and the mis-branding regulations in 21 C.F.R. § 1306 and other issues related to on-line pharmacies.

United States v. Goldberg, 538 F.3d 280 (3rd Cir. 2008)

The defendant was a veterinarian who sold drugs to animal owners, contending that they qualified as “vets” under state law and could receive drugs that he sold to them. The decision contains lengthy analyses of § 331(k) (misbranding) offenses. The court concluded that the defendant was guilty of misbranding, but only a misdemeanor, because there was no intent to defraud. He did what he did openly and without deception.

United States v. Geborde, 278 F.3d 926 (9th Cir. 2002)

Prior to the time that GHB was outlawed as a controlled substance, the defendant manufactured the drug and gave it to a minor, who died. The government prosecuted him for violating 21 U.S.C. § 331(p), operating an unregistered drug manufacturing facility. This is a misdemeanor, unless the government proves an intent to defraud (i.e., an intent to defraud by failing to register), in which case the defendant may be prosecuted for a felony. There was no proof of this intent, however, and the defendant’s felony conviction was reversed. In addition, the government charged the defendant with a violation of 21 U.S.C. § 331(k), which makes it a federal crime to misbrand a drug that is “held for sale.” However, the drug in this case was not “held for sale” and the convictions on these counts, too, were reversed.

United States v. Watkins, 278 F.3d 961 (9th Cir. 2002)

The felony offense of misbranding under the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. § 333(a)(2)) requires proof that the misbranding was “material.” It is not enough to simply prove that the statement is false.
DRUGS
(Distribution)

United States v. Combs, 379 F.3d 564 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant transferred waste material from his methamphetamine lab to another person solely for the purpose of disposing of the material. This conduct does not qualify as the delivery of methamphetamine.

United States v. Dunmire, 403 F.3d 722 (10th Cir. 2005)

Post-Apprendi, the government is required to prove to the jury that a certain threshold quantity of drugs is involved in an offense. In this case, for example, the government was required to prove that the defendant conspired to distribute at least fifty grams (or, as a lesser included offense, five grams) of crack cocaine. The evidence established that she actually distributed 2.97 grams, but the government argued that the surrounding circumstances established a conspiracy to distribute more. The Tenth Circuit rejected this argument, holding that there was insufficient evidence that the defendant conspired to distribute the quantity that would trigger the higher sentence.
DRUGS
(Identification of Drug)

All forms of cocaine base are not necessarily “crack cocaine.”
DUE PROCESS

The residual clause of the Armed Career Criminal Act is unconstitutionally vague. The residual clause triggers ACCA sentencing if the defendant, convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm has three or more previous convictions for a “violent felony,” a term defined to include any felony that “involves conduct that presents a serious potential risk of physical injury to another.” 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(B). The Court, having struggled with this definition for over a decade, finally decided that it was simply too vague.

Chicago's anti-gang loitering statute is unconstitutionally vague. The statute made it a crime to disobey a police officer's dispersal order, which must be directed to any person the officer believes to be a gang member or persons standing with such people, if they are loitering in any public place with no apparent purpose. The Court held that the statute was unconstitutionally vague because it failed to provide sufficient guidance to police officers to prevent arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement.

Consensual sodomy between adults in the privacy of their home may not be outlawed. Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), was overruled.

The Supreme Court upheld the child pornography pandering provision that had earlier been held unconstitutional by the Eleventh Circuit. The statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2252A(a)(3)(B) makes it a crime to solicit, or to offer to sell or distribute material that is purported to be child pornography. The Court rejected the defendant’s claim that it violates the First Amendment to make it a crime to offer or distribute material as child pornography, if, in fact, the material being offered for sale is not, in fact, child pornography. The Court also rejected a Fifth Amendment vagueness challenge.

There are three manifestations of the requirement that criminal statutes give “fair warning” of what is outlawed. First, the vagueness doctrine bars enforcement of a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application. Second, the doctrine insists that any ambiguity in a criminal statute must be resolved in favor of applying the statute only to conduct that is clearly covered. Third, although clarity may be applied by judicial gloss, due process bars courts from applying a novel construction of a criminal statute to conduct that neither the statute nor any prior judicial decision has fairly disclosed to be within its scope.

A state bar rule which prohibits an attorney from making certain extrajudicial statements to the press was void for vagueness.
Whatley v. Zatecky, 833 F.3d 762 (7th Cir. 2016)

An Indian statute made a crime to engage in a drug offense within 1000 fee of a “youth program center.” The Seventh Circuit held that the statute was unconstitutionally vague. The Due Process Clause applies not only to statutes that criminalize certain conduct, but also to sentencing enhancement statutes that increase the convictected defendant’s punishment.

MacDonald v. Moose, 710 F.3d 154 (4th Cir. 2013)

Based on the decision in Lawrence v. Texas, the Virginia statute that outlaws sodomy is unconstitutional.

Magwood v. Warden, Alabama Dept. of Corrections, 664 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2011)

The novel interpretation of Alabama’s aggravating circumstance law (which renders certain murders to be death-eligible), amounted to a “fair-warning” violation, which essentially provides that a defendant must have fair warning of the elements of a criminal offense and a novel interpretation of the law by an appellate court after the defendant’s conduct occurs that renders the conduct illegal, is a Due Process violation (not unlike an Ex Post Facto violation). See Rogers v. Tennessee, 532 U.S. 451 (2001); Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347 (1964).

Clark v. Brown, 450 F.3d 898 (9th Cir. 2006)

The state appellate court’s reinterpretation of the felony murder statute in California, and the retroactive application of that interpretation (thus making the defendant death-eligible) violated the defendant’s due process rights.

Richey v. Mitchell, 395 F.3d 660 (6th Cir. 2005)

Although a statute may be made clear by judicial gloss, due process bars courts from applying a novel construction of a criminal statute to conduct that neither the statute nor any prior judicial decision has fairly disclosed to be within its scope. See also United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259 (1997).

United States v. Albertini, 830 F.2d 985 (9th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was a frequent protester for nuclear disarmament at military bases on “open house” days. After one conviction, the Ninth Circuit held that his conduct was protected by the First Amendment. He continued to engage in these protests, in reliance on the Ninth Circuit decision and was again arrested. Subsequently, the United States Supreme Court reversed the decision of the Ninth Circuit. In the subsequent prosecution, the Court held that he had the right to rely on the Ninth Circuit decision and the prosecution was barred. A later Ninth Circuit decision overruled Albertini, on the basis of the Supreme Court decision in United States v. Rodgers, 466 U.S. 475 (1984). United States v. Qualls, 172 F.3d 1136 (9th Cir. 1999).
DUE PROCESS
(Inconsistent Prosecution Theories)

Stumpf v. Houk, 653 F.3d 426 (6th Cir. 2011)
On review after remand from the Supreme Court (see below), the Sixth Circuit again holds that the inconsistent prosecution theories tainted the death sentence and the court ordered that the writ be granted with regard to the sentence. NOTE: The Sixth Circuit vacated this decision, Stumpf v. Robinson, 722 F.3d 739 (6th Cir. 2013), holding:
Nothing misleading or deceitful happened here. The prosecution did not present a different and incomplete set of facts in support of different theories of culpability for the same crime. Cf. Thompson v. Calderon, 120 F.3d 1045, 1056 (9th Cir.1997) (en banc) (plurality opinion) (“The prosecutor presented markedly different and conflicting evidence at the two trials.”) (emphasis added), vacated on other grounds, 523 U.S. 538, 118 S.Ct. 1489, 140 L.Ed.2d 728 (1998). It did not offer different (and contradictory) testimony from the same witness in Wesley's trial, without acknowledging the contradiction. Cf. Smith v. Groose, 205 F.3d 1045, 1051 (8th Cir.2000) (“[T]he prosecutor chose at Smith's trial to use Lytle's December 2, 1983, statement to secure Smith's conviction and then later, at Cunningham's trial, elected to use Lytle's November 30, 1983, statement to secure Cunningham's conviction. Lytle's testimony constituted the only evidence of when the murders occurred and was the sole basis for two different convictions on two contradictory theories.”). And it did not omit evidence of Wesley's or Stumpf's guilt or innocence from its presentation. Cf. In re Sakarias, 35 Cal.4th 140, 25 Cal.Rptr.3d 265, 106 P.3d 931, 936–37 (2005) (discussing prosecutor's omission of key evidence in each of two prosecutions of co-defendants, leading to conviction of both).

United States v. Fulks, 683 F.3d 512 (4th Cir. 2012)
The court discusses, but rejects the applicability of the concept of inconsistent prosecution theories as a due process violation.

603
DURESS / COERCION / NECESSITY / JUSTIFICATION

Assuming that duress is a defense to possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, or by a person under indictment, it is not unconstitutional to place the burden of proving duress on the defendant.

United States v. Nwoye, 824 F.3d 1129 (D.C.Cir. 2016)

Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel by his failure to introduce expert testimony on the subject of battered spouse syndrome (the court actually only decided that the failure to present the defense was prejudicial, and remanded to the district court to decide whether counsel acted deficiently). The defendant claimed that she participated in an extortion scheme because her husband beat her and coerced her to engage in the criminal conduct. The failure to present such evidence resulted in the trial court refusing to instruct the jury on the law of duress, because of the absence of any proof of the “no reasonable alternative” prong of the duress defense’s prerequisites. With such evidence, the instruction would have been required. Thus, the defendant was prejudiced by counsel’s failure to present expert testimony on the phenomenon of battered spouse syndrome. This case includes a lengthy review of the battered spouse defense literature.

United States v. Haischer, 780 F.3d 1277 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant is entitled to present a defense of coercion, as well as a defense that she lacked the mens rea to commit the offense. The defendant in this case claimed that she suffered abuse at the hands of her boyfriend and explained that this was the basis of her coercion defense. The trial court erroneously excluded this evidence on the basis that the defendant did not admit that she committed the offense (i.e., that she knew that she was engaged in a fraudulent scheme).

United States v. Otis, 127 F.3d 829 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant, a Colombian, claimed that he engaged in a money laundering conspiracy in the United States, because members of the Cali Cartel had threatened to kidnap his father if he did not participate. The defendant testified that his father had been kidnapped once before and he reasonably feared for the safety of his family if he did not comply with the Cartel's demands. This evidence supported a duress instruction and the court's failure to instruct the jury on this defense was reversible error.

United States v. Paul, 110 F.3d 869 (2d Cir. 1997)

Duress is a defense to a charge of possession of ammunition by a convicted felon. In this case, the defendant and another individual were engaged in a fight after a poker game. The other individual had a gun. The defendant obtained possession of the gun and shot out all the bullets into the ground so that when the other fellow regained possession of the weapon, it would be empty. This testimony on the part of the defendant was sufficient to authorize a charge on the law of duress.
United States v. Paolello, 951 F.2d 537 (3rd Cir. 1991)

Charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm, the defendant requested an instruction on the defense of justification after introducing evidence that he grabbed the gun of a man who was fighting with him just prior to the police catching him with the gun. The trial court erred in failing to charge the jury on this defense. There are four elements to a justification defense in connection with a firearm charge: (1) the defendant was under unlawful and present threat of death or serious bodily injury; (2) he did not recklessly place himself in a situation where he would be forced to engage in criminal conduct; (3) he had no reasonable legal alternative to both the criminal act and the avoidance of the threatened harm; and (4) there is a direct causal relationship between the criminal action and the avoidance of the threatened harm.

United States v. Riffe, 28 F.3d 565 (6th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was an inmate at a state penitentiary. He was prosecuted for smuggling marijuana into the institution. He claimed that he did so because he had been threatened by fellow inmates that if he did not smuggle marijuana into the prison, he would be killed. The trial court erred in refusing to give a jury instruction on the defense of duress. It was not necessary for the defendant to first seek refuge from the prison authorities, because he introduced evidence that this was dangerous, because an investigation would be launched and he would be injured by the gang members for turning them in to the authorities. The trial court erroneously applied a per se rule that if a legal alternative to violating the law exists, the defendant must utilize that alternative, or the duress defense will be unavailable. See United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394 (1980). Note: In Dixon v. United States, 548 U.S. 1 (2006), the Court held that it is permissible to place the burden of proof on the defendant to prove duress (rather than requiring the government to prove the absence of duress).

United States v. Banks, 988 F.2d 1106 (11th Cir. 1993)

On retrial following the prior reversal (See 942 F.2d 1576), the trial court instructed the jury that in order to find that the defendant did not obstruct justice by refusing to testify at the grand jury based on his defense of fear of the target, the defendant was required to establish that his fear was genuine and substantiated. This improperly set up a mandatory rebuttable presumption. The government must prove a corrupt motive; the defendant is not required to prove an innocent or non-corrupt motive. Also, the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the defendant must have known or should have known, that the failure to testify would be likely as a natural and probable consequence, to obstruct the grand jury’s investigation.

United States v. Banks, 942 F.2d 1576 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was convicted of violating §1503 because of his refusal to testify at the grand jury investigating one of his previous drug suppliers. First, the court concludes that the willful refusal to give testimony to the grand jury may amount to obstruction of justice. However, the conviction in this case had to be reversed because of the trial judge’s refusal to instruct the jury on the law of “fear of reprisal.” The defendant testified that he feared for his safety and the safety of his family if he testified against the supplier. This is a valid defense to obstruction of justice, insofar as it negates the motive element of the offense.
EMBEZZLEMENT

United States v. Lequire, 672 F.3d 724 (9th Cir. 2012)

An insurance agency collected premiums from customers and at the end of each month was obligated by contract to pay the insurance company the premiums. The contract provided that the entire amount of the premiums that were due was obligated to be paid, regardless of whether the premiums were actually collected. In addition, the contract permitted the agency to commingle the funds during the course of the money with other agency money (i.e., the money was not required to be segregated or held in trust). When the agency failed to remit the premiums, the government alleged that this was embezzlement. The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that this was a breach of contract, not embezzlement.
ENTICING A MINOR FOR SEX

United States v. Laureys, 866 F.3d 432 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

Trial counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel by failing to secure expert testimony in this Internet child enticement case. An expert could have countered the testimony of the detective that anybody who drives to the location for a proposed rendezvous with a child intends to actually have sex with the minor. The expert would have testified that this is not necessarily true and than many men would go to the location intending to have sex with an adult, while continuing to fantasize about having sex with a child.

United States v. Davis, 854 F.3d 601 (9th Cir. 2017)

The defendant was charged with sexual exploitation of a minor. The indictment alleged that he recruited the child to participate in a sex video, “knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that the person had not attained the age of 18.” The jury instruction, however, the trial court instructed the jury that the knowledge requirement of the offense could be satisfied with roof that “the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to observe “the person].” This amounted to a constructive amendment of the indictment, because it provided the jury a path to conviction that was not alleged in the indictment. See also United States v. Dipentino, 242 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 2001).

United States v. Hite, 769 F.3d 1154 (D.C. Cir. 2014)

Joining every other Circuit, the DC Circuit holds that an enticement prosecution under § 2422(b) does not require that the defendant communicate directly with the child; communicating through an intermediary also constitutes enticement. Nevertheless, the communication with the intermediary must be intended to persuade the child to engage in sex, or to procure the child to have sex with the defendant. Simply communicating with an adult who says that he will “arrange” for a sexual rendezvous with a child is not sufficient. Nor is it sufficient if the communication with the adult is designed only to “cause” the child to have sex with the defendant. Rather, there must be an effort to have the intermediary induce, persuade, entice or coerce the child to have sex with the defendant.

United States v. Howard, 766 F.3d 414 (5th Cir. 2014)

The Fifth Circuit upheld the defendant’s conviction for attempted enticement of a minor to engage in sexual activity in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b). The defendant communicated with an undercover agent about having sex with the agent’s daughter. There were several communications and the defendant instructed the agent to have sexual contact with the daughter to get her ready (groomed) and also sent a nude photo of himself. However, when the agent suggested that the defendant travel to meet “her” and the daughter, he refused. The Fifth Circuit held that the evidence was sufficient to support an attempt conviction, but just barely and that this case represented the outer limit of what could be prosecuted as an attempt. Id. at 427.

United States v. Taylor, 640 F.3d 255 (7th Cir. 2011)

18 U.S.C. § 2422(b) makes it a ten-year felony for anybody who, “using a facility of interstate or foreign commerce knowingly persuades, induces, entices, or coerces andy invididual who has not attained the age of 18 years, to engage in prostitution, or any sexual activity for which any person can be charged with a criminal offense.” The term “sexual activity” is not defined. In this case, the Seventh Circuit concluded that the definition of “sexual act” which applies to crimes under 18 U.S.C. § 2246(2)(D), should apply. The conduct in this case would have amounted to a misdemeanor under Indiana law (i.e., masturbation). The Seventh Circuit determined that it would make no sense to impose a ten-year mandatory minimum sentence for conduct which does not involve a “sexual act,” and only meets undefined term “sexual activity” which could even apply to conduct which involves no touching at all.

United States v. Broxmeyer, 616 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. § 2423, transporting a minor in interstate commerce with intent that the individual engaged in any sexual activity for which any person can be charged with a criminal offense. This statute is the offspring of the original Mann Act, which dealt primarily with transporting prostitutes across state lines. In this case, the defendant was a field hockey coach who was charged with transporting one of his players (a minor) across state lines in connection with a practice and engaging in sexual conduct with her. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction, because there was insufficient evidence to support the government’s theory that the defendant caused the defendant to travel across state lines with regard to the trip to the practice (her father drove her to the practice and was available to pick her up the next day, so the defendant was not the cause of her interstate travel). The defendant did eventually drive the minor back home after practice and during the return trip, they engaged in sexual conduct. However, the evidence established that the sexual conduct occurred prior to the crossing of a state line and in order to be guilty of a § 2423 offense, the defendant must form the intent to engage in sexual conduct before crossing the state line and then engage in the sexual conduct after crossing the state line.

United States v. Joseph, 542 F.3d 13 (2d Cir. 2008)

The trial court instructed the jury that an enticement offense (18 U.S.C. § 2422(b)) could be found if the defendant made the possibility of having sex with the defendant more appealing. In other words, if the defendant, over the Internet, was communicating with (what he thought was) a young girl, and made the possibility of having sex with him appealing, this would constitute enticement. The Second Circuit reversed. “Enticement” is not the same as “making more appealing.”

United States v. Gladish, 536 F.3d 646 (7th Cir. 2008)

The defendant communicated with a person he believed was a young girl (actually an undercover agent) in an Internet chatroom. He suggested that at some point in the future, they should engage in sex. The Seventh Circuit held that this “hot air” did not qualify as enticement to engage in prohibited sexual activity in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2422(b). Equating the enticement statute to an attempted crime, the court held that such talk did not involve a “substantial step” toward the commission of the crime. Judge Posner quoted T.S. Elliot: “Between the Conception; And the Creation; Between the Emotion; And the Response; Falls the Shadow.”
ENTRAPMENT

The evidence in this case established entrapment as a matter of law. Government agents repeatedly, over the course of two years, urged the defendant to order child pornography. When the defendant finally ordered the magazines, the agents arrested him.

The Court holds that the defendant is entitled to present inconsistent defenses, including “I didn’t do it” and “If I did I was entrapped.”

United States v. Dennis, 826 F.3d 683 (3rd Cir. 2016)

At the urging of the ATF, an informant convinced the defendant to engage in some faux drug robberies. This reverse sting involved repeated efforts to enlist the defendant’s help: the informant explained to the defendant that he needed the money to help his mother who had cancer. The informant also told the defendant that they could net more than $1 million. Though the defendant had, in fact, committed crimes with the informant previously and despite the fact that the defendant recruited others to also participate in the robbery, he was entitled to an entrapment instruction and the trial court committed reversible error in declining to instruct the jury on this defense. Regarding predisposition, the defendant’s prior crimes did not involve violent crimes, so the threshold for a jury instruction on the entrapment defense was met.

United States v. Rutgerson, 822 F.3d 1223 (11th Cir. 2016)

Generally, specific acts of good conduct are not admissible as character evidence. However, if a person’s character, or trait of character is an essential element of a claim or defense, then specific acts are admissible. F.R.E. 405(b). In this case, the court held that when a defendant asserts an entrapment defense, Rule 405(b) applies and the defendant is entitled to present specific acts of good conduct (that show an absence of predisposition to commit the crime).

United States v. Pedrin, 797 F.3d 792 (9th Cir. 2015)

This is another of the stash house sting cases (see, Black, annotated below). The Ninth Circuit upheld the conviction, but Judge Noonan, like Judge Rienhardt in Black, decried the entire operation and the prosecution of the defendant who was nor suspected of having had any involvement in any robberies before he was “invited” to participate in this offense.

United States v. Barta, 776 F.3d 931 (7th Cir. 2015)

The conduct of the government agent in persisting encouraging the defendant to accept a bribe amounted to entrapment as a matter of law. “The government is supposed to catch criminals not create them.” It is not just the number of contacts between the undercover agent and the defendant that controls. The frequency of the contacts, the continuous offering of “sweeteners” to a bribe that the defendant already turned down, the number of unanswered or unreturned calls – all of these are factors in deciding whether the government’s conduct amount to improper inducement. The persistence of the government is what matters.
United States v. Mayfield, 771 F.3d 417 (7th Cir. 2014)

In this en banc decision, the Seventh Circuit reversed the trial court’s pretrial decision (ruling on a government motion in limine) to bar the entrapment defense. In a lengthy decision, the appellate court explained in great detail the relationship between the concepts of predisposition and inducement, noting at one point that even a person who is predisposed can be entrapped. The court also held that when ruling on the availability of the entrapment defense pretrial, the court must assume the truthfulness of the defendant’s proffer and not balance it against any competing proffer by the government: the jury must decide if the defendant’s evidence of entrapment is valid and the trial judge may not engage in fact finding based on disputed evidence prior to trial.

United States v. Kopstein, 759 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2014)

Though the defendant did not deny possessing child pornography, he defended against distribution charges on the basis that he was entrapped by the undercover agent to send the images to him. The defendant believed he was chatting with a young girl who repeatedly asked him to send “her” images of child pornography. The defendant finally agreed to do so. The trial court’s initial entrapment charge to the jury was appropriate and in conformity with Second Circuit law. The instructions became confusing, however, when the court also instructed the jury that if it found that the defendant did not distribute the pornography, it could find the defendant guilty of the lesser included offense of possession. But this was not correct, because even if the defendant did distribute the pornography, he could be found not guilty based on entrapment. The confusion was compounded by supplemental instructions that were inconsistent in connection with the burden of proof regarding the initial inducement phase of the entrapment defense.

United States v. McGill, 754 F.3d 452 (7th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with distributing child pornography. He claimed that he was entrapped by an informant who asked him to give him child pornography on a flash drive. The trial court declined to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment, because there was evidence that the defendant already possessed child pornography, he attended a party at which others shared child pornography, and there was inadequate proof of coercion. The Seventh Circuit reversed: the evidence was sufficient to authorize an entrapment instruction because there was no evidence of predisposition to distribute child pornography prior to the informant’s solicitation of the child pornography from the defendant and the informant’s persistence in getting the child pornography from the defendant was sufficiently coercive and relentless that an entrapment instruction was authorized. In addition, the informant was a friend of the defendant (who had been arrested) and the government’s exploitation of a friend of the defendant to induce the defendant to commit a crime is a relevant factor to consider in deciding whether there was sufficient evidence of coercion.

United States v. Black, 750 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2014)

This decision contains a noteworthy dissent to the denial of a request for rehearing en banc. Judge Reinhardt posed the question: “Whether the government may target poor, minority neighborhoods and seek to tempt their residents to commit crimes that might well result in their escape from poverty[?]” He then noted, “These cases force us to consider the continued vitality of the outrageous government conduct doctrine itself.” The case involves the use of a CI, who was instructed by the government to go to Phoenix and recruit random people to help rob a non-existent cocaine stash house. The CI went to a bad part of town and looked for people who looked like bad guys. When the defendant said he was interested, the CI introduced him to the undercover agent who told the defendant about the large quantity of cocaine at the fictitious stash house (thus driving up the Guideline calculation). Judge Reinhardt emphasized numerous problems with this operation, including its inception: The CI was sent to look for “bad guys” in a “bad part of town,” i.e., a minority neighborhood. This was an open invitation to racial discrimination. The CI was not told to invite known or suspected criminals to get involved in the stash house robbery. This dissenting opinion contains a wealth of quotable observations, including, “The government verges too close to tyranny when it sends its agents trolling through bars, tempts people to engage in criminal conduct, and locks them up for unconscionable periods of time when they fall for the scheme. . . In this era of mass incarceration, in which we already lock up more of our population than any other nation on Earth, it is especially curious that the government feels compelled to invent fake crimes and imprison people for long periods of time for agreeing to participate in them – people who but for the government’s scheme might have ever entered the world of major felonies. Of course, the government also controls the (often extraordinarily long) amount of time that its targets spend in prison after reverse sting operations, as it can specify the amount of drugs involved in the fake conspiracies.” Chief Judge Kozinski joined this dissent.

United States v. Cortes, 757 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2014)

The decision in Alleyne v. United States provides that a mandatory minimum sentence may only be triggered if proof of the drug quantity was proven to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. In this case, the Ninth Circuit holds that a “sentencing entrapment” claim must also be submitted to the jury: thus, if the defendant claims that the amount of drugs was increased by the undercover agent in order to trigger the mandatory minimum and the defendant would not have participated in a transaction of that magnitude, the jury must be instructed on that “defense.” In a separate holding the appellate court held that the jury should be instructed that while the amount of profit that a defendant anticipates cannot alone establish the defense of entrapment, if the profit is offered solely by the government, this is a factor that may be considered in deciding whether the government induced the criminal conduct.

United States v. Pillado, 656 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 2011)

The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment. The trial court held that there was no evidence of “extraordinary inducement” and that the defendant could have simply “walked away.” But these are not the proper standards for evaluating whether a defense entrapment is available. The trial court failed to begin with an analysis of whether there was any evidence of predisposition. Though the entrapment defense is a two-part test, both prongs must be considered in evaluating whether the defense is available. The absence of any predisposition “informs” the inducement inquiry, as well. The purpose of the entrapment defense is to ensure that a person with no predisposition is not transformed into a criminal by the government. A person with no predisposition whatsoever is not required to prove that the government used extraordinary inducement to persuade him to commit a crime. There was sufficient evidence of “persuasion” in the record to support an entrapment instruction in this case.
United States v. Theagene, 565 F.3d 911 (5th Cir. 2009)

The defendant was entitled to an entrapment instruction in this case involving an allegation of bribing an IRS revenue agent. There was sufficient evidence in the trial to support a jury’s determination that the defendant was not predisposed to commit the offense and that the agent encouraged the defendant to bribe him. Evidence of inducement was supplied by a single telephone call in which the agent steered the conversation toward bribery as a solution to the tax delinquency problem. Failing to instruct the jury on this defense was reversible error.

United States v. Luisi, 482 F.3d 43 (1st Cir. 2007)

The court discusses the concept of vicarious or third-party entrapment. In this case, the government targeted the defendant, Luisi. Efforts by an informant to induce Luisi to commit the crime were unsuccessful, so the middleman utilized the services of another person (a mob boss) to pressure the Luisi to commit the crime. The First Circuit concludes that in this situation, the defendant is entitled to an entrapment instruction. This is not a case in which a pressured defendant employs the services of an unsuspecting but willing participant, in which case the unsuspecting but willing participant could not claim entrapment. In this case, the target of the government’s pressure tactics was the defendant, even though the person who ultimately put the pressure on the defendant was not himself acting at the direction of the government.

United States v. Sandoval-Mendoza, 472 F.3d 645 (9th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from introducing expert medical testimony that the defendant’s medical condition (brain damage caused by pituitary tumor) rendered him unusually susceptible to “inducement” in this entrapment-defense case. The fact that doctors disagreed about the defendant’s medical condition did not mean that the defendant’s expert testimony was inadmissible. Medical testimony that a medical condition renders a person unusually vulnerable to inducement is highly relevant to an entrapment defense and should not have been excluded.

Bradley v. Duncan, 315 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2002)

The state trial court’s failure to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment amounted to a due process violation and the Ninth Circuit ordered that the petitioner’s § 2254 petition should have been granted. The defendant helped a decoy who was addicted and going through withdrawal, purchase a small amount of drugs. The Ninth Circuit held that the right to have the jury instructed on a defense provided by state law is protected by the Due Process Clause.

United States v. Mendoza-Prado, 314 F.3d 1099 (9th Cir. 2002)

When a defendant relies on an entrapment defense, Rule 405 allows him to introduce good character evidence. In this case, the government argued the converse: when the defendant relies on an entrapment defense, the government should be permitted to introduce any prior crime evidence, including unrelated crimes. The Ninth Circuit disagreed: Different inferences are drawn regarding predisposition from evidence of bad character and from evidence of good character. In short, the government is limited to introducing evidence of predisposition to commit a similar offense, not any criminal offense. The defendant, on the other hand, may introduce evidence of general good character.
In an entrapment case, the defendant is entitled, pursuant to both Rules 404(b) and 405(b) to introduce evidence of his lack of criminal record – that is, his good character. The defendant's "character" is relevant in an entrapment case on the issue of predisposition.

The trial court failed to instruct the jury in connection with the entrapment instruction that the government had the burden of disproving entrapment. That is, in order to convict the defendant who has raises an entrapment defense, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was predisposed to commit the crime. The failure to instruct the jury on this principle was plain error requiring reversal of the conviction. The trial court also erred in failing to adequately answer jury questions about the status of "agents" (such as non-government employees who were acting as informants) in connection with the entrapment defense. The jury repeatedly asked if certain informants who were acting on behalf of the government were "agents" within the definition of the entrapment defense. Failing to answer these questions was reversible error.

The jury could have found that an IRS agent repeatedly baited the defendant into paying her a bribe, and that the defendant repeatedly ignored these requests. Given these reasonable inferences, the trial court erred in deciding that no entrapment instruction would be given to the jury.

The trial court gave the improper pre-Jacobson entrapment instruction that improperly explained the burden of proof with regard to the element of predisposition.

The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. § 2423(b) – traveling in interstate commerce for the purpose of engaging in a sexual act with a person under the age of 18. This case began with a “sting” operation in which a police officer posed as a “mother” on the internet, seeking a man to “educate” her children about sex. The defendant was clearly on a “different wavelength” than the police, seeking adult companionship. The police officer’s artifice, however, induced the defendant to come to meet the undercover officer with children. The trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment.

In considering the improper inducement component of an entrapment defense, the jury may consider whether the undercover informant induced the defendant by claiming that she would lose her children if he did not help her acquire cocaine. The trial court in this case erred in failing to instruct the jury specifically on this point, that is, that an appeal to sympathy may amount to improper inducement.
United States v. Joost, 92 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 1996)

The defendant was the target of an undercover operation for several months, focusing first on counterfeit slot machine tokens. During the undercover operation, the police, on several occasions asked the defendant to furnish them with a weapon (the defendant was a convicted felon, so his possession of a weapon would be a felony), a request he eventually satisfied. The trial court erred in denying a request to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment. Though the police never used force, or undue persuasion to induce the defendant to obtain the gun, their request persisted for over three months before he finally acquiesced. Also, the police were aware of the defendant’s dire financial situation and used that “weakness” to induce him to produce a firearm for them. Finally, the calls from the agents were persistent, constant and frequent.

United States v. Rodriguez, 858 F.2d 809 (1st Cir. 1988)

If there is support for the defendant’s claim that the government induced the commission of the crimes and the defendant lacked predisposition, the defendant is entitled to a jury instruction on entrapment. In this case, a reasonable juror could have determined that the defendant was entrapped and the trial court erred in refusing to give a requested entrapment instruction.

United States v. Bradley, 820 F.2d 3 (1st Cir. 1987)

An informant in jail threatened a cellmate with physical injury if he did not obtain cocaine for him. The cocaine was provided to a guard at the jail who then arrested the defendant. The Court holds that this presents a valid claim of entrapment. However, the individual who supplied the cocaine to the defendant, even though he was aware of the threats on the defendant’s life, could not avail himself of the entrapment defense.

United States v. Khubani, 791 F.2d 260 (2d Cir. 1986)

Whether initial entrapment extends through a series of crimes is a question of fact for the jury.

United States v. Berkery, 889 F.2d 1281 (3rd Cir. 1989)

It was reversible error to require the defendant to admit to all elements of a conspiracy before allowing him to argue entrapment to the jury.

United States v. Fedroff, 874 F.2d 178 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The defendant offered sufficient evidence to permit a jury instruction on the law of entrapment. Though the evidence was weak on the government’s coercive efforts to get the defendant to commit the crime, they did “wine and dine” him and otherwise deceive him in an effort to convince him to accept a kickback.

United States v. Pervez, 871 F.2d 310 (3rd Cir. 1989)

Under the decision in Mathews, it was error to require the defendant to admit to all elements of the offense prior to issuing the jury instruction on the law of entrapment.

United States v. Bradfield, 113 F.3d 515 (5th Cir. 1997)

In order to have the jury instructed on the defense of entrapment, the defendant must provide, at the least, a basis for a reasonable doubt on the ultimate issue of whether criminal intent originated with the government. The defendant satisfied this standard in this case and the trial court erred in denying his request for an entrapment instruction. The defendant is not required to prove that the government used threats or coercion; he is only required to show that he was not predisposed to commit the offense before first being approached by government agents.

United States v. Sandoval, 20 F.3d 134 (5th Cir. 1994)

The government failed to rebut the defense of entrapment and the defendant was entitled to be acquitted as a matter of law. The IRS agent approached the defendant about a tax liability. The defendant suggested a “deal.” The agent decided that this meant a “bribe” and pursued the request doggedly. At the next meeting, the defendant offered to provide information about other criminals in hope of receiving a reward, but the agent steered the defendant towards something which could benefit her (the agent), commenting that “information is not enough.” The agent then specifically asked that the defendant “scratch her back and I’ll scratch yours.” They later agreed on a cash payoff. This amounted to entrapment as a matter of law. The government failed to show any evidence of predisposition. Although an eager acceptance of an opportunity to commit some illegal act may prove predisposition, Jacobson clarified the boundaries of such substituted proof, rejecting it where significant and persistent government encouragement was required to induce the crime.

United States v. Kang, 934 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1991)

It was reversible error to permit a prosecutor to argue to the jury that hearsay evidence admitted for the sole purpose of explaining an agent’s conduct (in initiating an investigation) was substantive evidence of the defendant’s predisposition to commit the offense. The evidence was admitted for a limited purpose and it could not be used for another purpose in the closing argument.

United States v. Cantu, 876 F.2d 1134 (5th Cir. 1989)

It was error to exclude as hearsay statements made by an informant to the defendant. The statements were offered to demonstrate the defendant’s state of mind, and to support his entrapment defense, not for the truth of the matter asserted.

United States v. Newman, 849 F.2d 156 (5th Cir. 1988)

The defendant raised an entrapment defense and sought to introduce expert testimony as to a mental disease, or subnormal intelligence making him peculiarly susceptible to inducement. The Court holds that such evidence is admissible, however, the defendant in this case failed to make a sufficient proffer and reversal was not required.

United States v. Robinson, 887 F.2d 651 (6th Cir. 1989)

The trial court erred in requiring the defendant to admit the elements of the offense prior to getting an entrapment instruction.

United States v. Graham, 856 F.2d 756 (6th Cir. 1988)

The decision in Mathews v. United States is retroactive. Thus, it was reversible error for the trial court to refuse an entrapment instruction solely on the basis that the defendant had not admitted all elements of the offense.

United States v. Hollingsworth, 27 F.3d 1196 (7th Cir. 1994) (en banc)

Rehearing this entrapment case (en banc), the Seventh Circuit again holds that Jacobson requires the government to prove that the defendant was ready, willing and able to commit the offense in order to rebut the claim of entrapment. Mere willingness, alone, is not sufficient to establish predisposition. The key to Jacobson is the definition of entrapment as being, “the apprehension of an otherwise law-abiding citizen who, if left to his own devices, likely would have never run afoul of the law.” A politician is ready and able to take a bribe; a drug addict is capable of selling drugs. Predisposition in those cases only requires a showing of willingness. But here, the defendants were not ready or capable of being international money launderers without the aid of the government.

United States v. Hollingsworth, 9 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 1993)

In a sweeping review of the entrapment defense, the Seventh Circuit holds that the government’s burden in defeating an entrapment defense is not satisfied merely by showing that the defendant was willing to commit the crime; rather, the government must prove that the defendant was “ready” to commit the crime – that he was poised and likely to commit the crime. Here, the defendants were inept, incapable international money launderers. The government provided the means and the wherewithal to commit the offense. The court holds that the government “turned a harmless man with impure thoughts into a felon.” Relying on Jacobson, the court observed, “The federal government shall not use its resources to increase the criminal population by inducing people to commit crimes who otherwise would not do so... [T]he proper use of the criminal law in a liberal society is to regulate potentially harmful conduct for the protection of society, rather than to purify minds and to perfect character. A person who would not commit a crime unless induced to do so by the government is not a threat to society and the criminal law has no proper concern with him, however evil his thoughts or deficient his character.” The Seventh Circuit then re-heard the case en banc. See supra.

United States v. Fusko, 869 F.2d 1048 (7th Cir. 1989)

The defendant’s crime in defrauding her insurer was first suggested by a friend who was an undercover confidential informant for the FBI. She claimed at trial that her friend’s persuasion overcame her initial reluctance to commit the offense. This is sufficient to authorize an entrapment instruction.

United States v. Martinez, 122 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 1997)

Despite being recruited by an undercover informant on several occasions to sell drugs, the defendant resisted. Eventually, however, he acquiesced. The informant taught the defendant how to sell drugs, promised him great wealth and reassured him not to worry about the police. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the defendant established the defense of entrapment as a matter of law.

United States v. Rameriz-Rangel, 103 F.3d 1501 (9th Cir. 1996)

Numerous decisions have discussed the concept of sentencing entrapment under the Sentencing Guidelines and the Guidelines themselves now provide for cases in which the government supplies more drugs than the defendant could afford in order to increase the base offense level. In this case, however, the sentence was for violating 18 U.S.C. §924(c), using a firearm in connection with a drug offense. The defendant agreed to receive firearms in exchange for drugs, which does amount to a §924(c) violation. What the government supplied, however (and arguably without any knowledge or intent on the part of the defendant) was machine guns, a 924(c) violation which carries a fifteen year sentence, rather than the five year sentence for a §924(c) violation involving a normal gun. The court holds that the lower court should determine whether the defendant negotiated for, or knew that machine guns would be supplied. If not, then only a five-year sentence should be imposed.
United States v. Reece, 60 F.3d 660 (9th Cir. 1995)

The trial court failed to instruct the jury properly on the entrapment defense. The instruction failed to explain that the jury could convict the defendant only if the government proved beyond a reasonable doubt “that the defendant was disposed to commit the criminal act prior to first being approached by government agents.”

United States v. Sterner, 23 F.3d 250 (9th Cir. 1994)

The trial court instructed the jury on the law of entrapment as follows: “Where a person has no previous intent or purpose to violate the law, but is induced or persuaded by law enforcement officers or their agents to commit a crime, he is a victim of entrapment, and as a matter of policy, the law forbids his conviction in such a case. On the other hand, where a person already has the readiness and willingness to break the law, the mere fact that government agents provide what appears to be favorable opportunity is not entrapment.” This was reversible error. The use of the term “already” in the second sentence is ambiguous and does not adequately advise the jury that the predisposition must exist prior to the inducement offered by the government. The jury could have erroneously believed that even if the defendant was not initially disposed to commit the crime, he could develop such a disposition during the later course of interacting with the government informant and still be guilty.

United States v. Lessard, 17 F.3d 303 (9th Cir. 1994)

As in the Mkhsian case, the trial court did not make it clear that if the defendant was initially entrapped, then his continued participation in the scheme would be tainted by the same entrapment. That is, “a defendant who is initially entrapped by the government cannot then become unentrapped during the same course of conduct.” The government must prove that the predisposition existed prior to the initial government involvement. The jury must be clearly instructed that if the defendant was not initially disposed to commit the crime, it would still be entrapment if he later developed such a disposition during the later course of interacting with the government informant.

United States v. Mkhsian, 5 F.3d 1306 (9th Cir. 1993)

The trial court’s entrapment instruction did not clearly explain that the defendant must have been predisposed prior to meeting with the government agents in order to find that he was not entrapped. The court’s instruction could have been understood by the jury to mean that if the defendant developed the disposition during his dealings with the agents, he was not entrapped. Under Jacobson, a person has been entrapped if he was not predisposed to commit the offense prior to being approached by the government.

United States v. Kessee, 992 F.2d 1001 (9th Cir. 1993)

The defendant testified that he had never previously been involved in the sale of cocaine; that he initially refused to sell drugs for the informant; that he eventually consented after he lost his job and needed food for his family. Though he was impeached during cross-examination and it was evident that he was conversant in the drug trade, it was reversible error to fail to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment. The jury, not the trial judge, must make the credibility decisions whether to accept the defendant’s version of the offense.

United States v. Becerra, 992 F.2d 960 (9th Cir. 1993)

The trial court erred in refusing to give an entrapment instruction to the jury. The defendant’s testimony – claiming that the undercover agent contacted him over forty times in a three-month period to convince him to find cocaine, and claiming to be from the New York Mafia – was sufficient to raise the defense.

United States v. Skarie, 971 F.2d 317 (9th Cir. 1992)

The defendant was entrapped as a matter of law. There was insufficient evidence of predisposition offered by the government – the fact that the defendant admitted to using drugs in the past was not determinative of predisposition – and the proof established that the informant threatened the defendant, as well as her son, in an effort to persuade her to engage in a methamphetamine transaction.

United States v. Tallmadge, 829 F.2d 767 (9th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was advised by a federally licensed firearms dealer that the defendant could purchase a firearm despite his prior conviction of a felony because the felony conviction was reduced to a misdemeanor. This was incorrect advice. Nevertheless, by the doctrine of entrapment by estoppel, the defendant could not be convicted of possessing a weapon after having been convicted of a felony.

United States v. Beal, 961 F.2d 1512 (10th Cir. 1992)

Defendant was acquitted on one count of distributing cocaine, but convicted of another. He defended both counts on the basis that he was entrapped. The second sale occurred approximately twenty-four hours after the first sale. The trial court’s decision to grant a post-verdict motion for judgement of acquittal was affirmed by the appellate court. The discreet acts of the defendant were part of the same continuum of events motivated by the same governmental influence.

United States v. Collazo, 885 F.2d 813 (11th Cir. 1989)

In this entrapment case, the trial court improperly advised the jury that a defendant must come forward with evidence that the government’s conduct created a substantial risk that the offense would be committed by a person other than one ready to commit it. This is a preliminary legal question which the judge must determine and not a question which is submitted to the jury. The instruction improperly suggested that the defendant had a burden to establish the entrapment defense. Reversal was required.

Though not applicable in this case, the D.C. Circuit holds that in certain circumstances, a defendant is entitled to an instruction on the law of derivative entrapment. This occurs where the government induces one person to commit a crime and that person, not acting knowingly as a government agent, induces another person (the defendant) to commit the crime. Thus, the defendant is induced by someone who is not knowingly acting at the behest of the government. To apply the concept of derivative entrapment, the government must direct the unwitting agent to induce others – specific others.
ENTRAPMENT BY ESTOPPEL

United States v. Giffen, 473 F.3d 30 (2d Cir. 2006)

The Second Circuit discusses at some length – all of which is dicta – the concept of entrapment by estoppel and the defense of “public authority.”

United States v. Batterjee, 361 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was not a citizen and, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(5)(B) was not permitted to possess a firearm. When he went to a store to buy a gun, the dealer asked certain questions, each of which the defendant answered accurately – including the fact that he was not a citizen – and filled out the required forms accurately, as well. The dealer followed up with certain questions relating to his citizenship answer and then sold him the gun. The dealer did not specifically ask, however, whether the defendant was in the United States on a work visa (which was what disqualified him for possessing a firearm). The Ninth Circuit held that the prosecution was barred under the theory of entrapment by estoppel.

United States v. Abcasis, 45 F.3d 39 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendants claimed that they had been informants for the DEA and engaged in a narcotics smuggling operation, believing that this was authorized by their informant status. The trial court erred in denying their request for an instruction on the law of entrapment by estoppel. In order to be entitled to this instruction, the defendant must show that his reliance on the government agent’s statement was reasonable in that “a person sincerely desirous of obeying the law would have accepted the information as true, and would not have been put on notice to make further inquiries.” In essence, the defendant must show that although he was mistaken, in good faith he believed that his conduct was authorized by the law enforcement agent with whom he was working.

United States v. Albertini, 830 F.2d 985 (9th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was a frequent protester for nuclear disarmament at military bases on “open house” days. After one conviction, the Ninth Circuit held that his conduct was protected by the First Amendment. He continued to engage in these protests, in reliance on the Ninth Circuit decision and was again arrested. Subsequently, the United States Supreme Court reversed the decision of the Ninth Circuit. In the subsequent prosecution, the Court held that he had the right to rely on the Ninth Circuit decision and the prosecution was barred. A later Ninth Circuit decision overruled Albertini, on the basis of the Supreme Court decision in United States v. Rodgers, 466 U.S. 475 (1984). United States v. Qualls, 172 F.3d 1136 (9th Cir. 1999).

United States v. Tallmadge, 829 F.2d 767 (9th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was advised by a federally licensed firearms dealer that the defendant could purchase a firearm despite his prior conviction of a felony because the felony conviction was reduced to a misdemeanor. This was incorrect advice. Nevertheless, by the doctrine of entrapment by estoppel, the defendant could not be convicted of possessing a weapon after having been convicted of a felony.

620
United States v. Thompson, 25 F.3d 1558 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was a convicted felon. For several years, he acted as an informant for the government, including the FBI and the ATF. In this prosecution for being a felon in possession of a firearm, he sought to rely on an entrapment by estoppel defense. The trial court incorrectly held that this was not a legal defense to a §922 charge. See e.g., Lewis v. United States, 445 U.S. 55 (1980); United States v. Billue, 994 F.2d 1562 (11th Cir. 1993). Entrapment by estoppel focuses on the actions of the government officials, not the state of mind (or predisposition) of the defendant. Entrapment by estoppel applies when an official tells a defendant that certain conduct is legal and the defendant believes that official. Because the defense rests on principles of fairness, it may be raised even in strict liability offense cases. Finally, the defendant’s proffer was sufficient to justify submitting the evidence to the jury. If there is any basis to support the defense, the jury should have been permitted to hear the testimony and weigh the evidence itself. Even if the defendant’s testimony regarding the alleged conduct of the officials authorizing his possession was not credible, as the government asserts and the district court found, it is the jury’s, not the district court’s, function to determine questions of credibility and assess the defendant’s testimony.

United States v. Hedges, 912 F.2d 1397 (11th Cir. 1990)

18 U.S.C. §208(a) is a strict liability offense. One who takes government action while having a conflicting financial interest is guilty of the offense even if he has no intent to violate the statute. However, in this case, the conviction had to be reversed because the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on the law of entrapment by estoppel. The defendant asked his Standards of Conduct Counselor to counsel him about the transactions in which he was engaged. Entrapment by estoppel applies when an official tells a defendant that certain conduct is legal and the defendant believes that official. This defense applies even in cases of strict liability, because entrapment does not negate the intent element of an offense, it relies on the principle of fairness.
ENVIRONMENTAL CRIMES

United States v. Wilson, 133 F.3d 251 (4th Cir. 1997)

The Clean Water Act does not authorize prosecutions where the water being polluted has not been shown to either be navigable, or affect interstate commerce. Regulations promulgated pursuant to the Act which outlaw polluting intrastate non-navigable waters that could affect interstate commerce, were not authorized by the Act and are not constitutional.
ESCAPE

United States v. Burke, 694 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir 2012)

The defendant’s failure to return to a residential re-entry center did no amount to the crime of escape under 18 U.S.C. § 751(a).

United States v. Rosa-Ortiz, 348 F.3d 33 (1st Cir. 2003)

The federal escape statute does not apply to people who are in federal custody solely on the basis of a material witness warrant.
EVIDENCE

(Charts and Summaries)

United States v. Adejumo, 772 F.3d 513 (8th Cir. 2014)

At the beginning of trial, the prosecution exhibited a chart to the jury that portrayed all the defendants, and included their nicknames and their “role” in the conspiracy (for example, “Foot Soldier”). The first witness, a government agent, was permitted to summarize each defendant’s role in the alleged conspiracy, after which the government was allowed to admit the chart into evidence. The Eighth Circuit found the captions to be particularly offensive. Admitting the chart was error, though harmless.

United States v. Groysman, 766 F.3d 147 (2d Cir. 2014)

The Second Circuit reversed this health care fraud conviction on the basis of several “egregious” evidentiary errors committed at trial. The defendant was charged with conspiring with a company that supplied durable medical equipment to prepare false invoices. The wholesaler was cooperating and taped many of the conversations, though many were inaudible. The government offered testimony from its case agent for several days at the start of trial. The agent (1) offered inadmissible bolstering testimony by testifying that certain transactions occurred, based only on his interviews of the cooperators – he had no personal knowledge to verify that these transactions occurred; (2) offered a summary chart which was not a summary of voluminous evidence, but simply a recitation of what he was supposedly told by the cooperators, thus violating both the hearsay rules and the bolstering rules and the rule governing the admissibility of summary charts; (3) the use of the agent to summarize the case at the outset was improper because it amounted to opinion testimony. The Second Circuit, as noted above, characterized these evidentiary errors as egregious and supported a plain error standard of review reversal.

United States v. Moore, 651 F.3d 30 (D.C. Cir. 2011)

The D.C. Circuit joined several other Circuits in holding that it is not proper for the prosecution to begin its presentation with an “overview” witness who explains the overall nature of the crime and the evidence to be presented. The government should present its overview in the opening statement, not through the testimony of a law enforcement witness.

United States v. Irvin, 682 F.3d 1254 (10th Cir. 2011)

In this mortgage fraud case, the Tenth Circuit held that it was reversible error to allow the government to introduce a chart that purportedly summarized several boxes of “loan files.” The defendant complained that the loan files were not admitted or admissible and thus the chart could not be used pursuant to Rule 1006 or Rule 611. Because the government failed to prove that the loan files themselves were admissible as business records, the chart was not admissible. The government’s claim that the chart also summarized the testimony of a witness who detailed the fraud was equally unavailing, because Rule 611, which allows that type of pedagogical device, may not be used to circumvent the hearsay rules, or the requirements of the business records exception. The Tenth Circuit also questioned the propriety of using a chart that used labels for the columns of information such as “Summary of Fraud” and “False Statements to Lenders.”
United States v. Meises, 645 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2011)

The government improperly began its presentation of the evidence with a “summary witness” who described the roles of the various defendants on trial. This was improper summary testimony, based on improper opinion testimony.

United States v. Oros, 578 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2009)

Rule 1006, which permits a party to introduce summaries of voluminous records is not a vehicle by which inadmissible evidence may be admitted. In this case, the government attempted to introduce phone records, but did not have a record custodian or a certification of the authenticity of the records. The trial court allowed the government to offer a summary of the phone records. This was error (though harmless), because summaries are only permissible if they relate to admitted evidence.

United States v. Garcia-Morales, 382 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to call an “overview” witness to begin its case, but the error was harmless.

United States v. Casas, 356 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 2004)

The government’s case agent, the first witness to testify, was permitted, over objection, to “name the members of the organization” that was involved in drug dealing (which, of course, included numerous of the defendants on trial). Some of the agent’s testimony was based on what other conspirators told him during their debriefings. This testimony was not admissible as summary evidence, because the underlying facts were not in evidence. In fact, he was offered as an “overview witness” not a summary witness. See also United States v. Griffin, 324 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2003). The testimony violated the confrontation clause. The testimony was not proper expert testimony because there was nothing about his testimony that was the proper scope of expert testimony. With regard to certain defendants, the error was reversible error. In United States v. Flores-De-Jesus, 569 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2009), the First Circuit once again condemned this practice, but again found harmless error. The Court stated that if the prosecutors in Puerto Rico continue to ignore the First Circuit decisions on this issue, they will be referred to DOJ and the local bar association for punishment.
EVIDENCE
(Evidence of Civil or Regulatory Violations)

United States v. Acevedo, 882 F.3d 251 (1st Cir. 2018)

The defendant, a lawyer, visited a co-defendant who was represented by counsel in a jail and encouraged him to lie (and exculpate the defendant’s/lawyer’s client). At trial, the court instructed the jury on Rule 4.2 of the Cannons of Professional Conduct, which dictates that a lawyer may not communicate with a represented party about a subject matter of the other client’s representation. The trial court instructed the jury on this Rule. The First Circuit held that this was not error. The Rules of Professional Conduct may be considered as some evidence of the defendant’s mens rea, or corrupt intent, though a violation of such a rule is not sufficient to convict a defendant of obstruction of justice.

United States v. Gluk, 831 F.3d 608 (5th Cir. 2016)

The defendants, Gluk and Baker, were charged with financial fraud in connection with their operation of a company. The company (for which Gluk and Baker served as CEO and CFO) allegedly engaged in “channel-stuffing” – basically inflating earnings by creating false sales towards the end of a reporting period. When the crime was first detected, the board hired a private law firm which conducted an investigation and determined that the defendants were not engaged in the fraud and were not aware the crime was being committed. One of the defendants was fired because he was not sufficiently vigilant in detecting the fraud. Later, the SEC conducted an investigation and also concluded that the fraud was hidden from Gluk and Baker. Next, the government indicted two other people in the company. They pled, cooperated – claiming that Gluk and Baker were involved – and now these two individuals were identified as being involved in the conspiracy. The question on appeal is whether the law firm report and the SEC findings were admissible evidence on behalf the defendants. The Fifth Circuit held that such evidence is admissible. The appellate court analogized this case to an EEOC case in which the administrative agency’s findings are admissible to assist the jury in its decision-making.

United States v. Munoz-Franco, 487 F.3d 25, 65 (1st Cir. 2007)

This case contains a useful discussion of when the government is permitted to introduce evidence that a defendant’s conduct violates a civil or regulatory provision. For example, in a bank fraud case, the defendant’s conduct might violate federal banking violations. The court in this case held that the government was permitted to introduce such evidence if the trial court properly limits the jury’s consideration of the evidence and carefully explains that the defendant is not on trial for violating regulations or civil rules. See United States v. Stefan, 784 F.2d 1093 (11th Cir. 1986); United States v. Christo, 614 F.2d 486 (5th Cir. 1980).

United States v. Schnitzer, 145 F.3d 721 (5th Cir. 1998)

In this complicated savings and loan fraud case, the Fifth Circuit upheld the lower court’s decision to grant a judgment of acquittal on certain counts. With regard to certain false entry counts, however, the appellate court found sufficient evidence to support the verdict, but upheld the lower court’s decision granting a new trial on those counts. Among the issues decided by the court was the impropriety of permitting the government to introduce evidence about a violation of...
of a banking regulation to prove that the defendants intended to deceive regulators. The banking regulation was insufficiently related to the supposed false entry to support its admission. The court also upheld the reversal of a misapplication conviction (18 U.S.C. § 657), relying on United States v. Beuttenmuller, 29 F.3d 973 (5th Cir. 1994).

United States v. DeSantis, 134 F.3d 760 (6th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with mail fraud. During trial, the government introduced evidence that the defendant's sales practices arguably violated Ohio state law. The appellate court held that in this context, the trial court should have instructed the jury that the violation of state law is not synonymous with mail fraud. Moreover, the intent to violate the state law is not sufficient to establish intent to commit mail fraud.
EVIDENCE
(Defendant's Right To Present Exculpatory Evidence)

The United States Supreme Court reversed a South Carolina conviction in which the defendant was barred from introducing certain evidence that implicated another person in the commission of the crime. South Carolina had a rule of evidence that barred certain evidence implicating another perpetrator if the state presented forensic evidence that, if believed, strongly supported a guilty verdict. The Supreme Court unanimously (Justice Alito’s first opinion) held that this rule violated the defendant’s Due Process rights. See Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967); Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986); Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987).

Though a defendant has a constitutional right to introduce evidence in his defense, this is subject to appropriate and rational rules of evidence. In military prosecutions, polygraph evidence is per se inadmissible. The Supreme Court held that this per se ban does not violate the defendants’ constitutional rights, because it is neither arbitrary, nor disproportionate.

The Due Process Clause places limits on the state’s ability to bar evidence, but only when the restriction offends some principle of justice so rooted in traditions and conscience as to be fundamental. Montana’s rule which bars a defense based on voluntary intoxication does not offend the Due Process Clause under this standard.

Though the Court held that a defendant may be barred from presenting any alibi evidence because of a willful failure to comply with a state discovery rule requiring pre-trial notice of alibi testimony, the Court canvassed a number of recent decisions which stressed the right of a defendant to present a defense. Among these cases are Crane v. Kentucky, Rock v. Arkansas, Mathews v. United States, and Pennsylvania v. Ritchie.

Prior to trial, the defendant was hypnotized in order to improve her memory. The state had a per se prohibition on witnesses testifying if their memory had been hypnotically refreshed. The defendant could only testify to matters “remembered and stated” prior to being hypnotized. This rule could not be applied to the defendant. The defendant has a Sixth and Fifth Amendment right to testify and present a defense which was impaired by the state evidentiary rule in this case.

United States v. Espinoza, --- F.3d --- (9th Cir. 2018)

The test for admitting defense evidence that exculpates the defendant and places blame on another person is simply the test of relevance. In this case, the defendant was charged with smuggling drugs across the border. She sought to introduce evidence that her next door neighbor may have planted the drugs in her car and she was an unwitting mule, including evidence of the neighbor’s drug-dealing background and deportations. This was relevant evidence and the trial court committed error in excluding the evidence because it did not “substantially connect” the neighbor to the crime.

United States v. Slatten, 865 F.3d 767 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

This is the Blackwater prosecution relating to the murders committed by military contractors while serving in Iraq. Reversal was required because the trial court refused to sever one defendant’s case which was requested in order to introduce the statement of a co-defendant that was inadmissible in a joint trial. Severance is required under Rule 14 if it is necessary in order to assure that a defendant can introduce evidence that would be inadmissible at a joint trial, and which is essential to the defendant’s right to a fair trial. The statement of the co-defendant exonerated the defendant. Even though the co-defendant would not have testified at defendant’s severed trial, the statement of the co-defendant would have been admissible pursuant to Rule 807, the residual exception to the hearsay rule. The co-defendant’s statements to the authorities investigating the shooting contained equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness: the co-defendant was speaking pursuant to a grant of immunity; he was implicating himself; his statements were consistent over time. Because the statement of the co-defendant would have been admissible at a separate trial, the trial court erred in denying the severance motion.

Kubsch v. Neal, 838 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was convicted of a triple murder. He contended that he was not at the location of the crime when the murders occurred. About five days after the killings, a young girl was interviewed on tape by the police and her statements exonerated the defendant. By the time of trial, however, she no longer remembered the events and even after reviewing the taped interview, her recollection was not refreshed. The defense was unavailing in invoking the “past recollection recorded” exception to the hearsay rule, because the witness could not even verify that the recorded statement accurately reflected her observations. The Seventh Circuit held that the recorded interview should have been admitted by the state trial court under the Chambers v. Mississippi 410 U.S. 284 (1973), Dur Process doctrine. See also Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979) and Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986), cases in which the Supreme Court held that there are cases in which Due Process trumps state evidence rules that would exclude evidence favorable to the defense.

United States v. Williams, 836 F.3d 1 (D.C. Cir. 2016)

The defendant was charged with second degree murder for his role in a “hazing” incident involving another soldier on a military base. The hazing involved several soldiers beating another soldier (with his consent) for a few minutes. The incident resulted in the death of the hazee. The defendant argued that the victim’s consent was relevant to the defendant’s state of mind. Second degree murder requires the government to prove malice and malice can be proven by showing that a defendant intended to kill or, as the government argued here, that he consciously disregarded an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury. While it is true that the defendant cannot “blame the victim,” the defense is still entitled to offer evidence that negates his culpable state of mind. The defense counsel argued that the victims’ consent to being hazed was relevant to the determination whether the defendant acted with malice. In closing argument, the prosecutor told the jury that that was entirely erroneous and that the victim’s consent was not relevant to any issue in the case. After closing argument, the judge declined to issue an instruction that explained that the victim’s consent could be relevant to the issue of malice. The D.C. Circuit reversed the conviction. The victim’s consenting behavior—that is, his “continued, and enthusiastic, statements that he wanted the initiation to continue”—suggested that Williams was not conscious of an extreme risk that Johnson might die or be seriously injured.

United States v. West, 813 F.3d 619 (7th Cir. 2016)

The defense sought to introduce expert testimony that would have explained that the defendant was a mentally ill person with a low IQ and was suggestible (all for the purpose of explaining that his confession was not reliable). The trial court excluded the expert testimony on the basis that it was just a back door way of trying to get an insanity defense before the jury. The Seventh Circuit reversed: evidence which shows that a confession is not reliable is admissible and expert testimony is no exception.

United States v. Gluk, 831 F.3d 608 (5th Cir. 2016)

The defendants, Gluk and Baker, were charged with financial fraud in connection with their operation of a company. The company (for which Gluk and Baker served as CEO and CFO) allegedly engaged in “channel-stuffing” – basically inflating earnings by creating false sales towards the end of a reporting period. When the crime was first detected, the board hired a private law firm which conducted an investigation and determined that the defendants were not engaged in the fraud and were not aware the crime was being committed. One of the defendants was fired because he was not sufficiently vigilant in detecting the fraud. Later, the SEC conducted an investigation and also concluded that the fraud was hidden from Gluk and Baker. Next, the government indicted two other people in the company. They pled, cooperated – claiming that Gluk and Baker were involved – and now these two individuals were identified as being involved in the conspiracy. The question on appeal is whether the law firm report and the SEC findings were admissible evidence on behalf the defendants. The Fifth Circuit held that such evidence is admissible. The appellate court analogized this case to an EEOC case in which the administrative agency’s findings are admissible to assist the jury in its decision-making.

United States v. Makkar, 810 F.3d 1139 (10th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with distribution of an Analogue Drug. That statute requires proof that the defendant knew that the drug was, in fact, an analogue drug, or that the drug had essentially the same chemical composition of a listed drug and the same physiological effect. At trial, the defendant sought to introduce evidence that he requested state agents to test the drugs he was testing. The government successfully moved to exclude this evidence on the theory that it was irrelevant to the defendant’s guilt. The Tenth Circuit reversed: the evidence was probative of the defendant’s knowledge about the chemical composition. After all, if he knew it was illegal, why would he have it tested by a state law enforcement agency?

United States v. Litvak, 808 F.3d 160 (2d Cir. 2015)

Litvak was a securities broker who worked for Jefferies & Company and was involved in selling residential mortgage backed securities (“RMBS”). He was charged with fraud in connection with his sales of RMBS’s. There were three categories of misrepresentations: (1) He lied about the cost at which Jefferies acquired certain RMBS in his effort to convince a purchaser to pay more for the same RMBS’s; (2) He lied when he said that he was negotiating for the purchase of certain RMBS’s at a certain price in his efforts to re-sell the RMBS’s, when, in fact, Jefferies already owned the RMBS’s at a lower price than the price he was about to pay to purchase the RMBS’s; (3) In the process of purchasing RMBS’s, he lied about the price at which he had negotiated to re-sell the RMBS’s (falsely saying that the price was less than it actually was) and thereby induced the seller to sell the RMBS’s to him at a cheaper price to enable Jefferies to make a profit. On the basis of these representations, Litvak was convicted of securities fraud and also making a false statement to the U.S. Treasury which was overseeing certain RMBS sales in connection with TARP. The Second Circuit reversed the false statement count, based on the failure to prove that Litvak’s false statements were material. Though the U.S. Treasury was aware and monitored these types of sales, the Treasury made no “decision” that was affected by the price of the sales. The Second Circuit held, however, that the materiality of the false statements to counter-parties was a jury question that could not be decided as a matter of law for purposes of the securities fraud convictions under Rule 10b-5. Litvak argued that the “price” of the RBMS’s to Jefferies was not what was important to the counter-parties; what mattered was the value. The Second Circuit disagreed, holding that the jury was the proper fact-finder on the question of materiality. However, the securities fraud convictions were reversed, because the district court improperly excluded expert testimony offered by Litvak on the topic of materiality. The expert was prepared to testify that a reasonable counter-party would not rely on representations made by Litvak and that they would normally make their own determination of value, rather than relying on Litvak’s representation about Jefferies’ price in purchasing (or the intended sales price of) the RMBS’s. This was the proper subject of expert testimony. Finally, the Second Circuit held that the trial court erred in excluding evidence offered by Litvak that his supervisors permitted these types of sales practices by other brokers, which, according to Litvak, demonstrated his good faith and his lack of intent to defraud. The evidence was relevant to show that Litvak held an honest belief that he was not engaged in improper or illegal conduct. Litvak was retried and convicted of one count. This conviction, too, was reversed. One of the purchasers was permitted to testify that he viewed Litvak as his agent in the sale. This conveyed the impression that Litvak owed a higher duty of honesty to him and that any misrepresentation would therefore be material. But Litvak was not, in fact, his agent and the Second Circuit held that permitting this evidence was reversible error. United States v. Litvak, 889 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2018).

United States v. Haischer, 780 F.3d 1277 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant is entitled to present a defense of coercion, as well as a defense that she lacked the mens rea to commit the offense. The defendant in this case claimed that she suffered abuse at the hands of her boyfriend and explained that this was the basis of her coercion defense. The trial court erroneously excluded this evidence on the basis that the defendant did not admit that she committed the offense (i.e., that she knew that she was engaged in a fraudulent scheme).

United States v. Bowling, 770 F.3d 1168 (7th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with making a false statement on a firearms form that he filled out in order to purchase a gun. He denied that he was a convicted felon. In fact he was a convicted felon (a fact that he acknowledged at trial), but he claimed that he was laboring under a mistake of fact when he filled out the form, because when he pled guilty to the predicate offense, he thought it was a misdemeanor offense. He sought to introduce evidence at the false statement trial that the prosecutor in the prior case had communicated an offer to the defense attorney in that case offering a misdemeanor disposition which the lawyer then communicated to the defendant. This, he claimed, was the source of his confusion. Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

_Alvarez v. Ercole_, 763 F.3d 223 (2d Cir. 2014)

The state trial court erred in preventing the defense from cross-examining the lead detective about other investigations that were not pursued. The investigation that was not done was not subject to a hearsay objection, because the issue is not the truthfulness of what was told to a police officer conducting the investigation, but whether there were leads that were not followed. Denying the defense the right to cross-examine the detective violated the Confrontation Clause and was particularly harmful, because the prosecutor argued in closing that the investigation was thorough.

_United States v. Certified Environmental Services, Inc._, 753 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2014)

Federal and State laws regulate the removal of asbestos from buildings, including OSHA regulations and the Clean Air Act. A company that removes asbestos must comply with various laws regarding the method of removal and a separate “monitoring” company must monitor the air after the removal is accomplished. The defendants in this case (a company and several employees) were involved in monitoring asbestos removal and were charged with not properly monitoring the asbestos removal and submitting false monitoring reports. The defense sought to introduce evidence at trial about certain conversations with officials about their monitoring practices, specifically, whether particular monitoring practices were required if the location was not sufficiently “contained” (i.e., the area where the asbestos was being removed was not fully contained which might result in the monitoring causing more contamination in nearby areas).
The government objected that these conversations were hearsay. The trial court’s exclusion of this evidence was reversible error. The evidence relating to the conversations with regulators was not offered to prove the truthfulness of the information provided by the regulators, but to prove that the defendants were acting in good faith when they engaged in certain monitoring practices. The fact that some of the conversations occurred after the criminal conduct did not make the evidence irrelevant, because it was consistent with what the defendants claimed was there long-standing understanding of the monitoring rules.

_United States v. Delgado-Marrero_, 744 F.3d 167 (1st Cir. 2014)

The defense sought to introduce evidence to impeach the testimony of a police officer who had participated in undercover activities that involving luring the defendant (a police officer) into corrupt efforts to provide security for a drug deal. The evidence that the defense proffered involved other efforts of the undercover officer to lure police to engage in corrupt activities. This testimony was offered to support the entrapment defense. The trial court excluded the evidence pursuant to Rule 608(b), on the theory that extrinsic acts of misconduct on the part of a witness are not admissible if the evidence is offered to impeach the credibility of the witness. The First Circuit reversed: Rule 608(b) only limits extrinsic evidence that is offered for the sole purpose of attacking the character of the witness. Rule 608(b) does not limit the defendant’s right to offer evidence that impeaches the witness for bias, or prior inconsistent statements, or to impeach his trial testimony. Quoting from United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984), the First Circuit wrote, “It would be a strange rule of law which held that relevant, competent evidence which tended to show bias on the part of a witness was nonetheless inadmissible because it also tended to show that the witness was a liar.”

United States v. Murray, 736 F.3d 652 (2d Cir. 2013)
In rebuttal, the government presented the testimony of a cell tower expert who provided an opinion (albeit somewhat equivocal) about the defendant’s location based on the cell tower evidence. The defendant sought to introduce surrebuttal evidence but the trial judge denied his request on the basis that the expert’s testimony was not significantly incriminating. The Second Circuit reversed.

United States v. Evans, 728 F.3d 953 (9th Cir. 2013)
The defendant was charged with various offenses involving his alien status and acquiring a false passport and certain federal benefits. The defendant sought to introduce a birth certificate he received from the State of Idaho. The trial court granted the government’s motion in limine excluding the birth certificate on the basis of Rule 403 and Rule 104 and the trial court’s conclusion that the birth certificate was fraudulently obtained. The Ninth Circuit reversed: Rule 104 is not a substantive rule of evidence. It simply is the procedure by which other rules of evidence (e.g., privilege, constitutional, hearsay) are enforced. The Rule does not provide an independent basis for the trial court to exclude relevant evidence. The trial court’s conclusion that the birth certificate was fraudulently obtained was not a decision that the trial court could make, especially since it was based on the judge’s credibility determination of the witnesses. When making a decision based on Rule 403, the judge must assume the truthfulness of the proffer regarding the evidence. Excluding the evidence in this case was a constitutional due process violation.

United States v. Hernandez-Meza, 720 F.3d 760 (9th Cir. 2013)
The trial court erred in this case in permitting the government to re-open the evidence and introduce evidence that was not previously produced to the defense as required by Rule 16. The government protested that the defendant’s defense was unexpected (it was revealed when the defendant submitted his proposed requests to charge) and that the additional evidence was needed to refute the newly-revealed theory of defense. The Ninth Circuit held that allowing the government to re-open the evidence was reversible error. The fact that the new defense was factually not realistic is not relevant, the defense had the right to raise this defense and to point out the gaps in the government’s proof. Judge Kozinski wrote,

“[A] criminal defendant, unlike the government, needn't have a good faith belief in the factual validity of a defense. So long as the defendant doesn't perjure himself or present evidence he knows to be false—and Hernandez-Meza presented no evidence at all—he's entitled to exploit weaknesses in the prosecution's case, even though he may believe himself to be guilty. What matters in satisfying the government's burden of proof in a criminal case is not objective reality nor defendant's personal belief, but the evidence the government presents in court. No competent prosecutor would be surprised, based on what he thinks defendant should know, to find defense counsel poking holes in the government’s case. The argument is without merit, yet the government made it before the district court, and again on appeal. The government’s failure to produce the evidence in its Rule 16 production was not justified. The Rule requires the production of all documents “material to the preparation of the defense.” Information is material even if it simply causes a defendant to completely abandon a planned defense and take an entirely different path. If the defendant in this case knew that the government had this evidence, the defendant may not have relied on this defense. Moreover, a defendant need not spell out his theory of the case in order to obtain discovery. Nor is the government entitled to know in advance specifically what the defense is going to be. Discovery must still be provided pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(E)(i). The Ninth Circuit held that the trial judge’s summary rejection of the defendant’s Rule 16 argument, as well as his unsupported decision to allow the government to re-open the evidence, required that the case be remanded and that a new judge preside over the case.

United States v. Phillips, 731 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2013)

In this en banc decision, the Seventh Circuit held that the defendants should have been permitted to introduce evidence that the defendants (who were charged with making a false statement to a bank in violation of § 1014) were told by their broker that lying in response to certain questions on a loan application form was permissible. The evidence was relevant to whether the defendants actually knew that their answers were false and whether they believed that answering the questions in that way would “influence” the bank’s decision.

United States v. Garcia, 729 F.3d 1171 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with murder and involuntary manslaughter as a result of his killing a person with whom he was fighting. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the victim had previously engaged in various acts of violence towards others and the defendant knew of these other incidents. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. In a self-defense case, the defendant’s knowledge of the victim’s prior assaultive behavior is relevant to show his state of mind in shooting the victim. See also United States v. Saenz, 179 F.3d 686 (9th Cir. 1999); United States v. James, 169 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 1999).

Harris v. Thompson, 698 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2012)

The trial court’s decision to exclude a defense witness who was 6-years old based on the child’s competence as a witness violated the defendant’s Compulsory Process rights to present evidence in his defense. The child had critical exculpatory evidence and the jury should have been allowed to evaluate the credibility issue. The fact that the child believed in the tooth fairy, Santa Claus and Spiderman did not render him unfit to testify. (Part of the child’s apparent confusion about who was “real” and who was not “real” was the way that questions were posed, which drew a distinction between characters in movies that were cartoons, or animated, and characters who were played by live actors). The state trial court violated the state statute that placed the burden of proving incompetency of a witness on the state, rather than proving competence of witness on the party calling the witness, as the court did in this case. In addition, the court held that the trial attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel in failing to properly litigate the competency issue and to interview and prepare the child to testify. This case contains an encyclopedic review of Compulsory Process cases.
Cudjo v. Ayers, 698 F.3d 752 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with murder. His brother was a key prosecution witness (his testimony at a preliminary hearing implicating the brother was offered at trial, though he refused to testify at trial). At trial, the defense sought to introduce the testimony of another man who was prepared to testify that the brother had confessed to him that he was the perpetrator, not the defendant. The trial court excluded this testimony because it was too unreliable, despite the fact that it was a statement against penal interest that would be admissible under that exception to the hearsay rules. Based on Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), the Ninth Circuit granted the writ.

Jackson v. Nevada, 688 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2012)

The defendant was charged with raping his ex-girlfriend. He sought to introduce evidence of numerous false allegations of rape (including the testimony of police officers who had responded to earlier claims of rape). The state court excluded this evidence. In part, the exclusion was based on the defendant’s failure to comply with a state law requiring pretrial notice of the intent to introduce prior false allegation evidence. See also Holley v. Yarborough, 568 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2009). THE SUPREME COURT REVERSED in Nevada v. Jackson, 133 S. Ct. 1990 (2013). The Court held that the Nevada rule of evidence (comparable to Rule 608(b) FRE) that barred extrinsic evidence of a witness’s prior acts of dishonesty was not unconstitutional. The Court also noted that the state rule also permitted such evidence of prior false allegations if the defendant provided pretrial notice, a rule that the Court held was properly enforced in the state courts.

United States v. Carmen, 697 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 2012)

Deporting a potentially exculpatory witness prior to providing the defense an opportunity to interview the witness violates the defendant’s right to compulsory process and to due process. The defendant, however, is required to show that the government acted in bad faith, a showing that was, in fact, made in this case.

United States v. Ibisevic, 675 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant carried over $10,000 into an international flight from Dulles Airport heading to Bosnia. An ICE agent who had a Puerto Rican accent questioned the defendant and his mother (the mother spoke no English) about whether they were carrying cash. The defendant responded that they had $5,000.00. During this “questioning” the defendant turned to his mother and translated, “They are asking how much the luggage is worth if it is lost.” The defendant and his mother actually had about $40,000 in the luggage, on their persons and in the mother’s purse. At trial, the defendant claimed that he did not understand the question and that the mother’s testimony (about what the defendant said to the mother) was admissible as a “present sense impression” to show a lack of understanding. The trial court held that this was hearsay and inadmissible. The Fourth Circuit reversed: The defendant’s statement was not hearsay (it was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted; it nevertheless would qualify as a present sense impression; and it was important to his defense regarding his lack of understanding that he was making a false statement or knowingly failing to file a currency form in violation of the law.
United States v. Waters, 627 F.3d 345 (9th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with arson in connection with her activities with an environmental “terrorist” group. After she was first contacted by the FBI, she called her cousin and told him that the FBI might contact him and told him, “I am innocent” and instructed him to “tell them the truth.” The first statement “I am innocent” is hearsay and the defendant was properly prohibited from introducing that out-of-court statement. But the second statement, urging her cousin to tell the truth, is not hearsay, because there is no assertion of fact that was being offered. That part of her statement was not hearsay and should have been admitted to show the defendant’s lack of guilty mindset. In a separate holding, the Ninth Circuit held that the trial court erred in excluding evidence of a document produced by the defendant that demonstrated her peaceful agenda in promoting change in environmental policies. Excluding this document was particularly an abuse of discretion given the trial court’s decision to allow the government to introduce various pro-anarchist and violence-promoting articles that the defendant supposedly gave to a co-conspirator.

Lunbery v. Hornbeak, 605 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2010)

Relying on Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), the Ninth Circuit held that excluding evidence that a witness heard another person confess to the murder with which the defendant was charged was reversible error. If, as in this case, the hearsay evidence is reliable and the declarant is unavailable, excluding the evidence under a state rule of evidence violates the federal Due Process Clause.

United States v. Pineda-Doval, 614 F.3d 1019 (9th Cir. 2010)

This case involves a charge of smuggling illegal aliens resulting in death. The question presented to the Ninth Circuit is whether the defendant’s offense “caused” the death of the aliens. The aliens were in the van which the police were chasing. The police placed “spike strips” on the road as part of the pursuit and this resulted in the van crashing, killing numerous illegal aliens in the vehicle. The Ninth Circuit held that excluding evidence of the policies that governed the use of spike strips was error, because the question of proximate cause was hotly disputed. Harmless error.

United States v. Stever, 603 F.3d 747 (9th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with growing marijuana on his property. He defended on the basis that Mexican drug organizations must have planted the marijuana on his property. He made a Rule 16 request for any information in the possession of the government about the practice of Mexican drug organizations planting marijuana on private property in this district. The government refused to provide the information. The Ninth Circuit held that the lower court’s failure to direct the government to produce this information was reversible error. The error was compounded by the lower court’s order directing both parties not to mention anything about Mexican drug organizations, because any such evidence was speculative. The Ninth Circuit held that the defendant is entitled to present evidence of an alternative perpetrator and the lower court may not bar the defendant from presenting his defense.

Gagne v. Booker, 606 F.3d 278 (6th Cir. 2010)

The Sixth Circuit held that the Michigan State Rape Shield Statute, as construed by the Michigan appellate court, was unconstitutionally applied. The defendant was charged, along with a co-defendant, of raping the defendant’s former girlfriend. The defendant sought to introduce evidence (in support of his consent defense) that he and the girl had participated in group sex previously. The Michigan court held that this evidence was barred under the state Rape Shield statute. The Sixth Circuit held that this evidence could not be excluded: the Due Process Clause assures a defendant that he may introduce evidence that is highly relevant and indispensable to the central dispute. REHEARING EN BANC GRANTED 7/20/2010.

Barbe v. McBride, 521 F.3d 443 (4th Cir. 2008)
The defendant was charged with child sexual assault. An expert testified that the victim exhibited signs of sexual abuse. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the defendant had been abused by other adults (and the child had made prior accusations about these prior assaults). Relying on the state rape shield statute, the trial court excluded the evidence. The Fourth Circuit granted the writ. Excluding evidence that would provide an alternative explanation for the expert’s findings violated the defendant’s right to confront the evidence against him. Pursuant to Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991), the trial court must make a case-by-case determination whether the state evidence rule trumps the Sixth Amendment. In this case, the state trial court invoked a per se ban on any evidence of prior sexual activity of the victim.

Ferensic v. Birkett, 501 F.3d 469 (6th Cir. 2007)
Defense counsel was directed to furnish his expert witness reports to the state two months prior to trial, but waited until eleven days before trial to submit the report. The state trial court excluded the evidence. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the district court’s granting of a writ of habeas corpus. The exclusion of the evidence in this case operated to deny the defendant the Constitutional right to present a defense. See generally Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988). Less severe sanctions were available to remedy the defense attorney’s error that would have protected the defendant’s rights. This is especially so, because there was an inadequate showing that the state was prejudiced by the tardy disclosure.

Christie v. Hollins, 409 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2005)
The prior testimony of a defense witness should have been admitted in this case in light of the showing by the defense that diligent efforts had been made to locate the witness and she had not been located.

United States v. Boulware, 384 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2004)
The defendant was charged with tax evasion and related charges. He claimed that the money that he allegedly skimmed from the company (and gave to his girlfriend) was actually legally still owned by the company (and simply being held by the girlfriend) and was therefore not taxable (i.e., there was no transfer of the money for tax purposes from the company to the defendant or the girlfriend). In a state court lawsuit, the state court agreed that the funds were still owned by the company. The trial court in the federal prosecution erred in excluding evidence of the state court judgment. The court also concluded that the state court judgment was not hearsay because under Rule 803(15) it was a statement in a document affecting an interest in property.

The government introduced a tape that suggested that the defendant was participating in a cover-up. The defendant responded by offering a tape of a conversation shortly thereafter during which he told the person on the phone, “Just tell the truth.” The government persuaded the trial court that this was hearsay. The trial court erred in excluding this testimony. The defendant’s statement was not hearsay, because it was not offered to prove the truth of what he said, but rather to show that he instructed others to tell the truth. Harmless error.

United States v. Stephens, 365 F.3d 967 (11th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with selling methamphetamine to an informant. The transactions were recorded on videotape, but the content of the tapes was hard to discern and did not clearly reveal the defendant handing any drugs to the informant. Nevertheless, the police testified that they searched the informant before he met with the defendant and he had money, but no drugs; and when he returned from the meetings, he had drugs and no money. Prior to trial, the informant died of natural causes. The defendant attempted to offer evidence at trial that the informant was regularly using, buying and selling drugs during the time period of the undercover work. Defense counsel explained that his theory was that the informant actually hid drugs on his person or in his car before he had the meetings with the defendant and he was tricking the police into believing that he was actually acquiring the drugs from the defendant. The trial court excluded the evidence, holding that this was an improper method of impeaching the informant – through prior bad acts evidence. The Eleventh Circuit reversed, holding that this evidence was admissible in support of the defendant’s theory that the informant had a source of drugs which explained how he had the drugs to give to the agents. The evidence was also admissible under Rule 404(b) – defendant’s use of Rule 404(b) – to show the informant’s other acts that explained his opportunity to commit the deception perpetrated on the police.

In this celebrated 9/11 trial of the suspected terrorist, the defendant sought access to witnesses who were in custody of the U.S. military as suspected Al Qaeda terrorists. He sought access to them to interview them, and to take their depositions pursuant to Rule 15, Fred.R.Crim.P. The Fourth Circuit agreed with the lower court and held that the Compulsory Process Clause, as well as the defendant’s due process right to present a defense necessitated granting him access to these witnesses – or, in the alternative, granting some other relief (such as dismissal of the death penalty) if such access was denied as a matter of national security. See also 382 F.3d 453 (4th Cir. 2004).

Chia v. Cambra, 360 F.3d 997 (9th Cir. 2004)

It is clearly established federal law that when a hearsay statement bears persuasive assurances of trustworthiness and is critical to the defense, the exclusion of that statement may rise to the level of a due process violation. Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973). In this case, two DEA agents were murdered during an undercover deal. During the ensuing arrest 638 of one of the perpetrators, the perpetrator was shot. He made several statements, however, some shortly before being wheeled into surgery and others after he was out of surgery. In each of these statements, he revealed who was involved in the murder. The defendant in this case was not named as a member of the conspiracy. At trial, the witness refused to testify. The defendant sought to introduce the witness’s statements. The Ninth Circuit held that there were sufficient indicia of trustworthiness associated with these statements to support their admission. Excluding this evidence violated the defendant’s due process right to present a defense.

United States v. Buffalo, 358 F.3d 519 (8th Cir. 2004)

The defendant contended that another man was the perpetrator of the assault with which he was charged. He called the other man to the stand and he denied being the perpetrator. The defendant then sought to call two other witnesses who were prepared to testify that the other man had confessed to them. The district court excluded the evidence because the “prior inconsistent statements” would have been inadmissible hearsay. Rule 613(b) allows a party to use a prior inconsistent statement to impeach a witness, but if the witness is called to the stand for sole purpose of impeaching him, the “impeachment” is really a subterfuge for admitting the hearsay. Nevertheless, the Eighth Circuit holds that because there are no Confrontation Clause concerns when the defendant (as opposed to the government) seeks to engage in this type of subterfuge, the proper course for the trial court is to employ the Rule 403 balancing test. In this case, because of the unique facts, the Eighth Circuit held that the defendant should have been permitted to introduce the prior inconsistent statement of the witness.

United States v. Turning Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in excluding a defense witness who was prepared to testify that in her opinion, the child-victim, was untruthful and “didn’t always tell the truth.” The witness in this case had a basis for forming the opinion (thus qualifying under Rule 701 to offer opinion testimony). Excluding this testimony violated the defendant’s constitutional right to offer evidence in his behalf.

United States v. Cruz-Garcia, 344 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defense attempted to prove the facts underlying the witness’s prior convictions to show that he had the capacity to commit the offenses with which the defendant was charged. The trial court erroneously excluded this evidence. The evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove the witness’s capacity to commit the crime. Indeed, the prosecutor had repeatedly argued that the witness was too stupid to have committed the crime without the defendant’s help. The court noted that Rule 404(b) should be more liberally interpreted when the evidence is being offered against a witness, as opposed to the defendant.

United States v. Alvarez-Farfan, 338 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2003)

The trial court erred in barring the defendant from introducing evidence of a motel receipt and a debriefing statement that was written by a witness to prove the witness’s handwriting. The jury is entitled to make a handwriting comparison.

Lewis v. Wilkinson, 307 F.3d 413 (6th Cir. 2002)
The Sixth Circuit held that the application of a state rape shield statute in this rape prosecution denied the defendant of his Sixth Amendment right of Confrontation. In the victim’s diary, there were various references to her other sexual conduct and the fact that she was apparently viewed by boys as a “nympho.” She wrote, “I’m just not strong enough to say no to them. I’m tired of being a whore. This is where it ends.” Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

Franklin v. Henry, 122 F.3d 1270 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged in state court with child molestation. The victim had previously accused her mother of acts of sexual abuse similar to those alleged against the defendant. Barring the defendant from introducing this impeaching evidence was error of constitutional proportions requiring that the writ of habeas corpus be granted.

United States v. Mulder, 147 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 1998)

Good faith constitutes a complete defense to a charge of fraudulent intent. In this case, the defendant was charged with bank fraud. At trial, he offered a financial statement which appeared to accurately reflect his assets and which was contained in the bank’s lending file. Excluding this document, even though it was internally inconsistent, was reversible error.

United States v. Lampkin, 159 F.3d 607 (D.C. Cir. 1998)

The trial court repeatedly – and erroneously – instructed the jury that two juvenile witnesses for the government could not be prosecuted by the AUSA, thus negating the defendant’s theory that the witnesses were testifying for the government in exchange for not being prosecuted. This erroneous instruction deprived the defense of its ability to mount a defense and was reversible error.

United States v. Gonzalez-Maldonado, 115 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1997)

The court retained a psychiatrist to determine if a co-defendant was competent to stand trial. The co-defendant was declared incompetent, but his recorded statements to undercover officers, statements that incriminated the defendant, were critical evidence for the prosecution. The defense wanted to call the psychiatrist as their witness to establish the mental illness of the co-defendant – a mental illness that led the witness to exaggerate, according to the psychiatrist. Excluding this testimony was reversible error. The psychiatrist was obviously qualified as an expert and his testimony related directly to the veracity of the declarant (i.e., the recorded statements of the incompetent co-defendant).

United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997)

The defendant, a loan officer at a bank, was charged with making fraudulent loans to car dealers. With respect to one of these counts, the defendant proffered evidence that the dealer was brought to the bank by a senior bank officer and that the defendant may have been negligent in making the loan, but the failure to adequately determine whether the dealer was qualified was due to the fact that he was brought to the bank by the senior officer. Excluding this evidence was reversible error on this count.
United States v. Shay, 57 F.3d 126 (1st Cir. 1995)

The defendant was accused of attempting to bomb his father’s car. He provided a statement to the police admitting his guilt. At trial, the defense sought to introduce evidence from a psychiatrist that the defendant suffered from a mental disorder that causes its victims to make false and grandiose statements without regard to the consequences – pseudologia fantastica. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. The evidence was admissible under Rule 608(a) because the evidence was admissible opinion evidence relating to the character of a witness; it was admissible under Rule 405 to prove a relevant character trait; and it was admissible under Rule 702 because such expert testimony was necessary to contradict the common sense notion that people do not generally make untrue inculpatory statements.

United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990)

If a defendant rejects an offer of immunity in exchange for testifying, and is then prosecuted, this evidence is admissible show defendant’s “consciousness of innocence.” This evidence is not barred by Rule 410.

United States v. Bailey, 834 F.2d 218 (1st Cir. 1987)

A defendant was accused of trying to bribe a juror. He attempted to interview other members of the jury panel as a means of probing the character of the juror who made the accusation. The trial court prohibited the defendant from questioning the other jurors. The First Circuit reverses, holding that the defendant had a right to interview these “witnesses.” The Court relied on the reasoning of Roviaro v. United States, and its analytical framework for determining whether to disclose the identity of an informant.

Lyons v. Johnson, 99 F.3d 499 (2d Cir. 1996)

One of two men shot the victim. The defendant and the other man resembled each other, were wearing similar jackets on the day of the shooting and both had gold-capped teeth. At the defendant’s trial, he requested permission to “exhibit” the other man to the jury. This request was denied, because (among other reasons) the other man asserted his Fifth Amendment right not to testify. The trial court erred. Moreover, offering the defendant the opportunity to introduce a photograph of the other man was not an adequate substitute.

Justice v. Hoke, 90 F.3d 43 (2nd Cir. 1996)

The state trial court erred in excluding testimony that would have demonstrated the key state witness’s motivation to lie about the defendant. The excluded evidence established that the state witness was a drug dealer for the defendant and had a dispute about money.

United States v. Doe, 63 F.3d 121 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendant asked that the court be closed for his testimony, as well as other portions of the trial, so he could relate to the jury the extent of his cooperation with the government, which he claimed supported his “public authority” defense. The trial court denied his request for closure which resulted in the defendant’s refusing to reveal this information (for fear that he would be the victim of retaliation). Even though the defendant could not point to a direct threat that he had received, the court of appeals holds that the district court should have more carefully evaluated the defendant’s request. A remand was required for more findings.

United States v. Blum, 62 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 1995)

The defendant was charged with creating false logbooks in violation of certain EPA laws. He offered evidence at trial that one of his employees was engaged in a series of thefts at the company and had an independent motive to falsify the logbooks to cover-up his thefts. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. The evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove the witness’s motive to commit the offense and was probative on the issue of who the actual culprit was who committed the offense.

United States v. Diallo, 40 F.3d 32 (2d Cir. 1994)

The defendant was arrested smuggling heroin into the country from Africa. He claimed that he thought he was smuggling gold dust. At trial, the defendant sought to introduce expert testimony about the profitability of smuggling gold dust out of Benin, Africa. The trial court erred in excluding this testimony. The trial court held that the expert had never been to Benin, therefore, he was not qualified to offer expert testimony about the economics of smuggling gold dust out of that country. Pursuant to United States v. Onumonu, 967 F.2d 782 (2d Cir. 1992), such expert testimony is relevant. Moreover, though the expert in this case had never been to Benin, he had advised neighboring countries about exporting gold and was aware of the profits to be made by smuggling gold out of Africa, into the United States.

United States v. Onumonu, 967 F.2d 782 (2d Cir. 1992)

The defendant was caught at the airport with heroin which he ingested in condoms. The defendant claimed that he thought he was smuggling diamonds into the country. He sought to introduce evidence from an expert that Nigerians frequently smuggle diamonds out of the country. The trial court erred in excluding this expert testimony. It was relevant and beyond the ken of the average juror.

United States v. G.A.F., Corp., 928 F.2d 1253 (2d Cir. 1991)

During the second trial of this securities fraud trial, the defense sought to introduce a copy of the bill of particulars which had been provided prior to the first trial. The defense theorized that this would prove that the government at one time believed, and stated, that its proof established something different from what it claimed at the retrial. The Second Circuit held that the trial court erred in excluding this evidence.

United States v. Vargas, 920 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1990)

Though deciding the case on other grounds, the appellate court addressed the question of how a defendant should raise a claim that his attorney refused to call him to testify at trial. Without deciding the question, the court concludes that the defendant’s failure to complain at trial does not amount to a waiver of this claim that he was denied the constitutional right to testify.

Rosario v. Kuhlman, 839 F.2d 918 (2d Cir. 1988)

The defendant perpetuated the testimony of a witness who claimed that the defendant and his purported girlfriend (prosecution witness) were acquainted at the time of the robbery offense. That witness refused to honor the defendant’s subpoena and evaded the local police who attempted to secure his presence. The Second Circuit holds that the defendant should have been permitted to use the deposition testimony because of the witness’s refusal to appear in court.

Gilmore v. Henderson, 825 F.2d 663 (2d Cir. 1987)

The state trial court’s exclusion of testimony that would have explained the defendant’s flight and also contradicted a portion of another witness’ testimony was not harmless.
Virgin Islands v. Mills, 956 F.2d 443 (3rd Cir. 1992)

The trial court was advised that a witness who had previously refused to testify had changed his mind. The judge did not inform the parties of this. The witness never did testify, but would have testified in a manner that would have exculpated the defendant. The trial court’s actions amounted to a denial of defendant’s right to compulsory process. The Court of Appeals analogized the court’s actions to the actions of a prosecutor who hides an important defense witness, or intimidates a witness who would have testified favorably to the defense.

United States v. Stevens, 935 F.2d 1380 (3rd Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with robbery and sexual assault and attempted to offer the testimony of the victim of a similar crime who did not identify the defendant as his assailant. The defendant’s syllogism was as follows: Because of the similarity of the two crimes, one person probably committed both; the defendant did not commit the other crime; therefore, he did not commit the charged offense. The Third Circuit reviewed the case law on this subject from various state courts and concluded that the trial court erred in excluding the evidence. Characterizing the evidence as “reverse Rule 404(b)” evidence, the court held that it is relevant and, assuming the defendant can lay the proper foundation, must be admitted. The court concluded, “Our resolution of this issue is informed by our general belief that a criminal defendant should be able to advance any evidence that, first, rationally tends to disprove his guilt, and second, passes the Rule 403 balancing test. To garner an acquittal, the defendant need only plant in the jury’s mind a reasonable doubt.”

United States v. Cavin, 39 F.3d 1299 (5th Cir. 1994)

The defendant, an attorney, was charged with fraud in connection with his efforts to help his client obtain regulatory approval for an insurance company. The attorney sought to offer evidence of the ethical problems involved in representing a client in such regulatory proceedings and also offered evidence of the uncertainties of the regulations in this area. The absence of clear guidance as to what an attorney should do when he becomes aware of his client’s fraud was also offered. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. Such evidence was probative of the defendant’s state of mind and thus was probative of his intent to defraud. See United States v. Kelly, 888 F.2d 732 (11th Cir. 1989); United States v. Garber, 607 F.2d 92 (5th Cir. 1979)(en banc).

United States v. Gaumer, 972 F.2d 723 (6th Cir. 1992)

Pursuant to Cheek, the defendant should have been given an opportunity to read tax protestor articles into the record, as well as portions of the Congressional Record and old Supreme Court decisions in order to show the basis of his belief that he was not obligated to pay taxes.

United States v. Poindexter, 942 F.2d 354 (6th Cir. 1991)

It was reversible error to preclude the defense attorney from arguing about the lack of fingerprint evidence on the container in which the cocaine was found. The attorney simply wanted to argue that the government’s failure to present fingerprint evidence – after it was determined that the container had been “dusted” – was sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Roberts, 887 F.2d 534 (6th Cir. 1989)

In defendant’s drug prosecution, he sought to introduce psychological testimony that he did not intend to violate the law but was simply attempting to apprehend drug dealers. Though the error was harmless given the strength of the government’s case, this evidence should have been permitted.

United States v. Montgomery, 100 F.3d 1404 (8th Cir. 1996)

When the police opened the defendant’s luggage pursuant to a consent search at a train station they discovered cocaine. The defendant claimed that the shirt in which the cocaine was wrapped did not belong to him and the cocaine must have been placed in his suitcase by his companion (who was not charged). At trial, the government compelled the defendant to try on the shirt, which he did. The defendant sought to compel the companion to try on the shirt, as well. The trial court denied this request. This was error. The companion, a witness, had no Fifth Amendment right to refuse to try on clothing. Even though the witness may have refused to testified, this did not affect the defendant’s right to have him try on the shirt in front of the jury.

United States v. Bear Stops, 997 F.2d 451 (8th Cir. 1993)

The defendant was charged with child sex abuse. The child had previously suffered abuse at the hands of another. The defendant sought to introduce detailed evidence of the prior offense in order to explain why the victim exhibited certain symptoms of a sex abuse victim. Limiting this evidence was reversible error. Such evidence fell within Rule 412’s exception for evidence which is “constitutionally required.”

United States v. Morales, 108 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with making false entries in a union ledger. The falsity of the information was not contested at trial. Whether the errors were mistakes or were intentional, however, was disputed. The defendant offered expert accounting testimony that the defendant lacked basic bookkeeping understanding. The trial court committed reversible error in excluding this evidence. Rule 704 prohibits the introduction of expert testimony (psychiatric, or otherwise) on the issue of whether the defendant had the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Nevertheless, the testimony offered in this case was not that the defendant did or did not intend to make false entries. Rather, the testimony related to a “predicate” matter: the defendant’s understanding of bookkeeping principles.

United States v. Young, 86 F.3d 944 (9th Cir. 1996)

Generally, a criminal defendant is not entitled to compel the government to grant immunity to a witness. In order to fall under an exception to this rule, defendant must show that: (1) the testimony was relevant; (2) the government distorted the judicial fact-finding process by denying immunity. In this case, a witness was prepared to testify for the defense (if immunized) that he overheard a government witness state that he was going to offer false testimony to inculpate the defendant. The failure to immunize this witness was reversible error.

United States v. Crosby, 75 F.3d 1343 (9th Cir. 1996)

Someone brutally assaulted the victim. The defendant was charged with the assault, but offered evidence that the victim’s husband lived in the vicinity, had previously beaten the victim, had previously been arrested for beating the victim, and that the victim had reported that the husband repeatedly beat her. The trial court committed reversible error in excluding this evidence. Fundamental standards of relevancy require the admission of testimony which tends to prove that a person other than the defendant committed the crime that is charged.
United States v. Thompson, 37 F.3d 450 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was arrested at the L.A. airport and her suitcase contained several kilos of crack. She claimed that she was an unwitting mule – her friend gave her the suitcase to bring to a person in Cleveland. The government moved in limine to exclude evidence that the government failed to take any fingerprints from inside the suitcase. The trial court erred in granting this motion: Evidence comes in various forms, some stronger and some weaker, and a defendant is entitled to argue to the jury that the government’s failure to present a particular type of strong evidence against her – e.g., fingerprints – weakens its case. Where, as here, the defense is lack of knowledge, the absence of fingerprint evidence may be argued in closing argument.

United States v. Thomas, 32 F.3d 418 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant bought fruit from growers and sold it to wholesalers. He kept a percentage and remitted the balance back to the growers. At some point, he decided to start averaging the prices. He would then send a fixed amount to the growers, sometimes paying them more than he actually received, sometimes keeping more than the agreed upon commission. By an agreed upon final accounting, this averaging scheme resulted in losses to him of over $700,000. Nevertheless, the government indicted him for mail fraud. At trial, the government called as witnesses certain growers who were underpaid. The defendant was denied the right to call growers who were overpaid, in order to prove that there was no “scheme to defraud.” This was reversible error. Such testimony would have been relevant in establishing the defendant’s intent in devising the averaging system. Individuals accused of criminal behavior should be permitted to present, within reason, the strongest case they are able to marshal in their defense. See also United States v. Garvin, 565 F.2d 519 (8th Cir. 1977); United States v. Foshee, 569 F.2d 401 (5th Cir. 1978); United States v. Etheridge, 948 F.2d 1215 (11th Cir. 1991).

United States v. Blaylock, 20 F.3d 1458 (9th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. The police testified that when they were called to a domestic disturbance scene, they saw the defendant with a gun and that he ran back inside. The defendant sought to introduce medical records which showed that he was infirm and incapable of “running.” The trial court excluded the evidence on the basis of a lack of foundation. The government, however, had stipulated to the authenticity of the documents. On appeal, the government argued that the evidence could have been excluded under Rule 403. This is wrong, however: the evidence tended to show that the defendant could not run, that he needed a cane to walk and that he was limited in his mobility. The evidence was therefore relevant to his defense and should not have been excluded.

United States v. Rahm, 993 F.2d 1405 (9th Cir. 1993)

At defendant’s possession of counterfeit currency trial, she sought to introduce the testimony of an expert who would testify that the defendant “showed a consistent tendency to overlook important details” based on tests the psychiatrist administered. The testimony was improperly excluded by the trial court. Under Rule 12.2, notice of the intended use of expert testimony is required where the expert will testify about a mental condition which bears on the issue of guilt. It is not necessary (as the lower court held) that the expert testify about a “mental disorder.” Other mental “conditions” may be the subject of expert testimony. Also, the fact that the expert was somewhat tentative in his testimony (the defendant “could have” failed to notice that the currency was counterfeit), was not a basis for excluding the testimony: it was the test results and the perceptual difficulties they demonstrate which were admissible, not the expert’s opinion. This testimony would have been helpful to the jury and was otherwise admissible as expert testimony and its exclusion was reversible error.

United States v. Word, 129 F.3d 1209 (11th Cir. 1997)

A man and woman were charged with securities fraud and related offenses. They were romantically involved when the offenses occurred, and subsequently were married. The wife sought to offer evidence at their joint trial that she was battered and obeyed her husband’s demands without question. The trial court excluded this evidence. The government, however, then argued that the wife had to have guilty knowledge – after all, she was married to the man who orchestrated the fraud – and the jury never learned about the acrimony in their relationship. The combination of allowing the government to make this argument and excluding the defendant’s evidence was reversible error.

United States v. Todd, 108 F.3d 1329 (11th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with embezzlement from an employee pension plan. 18 U.S.C. §664. He sought to introduce evidence that the employees were very well paid and were concerned with the welfare of the company and would have approved the use of their contributions to ensure the continued vitality of the company. The trial court held that this evidence was irrelevant. The appellate court reversed. The defendant’s argument that he believed the employees consented to his use of the funds was not contested by the government in the lower court, and was clearly probative of this defense. Moreover, the evidence would have rebutted the government’s “motivated by greed” argument.

United States v. Westcott, 83 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1996)

The Insanity Defense Reform Act, 18 U.S.C. §17 does not bar the defense from introducing evidence of a defendant’s mental disease or defect in contexts other than reliance on the insanity defense. If the defendant claims that he lacked the mens rea element of the offense (as opposed to lacking the capacity to form the mens rea element), he may offer expert psychiatric evidence.

United States v. Thompson, 25 F.3d 1558 (11th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was a convicted felon. For several years, he acted as an informant for the government, including the FBI and the ATF. In this prosecution for being a felon in possession of a firearm, he sought to rely on an entrapment by estoppel defense. The trial court incorrectly held that this was not a legal defense to a §922 charge. See e.g., Lewis v. United States, 445 U.S. 55 (1980); United States v. Billue, 994 F.2d 1562 (11th Cir. 1993). Entrapment by estoppel focuses on the actions of the government officials, not the state of mind (or predisposition) of the defendant. Entrapment by estoppel applies when an official tells a defendant that certain conduct is legal and the defendant believes that official. Because the defense rests on principles of fairness, it may be raised even in strict liability offense cases. Finally, the defendant’s proffer was sufficient to justify submitting the evidence to the jury. If there is any basis to support the defense, the jury should have been permitted to hear the testimony and weigh the evidence itself. Even if the defendant’s testimony regarding the alleged conduct of the officials authorizing his possession was not credible, as the government asserts and the district court found, it is the jury’s, not the district court’s, function to determine questions of credibility and assess the defendant’s testimony.
United States v. Sheffield, 992 F.2d 1164 (11th Cir. 1993)
The trial court committed reversible error in prohibiting the defendant from offering evidence in support of his defense. The defendant was prosecuted for using military base facilities (where he was employed) to make fishing lures for his personal use. He claimed that the base facilities were frequently used to make fishing lures for retirement benefits. This evidence should have been admitted.

United States v. Harnage, 976 F.2d 633 (11th Cir. 1992)
Though a criminal defendant may utilize collateral estoppel to bar a prosecution or argument of facts necessarily established in prior proceedings or to completely bar subsequent prosecution where one of the facts necessarily determined in the former trial is an essential element of the conviction the government seeks, the government may not collaterally estop a criminal defendant from relitigating an issue decided against him in a different court proceeding. Here, the trial court barred the defendant from asserting the attorney-client privilege concerning some discussions about a planned drug transaction. In a prior case, in another district, this same defense had been rejected by the trial court.

United States v. Lankford, 955 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1992)
In defense of tax evasion charges, the defendant sought to introduce expert evidence that the money he received could be characterized as a gift rather than a loan. The trial court committed reversible error by excluding this evidence. Such expert testimony is highly relevant to the assessment of whether the defendant willfully violated the tax laws.

United States v. Ethridge, 948 F.2d 1215 (11th Cir. 1992)
The defendants were charged with mail fraud. They filed false claims to an insurance company in connection with a fire loss. At trial, they sought to introduce evidence that the claimed losses exceeded the policy limits, therefore, even excluding the falsely claimed items, they could not have received more than that to which they were entitled. While this is not a defense to the mail fraud charge, the trial court committed reversible error by excluding the evidence. The evidence tended to show that the defendants did not intentionally try to defraud the insurance company, because the inclusion in the proof of loss of items not in fact lost, would not have netted them any additional money.

Nichols v. Butler, 953 F.3d 1550 (11th Cir. 1992)
The defendant’s attorney insisted that the defendant not testify in his own defense. The attorney threatened to withdraw if the client did testify. This violated the defendant’s right to testify and required a new trial. The right to testify at trial cannot be forfeited by counsel, but only by a knowing, voluntary, and intelligent waiver by the defendant himself. The defendant’s right to testify in his own defense is a fundamental right. Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987).

United States v. Teague, 908 F.2d 752 (11th Cir. 1990)
A defendant has the fundamental right to testify in his own defense. This may only be waived personally, not solely through counsel. Thus, if the attorney vetoes the defendant’s decision to testify, the defendant may challenge his conviction. After rehearing the case en banc, United States v. Teague, 953 F.2d 1525 (11th Cir. 1992), the Eleventh Circuit re-affirmed the principle that the defendant has a fundamental right to testify and the right may not be unilaterally waived by his attorney. However, the facts in this case did not show that the defendant’s will was overborne. Rather, the attorney urged the defendant not to testify and the defendant agreed. Consequently, there was no ineffective assistance of counsel.
United States v. Kelly, 888 F.2d 732 (11th Cir. 1989)

A criminal defense attorney was prosecuted for being a member of a conspiracy involving one of his former clients and one of his present clients. The former client was working with the government, unbeknownst to the attorney. In his defense, the attorney sought to introduce his understanding of the Canons of Ethics, which required him not to reveal the statements made by the cooperating individual. The trial court excluded this testimony. This was reversible error. Regardless of whether the Canons of Ethics in fact authorized or required the defendant to act as he did, the evidence was relevant to the state of mind which was the basis of his defense.

United States v. Calle, 822 F.2d 1016 (11th Cir. 1987)

The defendant attempted to prove that the prosecution’s star witness was the kingpin of the drug enterprise for which he was standing trial. The trial court prohibited this testimony, holding that it constituted improper impeachment of the witness. The Eleventh Circuit reverses, holding that an attempt to show that one other than the defendant was guilty of the offense is not impeachment, it is a substantive defense which cannot be limited by the trial court pursuant to the rules governing impeachment.

United States v. Shyllon, 10 F.3d 1 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

The defendant claimed that the prosecution witnesses had been intimidated by the investigator into testifying against him. In support of this argument he sought to call a potential prosecution witness, who did not testify for the government, and elicit testimony that the investigator threatened him. The defendant also tried to cross-examine the investigator about his threatening that non-testifying witness. The trial court erroneously excluded the testimony and the cross-examination. If the investigator intimidated the other witness, it would make it more likely that he intimidated the other witnesses; therefore, the testimony was relevant under Rule 401. Harmless error.
EVIDENCE
(Hearsay – Evidence Offered by the Government)

Richardson v. Griffin, 866 F.3d 836 (7th Cir. 2017)

The state introduced testimony from an officer concerning what witnesses told him about the identity of the shooter. The state argued that his evidence was introduced to explain the course of the police investigation, not for the truth of the matter asserted. The Seventh Circuit held that this violated the Confrontation Clause and granted the writ.

United States v. Cummings, 858 F.3d 763 (2d Cir. 2017)

The defendant, Cummings, was in jail. He allegedly threatened to kill Volcy, another inmate. But Volcy did not hear the threat directly from Cummings. Instead, he was told about the threat by another person (never identified). This presents a double hearsay problem. The out of court statement of Cummings was admissible (statement of a party), but the person who told Volcy that the threat by Cummings was made was not subject to any hearsay exception. The statement was offered for the truth of the matter asserted (i.e., Cummings uttered a death threat). The Second Circuit held that admitting this evidence was reversible error, because death threat evidence is potentially “toxic.”

United States v. Brooks, 772 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2014)

A postal inspector was permitted to repeat what he was told by the supervisor about the identity of the person who was mailing certain parcels. The fact that the supervisor’s statements were not repeated verbatim is irrelevant. The content of the supervisor’s identification testimony was introduced and the defendant was not able cross-examine the supervisor. “Out of court statements admitted at trial are statements for the purpose of the Confrontation Clause if, fairly read, they convey to the jury the substance of an out-of-court, testimonial statement of a witness who does not testify at trial.” The statements in this case were testimonial, because the supervisor knew his statements were being used to further an investigation and would be used to collect information necessary to make out a case against the suspect.

United States v. Groysman, 766 F.3d 147 (2d Cir. 2014)

The Second Circuit reversed this health care fraud conviction on the basis of several “egregious” evidentiary errors committed at trial. The defendant was charged with conspiring with a company that supplied durable medical equipment to prepare false invoices. The wholesaler was cooperating and taped many of the conversations, though many were inaudible. The government offered testimony from its case agent for several days at the start of trial. The agent (1) offered inadmissible bolstering testimony by testifying that certain transactions occurred, based only on his interviews of the cooperators – he had no personal knowledge to verify that these transactions occurred; (2) offered a summary chart which was not a summary of voluminous evidence, but simply a recitation of what he was supposedly told by the cooperators, thus violating both the hearsay rules and the bolstering rules and the rule governing the admissibility of summary charts; (3) the use of the agent to summarize the case at the outset was improper because it amounted to opinion testimony. The Second Circuit, as noted above, characterized these evidentiary errors as egregious and supported a plain error standard of review reversal.
United States v. Haldar, 751 F.3d 450 (7th Cir. 2014)

In a footnote (footnote 1), the Seventh Circuit cautions that the government should rarely be permitted to introduce “course of investigation” evidence, because of the likelihood that it will prompt the law enforcement officer to testify about inadmissible hearsay evidence that is supposedly not introduced for the truth of the matter asserted.

United States v. Nelson, 725 F.3d 615 (6th Cir. 2013)

An anonymous 9-1-1 caller’s description of a person who was seen in possession of a gun should not have been admitted in evidence, because it was hearsay and was not needed to “explain the police officer’s conduct” in detaining the defendant.

United States v. Demmitt, 706 F.3d 665 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant’s co-conspirator pled guilty and during his plea colloquy, a written factual basis was introduced and signed by the co-conspirator. The factual basis stated that the co-conspirator and the defendant conspired to commit the offense. At the defendant’s trial, the co-conspirator testified. He was asked if he signed the factual basis at his plea colloquy and he acknowledged that he did. There was no effort made by the government to establish that the prior signed statement qualified as a prior inconsistent statement. Instead, the government argued simply that the witness, having acknowledged that he signed the statement previously, adopted the statement and it was not, therefore, hearsay. The Fifth Circuit disagreed and held that admitting into evidence the signed factual basis for the truth of the matter asserted was error.

Jones v. Basinger, 635 F.3d 1030 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with murder. The key witness for the state testified that he participated in the home invasion with the defendant. That witness was vigorously cross-examined. The prosecution responded by calling the police officer who received a tip from an informant who provided considerable evidence against the defendant, as well as recited what he (the informant) had been told by one of the other participants in the murder. The state argued that this was offered to explain the police officers’ investigation and not for the truth of the matter asserted in the informant’s statement. The Seventh Circuit held that the evidence was not, in fact, offered for this purpose and was inadmissible hearsay that violated the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Holmes, 620 F.3d 836 (8th Cir. 2010)

The issue in this case was whether the defendant lived at a house where drugs and guns were found during the execution of a search warrant. When cross-examining the police officer, the defense attorney asked whether a certain item of evidence was all there was linking the defendant to the house. On re-direct, the prosecutor asked the officer to read the search warrant affidavit at length, which included the statement of a C.I. who did not testify at trial and who linked the defendant to the house. The Eighth Circuit held that this was error on hearsay and Confrontation Clause grounds. The evidence was not offered to “explain the officer’s conduct” and the defense attorney’s cross-examination did not “open the door” to the rebuttal, or waive the defendant’s Confrontation Clause guarantee.
United States v. Gomez, 617 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2010)

The police arrested Rivas. The officer told Rivas to call the person who supplied him with all the ecstasy pills. Rivas called the defendant, Gomez. At trial, the government offered this evidence to support the charge that Gomez was the supplier for Gomez. Rivas did not testify at trial. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction, holding that this was hearsay evidence (by inference) that also amounted to a violation of the Confrontation Clause. Even a limiting instruction by the court to the jury cautioning the jury not to consider the evidence for the truth of the matter asserted was not sufficient to cure the error. See also Ryan v. Miller, 303 F.3d 231 (2d Cir. 2002).

United States v. Kaiser, 609 F.3d 556 (2d Cir. 2010)

The government introduced a hearsay statement and argued that it was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but rather to explain the declarant’s state of mind and intent or, alternatively, to show the declarant’s knowledge. Neither of these arguments was sound, however. In addition, even if there were some non-hearsay basis to admit the testimony, the probative value was outweighed by its prejudicial effect and pursuant to Rule 403 should have resulted in excluding the evidence. Admitting this testimony was not harmless error.

United States v. Benitez-Avila, 570 F.3d 364 (1st Cir. 2009)

The government offered evidence that the police received a tip that the perpetrator was known as “The Twin.” The government acknowledged that this evidence was hearsay (the defendant, of course, was a twin) but offered the evidence to explain why the police focused on the defendant. The First Circuit rejected this “explaining the officer’s conduct” exception to the hearsay rule. Whether government agents had a reasonable, good faith basis or investigating the defendant is a completely different question than whether the evidence is sufficient to prove the defendant’s guilt. Only if the defendant puts the agents’ conduct in issue can such hearsay evidence be offered by the government to rebut a claim that the officer acted unreasonably.

Taylor v. Cain, 545 F.3d 327 (5th Cir. 2008)

The state offered testimony from an investigating officer about the investigation he performed including the information provided to him by other witnesses to the murder that implicated the defendant as the perpetrator. This constituted inadmissible hearsay that violated the defendant’s right of Confrontation.

United States v. McGee, 529 F.3d 691 (6th Cir. 2008)

The statements of a confidential informant to a police officer providing information about the defendant qualify as testimonial and, in this case, the officer should not have been permitted to testify about what the informant told him, even as “background” or to “explain the officer’s conduct.” Harmless error.

United States v. Johnson, 529 F.3d 493 (2d Cir. 2008)

The DEA agent’s testimony was replete with improper hearsay, opinion, vouching, and argumentative testimony. The agent testified about the course of the investigation, declaring, “We found out that . . .” and “We determined that . . .” The agent related what co-conspirators told him when they were first arrested, to explain what he did next in the investigation. He then explained what “corroboration” meant and explained what he did and learned to corroborate what he was told by informants and co-conspirators. He further explained that he was skeptical of what informants told him until he corroborated what they said and he was then able to ensure that the informants told him the truth. While it may be more interesting to a jury to learn how the police conduct investigations, a substantial amount of this testimony was inadmissible. Because defense counsel did not object, the plain error standard applied and the Second Circuit held that the inadmissible evidence did not meet this standard.

United States v. Hearn, 500 F.3d 479 (6th Cir. 2007)

Permitting the government to introduce considerable hearsay evidence to “explain the officer’s conduct” in keeping the defendant under surveillance, violated the rule against hearsay as well as the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights.

United States v. Powers, 500 F.3d 500 (6th Cir 2007)

The trial court erred when it permitted the prosecution to elicit evidence about what the confidential informant told the police. The evidence implicated the defendant was not necessary to provide background, or to explain the officers’ conduct. Harmless error.

United States v. Maher, 454 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2006)

The fact that the government offers an informant’s statements to the police “to explain the officer’s conduct” does not eliminate a Confrontation Clause problem. If the point of the inquiry is simply to explain what the officer did, then the officer should simply be asked, “Based on information received did you . . .” Because the defense did not object in this case, however, the error was only reviewed for plain error and was not sufficiently prejudicial to require setting aside the judgment.

United States v. Arbolaez, 450 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2006)

An officer may not testify about facts that he learned that prompted his efforts to obtain a search warrant. This is hearsay and is not admissible under the theory that it explains the officer’s conduct. Even a cautionary instruction does not render the evidence admissible. Harmless error.

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005)

The trial court erred in permitting an agent to testify about facts he learned from non-testifying people. The government’s suggestion that the testimony was admissible to explain the officer’s conduct was not a sufficient basis for violating the rules against hearsay.

United States v. Pugh, 405 F.3d 390 (6th Cir. 2005)

Introducing the out-of-court identification statement of a witness that fingered the defendants as the bank robbery (based on the declarant’s viewing of a surveillance tape) violated Crawford. The statement was given by the declarant to a police investigator (thus it was “testimonial”) and the statement was offered for the truth of the matter asserted – not, as the government suggested, merely to explain the officer’s conduct.

United States v. Cromer, 389 F.3d 662 (6th Cir. 2004)

652
During the defendant’s cross-examination of a police officer, he asked questions about a CI’s description that linked him to drug dealing. On re-direct, the government was permitted to pursue this line of questioning by asking about the specific statements made to the police by the CI. The trial court admitted the hearsay on the basis that the defendant “opened the door.” The Sixth Circuit disagreed. While as a matter of evidence law, the defendant may have opened the door, as a matter of constitutional law, he did not forfeit his rights under the Confrontation Clause. The admission of the CI’s statement to the police was a clear violation of Crawford. The cross-examination of the police officer amounted to foolish trial strategy, not misconduct that would forfeit the Confrontation Clause rights. Moreover, the government elicited other hearsay from the officer when he was asked about the basis for obtaining a search warrant.

United States v. Silva, 380 F.3d 1018 (7th Cir. 2004)

On more than occasion during the course of the trial, the government offered evidence that was clearly hearsay (including what informant’s told the police and the results of drug tests by crime labs) under the theory that the testimony was offered to explain the officers’ conduct, not for the truth of the matter asserted in the out of court statement. The Seventh Circuit reversed. The evidence was compounded by the prosecutor’s closing argument during which he relied on the hearsay evidence to show that the defendant was guilty.

The trial court erred in permitting a police officer to testify that he apprehended the defendant based on the report of a non-testifying complaining witness. Explaining the officer’s conduct was not necessary; therefore the non-hearsay purpose of offering this evidence was overshadowed by the prejudicial effect.

United States v. Chapman, 345 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 2003)

A missing witness previously assisted the police in catching one of his drug customers. His statements did not qualify under Rule 804(b)(3). The witness, “by casting himself as a mere mule and serving up the repeat buyer, could reasonably assume that he would be minimizing his criminal liability.” Therefore, the statement was not sufficiently against his penal interest to satisfy the Confrontation Clause. The court also rejected the government’s theory that the statements were admissible to explain the officers’ conduct in pursuing the buyer (defendant).

United States v. Lopez, 340 F.3d 169 (3rd Cir. 2003)

Prison officials searched the defendant’s cell and found drugs. During trial, two guards were asked why they conducted the search and they responded, over objection, “Because we received information that the defendant might be carrying drugs on his person in his cell.” This was inadmissible hearsay that necessitated reversing the conviction.

United States v. Marsh, 144 F.3d 1229 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendants operated a tax shelter scheme that invited people to “untax themselves” by various schemes (none of which, of course, actually untaxed anybody). Many people wrote letters to the defendants, complaining that the scheme did not work. At the defendants’ trial, these letters were read to the jury. The government was also permitted to read newspaper editorials into the record (the articles were found in the defendants’ property) that decried the fraud perpetrated by tax protestors. The government claimed that this evidence was admissible to prove the defendants’ state of mind. However, the jury was not instructed that the letters could not be considered for the truth of the matter asserted.

United States v. Johnston, 127 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1997)
The government improperly asked a series of questions to various law enforcement officers that elicited hearsay responses. For example, one officer was asked what he did after speaking with another law enforcement officer and the witness responded that he re-focused his testimony on the defendant. This testimony was improper hearsay and should not have been admitted "to explain the officer's conduct." Eliciting such testimony over and over again amounted to prosecutorial misconduct.

United States v. Lovelace, 123 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 1997)
The police went to a particular location after receiving a tip that the defendant would be there engaged in a cocaine transaction. The defendant was arrested at another location. There was no necessity for introducing evidence of the tip at trial. The defense did not question the police tactics (thereby prompting the government to show that the police were acting on a tip) and there was no other reason that the tip was relevant. Even with a limiting instruction, the admission of this evidence was erroneous. But it was harmless error.

United States v. Williams, 133 F.3d 1048 (7th Cir. 1998)
After a bank robbery, a confidential informant identified the defendants as the perpetrators. A photo line-up was prepared and the teller identified the defendant as the perpetrator. At trial, the confidential informant's identification was admitted in evidence to explain the background of the photo line-up. This was inadmissible hearsay and was reversible error.

United States v. Cass, 127 F.3d 1218 (10th Cir. 1997)
The defendant was charged with falsely claiming that she had been kidnapped. At trial, the case agent was permitted to testify about the various witness statements made to him during the course of investigation. The government argued that the out-of-court declarations were not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but to explain the course of the investigation (in response, in part, to the defendant's opening statement which stressed the inadequacies of the investigation). The Tenth Circuit held that this hearsay evidence was inadmissible. Harmless error.

United States v. Mazza, 792 F.2d 1210 (1st Cir. 1986)
Police officers were permitted to testify about what their informant told them about the defendant’s narcotics activities. The district court allowed the evidence on the theory that the informant’s statements explained the subsequent conduct of the law enforcement agents. The First Circuit holds that this is error, albeit harmless in this case. The probative value of this evidence was far outweighed by the risk that the jury would consider the words of the informant for their truth, not as an explanation of the agent’s conduct. Furthermore, coming from the mouth of an agent, the information was more credible than had it come from an informant.
The defendant’s co-conspirator entered a guilty plea with an attached stipulated statement of a factual basis, which included incriminating evidence about the defendant. At defendant’s trial, when the co-conspirator testified for the government, the defense counsel cross-examined the witness and referred to his cooperation agreement and the benefits he obtained by cooperating. The government then introduced the entire plea agreement, with the attached stipulated statement of facts. This was inadmissible hearsay and should not have been admitted under the doctrine of completeness, Fed.R.Evid. 106.

An officer testified that the reason he went to a hotel was “narcotics-related” and when asked by the prosecutor, added that a witness had led him to this conclusion. This was inadmissible hearsay. The officer’s motivation for going to the hotel was not a relevant issue in the case. On another issue, an officer was asked why he had not included the defendant’s name in a report which detailed a cooperating witness’s statement. The officer responded that he already knew about the defendant, so there was no need to include this information. The government then asked the agent how he “already knew” about the defendant. The agent then detailed the hearsay statements of other participants. Although this evidence was technically not offered for the truth of the matter asserted (it was offered to explain why the name of the defendant did not appear in the report), it should have been excluded under Rule 403. The probative value of the evidence (in its non-hearsay context) was outweighed by the prejudicial impact the evidence would have.

In order to amount to hearsay, the witness does not have to repeat verbatim what was told to him by the out-of-court declarant. Thus, a question such as, “Did your conversation with that person further confirm your suspicion that somebody else was involved in the criminal activity?” if answered affirmatively, amounts to hearsay. In this case, the prosecutor asked numerous such questions, and then explained that the government was only trying to establish the witness’ reasons for further investigation, rather than trying to establish the truth of the matter asserted by the declarant. While this was technically correct, the likelihood was sufficiently high that the jury would not follow the limiting instructions, but would treat the evidence as proof of the truth of the declaration. Thus, the evidence was inadmissible hearsay. In evaluating offers of evidence “to explain the conduct of the witness” (law enforcement agent), the following questions should be considered: (1) Does the background or state of mind evidence contribute to the proof of the defendant’s guilt? (2) If so, how important is it to the jury’s understanding of the issues? (3) Can the needed explanation of background or state of mind be adequately communicated by other less prejudicial evidence or by instructions? (4) Has the defendant engaged in a tactic that justifiably opens the door to such evidence to avoid prejudice to the government? In evaluating the potential prejudice, these questions should be considered: (a) Does the declaration address an important disputed issue in the trial? (b) Is the same information shown by other uncontested evidence? (c) Was the statement made by a knowledgeable declarant so that it is likely to be credited by the jury? (d) Will the declarant testify at trial, thus rendering him available for cross-examination? (e) If so, will he testify to the same effect as the out-of-court statement? (f) Is the out-of-court statement admissible in any event as a prior consistent, or inconsistent, statement? (g) Can curative or limiting instructions effectively protect against misuse or prejudice? In this case, virtually every one of these questions was answered by the appellate court in favor of excluding the evidence. Even a limiting instruction was presumed to be insufficient to deal with the potency of the evidence, and the conviction was therefore reversed.

United States v. Tussa, 816 F.2d 58 (2d Cir. 1987)

An FBI agent was permitted to testify that an unidentified informant had told him that he had seen the defendant leaving a building with a bag under his coat shortly before the heroin was delivered at another site. The admission of the statement was harmful error with respect to two defendants, the one who delivered the bag, and the one who acted as the middle man.

United States v. Sallins, 993 F.2d 344 (3rd Cir. 1993)

The government offered evidence of the content of a 911 tape into evidence to put the police officer’s conduct “in context.” This was inadmissible hearsay and necessitated a new trial.
The government’s argument that the content of the tape was only offered to explain the officers’ conduct did not provide an exception to the hearsay rule: the officers’ conduct was not material.

United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3rd Cir. 1992)

The government introduced bank wire transfer records for the truth of the matter asserted – that is, to show the movement of money from the bank to the corporation and then diverted to the defendant. The records were not admissible as a business record, because no custodian identified the documents or established the foundation for the admissibility on this theory. No other exception could be used to authorize the admission of the documents. This was reversible error.

Monachelli v. Warden, 884 F.2d 749 (3rd Cir. 1989)

The out-of-court statements of a co-defendant should not have been admitted at the defendant’s trial.

United States v. Hall, 989 F.2d 711 (4th Cir. 1993)

Defendant’s wife made statements to an investigator which implicated the defendant in drug dealing. Prior to trial, however, the wife asserted her marital privilege and refused to testify.
The prosecutor, in cross-examining the defendant made repeated references to the wife’s statement, even announcing to the jury that his questions were based on the wife’s three-page statement. Aside from violating the marital privilege, this amounted to the improper introduction of hearsay. Even a curative instruction, directing the jury to disregard the alleged statements of the wife, did not cure this error.

United States v. Guadian-Salazar, 824 F.2d 344 (5th Cir. 1987)

A videotaped deposition of two government witnesses who were in prison in Mexico was used at trial despite the fact that the witnesses were released from Mexico within days of their signing of the deposition. They were available for trial and the admission of the deposition constituted reversible error.

United States v. Arroyo, 805 F.2d 589 (5th Cir. 1986)

Inadmissible hearsay of a co-conspirator was admitted at trial. It was impossible to carve out and surgically isolate those portions of the indictment and subsequent verdict which were tainted by this testimony and consequently the conviction was reversed.

United States v. Hathaway, 798 F.2d 902 (6th Cir. 1986)

In a fraud prosecution, false statements are never hearsay. As a general rule, a statement offered to prove its falsity is never hearsay under Rule 801(c).
Gaines v. Thieret, 846 F.2d 402 (7th Cir. 1988)

Prior to a police officer testifying about the defendant’s statements about the crime, the State sought to introduce evidence that the defendant’s brother had made statements to the police officer incriminating the defendant. This admission of hearsay constituted reversible error in this death penalty case.

United States v. Montoya, 827 F.2d 143 (7th Cir. 1987)

The DEA agent’s testimony concerning the statement by a drug courier suspect implicating the defendant in a cocaine smuggling operation was inadmissible hearsay.

United States v. Blake, 107 F.3d 651 (8th Cir. 1997)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to offer hearsay statements of a confidential informant that the defendant was a drug dealer for the supposed limited purpose of explaining why the police began their investigation. There was no relevance to why the police began their investigation, so such testimony had no legitimate basis, other than to establish through hearsay that the defendant was a drug dealer.

United States v. Benson, 961 F.2d 707 (8th Cir. 1992)

Though the error was harmless, the prosecutor should not have read to the jury a statement of the defendant in an FBI case agent report. The report was hearsay and did not qualify under any exception to the hearsay rule.

Webb v. Lewis, 44 F.3d 1387 (9th Cir. 1994)

The state offered the hearsay statements of a child abuse victim which had been made to a social worker on videotape under the state version of Rule 803(4). This was clearly erroneous, however. The social worker was not a doctor and nothing about her relationship to the child reflected a medical relationship. The social worker’s function was to investigate the charges of sexual abuse which had been made against the defendant. The child in no way was seeking medical attention. The videotaped statement was also inadmissible under the residual exception to the hearsay rule. There were inconsistencies in her statements and a lack of spontaneity which indicated that she had been coached by other people prior to the videotaped statement. See Idaho v. Wright, 110 S.Ct. 3139 (1990).

United States v. Dean, 980 F.2d 1286 (9th Cir. 1992)

Defendant was tried on weapons possession charges. Over objection from the defense, a police officer testified that he was told by another person that the defendant had fired a weapon in his presence. The government argued that this hearsay was admissible to show why the police went to the defendant’s house. While it is true that the hearsay statement did explain the officer’s conduct, the officer’s conduct was not relevant to any issue in the case. Because the defendant’s possession of the weapon was disputed, this was reversible error.

United States v. Tafollo-Cardenas, 897 F.2d 976 (9th Cir. 1990)

The government offered the testimony of a witness who recanted her prior statement which implicated the defendant. The government convinced the trial court to admit the prior statement as substantive evidence. The evidence was not admissible as substantive evidence; because the trial court did not instruct the jury that the prior statement was only admissible for impeachment purposes, the conviction was reversed.
United States v. Scrima, 819 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1987)

The defendant’s accountant’s testimony as to the defendant’s reference to an undisclosed cash hoard was inadmissible hearsay in a prosecution for income tax evasion.

United States v. Eccleston, 961 F.2d 955 (D.C.Cir. 1992)

An officer was repeatedly asked, “What else did your investigation reveal?” He responded with the likes of, “They told me they were going to [the defendant’s house] to buy crack cocaine.” This was clearly inadmissible hearsay – “they” were not co-conspirators and knew they were being interviewed by a police officer – and required reversal of defendant’s conviction.
EVIDENCE
(Hearsay – Evidence Offered by the Defendant)

United States v. Slatten, 865 F.3d 767 (D.C. Cir. 2017)

This is the Blackwater prosecution relating to the murders committed by military contractors while serving in Iraq. Reversal was required because the trial court refused to sever one defendant’s case which was requested in order to introduce the statement of a co-defendant that was inadmissible in a joint trial. Severance is required under Rule 14 if it is necessary in order to assure that a defendant can introduce evidence that would be inadmissible at a joint trial, and which is essential to the defendant’s right to a fair trial. The statement of the co-defendant exonerated the defendant. Even though the co-defendant would not have testified at defendant’s severed trial, the statement of the co-defendant would have been admissible pursuant to Rule 807, the residual exception to the hearsay rule. The co-defendant’s statements to the authorities investigating the shooting contained equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness: the co-defendant was speaking pursuant to a grant of immunity; he was implicating himself; his statements were consistent over time. Because the statement of the co-defendant would have been admissible at a separate trial, the trial court erred in denying the severance motion.

Kubsch v. Neal, 838 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2016)

The defendant was convicted of a triple murder. He contended that he was not at the location of the crime when the murders occurred. About five days after the killings, a young girl was interviewed on tape by the police and her statements exonerated the defendant. By the time of trial, however, she no longer remembered the events and even after reviewing the taped interview, her recollection was not refreshed. The defense was unavailing in invoking the “past recollection recorded” exception to the hearsay rule, because the witness could not even verify that the recorded statement reflected her observations. The Seventh Circuit held that the recorded interview should have been admitted by the state trial court under the Chambers v. Mississippi 410 U.S. 284 (1973), Dur Process doctrine. See also Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979) and Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986), cases in which the Supreme Court held that there are cases in which Due Process trumps state evidence rules that would exclude evidence favorable to the defense.

United States v. Certified Environmental Services, Inc., 753 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2014)

Federal and State laws regulate the removal of asbestos from buildings, including OSHA regulations and the Clean Air Act. A company that removes asbestos must comply with various laws regarding the method of removal and a separate “monitoring” company must monitor the air after the removal is accomplished. The defendants in this case (a company and several employees) were involved in monitoring asbestos removal and were charged with not properly monitoring the asbestos removal and submitting false monitoring reports. The defense sought to introduce evidence at trial about certain conversations with officials about their monitoring practices, specifically, whether particular monitoring practices were required if the location was not sufficiently “contained” (i.e., the area where the asbestos was being removed was not fully contained which might result in the monitoring causing more contamination in nearby areas). The government objected that these conversations were hearsay. The trial court’s exclusion of this evidence was reversible error. The evidence relating to the conversations with regulators was not offered to prove the truthfulness of the information provided by the regulators, but to prove that the defendants were acting in good faith when they engaged in certain monitoring practices. The fact that some of the conversations occurred after the criminal conduct did not make the evidence irrelevant, because it was consistent with what the defendants claimed was there long-standing understanding of the monitoring rules.

Alvarez v. Ercole, 763 F.3d 223 (2d Cir. 2014)

The state trial court erred in preventing the defense from cross-examining the lead detective about other investigations that were not pursued. The investigation that was not done was not subject to a hearsay objection, because the issue is not the truthfulness of what was told to a police officer conducting the investigation, but whether there were leads that were not followed. Denying the defense the right to cross-examine the detective violated the Confrontation Clause and was particularly harmful, because the prosecutor argued in closing that the investigation was thorough.

United States v. Feliz, 794 F.3d 123 (1st Cir. 2015)

The defendant tried to suppress his confession on the basis that it was the result of threats made to him about deporting his mother and other family members. At the hearing, the defendant’s sister was prepared to testify that she heard the police threaten the defendant’s mother (in the defendant’s presence). The trial court excluded this as hearsay. This was reversible error. The truthfulness of the threat was not why it was being introduced; what was relevant was whether the threat was made and therefore it was admissible to prove the effect that the threat had on Feliz.

United States v. Leonard-Allen, 739 F.3d 948 (7th Cir. 2013)

During the defendant’s testimony, he was asked why he went to the bank to purchase a CD. His answer was offered to explain his state of mind and to show that he did not have fraudulent intent. The government objected on grounds of hearsay and the trial court sustained the objection. This was reversible error. The evidence was admitted to show the defendant’s state of mind, not to prove the truth of the matter asserted by the person who directed him to purchase the CD. In fact, the defendant would have argued that what he was told was not true, but it explained his state of mind when he purchased the CD. Reversible error.

United States v. Ibisevic, 675 F.3d 342 (4th Cir. 2012)

The defendant carried over $10,000 into an international flight from Dulles Airport heading to Bosnia. An ICE agent who had a Puerto Rican accent questioned the defendant and his mother (the mother spoke no English) about whether they were carrying cash. The defendant responded that they had $5,000.00. During this “questioning” the defendant turned to his mother and translated, “They are asking how much the luggage is worth if it is lost.” The defendant and his mother actually had about $40,000 in the luggage, on their persons and in the mother’s purse. At trial, the defendant claimed that he did not understand the question and that the mother’s testimony (about what the defendant said to the mother) was admissible as a “present sense impression” to show a lack of understanding. The trial court held that this was hearsay and inadmissible. The Fourth Circuit reversed: The defendant’s statement was not hearsay (it was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted; it nevertheless would qualify as a present sense impression; and it was important to his defense regarding his lack of understanding that he was making a false statement or knowingly failing to file a currency form in violation of the law.

United States v. Neadeau, 639 F.3d 453 (8th Cir. 2011)

If a prior statement of a person is offered to prove that the person said something false, it is not hearsay. In this case, the government offered evidence that the defendant’s wife, who was a co-defendant at trial, had previously testified that her husband was not a drug dealer and did not own a Chevrolet Blazer and did not visit the Twin Cities in 2009. The government offered this evidence to show that the wife was untruthful, not to prove that the defendant did not own the car, or make that trip. (I include this case in this section, because it shows that a party may offer the prior untruthful statements of a person – not necessarily a witness – if the statements are offered to prove that the declarant is a liar).

United States v. Waters, 627 F.3d 345 (9th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with arson in connection with her activities with an environmental “terrorist” group. After she was first contacted by the FBI, she called her cousin and told him that the FBI might contact him and, “I am innocent” and “tell them the truth.” The first statement “I am innocent” is hearsay and the defendant was properly prohibited from introducing that out-of-court statement. But the second statement, urging her cousin to tell the truth, is not hearsay, because there is no assertion of fact that was being offered. That part of her statement was not hearsay and should have been admitted to show the defendant’s lack of guilty mindset.

United States v. Mateos, 623 F.3d 1350 (11th Cir. 2010)

Two defendants were prosecuted for health care fraud in connection with their operation of a clinic. One defendant, a nurse, sought to introduce a surreptitious recording of a conversation between her and other people in the clinic during which the other people sought to assure her that the operation of the clinic was lawful and proper. The tape was not offered to prove that the clinic was operated legally, but to show that she was not a knowing conspirator and that she lacked knowledge of the illegal practices. The trial court erroneously excluded the tape on the basis that it was hearsay. Because the tape was not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, admitting it was not barred by the hearsay rules.

Lunbery v. Hornbeak, 605 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2010)

Relying on Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), the Ninth Circuit held that excluding evidence that a witness heard another person confess to the murder with which the defendant was charged was reversible error. If, as in this case, the hearsay evidence is reliable and the declarant is unavailable, excluding the evidence under a state rule of evidence violates the federal Due Process Clause.

United States v. Moran, 493 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2007)

Excluding evidence about what the defendant was told by her attorney and CPA about the legitimacy of the tax shelters was reversible error. Such testimony is not hearsay and cannot be excluded pursuant to Rule 403.

The government introduced a tape that suggested that the defendant was participating in a cover-up. The defendant responded by offering a tape of a conversation shortly thereafter during which he told the person on the phone, “Just tell the truth.” The government persuaded the trial court that this was hearsay. The trial court erred in excluding this testimony. The defendant’s statement was not hearsay, because it was not offered to prove the truth of what he said, but rather to show that he instructed others to tell the truth. Harmless error.

Chia v. Cambra, 360 F.3d 997 (9th Cir. 2004)

It is clearly established federal law that when a hearsay statement bears persuasive assurances of trustworthiness and is critical to the defense, the exclusion of that statement may rise to the level of a due process violation. Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973). In this case, two DEA agents were murdered during an undercover deal. During the ensuing arrest of one of the perpetrators, the perpetrator was shot. He made several statements, however, some shortly before being wheeled into surgery and others after he was out of surgery. In each of these statements, he revealed who was involved in the murder. The defendant in this case was not named as a member of the conspiracy. At trial, the witness refused to testify. The defendant sought to introduce the witness’s statements. The Ninth Circuit held that there were sufficient indicia of trustworthiness associated with these statements to support their admission. Excluding this evidence violated the defendant’s due process right to present a defense.

United States v. Parsons, 141 F.3d 386 (1st Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with bank fraud in that he used money designated as a construction loan for personal expenditures. At trial, he proffered testimony that he was told by his attorney that the money the defendant used came from a line of credit, not from the construction loan. This was not inadmissible hearsay, because the evidence was not offered to prove that the money was, in fact, from a line of credit, but rather, to prove that the defendant believed it was derived from a line of credit. Harmless error.

United States v. Lis, 120 F.3d 28 (4th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with embezzlement. The government relied in part on a “net worth” theory -- that is, she spent more than she legally earned. She claimed that when her husband died, she discovered cash in a suitcase and also in the suitcase was a document showing calculations in her husband's handwriting. The trial court erred in excluding the document on hearsay grounds. Nothing in the document was being offered for the truth of the matter asserted. Indeed, the only matter asserted in the document was a mathematical calculation (adding numbers). The document was offered to corroborate defendant's claim that she found money in the suitcase, and this was not hearsay. Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

United States v. Detrich, 865 F.2d 17 (2d Cir. 1988)

The defendant was on trial for importing heroin. He sought to introduce the testimony of a witness who would have testified that the defendant had been tricked by an acquaintance in Asia who had convinced him to carry a suitcase back to his brother for the brother’s wedding. The defendant sought to offer this testimony to show that he did not have the intent to import heroin. The statement which the defendant sought to introduce was the brother’s statement that he was, in fact, getting married at the relevant time. The trial court erred in excluding this testimony as it would have corroborated the defendant’s testimony and enhanced his credibility.

United States v. Kohan, 806 F.2d 18 (2d Cir. 1986)

It was reversible error for the trial court to exclude evidence of a conversation between a defendant and a co-defendant which was offered to explain the defendant’s state of mind. The evidence was not submitted to prove the truth of the co-defendant’s statements that the conduct was legitimate, but only to show that statements were made and the defendant believed them to be true, thus suggesting that he did not have bad intent.

United States v. Carter, 801 F.2d 78 (2d Cir. 1986)

In this firearms prosecution, the defendant defended on the basis of entrapment. The government was permitted to introduce a tape of the defendant’s confederate calling up the law enforcement agent and badgering him to come to a meeting and consummate the deal. The tape was admissible as it demonstrated the state of mind of the defendant and his confederate, and disproved the existence of entrapment. The tape was not admitted for the truth of the statements made.

United States v. Cantu, 876 F.2d 1134 (5th Cir. 1989)

In this drug prosecution, the defendant claimed that he was entrapped. He sought to introduce the statements of the informant who urged him to commit the offense, but the Court ruled the evidence inadmissible on hearsay grounds. However, the statements were not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but rather to explain the defendant’s conduct. The testimony should have been admitted.

United States v. Ebens, 800 F.2d 1422 (6th Cir. 1986)

A key witness in this civil rights prosecution had been “coached” in preparation of his testimony. The defense attorney sought to play a tape of this coaching but was prohibited by the trial court which held that this constituted inadmissible hearsay. The Sixth Circuit holds that this is incorrect. The tapes were introduced not to prove the truth of the matter asserted – quite the contrary – they were introduced to show that the witness was influenced by this coaching.

United States v. Hanson, 994 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1993)

In his trial on charges of filing an incomplete tax return, the defendant sought to introduce evidence of a conversation he had with his superior in which his superior told him that certain information did not have to appear on a conflict of interest form. The statement of his superior was not offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but to show the defendant’s state of mind. Excluding this testimony was error, but harmless.

Rivera v. Director, Department of Corrections, 915 F.2d 280 (7th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was convicted of murder, but at his trial was precluded from introducing the confession of his co-defendant who exculpated him. The co-defendant was tried separately and refused to testify at the defendant’s trial. Following the rule in Chambers v. Mississippi, the Seventh Circuit holds that the exclusion of this evidence denied the defendant due process in light of the vital nature of this hearsay testimony. The defendant was entitled to a new trial.

United States v. Norwood, 798 F.2d 1094 (7th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was on trial for knowingly possessing stolen goods. The defendant offered evidence of what was said to him when another person handed him the credit cards. This evidence was admissible to show the defendant’s state of mind, and his knowledge as to whether the credit cards were stolen. The trial court erred in excluding the testimony, but it was harmless in this case because the defendant was otherwise able to present his theory through other witnesses.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 104 – Preliminary determination of admissibility)

United States v. Evans, 728 F.3d 953 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with various offenses involving his alien status and acquiring a false passport and certain federal benefits. The defendant sought to introduce a birth certificate he received from the State of Idaho. The trial court granted the government’s motion in limine excluding the birth certificate on the basis of Rule 403 and Rule 104 and the trial court’s conclusion that the birth certificate was fraudulently obtained. The Ninth Circuit reversed: Rule 104 is not a substantive rule of evidence. It simply is the procedure by which other rules of evidence (e.g., privilege, constitutional, hearsay). The trial court’s conclusion that the birth certificate was fraudulently obtained was not a decision that the trial court could make, especially since it was based on the judge’s credibility determination of the witnesses. When making a decision based on Rule 403, the judge must assume the truthfulness of the proffer regarding the evidence. Excluding the evidence in this case was a constitutional due process violation.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 106 – Rule of Completeness)

United States v. Ramos-Caraballo, 375 F.3d 797 (8th Cir. 2004)
During the police officer’s testimony, the defense attorney cross-examined him about inconsistencies between his trial testimony and his police report, his testimony at the grand jury and his testimony at a suppression hearing. In re-direct, the prosecutor offered the entire police report, as well as a transcript of the witness’s entire grand jury testimony and his suppression hearing testimony. This was improper “rule of completeness” evidence. Only when the evidence offered by the opposing party is taken out of context, is distorted, or otherwise in need of balance, should the balance of the written document be admitted. Harmless error.

United States v. Awon, 135 F.3d 96 (1st Cir. 1998)
The government attempted to introduce the entirety of a witness’s prior statement implicating the defendant in the charged offense. The evidence was inadmissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B), because the prior statement was not made prior to the time the witness had a motive to seek leniency. The hearsay was also not admissible pursuant to Rule 106, the Rule of Completeness, because the portions of the statement used by the defendant when cross-examining the witness were not taken out of context, or misleading, or a distortion of the balance of the statement. Harmless error.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 403 – Prejudice versus Relevance)

Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997)

In a prosecution for being a felon in possession of a firearm, though the nature of the defendant’s prior offense is relevant pursuant to the definition of relevance under Rule 401, the defendant’s willingness to stipulate that he was a convicted felon obviates the need for this evidence and the trial court, pursuant to Rule 403, should accept the stipulation and bar evidence relating to the nature of the prior offense. The court explained that generally, the availability of alternative methods of proving a relevant fact is something that the district court may consider in evaluating whether evidence should be admitted over a Rule 403 objection. Thus, if evidence is relevant in one respect, but irrelevant and prejudicial in some other respect, the court should consider whether there exists an alternative method of proving the fact that is relevant.

United States v. Bailey, 840 F.3d 99 (3rd Cir. 2016)

The defendants were charged with numerous offenses, including a heroin conspiracy and gun charges. One of the gun charges required proof that the gun was used to further the drug conspiracy. There was evidence introduced that a gun was used to murder a rival drug dealer. Evidence of the murder was admissible. But there was no need to show a video of the murder actually occurring: the graphic video was far more prejudicial than probative. Harmless error.

United States v. Alvarez-Nunez, 828 F.3d 52 (1st Cir. 2016)

Though this is a sentencing decision, not a Rule 403 case, the court addressed the issue of whether a defendant’s music could be a relevant factor at sentencing, and thus may be a case worth noting when the government introduces such things as rap lyrics to prove a defendant’s predisposition, etc. The First Circuit held that a defendant’s music should not be any more relevant to a sentencing decision than an actor’s portrayal of a sadistic character.

United States v. McElmurry, 776 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with possessing and distributing child pornography. Prior to trial, the government announced its intention to offer evidence of a letter written by the defendant several years earlier in which he described his addiction to pornography and his ability to encrypt his computer to avoid law enforcement detection. The district judge denied the defendant’s motion in limine, without having actually read the letter, basing his decision solely on the proffer of the government. This was reversible error.

United States v. Morgan, 786 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2015)

Evidence that the defendant tried to hire a hitman to kill a government witness (informant) was too prejudicial to be probative and should have been excluded at trial pursuant to Rule 403.

Gumm v. Mitchell, 775 F.3d 345 (6th Cir. 2014)

The prosecutor introduced evidence in a murder trial that the defendant admitted having sex with a horse (and that the horse talked to him) and other evidence of deviant sexual acts that were contained in psychiatric reports. The Sixth Circuit, reviewing the case in habeas, held that this amounted to flagrant prosecutorial misconduct that required setting aside the conviction.

United States v. Gomez, 763 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2014) (en banc)

The Seventh Circuit, sitting en banc, reconstructs the analysis that must be used in deciding whether to admit other crimes evidence. Rather than a strict four-part test, the court insists that the ultimate questions are relevance and unfair prejudice and issues such as similarity and recency are relevant, but not “checklist” items that must be checked: “The extent to which a proffered “other crime, wrong, or act” is close in time and similar to the conduct at issue in the case may have a bearing on its relevance, which is the starting point for all evidence questions, but the importance of testing for similarity and recency will depend on the specific purpose for which the other-act evidence is offered. The proponent of the other-act evidence should address its relevance directly, without the straightjacket of an artificial checklist.” Second, the government must explain the legitimate purpose for which the evidence is offered in a way that does not include propensity as part of the reasoning. The trial court must not simply ask whether the other act evidence is being offered for a non-propensity purpose; the court must ask how the evidence establishes an element in a non-propensity way. And, finally, the court must determine whether the non-propensity purpose is a legitimately disputed issue at trial that would make the evidence more probative on that issue than prejudicial. Thus, with general intent crimes, such as drug possession or drug distribution offenses, the mere fact that the defendant enters a not guilty plea does not make his intent an issue that can be proven by the government with Rule 404(b) evidence, unless the defendant expressly disputes his intent at trial. The court emphasized that a carefully-crafted case-specific jury instruction should be given to the jury that expressly limits the use of this evidence, emphasizes the burden of proof on the government to prove each element beyond a reasonable doubt, and cautions against using the evidence to prove that the defendant is a bad person.

United States v. Caldwell, 760 F.3d 267 (3rd Cir. 2014)

In this trial for possession of a weapon by a convicted felon, the trial court erroneously permitted the government to introduce evidence of the defendant’s prior conviction for possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. The defendant denied possessing the weapon. The police testified that they saw the defendant with the gun in his hand. The government argued (and the trial court agreed) that the prior conviction was admissible to prove knowledge and intent. The Third Circuit reversed: the prior conviction did not prove anything about the defendant’s intent or knowledge in this case. The defense was that he did not possess the gun at all, so his knowledge or intent was not relevant. In addition, the government argued that the prior conviction was admissible pursuant to Rule 609, because the defendant testified and the prior conviction was introduced to impeach his credibility. The Third Circuit held that the Rule 403 balancing test weighed in favor of excluding this form of impeachment. This is a significant decision that devotes nearly 20 pages in the published opinion to the inadmissibility of the prior conviction under either the Rule 404(b) or Rule 609 bases.

United States v. Delgado-Marrero, 744 F.3d 167 (1st Cir. 2014)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce sexual orientation evidence relating to the two defendants. One defendant, a female police officer, was accused of participating in providing corrupt security for a drug deal. She claimed that she was entrapped by the undercover officer who lured her into the corrupt deal by having sex with her. At trial, the government offered evidence that the defendant was a lesbian and the evidence was offered to rebut her claim that the undercover officer (male) had sex with her. The trial judge commented that in his 67 years of experience, he was not aware that lesbians would have sex with males. The First Circuit held that admitting this evidence was error (and questioned the trial judge’s supposed “wisdom” on this point), but the error was deemed not to be prejudicial enough to warrant setting aside the conviction of a co-defendant.

_United States v. Adams_, 722 F.3d 788 (6th Cir. 2013)

The government offered hearsay evidence that the defendants were accused of vote-buying in prior years in this case that involved allegations of vote-buying. The government suggested that the accusations were offered no for the truth of the matter asserted. The court, citing Justice Cardozo, held that “the reverberating clang of those accusatory words would drown all weaker sounds” and held that admitting the evidence was an abuse of discretion.

_United States v. Evans_, 728 F.3d 953 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with various offenses involving his alien status and acquiring a false passport and certain federal benefits. The defendant sought to introduce a birth certificate he received from the State of Idaho. The trial court granted the government’s motion in limine excluding the birth certificate on the basis of Rule 403 and Rule 104 and the trial court’s conclusion that the birth certificate was fraudulently obtained. The Ninth Circuit reversed: Rule 104 is not a substantive rule of evidence. It simply is the procedure by which other rules of evidence (e.g., privilege, constitutional, hearsay). The trial court’s conclusion that the birth certificate was fraudulently obtained was not a decision that the trial court could make, especially since it was based on the judge’s credibility determination of the witnesses. When making a decision based on Rule 403, the judge must assume the truthfulness of the proffer regarding the evidence. Excluding the evidence in this case was a constitutional due process violation.

_United States v. Ramirez-Fuentes_, 703 F.3d 1038 (7th Cir. 2013)

The government elicited testimony that the methamphetamine involved in this case was “Mexican methamphetamine.” The Seventh Circuit held that this was reversible error. The testimony prejudiced the defendant, who was Mexican and was unnecessary to decide any issue in the case.

_United States v. Cunningham_, 694 F.3d 372 (3rd Cir. 2012)

The trial court committed reversible error by failing to engage in the Rule 403 balancing test prior to sending out child pornography videos to the jury room. Though the jury is permitted to see evidence of the crime, some of the videos in this case were so disturbing that the judge should have withheld them from the jury’s view. In fact, the trial judge did not examine the videos before sending them to the jury room, relying instead on a description of the videos. The defendant stipulated that the images on the computer were child pornography.

_United States v. Boros_, 668 F.3d 901 (7th Cir. 2012)
In this internet pharmacy prosecution, the government was permitted to introduce evidence by an expert about how certain drugs are scheduled, why they are prescribed and why a prescription is needed. While this information was interesting and probative background information, it was not relevant to any issue in the case or any of the essential elements of the crime. As such, the probative value was outweighed by the unfair prejudicial impact of the evidence. Harmless error.

United States v. Loughry, 660 F.3d 965 (7th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with advertising and distributing child pornography. The charges related to a specific website that included images of prepubescent girls posing nude. There were no images of sexual contact. At trial, however, the government was permitted to introduce evidence of other child pornography that was found on the defendant’s computer that was not part of the charged offenses and which included videos of sadistic child pornography, including scenes of rape. The Seventh Circuit held that permitting the government to introduce this evidence was reversible error. The evidence was not probative of any issue in the case and even under Rule 414, a rule 403 analysis must be accomplished. Among other errors, the trial court’s failure to review the material prior to admitting it was erroneous.

United States v. Gamory, 635 F.3d 480 (11th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with being the leader of a drug and money laundering operation. Evidence established that he owned a music recording business, as well. During the trial, the government located a video produced by the studio on YouTube. The video referred to drugs and money laundering, but was also replete with references to sex, degradation of women, violence directed at women and law enforcement. The defendant did not appear on the video and there was no evidence that he wrote the lyrics. Admitting the video was improper and should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403. Harmless error.

United States v. Tanner, 628 F.3d 890 (7th Cir. 2010)

Defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy. Several years earlier, he was in possession of a gun at a New Years Eve party. While there may be some limited relevance to his possession of a firearm previously (guns are “tools of the trade of drug dealers”) the probative value was outweighed by the unfair prejudicial impact. Harmless error.

United States v. Waters, 627 F.3d 345 (9th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with arson in connection with the destruction of certain property that was allegedly motivated by environmental concerns. The defendant was alleged to be a member of an environment terroristic group. At trial, the government was permitted to introduce evidence of various articles promoting anarchist ideals that she gave to another conspirator. The Ninth Circuit held that the introduction of a defendant’s “reading material” will rarely be admissible to prove the defendant’s guilt of a crime. In this case, the evidence should have been excluded. The district court abused its discretion, because the judge failed to read every page of all the articles in order to properly assess the probative value of the evidence.

United States v. Klebig, 600 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was charged with possession of an unlawful unregistered firearm. His home was full of junk. A “breath-taking” amount, according to the Seventh Circuit. Items, including squirrel tails, oil cans, pornography, syringes, chemicals, prescription bottles were everywhere. The government sought to introduce a sign that said, “Nothing in here is worth dying for” and a surveillance system at the house. The government contended that the evidence was admissible to show “knowledge” that the sawed off shotgun had the characteristics that required it to be registered. The government also argued that the evidence was inextricably intertwined with the crime of possession. The Seventh Circuit disagreed and reversed the conviction. Whatever minimal relevance the evidence had, it was outweighed by its prejudicial effect. In a separate holding, the appellate court held that it was error to permit the government to bring in numerous other guns found at the house (all legal) and to repeatedly emphasize that the “guns were rendered safe” in the courtroom, thus exploiting the jurors’ fear of guns. The display of guns in the courtroom served no legitimate purpose.

United States v. Cooper, 591 F.3d 582 (7th Cir. 2010)
The defendant was charged with distributing heroin. The fact that some of his customers died from the heroin was too prejudicial to be admitted at trial. Though this evidence was surely admissible at sentencing, it was not probative of any issue at trial and therefore should have been excluded under Rule 403. Harmless error.

United States v. Nobari, 574 F.3d 1065 (9th Cir. 2009)
Eliciting testimony that Mexicans are involved in the drug trade in one way, and Middle Easterners are involved in another aspect, was improper, especially given the government’s closing argument that pointed out that the Middle Eastern defendants played precisely the role that was described by the agent. To the extent that the evidence was minimally relevant (for example, there was a taped call where one of the conspirators referred to “the Mexicans”), the evidence should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403.

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008)
The defendants were charged with funding a terrorist organization. At trial, the government was permitted to introduce testimony from a victim of the terrorist organizations’ bombings. The government also called a person who attended a terrorist training camp. The defendants were not alleged to have had any involvement in the bombings. The Second Circuit reversed the convictions, holding that the probative value of this testimony was outweighed by the unfair prejudicial effect.

United States v. Parr, 545 F.3d 491 (7th Cir. 2008)
The defendant was charged with committing a terrorist act (threatening to use a weapon of mass destruction against a federal building). At trial, the government offered into evidence “The Anarchist Cookbook”. This was improper under Rule 403. Though certain portions could be admitted, allowing the entire book to be sent to the jury during deliberations was an abuse of discretion. Harmless error.

United States v. Stout, 509 F.3d 796 (6th Cir. 2007)
The district court correctly excluded evidence in this child pornography possession case that the defendant had previously been convicted of videotaping a fifteen year old neighbor in the shower. The 404(b) evidence was more lurid than the charged offense and was too prejudicial. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the trial court’s decision, relying in large part on Rule 403’s balancing requirement.

United States v. Sine, 493 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2007)

In a prior civil proceeding, a judge made numerous extremely unflattering comments about the defendant, who was a lawyer in that case. When the defendant testified at his criminal trial – as well as other witnesses – the prosecutor confronted him with those observations by the judge. The district court should have excluded this line of cross-examination pursuant to Rule 403 and as hearsay.

United States v. Moran, 493 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 2007)

Excluding evidence about what the defendant was told by her attorney and CPA about the legitimacy of the tax shelters was reversible error. Such testimony is not hearsay and cannot be excluded pursuant to Rule 403.

United States v. Curtin, 489 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant crossed a state line, according to the government, with the intent to have sex with a minor, with whom he had “chat room” discussions. He defended the charge on the basis that it was all just role play and he expected to meet an adult woman. In his possession when he was arrested was a “personal digital assistant” (PDA) with numerous stories about men having sex with young girls. The defendant’s subjective intent was the focus of the trial. The Ninth Circuit concluded, en banc, that pursuant to Rule 404(b), the contents of the PDA were admissible. However, the lower court failed to undertake the proper Rule 403 analysis and the conviction was therefore reversed. The trial judge failed to read the entirety of the stories that he admitted, relying, instead, on summaries and highlights.

United States v. Newsom, 452 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. Evidence that he had various tattoos, some of which contained vulgar language, and others of which depicted pictures of firearms, should not have been admitted. The government argued that a witness (the defendant’s girlfriend) had testified that she had not seen the defendant in possession of a firearm and that the tattoo evidence was relevant to her credibility. The Sixth Circuit disagreed: whether or not the defendant had a tattoo of a firearm was not relevant to the witness’s credibility and her testimony that she had never seen the defendant in possession of an actual firearm.

United States v. Davis, 449 F.3d 842 (8th Cir. 2006)

The trial court erroneously permitted the government to introduce the “face sheet” of a search warrant in order to establish why the police were at a particular house (where they found a gun). Even with a limiting instruction, the unfair prejudice occasioned by admitting the search warrant face sheet outweighed the probative value of the evidence.

United States v. Mahasin, 442 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2006)
The defendant was on trial for various crimes. As the verdict was being read, he jumped the AUSA and assaulted him. When tried for the assault, he offered to stipulate that he was convicted of the other crimes and was sentenced. The trial court agreed with the government that it was not required to accept the stipulation and allowed the government to offer evidence about the prior crimes. This was error. There was nothing probative about the actual crimes for which he was convicted. Harmless error.

United States v. Quattrone, 441 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with sending an email to employees directing them to comply with the company’s documents retention policy (i.e., it was time to start shredding documents) and that he did so, knowing that the grand jury had just issued a subpoena seeking certain documents. The defendant contended that the email was sent in the midst of various important matters with which he was involved, including a fee dispute with a customer. He introduced emails that documented his attention to the fee dispute during the same time as the document retention email was sent out. During cross-examination of the defendant, the government asked about that fee dispute and then questioned him about whether, in fact, the fee agreement with the customer violated SEC rules, etc. The Second Circuit held that this line of questioning should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403.

United States v. Awadallah, 436 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with committing perjury in the grand jury. He defended on the basis that he was exhausted, confused and intimidated. The government wanted to call grand jurors as witnesses and have them testify about the circumstances of the defendant’s testimony, as well as their opinion of the witness’s state of mind (i.e., exhaustion, confused, etc). The trial court entered an order providing that a grand juror witness would be permitted to describe the objectively observable circumstances of the grand jury testimony, but would not be permitted to express any opinion about the defendant’s state of mind or express any opinion about the defendant’s demeanor. The Second Circuit held that this was a proper Rule 403 limitation on the grand jurors’ testimony.

United States v. Weiland, 420 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2005)

The government should not have been allowed to introduce four prior felony convictions to prove the defendant’s status as a felon. One prior conviction would have sufficed.

United States v. Gonzalez-Flores, 418 F.3d 1093 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defendant was charged with alien smuggling. Evidence that two of the young aliens suffered from heat stroke was unfairly prejudicial. The fact that the aliens suffered heat stroke was not probative of any element of the charged offense. Harmless error.

United States v. Wesley, 417 F.3d 612 (6th Cir. 2005)

The trial court erred in allowing testimony about the background of a witness’s acquaintance with the defendant. The background established that the witness and the defendant met in prison after committing a prior robbery. The prejudice of this evidence outweighed its probative value.

673
United States v. Mayes, 370 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2004)
The government offered evidence that a government witness had received an anonymous threat that if he testified, he and his kids would be killed. This evidence should not have been admitted, but it was harmless error.

United States v. Amaya-Manzanares, 377 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2004)
The defendant was charged with possession of a forged green card. At trial, the government wanted to introduce evidence that the defendant unlawfully entered the country. The First Circuit (reviewing the case pretrial), carefully analyzed the relevance of such evidence and concluded that though somewhat probative of the defendant’s state of mind, the risk of unfair prejudice was substantial. The court observed that the falsity of the green card itself was not proven by the unlawful entry evidence. Only the knowledge element of the false green card charge could be proven by the unlawful entry evidence. Yet, the risk was undeniable that the jury would simply convict the defendant of the green card offense without carefully limiting the proper purpose of the unlawful entry evidence. Ultimately, the First Circuit remanded to the lower court to reconsider the motion in limine under Rule 403.

United States v. Ellis, 147 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1998)
The defendant was charged with receiving and concealing stolen explosives. The government offered evidence at trial that the defendant had borrowed a copy of The Anarchist Cookbook, which includes chapters on explosives, but also on drugs, sabotage, and the use of lethal weapons. Without deciding whether the government should have been permitted to introduce a redacted portion of the book, the Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction on the grounds that introducing the entire book was reversible error. The defendant was only charged with possessing the stolen explosives; his “intent,” therefore was not relevant to any issue in the case. The court also held that offering evidence that the quantity of stolen explosives was sufficient to destroy an office building was reversible error. Again, neither “intent” nor “potential victim impact” were relevant issues in the trial.

United States v. Merino-Balderrama, 146 F.3d 758 (9th Cir. 1998)
The defendant was found in possession of child pornography. He denied knowing the content of the films, but did not deny being in possession of the films. At trial, he offered to stipulate that the films contained child pornography to avoid having them played to the jury. The trial court held that the government was not required to accept the stipulation. The Ninth Circuit reversed. Considering the issue under the standard of Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172, 117 S.Ct. 644 (1997), the Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction. The offered stipulation was conclusive on the element of the offense for which the government offered the tapes (i.e., the fact that they contained child pornography) and playing the tapes did not increase the evidence on any other relevant question (i.e., whether the defendant was aware of the contents), because there was no evidence that the defendant had ever viewed the tapes.

People of Territory of Guam v. Shymonovitz, 157 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998)
The defendant was charged with molesting and sexually assaulting numerous young boys. The government introduced evidence that he had various sexually-explicit homosexual magazines in his house. The government argued that this proved his “intent” and his knowledge that having sex with minors was illegal. But the defense at trial was that he did not engage in the charged conduct. The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction. “The mere possession of reading material that describes a particular type of activity makes it neither more nor less likely that a defendant would intentionally engage in the conduct described.” Introducing homosexual erotica was bound to bias the jury. Moreover, introducing the evidence to prove his “propensity” is precisely what is prohibited by Rule 404(b). The court further noted that literature is filled with criminal behavior, ranging from Lolita to Les Miserables. Finally, possession of these materials did not qualify as a “bad act” and was thus not admissible under any Rule 404(b) theory. See also United States v. Curtin, 489 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 1007) (en banc) – partially overruling Shymanovitz. In Curtin, the court held that the evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b), but the lower court failed to properly undertake the Rule 403 analysis.

United States v. Fulmer, 108 F.3d 1486 (1st Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with threatening an FBI agent. The defendant had been trying to convince the agent to bring fraud charges against the defendant’s relatives, but the agent had declined. The threat was not explicit: the defendant left a phone message that he wanted the agent to “look up” misprision of a felony and then said, “The silver bullets are coming.” The defendant claimed that the “silver bullets” referred to the evidence that he was going to produce supporting his contention that his relatives had committed a crime. At trial, the agent testified that this “threat” was received one week after 169 people were killed in the Oklahoma bombing. This was clearly prejudicial and irrelevant evidence. The prosecutor referred to the bombing in both his opening statement and closing argument. Again, this was entirely irrelevant to any issue in the case. The risk of unfair prejudice was substantial and the conviction was reversed on this basis. The government also invited reversal by having the agent introduce some bullets in evidence (to prove that they are “silvery” in color), even though they came from the agent’s desk drawer and had no connection to the defendant. Finally, it was error to permit the agent to testify that he kept an extra magazine of bullets in his car after receiving the defendant’s message.

United States v. Aguilar-Aranceta, 58 F.3d 796 (1st Cir. 1995)

Though the defendant’s prior possession of cocaine was probative of her knowledge that the package she picked up from the post office contained cocaine, the evidence was too prejudicial to be admitted and should have been excluded under Rule 403. The fact that the prior offense also involved the defendant’s receipt of a package mailed from Colombia to her post office box contributes to the risk that the jury would unfairly draw the inference that the prior crime proves that the defendant was guilty of the present crime.

United States v. Copple, 24 F.3d 535 (3rd Cir. 1994)

Though there is no prohibition in a fraud case on calling the victims to testify about their losses, there is no reason to allow the government to overdo it. Testimony that the victims lost their children’s college education funds or that the losses affected their health, was unnecessary and not relevant to any issue relating to the defendant’s fraudulent intent. The evidence, even if marginally relevant, should have been excluded pursuant to Rule 403. See also United States v. Holloway, 826 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2016).
United States v. Cortes, 949 F.2d 532 (1st Cir. 1991)

The prosecutor introduced the defendant’s identification card which showed that he was a Colombian national. The prosecutor argued that the defendant’s heritage linked him to the other Colombian conspirators. This was prejudicial evidence which far outweighed any probative value and required reversal of the conviction. The prosecutor was capitalizing on the preconceived prejudices which the jurors would have about Colombians.

United States v. Ferreira, 821 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1987)

The defendant was on trial for robbery. The trial court admitted into evidence the fact that the defendant was carrying weapons at the time of his arrest. Since the robberies were not armed, the Court of Appeals holds that this is reversible error. The weapons found on the suspect were not relevant to identity or any other issue in the case.

United States v. Forrester, 60 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1995)

An officer was asked why he had not included the defendant’s name in a report which detailed a cooperating witness’s statement. The officer responded that he already knew about the defendant, so there was no need to include this information. The government then asked the agent how he “already knew” about the defendant. The agent then detailed the hearsay statements of other participants. Although this evidence was technically not offered for the truth of the matter asserted (it was offered to explain why the name of the defendant did not appear in the report), it should have been excluded under Rule 403. The probative value of the evidence (in its non-hearsay context) was outweighed by the prejudicial impact the evidence would have.

United States v. Harvey, 991 F.2d 981 (2d Cir. 1993)

Defendant was charged with knowing receipt of visual depictions of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct. He claimed that he was entrapped and the government was permitted to introduce evidence of his predisposition. However, the introduction of obscene tapes seized from the defendant which depict adults engaged in acts of bestiality, sexual acts involving human waste and sadomasochism, was unduly prejudicial and necessitated reversal of the conviction.

Virgin Islands v. Pinney, 967 F.2d 912 (3rd Cir. 1992)

The defendant was charged with raping a young girl. The government introduced evidence that he raped the girl’s sister several years earlier. Though this evidence would have been relevant to prove intent, it was not admissible to prove “course of conduct,” because the prior offense occurred so long ago. With regard to the issue of intent, that was not a disputed issue – the only dispute was whether an act of sexual intercourse had occurred at all. Thus, introducing the evidence was reversible error. Under Rule 403, this evidence should have been excluded.

United States v. Ham, 998 F.2d 1247 (4th Cir. 1993)

Defendant led a Hare Krishna group which engaged in various acts of mail fraud, murder and trafficking in counterfeit goods. In its case in chief and in rebuttal, the government was improperly permitted to introduce evidence of the acts of child molestation which occurred in the community, as well as the defendant’s homosexuality. With regard to the child molestation, it was only shown that defendant was aware of these acts in the community and failed to take adequate steps to stop the practice. The government argued that the evidence was admissible to show the motive for the murder. The theory of the government was that the victim was killed because he published articles alleging that child molestation occurred in the community; proof that such acts did occur was necessary to show motive. The appellate court disagreed. The prejudicial effect outweighed the slight probative value of the truth of the victim’s allegations.

United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997)

In this bank fraud prosecution, the government offered, pursuant to Rule 803(8)(B), a bank examiner’s reports that detailed the defendants’ violations and the condition of the bank. The report also detailed numerous other violations that were not included in the indictment, as well as various other findings and conclusions that were not relevant to the prosecution. Though the report was admissible under Rule 803(8)(B), the court should have excluded substantial portions pursuant to Rule 403.

United States v. Morris, 79 F.3d 409 (5th Cir. 1996)

The defendant was acquitted of a substantive money laundering charge, but the jury was deadlocked on a conspiracy charge which included, as one of the overt acts, the same money laundering transaction. On retrial, the doctrine of collateral estoppel did not bar introduction of evidence of this transaction as an overt act in the conspiracy. However, the court concluded that the jury would be confused by this limited admissibility of the evidence and decided that pursuant to Rule 403, Fed.R.Evid., the evidence would be excluded. The Fifth Circuit affirmed, concluding that this was within the district court’s Rule 403 discretion.

United States v. Parada-Talamantes, 32 F.3d 168 (5th Cir. 1994)

The defendant was arrested as a passenger in a van which had false compartments and which was secreting over 100 pounds of marijuana. Over objection, the government was permitted to introduce evidence that the defendant’s brother sold the van to the driver. This was inadmissible evidence. Evidence of “guilt by association” is typically highly prejudicial and should be excluded. A defendant’s guilt may not be proven by showing that he is related to an “unsavory” person.

United States v. Ebens, 800 F.2d 1422 (6th Cir. 1986)

The defendant was on trial for violating the civil rights of an individual whom he killed. The trial court permitted the government to introduce evidence that the defendant had uttered racial slurs in the past. The Sixth Circuit holds this to be reversible error as the slurs had not been made in the recent past and had not been made against someone of the same race as the victim.

United States v. Irvin, 87 F.3d 860 (7th Cir. 1996)

The trial court erred in allowing the government to offer evidence of defendant’s membership in the Diablos gang. There was no showing that the gang was involved in drug activity and consequently there was no logical link between defendant’s membership in the gang and the charge that he possessed drugs with the intent to distribute.

United States v. Frasch, 818 F.2d 631 (7th Cir. 1987)

A defendant’s statement contained offensive words and highly offensive language and racially derogatory remarks. The trial court should have considered deleting these words from the confession or otherwise minimizing the unfair prejudicial impact of the language. Furthermore, the trial court should have questioned the venire panel using the actual language that the jury would later hear to determine whether that would impact on their ability to decide the case.
United States v. Roark, 924 F.2d 1426 (8th Cir. 1991)

Throughout the course of the trial, the prosecutor sought to convict the defendant of drug possession and manufacturing by referring repeatedly to the defendant’s membership in the Hell’s Angels. This was irrelevant to the charges and was prejudicial.

United States v. Roenigk, 810 F.2d 809 (8th Cir. 1987)

The defendant was on trial for perjury that was allegedly committed at a prior cocaine conspiracy trial of another defendant. At pre-trial, the trial court granted a motion in limine preventing the prosecutor from introducing evidence about the extent of the drug conspiracy which was involved in the earlier trial. The government violated this restriction during trial. Despite the defendant’s failure to object to the government’s violation of the restriction, the Eighth Circuit holds that it was plain error to admit this evidence. It was highly prejudicial and not relevant and should have been excluded. In essence, the government’s presentation of too much evidence constituted reversible error.

United States v. Ellis, 147 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with possessing stolen explosives. The statute does not require any proof that the defendant intended to use the explosives for any purpose. In this trial, the government introduced testimony that the defendant possessed enough explosives to blow up an office building and that he possessed the book “The Anarchist Cookbook.” The Ninth Circuit held that this evidence was more prejudicial than probative and required reversing the conviction. The book contained various passages advocating revolution, drug use and sabotage, none of which was relevant to the defendant’s alleged possession of stolen explosives. The evidence of the explosive potential of the material was especially prejudicial in light of the recent Oklahoma City bombing and lack of any relevance of “victim impact.”

United States v. Kallin, 50 F.3d 689 (9th Cir. 1995)

In this tax evasion trial, the government elicited testimony from the defendant’s daughter that the defendant “dislikes Mexicans.” This was irrelevant to any issue in the case and should have been excluded under Rule 403. The admission of the evidence amounted to an abuse of discretion.

United States v. Bland, 908 F.2d 471 (9th Cir. 1990)

The defendant was prosecuted for being a felon in possession of a firearm. He was initially captured by police pursuant to an arrest warrant. The trial judge improperly told the jury about the basis of the arrest warrant. Though the existence of the warrant was admissible, the underlying offense for which the defendant was being sought at the time of his arrest was highly prejudicial and should have been excluded under Rule 403.

United States v. Elkins, 70 F.3d 81 (10th Cir. 1995)

Though the court never cited Rule 403, the defendant’s conviction was reversed because of the improper admission of evidence that a defense witness was the member of a gang. Such evidence is only admissible if it is shown that the witness belongs to the same gang as the defendant, or if it is shown that the witness was afraid of the defendant. Neither showing was made in this case and therefore the prosecutor’s cross-examination of the witness on this topic was reversible error.
United States v. Church, 955 F.2d 688 (11th Cir. 1992)

Though the error was harmless, the trial court erred in admitting evidence that some four years before the charged murder conspiracy, the defendant had engaged in a conversation with an informant that he would assist in the murder of a prosecutor of another individual. Because the extrinsic offense occurred four years prior to the charged offense, it was not probative of the defendant’s state of mind at the time of the charged offense. The evidence, moreover, was likely to prejudice the jury, because it related to the murder of a prosecutor. Under the Rule 403 balancing test, the evidence should not have been admitted. In gauging the question of when a prior offense is too remote, one factor to consider is the nature of the crime: Prior crimes involving deliberate and carefully premeditated intent – such as fraud and forgery – are far more likely to have probative value than prior crimes involving a quickly and spontaneously formed intent – such as assault.

United States v. Manner, 887 F.2d 317 (D.C.Cir. 1989)

Though relevant on the issue of intent, evidence that a drug defendant sold drugs after the crimes with which he was charged should not have been admitted without an on-the-record finding that the relevance outweighed the prejudicial effect.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 404(a) – Character Evidence)

SEE ALSO: CHARACTER EVIDENCE

United States v. De Leon, 728 F.3d 500 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant did not testify at trial. The defense called a character witness who was asked if the defendant was a law-abiding person. The prosecutor objected, citing Rule 608(a). The trial court improperly sustained the objection. Rule 404(a) allows the defense to introduce evidence of the defendant’s law-abiding trait. This rule applies regardless of whether the defendant testifies. Rule 608(a), on the other hand, only applies to the credibility of a witness (either the defendant, or any other witness), and focuses on the issues of truthfulness, not law-abidingness. Harmless error.

United States v. Farmer, 583 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2009)

Allowing the government to repeatedly refer to the defendant by his nickname, “Murder,” in this attempted murder trial violated Rule 404(a) and required reversing the conviction. The prosecutor repeatedly used that nickname – during opening statement, closing argument and during questioning of the witnesses – in a manner that was designed to prejudice the defendant’s right to get a fair trial.

United States v. Yarbrough, 527 F.3d 1092 (10th Cir. 2008)

The trial court erred in excluding good character evidence in this obstruction of justice trial. The fact that the defendant acknowledged committing the acts with which he was charged did not foreclose him from contending that he not act willfully in violation of the law. His reputation for law-abidingness, and his general good character were relevant on this issue.

United States v. Baldwin, 418 F.3d 575 (6th Cir. 2005)

Profile evidence is inadmissible as evidence of the defendant’s guilt of a charged offense. The defendant may offer good character evidence under Rule 404(a), but the government may not offer profile evidence. In limited circumstances, the prosecution may offer profile evidence to demonstrate why a suspect was stopped, but this showing must be relevant to an issue in the case, not just a pretext for admitting the profile evidence. Admitting the evidence in this case was error, but harmless.

In re Sealed Case, 352 F.3d 409 (D. C. Cir. 2003)

The trial court erred in excluding defendant’s evidence relating to his reputation for truthfulness and honesty in the community. Counsel argued that these issues were admissible even though the defendant did not testify, because the issue of his honesty and truthfulness were inherent in the charges (i.e., being a straw purchaser for firearms). Under Rule 404(a), the character trait for lawfulness is pertinent to almost all criminal offenses. Evidence on the specific character traits for truthfulness and honesty is admissible when the defendant is charged with an offense in which fraud or falsehood is one of its statutory elements. (When the defendant testifies, such evidence is also admissible – though this might be pursuant to Rule 608(a), as well). In this case, the charges were akin to charges of fraud, or making false statements. Excluding the evidence in this case was harmless.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 404(b) – Similar Transactions – General Principles)

The Court suggests that it would not be proper to bar the government from introducing Rule 404(b) evidence when a defendant offers to stipulate the fact sought to be proved by the evidence (e.g., knowledge, intent).

The collateral estoppel component of the double jeopardy clause does not prohibit the use of conduct that was the subject of a prior acquittal as 404(b) evidence in a subsequent trial.

The Supreme Court holds that the only preliminary decision which a trial court must make in admitting 404(b) evidence is whether the government can establish that there is sufficient evidence to support a finding by the jury that the defendant committed a similar act. The government need not establish the defendant’s commission of the prior act by a preponderance of the evidence or by any other standard.

United States v. Green, 842 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2016)

A defendant may enter a plea of nolo contendere pursuant to Rule 11(a)(6), which requires the court to consider the public interest in allowing such a plea: “Before accepting a plea of nolo contendere, the court must consider the parties’ views and the public interest in the effective administration of justice.” Id. The conviction that results following a nolo contendere plea is essentially the same for most purposes, including the conviction’s eligibility as the basis for recidivist punishment if the defendant commits another crime, the conviction’s use as impeachment pursuant to Rule 609, and the conviction’s use for deportation purposes. One exception, however, was found in United States v. Green, 842 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2016). In Green, the government sought to prove that a defendant had a prior conviction for the same offense for which he was on trial pursuant to Rule 404(b). The prior conviction was based on a nolo contendere plea. Citing Rule 803(22), the Green court, after thoroughly analyzing the ins and outs of nolo pleas, held that a conviction based on a nolo plea may not be introduced to prove that the defendant committed a prior similar act.

United States v. Gomez, 763 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2014) (en banc)

The Seventh Circuit, sitting en banc, reconstructs the analysis that must be used in deciding whether to admit other crimes evidence. Rather than a strict four-part test, the court insists that the ultimate questions are relevance and unfair prejudice and issues such as similarity and recency are relevant, but not “checklist” items that must be checked: “The extent to which a proffered “other crime, wrong, or act” is close in time and similar to the conduct at issue in the case may have a bearing on its relevance, which is the starting point for all evidence questions, but the importance of testing for similarity and recency will depend on the specific purpose for which the other-act evidence is offered. The proponent of the other-act evidence should address its relevance directly, without the straightjacket of an artificial checklist.” Second, the government must explain the legitimate purpose for which the evidence is offered in a way that does not include propensity as part of the reasoning. The trial court must not simply ask whether the other act evidence is being offered for a non-propensity purpose; the court must ask how the evidence establishes an element in a non-propensity way. And, finally, the court must determine whether the non-propensity purpose is a legitimately disputed issue at trial that would make the evidence more probative on that issue than prejudicial. Thus, with general intent crimes, such as drug possession or drug distribution offenses, the mere fact that the defendant enters a not guilty plea does not make his intent an issue that can be proven by the government with Rule 404(b) evidence, unless the defendant expressly disputes his intent at trial. The court emphasized that a carefully-crafted case-specific jury instruction should be given to the jury that expressly limits the use of this evidence, emphasizes the burden of proof on the government to prove each element beyond a reasonable doubt, and cautions against using the evidence to prove that the defendant is a bad person.

_United States v. Robinson_, 724 F.3d 878 (7th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The defendant stipulated that he had a prior felony conviction. The trial court read the stipulation to the jury, but never cautioned the jury that the stipulation was only admissible for the limited purpose of proving his status in connection with the felon in possession charge. The failure to limit the jury’s consideration of the stipulation was reversible error, because there was no reason the jury would not have also considered the fact that the defendant was a convicted felon in deciding that it was more likely that he did, in fact, possess the weapon (which he denied).

_United States v. Bailey_, 696 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2012)

The government may not simply offer a prior civil complaint (in this case an SEC Complaint) in order to prove a prior similar transaction. The government must offer evidence of the actual conduct, not an allegation for which there was no admission. See also _United States v. Marshall_, 173 F.3d 1312 (11th Cir. 1999) (evidence of prior arrests is not admissible to prove the commission of other acts under Rule 404(b)).

_United States v. Scott_, 677 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2012)

The defendant was observed by the police taking something from a woman on a street corner and then retrieving something from a hole in a tree and giving it to the woman. The defendant was arrested for possession with intent to distribute. He did not deny that he was the person that the police observed at the scene, but claimed that he was engaged in legal conduct and did not participate in a drug transaction. The government offered evidence that they had seen the defendant many times in the past and that they had spoken to him. The trial court admitted this testimony. The Second Circuit reversed the conviction. First, the Second Circuit held that Rule 404(b) is not limited to other crimes or other wrongful conduct. The Rule’s limitation also applies to “other acts” and thus the evidence of these prior encounters must have had some relevance other than propensity evidence. Moreover, the “other acts” are not required to be “bad acts” in order to be subject to Rule 404(b). Second the court held that there was no relevance to this testimony, other than creating jury speculation that the defendant was, in fact, involved in other prior encounters with the law enforcement officers. Importantly, the defense was not questioning the officers’ identification of the defendant (if that were the defense, then their ability to recognize him and their prior familiarity with him, would be relevant).
United States v. Green, 617 F.3d 233 (3rd Cir. 2010)

The Third Circuit abandoned the “inextricably intertwined” doctrine in this case. The court held that the doctrine confuses the issues involved in a proper Rule 404(b) analysis. If the evidence is not admissible under Rule 404(b) and it is not, in fact, part of the charged offense, then it will not be held to be admissible under the separate “inextricably intertwined” doctrine. However, offenses that are committed that facilitate the commission of the charged offense, will be admitted.

United States v. Gorman, 613 F.3d 711 (7th Cir. 2010)

The Seventh Circuit expresses considerable concern about the use of the “inextricably intertwined” evidence doctrine. If the evidence does not in fact relate directly to the charged offense then it should be required to pass the test under Rule 404(b) and 403, rather than being admitted pursuant to an ill-defined notion of “inextricably intertwined.”

United States v. McCallum, 584 F.3d 471 (2d Cir. 2009)

In addition to deciding that a similar transaction meets one of the permissible purposes outlined in Rule 404(b) and not for a proscribed “propensity” purpose, the trial court must also engage in the Rule 403 balancing test to determine if the prejudicial impact substantially outweighs the legitimate probative value. The trial court failed to articulate that he engaged in the Rule 403 balancing test in this case. The appellate court, however, was able to make that determination based on the evidence in the case and the conviction was affirmed.

United States v. Newsom, 452 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2006)

The Sixth Circuit cautions trial courts not to instruct the jury on a laundry list of permissible reasons that Rule 404(b) evidence may be admitted when, in fact, only one permissible purpose applies. Thus, the court should not instruct the jury that other crime evidence may be admitted to establish motive, when the defendant’s motive is not an issue in the case and the other crime evidence has no relevance to any motive. The same applies to accident.

Gibson v. Ortiz, 387 F.3d 812 (9th Cir. 2004)

The California state jury instruction in this case provided that a prior sexual offense need only be proven by a preponderance of the evidence; and that a prior sexual offense, if proven, could lead to the inference that the defendant committed the charged offense. This violated the due process clause, because it suggested a burden of less than proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The court also held that inconsistent instructions that emphasized the proper burden of proof did not cure the infirmity. “Language that merely contradicts and does not explain a constitutionally infirm instruction will not suffice to absolve the infirmity. A reviewing court has no way of knowing which of the two irreconcilable instructions the jurors applied in reaching their verdict.” Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 322 (1985). See also Doe v. Busby, 661 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2011) (relying on Gibson in reversing defendant’s conviction). The Ninth Circuit later overruled Gibson v. Ortiz, on the basis that it applied the incorrect AEDPA standard of review. Byrd v. Lewis, 566 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 2009).

United States v. Sampson, 385 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2004)

Defendant was charged with a drug offense committed in 1998 and another offense committed in 2000. He demonstrated that he would testify at a trial involving the 1998 offense, but not the 2000 offense. The Second Circuit concluded that the events surrounding the 2000 incident would not have been admissible in a trial involving just the 1998 transaction, because the defendant contended that he was not the person who was involved in the 1998 event – thus his “intent” was not in issue and the 2000 event could not be introduced to prove his intent. Because the evidence of the 2000 offense would not have been admissible under Rule 404(b) and the defendant demonstrated that he had a plausible basis for testifying at a trial involving just the 1998 offense, the failure to sever the counts was reversible error.

United States v. DeSantis, 134 F.3d 760 (6th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with mail fraud. During trial, the government introduced evidence that the defendant's sales practices arguably violated Ohio state law. The appellate court held that in this context, the trial court should have instructed the jury that the violation of state law is not synonymous with mail fraud. Moreover, the intent to violate the state law is not sufficient to establish intent to commit mail fraud.

United States v. Jones, 159 F.3d 969 (6th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in prohibiting the defendant from stipulating to the prior conviction in this § 922(g)(1) prosecution. See Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172, 117 S.Ct. 644 (1997). Harmless error.

United States v. Thomas, 134 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 1998)

In an entrapment case, the defendant is entitled, pursuant to both Rules 404(b) and 405(b) to introduce evidence of his lack of criminal record – that is, his good character. The defendant's "character" is relevant in an entrapment case on the issue of predisposition.

United States v. Vavages, 151 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with a marijuana offense. The evidence established that a car was stopped and that the occupants fled and marijuana was found in the vehicle. The defendant denied being in the vehicle. He had previously been involved in an offense in which he fled from a car that had marijuana in it. This evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b). The question in the present case was whether the defendant was in the car – i.e., identity of the perpetrator. The fact that the defendant previously fled from a car in which there was marijuana did not establish that he was the perpetrator in this case, because the two offenses were not so similar that the jury could reason that whoever committed the first offense was likely to be the person who committed this offense.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 404(b) -- Similar Transactions; Other Offenses – DRUG CASES)

United States v. Sheffield, 832 F.3d 296 (D. C. Cir. 2016)
While a prior drug offense may be admissible to prove an element of a charged offense, in this case, the government failed to show the relevant purpose: the prior offense was a decade old and the government only introduced the conviction without any evidence concerning the facts of that case, thus eliminating any proof that the prior conviction was factually relevant to any particular issue in the charged offense.

United States v. Hall, 858 F.3d 254 (4th Cir. 2017)
The defendant was prosecuted for possession with intent to distribute marijuana, and firearms violations. The government relied on a constructive possession theory and highlighted the defendant’s prior convictions for possession and possession with intent to distribute marijuana. The majority opinion exceeds 29 pages in the official reporter in reaching this conclusion and represents the gold standard for excluding prior drug convictions in a drug prosecution.

United States v. Green-Bowman, 816 F.3d 958 (8th Cir. 2016)
In Judge Bright’s dissenting opinion, he explains why improper argument by the prosecutor concerning the proper way to consider Rule 404(b) evidence should have resulted in a reversal of the conviction in this case. This dissenting opinion persuasively shows that when a prosecutor uses a “paralleling” argument, the jury is likely to consider the 404(b) evidence for an improper propensity purpose. In this case, the defendant was charged with possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. He had previously been convicted of the same offense. The prior offense was admitted to prove “knowledge” that the gun was in the car next to him. In closing argument, the prosecutor argued, “The prior conviction shows what he knows, what happens: When I have a gun, when I run, and when I eventually admit that I had the gun, I get convicted of carrying a weapon. So what did he do here? He walks away, he lies about even being in the car, an obvious lie. He walks away nonchalantly. The defendant knew – based on the context of what he had done previously and what happened the time previously, it shows what he knew on that day and why he acted the way he did.”

United States v. Carter, 779 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2015)
The trial court committed reversible error by admitting prior drug distribution evidence in this case. The defendant was charged with possession of precursors to manufacture methamphetamine and conspiracy to manufacture meth. The prior offense involved a different drug and did not involve any manufacturing conduct.

United States v. Stacy, 769 F.3d 969 (7th Cir. 2014)
Defendant was charged with manufacturing methamphetamine. Several years earlier, he was convicted of possession of methamphetamine. The trial court erred (though it was harmless) by admitting the prior offense. Other than demonstrating propensity, the evidence of the prior possession served minimal probative purpose in proving any element at issue in the charged offense.
offense. The court stressed that the focus of the Rule 403 aspect of the inquiry is whether the supposed limited purpose for which the evidence is being offered by the government is a disputed issue in the case.

United States v. Chapman, 765 F.3d 720 (7th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute heroin and gun charges. The gun and drugs were found in a bag in a house. The defendant denied having any connection to the bag. The government introduced evidence of the defendant’s prior heroin convictions and the circumstances of those offenses. The Seventh Circuit reversed: Proving defendant’s knowledge about distribution quantities of drugs was not relevant, because he denied possession of the bag at all. To the extent that the evidence was admissible to prove an element of the offense that was not in dispute (intent to distribute), it was inadmissible pursuant to Rule 403. The Seventh Circuit also held that the defendant should have been permitted to testify that with regard to his prior drug offenses (one of which was offered pursuant to Rule 404(b) and the others pursuant to Rule 609), the defendant should have been permitted to testify that he entered a guilty plea in those prior cases. This testimony was offered as “rehabilitation”: when he was guilty, he pled guilty. This was his effort to blunt the force the impeachment evidence.

United States v. Gomez, 763 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2014) (en banc)

The Seventh Circuit, sitting en banc, reconstructs the analysis that must be used in deciding whether to admit other crimes evidence. Rather than a strict four-part test, the court insists that the ultimate questions are relevance and unfair prejudice and issues such as similarity and recency are relevant, but not “checklist” items that must be checked: “The extent to which a proffered “other crime, wrong, or act” is close in time and similar to the conduct at issue in the case may have a bearing on its relevance, which is the starting point for all evidence questions, but the importance of testing for similarity and recency will depend on the specific purpose for which the other-act evidence is offered. The proponent of the other-act evidence should address its relevance directly, without the straightjacket of an artificial checklist.” Second, the government must explain the legitimate purpose for which the evidence is offered in a way that does not include propensity as part of the reasoning. The court emphasized that a carefully-crafted case-specific jury instruction should be given to the jury that expressly limits the use of this evidence, emphasizes the burden of proof on the government to prove each element beyond a reasonable doubt, and cautions against using the evidence to prove that the defendant is a bad person.

United States v. Lee, 724 F.3d 968 (7th Cir. 2013)

The trial court committed reversible error by admitting a prior cocaine conviction in this drug prosecution. The only purpose for which the evidence was admitted was to show his propensity to commit a drug offense. The government’s claim that the evidence was probative of his “knowledge, intent and lack of mistake” were simply surrogates for propensity evidence.

United States v. Richards, 719 F.3d 746 (7th Cir. 2013)
The defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy. He denied knowing that he was being used as a drug courier. The government offered Rule 404(b) evidence to show that the defendant was familiar with the drug trade. Admitting this testimony was not error. However, the government during closing argument insisted that the evidence proved that the defendant was, in fact, a drug dealer and therefore, the jury could infer that he was guilty of the charged offense. This was an improper propensity argument that was inconsistent with the limited purpose for which the 404(b) evidence was offered.

United States v. Smith, 725 F.3d 340 (3rd Cir. 2013)
The defendant’s conviction was reversed because the government was improperly permitted to introduce evidence of the defendant’s prior drug conviction. Even though the prior conviction involved conduct that occurred on the same street corner, the government failed to identify a proper purpose for the admissibility of the evidence other than an argument that implicitly relied on a theory of “propensity.”

United States v. Davis, 726 F.3d 434 (3rd Cir. 2013)
A defendant’s prior simple possession of cocaine was not admissible in this prosecution for possessing with intent to distribute a kilo of cocaine. There was no proof that the drugs were similar in appearance, or form, so the prior possession did not prove that the defendant, in the present case, was aware of what was in the parcel in his car. The Third Circuit canvasses other appellate courts’ decisions on this question and joins the majority in concluding that a prior possession offense is not generally admissible in a distribution prosecution.

United States v. Scott, 677 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2012)
In this drug prosecution, the arresting detectives testified that they observed the defendant retrieve something from inside a tree and hand it to a woman after receiving money from her. Then, over objection, they testified that they recognized the defendant, “from many previous encounters they had had with him.” The Second Circuit reversed the conviction, holding that this comment was an unmistakable reference to prior encounters the defendant had with the law. This evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b).

United States v. Miller, 673 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2012)
The admission of a prior conviction for possession with intent to distribute crack was error in this prosecution for possession with intent to distribute crack. The Seventh Circuit condemns the routine use of other crimes evidence in drug cases and declares that henceforth a rational explanation of how the prior offense establishes a fact in dispute must be made and simple statements such as, “it proves the defendant’s intent” will no longer be satisfactory. Here, the drugs were found in proximity to the defendant. He claimed the drugs were not his. The fact that he previously possessed with intent to distribute drugs did not prove his “intent” in this case, because he did not contest that whoever owned the drugs in this case intended to distribute them.
He denied that he was the owner of the drugs. The court also stressed the need to engage in the Rule 403 analysis.

United States v. McBride, 676 F.3d 385 (4th Cir. 2012)
Evidence that a defendant previously sold cocaine to an informant about two years prior to the charged offense of possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine was inadmissible Rule 404(b) evidence. Admitting this evidence was reversible error. There was no logical relevance to the prior crime evidence.

United States v. Sanders, 668 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2012)
Introducing evidence of a minor marijuana sale that occurred twenty-two years prior to the major cocaine smuggling operation that was the focus of this prosecution was error under Rule 404(b). The amount of marijuana was so small (i.e., the criminal behavior was relatively insignificant) and the remoteness in time was so significant, that any probative value was nonexistent. The court concluded, however, that admitting the evidence was harmless error.

United States v. Santini, 656 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2011)
The defendant was caught at the border bringing marijuana into the country. He claimed that because of a brain injury, he was subject to being tricked and presented a psychiatrist to support the defense. The prosecutor also presented an expert witness who testified that based on his review of the defendant’s “rap sheet” this defense was invalid, because he had run-ins with the law prior to the injury. The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction: the rap sheet was unreliable and did not distinguish arrests from convictions and was otherwise not probative of the defendant’s state of mind in connection with the present case. The government’s argument that the evidence was admissible to explain the expert’s opinion was also unavailing, because pursuant to Rule 702, the expert must base his opinions on reliable information.

United States v. Powell, 652 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 2011)
Evidence of a prior drug sale in a case alleging distribution of drugs is rarely admissible as Rule 404(b) evidence, because the issue of intent is rarely an issue in a drug distribution case. Harmless error in this case.

United States v. Tanner, 628 F.3d 890 (7th Cir. 2010)
Defendant was charged with being a member of a drug conspiracy. Several years earlier, he was in possession of a gun at a New Years Eve party. While there may be some limited relevance to his possession of a firearm previously (guns are “tools of the trade of drug dealers” the probative value was outweighed by the unfair prejudicial impact). Harmless error.

United States v. Johnson, 617 F.3d 286 (4th Cir. 2010)
The fact that a defendant may have been involved in drug activity in the past does not in and of itself provide a sufficient nexus to the charged conduct where the prior activity is not related in time, manner, place, or pattern of conduct. The prior drug episodes in this case occurred nearly five years before the charged conspiracy allegedly began. There was no link to the current members of the conspiracy. This was not harmless error in this case and required reversal of the conviction.
United States v. Jenkins, 593 F.3d 480 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was arrested in a house which contained ample quantities of guns and drugs. During his trial, the government offered evidence that the defendant was convicted of possession with intent to distribute marijuana at the same location in 1998, eight years prior to the events in this case. The government argued that the evidence was admissible to prove knowledge and intent. The Sixth Circuit reversed the conviction. Though knowledge and intent are generally relevant in any drug case, neither issue was really contested in this case. Even if the evidence was probative on either of these issues, it was "microscopic" at best and under Rule 403, the judge should have excluded the evidence.

United States v. Conner, 583 F.3d 1011 (7th Cir. 2009)

Though upholding the admissibility of other drug offenses pursuant to Rule 404(b), the Seventh Circuit rejected the lower court’s use of the "inextricably intertwined" theory.

United States v. Davis, 547 F.3d 520 (6th Cir. 2008)

The trial court admitted evidence of a prior marijuana transaction in this crack cocaine conspiracy and distribution prosecution. The trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the proper consideration of this evidence. The evidence could not reasonably have been considered as "preparation" evidence, because the prior marijuana offense was not undertaken in preparation of the crack offense. Nor was the evidence admitted a part of a "pattern." Perhaps the evidence was admissible to show the defendant’s intent in committing the charged conduct, but that was not the basis upon which the evidence was actually admitted and that was not the limiting instruction provided to the jury.

United States v. Taylor, 522 F.3d 731 (7th Cir. 2008)

The arresting officer was asked how he knew the defendant and he responded that he knew him based on his experience as a gang and narcotics officer. This was improper 404(b) evidence that was not necessary, or admissible. Judge Posner debunks the government’s argument that the evidence was “inextricable intertwined,” a phrase that Judge Posner described as “unhelpfully vague” in explaining why evidence was admissible. In the end, however, the court held that the inadmissible evidence was harmless error.

United States v. Simpson, 479 F.3d 492 (7th Cir. 2007)

The defendant’s statement to the police that he had previously sold crack cocaine was not admissible in this crack cocaine case because it was nothing other than mere propensity evidence. The government’s claim that it established the “identity” of the perpetrator was rejected by the Seventh Circuit – there was nothing unusual about the defendant’s offense and there were surely many other crack dealers in the neighborhood. The evidence did not meet the standard for admission under Rule 404(b), and was more unfairly prejudicial than probative of the identity of the perpetrator in this case. The Seventh Circuit also rejected the government’s “intricately related” theory of admissibility. The error was reviewed under a plain error standard, because counsel did not object to the defendant’s statement. Reversible plain error.

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005)
The Eleventh Circuit held that various acts of violence that the government was permitted to introduce against several defendants in this massive drug trial should not have been admitted. Harmless error, however, with regard to all but two defendants. The admission of improper Rule 404(b) evidence against those two defendants was reversible error. The court noted, moreover, “If intent is undisputed by the defendant, the evidence is of negligible probative weight compared to its inherent prejudice and is therefore uniformly inadmissible.” 432 F.3d at 1205.

United States v. Matthews, 411 F.3d 1210 (11th Cir. 2005) REHEARING GRANTED AND THIS DECISION WAS VACATED in December, 2005. 431 F.3d 1296

The Eleventh Circuit initially decided – in an opinion that was withdrawn – that a decade-old drug conviction should not have been admitted in this cocaine conspiracy trial. The defendant was charged with his participation in a massive cocaine conspiracy. The evidence against him, however, was primarily comprised of the testimony of alleged co-conspirators. The defense was that they were all liars. The government introduced evidence of a 1991 drug arrest and argued that the evidence was admissible to prove the defendant’s “intent.” The Eleventh Circuit initially reversed. The issue in the case was whether the defendant was, in fact, involved in the drug sales, not whether he had the requisite intent. The suggestion that “intent” is always an issue was not persuasive. The court found that it was impossible for a jury to properly consider the evidence for the limited purpose offered by the government (i.e., the defendant was engaged in the drug deals, and only his intent was an issue, and the prior offense was probative of his intent – that line of reasoning was, in the opinion of Judge Tjoflat, “preposterous”). This opinion contains a lengthy analysis of Rule 404(b) evidence in the context of a drug prosecution and was sure to be the leading case in this area of the law – until it was withdrawn. REHEARING GRANTED AND THE DECISION WAS SET ASIDE. THE CASE IS INCLUDED HERE FOR THE PURPOSE OF SHOWING WHAT A FAVORABLE DECISION MIGHT SAY, SOME DAY.

United States v. Jones, 389 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred (though it was harmless) in admitting evidence of two prior drug convictions in this prosecution for possession with intent to distribute cocaine. The only logical relevance of the prior convictions was proof of propensity to deal in drugs. This is the prohibited purpose. Harmless error.

United States v. Ramirez-Robles, 386 F.3d 1234 (9th Cir. 2004)

Evidence of defendant’s prior conviction for possession of a user quantity of methamphetamine was improperly admitted in this distribution of methamphetamine case. Harmless error.

United States v. Sampson, 385 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2004)

Defendant was charged with a drug offense committed in 1998 and another offense committed in 2000. He demonstrated that he would testify at a trial involving the 1998 offense, but not the 2000 offense. The Second Circuit concluded that the events surrounding the 2000 incident would not have been admissible in a trial involving just the 1998 transaction, because the defendant contended that he was not the person who was involved in the 1998 event – thus his “intent” was not in issue and the 2000 event could not be introduced to prove his intent.
Because the evidence of the 2000 offense would not have been admissible under Rule 404(b) and the defendant demonstrated that he had a plausible basis for testifying at a trial involving just the 1998 offense, the failure to sever the counts was reversible error.

United States v. Jenkins, 345 F.3d 928 (6th Cir. 2003)

The defendant received an express mail package that the police believed contained drugs. The package was delivered to the defendant’s house and shortly thereafter she was approached by the police and questioned. She denied knowing what was in the package, claiming that she was paid $50 to receive it for someone else. The police “told” her it contained drugs and she responded, “Yeah” but again denied knowing what was in the package. The government offered evidence that she admitted to being a crack cocaine user, though she denied that it came from the person to whom the package was ultimately destined. The trial court committed error in admitting the statement that she used crack cocaine. The use of cocaine is not sufficiently probative of her intent to participate in the possession with intent to distribute cocaine. The court also concluded that the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction.

United States v. Garcia, 291 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2002)

The government offered a twelve-year old prior conviction for selling two grams of cocaine for the purpose of proving that the defendant knew that the phone conversation had had with an informant was in code for a multi-kilogram cocaine transaction. The Second Circuit held that there was no showing that the prior deal established his knowledge of the code that was used by the informant.

United States v. Haywood, 280 F.3d 715 (6th Cir. 2002)

The defendant was charged with selling 18 grams of crack to an informant. He was arrested a year after the supposed transaction. In the meantime, in an unrelated incident, he was found to be in possession of a small amount of cocaine. The Sixth Circuit holds that the trial court reversibly erred in admitting the evidence relating to the episode of simple possession.

United States v. Millard, 139 F.3d 1200 (8th Cir. 1998)

The defendants, husband and wife, were charged in a methamphetamine conspiracy. The government introduced two prior convictions against both defendants. This was error (harmless as to the husband, reversible as to the wife). The only reason to admit this evidence was to show the defendants' "propensity" to commit a drug offense and this is precisely what Rule 404(b) prohibits.

United States v. Eggleston, 165 F.3d 624 (8th Cir. 1999)

The defendant was charged with possessing, with intent to distribute, crack cocaine that was found in the trunk of his car. His defense was that the drugs belonged to a passenger and he did not know the drugs were in his car. The government introduced evidence of a six-year old drug conviction. The Eighth Circuit held that this evidence was inadmissible, though it was harmless error. If the defendant claimed that he did not know what drugs were, or that he thought the substance was foot powder, his prior conviction would be probative of his knowledge. But because his defense was that the drugs were not his, the prior drug conviction was only probative of his propensity to commit the crime, which is a prohibited purpose.
United States v. Vavages, 151 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with a marijuana offense. The evidence established that a car was stopped and that the occupants fled and marijuana was found in the vehicle. The defendant denied being in the vehicle. He had previously been involved in an offense in which he fled from a car that had marijuana in it. This evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b). The question in the present case was whether the defendant was in the car – i.e., identity of the perpetrator. The fact that the defendant previously fled from a car in which there was marijuana did not establish that he was the perpetrator in this case, because the two offenses were not so similar that the jury could reason that whoever committed the first offense was likely to be the person who committed this offense.

United States v. Falls, 117 F.3d 1075 (8th Cir. 1997)

The government offered evidence that the defendant was involved in drug transactions on a large scale prior to his participation in the charged conspiracy. The government's theory -- this evidence proved that he participated in the charged conspiracy --- is exactly the theory prohibited by Rule 404(b). Admitting this evidence was error, but harmless.

United States v. Jones, 28 F.3d 1574 (11th Cir. 1994)

Though the error was harmless, the trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce evidence of gambling activity at a particular house, as well as the defendant’s prior gambling conviction in this drug/firearm prosecution. The government offered the proof on this theory: the defendant is a convicted gambler; gambling paraphernalia was found at the house where the drugs were found; therefore, the drugs belonged to the defendant. Among other problems with this theory, the government failed to establish that the gambling paraphernalia found at the house was sufficiently similar to the type of gambling for which the defendant was previously convicted. Also, the evidence did not satisfy the Rule 403 balancing test. Where, as here, the government has a strong case without the extrinsic offense, then the prejudice to the defendant will more likely outweigh the marginal probative value. If the government can do without the evidence, fairness dictates that it should; but if the evidence is essential to obtain a conviction, it may come in.

United States v. Simpson, 992 F.2d 1224 (D.C.Cir. 1993)

The defendant was stopped on suspicion of committing a rape. He was frisked and was found in possession of Dilaudid and cocaine. He contended that he was framed by the frisking officer. The AUSA questioned the defendant at trial about his knowledge of Dilaudid. He testified that he had had Dilaudid before, but did not know much about packaging of the drug. The trial court then permitted the government to introduce evidence of the defendant’s prior conviction for possessing Dilaudid. This was reversible error. No valid 404(b) purpose was offered for admitting this evidence.

United States v. Manner, 887 F.2d 317 (D.C.Cir. 1989)

Though relevant on the issue of intent, evidence that a drug defendant sold drugs after the crimes with which he was charged, should not have been admitted without an on-the-record finding that the relevance outweighed the prejudicial effect.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 404(b) – Similar Transactions – Non-Drug Cases)

United States v. Steiner, 815 F.3d 128 (3rd Cir. 2016)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce evidence of an outstanding arrest warrant for the defendant. The government claimed that this evidence was necessary to explain why the police went to the scene where he was arrested and also explained the “back story.” Neither explanation was accurate or sufficient to support the introduction of the evidence. Harmless error. This decision was re-affirmed following remand from the United States Supreme Court on a sentencing issue. 847 F.3d 103 (3rd Cir. 2017).

United States v. Gibbs, 797 F.3d 416 (6th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with possession of ammunition by a convicted felon. The ammunition shells were related to a prior shooting. The government introduced evidence of another shooting in which the defendant participated. This was improper Rule 404(b) evidence. The other drive-by shooting was not inextricably intertwined with the charged offense and was otherwise not admissible for a permissible purpose.

United States v. Martin, 796 F.3d 1101 (9th Cir. 2015)

The defendant was charged with federal tax evasion. Many years earlier, she had been audited by state tax authorities and been found to have taken improper deductions. The trial court committed reversible error in admitting the prior state audit results. When a prior act is introduced to prove “knowledge,” the government must prove a logical connection between the knowledge gained as a result of the commission of the prior act and the knowledge at issue in the charged act. The error was made even more harmful in this case by the prosecutor’s closing argument when he argued that the prior conduct showed that the defendant was a dishonest person. This is an impermissible propensity argument.

United States v. Briley, 770 F.3d 267 (4th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with reckless conduct (publicly engaging in sexual activity in a national park) and assault, which was the result of his encounter with the police who were arresting him for the reckless conduct. At trial, the government offered evidence that not long after the charged offense, the defendant once again visited the park and was about to engage in sex in his vehicle. The encounter with the police the second time was uneventful. The evidence should not have been admitted, because it was only marginally relevant to his conduct in the earlier incident, it was primarily just propensity evidence.

United States v. Gutierrez-Mendez, 752 F.3d 418 (5th Cir. 2014)

The defendant was charged with human trafficking. Two years prior to the events in this case, he had been stopped on the road with two illegal aliens in his vehicle. The Fifth Circuit held that the government failed to meet the threshold Huddleston test that the prior event had even occurred. There was insufficient proof that the prior offense involved the knowing harboring of illegal aliens. Thus, it could not be relevant to proving the intent (or knowledge) that the defendant committed the offense of human trafficking as charged in this prosecution.
United States v. Caldwell, 760 F.3d 267 (3rd Cir. 2014)

In this trial for possession of a weapon by a convicted felon, the trial court erroneously permitted the government to introduce evidence of the defendant’s prior conviction for possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. The defendant denied possessing the weapon. The police testified that they saw the defendant with the gun in his hand. The government argued (and the trial court agreed) that the prior conviction was admissible to prove knowledge and intent. The Third Circuit reversed: the prior conviction did not prove anything about the defendant’s intent or knowledge in this case. The defense was that he did not possess the gun at all, so his knowledge or intent was not relevant. In addition, the government argued that the prior conviction was admissible pursuant to Rule 609, because the defendant testified and the prior conviction was introduced to impeach his credibility. The Third Circuit held that the Rule 403 balancing test weighed in favor of excluding this form of impeachment. This is a significant decision that devotes nearly 20 pages in the published opinion to the inadmissibility of the prior conviction under either the Rule 404(b) or Rule 609 bases.

United States v. Brown, 765 F.3d 278 (3rd Cir. 2014)

In a trial for possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, a prior conviction for engaging in a straw purchase was improperly admitted under Rule 404(b). In the charged offense, the defendant was in a car and the weapon was found under the seat. The fact that he illegally purchased a gun six years earlier was not relevant to whether he knowingly possessed the gun in the car. One of the government’s arguments for admissibility was to show that the defendant knew what a gun was. The court dispatched this theory of admissibility summarily.

United States v. Smith, 725 F.3d 340 (3rd Cir. 2013)

The defendant was standing on a street corner when federal agents were conducting surveillance nearby. The defendant left, but then returned and was seen walking towards the agents with a gun in his hand. He was arrested. He was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon and with assault of a federal officer. He claimed that he retrieved the gun in self defense (there had been a shooting at that intersection recently) and never had the intent to assault the officers. The trial court permitted the government to introduce evidence that two years earlier, the defendant had sold drugs on that street corner. Admitting this evidence was reversible error. The district engaged in precisely the logic that Rule 404(b) forbids (i.e., the defendant previously was selling drugs at that location, so it is more likely that that is what he was doing that day). Though “motive” is a legitimate basis for introducing evidence, the government cannot use the prior offense to show that he was engaged in the same conduct again, which was the motive for committing the charged offense. The prior offense must itself provide the motive. In short, the chain of logic may not include a link that explains that “if he did it before, he is likely to have done it again (i.e., propensity).” The prior offense also did not qualify as a “common scheme or plan” because that principle applies when the uncharged crime and the charged crime are parts of a single series of events. Finally, the Third Circuit noted that the fact that the prior offense (drug dealing) was not the same as the charged offense (possession of a weapon and assault) is not what matters. Rule 404(b) is not limited to prohibiting evidence of “similar” crimes; it applies to any crime that is admitted, other than the crime with which the defendant is charged.
United States v. Mack, 729 F.3d 594 (6th Cir. 2013)
At the time the government introduced the defendant’s prior conviction for a prior robbery, there was insufficient evidence that he was, in fact, the perpetrator of the prior offense. All that was introduced was a copy of a judgment of conviction from a state court that had the same name as the defendant. Only when the defendant testified and admitted that he had that prior conviction was there sufficient information that he was the perpetrator and, of course, had the evidence not been admitted during the government’s case, he never would have addressed the topic during his testimony. In addition, the evidence of the prior robbery was insufficiently similar to justify its admission under Rule 404(b). The defendant’s charge in this case involved luring delivery drivers to vacant homes, stealing cell phones and carjackings. The prior offense was a typical street robbery. Admitting the evidence, however, was harmless error.

United States v. Hamilton, 723 F.3d 542 (5th Cir. 2013)
The defendant was charged with possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. The gun was found after the police followed the defendant from an apartment complex and stopped him and later found that the gun had been thrown from the vehicle shortly before it was stopped. At trial, the government offered evidence that the defendant had been a member of a gang. This was reversible error. There was no proof that the defendant was currently a member of a gang and absent that proof, the fact that he was formerly a gang member was prejudicial and not sufficiently probative.

United States v. Adams, 722 F.3d 788 (6th Cir. 2013)
At the defendants’ vote-buying trial, the government introduced evidence that numerous defendants were associated with drug dealers and that many of the co-conspirators had been involved in drug dealing. The government’s theory that this was admissible “background” evidence, or otherwise admissible under Rule 404(b) was rejected by the Sixth Circuit and the conviction was reversed. The appellate court also held that it was reversible error to admit a television “documentary” that discussed drug dealing in the county and suggested that the vote-buying scandal was somehow related.

United States v. Moore, 709 F.3d 287 (4th Cir. 2013)
The defendant was charged with carjacking, using a revolver to perpetrate the offense. The government was permitted to offer evidence at trial that the defendant possessed a semi-automatic firearm. This was error. The possession of one type of firearm is not probative that the defendant actually possessed another firearm that was used to commit the offense.

United States v. Qin, 688 F.3d 257 (6th Cir. 2012)
The defendant was charged with theft of trade secrets from GM. Previously (according to the government), he stole property from another employer. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the lower court’s decision excluding the evidence as too prejudicial and not sufficiently probative.

United States v. Clay, 667 F.3d 689 (6th Cir. 2012)
The defendant was charged with carjacking. The victim died before trial (unrelated to the carjacking) and another witness was unable to identify the defendant. The government introduced evidence that several years earlier, the defendant assaulted a girl on the side of the road and knocked her unconscious. Admitting this evidence was reversible error. The government reasoned that the prior assault showed that the defendant had the specific intent to cause the carjacking victim serious bodily harm or death. The Sixth Circuit held that the government’s argument was simply “propensity evidence” using different words. The government also introduced evidence that the defendant had stolen a gun from another car. There was no proof that this was the gun used and the theft from the other car was not logically related to the charged carjacking. Introducing the gun theft was also reversible error. Rehearing en banc was denied at 677 F.3d 753.

United States v. Curley, 639 F.3d 50 (2d Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with interstate stalking. Many years earlier, the defendant’s brother had assaulted the victim (the defendant’s wife). The Second Circuit held that admitting the defendant’s brother’s assault of the victim was reversible error, even though it may have contributed to the victim’s fear of the defendant himself. The Second Circuit also found it to be reversible error that fourteen months after the stalking incident, the defendant was stopped in a car and was found to be in possession of firearms, guns, a bullet proof vest, a ski mask and a will. There was too much speculation involved in linking the defendant’s conduct when he was stopped to the stalking incident.

United States v. Fawbush, 634 F.3d 420 (8th Cir. 2011)

The defendant was charged with molesting two young children. Evidence that he had previously molested his own daughters was improperly admitted as Rule 404(b) evidence in this case. In fact, even if there had been some relevance, the evidence would have been excludable pursuant to Rule 403 because of the highly inflammatory nature of the evidence (including the fact that one of his daughters fathered his child).

United States v. Wilson, 624 F.3d 640 (4th Cir. 2010)

In order to introduce Rule 404(b) evidence in the Fourth Circuit, the evidence must be “necessary” to prove an element of the charged offense. In this kidnapping case, evidence of a prior drive-by shooting was not necessary to prove an element of the kidnapping charge. Harmless error.

United States v. Corsmeier, 617 F.3d 417 (6th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with being part of a mortgage fraud conspiracy. On several occasions, brokers would give her small quantities of cocaine. The government argued that this evidence was admissible pursuant to Rule 404(b) to show her motive to engage in the fraudulent conduct. The trial court admitted the evidence on this theory. The Sixth Circuit held that this was error. First, the defendant engaged in the same fraudulent conduct with another broker who did not provide cocaine, so the motive theory was not particularly persuasive. Second, the prejudicial impact of this evidence far outweighed what little probative value it had. The evidence showed that the defendant was the kind of person who was willing to break the law and her entire defense was that she did not knowingly participate in the fraud scheme, because she was a successful businesswoman. This is the type of propensity evidence that is inadmissible under Rule 404(b).
United States v. Phaknikone, 605 F.3d 1099 (11th Cir. 2010)
A picture of the defendant on his MySpace page holding a gun, and which referred to him by the name “Trigga FullyLoaded” was not admissible in his bank robbery trial. Harmless error.

United States v. Klebig, 600 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was charged with possession of an unlawful unregistered firearm. His home was full of junk. A “breath-taking” amount, according to the Seventh Circuit. Items, including squirrel tails, oil cans, pornography, syringes, chemicals, prescription bottles were everywhere. The government sought to introduce a sign that said, “Nothing in here is worth dying for” and a surveillance system at the house. The government contended that the evidence was admissible to show “knowledge” that the sawed off shotgun had the characteristics that required it to be registered. The government also argued that the evidence was inextricably intertwined with the crime of possession. The Seventh Circuit disagreed and reversed the conviction. Whatever minimal relevance the evidence had, it was outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

United States v. Williams, 585 F.3d 703 (2d Cir. 2009)
The defendant was arrested outside an apartment after being chased by the police and charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. The gun that was found was in a garbage can near where he was arrested and an officer testified that he saw what he believed to be a gun in the defendant’s pocket as he was fleeing in the direction of where he was eventually arrested. Later the police searched the apartment where it was believed that he had previously been. Inside the apartment were numerous firearms and ammunition, which the trial court permitted the government to introduce as “background” or “to complete the story” or “opportunity.” The Second Circuit reversed the conviction. The evidence was not relevant or admissible for any of these purposes and was inadmissible bad character evidence, at best.

United States v. Commanche, 577 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2009)
The defendant was charged with assault with a dangerous weapon (a box-cutter) on Indian Territory. He claimed that he acted in self-defense. The government offered evidence of two prior aggravated battery convictions involving sharp instruments. This was error. The prior offenses served no purpose other than to show the defendant’s violent propensity. There was no showing that he claimed self-defense in the other cases. The government also introduced the evidence pursuant to Rule 609. However, this, too, was error, because the Rule 609 only authorizes the introduction of evidence of the fact of conviction, not the details of the prior convictions.

United States v. Morena, 547 F.3d 191 (3rd Cir. 2008)
Throughout the course of this firearm possession prosecution, the prosecutor repeatedly asked witnesses about the defendant’s drug use. There was no relevance of the drug use and the trial court repeatedly told the prosecutor to avoid this topic. The Third Circuit reversed the conviction, condemning the prosecutor’s behavior as governmental misconduct.

United States v. Reyes, 542 F.3d 588 (7th Cir. 2008)
The government offered evidence that the defendant and his confederates had participated in certain prior burglaries. The evidence of these prior offenses, however, was quite vague (even though the co-conspirators testified briefly about these prior events). This is one of the rare cases in which the appellate court holds that there was insufficient evidence that the defendant committed the similar transaction. Harmless error.

United States v. Stout, 509 F.3d 796 (6th Cir. 2007)

The district court correctly excluded evidence in this child pornography possession case that the defendant had previously been convicted of videotaping a fifteen year old neighbor in the shower. The 404(b) evidence was more lurid than the charged offense and was too prejudicial. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the trial court’s decision.

United States v. Jones, 484 F.3d 783 (5th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. The government sought to introduce a prior conviction for being a felon in possession of a firearm. The trial court erred in admitting the prior offense. The defendant was found in actual possession of the firearm in this case, so there was no probative value in introducing the prior conviction as far as his intent, or knowledge are concerned. See also United States v. Linares, 367 F.3d 941 (D.C. Cir. 2004).

United States v. Sumlin, 489 F.3d 683 (5th Cir. 2007)

The defendant was stopped on the highway by a drug interdiction officer. Numerous characteristics of the car suggested to the officer that the defendant was involved in drug smuggling. No drugs were found, however. A gun was found. The defendant was prosecuted for possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. At considerable length, the officer explained to the jury why the defendant was a suspected drug smuggler, including features of the car that suggested that the defendant was involved in drug dealing. The Fifth Circuit reversed: The government failed to satisfy the requirement that the extrinsic offense ever occurred, consequently, the evidence of the officer’s conjecture was inadmissible.

United States v. Rendon-Duarte, 490 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2007)

Evidence that the defendant previously possessed weapons was inadmissible Rule 404(b) evidence in this prosecution for possessing a weapon by a convicted felon. Harmless error.

United States v. Ortiz, 474 F.3d 976 (7th Cir. 2007)

The trial court probably erred in permitting the government to introduce evidence that the defendant and the informant were formerly engaged in an armed robbery together for the purpose of explaining their conversations relating to the charged offense of possessing a weapon by a convicted felon. The government argued that they had developed a code and that their prior involvement in the robber offense was necessary to explain the code. The Seventh Circuit held that admitting the evidence was a “close question” but that it was clearly harmless.

United States v. Curtin, 489 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 2007)

The defendant crossed a state line, according to the government, with the intent to have sex with a minor, with whom he had “chat room” discussions. He defended the charge on the basis that it was all just role play and he expected to meet an adult woman. In his possession when he was arrested was a “personal digital assistant” (PDA) with numerous stories about men having sex with young girls. The defendant’s subjective intent was the focus of the trial. The Ninth Circuit concluded, en banc, that pursuant to Rule 404(b), the contents of the PDA were admissible. However, the lower court failed to undertake the proper Rule 403 analysis and the conviction was therefore reversed. The trial judge failed to read the entirety of the stories that he admitted, relying, instead, on summaries and highlights.

United States v. Johnson, 439 F.3d 884 (8th Cir. 2006)

The defendant was charged with knowingly possessing child pornography. He denied knowingly possessing the pornography, pointing out that many of the images on his computer had never been viewed. At trial, the government introduced evidence of written material that was included on the computer involving child rape. The Eighth Circuit reversed the conviction, relying in part on its earlier decision in United States v. Heidebur, 122 F.3d 577 (8th Cir. 1997). In Heidebur, the court held that it was error to admit evidence that the defendant abused his child in a trial for possessing child pornography. Such evidence is nothing more than inadmissible propensity evidence. In this case, admitting the evidence of the written material relating to child rape was reversible error.

United States v. Owens, 424 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2005)

Evidence that a defendant previously robbed a bank was improperly admitted in this bank robbery trial. Based on the defendant’s defense, the prior robbery did not refute the defense offered by the defendant. For example, the defendant did not claim that he was a mere “pawn” in the charged offense (thus making the prior offense probative of his actual role in the charged offense). Moreover, because bank robbery is a general intent crime, the prior offense did not establish the defendant’s mens rea for the charged offense.

United States v. Fleck, 413 F.3d 883 (8th Cir. 2005)

The police went to the defendant’s house as part of an insurance fraud investigation. While there, the police found guns and the defendant was charged with possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. The trial court erred in permitting the government to introduce evidence of the insurance fraud information “to explain the officer’s conduct” or to more fully explain the circumstances of “the crime.” Neither reason justified introducing the evidence.

United States v. Griffin, 389 F.3d 1100 (10th Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to offer evidence from the defendant’s probation officer that the defendant knew that he was not permitted to possess a firearm. The defendant was on trial for being a felon in possession of a firearm. There is no requirement that the government prove that the defendant knew he was not permitted to possess a firearm. Thus, the evidence was irrelevant and the probation officer should not have been permitted to recite all the terms and conditions of the defendant’s probation. Harmless error.

Gibson v. Ortiz, 387 F.3d 812 (9th Cir. 2004)

The California state jury instruction in this case provided that a prior sexual offense need only be proven by a preponderance of the evidence; and that a prior sexual offense, if proven, could lead to the inference that the defendant committed the charged offense. This violated the due process clause, because it suggested a burden of less than proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The court also held that inconsistent instructions that emphasized the proper burden of proof did not cure the infirmity. “Language that merely contradicts and does not explain a constitutionally infirm instruction will not suffice to absolve the infirmity. A reviewing court has no way of knowing which of the two irreconcilable instructions the jurors applied in reaching their verdict.” Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 322 (1985). See also Doe v. Busby, 661 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2011). The Ninth Circuit later overruled Gibson v. Ortiz, on the basis that it applied the incorrect AEDPA standard of review. Byrd v. Lewis, 566 F.3d 855 (9th Cir. 2009).

The defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. He denied ever possessing the gun. The government introduced evidence that he possessed (and threw down) a gun several years earlier in Connecticut. This evidence was not admissible to prove knowledge, or lack of mistake (because, though knowledge is an element of the offense of possession, there was no issue in this case that he “unknowingly” or “mistakenly” possessed the firearm and the previous conduct would not be relevant to prove that he knowingly possessed the weapon in this case); or to prove intent – because intent is not an element of a possession offense. The defendant must know that he possesses the weapon, but there is no additional “intent” element of the offense. Given the overwhelming evidence, however, erroneously admitting this evidence was harmless.

United States v. Moore, 375 F.3d 259 (3rd Cir. 2004)

Defendant was charged with arson and possession of a weapon by a convicted felon. Throughout the trial, the prosecutor introduced various “bad acts” evidence that had no bearing whatsoever on the charged offenses, including domestic abuse and drug dealing. No objection was raised by the defense attorney. Then, in closing argument, the prosecutor labeled the defendant a terrorist. Again, no objection. The Third Circuit held that the prosecutor’s behavior amounted to plain error and reversed the conviction, noting, “There was a serious break down here.”

United States v. Jackson, 339 F.3d 349 (5th Cir. 2003)

In this conspiracy case (interstate transportation of stolen jewelry), the government was permitted to introduce evidence that the defendant had a prior conviction for theft of watches. The government argued that this established the defendant’s state of mind. The Fifth Circuit concluded that the evidence was admissible to prove the state of mind element of the conspiracy offense, but that the probative value was outweighed by its prejudicial effect (Rule 403). The defendant’s defense at trial was that the government had the wrong guy. Thus, while the government was still required to prove that the defendant had the requisite state of mind, the importance of the evidence on this issue was considerably diminished in light of the defense raised by the defendant. The trial court also erred in permitting the government to introduce evidence that the defendant was on parole.

United States v. Thomas, 321 F.3d 627 (7th Cir. 2003)
The defendant was tried for possessing a firearm by a convicted felon. Introducing evidence that he had two prior state court gun convictions and that he had a tattoo of two guns on his forearms was error. This was improper propensity evidence.

United States v. Latouf, 132 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 1997)

The defendant was charged with conspiring to burn down her restaurant to collect the insurance proceeds. The government offered evidence that the defendant had previously made comments to two employees that she would pay someone $5,000 to burn her house down. The Sixth Circuit concluded that the probative value of this evidence was outweighed by its prejudicial impact. The defendant's financial motive for burning the restaurant was abundantly established by other evidence, so the Rule 404(b) evidence was not necessary to show financial motive. Harmless error.

People of Territory of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998)

The defendant was charged with molesting and sexually assaulting numerous young boys. The government introduced evidence that he had various sexually-explicit homosexual magazines in his house. The government argued that his proved his “intent” and his knowledge that having sex with minors was illegal. But the defense at trial was that he did not engage in the charged conduct. The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction. “The mere possession of reading material that describes a particular type of activity makes it neither more nor less likely that a defendant would intentionally engage in the conduct described.” Moreover, introducing the evidence to prove his “propensity” is precisely what is prohibited by Rule 404(b). The court further noted that literature is filled with criminal behavior, ranging from Lolita to Les Miserables. Finally, possession of these materials did not qualify as a “bad act” and was thus not admissible under any Rule 404(b) theory. See also United States v. Curtin, 489 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 1007) (en banc) – partially overruling Shymanovitz. In Curtin, the court held that the evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b), but the lower court failed to properly undertake the Rule 403 analysis.

United States v. Mills, 138 F.3d 928 (11th Cir. 1998)

The trial court erred in admitting evidence that the defendant had committed a similar crime previously. The defendant was charged with violating 18 U.S.C. § 1001, as part of a Medicaid fraud scheme. The government introduced evidence that she had lied to U.S. Customs about a jewelry purchase upon returning to the United States from overseas travel. The government's theory was that she was the type of person who would lie to the government. This is precisely what is forbidden by Rule 404(b) – that is, propensity evidence. Harmless error.

United States v. Utter, 97 F.3d 509 (11th Cir. 1996)

The defendant’s business burned down. Evidence was introduced by the government that one of the defendant’s residential tenants was behind in her rent and the defendant threatened to burn her property if she did not pay up. This evidence was inadmissible. The government also introduced evidence of a fire at the defendant’s residence in Kentucky. The government failed to show that that fire was caused by arson, or that the defendant was the perpetrator. Reversible error.
United States v. Gonzalez, 975 F.2d 1514 (11th Cir. 1992)

The trial court committed reversible error in failing to give a limiting instruction to the jury relating to 404(b) evidence. Defendant was charged with a conspiracy to engage in money laundering. Substantial evidence was introduced relating to events which occurred prior to the time of the conspiracy as set forth in the indictment. The failure to instruct the jury about the limited relevance of such evidence seriously prejudiced the defense. The trial court should have instructed the jury that the evidence of similar transactions may not be the basis of the conviction, though such evidence could be considered as to issues of knowledge and intent.

United States v. Hines, 955 F.2d 1449 (11th Cir. 1992)

It was reversible error to allow the government to introduce mug shots of the defendant in an effort to show that the complainant had previously identified the defendant as the perpetrator. The use of the mug shots impermissibly showed that the defendants were previously in custody and were “known criminals.”

United States v. Church, 955 F.2d 688 (11th Cir. 1992)

Though the error was harmless, the trial court erred in admitting evidence that some four years before the charged murder conspiracy, the defendant had engaged in a conversation with an informant that he would assist in the murder of a prosecutor of another individual. Because the extrinsic offense occurred four years prior to the charged offense, it was not probative of the defendant’s state of mind at the time of the charged offense. The evidence, moreover, was likely to prejudice the jury, because it related to the murder of a prosecutor. Under the Rule 403 balancing test, the evidence should not have been admitted. In gauging the question of when a prior offense is too remote, one factor to consider is the nature of the crime: Prior crimes involving deliberate and carefully premeditated intent – such as fraud and forgery – are far more likely to have probative value than prior crimes involving a quickly and spontaneously formed intent – such as assault.

United States v. Philibert, 947 F.2d 1467 (11th Cir. 1991)

The defendant was charged with making a threatening phone call. The prosecutor should not have been allowed to introduce evidence that several weeks before the threat, the defendant had purchased guns and ammunition. The error was exacerbated by the prosecutor’s presentation of the guns to the jury, including a Thompson machine gun.

United States v. Lequire, 943 F.2d 1554 (11th Cir. 1991)

The improper questions posed by the prosecutor which inevitably elicited evidence of the defendant’s prior indictments and convictions were grounds for reversal. Curative instructions from the trial judge were not adequate to cure the error.

United States v. Lail, 846 F.2d 1299 (11th Cir. 1988)

The defendant was charged with bank robbery. The government introduced evidence of another armed robbery which occurred close to the same time as the charged armed robbery. The defendant’s case rested on his presentation of alibi witnesses. The Eleventh Circuit holds that the 404(b) evidence was not admissible. The uncharged bank robbery was not sufficiently similar to the charged crime to admit such evidence to establish identity. In order to admit uncharged crimes on the basis of identity, there must be sufficient similarity that the perpetrator virtually left his “signature.” Here, the mere fact that in both cases the robber acted alone with a gun and without a disguise is not sufficient to constitute sufficient similarity to admit the evidence under the identity rule. Furthermore, there were sufficient dissimilarities between the charged and uncharged crime that the evidence should have been excluded.

It was plain error to permit the government to introduce evidence of fraudulent checks which were in no way connected to the indicted offenses involving bank fraud and forgery.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 404(b) – Similar Transactions – Defendant’s Use of 404(b) Evidence)

United States v. Garcia, 729 F.3d 1171 (9th Cir. 2013)

The defendant was charged with murder and involuntary manslaughter as a result of his killing a person with whom he was fighting. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the victim had previously engaged in various acts of violence towards others and the defendant knew of these other incidents. The trial court erred in excluding this evidence. In a self defense case, the defendant’s knowledge of the victim’s prior assaultive behavior is relevant to show his state of mind in shooting the victim. See also United States v. Saenz, 179 F.3d 686 (9th Cir. 1999); United States v. James, 169 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 1999).

United States v. Parkes, 668 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 2012)

The defendant, a customer of a small Tennessee bank, was charged with participating in bank fraud. His company had large debts to the bank, in fact, the debts exceeded the lending limits permitted by the bank and the FDIC. The president of the bank altered the books to make it look like the loans were actually to several different unrelated companies (some of which were non-existent), so that it did not appear on the books as an outsized loan to the defendant. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the president had altered the books of the bank to falsify the amount of loans by other customers, as well (customers who were not aware that this was occurring). The trial court improperly excluded this evidence. This evidence was offered to show that the president had the means and the motive to commit the crime with which the defendant was charged. The fact that the 404(b) evidence would also show the president’s propensity to commit this crime did not automatically disqualify the admissibility of the evidence.

United States v. Wright, 625 F.3d 583 (9th Cir. 2010)

The defendant was charged with possession of child pornography on his computer. He defended on the basis that his roommate downloaded the child pornography on the defendant’s computer. The roommate did not testify at trial. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the roommate was computer-savvy, and that he had an interest in young boys. The Ninth Circuit held that such evidence was admissible pursuant to Rule 404(b) and that the limitations on Rule 404(b) evidence when introduced against the defendant are more relaxed when introduced against a person (witness, or non-witness) other than the defendant. Because the issue was not properly litigated in the trial court, the plain error standard applied and the appellate court concluded that the error in excluding the evidence did not rise to the level of plain error.

United States v. Montelongo, 420 F.3d 1169 (10th Cir. 2005)

The defendant was convicted of transporting marijuana in a truck. The owner of the truck also owned other trucks and another of the trucks was also found to have been carrying marijuana. When the owner testified, the defendant sought to cross-examine him about the other incident (to suggest that the owner was using the trucks to haul marijuana, unbeknownst to the drivers). Barring this cross-examination was reversible error. The defendant was permitted under Rule 404(b) to show the other incident to prove his innocence.

United States v. Stephens, 365 F.3d 967 (11th Cir. 2004)

The defendant was charged with selling methamphetamine to an informant. The transactions were recorded on videotape, but the content of the tapes was hard to discern and did not clearly reveal the defendant handing any drugs to the informant. Nevertheless, the police testified that they searched the informant before he met with the defendant and he had money, but no drugs; and when he returned from the meetings, he had drugs and no money. Prior to trial, the informant died of natural causes. The defendant attempted to offer evidence at trial that the informant was regularly using, buying and selling drugs during the time period of the undercover work. Defense counsel explained that his theory was that the informant actually hid drugs on his person, or in his car before he had the meetings with the defendant and he was tricking the police into believing that he was actually acquiring the drugs from the defendant. The trial court excluded the evidence, holding that this was an improper method of impeaching the informant – through prior bad acts evidence. The Eleventh Circuit reversed, holding that this evidence was admissible in support of the defendant’s theory that the informant had a source of drugs which explained how he had the drugs to give to the agents. The evidence was also admissible under Rule 404(b) – defendant’s use of Rule 404(b) – to show the informant’s other acts that explained his opportunity to commit the deception perpetrated on the police.

United States v. Cruz-Garcia, 344 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2003)

The defense attempted to prove the facts underlying the witness’s prior convictions to show that he had the capacity to commit the offenses with which the defendant was charged. The trial court erroneously excluded this evidence. The evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove the witness’s capacity to commit the crime. Indeed, the prosecutor had repeatedly argued that the witness was too stupid to have committed the crime without the defendant’s help. The court noted that Rule 404(b) should be more liberally interpreted when the evidence is being offered against a witness, as opposed to the defendant.

United States v. Cohen, 888 F.2d 770 (11th Cir. 1989)

The Eleventh Circuit holds that Rule 404(b) may be used by the defendant in an effort to introduce evidence of a witness’ prior bad acts. Thus, if a witness’ prior criminal acts or misconduct would provide a motive or demonstrate a modus operandi, or demonstrate a capacity (as here) to commit a crime without the aid of the defendants, such evidence may be admissible without regard to the rules of impeachment embodied in Rules 608 and 609.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 404(b) – Notice Requirement)

United States v. Carrasco, 381 F.3d 1237 (11th Cir. 2004)

The trial court erred in permitting the government to offer Rule 404(b) evidence without providing the required notice to the defendant prior to trial. The error was prejudicial and required setting aside the verdict.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 405 – Character Evidence)

United States v. Rutgerson, 822 F.3d 1223 (11th Cir. 2016)
Generally, specific acts of good conduct are not admissible as character evidence. However, if a person’s character, or trait of character is an essential element of a claim or defense, then specific acts are admissible. F.R.E. 405(b). In this case, the court held that when a defendant asserts an entrapment defense, Rule 405(b) applies and the defendant is entitled to present specific acts of good conduct (that show an absence of predisposition to commit the crime).

United States v. Thomas, 134 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 1998)
In an entrapment case, the defendant is entitled, pursuant to both Rules 404(b) and 405(b) to introduce evidence of his lack of a criminal record – that is, his good character. The defendant’s "character" is relevant in an entrapment case on the issue of predisposition.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 408 – Civil Settlement Negotiations)

_United States v. Davis_, 596 F.3d 852 (D.C.Cir. 2010)

A defendant’s offer to repay money to the organization for which he worked – in order to “make the situation go away” – was not admissible evidence in an embezzlement trial. The government offered the evidence as “consciousness of guilt” which is precisely what Rule 408 prohibits.

_United States v. Arias_, 431 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2005)

Rule 408 applies in both civil and criminal cases.

_United States v. Bailey_, 327 F.3d 1131 (10th Cir. 2003)

Evidence of a civil settlement is not admissible in a criminal case. In this case, the government improperly introduced evidence of a settlement the defendant reached in a civil action brought by the defrauded victims of the criminal offense. Other Circuits have held that Rule 408 only applies in civil cases.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 410 and Fed.R.Crim.P. 11(f))

The protection provided by Rule 410, Fed.R.Evid. and Rule 11(e)(6) Fed.R.Crim.P. (now located at Rule 11(f)) can be waived by the defendant. Thus, a defendant may engage in plea negotiations and agree to the government’s terms that the statements he made during the course of these discussions could, in the event a plea was not entered, be used for impeachment purposes at trial. This would be a valid waiver of the protection provided by Rule 410.

United States v. Escobedo, 757 F.3d 229 (5th Cir. 2014)

The defendant’s plea agreement provided that the defendant would waive his rights under Rule 410 / Rule 11(f) if he failed to comply with the terms of the plea agreement. The defendant tendered his plea, but later withdrew the plea. The Fifth Circuit held that the plea agreement was ambiguous whether this triggered the Rule 410 waiver, because he did not fail to comply with the plea agreement, he simply withdrew his plea, which he was entitled to do. Therefore, at his trial, introducing his withdrawn plea and related statements was improper.

United States v. Nelson, 732 F.3d 504 (5th Cir. 2013)

The defendant entered into a plea – later withdrawn – that contained an express waiver of his rights under Rule 410 to exclude evidence of his statements in the event he withdrew. At his trial, the government sought to introduce not only his statements, but also his then-attorney’s testimony about the circumstances surrounding the preparation of the factual basis. This violated the attorney-client privilege. The defendant’s waiver regarding the use of his statements did not also waive the attorney-client privilege.

United States v. Oluwanisola, 605 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 2010)

The defendant signed a proffer agreement that provided that the government could introduce the defendant’s statements as substantive evidence to rebut, directly or indirectly, any evidence offered or elicited, or factual assertions made, by or on behalf the defendant at any stage of the criminal prosecution. The defense counsel, in opening statement, suggested that the government would fail to prove certain elements of the offense. During cross-examination of a witness, the attorney questioned the witness about certain dates that he made observations. The district court held that both of these events triggered the waiver provision. The Second Circuit disagreed. Simply challenging the sufficiency of the evidence in general, or questioning a witness about certain dates, did not allow the government to introduce the defendant’s statements that were subject to the proffer agreement.

United States v. Newbert, 504 F.3d 180 (1st Cir. 2007)

If a defendant withdraws his guilty plea based on newly discovered evidence of his innocence, the government may not invoke the “breach the plea agreement” penalties (such as various rights waivers, including a waiver of Rule 410) that would apply in other situations when the defendant breaches a plea agreement.

United States v. Nguyen, 465 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2006)

711
A nolo contendere plea is not admissible; nor is a conviction resulting from a nolo plea.

United States v. Ventura-Cruel, 356 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2003)

The defendant entered into a plea agreement and entered his plea. However, his debriefings went poorly and the court ultimately withdrew the guilty plea, because the court concluded that based on the defendant’s statements, there was no longer a factual basis for the plea. During the ensuing trial, the government introduced a letter written by the defendant during the debriefings (it was essentially the “acceptance of responsibility” letter) that was incriminating. The First Circuit held that admitting this letter was reversible error. Technically, Fed.R.Evid. 410 did not apply, because the defendant’s statement was not anticipatory to, or part of, the plea negotiation process. The court concluded that allowing the government to use the statement gave them the benefit of the bargain while depriving the defendant of the benefit of the bargain. See also United States v. Escamilla, 975 F.2d 568 (9th Cir. 1992).

United States v. Velez, 354 F.3d 190 (2d Cir. 2004)

The defendant’s proffer agreement provided that any statement he made could be used by the government if any testimony at trial was inconsistent with the defendant’s admissions. The Second Circuit upheld this proffer agreement. See United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995) (upholding waiver of voluntary and knowing waiver of Rule 410 protection).

United States v. Millard, 139 F.3d 1200 (8th Cir. 1998)

During the course of trial, the government offered considerable evidence about the defendants’ efforts to negotiate a deal and cooperate. This evidence violated Rule 410 and was reversible error with respect to one defendant, though harmless with regard to another.

United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990)

If a defendant rejects an offer of immunity in exchange for testifying, and is then prosecuted, this evidence is admissible to show defendant’s “consciousness of innocence.” This evidence is not barred by Rule 410.

United States v. Serna, 799 F.2d 842 (2d Cir. 1986)

During the course of plea negotiations, a co-defendant stated that the defendant was the “wrong man.” These statements were made to a law enforcement agent, but the law enforcement agent was acting under the government attorney’s authority in questioning the co-defendant about his cooperation. The defendant sought to introduce this evidence at a joint trial. This evidence was inadmissible at a joint trial, because the statement was not admissible against the co-defendant pursuant to Rule 11(e)(6).

United States v. Acosta-Ballardo, 8 F.3d 1532 (10th Cir. 1993)

Under Rule 11(e)(6), statements made during plea negotiations are inadmissible, even for impeachment purposes, at trial.
EVIDENCE
(Rule 412 – Rape Shield Statute)

_Gagne v. Booker, 606 F.3d 278 (6th Cir. 2010)_

The Sixth Circuit held that the Michigan State Rape Shield Statute, as construed by the Michigan appellate court, was unconstitutionally applied. The defendant was charged, along with a co-defendant, of raping the defendant’s former girlfriend. The defendant sought to introduce evidence (in support of his consent defense) that he and the girl had participated in group sex previously. The Michigan court held that this evidence was barred under the state Rape Shield statute. The Sixth Circuit held that this evidence could not be excluded: the Due Process Clause assures a defendant that he may introduce evidence that is highly relevant and indispensable to the central dispute. REHEARING EN BANC GRANTED 7/20/2010. DECISION OF THE PANEL VACATED AND THE CONVICTION WAS REINSTATED. 680 F.3d 493 (6th Cir. 2012).

_Barbe v. McBride, 521 F.3d 443 (4th Cir. 2008)_

The defendant was charged with child sexual assault. An expert testified that the victim exhibited signs of sexual abuse. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the victim had been abused by other adults (and the child had made prior accusations about these prior assaults). Relying on the state rape shield statute, the trial court excluded the evidence. The Fourth Circuit granted the writ. Excluding evidence that would provide an alternative explanation for the expert’s findings violated the defendant’s right to confront the evidence against him. Pursuant to _Michigan v. Lucas_, 500 U.S. 145 (1991), the trial court must make a case-by-case determination whether the state evidence rule trumps the Sixth Amendment. In this case, the state trial court invoked a _per se_ ban on any evidence of prior sexual activity of the victim.

_Lewis v. Wilkinson, 307 F.3d 413 (6th Cir. 2002)_

The Sixth Circuit held that the application of a state rape shield statute in this rape prosecution denied the defendant of his Sixth Amendment right of Confrontation. In the victim’s diary, there were various references to her other sexual conduct and the fact that she was apparently viewed by boys as a “nympho.” She wrote, “I’m just not strong enough to say no to them. I’m tired of being a whore. This is where it ends.” Excluding this evidence was reversible error.

_United States v. Bear Stops, 997 F.2d 451 (8th Cir. 1993)_

The defendant was charged with child sex abuse. The child had previously suffered abuse at the hands of another. The defendant sought to introduce detailed evidence of the prior offense in order to explain why the victim exhibited certain symptoms of a sex abuse victim. Limiting this evidence was reversible error. Such evidence fell within Rule 412’s exception for evidence that is “constitutionally required.”

_United States v. Platero, 72 F.3d 806 (10th Cir. 1995)_

The defendant was charged with sexually assaulting the victim. He sought to cross-examine the victim about the relationship she had with another man (not her husband) a la _Olden v. Kentucky_, 488 U.S. 227 (1988). The trial court determined that there was insufficient evidence. of such a relationship and barred the testimony pursuant to Rule 412. This was error. If a jury
